THE PREFACE.

How unfit and how unworthy a choice I have made of my ſelf, to undertake a work of this mixture; mine own reaſon, though exceeding weak, hath ſufficiently reſolved me. For had it been begotten then with my firſt dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it ſelf to my younger yeers, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted that the darkneſſe of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Mee, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my Diſcourſe, with this our renowned Iſland of Great Britain. I confeſſe that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are run out in other travells, to have ſet together (as I could) the unjoynted and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh affaires, than of the univerſall: in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempeſtuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But thoſe inmoſt and ſoule-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured: with the deſire to ſatisfie thoſe few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adverſity, the former enforcing, the later perſwading; have cauſed me to make my thoughts legible, and my ſelf the ſubject of every opinion; wiſe or weak.

To the World I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were, (Fortune changing) ſped much better in any age. For Proſperity and Adverſity have evermore tyed and untyed vulgar affections. And as we ſee it in experience, That dogs do alwayes bark at thoſe they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo it is with the inconſiderate multitude; who wanting that vertue which we call Honeſty in all men, and that eſpeciall gift of GOD, which we call Charity in Chriſtian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given: led thereunto by uncertain report onely; which His Majeſty truely acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (ſaith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter: underſtand firſt, and then reforme righteouſly. Rumor, res ſine teſte, ſine judice, maligna, fallax; Rumour is without witneſſe, without judge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave Saint Auguſtine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praiſe of good men, and deteſted that of the evill. And herein no man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca; Conſcientiæ ſatisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, ſequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis; Let us ſatisfie our own conſciences, and not trouble our ſelves with fame: be it never ſo ill, it is to be deſpiſed, ſo we deſerve well.

For my ſelf, if I have in any thing ſerved my Country, and prized it before my private: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair ſun-ſhine day to a Sea-man after ſhipwrack; and the contrary no other harm, than an outragious tempeſt after the Port attained. I know that I loſt the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I muſt ſtill honour in the duſt; though further than the defence of her excellent perſon, I never perſecuted any man. Of thoſe that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: ſo as for this kinde of ſuffering, I muſt ſay with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themſelves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envie at ſuch their purchaſed glory, nor much lament mine own miſhap in that kinde; but content my ſelf to ſay with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other ſatisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope, ſeeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travell the World without a paſs-port. For were it otherwiſe; and were there not as many internall forms of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then ſome poſſibility to perſwade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But ſuch is the multiplying and extenſive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath caſt upon ſlime and duſt, as that among thoſe that were, of whom we reade and hear; and among thoſe that are, whom we ſee and converſe with; every one hath received a ſeverall picture of face, and every one a divers picture of minde; every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature ſo much triumpheth as in diſſimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found ſo great diverſity of opinions; ſo ſtrong a contrariety of inclinations; ſo many naturall and unnaturall; wiſe, fooliſh, manly, and childiſh affections and paſſions in mortall men. For it is not the viſible faſhion and ſhape of plants, and of reaſonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internall.

And though it hath pleaſed God to reſerve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himſelf: yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; ſo do the outward works of men (ſo far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to gheſſe at the reſt. Nay, it were not hard to expreſſe the one by the other, very neer the life, did not craft in many, fear in the moſt, and the Worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compaſſe it hath, to qualifie and maske over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be alſo true, Nemo poteſt diu perſonam ferre fictam: cito in naturam ſuam reſidunt, quibus veritas non ſubeſt: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long diſſemble their own natures. Neither can any man (ſaith Plutarch) ſo change himſelf, but that his heart may be ſometimes ſeen at his tongues end.

In this great diſcord and diſſimilitude of reaſonable Creatures, if we direct our ſelves to the Multitude; Omnis honeſtæ rei malus judex eſt vulgus: The common people are evill Judges of honeſt things, and whoſe Wiſdome (ſaith Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed: if to the better ſort; every underſtanding hath a peculiar judgement, by which it both cenſureth other men, and valueth it ſelf. And therefore unto me it will not ſeem ſtrange, though I finde theſe my worthleſſe papers torn with Rats: ſeeing the ſlothfull Cenſurers of all ages have not ſpared to taxe the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition, the ſevereſt men to themſelves, with Hypocriſie; the greateſt lovers of Juſtice, with Popularity; and thoſe of the trueſt Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of theſe natures which lie in wait to finde fault, and to turn good into evill, ſeeing Solomon complained long ſince: and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I muſt leave the profeſſors to their eaſie wayes of reprehenſion, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Eccleſ. c. 11. Nihil facilius quàm reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the firſt part of this Preface, following the common and approved cuſtome of thoſe, who have left the memories of time paſt to after-ages; to give, as neer as I can, the ſame right to Hiſtory which they have done. Yet ſeeing therein I ſhould but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, That it hath given us life in our underſtanding, ſince the world it ſelf had life and beginning, even to this day: yea; it hath triumphed over time, which beſides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vaſt and devouring ſpace of many thouſands of yeers, and given ſo fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei ſapiens opus, The wiſe work (ſaith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it ſelf. By it (I ſay) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled: How Kings and Kingdoms have flouriſhed and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made proſperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the leaſt debt which we owe unto Hiſtory, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Anceſtors; and, out of the depth and darkneſſe of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of Hiſtory a policy no leſſe wiſe than eternall; by the compariſon and application of other mens fore-paſſed miſeries with our own like errours and ill deſervings. But it is neither of Examples the moſt lively inſtruction, nor the words of the wiſeſt men, nor the terrour of future torments, that hath yet ſo wrought in our blinde and ſtupified mindes, as to make us remember, That the infinite eye and wiſdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the juſtice of God doth require none other accuſer, than our own conſciences: which neither the falſe beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the leaſt kinde, cover from his knowledge. And ſo much did that heathen wiſdome confeſſe, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (ſaith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedneſſe, think he can hide it from the everlaſting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS judgements in particular, upon thoſe of all degrees, which have played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The marks, ſet on private men, are with their bodies caſt into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of thoſe that lived with them: ſo as they who ſucceed, and have not ſeen the fall of others, doe not fear their own faults. GODS judgements upon the greater and greateſt have been left to poſterity; firſt, by thoſe happy hands which the holy Ghoſt hath guided; and ſecondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of men mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point far off, and to ſpeak of the converſion of Angels into Divels, for Ambition: Or of the greateſt and moſt glorious Kings, who have gnawn the graſſe of the earth with beaſts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wiſe working of Pharaoh, when he ſlew the Infants of Iſrael, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Jezabel, in covering the murther of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the law, with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſſe proofe, that far-off examples would not be left to the ſame far-off reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerved, what labour, practice, perill, bloodſhed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world have undergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed; to make themſelves and their iſſues maſters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Perſia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the reſt, no fruit, no flower, graſſe, nor leaf, ſpringing upon the face of the earth, of thoſe ſeeds: No, their very roots and ruines doe hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either overturned by the hand of man, or at length by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of whoſe ruines, are diverſly given by thoſe that ground their opinions on ſecond cauſes. All Kingdomes and States have fallen (ſay the Politicians) by outward and forraign force, or by inward negligence and diſſention, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerve, That the greateſt have ſunk down under their own weight: of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret ſua: Others, That the divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath ſet down the date and period of every Eſtate, before their firſt foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my ſelf a a day over to reſolve.

For ſeeing the firſt books of the following ſtory, have undertaken the diſcourſe of the firſt Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a Preface to travell after, and over-take far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the preſent, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who having beheld, both in divine and humane letters, the ſucceſſe of infidelity, injuſtice, and cruelty; have (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame pattern.

True it is, that the judgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more ſtrange) the affection of any one man ſtirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched moſt with that which moſt neerly ſeemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwiſe beſt ſuteth with his apprehenſion. But the judgements of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long proceſſe of time, and won to give his bleſſing in one age, to that which he hath curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſdome of it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to diſcern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among thoſe examples that are found in ages removed far from the preſent, as in thoſe of later times. And that it may no leſſe appear by evident proofe, than by asseveration, That ill doing hath alwayes been attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of Preface, run over some examples, which the work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conqueſt, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossest, over-reacht, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder brother Robert Duke of Normandy, *to make his own sons Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Neeces (*Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with above a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe over the rest, till we come to Edward the second; it is certain, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out; and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young yeers of Edward the third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his own Uncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be treason in his Uncle, which was indeed treason in himself, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and unsearchable judgement of GOD revenged on the Grand-childe of Edward the third: and so it fell out, even to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellour, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he alwayes took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those dayes, as others have done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves by the murther of Glouceſter; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himself (who in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) He was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousin-Germane and Vassall, Henry of Lancaſter, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown traiterous: who brake faith with the Lords at his Landing, protesting to intend onely the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himself; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should live. After that he had enjoyed this Realme some few yeers, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from conſpiracies and rebellions: he ſaw (if ſouls immortall ſee and diſcern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-childe Henry the ſixth, and his ſon the Prince, ſuddenly and without mercy, murdered; the poſſeſſion of the Crown (for which he had cauſed ſo much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race, and by the Iſſues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd: enemies, whom by his own practice he ſuppoſed that he had left no leſſe powerleſſe, than the ſucceſſion of the Kingdome queſtionleſſe, by entailing the ſame upon his own Iſſues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reaſon could have judged no otherwiſe, but that theſe cautious proviſions of the father, ſeconded by the valour and ſignall victories of his ſon Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the deſpaire of all reconqueſt and recovery. I ſay, that humane reaſon might ſo have judged, were not this paſſage of Cauſabon alſo true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus ſufficit, quæ Adamantinis credebantur radicibus eſſe fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment is enough to overturn the things that ſeemed to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the ſixth, upon whom the great ſtorm of his Grand-fathers grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-childe of Edward: although he was generally eſteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet as he refuſed the daughter of Armaignac, of the Houſe of Navarre, the greateſt of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the daughter of Anjou, (by which he loſt all that he had in France) ſo in condeſcending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Gloceſter, the main and ſtrong Pillar of the Houſe of Lancaſter; He drew on himſelf and his Kingdome the greateſt joynt-loſſe and diſhonour, that ever it ſuſtained ſince the Norman Conqueſt. Of whom it may truly be ſaid which a Counſellor of his own ſpake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il eſtoit une fort gentile Prince; mais ſon reigne eſt advenu en une fort mauvois temps: That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reign happened in a very unfortunate ſeaſon.

It is true that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practiſers and contrivers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, becauſe the Duke gave inſtructions to their authority, which otherwiſe under the Queen had been abſolute; the Queen in reſpect of her perſonall wound, ſpretæque injuria formæ, becauſe Glouceſter diſſwaded her marriage. But the fruit was anſwerable to the ſeed; the ſucceſſe to the counſell. For after the cutting down of Glouceſter, York grew up ſo faſt, as he dared to diſpute his right both by arguments and arms; in which quarrell, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their adherents, were diſſolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike down York: yet his ſon the Earle of March, following the plain path which his father had troden out, deſpoiled Henry the father, and Edward the ſon, both of their lives and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That ſhe lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that ſhe lived to look on, while her husband the King, and her only ſon the Prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the Crown was ſet on his head that did it? She lived to ſee her ſelf deſpoiled of her eſtate, and of her moveables: and laſtly, her father, by rendring up to the Crown of France, the Earldome of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000. crowns for her Ranſome, to become a ſtark

Beggar.

Beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtlety, which Siracides calleth fine; but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yeelded ſince the world was. Sirach. 19.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaſter were rooted up, one onely Earl of Richmond excepted: whom alſo he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelf ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter which Glouceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own preſence: of which tragicall Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the judgement of GOD in the ſame kinde. And he, which (beſides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himſelf had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Glouceſter to kill Henry the ſixth, his Predeceſſor; taught him alſo by the ſame art to kill his own ſons and ſucceſſors, Edward and Richard. For thoſe Kings which have ſold the blood of others at a low rate; have but made the market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame price.

To Edward the fourth ſucceeded Richard the third, the greateſt Maſter in miſchief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own perſon, than all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly upon the affections of Haſtings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her kinred, as he eaſily allured them to condeſcend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternall Uncle and halfe brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſevered from him: ſecondly, he wrought their conſent to have them impriſoned: and laſtly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their heads ſevered from their bodies. And having now brought thoſe his chief inſtruments to exerciſe that common precept which the Devill hath written upon every poſt, namely, To depreſſe thoſe whom they had grieved, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſt; He urged that argument ſo far and ſo forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himſelf, and of his brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For he cauſed it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whenſoever the King or his Brother, ſhould have able yeers to exerciſe their power, they would take a moſt ſevere revenge of that cureleſſe wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother; Rivers and Grey. Sceleta ſceleribus tuenda. Sen. de clem.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters Sons was without ſuſpect: and yet the Devill, who never diſſwades by impoſſibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But when he found by Catesby, who ſounded him, that he was not fordable, he firſt reſolved to kill him ſitting in councell: wherein having failed with his ſword, he ſet the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And becauſe nothing elſe could move his appetite, he cauſed his head to be ſtricken off, before he eat his dinner. A greater judgement of God, than this upon Haſtings, I have never obſerved in any ſtory. For the ſelf ſame day that the Earle Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of law, or offence given) by Haſtings advice executed at Pomfret: I ſay Haſtings himſelf in the ſame day, and (as I take it) in the ſame houre, in the ſame lawleſſe manner had his head ſtricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perſwaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earledome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely son; after many grievous vexations of minde, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; he had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischieves and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian Religion: and after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords, other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A polick Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdome, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the rains of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he alwayes weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazzard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the eleventh, whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like; but he was far more just; and begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever the taking off of Stanlies head, who set the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, son to George Duke of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the third, and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eighth, if all the pictures & patterns of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he advance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather hony, and in the end of harvest burnt them in the Hive? How many wives did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to have given his accompt to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the father; and executed the Earle of Surry the son; the one, whose deservings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings ſervice; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his leaſt diſpleaſure: the one exceeding valiant and adviſed; the other no leſſe valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But beſides the ſorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherleſſe and Widows at home: and beſides the vain enterpriſes abroad, wherein it is thought that he conſumed more treaſure, than all our victorious Kings did in their ſeverall Conqueſts: what cauſleſſe and cruell wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the fifth? What Laws and Wills did he deviſe to eſtabliſh this Kingdom in his own Iſſues? uſing his ſharpeſt weapons to cut off, and cut down thoſe branches, which ſprang from the ſame root that himſelf did. And in the end (notwithſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious proviſions) it pleaſed God to take away all his own, without increaſe; though, for themſelves in their ſeverall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For theſe words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy ſword hath made other women childleſſe, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſſe among other women. And that blond which the ſame King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffuſed by the ſun-ſhine of his grace: from whence His Majeſty now living, and long to live, is deſcended. Of whom I may ſay it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infuſed into one eye: yet could it not diſcern in his life, even to this day, any one of thoſe foul ſpots, by which the conſciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the ſword of his juſtice, with which the moſt that fore-went him have ſtained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed: That he hath received it even from the hand of God, & hath ſtaied the time of putting it on, howſoever he were provoked to haſten it: That he never took revenge of any man, that ſought to put him beſide it: That he refuſed the aſſiſtance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princeſſe did: That His Majeſty entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his own right ſet open; and into which, by a generall love and obedience, He was received. And howſoever His Majeſties preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witneſſe the Treaty at Cambray in the yeer 1559.) yet he never pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of Her long reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulneſſe to GOD for the uniting of the Northen parts of Britany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were ſevered but by ſmall brooks and banks, yet by reaſon of the long continued war, and the cruelties exerciſed upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely ſevered. This, I ſay, is not the leaſt of Gods bleſſings which His Majeſty hath brought with him unto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to their height, they will appear but as a Mole-hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the Hiſtorians ſince then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Roſe and the White, for the greateſt happineſſe (Chriſtian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdome received from GOD, certainly the peace between the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, beſides the ſparing of our Britiſh blood, heretofore & during the difference, ſo often and abundantly ſhed, the ſtate of England is more aſſured, the Kingdome more enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conquests. It is true, that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the yeer 1588. joyned the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South coast; and had His Majesty at the same time declared himself against us in the North, it is easie to divine what had become of the liberty of England: certainly, we would then without murmure have brought this union a far greater praise than it hath since cost us. It is true, that there was never any Common-weal or Kingdome in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings live in the world, and not above it. They are not infinite to examine every mans cause, or to relieve every mans wants. And yet in the later, (though to his own prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who as well in divine, as humane understanding hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Fin. comment. in Sal. 1. K. 4.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of presumption, and withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilfull and common Painters, which by her own commandment were knockt in pieces, and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall; and weak writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; do often leave to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely mindes, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I have inserted this brief discourse) with His Majesties temperate, revengelesse, and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them justly, and with an even hand: and withall but bestow every deformed childe on his true Parent; He shall finde, that there is no man that hath so just cause to complain, as the King himself hath. Now as we have told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Personages: so we find, that GOD is every-where the same God. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation and unnaturall cruelty of Henry the first, and of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations; so dealt he with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the Great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torn out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the son of Pepin the eldest son of Charlemaine, and Heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poysoning, imprisonments, and civill war; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himself of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his bastard brothers by a civill death (having inclosed them with sure guard all the dayes of their lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: Yet God raised up against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his own sons, with whom

(to

(to ſatisfie their ambition) he had ſhared his eſtate, and given them Crowns to wear, and Kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had four, three by his firſt wife, and one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition, That he had uſed violence towards his brothers and kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be ſlain. Eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus, & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit; Becauſe he uſed violence to his brothers and kinſmen, and ſuffered his nephew to be ſlain, whom he might have delivered. Sig. Paſſim. rerum. l. 5. a. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which he performed in the Generall Aſſembly of the States, it follows: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat: After this he did openly confeſſe himſelf to have erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, he underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew. Paſſ. Ibidem.

This he did, and it was praiſe-worthy. But the blood that is unjuſtly ſpilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

This King, as I have ſaid, had foure ſons. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gave the Kingdom of Italy, as Charlemaine his father had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gave the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bavier: and to Charles, whom he had by a ſecond wife, called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this ſecond wife, being a mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitain; thereby to greaten Charles, which, after the death of his ſon Pepin, he proſecuted to effect againſt his Grand-childe bearing the ſame name. In the mean while, being invaded by his ſon Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bavier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyne in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt brother. They fight neer to Auxerre the moſt bloody battell that ever was ſtrucken in France: in which, the marvellous loſſe of Nobility, and men of war, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunnes to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the bald by treaſon ſeizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter: Carloman rebells againſt his father Charles the bald, the father burns out the eyes of his ſon Carloman; Bavier invades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, He is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his own conſcience, for his Rebellion againſt his father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monaſtery. Charles the bald the Uncle oppreſſeth his Nephews the Sons of Lothaire, he uſurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier his elder brother; Baviers Armies and his ſon Carloman are beaten, he dies of grief, and the Uſurper Charles is poyſoned by Zedechias a Jew, his Phyſician, his ſon Loys le Beque dies of the ſame drink. Beque had Charles the ſimple, and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman ; they rebell againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breaks his neck, the younger is ſlain by a wilde Bore ; the ſon of Bavier had the ſame ill deſtiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a window in ſporting with his companions. Charles the groſſe becomes Lord of all that the ſons of Debonaire held in Germany ; wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the ſimple : but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his underſtanding; he dies a diſtracted Beggar. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the brother of Eudes : and laſtly, being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, he is forced to dye in the priſon of Peron. Loys the ſon of Charles the ſimple breaks his neck in chaſing a Wolfe, and of the two ſons of this Loys, the one dies of poyſon ; the other dies in the priſon of Orleans ; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes himſelf King.

Theſe miſerable ends had the iſſues of Debonaire ; who after he had once apparrelled injuſtice with authority, his ſons and ſucceſſours took up the faſhion, and wore that Garment ſo long without other proviſion, as when the ſame was torn from their ſhoulders, every man deſpiſed them as miſerable and naked Beggars. The wretched ſucceſſe they had, (ſaith a learned French-man) ſhewes, que en ceſte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la juſtice : That in the death of that Prince; to wit, of Bernard the ſon of Pepin, the true heir of Charlemaine, men had more medling than either God, or Juſtice had.

But to come neerer home ; it is certain that Francis the firſt, one of the worthieſt Kings (except for that fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himſelf, after he had commended the deſtruction of the Proteſtants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murdered ; men, women, and children. It is true that the ſaid King Francis repented himſelf of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his ſon, to doe juſtice upon the Murderers, threatning his ſon with GODS judgements, if he neglected it. But this unſeaſonable care of his, GOD was not pleaſed to accept for payment. For after Henry himſelf was ſlain in ſport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his foure ſons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies : yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the world, without ſtock or ſeed. And notwithſtanding their ſubtlety, and breach of faith ; with all their Maſſacres upon thoſe of the religion, and great effuſion of blood, the Crown was ſet on his head, whom they all laboured to diſſolve ; the Proteſtants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more ſtrong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now ſee if God be not the ſame God in Spain, as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Caſtile : in reſpect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Evan Vaſilowick of Moſcovia, were but petty ones : this Caſtilian, of all Chriſtian and Heathen Kings, having been the moſt mercileſſe. For, beſides thoſe of his own Blood and Nobility, which he cauſed to be ſlain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis, the great Maſter of Calatrava, Ruis Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and caſt into the ſtreet, denying him Chriſtian buriall: I ſay, beſides theſe, and the ſlaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; he made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquergues, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treasurer, and all his kinred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen yeers, and the other fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed of purpose to enjoy their treasures; so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobility, that came unto him for succour, with a great summe of monye, to levie (by his favour) some companies of souldiers to return withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; insomuch as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God & Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger brother the Earle of Astramara, who dispossest all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing. Hist. of Spain.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoign, who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earle of gran Pre, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of justice of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasury, and Request, (with sixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastred France: He was soon after strucken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slain. These were the Lovers of other mens miseries: and misery found them out. French invent. in anno 1418.

Now for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatnesse. For this King did not content himself to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, he also cast his own Neece out of the Kingdome of Navarre: and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his own blood, and by double alliance tied unto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonsalvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politick King, who sold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his ſon the Prince of Spain, the greateſt Monarch of the world: ſaw him die in the flower of his yeers; and his wife great with childe, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldeſt daughter married unto Don Alphonſo, Prince of Portugal, beheld her firſt husband break his neck in her preſence; and being with childe by her ſecond, died with it. A juſt judgement of God upon the race of John, father to Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed: who had not onely left many diſconſolate Mothers in Portugal, by the ſlaughter of their children; but had formerly ſlain with his own hand, the ſon and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutcheſſe of Viſeo. The ſecond daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the eighth, he ſaw caſt off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a daughter, that in her unhappy zeal ſhed a world of innocent blood; loſt Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude, all thoſe Kingdoms of Ferdinand have maſters of a new name; and by a ſtrange family are governed and poſſeſt.

Charles the fifth, ſon to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whoſe vain enterpriſes upon the French, upon the Almans, and other Princes and States; ſo many multitudes of Chriſtian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were conſumed: who gave the while a moſt perillous entrance to the Turks, and ſuffered Rhodes, the Key of Chriſtendom, to be taken; was in concluſion chaced out of France, and in a ſort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, ſtole away from Inſpurg; and ſcaled the Alpes by torch-light, purſued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to ſwallow up all thoſe Dominions, wherein he concocted nothing ſave his own diſgraces. And having, after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in either: He crept into a Cloiſter, and made himſelf a Penſioner of an hundred thouſand Duckets by the yeer, to his ſon Philip, from whom he very ſlowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

Nather. hiſt. l. 7. fo. 313.

His ſon again King Philip the ſecond, not ſatisfied to hold Holland & Zeland, (wreſted by his anceſtors from Jaqueline their lawfull Princeſſe) and to poſſeſſe in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: perſwaded by that miſchievous Cardinall of Granvile, and other Romiſh Tyrants; not onely forgot the moſt remarkable ſervices, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobility of thoſe Countries, not onely forgot the Preſent made him upon his entry, of fourty Millions of Florens, called the Novaile aide; nor onely forgot that he had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworn to the Generall States, to maintain & preſerve their ancient rights, priviledges, and cuſtomes, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of thoſe Provinces: but beginning firſt to conſtrain them, and enthrall them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impoveriſh them by many new deviſed and intollerable impoſitions, he laſtly, by ſtrong hand and main force, attempted to make himſelf not onely an abſolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Soveraignes of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their Naturall and Fundamentall Laws, Priviledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtained from the Pope a Diſpenſation of his former Oaths (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of the War and Bloudſhed ſince then;) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the govern- ment of his baſe ſiſter, Margaret of Auſtria, and the Cardinall Granvile; He imployed that moſt mercileſſe Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerfull Army of ſtrange Nations: by whom he firſt ſlaughtered that renowned Captain the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare: and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn: made away Montigue, and the Marqueſſe of Bergues, and cut off in thoſe ſix yeers (that Alva governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thouſand and ſix hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, beſides all his other barbarous murders and maſſacres. By whoſe miniſtry when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wiſhed ends, having it in his hope to work that by ſubtilty, which he had failed to perform by force: He ſent for Governour his baſtard brother Don John of Auſtria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to thoſe people. But he, uſing the ſame Papall advantage that his Predeceſſors had done, made no ſcruple to take Oath upon the holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve the Treaty made with the Generall States; and to diſcharge the Low-Countries of all Spaniards, & other ſtrangers therein garriſon'd: Towards whoſe Pay & Paſport, the Netherlands ſtrained themſelves to make payment of 600000. pounds. Which monies received, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemures: not doubting (being unſuſpected by the States) to have poſſeſt himſelf of all the maſtring places of thoſe Provinces. For whatſoever he overtly pretended, he held in ſecret a contrary counſell with the Secretary Eſcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Miniſters of the Spaniſh tyranny formerly practiſed, and now again intended. But let us now ſee the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Dukes cruelties. Firſt, for himſelf; after he had murdered ſo many of the Nobility; executed (as aforeſaid) eighteen thouſand ſix hundred in ſix yeers, and moſt cruelly ſlain Man, Woman, and Childe in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after he had conſumed ſix and thirty millions of treaſure in ſix yeers: notwithſtanding his Spaniſh vaunt, That he would ſuffocate the Hollanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs: He departed the Country no otherwiſe accompanied, than with the curſe and deteſtation of the whole Nation; leaving his Maſters affaires in a tenfold worſe eſtate, than he found them at his firſt arrivall. For Don John, whoſe haughty conceit of himſelf overcame the greateſt difficulties; though his judgment were over-weak to manage the leaſt: what wonders did his fearfull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers jealouſie & diſtruſt, with the untimely death that ſeized him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Eſcovedo his ſharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Maſter both England and the Netherlands; being ſent into Spain upon ſome new project, he was at the firſt arrivall, and before any acceſſe to the King, by certain Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Laſtly, if we conſider the King of Spains carriage, his counſell and ſucceſſe in this buſineſſe, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above foure hundred thouſand Chriſtians, for the loſſe of all thoſe Countries, which, for beauty, gave place to none; and for revenue, did equall his Weſt-Indies: for the loſſe of a Nation which moſt willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty yeers war, are in deſpight of all his forces become a free Eſtate, and far more rich and powerfull than they were, when he firſt began to impoveriſh and oppreſſe them.

Oh by what plots, by what forſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, impriſonments, tortures, poyſonings, and under what reaſons of State, and politick ſubtlety, have theſe fore-named Kings, both ſtrangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themſelves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent miniſters! and in the end have brought thoſe things to paſſe for their enemies, and ſeen an effect ſo directly contrary to all their own counſels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themſelves, and the other never have ſucceeded; if no ſuch oppoſition had ever been made. GOD hath ſaid it, and performed it ever: Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum; I will deſtroy the wiſdome of the wiſe.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: ſeeing the world is the ſame that it hath been; and the children of the preſent time, will ſtill obey their parents? It is in the preſent time, that all the wits of the world are exerciſed. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at leaſt we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our ſelves; or perſwade our ſelves, that GOD hath given us letters patents to purſue all our irreligious affections, with a non obſtante: ſo we neither look behinde us what hath been, nor before us what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, far off, and unſearchable: we have ſenſe and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by revelation. No marvell then that our thoughts are alſo earthly: and it is leſſe to be wondred at, that the words of worthleſſe men cannot cleanſe them: ſeeing their doctrine and inſtruction, whoſe underſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the Prophet Eſay cried out long agone, Lord, who hath beleeved our reports? And out of doubt, as Eſay complained then for himſelf and others: ſo are they leſſe beleeved, every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof be in every mans mouth, yea, in the diſcourſe of every woman, who for the greateſt number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an univerſall diſſimulation? We profeſſe that we know GOD: but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life: for the Divels know them better than men. Beatitudo non eſt divinorum cognitio, ſed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the paſſionate diſpute, the perſonall hatred, and the perpetuall war, maſſacres, and murthers, for Religion among Chriſtians: the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the World, as it hath well neer driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not ſoon reſolve, that took knowledge but of the religious diſputations among men, and not of their lives which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchaſe of Heaven; and that the World it ſelf were but uſed as it ought, and as an Inne, or place wherein to repoſe our ſelves in paſſing on towards our celeſtiall habitation? when on the contrary, beſides the diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the ſoule hath nothing but hypocriſie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in Religion: and while we act in geſture and voice, divine vertues, in all the courſe of our lives we renounce our Perſons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Juſtice, and Truth, have but their being in terms, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdome, which Solomon defineth to be the School-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we give it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the perill our own in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdome, and the greatest ability that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the use: When goods increase (saith Solomon) they also increase that eat them; and what Eccles.5.10. good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that devoure the rest, and follow us in faire weather: they again forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Master Dannet, and use his own words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the fifth, after the resignation of his estates, stayed at Ulosshing for winde, to carry him his last journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him, (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperour took up the candle himself, and went before Seldius to light him down the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the staires foot, he said thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast known in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of Souldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his own domesticall servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first is, the reverend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their justice and piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noise they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most vertuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune her self rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foot: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The ſecond is the greatning of our poſterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behinde us. Certainly, of thoſe which conceive that their ſouls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be ſaid of them, which Lactantius ſpake of certain Heathen Philoſophers, quod ſapientes ſunt in re ſtulta. For when our ſpirits immortall ſhall be once ſeparate from our mortall bodies, and diſpoſed by GOD : there remaineth in them no other joy of their poſterity which ſucceed, than there doth of pride in that ſtone, which ſleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace, nor any other ſorrow for their poverty, than there doth of ſhame in that, which beareth up a Beggars cottage. Neſciunt mortui, etiam ſancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non interſunt: The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children: for the ſouls of thoſe departed, are not converſant with their affaires that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Auguſtine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our ſons ſhall be honourable: neither ſhall we underſtand concerning them, whether they ſhall be of low degree. Which Eccleſiaſtes alſo confirmeth: Man walketh in a ſhadow, and diſquieteth himſelf in vain: he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who ſhall gather them. The living (ſaith he) know that they ſhall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can ſhew unto man what ſhall be after him under the Sunne? He therefore accounteth it among the reſt of worldly vanities, to labour and travell in the world; not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wiſe man ſhould enjoy the fruits thereof: which made me (ſaith he) endeavour even to abhorre mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whoſe bleſſed or ſorrowfull eſtates after death God hath reſerved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, ſeeing the Prophet Eſay confeſſeth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Iſrael knows us not. But hereof we are aſſured, that the long and dark night of death, (of whoſe following day we ſhall never behold the dawn till his return that hath triumphed over it) ſhall cover us over till the world be no more. After which, and when we ſhall again receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the ſeats of Angelicall affections: in ſo great admiration ſhall the ſoules of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſſe joy; nor any return of forgone and mortall affection towards friends, kinred, or children. Of whom whether we ſhall retain any particular knowledge, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them, no man can aſſure us; and the wiſeſt men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of thoſe faculties, which the ſoule exerciſed in a mortall body; we ſhall not at that time ſo divide the joyes of Heaven, as to caſt any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their eſtates greater than ever the World gave, we ſhall (by the difference known unto us) even deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoever comfort ſhall remain of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the charity, which we exerciſed living: and in that Piety, Juſtice, and firm Faith, for which it pleaſed the infinite mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unneceſſary and vain? Certainly no. For that infinite wiſdome of God, which hath diſtinguiſhed his Angels by degrees: which hath given greater and leſſe light and beauty to heavenly bodies: which hath made differences between beaſts and birds: created the Eagle and and the Flie, the Cedar and the Shrub; and among ſtones, given the faireſt tincture to the Ruby, and the quickeſt light to the Diamond; hath alſo ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people, Magiſtrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to poſterity, for a mark and enſigne of the vertue and underſtanding of their Anceſtors; ſo (ſeeing Siracides preferreth Sira.c.40.v.28. Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable eſtates, fall under the miſerable ſuccour of other mens pity;) I account it fooliſhneſſe to condemn ſuch a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten; and that we raiſe not our own buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth firſt Plat. de leg. 1. 2. & 6. & in Georgo preferre the perfection of bodily health; ſecondly, the forme and beauty, and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæſitas: ſo Jeremy cries, Woe unto them that Jer. 22. 13. erect their houſes by unrighteouſneſſe, and their chambers without equity: And Eſay the ſame, Woe to thoſe that ſpoile, and were not ſpoiled. And it Eſay 33. was out of the true wiſdome of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink Pro. 1. 18. 12. the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood, and not to ſwallow them Pro. 23. 1, 2, 8, 9 & 25. 9, 8. up alive, whoſe riches we covet: for ſuch are the wayes (ſaith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And if we could afford our ſelves but ſo much leiſure as to conſider, That he which hath moſt in the world, hath, in reſpect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longeſt time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, ſetting it either by that which is paſt, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we ſhall abide for ever: I ſay, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of underſtanding, that we ſo much priſe the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and ſo much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting thoſe mortall things of the world, as if our ſoules were therein immortall, and neglecting thoſe things which are immortall, as if our ſelves after the world were but mortall.

But let every man value his own wiſdome, as he pleaſeth. Let the Rich man think all fools, that cannot equall his abundance; the Revenger eſteem all negligent, that have not trodden down their oppoſites; the Politician all groſs, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in ſight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, & when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I ſay, that our own cogitations (thoſe ſad & ſevere cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health & Felicity) return again, & pay us to the uttermoſt for all the pleaſing paſſages of our lives paſt. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our ſelves can no longer exerciſe cruelty to others: and it is onely then, that we are ſtrucken through the ſoul with this terrible ſentence, That God will not Gal. 6. 7. be mock't. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous ſcarcely be ſaved: and 1 Pet. 4. that God ſpared not his Angels: where ſhall thoſe appear, who, having ſerved their appetites all their lives, preſume to think, that the ſevere Commandments of the All-powerfull God were given but in ſport; & that the ſhort breath, which we draw when death preſſeth us, if we can but faſhion it to the ſound of Mercy (without any kind of ſatisfaction or amends) is ſufficient? O quam multi, ſaith a reverend Father, cum hac ſpe ad æternos labores & bella deſcendunt! I confeſſe that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it ſaid, that we ended well; for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a dis-esteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men do not oppose him, dis-esteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveneſſe at leiſure, with the remainder & laſt drawing of a malicious breath? For what do they otherwiſe, that die this kinde of well-dying, but ſay unto God as followeth? We beſeech thee, O God, that all the falſhoods, forſwearings, and treacheries of our lives paſt, may be pleaſing unto thee; that thou wilt for our ſakes (that have had no leiſure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impoſſible) and forget to be a juſt God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppreſſions, call ambition wiſdome, and charity fooliſhneſſe. For I ſhall prejudice my ſon, (which I am reſolved not to do) if I make reſtitution; and confeſſe my ſelf to have been unjuſt, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppreſſed. Certainly, theſe wiſe worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood ſuch a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleventh ware in his Cap; which when he had cauſed any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kiſſe it: beſeeching it to pardon him this one evill act more, and it ſhould be the laſt; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinall and a falſified Sacrament, he cauſed the Earl of Armagnac to be ſtabbed to death: mockeries indeed fit to be uſed towards a Leaden, but not towards the Everliving God. But of this compoſition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureleſſe and ridiculous: they fear the plots and practices of their oppoſites, and their very whiſperings: they fear the opinions of men, which beat but upon ſhadowes: they flatter and forſake the proſperous and unproſperous, be they friends or Kings: yea, they dive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble ſtone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and Giant-like valour, againſt the terrible judgements of the All-powerfull God: yea, they ſhew themſelves gods againſt God, and ſlaves towards men; towards men whoſe bodies and conſciences are alike rotten.

Now for the reſt: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor & oppreſſed, whom we account wretched: we ſhall finde the happineſſe of the one, and the miſerable eſtate of the other, ſo tied by God to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubject to enterchange (witneſſe the ſudden downfall of the greateſt Princes, and the ſpeedy uprising of the meaneſt perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certain, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo uncertain, whereof to bewail it ſelf. For there is no man ſo aſſured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt; What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (ſaith S. James) what ſhall be to morrow. To day he is ſet up, and to morrow he ſhall not be found; for he is turned into duſt, and his purpoſe periſheth. And although the aire which compaſſeth adverſity, be very obſcure: yet therein we better diſcern God, than in that ſhining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the cleerneſſe thereof, there is no vanity which eſcapeth our ſight. And let adverſity ſeem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themſelves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to thoſe under the croſſe, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we have lived many yeers, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoyced; or be it that we have measured the same length of dayes, and therein have evermore sorrowed: yet looking back from our present being, we finde both the one and the other, to wit, the joy and the woe, sailed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us, and hold us in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So as whosoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a servant; and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved either of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his deareſt affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall finde that all the Art which his elder yeers have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavie, secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing youth, over-take it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: insomuch as looking back from the very instant time, and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains, as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasure and delights. For whatsoever is cast behinde us, is just nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ eventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Onely those few black Swans I must except: who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other to the World. In the first we complain to GOD against our selves, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos; And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second we complain to our selves against GOD: as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them again from us having had them; forgetting that humble and just acknowledgement of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which S. Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a fool, or ungratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharp soever his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the adversities of the world but tributa vivendi; the tributes of living: a wise Christian man ought to know them, and bear them but as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and resolvedly, and not as those whining Souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, been partiall to the most mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable beggar, a beggar begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Sapores:) that made Belisarius play the most victorious Captain, and lastly the part of a blind beggar; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now if any man out of weaknes prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the brains of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they work. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwrack of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato: To fall under Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retrait, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing els but a continuation of such examples) have perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neer, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: Creation inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) & Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that have seemed to excell in worldly wisdome, have gone about to dis-joyn this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we understand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotles rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the Worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeved, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the rest) have so retrencht their mindes from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much lesse batter it down: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his Book of Wisdome, Tout proposition humaine a autant d' authorite quel' autre, si la raison n' on fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equall authority, if reason make not a difference; the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and unpartiall judgement of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdome, who without any judgement approve the invention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick, and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem Principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

Lact. de orig. Erroris, l. 2. c. 8.

But for my self, I shall never be perswaded, that God hath shut up all light of Learning within the lanthorn of Aristotles brains: or that it was ever said unto him, as unto Esdras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they onely invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome thereof; the same Nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not reason: and so hath experience without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Rennet doth coagulate her milk into a curd. But if we aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grasse under his feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are far lesse noble creatures than himself; who is far more noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Solomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his own soul, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not;

and

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Mankinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the motes of the Aire for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make himself the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur Philosophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, One eternall and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the universall. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut Providentiam unam esse consentiant: sive enim Natura, sive Æther, sive Ratio, sive Mens, sive fatalis Necessitas, sive divina Lex, idem est quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions, (saith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this; That they agree upon one Providence, whether the same be Nature, or Light, or Reason, or Understanding, or Destinie, or divine Ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the world, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; do at last finde, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiosity, in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolves it self.

Lact. 5.

As for others; and first touching those which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternall, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente; the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoq; Deo annectere; They seem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune: insomuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither been Authour, nor Father, nor Creatour, nor Lord of the Universall. For were the Matter or Chaos eternall: it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it self to God, or God accommodate himself to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

Euseb. de præp. Evang. l. 7. c. 8.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, & infinitely wise: I would gladly learn how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; and no more, nor no lesse, than served to receive the form of the Universall. For had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the World: Or had there been more of this matter than sufficed, then God did dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable ſonable ſoul confeſſe, That it is the ſame work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the ſame art and power, and by none other, can thoſe things, or any part of that eternall matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which thoſe things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to ſay that this matter was the cauſe of it ſelf; this, of all other, were the greateſt Idiotiſm. For, if it were the cauſe of it ſelf at any time; then there was alſo a time when it ſelf was not; at which time of not being, it is eaſie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it ſelf, nor any thing elſe. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impoſſible. Nihil autem ſeipſum præcedit, neque ſeipſum componit corpus: There is nothing that doth precede it ſelf, neither do bodies compound themſelves.

For the reſt, Thoſe that feign this matter to be eternall, muſt of neceſſity confeſſe, that Infinite cannot be ſeparate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form; but that the firſt matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For concluſion of this part, whoſoever will make choice, rather to beleeve in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life; let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madneſſe of that kind, as wanteth terms to expreſſe it. For what reaſon of man (whom the curſe of preſumption hath not ſtupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of ſhadow, quia comprehenſio eſt intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it ſelf, either for matter or form; yea for as many worlds (if ſuch had been Gods will) as the Sea hath ſands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea, Reaſon it ſelf finds it more eaſie for infinite power, to deliver from it ſelf a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and duſt, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionyſius his words, Deus in una exiſtentia omnia præhabet: and again, Eſſe omnium eſt ipſa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, cauſaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, ſed tanquam cauſa univerſalis. Neither hath the World univerſall cloſed up all of GOD: For the moſt part of his works (ſaith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wiſdome be opened by the glorious work of the World: which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we ſeldome entitle GOD the all-ſhewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able. Cap. 16. v. 21.

But now for thoſe, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not ſo ſalvage therein, as thoſe are, which give an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [Nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, impoſed upon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But ſeeing their great Doctor Ariſtotle himſelf confeſſeth, quod omnes Antiqui decreverunt quaſi quoddam rerum principium, ipſumque infinitum: That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the ſame to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium ejus eſt nullum, ſed ipſum omnium cernitur eſſe principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere: it is ſtrange, that this Philoſopher, with his followers, ſt ould rather make choice out of falſhood, to conclude falſly; than out of truth, to reſolve truly. For if we compare the World Univerſall, and all the unmeaſura- Simpl. Eng. l. 3. c. 9. ex Ariſt. Phyſ. 3. 20.

ble Orbs of Heaven, and thoſe marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipſum Infinitum: it may truly be ſaid of them all, which himſelf affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui deſtruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Meliſſus, and Empedocles, call the world univerſall, but particulam Univerſitatis & infinitatis; a parcell of that which is the univerſality and the infinity it ſelf: And Plato, but a ſhadow of God. But the other to prove the worlds eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A ſufficient and effectuall cauſe being granted, an anſwerable effect thereof is alſo granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a ſufficient and effectuall cauſe of the world, the effect of the cauſe ſhould alſo have been for ever; to wit, the world univerſall. But what a ſtrange mockery is this in ſo great a Maſter, to confeſſe a ſufficient and effectuall cauſe of the world (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; and the ſame God to be a God reſtrained in his Concluſion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiouſly to reſolve of God, as of naturall neceſſity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor underſtanding; which cannot but work matter being preſent: as fire, to burn things combuſtible. Again he thus diſputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it ſelf, or by ſomwhat elſe: & ſo it paſſeth from power to act: But God (ſaith he) is immoveable, and is neither moved by himſelf, nor by any other: but being alwayes the ſame, doth alwayes work. Whence he concludeth, If the world were cauſed by God, that he was for ever the cauſe thereof: and therefore eternall. The anſwer to this is very eaſie, For that Gods performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather conſtancy in him. For the ſame action of his will, which made the world for ever, did alſo withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this anſwer, in it ſelf ſufficient, others adde further, that the Pattern or Image of the world may be ſaid to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, ſpiritualem mundum; and do in this ſort diſtinguiſh the Idæa and Creation in time. Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali eſt Architecto, fuit ſemper cum illo, eritque ſemper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod ſecundum opus eſt Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit ſemper: retinet alteram, quia ſit ſemper futurus: That repreſentative, or the intentionall word (ſay they) the ſampler of this viſible world, the firſt work of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever ſhall be. This materiall world, the ſecond work or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from everlaſting, and in this it doth agree, that it ſhall be for ever to come, The firſt point, That it was not for ever, all Chriſtians confeſſe: The other they underſtand no otherwiſe, than that after the conſummation of this world, there ſhall be a new Heaven and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of theſe things we need not here ſtand to argue: though ſuch opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this conſideration, of an eternall and unchangeable cauſe, producing a changeable and temporall effect, Touching which point Proclus the Platoniſt diſputeth, That the compounded eſſence of the World (and becauſe compounded, pounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, & knit to the Divine Being, by an individuall & inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good & understanding divine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue & preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it shall have any end, & to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never seen, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appear any way the older by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subject to finall corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newnesse, & that they have not continued so long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjecturall arguments may receive answer by conjectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grosly mistaken: or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Suns heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctiall navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of Deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Suns violent heat.

But in a word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, have stood two or three thousand yeers: that many things have been digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the generall Flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea, it is beleeved, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we look for in celestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by whose help all creatures are generate, doth not in these later Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest world had, nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proofe; as that this world shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this objection: if the World were eternall; why not all things in the World eternall? If there were no first, no cauſe, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehenſible wiſdome, but that every Nature had been alike eternall ; and Man more rationall than every other Nature : Why had not the eternall reaſon of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all ? why ſhould heavenly bodies live for ever , and the bodies of Men rot and die ?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the centre, and gave order that it ſhould hang in the Air : that the Sun ſhould travell between the Tropicks, and never exceed thoſe bounds , nor fail to perform that Progreſſe once in every yeer : the Moon to live by borrowed light : the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to be faſtned like nails in a Cart-wheel ; and the Planets to wander at their pleaſure ? Or if none of theſe had power over other : was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetuall travell within thoſe two Cireles , hath viſited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth , and the Creatures therein, by turns and times ? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this courſe in all eternity : He may juſtly be called eternall Charity, and everlaſting Love. The ſame may be ſaid of all the Stars: who being all of them moſt large and cleer fountains of vertue and operation, may alſo be called eternall Vertues : the Earth may be called eternall Patience , the Moon, an eternall Borrower and Beggar ; and Man of all other the moſt miſerable, eternally Mortall. And what were this, but to beleeve again in the old Play of the gods ? Yea, in more gods by millions, than ever Heſiodus dream'd of. But inſtead of this mad folly, we ſee it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes : and the eyes of our reaſon diſcern it better , That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and conſtrained : themſelves they have not conſtrained, nor could. Omne determinatum cauſam habet aliquam efficientem , quæ illud determinaverit : Every thing bounded hath ſome efficient cauſe, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature ; As by the ambiguity of this name, the ſchool of Ariſtotle hath both commended many errours unto us, and ſought alſo thereby to obſcure the glory of the high Moderatour of all things, ſhining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World : ſo if the beſt definition be taken out of the ſecond of Ariſtotles Phyſicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphyſicks , I Ficin. ſay that the beſt is but nominall, and ſerving onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall : which yet the Academicks open better; when they call it, A Seminary ſtrength, infuſed into matter by the Soule of the World : who give the firſt place to Providence, the ſecond to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they underſtand G O D) dux & caput ; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodiens ; Natura poſtremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of theſe (God excepted) or participating of all : yet that it hath choice or underſtanding (both which are neceſſarily in the cauſe of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanſwerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut ſcientiam : He onely can be ſaid to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

Ficin. de Plat. But the will and ſcience of Nature, are in theſe words truly expreſt by Ficinus: Poteſt ubique Natura, vel per diverſa media, vel ex diverſis materiis, diverſa facere : ſublata vero mediorum materiarumque diverſitate, vel unicum, vel ſimilimum operatur, neque poteſt quando adeſt materia non operari ; It is the power of Nature by diverſity of meanes, or out of diverſity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diverſity of meanes, and the diverſity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being preſent. Now if Nature made choice of diverſity of matter, to work all theſe variable works of Heaven and Earth, it had then both underſtanding and will; it had counſell to begin; reaſon to diſpoſe; vertue and knowledge to finiſh, and power to govern: without which all things had been but one and the ſame: all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this underſtanding, this counſell, reaſon, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould we then call ſuch a cauſe rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the firſt and higheſt place to Divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnetque ſummum locum divino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay in ſhort, that it is a true effect of true reaſon in man (were there no authority more binding than reaſon) to acknowledge and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime power. Vera Philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True Philoſophy is an aſcending from the things which flow, and ariſe, and fall, to the things that are for ever the ſame.

Arist. l. 1. de Cœlo. c. 3. T. 22.

For the reſt; I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety monſtrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in terms. For it is God, that onely diſpoſeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, Veſſels of honour and diſhonour. It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all: it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth. It is Nature, that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelf: Nature, nothing in it ſelf. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth, for by it ſelfe it exiſteth not. For ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavie things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reaſon, which doth conduct every River into the ſalt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in fire, that makes it to conſume combuſtible matter? If it be Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge in theſe: by the ſame Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore ſeeing all things work as they do, (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you pleaſe) yet becauſe they work by an impulſion, which they cannot reſiſt; or by a faculty, infuſed by the ſupremeſt power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worſhip, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder: and to him is the worſhip due, who hath created ſuch a Nature in things, and ſuch a faculty, as neither knowing it ſelfe, the matter, wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; do yet work all things to their laſt and uttermoſt perfection. And therefore every reaſonable man, taking to himſelf for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which alſo neceſſity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith, and Reaſon; without the force of Authority) all things do as eaſily follow which have been delivered by divine letters, as the waters of a running River do ſucceſſively ceſſively purſue each other from the firſt fountaines.

Thus much I ſay it is, that Reaſon it ſelf hath taught us: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio ſequitur: quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows: becauſe it is firſt to know God, and then to worſhip him. This Sapience Plato calleth abſoluti boni ſcientiam, The ſcience of the abſolute good: And another, Scientiam rerum primarum, ſempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (ſaith Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reaſon and examples perſwaded: Fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, ſed ratione & exemplis ſuadetur. I confeſſe it, That to enquire further, as of the Eſſence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what mean he created the world: Or of his ſecret judgement, and the cauſes, is not an affect of Reaſon: Sed cum ratione inſaniunt; but they grow mad with reaſon, that enquire after it: For as it is no ſhame nor diſhonour (ſaith a French Author) de faire arreſt au but qu'on naſceu ſurpaſſer; For a man to reſt himſelf there, where he findes it impoſſible to paſſe on further: ſo whatſoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reaſon, it acknowledgeth it to be ſo; as underſtanding it ſelf not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that beſt knows the end of his own Art. For ſeeing both Reaſon and Neceſſity teach us (Reaſon, which is pars divini ſpiritus in corpus humanum merſi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and ſeeing the ſame Reaſon and Neceſſity make us know, that the ſame infinite power is every where in the world; and yet how every where, it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakned, but greatly ſtrengthened by our ignorance, becauſe it is the ſame Reaſon that tells us, That ſuch a Nature cannot be ſaid to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

Lact. l. 4. c. 4. de vera ſapientia.

Lact. de deſin.

Quod eſt infinitum, & non ſecundum naturam terminatum non continetur à ſcientia. Ariſt. poſter.

I have been already over-long, to make any large diſcourſe either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuſe: eſpecially in the excuſe of this or that paſſage; ſeeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the groſſeſt, the unſutable diviſion of the books, I could not know how to excuſe, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the firſt part finiſhed. All men know that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of thoſe things, which are ſubject to number and meaſure. For the reſt, it ſutes well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which ſpeak too much, and yet ſay little; Ipſi nobis furto ſubducimur; We are ſtollen away from our ſelves, ſetting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet ſhall it not lay hold on me, becauſe I beleeve as he doth; That who ſo thinks himſelf the wiſeſt man, is but a poor and miſerable ignorant. Thoſe that are the beſt men of war, againſt all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keep the ſtrongeſt guards againſt themſelves, to defend them from themſelves; from ſelf love, ſelf eſtimation, and ſelf opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the Worke, I have onely taken counſell from the Argument. For of the Aſſyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the firſt part, and were the firſt great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of poſterity: ſome few enterpriſes, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the ſtory of the Hebrews, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the conſuming diſeaſe of time, and preſerved it ſelf from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day : and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression : of which we may say with Virgil :

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto ;

They appear here and there floting in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us ; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws ; they had diversity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility; Policy in war ; Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therfore of these (seeing in a generall History we should have left a great deal of Nakednes, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have made also many others : which if they shalbe laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of humane errour. For seeing we digresse in all the waies of our lives : yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression ; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the Kindes. The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles ; and every day preach't unto us. But we still make large digressions : yea, the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldæans, & had raised a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found : it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire ; whilst it so flourished, that the affairs of the Nations adjoyning had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians ; as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement : it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers : who seldome give names to those small brooks, whereof many, joyned together, make great Rivers ; till such time as they become united, and run in main stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, and the Stile not every-where like it self ; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent ; the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, graeili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Æneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first book, and elsewhere, in which language others may think, and I my self acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant : but it is true, that some of them I finde in Montanus, others in Latine Character in S. Senensis; & of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, having had an eleven yeers leasure, to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own times, having been permitted to draw water as neer the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that who soever in writing a modern History, shall follow truth too neer the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself: and he that walks after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kinde of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them: and I have now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall finde fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsly.

For I protest before the Majesty of God, That I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, sed tibi; (or as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry; the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the World without a Master: from which all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks: Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis judicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably; so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall: and for rising again, as in the Naturall privation, there is no recession to habit; so it is seldome seen in the privation politick. I do therefore forbear to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never so many courteous phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fools that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise; I should hardly have had this leisure to have made my self a fool in print.

THE

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, of the First Book of the First Part of the History of the World.

CHAP. I.
Of the Creation and Preservation of the WORLD.

§. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1. ver. 1.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth] Gen. 1. 1.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Unformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sun; and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it; and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystaline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.

That nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.

Of Fate, and that the Stars have great influence: and that their operation may diversly be prevented or furthered.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

§. XIV.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

§. III.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall soule.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

§. VI.

Of the free power which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himself.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the universall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

THat the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought, making the Ocean to be the Fountain of those foure Rivers.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the aire.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places; and that besides that Eden in Cœlosyria, there is a Country in Babylon once of this name, as is proved out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one stream.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happinesse of the Babylonian soile, as it is certain that Eden was such.

§. XIII.

Of the river Gehon, and the land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Æthiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

§. XIV.

A conclusion, by way of repitition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

THat the Tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IV.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evill: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sin.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of divers Memorable things between the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause and revenge of Cains sin: and of his going out from God.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the land of Nod : and of his City Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Age of the Patriarchs, when they begat their children.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs : and some of late memory.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition : and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

§. VII.

Of the men of War before the Flood.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies : as also divers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanquished in the world : and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

THat in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient : as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IV.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians & others, the first Idols and Fables were invented : and that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of gods.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

§. VIII.

That Heathenism, and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Devill, to maintain his Kingdom.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

§. I.

OF Gods fore-warning : and some humane testimonies : and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

§. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges : and that this was not Noahs Flood.

§. III.

Of Deucalians flood : and that this was not Noahs Flood ; nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any universall Flood.

§. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the universall Flood : and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt : and of some elsewhere.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might have been fore-seen by the Stars.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universall Flood : and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. 11.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark : as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

§. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill

Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

§. I.

A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

§. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, That the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

§. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion: They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so neer a place as Armenia.

§. IV.

The second Argument, That the Eastern people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

§. V.

The third Argument; From the wonderfull resistance which Semiramis *found in the East-*Indies.

§. VI.

The fourth Argument; From divers considerations in the person of Noah.

§. VII.

Of the senslesse opinion of Annius, the Commenter upon Berosus, That the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; and yet upon Gordiæi, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

§. VIII.

The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally neer the place where the Ark rested.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth.

§. X.

An answer to the objection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia; and the height of the Hills there.

§. XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher Hills than the Armenian.

§. XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

§. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia unto the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvell, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all a-long, and even in India be called Ararat.

§. XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountains Caucasi, *and toward the East-*Indies, and of other excellencies of the soile.

§. XV.

The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

W*Hether* Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the known great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhets portion: of Berosus his too speedy seating Gomer the son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhets sons Tubal, in Spain: and also of the antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

§. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezech. 38.39.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

§. VI.

That Gomer also, and his son Togorma, of the posterity of Japhet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread West-ward into Europe; and North-ward into Samaria.

§. VII.

Of Javan the fourth son of Japhet; and of Mesech of Aram, and Meshech of Japhet.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two elder sons of Gomer.

Of the four sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

§. X.

That the seat of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

¶. I.

OF Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopesse, wife to Moses; grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

¶. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

¶. III.

Chush ill expounded for Æthiopia. Ezechiel 29.10.

¶. IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, *chap.*30. *vers.*9. in like manner mistaken.

¶. V.

A place, Esay 18. *v.*1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chush for Æthiopia.

¶. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terhaka, the Story of Sennacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are unadvisedly made Æthiopians.

¶. VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18.1.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

¶. I.

THat Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sons of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

¶. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunary yeers, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.

¶. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

¶. IV.

Against Pererius, That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeers after the Creation: at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

¶. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

¶. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Genes. 10. ver. ult. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

¶. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.

Of the eleven sons of Canaan, the fourth son of Ham.

¶. I.

OF the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven sons.

¶. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

¶. III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

¶. IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites, and Harkites.

¶. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

¶. VI.

Of Zemari.

¶. VII.

Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.

Of the sons of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

¶. I.

THat the most of the sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Solomon.

¶. II.

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the West Æthiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

§. XIV.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, *ch.*9. *v.*7.

§. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

¶. I.

OF Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

¶. II.

Of Aram, and his sons.

¶. III.

Of the division of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sons of Heber, &c.

¶. IV.

Of the sons of Joctan, the other son of Heber.

¶. V.

Of Ophir, one of Joctans sons, and of Peru: and of that voyage of Solomon.

¶. VI.

Of Havilah the son of Joctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan; with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the World.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and eſtabliſhing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt Government under the eldeſt of families to Regall, and from Regall abſolute to Regall tempered with Laws.

§. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Government, with their oppoſites: and of the degrees of humane ſocietie.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the firſt Kings.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about thoſe times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the firſt after the Floud that reigned like Soveraigne Lord: and that his beginning ſeemeth to have been of juſt authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three diſtinct perſons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Aſſur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Eſay 23.13. that Aſſur built Ur of the Chaldees.

§. IV.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

§. V.

That wee are not to marvell how ſo many Kingdomes could be erected about theſe times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine unto it.

§. VII.

Of the worſhipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and laſtly, of his War againſt Zoroaſter.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaſter, ſuppoſed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts; and of divers kindes of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt Inventer of Aſtrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to bee condemned; though the Devill here, as in other kindes, hath ſought to obtrude evill things under the name and colour of good things.

§. IV.

That Daniels miſliking Nabuchodonoſors condemning of the Magicians, doth not juſtifie all their practices.

§. V.

The abuſe of things, which may be found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right uſe of them.

§. VI.

Of the divers kindes of unlawfull Magick.

§. VII.

Of divers waies by which the Devill ſeemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was ever raiſed from the dead, by the power of the devill: and that it was not the the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninive by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage, and education: and Metamorphoſis of her Mother.

§. IV

§. IV.
Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V.
Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis : and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Book of the first Part of the History of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham : and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.
Of some of the successours of Semiramis : with a brief transition to the question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

§. II.
A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the yeer 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeer 352.

§. III.
The answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his fathers death.

§. IV.
The answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeer.

§. V.
The answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest son : and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

§. VI.
That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest : together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII.
A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides : with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more unprobable.

§. VIII.
A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus.

§. X.
Of Arioch another of the four Kings : and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlosyria, and Arabia Petræa.

§. XI.
Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

§. XII.
That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia : and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.
That it is not unprobable, that the four Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colinies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came : which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A Brief of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt : with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the yeer after the Flood 191.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oft-times many under one King.

§. IV.

Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Osiris.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reign ended : and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the son of Osiris.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim : and of divers errours about the former Sesostres.

§. VII.

Of Busiris, the first oppressour of the Israelites : and of his successour Queen Thermutis, that took up Moses out of the water.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis : and what King it was under whom Moses was born : and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth : and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt : and of Moses his preservation and education.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians : of his War in Æthiopia, and of his marriage there : Philo his judgement of his Pastorall life : and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites : and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

§. VI.

Of the Solary and Lunary yeers : and how they are reconciled : with the form of the Hebrew yeer, and their manner of intercalation.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth, towards the Red Sea : and of the divers wayes leading out of Egypt.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea : and of the Red Sea it self.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at low ebb.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them : with a Discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie, with a continuation of the story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given : with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

§. VI.
Of the Law of Nature.
§. VII.
Of the written Law of God.
§. VIII.
Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.
§. IX.
Of the Morall, Judiciall, and Ceremoniall Law: with a Note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.
§. X.
A proposall of nine other points to be considered; with a touch of the five first.
§. XI.
Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
§. XII.
Of the rest of the points proposed.
§. XIII.
Of the severall Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.
§. XIIII.
If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.
§. XV.
Of humane Law, written, and unwritten,
§. XVI.
That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what sort.

CHAP. V.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE BEGINNING AND first Ages of the same, from the Creation unto ABRAHAM.

THE FIRST BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§ I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie invisible; and Understanding which it self can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the work of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which he imbraceth, filleth and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet universall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his divine Countenance; in his mercifull provision for all that live, his manifold goodness: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universall, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightiness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestiall, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more than wonderfull works, God (saith * Hugo speaketh unto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, witness in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: for according to S. * Gregory; Omnis homo eo ipso quòd rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet; Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in Creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his creatures. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding.

ding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, Ye have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicity, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrisostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters are the unnumbred Stars, the Sun and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabite and reside therein. Therefore said that learned CUSANUS, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The World universall is nothing else but God expresst. And the invisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seen by creation of the World, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, than his own Will, no other matter than his own Power, no other Workman than his own Word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodnesse. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his high Wisedome disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) wee ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds Creation: Neq; enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæq; fiunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledg of cause or beginning (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern, or else by the word of God himself.

A Mont. Nat. Hist. fol. 7.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to bee despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

THis work and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledg, though by divers terms, and in a different manner expresst, I mean all those who are intitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universorum; The originall of the universall: to whom hee giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein hee truely with S. Paul, casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the World was made by Gods Almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heroclitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire, to expres God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in S. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

Hierm. in Pœmandro, & in sermone sacro.

Deut. 4. 24. Heb. 12. 29.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the World had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkable words are thus converted: Cùm abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deindè in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense; When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Vid. cap. 6.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers in matters of Divinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath hath not want of any forrain testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned are my examples herein; so S. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not: as in the Epistle to Titus he cryeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus &c. For, Truth (saith S. Ambrose by whomsoever uttered is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunq; dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule; Quæ sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane that serveth to the use of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1.1.

THis visible world of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or, first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seeke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Jewes Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent: but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primarie matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name shall wee then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellencie to make, than to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we fain a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite, the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altro finitum; There cannot be more infinites than one: for one of them would limit the other. Cusan de Mente lib. 3.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genes. 2.1.

THe Universal matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood: for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetickes understand it; to which S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Feciſti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam feciſti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: that is, Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoolemen, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirme that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyran Heaven Stenchius Eugubynus calleth Divine clarity, and uncreated: an errour, for which he is sharpely charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seate of Angels and just soules, than in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liveth in eternall Light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord that covereth himselfe with light: and in thn Revelation; and the City hath no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer upon Genesis, differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestial, so in his judgement, because it was in all eternitie the glorious seat of God himselfe, it was not necessarie to be created; Quem mundum super cœlestem meo judicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse. Beda Hex. Strabo super Gen. Eug. Cos. &c. de nat. in corp. Psal. 104.12. Claritas divina non est lux ista, sed sapientia Dei, non creata, sed nata, Apoc. 21.23. Mercer. in Gen. cap. 7. v. 7.

But as Moses forbare to speake of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the the weakneſs of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of thoſe things which were more manifeſt, (to wit) that God did not only by a ſtrong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promiſe made to their forefathers; but alſo that he created, and was the ſole cauſe of this aſpectable, and perceiveable Univerſal: ſo on the other ſide I dare not thinke, that any ſuperceleſtial Heaven, or whatſoever elſe (not himſelfe) was increate and eternal: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wiſdome of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the ſeat of infinite power, no more than infinite power it ſelf can be limited: for his place is in himſelfe, whom no magnitude elſe can containe: How great is the houſe of God (ſaith Baruch) how large is the place of his poſſeſſion; it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeaſurable.

Bar. 3. 24, 25.

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the ſolid matter and ſubſtance, aſwel of all the Heavens, and Orbs ſupernal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, poſſibilitas, ſive poſſe fieri. Which matter (ſaith Calvin was ſo called, quod totius mundi ſemen fuerit; Becauſe it was the ſeed of the Univerſal: an opinion of ancient Philoſophers long before.

§. V.

That the ſubſtance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moſes underſtood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is diſcribed as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moſes firſt nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to diſtinguiſh the confuſed Maſſe, and (as Baſil ſaith) præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulneſſe.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of al heavenly bodies, & natures expreſt: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatſoever is under the Moon, and ſubject to alteration. Corrupt ſeeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not ſubject, though ſubject to periſhing. They ſhal periſh (ſaith David) and the heavens ſhall vaniſh away like ſmoake, ſaith Eſay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mixt and covered with the waters and not yet diſtinguiſhed; but no way, that the waters were the matter or ſeed of the Earth, much leſſe of the Univerſal. Initio tu Domine terram fundiſti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning haſt founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was covered with the Deep) meaning with waters) as with a garment; ſaith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condenſation may become earth, the ſame reaſon teacheth us alſo, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and ſo on the contrarie. Deus ignis ſubſtantiam per aërem in aquam convertit, God turneth the ſubſtance of fire by aire into water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the ſame ſtate, in which they were created, as touching their ſubſtance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in reſpect of beauty and ornament. Cœlum verò & terra in ſtatu creationis remanſerunt quantum ad ſubſtantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis poſtmodùm ſuperaddita eſt. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be underſtood according to the Latine tranſlation ſimply, and as ſpecifical water; but the ſame more properly ſignifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Eſt autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Maim (ſaith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latines, wanting a voyce to expreſſe it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Maſſe, or indigeſted matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had ſeparated the Earth, and digeſted it from the waters. And the Earth was voide: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigeſted matter into that form, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herb, which ſeedeth ſeed, and the fruitful tree according to his kinde, and God ſaw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confuſed; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God ſaw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta ſunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogorgon: Heſiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: of which Ovid;

§. VI.

How it is to be underſtood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and that this is not to be ſearched curiouſly.

AFter the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters uſe the word ſuperferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat, or fovebat (ſaith Hierome) out of Baſil; and Baſil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, ſed viri cujuſdam Syri ſententiam recenſebo (ſaith Baſil:) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a ſpecial likeneſs. Verbum tranſlatum eſt ab avibus pullitici ſuæ incubantibus, quamvis ſpirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a ſpiritual and unexpreſſible manner. Baſil Hexam. Junius.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect,, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldæan Paraphraſt in this ſenſe. Ventus à conſpectu Dei ſufflabat: or as other underſtand the Chaldæan, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147 Pſalme, He cauſed his winde to blow, and the waters increaſe: but there was yet no winde nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in theſe words, Et Spiritus Elohim Meracheſet, id eſt, efficaciter motitans, confovens, ac agitans ſuper facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cheriſhing, quickning and ſtirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the laſt paſſive and material, to wit, Cauſa, which is the divine goodneſs: Jehi, which is, fiat, ſive erit, Let it be, or it ſhall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (ſaith he) was the firſt that was uttered by the Word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id eſt, vis quædam divina, agilis ac præſens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, A certain divine power, or ſtrength every where, active and extending, and ſtretching through all, filling and finiſhing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id eſt, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my ſelf, I am reſolved (Cùm Deus ſit ſuper rationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reaſon above reaſon) that although the effects which follow his wonderful waies of working, may in a meaſure be perceived by mans underſtanding, yet the manner and firſt operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any minde, or ſpirit, compaſſed with a mortal body. Animalis homo quæ Dei ſunt, non percipit: For my thoughts (ſaith the Lord in Eſay) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies. And as the world hath not known God himſelf: ſo are his waies (according to S. Paul) paſt finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, ſaith Chriſt. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality and operation, were by incubation or how elſe, the manner is onely known to God. Quomodo in omnibus ſit rebus vel per eſſentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noſter non capit; For, how God (ſaith S. Auguſtine, ſpeaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by eſſence, preſence, or power, our underſtanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque diſtaret, ſi conſilia, & diſpoſitiones illius Majeſtatis æternæ, cogitatio aſſequeretur humana: There would be no difference between God and man, if man's underſtanding could conceive the counſels and diſpoſing of that eternal Majeſty; and therefore to be over-curious in ſearching how the all-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative ſpirit diſtinguiſhing, gaue form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warm our selves safely, while we stand neer the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometimes for a winde or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or winde: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Tostatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi, The soule of the world: and in his sixth Book de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantùm, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine onely, but even the voice of Angels: so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the waies and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or winde, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth, and giveth continuance to the Universal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith Solomon. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith David) they are created: And Gregory, Deus suo præsentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quòd si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerent universa; God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expresst excellently:

Wisd. 1. v. 7.

Virg. Æneid. lib. 8. 724.

Principio Cœlum ac Terras, camposque liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Lunæ, Titaniaq; astra,
Spiritus intus alit: totamq; infusa per artus,

The Heaven, and Earth, and all the liquid Mayn,
The Moons bright Globe, and Stars Titanian,
A Spirit within maintains: and their whole mass,
A mind, which through each part infus'd doth pass,
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Universe.

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarifaction, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten Aire: an element superiour, as lighter than the waters, through whose vast, open, subtile, Diaphanick, or transparent body, the light afterwards created, might easily transpierce: Light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vital Operation. Aquis à Deo insitam, ex qua aquæ non solùm motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital Operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the material ſubſtance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and uſe of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

THeſe waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Inſtrument of created light. For this firſt and diſperſed light did not (as I conceive) diſtinguiſh the night from the day, but with a reference to the Suns creation, and the uniting of the diſperſed light therein. This is proved by theſe words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to ſeparate the day from the night: which lights in the Firmament of Heaven, were alſo made for ſignes, and for ſeaſons, and for daies, and for years, implying a motion inſtantly to follow, by which, daies and years are diſtinguiſhed; after which ſucceeded time, or together with which, that Time (which was the meaſure of motion) began. For that ſpace of the firſt three daies which preceded the Suns creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be meaſured, and the day named in the fifth Verſe; was but ſuch a ſpace, as afterwards by the Suns motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beaſts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: ſo may Light (for expreſſion ſake) be called the Chaos, or material ſubſtance of the Sun, and other lights of heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing ſenſible, is that light it ſelf, Quæ cauſa eſt lucidorum, which is the cauſe that things are lightſome (though it make it ſelf and all things elſe viſible): but a body moſt illightned, which illuminateth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the ſuppoſed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our aire. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium cæleſtium virtutum, & impreſſionum: The conducter, and preſerver, or nouriſher of all celeſtial virtues and impreſſions, nothing deſcending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Ariſtotle calleth light a quality, inherent, or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, Lumen eſt qualitas inhærens Diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it tranſporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (ſay the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine reſidet in ſubjecto, The light being departed, doth reſide in the ſubject, as warmh in the air, though the ſame be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academicks make incorporal, and ſo doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia reſiſtit, nec ſpatium; Which neither hardneſs reſiſteth, nor ſpace leaveth.

Lux dicitur, quæ ſe, & omnia viſibilia facit. Cuſan. in Compend. cap. 7. & exercit. lib. 5

Ficin. lib. lumine, cap. 11.

Ariſtotle findeth corporality in the beams of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, ſaith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light it ſelf, but improperly: for it paſſeth at an inſtant from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it reſiſted by any hardneſs, becauſe it pierceth through the ſolid body of glaſs, or other Cryſtalline matter; and whereas it is withſtood by unclean and unpure earthy ſubſtances, leſs hard, and more eaſie to invade then the former, the ſame is, Quòd obſtaculum naturâ terreum atq; ſordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem: Becauſe an obſtacle by nature earthy and foule, doth not receive the pure clearneſs of light: alluding to that moſt divine Light, which onely ſhineth on thoſe minds, which are purged from all worldly droſs, and humane uncleanneſs.

Pic. de ſui.

Plain.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither do I marvail at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philoſophers, or School-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them underſtood either it or themſelves therein: all men (to caſt off ignorance) have diſputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as he hath ſhewed little ſtrength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: ſo is his own judgement herein, as weak as any mans; and moſt of the School-men were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more ſubtile in diſtinguiſhing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, than diſcoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philoſophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truly ſaid, Nihil ſapientiæ odioſius acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wiſdom, than too accute ſharpneſs. Neither hath the length of time, and the ſearch of many learned men, (which the ſame time hath brought brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporal: Corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies; which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire illightned: incorporal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subiect: for light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opake, Diaphanous or transparent; but darkenesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darkenesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or form, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtaine their so being of the light; and therefore, if wee derive this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely and against nature; and therefore he concludeth that light in the Sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Suns form, and the form of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

Lucida corpora sunt plena sua luce, alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris alieno lumine. Transparentia seu Diaphana carent suis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. sub. ex. 71.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red, or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or green glasse: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which redness or other colour, we call the intentional Species of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, be the same which the Sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than til the Suns creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the maine parts of the Universal: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or inriched with their vertual formes: So the Sun although it had not his formal prefection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisedom of God finde cause why it should move (by which motion, days and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give light, heate and operation.

But after the Earth (disttinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by enterchange of time) to visite every part of the inferiour world; by his heate to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

Job 38. 24. 9.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Job, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treaſure of God (ſaith Esdras:) And thoſe which inhabite the Heavens, do onely know the Eſſence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cælo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on earth. Res veræ ſunt in mundo inviſibili; in mundo viſibili umbræ rerum: Things themſelves are in the inviſible world; in the world viſible, but their ſhadowes. Surely, if this Light be not ſpirituall, yet it approacheth neereſt unto ſpiritualitie; and if it have any corporalitie, then of all other the moſt ſubtile and pure; for howſoever, it is of all things ſeen, the moſt beautifull, and of the ſwifteſt motion, of all other the moſt neceſſary and beneficiall. For it miniſtreth to men, and other cratures, all celeſtial influences; it diſſipateth thoſe ſad thoughts and ſorrowes, which the darkneſſe both begetteth and maintaineth; it diſcovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical ſwiftneſs, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the ſight thereof, our minds being informed of his viſible marvails, may continually travail to ſurmount theſe perceived Heavens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cauſe and Creator. Cognitio non quieſcit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it ſelfe in things created. Et ipſa lux facit, ut cætera mundi membra digna ſint laudibus, cùm ſuam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (ſaith Saint Ambroſe) that maketh the other parts of the world ſo worthy of praiſe, ſeeing that it ſelfe communicateth its goodneſſe and beauty unto all. Of which Ovid out of Orpheus:

Esd.l.2.c.6.40. Herm. Ficin.

Ille ego ſum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,
Mundi oculus.

Ovid. Met. lib. 1

The World diſcerns it ſelf, while I the World behold,
By me the longeſt years, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Laſtly, if we may behold in any creature, any one ſparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightneſs, the ſame in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipſa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux ſancta, and Chriſt our Saviour ſaid to be that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in reſpect of Gods incomprehenſible ſublimitie, and puritie, this is alſo true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other ſpirits; nor a light, ſuch as can be diſcerned. Deus profectò non mens eſt, at verò ut ſit mens cauſa eſt; nec ſpiritus, ſed cauſa quâ ſpiritus extat; nec lumen, ſed cauſa quâ lumen exiſtit: God (ſaith Hermes in Pœmandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cauſe that the minde hath his being; nor ſpirit, but the cauſe by which every ſpirit is; nor light, but the cauſe by which the light exiſteth.

Joh 1.9. & 14. 16.

So then the Maſs and Chaos being firſt created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, reſolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightned: the Earth alſo by being contiguat, and mixt with waters (participating the ſame divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the hearb that ſeedeth ſeed &c. and for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it alſo motion and heat, which heat cauſed a continuance of thoſe ſeverall ſpecies, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times ſucceeding.

Gen. 1. 10.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Cryſtalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God ſaid, Let there be a Firmament in the middeſt of the waters, and let it ſeparate the waters from the waters: that is, thoſe waters which by rarifaction and evaporation were aſcended, and thoſe of the Earth and Sea.

But theſe waters ſeparate above this extenſion, which the Latine Tranſlation calleth firmamentum, or expanſum (for ſo Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turne it) are not the Cryſtalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Baſilius Magnus calleth a childiſh ſuppoſition, making in the ſame place many learned arguments againſt againſt this infancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the ayre above us, where the ſame is more ſolid and condenſe, which God ſeparated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended diſtance and vaſt ſpace: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for ayre, and more properly for the ayre and Æther, than for the heavens, as the beſt Hebricians underſtand them, Quo ſuprema ac tenuia ab infimis craſſis diducta, interſectaq; diſtarent, for that whereby the ſupreme and thin bodies were placed in diſtance, being ſevered and cut off from low and groſſe matters: and the waters above the firmament, expreſt in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the ayre, or in the uppermoſt region of the ſame.

Gen. 49. 25. * Pſal. 104. 12. 2 Gen. 19. 24. Cap. 27. 28. Deut. 11. 11. Job 38. 29. Matth. 6. 26.

And that the word Heaven is uſed for the Ayr, the Scriptures every where witneſs: as in the bleſſings of Joſeph, and in the 104 Pſalm: * By theſe Springs ſhal the fowle of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodome and Gomorrah it rained brimſtone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Iſaacs bleſſing to Jacob; God give thee therefore of the dew of Heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you go to poſſeſſe it, is a land that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Job, Who hath ingendred the froſts of Heaven; and in S. Matthew, Behold the Fowles of Heaven, for they ſow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament throughout, is the word Heaven very often uſed for Ayre, and taken alſo hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whoſe top may reach to Heaven &c.

Gen. 11. 4.

And in this very place Baſil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of ſimilitude: his owne words be theſe; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad ſimilitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (ſaith Baſil) is properly applied to another (that is to the Starrie Heaven) but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the waters) it is impoſed by ſimilitude. And if there were no other proofe, that by the firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heaven, the words of Moſes in the eighth verſe, conferred with the ſame word Firmament in the twentieth verſe, make it manifeſt: for in the eighth verſe it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth verſe he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Ayre in theſe words: And let the Foule flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what uſe there ſhould be of this ycie or cryſtalline, or waterie Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the primum mobile would otherwiſe gather and increaſe: though in very truth, inſtead of this help, it would add an unmeaſurable greatnes of circle, wherby the ſwiftneſſe of that firſt Moveable would exceed all poſſibilitie of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impoſſibilia; but no man ought to be held to impoſſibilities: and faith it ſelf (which ſurmounteth the height of all humane reaſon) hath for a forcible conducter, the Word of Truth, which alſo may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reaſon and underſtanding. Now that this ſuppoſed firſt Moveable, turneth it ſelfe ſo many hundred thouſand miles in an inſtant (ſeeing the Scriptures teach it not) let thoſe that can beleeve mens imagination, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of theſe many Heavens, let the Reader that deſireth ſatisfaction, ſearch Orontius, and of this waterie Heaven, Baſilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41 &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his ſecond Book and ſixt chapter. For my ſelfe, I am perſwaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermoſt ayre.

A concluſion, repeating the ſumme of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finiſhing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the firſt Chapter of Geneſis, that this was the order of the moſt wiſe God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehenſible eternitie. Firſt, hee created the matter of all things: and in the firſt three dayes he diſtinguiſhed and gave to every nature his proper forme; the forme of levitie to that which aſcended; to that which deſcended, the form of gravitie: for he ſeparated light from darkeneſſe, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the laſt three three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and repleniſhed the World: he ſet in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moone, and Stars; filled the Earth with Beaſts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fiſh, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetative and growing, their ſeeds in themſelves; for he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preſerved. Wiſd. Sal. c. 1. 14.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per ſe; nor Forme the giver of being: and of our ignorance how ſecond cauſes ſhould have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and reſt, according to Ariſtotle, the ſame is nothing elſe, but the ſtrength and faculty, which God hath infuſed into every creature, having no other ſelfe-ability, than a Clocke, after it is wounde up by a mans hand, hath. Theſe therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any firſt or ſole power, have therein no other underſtanding, than ſuch a one hath, who looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth aſcribe ſome abſolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all conſideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgement, which alſo directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all elſe, that by the vertue of the firſt act, all Agents worke whatſoever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man ſeeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute ſight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all theſe his inſtruments and Organs; ſo God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Starres, by Nature, or infuſed properties, and by men as by ſeverall Organs, ſeverall effects; all ſecond cauſes whatſoever, being but inſtruments, conduites, and pipes, which carry and diſperſe what they have received from the head and fountaine of the Univerſall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and everiewhere-preſence (compaſſing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to vapours to be made clouds, cloudes to containe rain, and raine to fall: ſo all ſecond and inſtrumentall cauſes, together with Nature it ſelfe, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would becom altogether ſilent, vertueleſſe, and dead: of which excellently ORPHEUS; Per te vireſcunt omnia, All things by thee ſpring forth in youthfull greene. I enforce not theſe things, thereby to annihilate thoſe variable vertues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayſe him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in, or with each other, which the Heathen Philoſophers, and thoſe that follow them have taken on them to teach: I ſay, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or expreſſe it, ever enrich his owne underſtanding with any certaine truth, or ever edifie others (not fooliſh by ſelfe-flattery) therein. For (ſaith Lactantius, ſpeaking of the wiſdom of the Philoſophers) Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic ſtudio ſubjaceret, aliquando eſſet inventa; cum verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquiſitione contritis, non ſit comprehenſa, apparet nullam ibi eſſe ſapientiam; If in this ſtudie (ſaith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out: but ſeeing it is not yet comprehended, after that ſo much time, and ſo many wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wiſdom there to be had. Nam ſi de unâ re præcipua ſcientia haberetur, omnium rerum ſcientia neceſſariò haberetur: If the preciſe knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it ſhould neceſſarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philoſophers were ignorant in Nature, and the waies of her working: ſo were they more curious, than knowing, in their firſt matter and Phyſical form. For if their firſt matter had any being, it were not then the firſt matter: for, as it is the firſt matter, it hath onely a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth ſubſiſt. And ſeeing it is neither a ſubſtance perfect, nor a ſubſtance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other ſubſtance ſhould thence take concreſcence, it hath not been taught, neither are theſe formes (ſaith a learned Authour) any thing, ſi ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil eſt. Againe, how this firſt matter ſhould be ſubjectum jectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and humane: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between matter and forme, than between heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rationall consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Lovers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AUGUSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoever is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soever, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujuscunq; generis est, cujuscunq; æstimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confesse. For all forms (saith he) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starres have great influence: and that their operations may diversly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more generall, and universally powerfull than it is, by giving it Dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid and Juvenal:

Juven. sat. 7. 201.

Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.
Servis regna dabunt, captivis Fata triumphos.

'Gainst Fate no counsell can prevaile.
Kingdomes to Slaves by Destinie,
To Captives triumphs given be.

Basil. Hexa. 4. Aug. de heres. 70. c. 35. Tho. cont. Gent. 3. cap. 8. 3. Ficin. in 12. de leg. Cic. de fat.

An errour of the Chaldæans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiall Orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Stars are instruments of far greater use, than to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sun-set: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertained by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the same course, but that the Stars have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given vertues to Springs and Fountains, to cold earth, to plants and stones, Mineralls, and to the excrementall parts of the basest living creatures, why should we robbe the beautiful Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasury of his wisedom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as every herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, than to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his divine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his just will

to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Stars are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes; but are as open Books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisedom: which latter part I beleeve well, and this saying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things than these be, and we have seene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost vertues of hearbs and plants, which our selves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For hardly (saith Solomon) can we discerne the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before us: who can then investigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum est de rebus cœlestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some, were justifiable; of whom S. Augustine: Impiâ perversitate in malis factis rectissimè reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorem syderum, quàm commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of evill deeds, they againe with wicked perverseese urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, than the doer of the evill, is to be accused. Gen. 1.15. Eccl. 42. c. 32. Wis. 9.16. Aristotle. Aug. 20. super Gen. ad lit.

But that the Stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœlestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones. The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dispositions: for the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in vertues: for those of cholericke complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to bee transported, where the mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse minde, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestiall bodies (as instruments and executioners of Gods providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect, it conquereth. Gal. 1. tuer. an. seq. temp. Quint.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other than as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sun (saith S. AUGUSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sun is good to serve, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And Saint AUGUSTINE: Deis regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but he avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporall. Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 5. Hex. lib. 4. de term. 3.

But howsoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heavens do not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies no more than the signes of raine and winde do alwayes come to passe. And it is divers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Juvencis patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the Fathers vertue is, and so the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterchange; the Sons of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue. Hor. lib. 4. Od. 30.

A worthy ſon is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reſerved power) that ſo much ſetteth this art of influence out of ſquare and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World ſo wickedly inclined, but that a religious inſtruction and bringing up may faſhion anew and reforme them; nor any ſo well diſpoſed, whom (the reines being let looſe) the continuall fellowſhip and familiarity, and the examples of diſſolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Veſſels will ever retain a ſavour of their firſt liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanſe the minde once corrupted, or to extinguiſh the ſweet ſavour of vertue firſt received, when the minde was yet tender, open, and eaſily ſeaſoned; but where a favourable conſtellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found ſo exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the ſeeds of vertue may by the art and huſbandry of Chriſtian counſaile produce better and more beautiful fruit, than the ſtrength of ſelf-nature and Kind could have yeelded them; ſo the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themſelves into weeds, by being ſet in a ſoyle ſutable, and like themſelves, are made more unſavoury and filled with poyſon. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus aſtrorum, quemadmodùm agricola terræ naturam; A wiſe man aſſiſteth the work of the Stars as the Huſbandman helpeth the nature of the ſoyle. And Ptolemie himſelfe confeſſeth thus much, Sapiens, & omina ſapientis medici dominabuntur aſtris; A wiſe man, and the ominous art of a wiſe Phyſician ſhall prevaile againſt the Stars. Laſtly, we ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the reſt of the Univerſal, whoſe influences may be called his reſerved and unwritten Lawes. But let us conſider how they bind: even as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer ſhall ſuffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magiſtrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet theſe Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compaſſion, or binde them without prerogative, to ſuch a ſevere execution, as that there ſhould be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conſcience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other than a deafe Tyrant. But ſeeing that it is otherwiſe, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe ſometimes for cauſes to themſelves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both againſt others and themſelves, it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himſelfe, which his Subſtitutes injoy; God being mercy, goodneſſe, and charity it ſelf. Otherwiſe that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evill, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath aſſured us, that there is no inclination or temptation ſo forcible, which our humble Prayers and Deſires may not make fruſtrate and breake aſunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Deſtiny, though depending upon eternall power, yet being once ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himſelf ſhould in a kinde have ſhut up himſelfe therein: How miſerable then were the condition of men (ſaith S. Auguſtine) left altogether without hope.

Mat. 6. 13.

And if this ſtrength of the Stars were ſo transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo beleeveth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be deſpoyled of all worſhip, reverence, or reſpect.

John 17. 4.

And certainly, God which hath promiſed us the reward of well-doing, which Chriſt himſelf claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finiſhed the worke which thou gaveſt mee to doe:) and the ſame God, who hath threatned unto us the ſorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be ſo unjuſt, as to bind us inevitably to the Deſtinies or influences of the Stars, or ſubject our ſoules to any impoſed neceſſity. But it was well ſaid of Plotinus, that the Stars were ſignificant, but not efficient, giving them yet ſomething leſſe than their due: and therefore as I doe not conſent with them, who would make thoſe glorious creatures of God vertueleſſe: ſo I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and abſolute power and providence, to aſcribe to them them the same dominion over our immortal soules, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the souls of men, loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the Suns clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predestination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have. Plat. pol. 6. Ficin. in 7. pol.

§. XII.
Of Prescience.

PRescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other than an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience onely) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will rise, and set; that all men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Sommer and Harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us binde or constrain the Sun to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own natures. And again our of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non ipsonit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil. Boetius de consol.

§. XIII.
Of Providence.

NOw Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and we our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembring things past, and observing things present, can by judgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us hereof: and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the Mountains, which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them food in due season: And thou shalt drink of the River Chearet (saith God to Elias) and I have com- Psal. 147. 8. Psal. 104. 27, 9. & 145. 15.

1 Reg. 17.4. Matth. 6.26. Luke 12.6,7. 1 Pet. 5.7. Psal. 36.6. Jer. 23.24. Esay 42.8.

commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the hayres of your head are numbred: And S. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgements are written, saith David.

God therefore, who is every where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the Righteous, and his countenance against them that do evill, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinit eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his own word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is every-where present, and King of kings. The example of Gods universall Providence is seen in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all livings for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universall: and if there be a naturall loving care in men, and beasts much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universall: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universæ machinæ fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetuall knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the universall. God therefore who could onely be the cause of all, can onely provide for all, and sustain all; so as to absolute power; to every-where presence; to perfect goodness; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is onely proper and belonging.

§. XIV.

Of Predestination.

NOw for Predestination, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, than in this, that Prescience onely fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven, to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: and Predestination (as it is used specially by Divines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines, or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity: divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devill: for according to Nonius Marcellus, destinare, est præparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanus, Danæus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again with S. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

LAstly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Stars have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini præcepti instrumentum;

The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddess, the most reverenced, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greekes call her τύχη, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisedom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the successe prosperous; insomuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which Palladius, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels, have equal successe to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had Fortune the same externall figure with Sapience; whereof Athenæus:

Sen. ep. 91. Aur. vict. de pertinace. Sen. ep. 74. Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is said to have used to cry out upon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of Æschilus, Tu me extulisti eadem meis (sentio) perditum.

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors dissidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen similima:
From Wisedome Fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successe of humane actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato: Nihil est ortum sub Sole; cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to passe under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem Inferioris, sed non præter intentionem Superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith Melanchton) Quod Poetæ fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murder, He that smiteth a man, and he dye, shall dye the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words; God hath offered him into his hands, we say, If he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself, we in our phrase attribute this accident, to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casuall and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soul of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisedom, which we express by the name of God, governing every being aswell in heaven as in earth; to which wisedom and power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same differenced by divers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power divers'ly.

Te facimus Fortuna Deam, cæloq; locamus. Sat. 10. 366. Exod. 21. 12, 13 Vers. 5. Vers. 33. Cic. ac quæst. l. 1 Senec. l. 4. c. 7.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express successe; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depended upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fooles; that riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernell nell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their lives in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferiour, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the time wherein we live: for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth; if Princes, or those that governe, endure no other discourse than their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheele; which kinde of deserving well and receiving ill, we alwayes fallsly charge Fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not Just; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall never be made a Counseller, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wise Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities; saile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are vertues, and all their dusty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to Menander, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Every foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoever will live altogether out of himselfe, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the authour of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishops of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heresie raged:

Ovid. Metam. lib. 1.

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed Judgement had followed the counsell of his brother Quintus, Potuisset (saith Petrarch in lectulo suo mori, potuisset integro condavere sepeliri; He might then have died the death of nature, and beene with an untorne and undissevered body buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quàm desperantem præsertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari? What more fooliſh than for him that despaires (especially of the effect) to be intangled with endlesse contentions; Whosoever therefore will set before him Machiavels two markes to shoot at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak woodden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble; for as he that first devised to adde sayls to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne invention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the divers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sailes and his cloth of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather fooliſhnesse) of man hath found out: let us resolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of man's estate in his first Creation, and of God's rest.

§. 1.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heavens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let us make man in our owne Image, according to our likeness. Gen. 1. 26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods works to us known: ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greatest wonder (saith Plato out of Mercurius:) Naturæ ardentissimæ artificium, The artificial work of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellency externall, but in respect of his internall forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence, immortal, and spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein. Trif. Asel. 2. & de volunt. Dei. Plat. leg. l. 1.

Sanctius his animal mentisq; capacius altæ
Deerat adhuc: & quod dominari in cætera posset, Natus homo est.
More holy than the rest, and understanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Sanctius, quia pars potior immortalis, anima, quia in mortali. In locum Ovid. Met. l. 1. 76.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Ut sicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus, & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terræ: unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse; that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortal soule onely, because as God is invisible, so the soule of man is invisible; as God is immortal and incorporall, so is the soule of man immortal and incorporal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world; so but one soul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwise than potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments do the Jewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Son, the holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude divers; and againe, they distinguish between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threds with subtile distinctions, many times the plainenesse and sincerity of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to bee substantiall, but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring qualitie in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ, so the sinful soule doth not therefore leave to be the image of God; but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man; and in his Retractations maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the similitude is more largely taken, than the Image.

But howsoever the Schoolmen and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the Image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we have borne the image of the earthly, so shall we bear 10
1 Cor. 15. 49. the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words Image and Similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both: so Saint James useth the word (Similitude) for both in these
Jam. 3. 9. words: Therewith bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of Ut supra. elegancy in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in æternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri; we confesse that this image is found in 20
Aug. ut sapr. eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi verò possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not? no, out of doubt, where there is no likenesse, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as Let us make man in our image, according to our likenesse: which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine; for there he useth the word (Image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fift Chapter, the word (Similitude) is used againe 30 by it selfe, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likenesse of God made he him. And Vers. 10. this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the Image. Put on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleeve Saint Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolemen, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for S. Paul useth both the words directly
Rom. 1. 23. in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanch. de op. Dei. l. 3. c. 1. Zanchius labours to prove, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine quæ non fuerit hujusce imaginis particeps; No part in 40 a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let us make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole Man compounded of body and soule. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idæa and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alleged that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the body only: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert 50
In Gen. (saith Saint Augustine:) Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of mans body: Deus enim non est humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum divinæ (saith Philo;) God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the forme divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the very essence and Majesty of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine underſtanding than theſe groſs Hereticks: Ad ſimilitudinem Dei propriùs accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The vertue which is in man (ſaith he) came neerer the ſimilitude of God, than the figure. For God is a ſpirituall ſubſtance, inviſible, and moſt ſimple; God is a juſt God: God is Mercifull: God is Charity it ſelf, and (in a word) Goodneſs it ſelf, and none elſe ſimply good. And thus much it hath pleaſed God himſelf to teach us, and to make us know of himſelf. What then can be the ſhadow of ſuch a ſubſtance, the image of ſuch a nature, or wherein can man be ſaid to reſemble his unexcogitable power and perfectneſs? certainly, not in Dominion alone: for the Devil is ſaid to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdom of Chriſt was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither becauſe man hath an immortall ſoul, and therein the faculties of Memory, Underſtanding, and Will; for the Devils are alſo immortall, and participate thoſe faculties, being called Dæmones, becauſe ſcientes of Knowledge, and ſubtilty; neither becauſe we are reaſonable creatures, by which we are diſtinguiſhed from beaſts: for who have rebelled againſt God? who have made gods of the vileſt beaſts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, even of ſhamefull parts, of luſts and pleaſures, but reaſonable men? yet do I not condemn the opinion of Saint Chryſoſtome and Ambroſe, as touching dominion, but that, in reſpect thereof, man was in ſome ſort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, ſuch as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Juſtice and Piety: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fiſhes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heaven (or of the aire) and over the Beaſts of the Field; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them; and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reaſon, as it is the ability of Underſtanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenæus did therefore call man, the image of God, becauſe he was animal rationale onely; but that he underſtood it better, with Sybilla: Imago mea eſt homo, rectam rationem habens: Man that is endued with right reaſon is ſaid to reſemble God, (that is) by right reaſon to know and confeſs God his Creatour, and the ſame God to ſerve, love, and obey: and therefore ſaid S. Auguſtine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem ſuam in mente; God made man, in reſpect of the intellect, after his own Image and ſimilitude; and Reynerius; Homo, quòd habet mentem, factus eſt ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sin.

BUt Mens is not taken here for anima phyſica, according to Ariſtotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall ſtrength of the minde, or ſoul, cujus actus eſt perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whoſe act, exerciſe, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is alſo called intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa. A divine underſtanding, and an intellect or minde contemplative. Eſt autem mens noſtra (ſaith Cuſanus) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compoſitum: Our intellectuall minde (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending, even the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehenſion: unto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the errour of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) than the light from the Sun: for this Mens or underſtanding (ſaith Mercurius) eſt Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the Sun is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; ſo is this Mens or underſtanding in men, not of the eſſence of Gods infinite underſtanding, but a power and faculty of our ſoules the pureſt; or the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens, others call animam animæ, The ſoul of the ſoul, or with Saint Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine knowledge, quæ amorem ſapientiæ tanquam ducem ſequitur, Which followeth

after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which and reason, between which and the mind, called anima, between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; or the soul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life: for death is the separation of body and soul; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soul in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which called this Mens, or divine understanding, perspicacem animæ partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the soul discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that sleep it is this (mens) or understanding, and not the mind or soul, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, and in mad men this (Mens) is extinguished, and not the soul: for mad men do live, though distract.

Therefore this word being often used for the soule giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distract minde, in stead of a broken understanding: which word (Minde) we use also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that minde: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honest minde, or, a man of a just minde: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's sake; and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; A part or particle of the Soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be dissevered, as, eternall from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præest, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the Image of this understanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or understanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the Soule, and this Soule over the Body. This division and distinction out of the Platonicks and Peripateticks, I leave to the reader to judge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marsilius Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words: for (saith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intuatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum à sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasiam prolata: To exercise the faculty of understanding, the minde of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasmes, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasie. But in effect, his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and minde, as colours are to the sight: whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing; and as this is an organum, so that. Of this question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M.D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. However the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the minde it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being being added to the nature, eſſence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whoſe words are theſe: Non propterea imago Dei eſt, quia ſui meminit Mens, ſeq; intelligit & diligit (which alſo was the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) ſed quia poteſt meminiſſe, intelligere ac diligere eum à quo facta eſt, (that is) The Minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, becauſe it remembreth, underſtandeth, and loveth it ſelf, but becauſe it can remember, underſtand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem Dei factus eſt, peccatum verò imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiſcentiæ affectibus immerſit: Man was made after the Image and ſimilitude of GOD, but ſin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiſcence.

It is not therefore (as aforeſaid) by reaſon of Immortality, nor in Reaſon, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of theſe by it ſelf, nor in all theſe joyned, by any of which, or by all which we reſemble, or may be called the ſhadow of God, though by reaſon and underſtanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in reſpect of the habit of Original righteouſneſs, moſt perfectly infuſed by God into the Mind and Soule of man in his firſt Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the ſeale of Gods Image (though Reaſon may be ſaid to be of her gift, which joyned to the ſoul, is a part of the Eſſential Conſtitution of our proper Species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodneſs, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Duſt and Clay, the inimitable hability of his own Piety and righteouſneſs.

So long therefore (for that reſemblance which Dominion hath) do thoſe that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exerciſe the Office or Magiſtracy to which they are called, and ſincerely walk in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men ſo long retain this Image, as they feare, love and ſerve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruiſe and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obſtinate ſins. For the unjuſt minde cannot be after the Image of God, ſeeing God is Juſtice it ſelf; The blood-thirſty hath it not; for God is Charity, and Mercy it ſelf: Falſhood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one ſoul, together with GOD: and to be ſhort, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkneſs, between beauty and deformity, or between righteouſneſs and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common underſtanding, have made us capable by the power of reaſon, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodneſs, which the ſenſual ſouls of Beaſts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and imbrace the falſe and dure-leſs pleaſures of this Stage-play World, than to become the ſhadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanſhip of GOD's Wiſedom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our ſouls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our fleſh, behold the higheſt Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and termleſs Joy, prepared for thoſe which retain the Image and ſimilitude of their Creator, preſerving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of GOD, is created in Righteouſneſs, and Holineſs, as ſaith Saint Paul. Now whereas it is thought by ſome of the Fathers, as by S. Auguſtine, with whom S. Ambroſe joyneth, that by ſin, the perfection of the Image is loſt, and not the Image it ſelf; both opinions by this diſtinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for either it is conſidered, according to natural gifts, and conſiſteth therein: namely, to have a reaſonable and underſtanding nature, &c. and in this ſenſe, the Image of God is more loſt by ſin, than the very reaſonable or underſtanding nature &c. is loſt, (or ſin doth not aboliſh and take away theſe natural gifts:) or, the Image of God is conſidered, according to ſupernatural gifts, namely, of Divine grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accompliſhment of the natural Image; and this manner of ſimilitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and deſtroyed by ſin.

§. III.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof shou'd yeeld to the immortall Soule.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam, of Adamath, of red Earth, or ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguissima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

Arias Mont. de nat. f. 156.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabite, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and resistless assaults of death, and Nature assureth us by never-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our Bodies are but the Anviles of pain and diseases, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbred cares, sorrows and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Envie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we onely prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or onely remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soule, which can neither die with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing Gods justice in the one, and his goodness in the other is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? Never while we have one vanity left us to spend: we pleade for Titles, till our breath fail us; dig for Riches, while our strength inableth us; exercise malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it self hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must go the way from whence we shall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; And then, I say, looking over-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withal this terrible Inscription: That God will bring every work into judgement, that man hath done under the Sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what perswasions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other men's Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promised and threatned: but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and these betraying lights, (with which we onely see) do neither looke up towards termless joyes, nor down towards endless sorrowes, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the World's hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil deniq; morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, iisq; periclis
Tentati, nihilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitiis nullo culparum fine manentes.

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend;
In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal souls herein: for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Frustra sperant qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul spirituall and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breathed his grace daily into such as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIHU in JOB) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua sententia (saith RABANUS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formâsse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis suis inspirâsse in faciem formati, ut vivere posset & spiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quàm propria, (id est) juxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggarlinesse of carnal sense is to be avoided, least perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith; Thy hands have made me, spake this Tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custome which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnal sense? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soule, and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith JOB; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, than for the soule; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Jesus receive my spirit: and in S. JOHN, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the Soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so shall they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne again to God that gave it.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief Story of the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate and serve his Creator, after whose image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other God's creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man: and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE,) Homo est utriusque naturæ vinculum; Man is the bond and chaine which tieth together both Natures: and because in the little frame of man's bodie there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kinde of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem fecit, velut alterum quendam mun-

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, enduring pain and care, Approving, that our bodies of a ſtony nature are.

His bloud, which diſperſeth it ſelf by the branches of veines through all the body, may be reſembled to thoſe waters, which are carryed by Brooks and Rivers over all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heat to the incloſed warmth which the Earth hath in it ſelf, which, ſtirred up by the heat of the Sun, aſſiſteth Nature in the ſpeedier procreation of thoſe varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moiſture, Oyl, or Balſamum (whereon the naturall heat feedeth and is maintained) is reſembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adornes or over-ſhadowes it, to the graſs, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering and unſtable clouds, carryed every where with uncertain winds; our eyes, to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very ſhort time, or with the Suns heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffes of wind blow them from the ſtalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure underſtanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh upwards) to thoſe intellectuall natures, which are alwayes preſent with God; and laſtly our immortall ſoules (while they are righteous) are by God himſelf beautified with the title of his own Image and ſimilitude. And although, in reſpect of God, there is no man juſt, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprehenſa eſt ſtultitia, Behold, he found folly in his Angels (ſaith Job) yet with ſuch a kind of difference, as there is between the ſubſtance and the ſhadow, there may be found a goodneſs in man: which God being pleaſed to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and ſimilitude of his own righteouſneſs. In this alſo is the little World of man compared, and made more like the univerſall (man being the meaſure of all things; Homo eſt menſura omnium rerum, ſaith Ariſtotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complections reſemble the four Elements, and the ſeven Ages of man the ſeven Planets: Whereof our infancie is compared to the Moon, in which we ſeem onely to live and grow, as Plants; the ſecond Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and inſtructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Love, Deſire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the ſtrong, flouriſhing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we ſeek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travail to ambitious ends; the ſixth Age is aſcribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take accompt of our times, judge of our ſelves, and grow to the perfection of our underſtanding; the laſt and ſeventh to Saturn, wherein our dayes are ſad and over-caſt, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loſs which can never be repaired, that of all our vain paſſions and affections paſt, the ſorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are ſickneſſes, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by ſo much the more greedily is our end deſired, whom when Time hath made unſociable to others, we become a burthen to our ſelves: being of no other uſe, than to hold the riches we have from our Succeſſors. In this time it is, when (as aforeſaid) we, for the moſt part, and never before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we paſſe on unto with many ſighes, grones, and ſad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanſhip of death, finiſh the ſorrowfull buſineſs of a wretched life; towards which we alwayes travell both ſleeping and waking: neither have thoſe beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promiſe of entertainments; but by what crooked path ſoever we walk, the ſame leadeth on directly to the houſe of death, whoſe doors lye open at all hours, and to all perſons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Stream, but never floweth again: our Leaf once fallen, ſpringeth no more, neither

For if there were any baiting place, or reſt, in the courſe or race of mans life, then according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the ſame might alſo perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall living things, and as the ſap and juyce, wherein the life of Plants is preſerved, doth evermore aſcend or deſcend; ſo is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increaſing towards ripeneſſe and perfection, or declining and decreaſing towards rottenneſs and diſſolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his firſt Creation, to diſpoſe of himſelf.

THeſe be the miſeries which our firſt Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconſtrained will, and on whom he beſtowed the liberall choice of all things, with one onely prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God ſet before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celeſtiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himſelf, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or deſcribe unto himſelf what he pleaſed, and make election of his own form. God made man in the beginning (ſaith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his own counſel. Such was the liberality of God, and mans felicity: whereas beaſts, and all other creatures reaſonleſs, brought with them into the World (ſaith Lucilius) and that even when they firſt fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the ſupernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or ſoon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetuall eternity. But (as aforeſaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegative life of Plants, the ſenſuall of Beaſts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which ſoever he took pleaſure to plant and cultive, the ſame ſhould futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the firſt man Adam, and our firſt Father, was ænigmatically deſcribed by Aſclepius Athenienſis (ſaith Mirandula) in the perſon and Fable of Proteus, who was ſaid, as often as he pleaſed, to change his ſhape. To the ſame end were all thoſe celebrated Metamorphoſes among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into divers ſhapes of beaſts, thereby to ſhew the change of mens conditions, from Reaſon to Brutality, from Vertue to Vice, from Meekneſs to Cruelty, and from Juſtice to Oppreſſion. For by the lively Image of other creatures did thoſe Ancients repreſent the variable paſſions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were ſignified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppreſſors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men given over to luſt and ſenſuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which alſo Saint Matthew reſembleth to falſe Prophets, which come to you in ſheepes clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: by the images of ſtones and ſtocks, fooliſh and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungratefull Men: of which St. JOHN BAPTIST, O ye generation of Vipers, &c.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universall created was exceeding good.

IN this work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality, and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to repleniſh the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

CONcerning the first Habitation of man, we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeved in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum authoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We passe over many grosse errours, by the authority of great men led and and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakenesse:

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confeſt that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the fleſh, or out of the fleſh; and Chriſt himſelf acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, ſeeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wiſe. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (ſaith JOB) but where is wiſdom found? and where is the place of underſtanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore ſeeing GOD found folly in his Angels, mens judgements (which inhabit in houſes of Clay) cannot be without their miſtakings: and ſo the Fathers, and other learned men, excuſable in particulars, eſpecially in thoſe whereupon our ſalvation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of ſtrange opinions touching Paradiſe.

NOw touching Paradiſe, firſt it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradiſe, or no? or whether Moſes deſcription were altogether myſtical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others have affirmed; and that under the names of thoſe four Rivers, Piſon, Gehon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other myſteries and ſignifications; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal vertues, Juſtice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyl, Wine, Milke and Hony. This Allegorical underſtanding of Paradiſe by Origen divulged, was again by Franciſcus Georgius received (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis;) whoſe frivilous imaginations Sixtus himſelf doth fully and learnedly anſwer, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Book, fol. 338. the laſt Edition. Bartaſ. ſem. 2. l. 1. 143.

S. Ambroſe alſo leaned wholly to the Allegoricall conſtruction, and ſet Paradiſe in the third Heaven, and in the vertues of the mind, & in noſtro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our ſoules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this ſort. By the place or garden of Paradiſe, was meant the ſoul or mind; by Adam, Mens, or Underſtanding: by Eve, the Senſe: by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; & by the reſt of the Trees, the vertues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence ſpringing. Notwithſtanding all which, upon the firſt of the Corin. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celeſtiall and terreſtriall Paradiſe; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chryſamenſis was of opinion, that a Paradiſe had been, but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the ſame being not only defaced, but withall the places now not ſo much as exiſting. To which Luther ſeemeth to adhere. Amb. de Parad.

The Manichees alſo underſtood, that by Paradiſe was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two ſeverall places. Firſt, upon this: Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipſo etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini univerſis animantibus, ſubjicite terram, clariſſimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus conſitam, ſedem & hortum illum Adæ, & poſteritatis futuræ fuiſſe; These words (ſaith he) in which God ſaid, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and ſubdue it, and rule over every creature, do cleerly ſhew, that the Univerſall earth ſet or filled with all ſorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and ſeat of ADAM, and of his future poſterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts Cap. 17. Apoſtolus ex uno ſanguine omne genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent ſuper univerſam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra Paradiſus ille erat; The Apoſtle (ſaith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one bloud all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (ſaith he) was that Paradiſe. Which conjectures I will anſwer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was firſt planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth neer the River of Aceſines, in the confines of India. Verſ. 25.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradiſe under the Equinoctiall, and Poſtellus, quite contrary, under the North pole: the Chaldæans alſo for the moſt part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradiſe a figure, or Sacrament only, or elſe would have it ſeated out of this ſenſible world, or raiſed into ſome high and remote Region of the Ayr. Strabus, and Rabanus Bart. 16. 126.

Bed. in Gen. Pet. Comeſt. l. 1. cap. 3. Moſes Barc. de Par.

Rabanus, were both ſick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: ſo was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comeſtor, and Moſes Barcephas the Syrian, tranſlated by Maſius. But as Hopkins ſayes of Philo Judeus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what evil Angel he was blown up into this errour: ſo can I not but greatly marvel at the learned men, who ſo groſſely and blindly wandred; ſeeing Moſes, and after him the Prophets, do ſo plainly deſcribe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compaſſe upon which it lay, in reſpect of Judæa, or Canaan.

Noviomagus alſo upon Beda, De naturâ rerum, beleeveth that all the Earth was taken for Paradiſe,, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (ſaith he) hath the ſame beauty aſcribed to Paradiſe. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain, from whence the four Rivers, Piſon, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not think it poſſible, that theſe Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Meſopotamia, and Armenia) could riſe out of one Fountain, were it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradiſe Eaſtward, in the Countrey of Eden.

Gen. cap. 2.

TO the firſt therefore, that ſuch a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moſes make it manifeſt, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eaſtward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made: and howſoever the vulgar tranſlation, called Jeromes tranſlation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverat Dominus Deus Paradiſum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradiſe of pleaſure from the beginning; putting the word (pleaſure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eaſtward: it is manifeſt, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what ſenſe hath this tranſlation (ſaith our Hopkins, in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe) that he planted a Garden in pleaſure, or that a River went out of pleaſure to water the Garden: But the ſeventy Interpreters call it Paradiſum Edenis, the Paradiſe of Eden, and ſo doth the Chaldæan Paraphraſt truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Noune appellative; which Region, in reſpect of the fertility of the ſoyle, of the many beautiful Rivers & goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do alwayes keep their leaves, was called Eden, which ſignifieth in the Hebrew, pleaſantneſs, or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Country, oppoſite to the Iſle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the miſtaking, which may end the diſpute, as touching the double ſence of the word, that as Florida was a Countrey, ſo called for the flouriſhing beauty thereof; ſo was Eden a Region called pleaſure, or delicacy, for its pleaſure, or delicacy: and as Florida ſignifieth flouriſhing; ſo Eden ſignifieth pleaſure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region, (called pleaſure in the Hebrew) and Paradiſe being the choiſe ſeate of all that Region, Paradiſe was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleaſure.

Now, for Eaſtward, to tranſlate it, from the beginning, it is alſo contrary to the tranſlation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Baſil, Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damaſcenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and ſet the word (Eaſtward) for ab initio: for Damaſcens own words are theſe, Paradiſus eſt locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter conſitus; Paradiſe is a place, marvellouſly planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the Eaſt.

And after all theſe Fathers, Guilhelmus Pariſienſis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senenſis, of latter times, do both underſtand theſe words of Eden and of the Eaſt, contrary to the vulgar Tranſlation; Pariſienſis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senenſis, directly againſt the vulgar: of which theſe are their own words: After this I will begin to ſpeak of Paradiſe terreſtrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eaſtward, &c. Poſt hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiſo terreſtri, quem plantâſſe Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senenſis; MOSES enim clariſſimè prodit, Paradiſum à Deo conſitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem eſſe proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus CHAM habitâſſe ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For MOSES (ſaith (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERERIUS endeavoureth to qualifie this Translation; for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgement) the Devill was from the instant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans Creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (antè) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. BECANUS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end, to find Paradise upon the River of Asecines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the Tree of knowledge, of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-Tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Verse. 16.

John 8. 44.

Gen. 3. 24.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldæans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damascenus:) affirming, that we alwayes pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, alwayes towards the West, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Judea, yet it was West from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestial, & the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwayes called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ovid.

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataeaq; regna recessit,
Persidaq; & radiis juga subdita matutinis

The East wind with Aurora hath a biding
Among th' Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his first rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremy the Prophet, threatning the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonozer, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est, (saith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning and East-ward is all one; à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verse, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to growe every Tree pleasant to the sight; and good for meat &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam else-where as in the World at large; and then put him into the Garden; and the end why, is expresst: that he might dress it and keepe

Vers. 18. keep it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Country neer unto Charon in Mesopotamia, Ezekiel witnesseth.

Vers. 10. Ezek. 27. 23.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit EVA de arbore, non est ADAM, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur; If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river, as Prison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; EVE then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome upon DANIEL: Contitescant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoriæ Legibus se debere subruere: Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it self, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, & the Trees under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to ADAM to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third heaven, nor neer the circle of the Moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmaticall or mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Mankinde. And is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we finde that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of GOD, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soyle of far exceeding excellency.

Ezek. 31. 9.

Gen. 13. 10.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the story of Paradise? to which also appertain those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Ovid. Metam. l. 2.

Ver erat æternum, placidiq; tepentibus auris
Mulcebant Zephyrinatus sine semine flores.

The joyful Spring did ever last, | Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breed | Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Secta-

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had bin conceived out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if wee finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into foure Branches; together with the kingdomes of Havila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegorical sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantùm (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroq; modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporall: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spirituall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgement: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible, so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

§. IV.

Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUt it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seate of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pison should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Rivers so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have beene in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or give place to the judgement of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in generall, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Greeians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleeve that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe and separated as to hang in the Ayre under the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the foure Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up againe in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any man think that I enforce or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestors own words. Est autem locus amœnissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeò elevatus, ut usq; ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so that it reacheth to the globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoq; responsum volumus Bar. converted by Masius.

volumus, Paradiſum multò ſublimiore poſitum eſſe regione, atq; hæc noſtra extet terra, eoq; ſi-eriut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non poſſis; eoq; impetu impulſi preſſiq; ſub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rurſus proſiliant ebullianteq; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this ſenſe: Furthermore (ſaith he) we give this for an anſwer, that Paradiſe is ſet in a Region farre raiſed above this part which wee inhabite; whereby it comes to paſſe, that from thence theſe rivers fall downe with ſuch a headlong violence, as words cannot expreſſe; and with that force ſo impulſed and preſt, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again riſe and boyle up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradiſum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita poſitum eſſe, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradiſe doth compaſſe or embrace the whole Earth, and is ſo ſet beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every ſide, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that theſe ridiculous expoſitions and opinions doe not bring queſtion unto Truth it ſelfe, or make the ſame ſubject to doubts or diſputes, it is neceſſary to diſcover the true place of Paradiſe, which God in his wiſedome appointed in the very Navell of this our World, and (as Melanchon ſaies) in parte Terræ meliore, in the beſt part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Univerſall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we ſhall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the worlds inhabitation: for neere unto this did the Sons of Noah alſo diſperſe themſelves after the floud into all other remote regions and countries. And if it be a generous deſire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers have come, and out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be diſpleaſing to underſtand the place of our firſt Anceſtor, from whence all the ſtreames and branches of Mankind have followed and bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that ſuch a place there was as Paradiſe, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine ſeveral opinions before remembred, by the Truth it ſelf; and to ſee how they agree with the ſenſe of the Scripture, and with common reaſon, and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God firſt planted this delightful Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradiſe, nor cauſed Hils in the Earth.

AND firſt, whereas it is ſuppoſed by Aug. Chyſamenſis, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in ſuch ſort, as no man can find any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others alſo, aſcribing to the Flood the cauſe of thoſe high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other ſtrange effects) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradiſe was after the Flood withered, and grown old, in reſpect of the firſt beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no ſigne of any ſuch place, or if the ſoile and ſeate had not remained, then would not Moſes, who wrote of Paradiſe about 850. yeares after the Flood, have deſcribed it ſo particularly, and the Prophets long after Moſes would not have made ſo often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it ſelfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and paſture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is ſtill the ſame, and the Rivers ſtill remaine the ſame Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit Tygris and Euphrates, we are ſure to finde in what longitude Paradiſe lay; and learning out one of theſe Rivers, which afterward doth divide it ſelf into foure branches, wee are ſure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it ſelf. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided and became into foure heads; Now whether the word in the Latine Tranſlation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it ſelf, or to Paradiſe, yet the diviſion and branching of thoſe rivers muſt be in the North or South ſide of the very Garden (if the rivers run as they doe, North and South) & therfore theſe rivers yet remaining, & Eden manifeſtly known, there could be no ſuch defacing by the flood, as is ſuppoſed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new rivers created by the Floud which were not, or that the Floud (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hils or deep Valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebb or floud of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to pass upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. Gen. 8. 1.

Gen. 2. 10.

So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters sank, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the winde to blow, to dry up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Aire of thick vapours, and unwholsom mists: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore dissever the violence of outragious winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughs, Bayes, or Gulfs to receive a Floud, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his daies; which pillars were set up above 1426. years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the city of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his daies, who lived in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certain altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the World, built by Cain, the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Floud overflowed by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountains. Gen. 4. 17. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the floud, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos servo est diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Minyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and ever since, knowne by the same names; and on which Mountains it is generally received that the Arke rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Floud; on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all authority, either divine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turn upside down the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when NOAH sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, Gen. 8. 11. which she had pluckt, and which (until the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floting on the water; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written: folium Olivæ, raptum or decerptum, a leaf pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chysamensis being answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over every Creature, &c. Gen. 1. 28. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blood all Mankinde, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, Acts 17. 26. do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the earth; yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultive, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choyce, but that Adam had bin left to the Universal; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, Gen. 2. 8. 3. 24. seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the Universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there should grow but one Thistle. NOVIOMAGUS upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havilah in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Floud, yet Adams shin-bones must have contained a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others, which make it higher than the Middle Region of the Ayre.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoolemen affirme, Paradise to be a Place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neer the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoolemen charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heaven; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) tooke this place for Heaven it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other divine apprehensions) set downe what they beleeved in plain termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Devill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull, and healthfull upon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being above all Clouds of Raine, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeeres) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proofe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Soules were preserved till the last judgement; which Irenæus and Justin Martyr also beleeved. But this opinion was of all Catholique Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est, ENOCH and ELIAM nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now live, so where they live, in Paradise or elsewhere it is uncertaine. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the earth, and have risen again in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

Diog. Laert. Soc.

Justin. Mart. adm. ad Gent. Aug.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeate these few: for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferiour to that of the Inventer.

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had beene too neer the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the ayre in that Region is so violently moved, and carried about with such swiftnes, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the place between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolomie and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it beene so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive us of the Suns light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neer those fals of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell neer the Catadupæ, or over-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-fals, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neer them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in BASIL or AMBROSE.

Cicero Somn. Scip.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and bloud, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shalbe changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Floud all perished on the earth, saving 8 persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

1 Cor. 15. 36. 51

1 Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Aire, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Floud did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelm it:) this is also contrary to the expres letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell give credit to Masius, Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolmen are) full of distinction, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Floud was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seem to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, than to resolve by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hils both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountain tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence washt off by rains, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self Hils the aire is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of aire to mount her self by.

Exod. 14. 21.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climats.

THose which come neerer unto Reason, finde Paradise under the Æquinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa,) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it, (Ganges being one of the foure rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Æquinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now finde, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it self. For here-of Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by trial and the witness of men's travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith ISAY) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated under the Æquinoctial line, or neer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easterly winde (which the Spaniards call the Erize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, neer the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper: Only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this ayre and fresh winde, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountains, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona any time despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terræ vitiosæ, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolmen were grosse in this particular.

Isay 45.1.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlosyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of ESA. 37. and EZEK. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembred, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as modern.

Besides, we finde that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romanes despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turk hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memory of those people; which he hath subjected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tygris, the better to finde the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are expresst to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the rivers onely described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in
Isa. 37. v. 12. these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RABSAKEH: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he pro-
Cap. 27. ver. 23. phecieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Assur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof,
Cap. 1. vers. 1. the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwise Convallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Assyria is joyned to Arabia the Desart, and where Ptolomie placeth the City of Averia: and the third is knowne Strabo. by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœlosyria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greek is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradise, the Jewes believed this Cœlosyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though, to give Beroldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAH) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the chil- Ezech. 27. v. 23 dren of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Assur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) The Mart of the people for many Iles. And it hath ever been the custome, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterane Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every Countrie yeelded; and having counted the several People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They Vers. 24. were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broydered workes, fine linnen, corral, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba, and Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all precious stones, and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia & Arabia Fœlix yeeld: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearls, as their owne Countries yeelded:

and (withal) having trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them alſo all ſorts of ſpices, and plenty of gold. The better to convey theſe commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonozor, now called Balſara) thence ſent up all theſe rich merchandiſes by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Weſtward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies journey of Alleppo, and then over Land they paſt to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforeſaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, beſides thoſe proper commodities which themſelves had, and which they received out of Perſia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome underſtandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is ſeated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hieroſolymitanus thinks it to be Cteſiphon: but Cteſiphon is ſeated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that ſide. I mean on the Eaſt-ſide of Tygris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plin. l. 6. c. 26. Plinie placeth the Schenitæ upon Euphrates, where the ſame beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Deſart, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Deſart of Palmirena: for theſe people of Canneh (afterward Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, ſtretching themſelves, from their own City of Canneth in Shinar Weſtward along the banks of Euphrates, as farre as the City of Thapſacus, where Ptolomy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which alſo agreeth with the deſcription of the Schenitæ by Strabo, whoſe words are theſe: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam euntibus, iter eſt per Schenitas; The Merchants which travail from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore thoſe which take Canneh for Charran, do much miſtake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldæa (called by God) ſtandeth alſo in Meſopotamia; not upon Euphrates it ſelf, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are diſtinctly named with thoſe of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Aſſur and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is ſometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the ſame Charran of Meſopotamia: and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Meſopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word (Meſopotamia) importing, a country between rivers: for Meſos in Greek, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it ſelf, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforeſaid.) For Strabo in the deſcription of Arabia, giveth that tract of land from the borders of Cœloſyria, to the edge of Meſopotamia, to the Schenitæ, who alſo inhabited on both ſides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of theſe Arabians which inhabite Batanea, and the North part of the Deſarts, ſtretching themſelves toward the unhabited ſolitude of Palmirena, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Deſart. So as theſe of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But Saint Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witneſs Appian) and ſo Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Geneſis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, ſtanding in Triangle with Seleucia, and almoſt the next unto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the Weſt of Seleucia, and the other oppoſite unto it; where theſe rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joine. Therefore, which of theſe the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain ſeat thereof, that ſo many other cities did retain a part of the name in ſo many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that theſe additions of Thelbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the Eaſt and the Weſt, or the greater and the leſs Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to diſtinguiſh cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Gen. 11. 31.

Jud. 1. Now of the other city joyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ est in medio itinere contra Nineven, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineve) the eleventh day.

This city is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Acts 7.1. Yee Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seate of this city is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembred in many Scriptures, but, withal, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Crassus the Romane, who for his unsatiable greedinesse was called Curges avaritiæ; the Gulf of avirice. Whereof Lucan: Lucan. l. 1. 105.

Assyrias Latio maculavit sanguine Carras.
With Roman bloud th' Assyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this city Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of NIMROD: Gen. 10. 10. And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalne, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what cities and people were subject unto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or neer it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldæa, into which also Eden stretcheth it self. Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there Vers. 2. they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Esay in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. Vers. 7. But before I conclude where Eden it self lieth, it is necessary to describe those other Countries, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the sons of HAM were CUSH, &c. And the sons of CUSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the sons of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after; CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs with the chief of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Fælix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render Strabo l. 16. themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrey, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persicæ oræ initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi uniones gignantur: in altis vero, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining stones. Now, the difference between Sheba, the son of Raamah, and Seba the son of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Schin:)

but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countries and Habitations are divers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalm expounded Reges Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Shebæ & Sabæ.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and upon it past up the Countrey, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Channeh, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldæan Paraphrast; which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R.) which change the Hebrewes also often use.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba & Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were utterly dis-joyned.

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabsache, the while the Army of Assyria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Gosan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Assyrians: though by them (in a sort) mastered and recovered. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed as Gosan, and Haran, Reseph, & the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Esar-Haddon held Assyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabsache which lay before Jerusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed; the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Assyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slaine by his own sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Esar-Haddon succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadours sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, aswell proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the suspition of warre encreasing between Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were imployed to beare off the incursions of the Assyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Junius, signifying as much as a bulwork against the Assyrians. This place Hierosolymitanus takes for Resem, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Thilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke: it is seated in an Iland of Euphrates upon a steep and unassaultable Rocke, in so much as tht Emperour Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adjoyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolomy calleth Teridata, having Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand; and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand; not far from whence is also found the City of Mann-canne) upon Tygris; and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezechiel have sorted them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldæans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen transierunt (saith NIGER,) Assyria and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated seated, as, by Charran or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Cannch and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem IEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente; The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Jusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Mesopotamiæ; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

§. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which Epistles in the yeare 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, & Andræas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may have some farther light for the proofe of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldæa. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Mosal or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher up Tigris, in these words, Juxta autem Tigrim, Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sanè, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwelt there (the Seat of whose Patriach it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mosal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated upon Tigris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur, in these words: Ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum Civitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Nineves; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Isle of Eden, which lieth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelve miles from Mosal, & that ancient City, which Ptolomy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philostratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosula, and John Lean, Mosal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mosal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tigris, neere Mosal: so that we are like to finde this Isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andræas Masius, which placeth it above Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-cepha, which is upon the same River of Tigris, Vt supra.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speak not of any Isle in Tigris, called the Isle of Eden, but of an Isle in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more unprobable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we have a testimonie from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdoms of the world have beene, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the floud called Shiver, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria and Armenia, which imbraceth both the bankes of Tigris betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Æthicus maketh mention, (not that latter Æthicus, Disciple of Gallinicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenæus called Istri, who liveth in Egypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus; but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Aethicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phœnicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Æthicus. For Æthicus makes it a Countrey, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the land of Chus Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, an Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions; (saith Aethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which River he called Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates have their originall: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertilitie thereof in divers places, is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANUS de urbibus, mentioneth the Citie of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amos time, though he speak not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Cœlosyria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once joyned together; and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise were divided: whose courses being knowne, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventie and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: and all men understand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatablus.) And because that which I have said of the Ille of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of selfe-invention, I have here-under set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIUS (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Maries time they had fifteen Churches in one Citie called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tygris; having no sufficient authoritie to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without foure or three Metropolitane Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such an Election as themselves had made: having three hundred yeare before that upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himselfe, had forborn to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell voide) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held; the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle; Verùm nos non acceptavimus, neq; proclamavimus ipsum; sed subitò convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis quæ sunt circum Civitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineves, ex Babyloniâ, ex Charrâ, ex Arbellâ, ex Insulâ quæ est in medio Tygris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persiæ, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Nineve, & out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tygris:

gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Isle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they use these words: Neq; super sunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci, Episcopi, Episcopus Arbelæ, Episcopus Salmasti, Episcopus Adurbeigan; en è vestigio convenimus in Insulam, quæ est, intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, fecimusq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmastus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed betweene our selves, &c.

Now this Island of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians Jacobites, Maronitæ, and Cophtie he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuariò in illam quam modò dixi Tygris Insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem ferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & à paucis aliis quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosal, containing very neer ten miles in compasse, and every where invironed with a wall, inhabited by few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tygris: sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the City of Hosan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictum Tygris, Insulam rupi asperæ impositam; Above the aforesaid Island of Tygris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Riviere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l' Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liveth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petræa, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one streame.

BUt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plurall; which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad regandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became foure heads. The Tygurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleaſure: and ſo the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region moſt delightful and fertile; and ſo alſo the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it ſelf.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is uſual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that ſeedeth Seede, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Gen. 1. 11. Here the Hebrew uſeth the Singular for the Plural, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; 3. 2. and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in ſtead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themſelves from the preſence of God; In medio ligni Paradiſi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Geneſis ſay, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and he giveth an inſtance in this queſtion it ſelfe, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden. 8.

And this anſwer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reaſon, be given to the objection, That Moſes ſpeaketh but of one River, from which the heads ſhould divide themſelves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reaſon, we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable paſſages into famous Countries. And ſo we may take the word (River) Verſe the tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River, (after he is paſt the place, where we ſuppoſe Paradiſe to have beene,) divides it ſelfe, and ere long yeeldeth foure notable paſſages into ſeverall Countries, though not all the way down ſtreame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Aſſyria) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text ſpeaking of Hiddekel, as it riſeth from the River of Eden, doth not ſay it compaſſeth or waſheth the whole Region of Aſſyria, (as it had uſed this phraſe of Piſon and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Aſſyria. The firſt branch Piſon, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Baſilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Apamia; whence ariſeth the name of Paſi-tygris, as it were Piſo-tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Suſiana. The ſecond branch Gehon, is that which in Hiſtorians is Nabarſares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names ſignifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) alſo Acracanus, quaſi Ranoſus, by reaſon of the froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the firſt ſeate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldæa and Arabia, and it is loſt at length in the Lakes of Chaldæa. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper ſtream of Piſon, or Baſilius which runneth into Hiddekel, properly ſo called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it ſheweth a paſſage up Tygris into Aſſyria: where, becauſe at length it is called Hiddekel or Tygris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, ſo called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, ſeeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradiſe was not farre from theſe Rivers: for that Perath in Moſes is Euphrates, there can be no queſtion; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtward towards Aſſur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Aſſyria propriè dicta, whoſe chiefe City was Nineve, as in Geneſis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Aſſur, and builded Nineve, which was the chief City of Aſſyria.

And as for the kind of ſpeech here uſed in the Text, ſpeaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be underſtood, to be ſpoken of the beginning of their diviſion from the firſt ſtream. Caput aquæ (ſaith ULPIANUS) illud eſt, unde aqua noſcitur, ſi ex fonte naſcatur, fons; ſi ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be ſeparate and divided, then where that branch doth firſt bound it ſelf with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forſaketh the main ſtream, called the head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which, if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection.

Herod. Clia. 1. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self; for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Nineve, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tygrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat. Hæc regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cereris autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheat and Barley being almost foure fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbeare to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which never were in the Country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Country Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-tree, so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellency, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fift commodity, not inferiour to any of those foure, which is, that from this self-same Tree there is drawn a kinde of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships. And that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the eremite, confesseth, saying: That he received a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himself, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeelded no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem palmæ sua sponte nascentes; There are of palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus à parte læva Arabiæ (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris interest inter Tygrim & Euphratem, jacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travail on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champain Country placed between Tygris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are said to drive their Cattel from pasture, least they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonii secant; The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countries generally are more fruitful to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may judg the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees alwaies greene: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Suns neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetuall activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their Corn fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make our kinde of Wheate beare seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds

(saith Pliny) who addeth this singularitie to that soyle, That the second yeare the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the seedes again) yeeldeth them a harvest of corne without any further labour: his words are these, Ubertatis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges. Plin. Nat. hist. l.18.c.17.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the land of Havilah.

After the discoverie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tygris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris, or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which river or rivers Moses witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two rivers as far distant as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, reason, and Experience bearing witnesse. There is no errour, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probabilitie, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weake babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tygris tooke name from Havilah the son of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the son of Joctan; the one remembred by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sons after the Flood. For the sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the sons of Joctan were Ophir, and Havilah &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the sonnes of Joctan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous river of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which river is said by Moses to water the land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure rivers named by Moses must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous river after Tygris and Euphrates) they chose out this river to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another river, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the river Indus on this side India, for beauty, for neerenesse, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the four heads, seeing Indus commeth between it and Tygris? and between Tygris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tygris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse than fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoever readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no river in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transpotted himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe; and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it and as great as it, having beſides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suaſtus, Aceſines, Adris (otherwiſe) Hirotis, Hiſpalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are ſwallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one ſtream, it croſſeth athward Aſia, and then at Cambaia viſiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15. But becauſe Piſon, which compaſſeth Havilah, as alſo Gehon, which watereth Cuſh, muſt ſome-where be joyned with the reſt in one body, or at leaſt be found to proceed out of the ſame Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceed; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riſeth in the uttermoſt of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the River Ganges riſeth out of the mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucaſus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neer Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the ſame Armenia, by the Gorgiæan mountains; ſo as Ganges, who only travaileth in her own India, and Nilus through Æthiopia and Egypt, never ſaw the land of Eden, or joyned themſelves in one channell, either with themſelves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be ſeparated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moſes, Gen. 2. v. 12. Therefore the River Piſon, which inricheth Havilah, is the ſame which by joyning it ſelf with Tygris, was therefore called Piſi-Tygris, or Piſo-Tygris, of Piſon and Tygris, which River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the ſonne of Cuſh gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, ſo called of Havilah the ſonne of Joctan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the Eaſt. And this Havilah of the Cuſhites had alſo Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx ſtone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bigneſſe of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine Gum ſweet to ſmell to, but bitter in taſte, called alſo Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Load-ſtone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew ſignifieth pearl: ſo doth Eugubinus; and Hierom calls it Oleaſter: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Havilah or Suſiana hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Suſiana or Havilah ſtretcheth it ſelf towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Perſian Gulfe, on the Eaſt ſide thereof: from which Eaſt ſide had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezechiel) their great plenty of gold; which Strabo alſo witneſſeth, as was ſhewed before.

Strab. Hopk. de Par. The Greeks had a conceit, that Piſon was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (ſaith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranſlateth Piſon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the ſame impoſſibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont and all Aſia the leſſe between it and Tygris. Now Piſon, which runneth through Havilah or Suſiana, doth to this day retain ſome ſigne of this name; for where it and Tygris embraceth each other under the City of Apamia, there doe they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piſo-tygris. And it is ſtrange unto me, that from ſo great antiquitie there ſhould be found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon it ſelf, which dwelleth ſo neer theſe Rivers, is by ſome writers known by the name of Bandar, as, by Poſtellus: by Caſtaldus, of Balduch: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Boughedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all thoſe that have lately ſeene it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Piſon, Ptolomie indeed with many others give the name of Baſilius or Regius, and Gehon they term Mahar-ſares, and Marſias, and Baarſares. So is Euphrates, neer the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Junius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profuſion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it bre aketh through the mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath, (ſaith Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Joſephus, Phorah; Euſebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giſtilanus and Colinutius term it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 24

The ſame confuſion of names hath Tygris, as Diglito, and Diglath, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer upon Geneſis conceiveth rightly of theſe Rivers: for Euphrates and Tygris (ſaith he) ſtream into foure branches; two of which keep their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason why these two Rivers joyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names and are called Pisi-tigris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguished is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the lakes of Chaldæa, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not entirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris, accompanied with Pison, doth.

This errour that Pison was Ganges, was first broched by Josephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds) and other men (who take his authority to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For, Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India to finde out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa to compasse Æthiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoyning to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Æthiopia) fastned to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon men the transportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first sate down with his sonnes Shelah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the sonnes of Joctan, Ophir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the sons of Cush in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah, or Chavilah, was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Havilah unto the Desarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possess all the interjacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldæan Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red Sea. But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red Sea, to Havilah in the East India, for Saul was no such Travailer or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which Countrey Saul wasted: for Amalek and the Amalekites possest that neck of Countrey, between the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extream of the one, towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the East part, or backside of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petræa and Deserta.

§. XIIII.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Æthiopia for Cush, 2 CHRON. 21. 16.

NOw, as Havilah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopians are, as much as black or burnt faces, whose proper Country called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Æthiopians, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Æthiopians are very neer, or else directly under the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that Land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Æthiopia.

See more of this point, c. 7. Sect. 10.

Now if it be granted, that Chush and the land of the Chusites be that tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit ISMAEL ab Havilah usq; Sur, quæ respicit Ægyptum Gen. 25. 18.

Egyptum introcuntibus Assyrios, Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Countrey bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Egypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharantha, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Judah. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having so mighty a King as the King of Egypt, between Palæstina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victory took some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the scripture disproving it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt between Kadesh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the story of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou commest to Gerar: for Sydon was the Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth with an honest excuse salve his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Josephus did altogether mis-understand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Plinie in his fift Book and eight Chapter, citeth Homer for an Author of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empyre of the Abyssines under Prestor John; And the West Æthiopia is that which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Dararites, with divers other names, which Plinie numbreth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Juba; which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Prestor John, and the Troglodites) lye due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Josephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Moses when he served Pharao, in the Warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibis aquam Gehon? To this saith Pererius, profectò hebraicè ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat nigrum & turbidum: Truely (saith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth black and troubled water.

C.2.v.18.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerrble argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopissam, as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia

Ex.2.21.& 3.1. Num.12.1.

Arabia Petræa, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that MOSES fled from PHARAO into the Land of Midian, and sate down by a Well, &c. and again in the third of Exodus; When MOSES kept the sheep of JETHRO, his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed these four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Joseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginall note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth; and these were all Arabians: & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their Camels were loaden with Spicery, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia fœlix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is served with Myrrhe and Frankinsence; and their spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulf, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Potiphar bought Joseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldæan Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the sixt of Judges, That when Israel had sown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came upon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desart; so as where before in the buying of Joseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eight Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired that every man would give him the golden ear-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zeba and Zolmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shekles of gold, it is written: For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites come the Mahometon Arabians, though some Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenitæ. And these Ismaelites, which inhabite chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Josephus) use poyson upon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Verſ. 15. Verſ. 1. Gen. 37. 25. Verſ. 10. Verſ. 3. Cap. 7. C. 8. v. 24. Gen. 16. 12.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparent in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against JEHORAM the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierome reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now how far it is off between the Philistines and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mixe and joyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirtie degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desart of Sur and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistins, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Country which joyneth to Arabia.

2 Chro. 21. 16. * Steuch. Eugub. in Gen. c. 2.

Now, may we think, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the daughter of Pharao) a River of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had derided them: for they had lived there all daies of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof, except we shall believe the paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Isay, and once in the Prophet Jeremie, and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Æthiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlosyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalites, and others their adherents. And thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast (as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerusalem it self was withheld from Israel (from the daies of Moses, even unto the time of David) by the Jebusites.

Exod. 2.

Plin. l. 5. c. 1. c. 23. c. 3. c. 2. v. 18.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt: Beroaldus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I finde none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart,

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus; so where to find them else-where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more than twentie English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Floud, Chus and his Children never rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his sons, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tygris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Susiana:) Raamah, and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia fœlix. NIMROD seated himself in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldæa, and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now because there could be no such River found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Æthiopia; and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in processe of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them: in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land

which the Chuſites ſhould, or might in future time conquer people, and inhabit, ſeeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have beene Maſters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For, though the Babylonian Empire which tooke beginning in Nimrod the ſonne of Chus, conſiſted at the firſt but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne; yet we finde, that his Succeſſours within a few yeares after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel conſumed the memorie of Chuſea. For of this Tower of Confuſion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatneſſe of that Empire, founded by Nimrod a younger ſon, obſcured the name and nation of his father Cuſh in thoſe parts untill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chuſites retained their names, which alſo they faſtned to the Soile and Territorie by themſelves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haſte creepe through thoſe deſart Regions, which the length of 130. yeares after the Floud had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Buſh and Bryar, Reede and Tree to joyne themſelves (as it were) into one maine body and Forreſt. For if we look with judgement and reaſon into the Worlds plantation, we ſhall finde, that every Family ſeated themſelves as neare together as poſſibly they could; and though neceſſitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to ſpread themſelves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times reſort and ſuccour one another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impaſſable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and ſtrength uſurped dominion over the reſt, ſate down in the very confluence of all thoſe Rivers, which watered Paradiſe: for thither it was to which the greateſt troups of Noah's children repaired; and from the ſame place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increaſe. The firſt Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The ſecond Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his diſperſion.

Now as Nimrod the youngeſt, yet ſtrongeſt, made his choice of Babel (as aforeſaid) which both Tygris and Euphrates cleanſed and enriched; ſo did Havilah place himſelfe upon Piſo-Tygris, Raamah and his ſon Sheba farther downe upon the ſame River, on the Sea coaſt of Arabia: Chus himſelf upon Gehon, the faireſt branch of Euphrates. And when they began to ſpread themſelves farther off, yet they alwaies faſtened themſelves to the Rivers ſides: for Ninive, Charran, Reſeph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldæa, and the other firſt-peopled Cities, were all founded upon theſe navigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give ſuccour and aſſiſtance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A concluſion by way of repetition of ſomething ſpoken of before.

BUt now to conclude this diſpute, it appeareth to me by the teſtimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradiſe was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, ſeated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluviorum, or Meſopotamia, which taketh into it alſo a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region ſtanding in the moſt excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35 degrees from the Æquinoctial, and 55 from the North-pole: in which climate the moſt excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all ſorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this ſaid ſoile and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein ſoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can moſt vaunt that they have excelled, yet ſhall this Plant be the greateſt wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatſoever his life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may be ſaid, that theſe Trees are found both in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, which Countries are alſo bleſſed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by thoſe pleaſures and benefits the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diſeaſes, the multitude of venimous Beaſts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no compariſon between one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradiſe had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) curſed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may ſafely think, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Univerſal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradiſe, and garden of ſo great a Lord.

The ſum of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have been dim-ſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our known World: ſome, above the middle region of the ayre: ſome, elevated neer the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like Caſtles in the aire, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtward, in reſpect of Judæa, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A river went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it ſelfe into foure branches; and we finde that both Tygris and Euphrates ſwimming through Eden, do joyne in one, and afterward taking waies apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moſes, the true ſeats of Chus and his Sons being then in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Piſon was Ganges, the Scripture, reaſon, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the ſame diſtance maketh the ſame impoſſibility; and this river is a greater ſtranger to Tygris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thouſand miles, yet they both riſe in the ſame quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almoſt as far off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates diſtilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Perſia: the one riſeth in the South, and travaileth North: the other riſeth in the North, and runneth South, threeſcore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I have added a Chorographical deſcription of this terreſtrial Paradiſe, that the reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Diſcourſe; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receive an allowance ſuſpended, until ſuch time as this deſcription of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradiſe.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a material tree; and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubject to death.

FOr eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradiſe, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the baniſhment of temporal life, ſaith Beda.

That theſe Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Goſpel) it is not doubted by the moſt religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are ſo volatile, as nothing can fix them, and ſo ſlippery, as nothing can faſten them, have in this alſo delivered to the World an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (ſay the Hebrews) hath a plural conſtruction, and is to be underſtood, Lignum vitarum, The tree of lives, becauſe the fruit thereof had a property, to preſerve both the growing, ſenſitive, and rational life of man; and not onely (but for Adam's tranſgreſſion) had prolonged his own daies, but alſo given a dureful continuance to all poſterity; and that, ſo long, as a body compounded of Elements could laſt.

Man notwithſtanding) ſhould have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of moſt Divines) he ſhould have been tranſlated, as Enoch was. And as before the Floud, the daies of men had the long meaſure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and ſoon after the floud, of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred: ſo if Adam had not diſobeyed Gods firſt and eaſie Commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longeſt times of the firſt age, as many learned men have conceived. Chryſoſtome, Rupertus Toſtatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adams fall and tranſgreſſion) Adam and his Poſterity had been immortal. But ſuch is the infinite Wiſdom of God, as he foreſaw that the earth could not have contained Mankind; or elſe, that millions of ſouls muſt have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the firſt number, wherewith the Earth was repleniſhed, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chryſoſtome muſt be underſtood of immortality of bodies, which ſhould have been tranſlated and glorified.

But of what kinde or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which reſpect many have conceived, that the ſame was not material, but a meer Allegorie, taking their ſtrength out of Solomon, where Wiſdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where alſo Chriſt is called the Tree of Life; and out of the Apocalypſis, I will give to him that overcommeth, to eat of the Tree of Life which is in the Paradiſe of God. But to this place Saint Auguſtine's anſwer may ſuffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terreſtrial Paradiſe, ſo there was a cœleſtial. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Teſtament, yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer fooliſhneſs. And ſo in this place the ſenſe of the Scripture is manifeſt. For God brought out of the earth every Tree faire to the ſight, and ſweet to taſte; the Tree alſo of Life in the midſt of the Garden: which ſheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by God's commandment produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was alſo to be eaten. The report of this Tree was alſo brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigeſted matter or Chaos, Heſiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others, ſteale the invention of the created World; ſo from the Garden of Paradiſe they took the Plat-form of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Heſperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambroſia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, ſignifieth making young, and Ambroſia, immortality; and therefore ſaid to be the meat and drinke of the gods. Apocal. 2. 7.

§. II.

Of BECANUS his opinion, that the Tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOw for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, ſome men have preſumed farther, eſpecially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himſelfe the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever gueſs at, whereat Goropius much marvailed. But as he had an inventive brain, ſo there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himſelf. Surely, howſoever his opinion may be valued, yet he uſurpeth the praiſe due to others, at leaſt if the invention be at that price at which he ſetteth it. For Moſes Bar-Cephas faſtened on this conjecture above ſix hundred yeers before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himſelfe referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgenſis, and others, whoſe very words Goropius uſeth, both concerning the Tree, and the reaſons wherewith he would induce other men to that beliefe. For Moſes Bar-Cephas in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe (the firſt Part and fol. 48.) ſaith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-Tree; of which the greateſt plenty (ſaith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Aceſines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies, in or neer the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigneſs of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) ſomewhat bigger; and that it is a tree, ſe ſemper ſerens; alwaies planting it ſelf; that it ſpreadeth it ſelf ſo far abroad, as that a troupe of horſemen may hide themſelves under it. Strabo ſaith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no leſs than a ſhield. Plin. l. 12. c. 3. Lib. 15. cap. 2.

Ariſtobulus

Aristobulus affirmeth, that fifty Horsemen may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onesicritus raiseth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bignes, which also Plinie and Onesicritus confirm: to the trunk of which, these Authors give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the River Acesines. But many parts of the world have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some les, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy juyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top boughs, and from his own proper roote, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young Trees there fall again the like cords, which in one year and les (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also trees of the bigness of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kinde of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can do. Now, one of these Trees considered with all his young ones, may (indeed) shrowd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsmen, if they please; for they cover whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, shooting alway downward to find root under water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breed, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cords out of the Sea, I have seen five hundred Oysters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, That Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never finde, and yet I have travailed a dozen miles together under them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith he) was good for meat and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of knowledge of good and evil is described to be.

Secondly, This Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authours report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunke or stem, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plurall number (that is) in the middest of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being possest with shame, did not run up and downe the Garden to seeke out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaves of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse; which Plinie avoweth in these words; Latitudo foliorum peltæ effigiem Amazoniæ habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis PENTHESILAEA furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILAEA leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that reade him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis de ficu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum MOISIS narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to avow, that any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly anſwer, or agree therewith? But for my ſelf, becauſe I neither finde this Tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſs of leaves, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo. That the Earth never brought forth any of theſe trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his owne belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde; onely thereby, and by the eaſie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbeare to feed thereon, it pleaſed God to make trial of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quàm ad commendandum puræ ac ſimplicis Obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other reſpect, than thereby to commend the goodneſs of pure and ſimple Obedience. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

we

§. III.

Of BECANUS his not unwitty allegorizing of the ſtory of his Ficus Indica.

BUt in this I muſt do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his ſuppoſition of the Tree it ſelf to be true. The effects whereof, becauſe his diſcourſes are exceeding ample, I have gathered in theſe few words. As this Tree (ſaith he) ſo did Man grow ſtraight and upright towards God, until ſuch time as he had tranſgreſſed and broken the Commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this tree, he began to bend downward, and ſtooped toward the earth, which all the reſt of Adam's poſterity after him have done, rooting themſelves therein, and faſtning themſelves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiouſneſs of this tree, he compareth to the dark and ſhadowed life of man, through which the Sun of juſtice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the ſhadow of death, till it pleaſed Chriſt to climbe the tree of the Croſs for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to finde among ſo many large leaves, may be compared (ſaith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived knowledge among ſo large vanities, which obſcure and ſhadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding ſweet, and delicate to the taſte and palate: ſo are the delights and pleaſures of the world moſt pleaſing, while they dure. But as all thoſe things which are moſt mellifluous, are ſooneſt changed into choler and bitterneſs: ſo are our vanities and pleaſures converted into the biterreſt ſorrows and repentances. That the leaves are ſo exceeding large, the fruit (for ſuch leaves) exceeding little, in this, by compariſon we behold (ſaith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their ſollicitude, their outward ſhews, and publike oſtentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we ſeek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bigneſs of the ſmalleſt peaze; glory, to all the world apparent; goodneſs, to all the world inviſible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by ſo much exceed all other Plants, as the greateſt men of power and worldly abilitie ſurpaſs the meaneſt: ſo is the little fruit of ſuch men, and ſuch trees, rather fitting and becomming the unworthieſt Shrub, and humbleſt Bryar, or the pooreſt and baſeſt Man, than ſuch a flouriſhing ſtatelineſs, and magnitude. Laſtly, whereas Adam, after he had diſobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedneſs and ſhame, ſought for leaves to cover himſelf withal: this may ſerve to put us in minde of his and our ſins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorne our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we uſe ſo many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

§. IV.

Of the names of the tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with ſome other notes touching the ſtory of ADAM'S ſin.

NOw, as touching the ſenſe of this tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it ſelfe, Moſes Bar-Cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (tranſlated by Moſius) giveth this judgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no ſuch virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had beene ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth: Arbor scientiæ boni & mali (id est) experientiæ boni & mali ab eventu. The Tree of knowledge of good and evill (that is) the experience of good and evill by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men living have growne up; and having received immortalitie from the breath or spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandement was the fearefullest evill, and the observation of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sicknes is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witnes: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his own guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods judgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evill, which could not be expreſt. He then saw himselfe naked both in Body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sitnath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heape of Stones called the heape of witnesse, between Jacob and Laban; not that the stones bare witnesse, but for a memorie of the covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desart, Viventis, & videntis.

Num. 20. 13. Gen. 26. 20, 21. Cap. 31. 48. Cap 28. 19. Cap. 16. 14.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing perswasions, unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for ever.

Ben. Jon. 2. l. 2. But what meanes did the Divell find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to work this michiefe by? even the unquiet vanity of the woman; so as by Adams hearkning to the voice of his wife, contrarie to the expres commandement of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voyce of thy wife &c. (said God himselfe) Cursed it the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. Gen. 3. 17. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted? even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts, into whom the Divell entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting her knowledge; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yeild to her perswasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namly, an unwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the son of David, Gods chosen servant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisedome, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the perswasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietnesse.

§. I.

Of the cauſe and the revenge of CAINS ſinne: and of his going out from God.

THe ſame Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward poſſeſt Adam, Cain alſo inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) ſlew him, making himſelfe the firſt Manſlayer, and his Brother the firſt Martyr: the revenge of which unnaturall Murther, although it pleaſed God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his puniſhment was greater than he could beare. For the ſame offence chiefely (wherwith the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he deſtroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth alſo was corrupt before God: of which Gen.6.v.11,13. in the ſame place Moſes giveth a reaſon; for ſaith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himſelfe made the cauſe knowne unto Noah, ſaying; An end of all fleſh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will deſtroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in takeing away the lives of men onely, but in all ſorts of Injuſtice and Oppreſſion. After this Murther of ABEL, CAIN went out from the preſence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the Eaſt-ſide of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the preſence of the Lord, is not to be underſtood after the literall ſenſe, God being wholly in all parts of the World,: Totus in cœlo eſt, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, ſed utrumq; ſimul; God (ſaith S. AUGUSTINE) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by enterchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witneſſeth: If I be in Heaven (ſaith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there alſo. But what is meant thereby? Exiit à facie Dei (ſaith CHRYSOSTOME) CAIN went out from the preſence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, diſfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of CAINS dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others underſtand to ſignifie wandring or uncertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, ſaith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwiſe, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and ſo doth Joſephus. But it ſeemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing elſe, and that his thoughts and conſcience had no quiet or reſt, in regard of the Murther committed, juſtly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And whoſoever findeth me (ſaith CAIN) ſhall ſlay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherin Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling ſignifieth an abiding: and we call thoſe people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifeſt, Moſes teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the Eaſt-ſide of Eden. Secondly it is ſaid by Moſes, that after Cain departed from the preſence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his firſt-born, Enoch; which ſheweth that he feared to wander, and rather ſought to fortifie himſelf againſt revenge. Cyrillus ſaith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Chriſt, and of the Jewes; and that as Cain after that he had ſlain Abel unjuſtly, had thence-forth no certain abiding in the World: ſo the Jews after they had crucified the Son of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jews had never ſince any certain Eſtate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne upon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deſerta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Deſart is not Eaſtward, or on the Eaſt part of Eden, neither are theſe Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all theſe, in what part of the World ſoever, which in old time lived by Paſtorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi, as the Northerne Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britans, and the Northern Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolomy Calena, which also might be derived of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence hee was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubins: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, than till hee built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he inclosed, either for his owne defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain useth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travaileth in fear of revengement: For whosoever findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

Verse 23. 24.

And becaus these Henochians, so called of the City of Henoch, were the first society & civill assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his Sons: so that after the Floud (as there were of all sorts of natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self where Henoch stood before the Floud, and whereof the Monuments might remain (as the pillars or the foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, & Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, & Bactria; of the same name many mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to finde out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoice, and therewith satisfie our selves, if of so great & almost worn-out antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & nations, there remain any print or footsteps to posterity.

Quocirca aliquid in hac magna urbe mutatur, novæ urbium fundamenta jaciuntur, nova Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus priscis) oriuntur. Seneca ad Albinum.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we finde those Henochei described, though diversly written; as in Pliny, sometimes Heniochi, in Mela, Eniochi, in Flaccus, Heniochi: In Lucan, Eniochi, all which inhabite upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise as sometime he useth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward, or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh, he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Henoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherin it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Floud: so it is probable that these Henochis of Colchis, and other parts adjoyning, were not the first of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: becaus, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomy, Zani; beyond wch an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; & beyond these he again discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountains of Paro-panisus; between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

And although we cannot be assured that these Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Annius the Frier, who sets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden being directly west.

And besides these severall Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprise of Jason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Jason with other Greeks ranged the coasts of Asia the less in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poeticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and less use of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

BUt of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Henoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice: Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Henoch) to performe such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which wasted by the least account, 1656. years, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens lives so long a measure as 800. & 900. years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soever: for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his issues Moses had the least care. And, as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required to be understood: which advice, seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or à fine dierum (that is) in process of time, it came to passe that CAIN brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years fore-gone, and when his people were increased, hee built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Solomon, that hee built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he imployed in that Work 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: & he built, when he comanded such a building. And therefore seeing that we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, birth, or death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvailed at, why hee also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for

Gen. 4. 17. of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare
HENOCH, and he built a City, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his Sonne
18. HENOCH. And to HENOCH was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHUJAEL, and MEHUJAEL begat METHUSAEL, and METHUSAEL LAMECH.

C. 5. v. 5. Now of Seth, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat ENOCH, and SETH lived after he begat ENOCH 807. yeares, and begat sonnes and daughters: so as all the daies of SETH were 912. yeares, and he dyed: as for the years and times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God establisht; from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therfore this way and work Moses walked in, and finisht it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josephus giveth unto Lamech threescore and seventeen Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wives Ada and Sylla: and to these three sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, & brought Gen. 4. 20, 21, 22 them into Heards and Droves: Tubal invented musick, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecie, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Chilren.

A Second Scruple hath been made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seventy yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threescore and five yeares, whereas Jared begat not any of his untill he was 162. years old: Methusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusalem, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threescore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Floud precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-born of Methusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and surviving, & which by God were reserved to bee the Fathers of mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threescore and ten years, who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other sons of Methusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah, as aforesaid. Of this

Saint

Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth S. Matthew recite the Geneology of Christ, not by the eldest sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the Elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger son of Jessai; and lastly, we finde, that the Kingdome it self of Juda was not given to the Heir in nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Solomon. Mat. 1. 2. 1 Kings 2.

§ V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

THe third Objection is, that the great difference of years between those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well neer seen a thousand years, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing that soon after the Floud, men lived not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages, and to this day, not the tenth.

They that have hereon resolved that those years were but Lunary years, (to wit) of a moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeare of his life an hundred and five, if those yeares be taken but for moneths, then had Seth lived but eight years and one moneth when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have been but six years and forty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kinde, as were the trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at six, seven, or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the World, and length of daies, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the lunary years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourscore and ten and odd years, which were not only lesse by far than the Patriarchs lived after the Floud, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourscore, and some a hundred years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former account were of Lunary years) makes but seventeen and an half of our years. Sol. Pol. hist. c. 3 Macrob. Satur. lib. 1. cap. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt, which yeelded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmfull quality, as since that time the curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and mankinde: Neither had the waters of the Floud infused such an impurity, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmfull change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weaknesse, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so time it self (under the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that lively vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and cleansed matter, shall wax old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Vertue from the superiour. Psal. 102. v. 26

But besides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and simplicity of of living differ from that old time? the tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nouriſhed with the Milk of a ſtrange Dugge; an unnatural curioſity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to finde out Nurſes, which neceſſity onely ought to commend unto them: The haſty Marriages in tender years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her ſelf hath not yet any root ſufficient to maintain her own top; and ſuch half-ripe ſeeds (for the moſt part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their Infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxurioufneſs of this gluttonous age, wherein we preſs Nature with over-weighty burdens, and finding her ſtrength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of ſtrong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath theſe elegant Verſes:

Pharſal. 4.

------O Prodiga rerum	Diſcite quàm parvo liceat producere vitam:
Luxories nunquam parvo contenta paratu:	Et quantum Natura petat.
Et quæſitorum terra pelagoq; ciborum	Non auro myrrhâq; bibunt: ſed gurgite puro
Ambitioſa fames, & lautæ gloria menſæ,	Vita redit: ſatis eſt populis fluviuſq; Cereſque.

O waſtful Riot never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and ſent:
Vain glory of a Table ſumptuous,
Learn with how little life may be preſerved.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouſe,
But with the Brook the peoples thirſt is ſerved:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not ſterved.

Pier. Hierog. l. 2. The Egyptians affirm, that the longeſt time of man's life is a hundred years, becauſe the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to ſtrength fifty years, and afterwards by the ſame degree decayeth and withered. Epigenes findeth in his Philoſophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Beroſus to a hundred and ſeventeen years. Theſe opinions Plinie repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the laſt taxation, number and review of the eighth region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (ſaith Plinie) foure and fifty perſons of an hundred years of age: ſeven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and five and twenty: foure, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or a hundred and ſeven and thirty years old: and laſt of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this ſearch was made in the times of Veſpatian the Father and the Son.

Plin. l. 7. c. 29.

The ſimple dyet and temperate life of the Eſſæans gave them long account of many years: ſo did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Perſians Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Neſtor lived three Ages, and Tireſias ſix, Sybilla three hundred years, Endymion of the leſs Aſia, little leſs: Alſo Maſaniſſa of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (ſaith Ephorus.) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that ſome of them lived full two hundred years; and ſo doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: and that theſe reports are not fabulous, Joſephus bringeth many witneſſes with himſelf; as Marethon, Beroſus, Mochus, Eſtius, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecataus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Hiſtorian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian preſented to Solyman, General of the Turks Army, who had outlived three hundred years. I my ſelf knew the old Counteſs of Deſmond of Inchiquin in Munſter, who lived in the year 1589. and many years ſince, who was married in Edward the Fourth's time, and held her Joynture from all the Earles of Deſmond ſince then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munſter can witneſs: Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Maffæus, and the like Authours, telleth of ſome that have not only far exceeded the term preſcribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered eſtate of decrepit age to freſh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in thoſe daies wherein Galen the Phyſician lived, it may eaſily prove unto us what Reeds we are in reſpect of thoſe Cedars of the firſt age. For Galen did ordinarily let bloud ſix pound weight, whereas we (for the moſt part) ſtop at ſix ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Conſtellations) which are the natural cauſes of a long and healthful life; (to wit) ſtrong Joſ. ant. l. 13. c. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

Parents,

Parents, a pure and thin ayre, and temperate use of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long upright; on ayre we feed alwaies and in every instant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the midway; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure ayre, and a temperate use of those things which nature wanteth, are the onely friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the Floud.

A Fourth scruple hath bin made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Floud.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder ages, we shall finde, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wise men to a posterity equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of Tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not onely upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Joshuah, and Joshuah to the Elders: for to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas; than to give holy things to Dogs, and to cast Pearls before Swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

Dion. Areop. Fol. 18.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittans, and of latter times by the Irish Chronicles called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation, or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less than five hundred years: and before Noah died, Abrahams was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

Cabala est scientia Theologia non revelata. P. M. 82. Miran. 110. fol.

But besides this tradition, it is questionless, that the use of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, S. Jude testifieth; and some part of his Books (which contained the course of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia fœlix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had seen, and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Origen. Hel. 28. in Num. & comment in Evang. Johan. Gelas. dist. 15. Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make mention of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apochryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembred out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius, that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these Books, is, that neither Philo nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of S. Augustine, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembred by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this Book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if letters and arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the undoubted word of God need of any other proof than self-authority.

Tert. de habit. mulierum. Heb. 11. 15.

§. VII.

Of the men of renown before the Floud.

NOw let us consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cains children: and of Adam by Seth ten; Seth being given by God in stead of Abel: and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to profess Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh, men began publiquely to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the sons of God, or the godly, distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the son of Seth, to the time of Henoch the son of Jared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written: That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: For God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah; Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others understand this place, (tulit eum Deus) scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the piety of Henoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, He was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expresly added, that he saw not death.

Gen. 5. 24. 6. 9.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the same kinde of changing, which S. Paul promiseth, when he saith, that, when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, 1 Cor. 15. 51. but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Henoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saving that Lamech propheſied of his son Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God. Gen. 5. 29. Gen. 6. 9.

But of the warre, peace, governement, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories if they had bin preserved, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits, had the experience added of 800 and 900 years) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisedom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of aftertimes, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to HIPPOCRATES: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præceps; (which is) Life is short, art is long, and time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of MOSES; These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgat altogether the piety of Seth, and the waies wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evill, and continually evill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universall, when the children and sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mis-led by their idolatrous wives, the daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world only. Aphor. 1. Gen. 6. 4. Verse 5.

That these sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namly, Lactantius, and Eusebius, mis-led by Josephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needlesse: the question being uncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostom and S. Augustine have answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in the Scriptures; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creatour, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnesse to imagine. Gen. 6. v. 4.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by MOSES so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also divers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall than the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayned his braines to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may find them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly,

That

That the Giants have in elder times not only cast up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hils, and making war with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this Scripture: That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus. That Giants were the sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the sons of God, and by the Earth the daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassam (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latine:

Nomine cœlestes illos dixêre Gigantes,
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & sanguine cœli.

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeving men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since; seeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlative straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppresse, than say, That they were called Giants only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himself calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renowne, (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not beene found among divers Nations after the generall floud, then might this place of Moses have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yeelded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I wil reserve to acompany the Giants of Albion, in the story of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerly and without all allegoricall construction avow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found
Gen. 14. 5. of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Josuah, and of David; namly, the Re-

Vers. 21. where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon he useth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: &, whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzæi or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer

Deut. 3. v. 11. written of Og, K. of Basan, that his bed of yron was 9 cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made reporte at their returne of the great stature of those of another Goliah, ſurnamed Getheus, becauſe he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the firſt was ſlain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great ſtature, and his fingers were by ſixes, even four and twenty. 1 Chron. 20. 7.

2 Sam. 21. v. 19 weighed six hundred shekles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliab

Alſo that Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after ſlue thirty of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Aſs: And laſtly, he took the gates of Azzah, and the two Poſts, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his ſhoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgement, that both Nature and the Heavens wax old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it ſelf) infeebled and almoſt worn out the virtue of all things, then, I ſay, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increaſed the curſe and corruption) brought forth her young ones more ſtrong and beautiful, than it did in after ages: ſo alſo thoſe Giants, thoſe mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and ſtrength of thoſe Giants, remembred by Moſes of his own time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinary proportion of all men in general, ſoon after the floud and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the firſt flouriſhing youth and newneſs of the world. Jud. 14. 6. 14. 19. 16. 3.

But the wickedneſs (eſpecially in cruelty and oppreſſion) of theſe men was ſuch, as God therefore by the floud gave end to all fleſh, but to the juſt Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which S. Auguſtine thus expoundeth; Neq; enim ſicut hominem, ita Deum facti ſui pœnitet, cujus eſt de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa ſententia, quam certa præſcientia. Sed ſi non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non ſe quodammodo familiarius inſinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult eſſe conſultum: ut & perterreat ſuperbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alat intelligentes; God (ſaith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men uſe to do): but if the Scripture did not uſe thoſe words or the like, it ſhould not (in a ſort) inſinuate it ſelf familiarly to all ſorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, ſtir up the negligent, exerciſe the ſearchers of the truth, and nouriſh thoſe that underſtand. Gen. 6. 6. De Civit. Dei. l. 15. c. 15.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly riſing, and hardly at length vaniſhing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching theſe ancient times, obſcurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§ I.

That in old corruptions we may finde ſome ſigns of more ancient truth.

HEre, before we proceed any further, the occaſion offereth it ſelf for us to conſider how the Greeks and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the ſtory of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a myſtical ſenſe, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have ſought to obſcure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive thoſe inter-mixt diſcourſes of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philoſophers, and not as any thing borrowed or ſtolne out of the Books of God. But as a skilful and learned Chymiſt can aſwel by ſeparation of viſible elements draw helpful medicines out of poyſon, as poyſon out of the moſt healthful hearbs and plants (all things having in themſelves both life and death): ſo, contrary to the purpoſes and hopes of the Heathen, may thoſe which ſeek after God and Truth, find out every-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philoſophers, the Story of the firſt Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively expreſt.

§. II.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient; as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BUt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Mankinde it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberal grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general floud could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, even among the few sons of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sons of Cham did possess the vices of the sons of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldæans began soon after the Floud to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians did not onely learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutuatos, eosque prius Aras, & Imagines, & Templa Diis sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herod. in Euterpe.

§. III.

That in process of time these lesser errours drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BUt as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travail towards their eternal perdition: so did these gross and blinde Idolaters every Age after other, descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortal men onely, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Paleness, Sickness, Sorrows, yea to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

Nat. Com. l.1. cap.7.

Bovem colis, ego Deis macto bovem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidi suavissimum.
Carnes suillas tu caves, at gaudeo
His maximè: canem colis, quem verbero
Edentem ubi deprehendo fortè obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beef, which you adore.
I broyle th' Egyptian Eeles, which you (as god) implore:
You fear to eat the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.
You worship Dogs; to beat them I think meet,
When they my store devoure.

And in this manner JUVENAL.

Porrum aut cæpe nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina!

The Egyptians think it sin to root up, or to bite
Their Leeks or Onyons, which they serve with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their own sowing
Have store of gods in every Garden growing!

§. IV.

§. IV.

That from the relicks of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

BUt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to finde out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metall remaining after the Floud; and partly from Mizraim the son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: for all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained, and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the Sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochii before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove ædificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochii were found after the Floud. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities (say Phornutus and Pausanias) and that to Jupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Floud, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soon after mankinde began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plaine termes, in his third Book of Lawes: for he saith that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Floud.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And besides this City of Henoch, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Maich, Iared, Tebe, Iesca, Selet, and Gebat: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Iubal, Tubal, and Tubalcain (inventors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noëma, or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venusta or beautifull, Voluptas or pleasure; as the Wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Jupiter; Eva, Rhea, and Nomea or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren the Sons of Saturne, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Evah: so was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Prophecies, that Christ should break the serpents head, and conquer the power of Hel, occasioned the fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hel, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroës (the inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars and Heavenly signes, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astræa: of which Ovid:

Gen. 4. 20, 21, 22

Lact. l. 4. c. 27.

Ovid. Met. l. 1.

Ultima cœlestum terras Astræa reliquit.
Astræa last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethnicks would understand Justice it selfe to have failed, Nat.com.l.2.c.2 as is is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person, yet as it is usuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Lust by Venus; so doe they also the persons of men by like Vertues and Vices: and therefore by justice and Astræa, Enoch; the justice and piety of Enoch being in the same manner expresst, as that of Noah
Gen.7. Gen.5.22,24. was by Moses: for Noah was said to be a just man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

From this Story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men upon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and again their war undertaken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nim-
L.de civit. Dei rod, as S. Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus describeth.

Tentavere (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captiviq; Jovis transferre Gigantes
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cœlo.
The Giants did advance their wicked hand
Against the Stars to thrust them headlong down;
And robbing Jove of his Imperiall Crown,
On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second Floud, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it self. Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who when he read the Book of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with bloud.

Joseph.l.1. contra Appian. We finde also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his Sonne and Successour Setho, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, where-Plut. in Isid. of there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Sethetica. We Strab.l.17. also finde in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquity preceding their own: and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same names to their own Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and the strange story of the third.

BUt of all those Armies of Jupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called because the one had reference to his celestial conditions (for æther is as much as shining or pure fire): the other discovered his naturall vertues, which daies and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the son of Cœlum or Heaven, for the same former respect, and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were deviſed, was of Crete (now Candie) the Son of Saturne and Ops. The name derived from the Latine is taken of juvans pater, from the Greek word Zeus, it ſignifieth life, but ſomewhat ſtrained. Boccas in his Genealogie of the Gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had ſuch a name before the ſame was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moiſt, temperate, modeſt, honeſt, adventurous, liberall, mercifull, loving, and faithfull (that is) giving theſe inclinations. And therefore thoſe ancient Kings beautified with theſe conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howſoever they were, or were not with thoſe vertues inriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldeſt times aſſumed thoſe Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world (howſoever deſerved) as the worthieſt, that ever were, acquired by their well deſervings. Joves omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui, The ancients called all Kings Jupiters, as Tzetzes in his varia hiſtoria confirmeth; Reges olim Joves vocârunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings Jupiters. But where this laſt and moſt remembred Jupiter was borne, it is uncertain. Some there are that make him of Crete: others that he was but ſent thither by his Mother Ops, or Opis, to be foſtered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: becauſe it was conditioned between Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titans permiſſion, he ſhould put to death all his male children, leſt the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their ſucceſſion; which agreement, becauſe Saturne performed in his firſt borne, it is feigned that Saturne devoured his own children. Hereof Lycophron thus turned into Latine: Nat. com. l. 1. c. 7

Haud ſit pinguior, | Saturne to be the fatter is not known,
Crudis ſepulchrum quòd ſit ipſe filiis. | By being the grave and buriall of his own.

This compoſition between Titan and Saturne, Sybilla alſo witneſſeth in theſe words;

Conceptis verbis, Titan jurare coëgit
Saturnum, de ſe natum ne nutriat ullum,
Qui poſſint regnare ſenis poſt fata Nepotes.
Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturne ſweare
No Son to nouriſh, which by reigning might Uſurp the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (firſt called Lyſanias) into Crete, as ſhe did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnoſſus, the chief City of that Iſland, by Creſta the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof. Euſeb. in Tim.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: Others make him of Meſſena. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and firſt foſtering. Some affirm that he was fed by Honey-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and ſkins into yellow; a reward wel fitting ſuch a God; other, that he was nouriſhed by Bears: others, by Goats: and of all theſe the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge that Saturne had broken his faith, he ſet on him, and took him and his wife priſoners, whom Jupiter again reſcued and delivered.

But laſtly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the leſs powerfull, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdoms in Greece to his ſonne. And although this Prince at the firſt purchaſed great honour, and for his many vertues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after he was once ſetled, and became potent, he gave himſelf over wholly to palliardize and adultery, without all reſpect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by ſuch as doe aſcribe the actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith ſatisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the ſinne of Sodom with Ganimedes and others: and did not only begin with inceſt, marrying his owne Siſter Juno, but he raviſhed, betrayed, ſtole away, and took by ſtrong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom theſe hereafter written were of greateſt fame; Niobe, Laodemia, and Alcmena, the Wife of Amphitrion, by whom he had Pelaſgus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountain Taygetus took name, with another Sonne called Saon, of whom Saonia by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Læda, Castor and Pollux, Hellen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus; by Jordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protogenia, he had Athlius the Father of Endymion: and by Iö (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. He raviſhed Aegina the daughter of Aesopus, and carried her into the Iſland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begate Aecus: by Torrhebia he had Archesilaus and Carbius: by Ora, Colaxes: he had alſo Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium or Troy. He begate the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis, Hiarbas. He had beſides theſe (if they belye not their chief God) Philcus and Pilumnus, inventers of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all theſe, who were borne in ages ſo farre differing. And of theſe his ſeverall raviſhments, betrayings, ſtealing away of mens wives, daughters, and ſons, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all thoſe ancient fables of his transformations into ſhowers of gold, eagles, bulls, birds, and beaſts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romanes fear to entitle this monſter, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his ſecond Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that he deſerved nothing leſſe; and in his Oration, pro domo ſua, reprocheth Clodius for his inceſt, by the name of Jupiter. His buriall was in Lus. in Sacrif. Crete (ſaith Lucian.) Cretenſes non ſolùm natum apud ſe, & ſepultum Jovem teſtantur, ſed etiam ſepulchrum ejus oſtendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely avow that Jupiter was borne and buried among them, but they ſhew his grave and ſepulchre: which Epiphanius alſo confirmeth; for in his time there remained the monuments of his tombe in the Mountain Jaſius. This Callimachus in his hymnes alſo witneſſeth, but, as offended thereat, ſaith thus:

> The Cretians ever lyars were, they care not what they ſay:
> For they a tombe have built for thee, O King, that liv'ſt alway.

Diod. l. 2. c. 5. Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as he ſaith) by ſome Greek Writers, that the original of theſe gods was from the Weſtern parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantidæ reigned one Uranus (which ſignifieth Heaven) called ſo for his great ſkill in Aſtrology; and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wives 45 ſons; but by his principal wife Titea, he had ſeventeen ſons and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name, the Titanes. Of Titea, likewiſe it is ſaid, that ſhe for her goodneſs was canonized as a goddeſs, being dead, and called the Earth, as her huſband was ſtiled Heaven. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Basilea (which name ſounding as Queen in Engliſh, ſhe is by the Latine tranſlatour of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the reſt as far in virtue as in yeers, was by generall conſent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queen after her father's death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to huſband her brother Hyperion, to whom ſhe bare a ſon and a daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beauty and towardlineſs of theſe children moved her brethren to envie, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the ſucceſſion: wherefore they took the boy and drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Poe. The loſs of this childe cauſed his ſiſter to break her own neck; and the loſs of both her children made the mother to play many mad prancks, dauncing with Cymbals, after a wilde faſhion, in ſight of all the people, before whom ſhe is ſaid to have vaniſhed away. Ere ſhe died, her ſon (as the fable hath it) ſignified unto her in a dreame, that he and his ſiſter, by the providence of God, ſhould become immortal, that alſo the Sunne and Moone ſhould be called by their names, and that their death ſhould be revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is ſaid, that the people did ſo call thoſe two Planets, and withal held her ſelfe as a goddeſs; and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cheriſhing her brethren whileſt they were young. Hyperion and his race being extinguiſhed, the other ſons of Æranus divided the Kingdome. Of theſe Atlas and Saturne were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his name; a juſt and wiſe Prince, deeply skilful in Aſtrologie, and for invention of the Spheare, ſaid to have ſupported Heaven.

He

He had many ſons; but the principall of them called Heſperus, being of his fathers qualities and ſtudies, was ſaid to have been carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the middeſt of his contemplations; and his name in honour of him, impoſed by the people upon the morning Star. The ſeven Daughters of Atlas were alſo ſaid to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying ſuch as came to be Deified, or regiſtred among the Worthies, brought forth children, anſwerable in quality to thoſe that begat them. Of theſe it is held, that the ſeven Stars, called Pleiades, took name. Saturn, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk, and Italy. Jupiter, another of the ſons of Uranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten ſons, which he called Curetes: he called that Iſland after his Wives name, Idea; in which Iſle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter muſt not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if theſe Fables of the Lybians were true. Saturn (as theſe Lybians tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified ſtrong places, the better to keep his people in ſubjection. His ſiſter Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in ſome part of Africk. Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, neer to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He alſo begat on Amalthea a ſon called Bacchus, whom he cauſed ſecretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nyſa, an Iſland in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva and certain Nimphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea-coaſt, bending in form of a horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard theſe news, ſhe fled from her huſband to her brother Saturn, who not onely entertained her as a ſiſter, but took her to Wife, and at her inſtigation made war upon Hammon, vanquiſhed him by the aſſiſtance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiters children before mentioned, held the Iſland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (women, as may ſeem, being very gracious in thoſe names) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting Trees, and many things elſe commodious for mankinde, before the flight of his Mother-in-law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturn was coming againſt him with the Titans; he levied an Army, to which the Amazons, living not far from Nyſa, added great forces, in love of Minerva, who was entred into their profeſſion. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they ſet forward againſt Saturn, met him, and overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans priſoners, returned to Nyſa; where pardoning the priſoners, that promiſed to become his true followers, he prepared for a ſecond Expedition. In the ſecond Expedition he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he wan the love of all the people by whom he paſſed: inſomuch, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturns rigorous government, he was greatly ſtrengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Hammon, he wan a battell of Saturn before the very walls. After which Saturn, with his wife Rhea, fled by night, ſetting the Town on fire, to deſpight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindely entreated. Saturn had a young ſon by Rhea, called Jupiter. This childe Bacchus took with him in a great Expedition that he made into the Eaſt Countries: and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, Governour of the Country; but appointed unto him, as an Over-ſeer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whileſt Bacchus travelled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titans had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his ſiſter Minerva, together with the reſt, that afterwards were held as gods, joyning all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chaſed them, took and ſlew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter, the ſon of Saturn, ſucceeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the World, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to diſturb him. Between this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Oſiris, there is a rude reſemblance, that may cauſe them both to be taken for the crooked Images of ſome one true Hiſtory. For the Expeditions of Oſiris, and of Bacchus; the wars of the Giants in the one ſtory, of the Titans in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Libycus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Iſis, and the cymballs of Baſilea, with many petty circumſtances, neerely enough reſemble each other, howſoever not alike fitted to the right perſons. Sanchoniato (as Euſebius cites him) would have all theſe to be Phœnicians, and is earneſt in ſaying, That it is a true ſtorie, and no allegorie. Yet he makes it ſeem the more allegoricall, by giving to Uranus or Heaven for daughters, Fate, and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius, or the Sun, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Japetus, Bætilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withall to Uranus the proper name of Terrenus, or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The pedigree of them is this:

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gate, some affected the name of Gods.

OF Jupiter Belus, the son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their gods.

But the Egyptians, even after the floud, began (somewhat before this Chaldæan Jupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their own Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymology of this word (Hammon) which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer;) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heat: because the said Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the aire is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was borne not long before the war of Troy as by many of his sons is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom, Troy was destroyed. Peucer de Oracul.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tyberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: for by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUt that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleeved in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over-busily) have mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in Hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the books of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Justine Martyr remembreth many in that treatise converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he dissembled in some things for fear of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred) Et mirifice iis delectatus est, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Justine Martyr. Now howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledg from the Egyptians, and the Chaldæans, neglecting the Jews, and books of Moses; * Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleeve the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or favouring of Divinity: and the same opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras.

* Euseb. præp. Evan. lib. 11. Cyril. cont. Julian. Origen. cont. Celsum. Ambr. ad Iren. Ep. 6 lib. 1.

But whether it were out of the same vanity, which possessed all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not under the right Authours names) those things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the severity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, I cannot judge. Justine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whose words, among many other of the same effect; are these, Plato Mosis mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses tutum non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the Areopagites, thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moses, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that Divinity which he hath written in TIMÆO; id ipsum de Deo disseruit quod & Moses; He discoursed and taught the same of God (saith Justine Martyr) which Moses did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answere Moses, Ego sum existens (which is) I am; and, existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent mee unto you; herein did Plato (saith Justine Martyr) no otherwise differ than that Moses used the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim qui existit (inquit,) Plato quod existit; for Moses saith, Areopagus or domus seu mons Martis, Mars his hill: a house wherein capitall matters were tryed: so called at first, because Mars therein first pleaded his cause for the murder of Halirrhothius. Pausan. in Attic. Nat. Com. l. 4. c. 7. Just. Mart. cum Gen. 30. 8. 14. & sqq. Exod. 3. 14.

He

He who is; Plato, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or expresse the same, he giveth this testimony: Genitorem Universitatis tam difficile est invenire, quàm inventum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to finde out the Creatour of the Universall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evill, he is no cause at all. And again, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solùm loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: & nihil est Deo similius & gratius, quàm vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God, than a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cœpit; Because he never had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld even the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholar of Anaxagoras?

In Timæo. De legib. l. 10. Latium.

Cœlum terraque unius formæ fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo,
Emersit omnis in lucem res progenita;
Arbores, aves, feræ, quasque affert mare,
Genusque mortalium.

Heaven and Earth one form did bear:
But when dis-joyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato; so we finde the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every-where expressed the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envie and danger of the time: but that he could attribute those things to the sons of men, and mortall creatures, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man, who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEUS canit, non decipientium dæmonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving devils, from whom evill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall and divine vertues. Yea, that he reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymn following, teach us: Respiciens verò ad divinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspice mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truely lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one,
Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone
All else; in which hee's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And again the same Author,

Jupiter omnipotens, & primus, & ultimus idem;
Jupiter est caput & medium: Jovis omnia munus.
Jupiter est fundamen humi, & stellantis Olympi.
Jupiter & mas est, & fœmina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Jupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radix, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse.
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occuluit, magno post numine, sacrum
Cor reserans bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.

The

The first of all is God, and the same last is he.
God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be,
God is the Base of earth and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall never die.
The spirit of all is God, the Sun and Moone, and what is higher.
The King, th' originall of all, of all the end.
For close in holy breast he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Engubinus, Pencer, Plessis, Danæus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, justus, sanctus, sei ipsum possidens, utilis, splendidus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautifull, best, severe, free, alwaies doing good, safe without feare, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was onely and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the onely King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes: Save onely in that everlasting Country, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty; as is manifest to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none, save onely to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum naturæ causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neq; tempore ullo comprehensus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, in eros & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creatour of the world: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall finde that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgement: never any man whose minde the Art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unresistable necessity, one true God, and everlasting being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by divellish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Devil perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common people.

Hieron. in Com. in Dan. in princip.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Judaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUt these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldæans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimney, which the lack of fuel starveth, water quencheth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's Jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and dureful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apolloes Priests are become speechless, and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his over-throws and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubæan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fiftly, by the Captaines of the Phocences: Sixtly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was again gloriously re-built, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten down, and lost in the earth.

The like success had the Jewes in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruines, and others slain, and scattered by Tempest and thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judæa, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neer the foundation, and oft consuming the Work-men, made the enterprize frustrate.

Am. Mar l.13. cap.1.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

NOw the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open stage of this World, (as in those daies) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself than ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddess of dangers and oppressions, that chastity is the enemy of Nature, and lastly, that as all vertue (in general) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtayning of power to oppress, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politician finde in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of God's future judgement, he perswades them that God hath so great need of men's souls, that he

he will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and over-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts & divine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening, worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we finde our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joies) at the other our cruelties, covetousnes, licentiousnesse, injustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: so is he now more laborious than ever, the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.
Of NOAHS Floud.

§ I.

Of God's fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Floud.

OF this distruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Cecedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children, and travailed into another region. Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and unnatural wickednes, and that they were contemptores & religionis & deorum; contemners of religion and of the Gods: among which mighty men (saith Berosus) unus erat qui deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat Noah: There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three sons, Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Neela, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Pinetrees: thou shalt make cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the aire, Noah and his family excepted. Gen. 6. 14. v. 13.

But this universal grave of waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for divine testimonies do not perswade all natural men to those things to which their own reason cannot reach: Dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilst the truth lieth wrapt up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this overflowing, and have judged that this floud of Noah fell but in some particular places and kingdomes: moved so to think, because in elder ages there have been many other flouds (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus. Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca devectum in hujus vertice hæsisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit de quo etiam Moses Iudæorum legislator scribit: thus far this Authour. There it (saith he) above Minyada (or the country of Minyæ) an exceeding high mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an arke, and rested upon the top of the mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same of which Moses the Law-giver of the Iews makes mention. And of this opinion Lact. impress. de falsa relig. Ios. ant. l. 1. c. 4. Euseb. de præp. l. 9. c. 4.

were the Thalmudists (saith Annius) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who, after Moses, was one of the most antient, howsoever he hath been since deformed & corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Floud, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua universus periit Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World universall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three sons with their wives (in all eight persons) were only saved

Of the Floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

BUt from the vanity of the Greekes, the Corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the errour first or all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the world that there was no Floud preceeded the Flond of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bæotia, or rather
Rho. l.15.c.33. of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodiginus) Oggygm id appellant Poetæ, tanquim pervetus dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient. 20

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that he lived Euseb. de prep. Evang. l.10.c.3. Ca.22. but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. yeers after him. There is also an opinion that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodiginus in the ninth booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à bove jugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this Ogyges did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

But this Floud of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World, 3440. according to Eusebius, 30 who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Floud of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. between these Flouds, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeare and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whosoever makes it most ancient, findes above 500. yeeres difference between that and the generall floud.

For Paulus Orosius affirmes that this tempest fell upon the Athenians, but 1040. years Lib.1.c.7. before Rome was built. Eucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Eucholzerus) in the worlds yeare 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) 40 it was built in the Worlds year, 3280. Now the generall Floud preceded the building of Rome (saith Eucholzerus) 1563. yeares: and the Floud of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Flouds must be 520. yeares, to which wee (allowing 60.
Xenophon annianus. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the Floud of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any farther than the bankes of Archi-pelago, or Mela. lib.3. Plin.lib.5. Sol. cap.47. Joppe è epidem antiquissimam orbe toto utpotè ante inundationem terrarum conditum. Sol. ibid. Ovid. Metam. l.15.30.3. the Aegæan Sea. For whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witnesse, that the City of Joppe in Judæa was founded before the Floud; and that (notwithstanding the weight of Waters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Floud of Ogyges spred it selfe over any part of Syria, much lesse over all the earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Eura were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which Ovid:

Si

Si quæras Helicæn, & Buran, Achaidos urbes, Invenies sub aquis. Ovid. Metam. lib. 15. 303.

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground
Are sought in vaine, but under Sea are found.

Of this Floud of Ogyges was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cœus, the son of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow and affright her, whersoever she travelled: till at length ariving at the Isle of Ortygia, she was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the aboundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thicke mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Aegean Sea, neither the beames of the Sun by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dryed, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia espyed the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sun also appeared; fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sun) they were reported to be borne in the Isle of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth manifestation. Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 6. Plin. l. 4. c. 11.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Floud of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the Star of Venus, as never was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges. Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 21. cap. 8.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those dayes as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should neede no reformation: Of the colour and magnitudes I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and fogges than those which covered Greece with so long darknesse, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sun and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightned by him, the opposite halfe should remain shadowed; whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, deserying only that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things unknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have beene discovered in Venus, by his late observations. Whether some watrie disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galilæus hath seen through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discoverie of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Floud of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such unusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Floud of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to have had no other token, or fore-shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Floud came suddenly, and tooke them all away. Luke 17. v. 27.

§. III.

Of DEUCALIONS Floud: and that this was not NOAHS Floud: nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any universall Floud.

A Second Floud of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (ut VARRO scribit) regnante Athenien sibus CRANAO, successore CECROPIS (ut autem nostri, EUSEBIUS & HIERONYMUS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est DEUCALIONIS: (that is) in these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAUS the successour of CECROPS governing the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and HIEROME say) CECROPS yet living, that Floud (called DEUCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Book, he useth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Egypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Athenien sium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Ascatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas: MOSES led the people of God out of Egypt about the later time of CECROPS King of the Athenians, Ascatades reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Triopas. So as leaving the curiosity of a few years, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Floud of Deucalion was either at the egression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. yeares, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the World 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. years after Noah, and in the yeare of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giving unto Deucalion 40. yeares of age when this Floud happened, it falleth within one yeare of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historians is said to have been 82. years old at that time. Now Clements Alexandrinus dates the time of this Floud of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëtons time, by the Reign of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives sixe years after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty years difference, according to Functius, who will have this Floud and Burning to have fallen 14. yeares before Moses left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds years to the Floud and burning the year 2440. and to Moses his egression the year 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinkes that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Floud of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Floud of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessaly (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. years, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. & so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. yeare of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Floud 770. years: for these be Clements Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Græcia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio quæ fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece in the time of Phorneus, who lived after Inachus, the Floud of Ogyges. Now if the Floud of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. years before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it fals out, that Ogyges floud happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 260. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which give 60. yeares more to Abraham after the Floud, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Flouds in this sort. The generall Floud was in the year of the World 1656. Jacob was borne in the year of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the floud to Jacobs birth, there were consumed 513. years. Ogyges floud happened 100. years after Jacob was borne; and therefore after the generall floud 613. years. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeare of the World 2356. and had lived 82. years when his Kingdome of Thessalie was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his floud was after Noahs floud ended, 782. years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeares between the generall floud and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeares of his Age (as before) and then the floud of Thessaly followed the generall 782. yeares. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundo anno Sphaeri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the second yeare year of SPHÆRUS, are numbred 700. yeares, and when DEUCALION was 82. yeares old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Floud happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesse Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Floud of Deucalion to have happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Thessaly it self, and the Regions adjoyning Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italy: and either the same, or some other particular Floud then happening, oppresst Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feigne it to be universall; and Deucalion then King, saving himself and some others on the Mountain of Thessalie (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to bee the preserver of mankinde. That this Floud covered a great part of Italy, Pliny, and Solinus make it probable, who affirm, that the people then inhabiting Italy, were therefore called Ὀμβρικοὶ: quia ab imbribus diluvii superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Umbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Picens, Lucani, Brutii, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Floud of Noah, and so took name by saving themselves upon the Appenine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach us; shewing who, and who only then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the first people which after the generall Floud inhabited Italy, were the Camesenes; (so named from Camese, whom CATO in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Janus) which people lived altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturne arriving on those Coasts, devised Lawes to govern them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greeks, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latines, have preserved; and of whom Virgil:

His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth fly,
Rude people on the Mountain tops he won
To live together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which again sought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venêre Sicani. Virg. l. 8. Æn.
Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sate down in Italy) Thucidides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations & replantations, came the Umbri, descended of the Gauls (saith Annius) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius have assured us: and therefore this floud of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italy, & dispossest of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdom was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then Sicania; before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalions floud happened) possest the same, about 306. years before the war of Troy; Lycaon then governing Arcadia: who being the father of two and twenty sons, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. years before the fall of Troy. After these, came came the Pelasgi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixt, speak at large: and after them the Lydi, under Tyrrhenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Umbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had possest and past over the Appenine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I doe not affirm; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the universall Floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

SAint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latines made not any mention of the Universall Floud, because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledg) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worm-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Family, which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine letters was not received, finde no Parent of more antiquity, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigenæ, & growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldæans had certain knowledge of Noah's Floud, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hear-say, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountains Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus, to preserve himself from a Floud fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ship ad Armeniam navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time; but at the third return the birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noahs Floud.

Euseb. de præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Floud. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Books of Egypt, the story of the Floud universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Frier Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Floud, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Floud for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old OGYGES: Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah, he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then living, 44. years before that of Attica, in the 34. year of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not believe him as touching the time. But this Floud covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemq; aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, HERCULEM tum consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Unde & Græci quidam Poetæ rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCULEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI jecur depascentem occidisse: This Floud (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCULES by his great judgment and vertue did againe compresse and straighten this River, so far extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certain Greek poets (converting this labour and work of HERCULES into a fable) fable) devised, that HERCULES slew the Eagle which fed on PROMETHEUS liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his people and Country (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered.

A fourth Floud chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe sort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuere: prima novimestris inundatio terrarum sub prisco OGYGE: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon:) the first, which was universall, of nine moneths; and this happened under the first OGYGES: the second was Niliaca, and of one moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two moneths, under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia, under Deucalion: and a fifth of the lik continuance (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Book and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Floud in Asia the less, and elsewhere, of no less destruction than any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellespont breaking in over the Land.

Xen. de aquin Comm. per Annium, fol. 37.

But there have bin many flouds in divers times and ages, not inferiour to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same year, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territory, and in Liguria; accompanied with a most fearfull storm of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the land after the waters decreased and returned. And in the year 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that Floud to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the year 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Floud in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog, in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixt: also in the year 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a perilous over-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginier a French Historian speaketh of a great Floud in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the year of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and judgment day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountains, about Nismes there were removed divers old heaps and mountures of ground, and many other places torne up and rent: by which accident there was found both coyn of silver and gold, divers pieces of plate and vessels of other mettall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Province, in the year 1156.

§ V.

That the Floud of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might have been foreseene by the Starres.

NOw howsoever all these Flouds, and many other, which have covered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southsayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that universall Floud (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especiall commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gave strength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountaines of the deep: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes, by whatsoever union, could performe, without receiving from the Fountain of all power, strength, & faculties supernatural. Henricus Mechlinienſis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albu Masar, observeth, that before the Floud of Noah, the like conjunction of Jupiter and Saturne happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Floud of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watry Signe, and the House of the Moon, which is the Lady of the Sea, and of moysture, according to the rules of Astronomy, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by divine revelation, (yet this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himself: and further, that by Catarractæ cœli, English-ed the Windows of Heaven) Moses meant this great and watry conjunction; the word Catarractæ) signifying flowing down, or coming down. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordain by the course of the Heavens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

* The word ἐκπέτασμα properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carried downwards, dasheth and breaketh; of πετάω, allido, or frango. Hence because Windowes do not only open, but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windows) for Bars or Floud-gates

Of this judgment was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood, that the words Catarractæ Cœli, or Windows of Heaven, were to be taken for the former conjunction, or for these watry signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleides Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Catarractas Cœli vocasse, nisi partes illas cœli, quæ generativæ sunt Pluviarum & Inundationum Aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Catarractæ Cœli, or Windows of Heaven) unlesse he thereby understanding those celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendred the rain, and inundations of waters, such as are the watry signs of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable wisdome this conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountains, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and condensing aire into water by the ministery of his Angels, or whosoever else best pleased his All-powerfulness.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universall Floud: And what are Catarractæ Cœli.

GEN. 7. VERS. 11.

NOw if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seem that then all the Earth and Aire had not waters sufficient to cover the habitable World fifteen cubits above the highest mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrained himself, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to over-cover the highest mountaines, I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountains of the great deep were broken up (that is) the waters forsook the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoever was disperst therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let us consider, that the Earth had above one and twenty thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seven thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the center, some three thousand five hundred miles. Take then the highest mountain of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenneriff, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deep, should not well help to cover the space of thirty miles in height, this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteen times: for the Fountaines of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Aire over and above it, we shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Aire, as every where compasseth and imbraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Aire into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seem strange to men of judgment, yea but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berosus and others, That such a conjunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarractæ Cœli, or Windowes of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the graveſt Astrologian it was observed, that in the yeer 1524. there should happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Floud; than which (saith he) there was never a more faire, dry, and seasonable yeer: the like destruction was prophecied of the yeer 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Catarractæ Cœli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the Word Windows of Heaven (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the rains, and Pouring down of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windows or Floud-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost ayre, and the waters fell in aboundance: Behold (saies JOB) he withholdeth the Waters, and they drie up (or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up) but when he sendeth them not, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26 Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the general Floud, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep; and these joyning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the work of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast Caves, and the rest (by a winde) rarified again into ayre, formerly condensed into drops. Job c. 12. v. 15. Gen. 8. 1.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of NOAH among the Heathen.

NOAH, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Ark which he had built, with his own wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophecy of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom aftertimes gave many Names, answering his antiquity, zeale, virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Floud of Achaia: Saturn they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Jupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisedome and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus, (id est) vinosus, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in Libris Ritualibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceeding both Saturne, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in use before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Janus, Fabius Victor giveth this testimony: JANI ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæserat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit JANUS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomœria & sacra docuit; In the time of JANUS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. JANUS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens and solitarie Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimonie than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soveraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Flood was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that raysed an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God a thanksgiving for Gen. 9. 20. Gen. 8. 20.

for his merciful goodneſs towards him. Noah was alſo ſignified in the Name of Biſrons (which was given to Janus) becauſe he beheld the times both before and after the Floud. Quia præterita noverit, & futura proſpexerit, ſaith ARNOBIUS: Becauſe he knew what was paſt, and provided for what was to come. He was alſo in the perſon of Janus ſhadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The ſeed of the World: becauſe as out of that confuſed Heap was drawn all the kinds of beaſts and Plants; ſo from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ovid in the perſon of Janus:

The Ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeers
By thoſe old times, of which I ſing, appears.

He was alſo intituled Cœlum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledg in Aſtronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodiſius ſo call, becauſe he was the reſtorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in reſpect of the Floud. For the Greeks called Liber Ὑετὸν, and his Nurſes Hyades, of Raine, becauſe Noah entred the Ark when the Sun joyned with the Stars Hyades, a conſtellation in the Brow or Neck of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Floud. He was alſo by others ſurnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Son of Neptune; becauſe he lived in ſafety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Dionyſius, quaſi διανύσσων, mentem pungens, Bite-brain, or Wit-ſtinger; though Diodorus conceive otherwiſe, and derive that name à Patre & Loco; Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Niſa, a Towne of Arabia fœlix, ſaith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had alſo the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; becauſe he firſt yoked Oxen, and tilled the ground: according to that of Moſes; and NOAH became an Huſbandman. Now howſoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, otherwiſe Dionyſius) it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention ſtolen from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boäcus, was taken (ſaith Cul. Stuckius, and out of him Danæus.) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, becauſe it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the firſt planter of the Vine after the Floud: and of Noah (the firſt and ancient Bacchus) were all thoſe fables deviſed, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This firſt Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was ſurnamed Nyſius, of the Mountain Nyſa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatſoever themſelves feign of his enterpriſes: and theſe Mountains of Nyſa joyne with thoſe of Paropaniſus, and thoſe other Eaſterne Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah reſted after the Floud.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this ſecond Parent of Mankinde might the better be preſerved, there were founded by his Iſſues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Rivers and Mountains; which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, becauſe the many Names given him brought the ſame confuſion to places as to himſelf. Notwithſtanding all which, we finde the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elſewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomy, Danus; dividing Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion, and name.

NOw in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Authour that hath written thereof; onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo. Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his Ark neer the Mountains of Caucaſus, becauſe on thoſe hils are found the goodlieſt Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among the people, called Nyſæi, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucaſus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchres wrought over with Cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelf from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled againſt God and Nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the building of the Ark; to which alſo he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to tranſport the Timber which he uſed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Onely

Onely this we are ſure of, that the Ark was built in ſome part of the Eaſtern World; and to my underſtanding, not far from the place where it reſted after the Floud. For Noah did not uſe any Maſt or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwiſe move, than the Hulk or body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Alſo, becauſe it is not probable, that during theſe continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moved from the place where it was faſhioned and ſet together: for it is written, God made a Wind to paſſe upon the Earth, and the Waters ceaſed. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible winde at all, which could drive the Arke any great diſtance from the place where it was firſt by the Waters lifted up. This is alſo the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not rayſed in forme of a Ship, with a ſharpeneſſe forward, to cut the waves, for the better ſpeed. Gen. 8. 1.

This kind of Veſſell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for ſo they termed Deucalions Ship: and ſome ſay, that the Hill Parnaſſus, to which in eight dayes he arrived, was firſt called Larnaſſus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnaſſus; but Pauſanias thinkes that it took name of a Son of the Nimph Cleodora, called Parnaſſus, the Inventor of Auguration. Steph. de Urb. fol. 227.

Pencerus finds the word (Parnaſſus) to have no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nabas, which ſignifieth Auguration and Divination; or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leafe before cited. De Oracul. fol. 94.

Joſephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Fram; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lieth the difference betweene Aron and Thebet, That Aron ſignifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet ſuch a Veſſell, as ſwimmeth, and beareth it ſelf upon the Waters. Epiph. in Anter.

Laſtly, this Arke of Noah differed from the faſhion of a ſhip in this, that it had a Cover and Roofe, with a Creſt in the middeſt thereof, and the ſides declining like the Roofe of an Houſe; to the end, both to caſt off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himſelfe and his children might ſhelter, and ſeparate themſelves from the noyſomneſſe of the many Beaſts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke. Gen. 6. 4.

Of what Wood the Ark was built, it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place only uſed, is diverſly underſtood: & though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Tranſlation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seventie, ſquare Timber; the Latine, ſmooth Timber. Other will have it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, becauſe Cypres is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher ſignifie any ſpecial kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; If not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promiſe of God, and his Grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promiſed to eſtabliſh his covenant: Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the uſe to build ſhips of Cedar, which the worms eate not; and he avoweth, that he ſaw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were ſtill found in his time, which was about 1188. years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not ſubject to putrefying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is eaſie to cut, light to carrie, and of a ſweete ſavour, laſting alſo better than any other wood, and becauſe neer the place where the Ark reſted, there are found great ſtore of theſe Cedar trees, as alſo in all the Mountains of the Eaſt, beſides thoſe of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that wood: which hath, beſides the other commodities, the greateſt length of Timber, and therefore fitteſt to build ſhips withall. Pererius conceiveth, that the Ark had divers ſortes of Timber, & that the bottom had of one ſort, the deck & partition of another; all which may be true or falſe, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will ſerve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the body, as for Maſts and Yards. But Noah had moſt reſpect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabines; thereby to ſever the clean beaſts from the unclean, and to preſerve their ſeveral ſorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he caſt his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels ſteered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the helpe of a Compasse or the North starr. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have bin a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorah, now the dead Sea, or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Waxe.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

THe Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites, fifty of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had sixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AUGUSTINE: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesiæ, quæ sit salva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisq; ejus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the City of God travailing in this World as a stranger, (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator betweene God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height and breadth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the comming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

De Civit. Dei. l.15.c.26.

By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath bin a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palm-Cubit) which taketh one handful more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fift Cubit, called Geometricall, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length than it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometricall Cubit, which containeth almost sixe of the Common: For, measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacitie of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgement as touching the Geometricall Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca quæ possent in aquis vivere, non solùm mersa sicut Pisces, verùm super natantia, sicut multæ alites: It was not needfull to conserve those Creatures in the Arke, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia ADAM non hujus, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

Athen. dipnos. lib.4.
Plater. in vita Demetrii.
Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib.5.c.27.

And if we looke with the eyes of judgement hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischefe and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others; as the Mules, the Hyæna's, & the like; the one begotten by Asses & Mares, and the other by by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by diſcovering of ſtrange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beaſts and Birds, differing in colour or ſtature from thoſe of theſe Northern parts; it may be ſuppoſed by a ſuperficial conſideration, that all thoſe which wear red and pied ſkins, or feathers, are differing from thoſe that are leſs painted, and wear plain ruſſet or black; they are much miſtaken that ſo think. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ownce of India; and even thoſe Dogs which are become wilde in Hiſpagniola, with which the Spaniards uſed to devoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to deſtroy the breed of their Cattel, and do alſo oftentimes teare aſunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red feathers in the drowned and low Iſlands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thruſh hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fiſh of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Nigro's, which we call the Black-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but ſome kind of ſtrange Beaſts: and ſo the Giants of the South America ſhould be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. Wee alſo ſee it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by tranſplantation, ſome to better, ſome to worſe, eſpecially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the beſt Melons will change in a year or two to common Cowcummers, by being ſet in a barren Soyle. Therefore, taking the kinds preciſely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Ark, after the meaſure of the common Cubit, was ſufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but half a foot of meaſure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly ſtature (and leſs allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Arke contain 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deep. Acoſt. hiſt. Indi.

But firſt of all, to make it manifeſt that the Geometrical Cubit is not uſed in the Scripture, the ſtature of the Giants therein named may ſuffice. For if the bed of Og, King of Baſan, had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54. Cubits of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliah, who had the length of ſix Cubits and a handful, which makes nine foot and a handful (a proportion credible) if theſe Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monſtrous and moſt incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliah been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's body, who carried it away. Deut. 3. 11. 1 Sam. 17. 4.

Againe, if the Geometrical Cubit had been uſed for a Meaſure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have obſerved, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of bredth, and three of height) have reached the length of 27. foot upright, and ſo muſt their Prieſts have aſcended by ſteps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment given in theſe words: Thou ſhalt not go up with ſteps unto mine Altar, that thy ſhame be not diſcovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Prieſts ſtanding thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one foot and a half, according to the meaſure of Giantly ſtature; which meaſure (doubtleſs) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be alſo probable, that as the Men were, ſo were the Horſes whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correſpondent ſize. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceive, how all the diſtinct ſpecies of Animals, whoſe lives cannot be preſerved in the Waters, might according to their preſent quantities be contained in a Veſſel of thoſe dimenſions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now uſual meaſure: whence it followeth of neceſſity, that thoſe large bodies which were in the daies of Noah might have room ſufficient in the Ark, which was meaſured by a Cubit of length proportionable. Exod. 20. 26.

How the appointed number of creatures to be ſaved, (that is, ſeven of the clean, two of the unclean (with neceſſary food) might have place in the Arke; Buteo hath very learlearnedly declared: the brief sum of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty cubits, and the product by the height of thirty cubits, sheweth the whole Concavity to have been 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hallow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cupicall Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89 distinct Species of Beasts, or (least any should be omitted) for 100. several kinds, we shall easily finde place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beeves, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kinde entred into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as ninety one Beeves; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as a hundred and twenty Beeves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devoure flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threescore and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabines; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for NOAH and his family, and all their necessaries.

§. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies, and Scythia.

‖. I.

A preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHat time NOAH took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute: but he received the Commandment from God a hundred yeers before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needless curiosity; and yet to this saith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fishpoole might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfie my self and others in, is, in what part of the World the Ark rested after the Floud: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Floud; and all story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

‖. II.

A proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hils of Armenia.

AND first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Floud, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travailed to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am reſolved (without any preſumption) that therein the moſt Writers were utterly miſtaken. And I am not led ſo to thinke out of my Humour or newneſſe of opinion, or ſingularitie; but doe herein ground my ſelfe on the originall & firſt truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reaſon, and the moſt probable circumſtances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke ſtayed upon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphraſt hath converted Kardu, meaning the hils Gordæi or Gordiæi in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordæi and Kardu, ſeem to be one and the ſame) of which opinion alſo the moſt of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reaſon which teacheth any ſuch thing: (to wit) that it reſted on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damaſcenus cals this mountain of Ararat, Baris; being the ſame which the Chaldæan nameth Kardu, to which mountain the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Joſephus) makes him finde another adjoyning, called Ocila, and to ſay that the Arke (of which Moſes the Lawgiver of the Hebrewes wrote) did firſt take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any ſuch mountaine in being, as this Ocila, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Joſephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia fælix of that name; and Plinie findes a Mart-towne ſo called in the ſame, which Ptolomie cals Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damaſcenus, or rather of Annius, ſeemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountains. Beroſus calleth thoſe mountains of Armenia Gordiæi, and Curtius Cordæi: Ptolomie Gordæi and Gordiæi: of which the Countrie next adjoyning is by this Nicolaus Damaſcenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is uſed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia ſeemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we ſhould ſay Minni of Syria; for that Armenia alſo was a part of Syria, Plinie witneſſeth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about theſe mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountaines are ſeated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountains called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thoſpitis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 52. degrees of latitude. One of the mountains Gordiæi (that which ſurmounteth the reſt) Epiphanius cals Lubar, which in the Armenian ſignifieth a place of deſcent: but this out of Joſephus; which name (ſaith Junius) was of the event, becauſe of Noahs comming downe with his children. But this alſo I take to be a ſuppoſed event; ſeeing any hill from whence on every ſide we muſt deſcend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Joſephus κιβάρεως (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, becauſe Joſp. l. 1. c. 4. ſayes, the place is called ἀπόβασις (as it were the deſcent or comming downe) and Epiphan. l. 1. contr. Hæreſ. cals it λίβαρα which word in the Armenian and Ægyptian tongue ſignifieth deſcent, of Lubar, which is to deſcend; whence alſo Lubra is a Synagogue, becauſe it was commonly built on ſom high place: whereof alſo the Latine Delubrum may ſeem to be derived; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Ægyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath beene embraced from age to age, receiving a habit of ſtrength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwiſe rightly be given, eſpecially to that mountain, by reaſon that the paſſage was more faire, up and downe unto it, than to any of the reſt adjoyning.

The firſt argument againſt the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come ſooner, had they come from ſo neere a place as Armenia.

BUt there are many arguments to perſwade me, that the Arke of Noah did not reſt it ſelfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordiæan mountaines.

For the firſt, it is agreed by all which follow Beroſus, that it was in the 130. yeer, or in the yeer 131. after the floud, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chuſh, and Chaldæa. If then the Arke had firſt found land in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could have ſpent ſo many yeers in ſo ſhort a paſſage: ſeeing the Region of Meſopotamia was onely interjacent, which might by eaſie journeyes have beene paſt over in twenty dayes; and to haſten and help which paſſage, the navigable River of Tygris offered it ſelfe, which is every where tranſpaſſable by boats of great burden: ſo as where the Deſart on the one ſide reſiſted their expedition, the River on the contrary ſide ſerved to advance it; the River riſing out of the ſame ledge of mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was firſt ſuppoſed to ſettle it ſelfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod ſtill doubted the ſurpriſe of a ſecond floud (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it ſoundeth ill to the eare of reaſon, that they would have ſpent many years in that low and overflown Valley of Meſopotamia, ſo called of the many rivers which imbroyder or compaſs it: for the effects witneſſed their affections, and the works which they undertook, their unbelief; being no ſooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to provide themſelves of a defence (by erecting Babel) againſt any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the firſt known City of the World, founded after the floud about 131. years, or (as others ſuppoſe) ten years later: though (for my ſelfe) I rather think, that they undertook that work in two reſpects; firſt, to make themſelves famous, To get us a name (ſaith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to uſurp dominion over the reſt.

‖. IIII.

The ſecond Argument, That the Eaſtern people were moſt ancient in populoſitie, and in all humane glory.

FOr a ſecond Argument: The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the Eaſt parts of the World firſt abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be ſaid for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the uſe of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the Eaſt had) may eaſily perſwade us, that thoſe Sun-riſing Nations were the moſt ancient. The certainty of this report, that the Eaſt Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to underſtand, That the place of Philoſtratus in vita Apollonii Tianæi, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expreſt in fabulous words: when he ſaith, that the wiſe men, which dwell between Hyphaſis and Ganges, uſe not themſelves to go forth into battaile: but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning ſent from Jupiter. By which meanes there it is ſaid, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden ſhield. For the invention of letters was ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe he brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſavage) had reaſon to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leſſe ancient than Seth or Henoch were: for they are ſaid to have written on pillars of ſtone (as before remembred) long before the floud. But from the Eaſtern world it was that John Guthenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being inſtructed, brought the practiſe thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerſon a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and invention. And notwithſtanding that this myſtery was then ſuppoſed to be but newly borne, the Chinaos had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phœnicians; and alſo the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witneſſed, who about an hundred years ſince diſcovered thoſe Kingdomes, and doe now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other nations but ſalvages in reſpect of themſelves.

And to adde ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtory of Alex. Macedon may juſtly be called to witneſs, who found more Cities and ſumptuoſity in that little Kingdome of Porus, which lay ſide by ſide to the Eaſt India, than in all his other travails and undertakings. For in Alexanders time, learning and greatneſs had not travailed ſo far to the Weſt as Rome. Alexander eſteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the Eaſt pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-riſing, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermoſt Angle and Iſland thereof, we ſhall finde that thoſe Nations have ſent out, and not received; lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the Weſt. For the farther Eaſt (to this day) the more civill, the farther Weſt, the more Salvage.

And

and of the Isle of Japan (now Zipingari) Venetus maketh this report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & sapientiæ sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philosophy, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians: They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who have bin imployed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the World.

‖. V.

The third Argument, from the wonderfull resistance which SEMIRAMIS found in the East Indies.

BUt for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what age she lived, and how soon after the Worlds new birth she gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more than three millions to invade India, to which he adjoyned also 500000. Horse; and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Country after the floud. Now as touching the time wherein she lived: All Historians consent that she was the Wife of Ninus, and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Army was composed. Let us then see with whom she encountred in that War with this her powerfull Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling her own conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witnesse of Diod. Siculus. STAUROBATES avitis majoribus, quàm quæ erant SEMIRAMIDIS copiis: STAUROBATES gathering together greater Troops than those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had beene increased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinaar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Staurobates must have been made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall bee demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65. years time after the Floud, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeares to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom hee had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then thirty yeares to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and five yeares to his five elder brothers, which make sixty five, and then twice thirty yeares for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five yeares; there will then remaine six years to have been spent in travailing from the East, ere they arrived in Shinaar, in the year after the Floud 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101. and the confusion to have been at Pelegs birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build Nimrods Tower in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plaines of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that yeare 101. or at Pelegs birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regall authority in the 131. yeare after the Floud, (according to Berosus) and that the work of Babel lasted forty yeares (according to GLYCAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40. years to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. years after the Floud, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empress of all the part of that world, gathered the most of Nations into one body.

Gen. 10. 7.

Glyc. in Gen. & de Turris extructione fol. 173.

§. VI.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of NOAH.

FOurthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the Floud, and had lived therein the long time of 600. years, was all that space 130. years after the floud without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conducter of those people, by Noah destined & appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne World; (which travailes Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself then covered with many years, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman, whose businesse was to dress and manure the Earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia fœlix, where he should (if the tradition be sound) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton, then into Spaine, where they say he setled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but then finding no amendment, they say he banisht him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travaile far in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Floud, the same lay waste and over-grown for 130. or 140. yeares, and wherein there could hardly bee found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for woods, bushes, and bryars that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the valley of Shinaar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spaine: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reverenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbeleeving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent perswasions he would have bound their hands from so vain labours, & by the authority which he received even from God himselfe, he would have held them in that awfull subjection, as whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personall commandement of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankinde was by themseves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilty, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troop, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus and Cœlestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increase (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Joctan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Joctan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the Worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Joctan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adjoyning adjoyning to Indus, and held alſo a part of Chaldæa for a time: for Abraham inhabited Vr, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the ſons of Joctan, or of all the reſt a certain number (Cham and his iſſue only excepted) that Noah kept with himſelf, it cannot be known. Of which plantation I ſhall ſpeak at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reaſon which moves me to beleeve that Noah ſtayed in the Eaſt far away from all thoſe that came into Shinaar, is, that Moſes doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the ſtory of the Hebrewes, or among any of thoſe Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all mankinde, and the choſen ſervant of God, was too principall a perſon, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in reſpect of his age and wearieſome experience of the World) withdrawne himſelfe, and reſted a part with his beſt beloved, giving himſelf to the ſervice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their deſtined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile ſoile, where he planted his Vineyard, and dreſt the Earth; after which, and his thankſ-giving to God by ſacrifice, hee is not remembred in the Scriptures, becauſe he was ſo farre away from thoſe Nations of which Moſes wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

‖§. VII.

Of the ſenſeleſſe opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor upon BEROSUS: who findes divers places where the Ark reſted; as the Caſpian and Gordiæan hils which are three hundred miles aſunder; and alſo ſome places of Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Beroſus and others, laboureth marvailouſly to prove that the Arke of Noah reſted upon the Armenian Mountaines called Caſpii; which mountains ſeparate Armenia from the upper Media, & do equally belong to both. And becauſe all his Authors ſpeak of the mountains Gordiæi, he hath no other ſhift to unite theſe opinions, but by uniting thoſe far-diſtant mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge thoſe men with errour, which have carefully over-ſeen, printed, and publiſhed Ptolomies Geography, in which they are altogether diſſevered. For that laſt edition of Mercators, ſets theſe hills five degrees (which makes three hundred Engliſh miles) aſunder. And certainly, if we look into thoſe more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we ſhall finde nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in thoſe the mountains Caſpii ſtand ſeven degrees to the Eaſt of the Cordiæi, which maks 420. miles. And for thoſe Authors by whoſe authority Annius ſtrengtheneth himſelf, Diodorus whom he ſo much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like diſpute. Aberrarunt verò omnes, non negligentiâ, ſed regnorum ſitus ignorantiâ; They have all erred (ſaith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the ſituation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah ſtood on the mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the ſame he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250. years before Ninus, the earth was over-flown with waters, & in Scythia Sagarenatum mortale genus; and that in Scythia the ſtock of mortall men was renewed. The ſame Author alſo teacheth, that the Umbri before remembred (who were ſo called, becauſe ſaved from Deucalions Floud) were the ſonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his veniſſe JANUM cum DYRIM, & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From theſe Scythians, he ſaith, that JANUS came with DYRIM, and with the Galli the progenitours of the Umbri: And againe, Equidem principatus originis ſemper Scythis tribuitur; Certainely, the Prime Antiquity of Off-ſpring is alway given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that thoſe Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by ſome Writers Sarmatia, Aſiatica, were among the firſt peopled: and they held the greateſt part of Aſia under Tribute till Ninus time. Alſo Plinie called the Umbri which long ſince inhabited Italy, Gens antiquiſſima, a moſt ancient Nation, who deſcended of theſe Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that theſe ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did firſt inhabite that Region of the mountains, on which the Ark reſted; and confeſſing that this great Ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigneth a nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking name of the mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And becauſe his Author Cato helpeth him in part

Ptol. tab. Aſia 3

Diod. l. c. 3.

Cato de orig. pars prima.

Plin. l. 3. c. 14.

(to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great floud 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga;

Beros. l. 1. as, In Scythia Sagæ renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankinde was restored, he therefore in the Proœme of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga

Ptol. Asiæ tab. 7 altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos. For Scythia Saga or Sacæ, is undoubtedly under the Mountaines of Paropanisus; on which, or near which it is most probable that the Arke first took ground: and from

Gen. 11. 2. those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scyth their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his falshood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythæ; The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that work giveth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The originall and succesſe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolomy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Sacæ, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus call all the Scythians, Sacæ; which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Sacæ

L. 6. c. 17. (saith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sacæ; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colthene and Soducene & Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus or without, Tab. Asiæ 7. & 8 to the number of 100. severall Nations, are by Ptolomy precisely set down.

But to come to those latter Authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great part of those North-East Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: for Scythia without these Mountains is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ostia Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc usq; ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the mountaine Imaus is that part of the World which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica (or of Asia:) on the East by the Imaan Mountaines: on the North by unknown Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are in the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as far as the mouth of Rha.

Rha, now Wolga.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (quæ magna sanè Regio est, & quæ innumeras nationes complectitur) Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations (saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he dissevereth Sarmatia it self from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythyan Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the bloud of those Kings (though afterward a Monk) ever acknowledge himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he write that story at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Riphæi, and Hyperborei in Scythia, ſpring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; providing by unanſwerable experience, that there are no ſuch Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of thoſe famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Muſcovia knowne to every Merchant, and that they ariſe out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and mariſh grounds. The River of Tanois or Don, ariſeth to the South of the Citie Tulla, ſome twentie Engliſh miles, out of a Lake called Iwanoweſero, in the great wood Okenitzkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riſeth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Boryſthenes (now Neyper) and Dſuina or Dividna. And this learned Polonian doth in this ſort bound the Europæan Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Ruſſians, Lithuanians, Muſcovians, and thoſe adjoyning, bounded on the Weſt by the River of Viſſa, the Name perchance miſ-printed Viſſa for Viſtula, a River which parts Germania and Sarmatia: and for the Eaſt border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Aſiatica he cutteth from Europe by the ſame River of Tanais, and the Caſpian Sea, to with-hold it from ſtretching farther Eaſt: this Aſian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the ſame Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Aſiatica it ſelfe above three hundred and a few odd yeeres before his owne time: theſe be his words: Conſtat eam eſſe gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis ſedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Aſiæ Sarmatiam ingreſſam: It it manifeſt (ſaith he, ſpeaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coaſts of the Eaſt: from whence they entred into Aſia, & gat new ſeates a little more than 300. yeers ſince: For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia Aſiatica. And this Mathias lived in the yeer 1511. and this his Diſcourſe of Sarmatia was printed at Auguſta in the yeere 1506. as Eucholzerus in his Chronologie witneſſeth. Now theſe Scythians (ſaith he) came from the Eaſt, for in the Eaſt it was that the Ark of Noah reſted, and the Scythæ Sacæ were thoſe people which lived at the North foot of thoſe Mountains, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themſelves with the great Imaus. And were there no other teſtimony than the generall deſcription of the Earth now extant, and the witneſſe of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only thoſe three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caſpian Sea: on the Eaſt ſhore of which Sea, but not on the Weſt, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (inded) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) betweene Jaxartus and Jactus; but what are theſe Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

The firſt Argument, The Vine muſt grow naturally neere the place where the Arke reſted.

TO this if we adde the conſideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, we ſhall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayſin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this reſting of the Arke was ſuppoſed: for if the Vine was a ſtranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrrhenus firſt brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at ſuch times as Brennus and the Gaules invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Camilus) the Gaules remained betweene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, neere unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, untill they drunke Wine, which was firſt brought them out of Italie; and after they taſted thereof, they haſted to inhabite that Country, which brought forth ſuch pleaſant fruit: ſo as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from elſe where into Italy.

Gen. 9. 20.

Servius Aneid. Eutropius.

Now it is manifeſt, that Noah travailed not far to ſeeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counſaile how to diſpoſe of the world among his children: and the firſt thing he did, was, to till the ground, & to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thankſgiving to God; and whereſoever the Arke reſted, there there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travailed far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a wanderer.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare saving that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam cœlum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

‖. X.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hils there.

BUt before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath onely these words: The Arke rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the marginall note of the Geneva: the Chaldæan Paraphrast cals it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14.

Epiph. l. 1. contr. Hæres.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Floud. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia; they are placed where the City of Cælenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description she maketh mention of Marsyas, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it selfe with the River Mæander, which is far from the Gordiæan Mountaines in Armenia. We may also finde a great mistaking in JOSEPHUS (though out of BEROSUS, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that JOSEPHUS sets Ararat betweene ARMENIA and PARTHIA, toward ADIABENE, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Cæron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some peices of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia; for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betweene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discoverie of the Mountaines Cordiæi was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the Text which Josephus citeth out of Berosus differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandereth up and downe in these dayes, set out by Annius. For Berosus, cited by Josephus, hath these words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Cordiæorum superesse, & quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci hujus homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiæan Mountains; and that diverse do scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Annius his Edition of the Fragment of Beroſus uſeth theſe words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordiæ montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars eſſe, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maximè utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, reſted on the top of the Gordiæan Mountaines, of which it is reported that ſome parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: ſo as in theſe two Texts (beſides the difference of words) the name is diverſly written. The ancient Beroſus writes Cordiæi with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiæi with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is uſed for a preſervative againſt Poyſon or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice. And if it be ſaid that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved Authour: for one of them, uſeth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that ſo it is reported, the other, that ſo it is ſaid; and both but by heare-ſay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is ſo infamous an Hiſtorian, as wiſe men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Edition

Furthermore, theſe Mountaines which Ptolomie cals Gordiæi, are not thoſe Mountaines which himſelf giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountains of Armenia, Moſchici. Theſe be his own words: Montes Armeniæ nominantur ii, qui Moſchici appellantur, qui protenduntur uſq; ad ſuperjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moſchici, ſtretcht along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: alſo the Hill which is called Paryardes: which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordiæan Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northermoſt of which did the Georgians take their names, who were firſt Gordians, and then Georgians, who amidſt all the ſtrength of the greateſt Infidels of Perſia and Turkie, doe ſtill remaine Chriſtians. Concerning the other ſuppoſitions, that the Mountaines of Gordiæi, otherwiſe Baris, Kardu or Lubar (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodiaion) are the higheſt of the World, the ſame is abſolutely falſe.

Of Caucaſus, and divers far higher hils than the Armenian.

FOr the beſt Coſmographers with other, that have ſeene the Mountaines of Armenia, find them far inferiour, and under-ſet to divers other Mountaines even in that part of the World, and elſe where: as the Mountaine Athos betweene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lacas, (ſaith Caſtaldus) is far ſurmounting any Mountain that ever hath beene ſeene in Armenia: for it caſteth ſhade three hundred furlongs, which is ſeven and thirtie miles and upwards: of which Plutarch; Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bovis: Athos ſhadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Alſo the Mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Clouds or Raine overtop it. Againe, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Myſia, not farre from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a farre more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be ſeene from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania neere the Sea the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERODOTUS: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſſe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non poſſint: Upon this Coaſt there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whoſe height is ſaid to be ſuch, as the eye of no mortall man can diſcerne the top thereof. And if we may beleeve Ariſtotle, then are all theſe inferiour to Caucaſus, which he maketh the moſt notorious both for breadth and height: Caucaſus Mons omnium maximus, qui æſtivum ad ortum ſunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cujus juga à Sole radiantur uſq; ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu: Caucaſus (ſaith ARISTOTLE) is the greateſt Mountaine both for breadth and height of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightned by the Sunbeams, uſq; ad conticinium (which is, ſaith Macrobius betweene the firſt crowing after midnight and the breake of day: Others affirm, that the top of this Mountain holds the Sunbeames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleeve either, for the higheſt Mountaine of the World knowne, is that of Teneriſe in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Sun's company at any ſuch late houres. Beſides theſe Mountaines which Ariſtotle calleth Caucaſi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colchis from Iberia;

Plut. Muſ. Coſm.

Ariſt. Met. cor. l. 1. c. 13.

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hils which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yeeldeth it self to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

‖. XII.

Of divers incongruities if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the Books of the Sybils set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hils which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierome) signifieth high Towers: and so may all high Hils be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the Hils of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any Hils of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiæi stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordiæan, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neer the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth, Euphrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountains Moschici are those Hils which disjoyn Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

‖. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvaile that the same Ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LAstly, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it downe, and carry it out of Armenia, or finde it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withal) set it East from Shinaar; or else we shall wound the Truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as these, being continuations of many Hils, keep one name in divers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountains, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and cross the Mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seem to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspii, Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diversly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie cals by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, even from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West, so do those marvailous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neer, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Plinie called these former Hills Taurus, and Moses the hils of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolomie, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and dissever; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: having ving all these Kingdoms either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular places and Regions. For these Mountains which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less on the North side, are called Taurus; and those Mountains which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountains called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomie's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates; (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the River of Bagradus riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yeelding her self to Oxus (now Abia): and drawing now neer their waies end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus; and lastly of Caucasia, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hils called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delamuer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountains in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) that is, between Paropanisus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus. Ptol. tab. Asiæ.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountains Caucasi, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

NOw in this part of the World, it is where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nyseus (so called of Bacchus Niseus or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Floud; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoscythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, & 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judæa, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bigness at Escol. Num. 13. 24.

The fruitfulnes of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hils, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neer the Mountains of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Army ten daies together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

‖. XV.

The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name

L. 5. c. 27. name of Ararat. But as Plinie giveth to this ledge of high Hils, even from Cilicia to Paroponisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hils of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hils for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Aegeum: between Sestus and Abydus, Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this side, the Brittain Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question, we must appeal to that Judge, which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selves any new or strange exposition; And (withal) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us touching the Gospel of CHRIST JESUS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legerit, quàm si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel (the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

Gen. c. 11. v. 2. The words then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proveth without controversie, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places whersoever Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he alwaies precisely nameth toward what quarter of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Joctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth; And CAIN dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words; Afterwards removing thence unto a mountain East-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: having Bethel on the West side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written; And ABRAHAM went forth journying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophecieth of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit SOLOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travailes were precisely set downe upon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judæa; Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Cælocyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journying from the East, nor so neer unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cælo, and that he knew not East from west. For the body of Armenia standeth in forty three degrees Septentrionall, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordiæan Mountains, whereon it was supposed that the Ark rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the valley of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betweene East and West) the Gordiæan Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-west, ninety five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the compasse. But Gregory and Hierome warne us, In Scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who also speak by hear-say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Ark of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first civill, which had Noah himself for an instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes, and the best wine. The great Armies also which overtopped in number those millions of Semiramis, prove, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my self I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, that the sons of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Eastern mountains, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the mountains of Ararat, and not on those mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentifull warm East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamq; rem sua ipsius lingua Ish-Adamath (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusq; est, The study of Husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledg and order of which, it is said that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth, that he was no wanderer; and that he troubled not himself with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the World where he was first delivered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SHEM, HAM, and JAPHET, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder than JAPHET.

OF these Sons of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we finde every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in vertue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of JAPHET, were children born. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of JAPHET the eldest Sonne, were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japhet than for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundreth year of his life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundreth year (to wit) the hundreth year following, came the general floud; two years after which, Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noahs life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. years old, two years after the Floud: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. years old, and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an hundred years old at the floud, and in the six hundreth year of Noahs life, and not two years after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done unto him (to wit) HAM; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son, so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it filius minimus, His youngest son; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and finds Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednes he derided) was dis-inherited, and lost the preeminencie of his birth, as Esau and Ruben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, SHEM Frater JAPHET major; or with the Septuagint, Iunius and Tremelius, SHEM fratris JAPHET majoris; or with Pererius, SHEM frater JAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former argument, That Shem's age at the time of the floud did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred years old, and begat ARPHAXAD two years after the floud; and again in the 12. verse: So SHELA lived after he begat EBAR, four hundred and three years, &c. so as the number of two years, of three years, of five yeares, and afterward of two yeares, were alwayes precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world; as that all Histories must yeeld to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that known great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of HAM.

BUt let us goe unto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly understood, we shall finde that many Nations have supposed or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the sons & issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so far as the story of nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth & antiquity of the books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, & testimony of antiquity what soever, which hath come to the knowledg of men, the same hath have bin borrowed thence, & therfore later than it, as all careful obſervers of time have noted: among which thus writeth Euſebius in the Proeme of his Chronology: MOSES is found more ancient than all thoſe whom the Grecians make moſt ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Trojan Warre; and farre before HERCULES, MUSÆUS, LINUS, CHIRON, ORPHEUS, CASTOR, POLLUX, ÆSCULAPIUS, BACCHUS, MERCURIUS, and APOLLO, and the reſt of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of JUPITER, whom the Greeks have ſeated in the top and higheſt Turret of their Divinity.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancienteſt was the ſon of Æther whoſe three ſons begotten on Proſerpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the firſt King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moſes bring the children of Iſrael out of Egypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Egypto noviſſimo tempore CECROPIS Athenienſis Regis; MOSES brought the children of Iſrael out of Egypt in the laſt dayes of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ſaith S. Auguſtine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it ſelf, but Theſeus long after him. But becauſe the truth hereof is diverſly proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut aſunder the purpoſe in hand, by alledging many authorities in a needleſſe queſtion, but leave it to the proper place. Cicero de Nat. Deorum l. 3. De civit. Dei l. 18. c. 11.

First, we are to conſider, that the world after the floud was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to fly from Shinaar to the uttermoſt border of Europe, Africa, and Aſia, in haſte, but that theſe children were directed by a wiſe Father, who knew thoſe parts of the World before the floud, to which he diſpoſed his children after it, and ſent them not as diſcoverers, or at all-adventure, but aſſigned and allotted to every Son and their iſſues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authors, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Æneas) or elſe to glorifie their own nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themſelves, and after them upon Reaſon and Nature. First therefore we muſt call to mind and conſider, what manner of face the Earth every where had in the 130. year after the great inundation, and by comparing thoſe fruitfulleſt Vallies with our own barren and cold ground, inform our ſelves thereby, what wonderful Deſarts, what impaſſable faſtneſs of woods, reeds, bryars and rotten graſſe, what lakes and ſtanding pools, and what mariſhes, fens, and bogs, all the face of the Earth (excepting the mountains) was peſtered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and deſtroying Winter depreſſeth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one halfe of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, theſe our grounds would all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods, or with other offenſive thickets and buſhments: much more did all ſorts of plants, reeds, and trees, proſper in the moſt fruitful Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withall the ſtart of 130. years to raiſe themſelves without controlement.

This being conſidered, it will appear, that all theſe people which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod either by order or ſtrength took the Dominion, did after the confuſion of Languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty people, diſperſe themſelves into the Regions adjoyning to the ſaid Valley of Shinaar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldæa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, ſome of them towards the South, others towards the Weſt and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both Eaſt and Weſt from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Paleſtina, which the Cananites firſt poſſeſt; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his Inheritance on the ſudden, but by time and degrees. For we finde, that Abraham, the true ſucceſſour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldæa at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he travailed to Sichem in Palestina; and yet there had passed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldæa; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeares, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Ninive. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as far as we can know) were, in that Age of the issues of Ham; the blessing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking lesse effect, untill divers years were consumed; and untill the time arrived, which by the wisedome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the people and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in JAPHETS portion: of BEROSUS his too speedy seating GOMER the sonne of JAPHET in Italy; and another of JAPHETS sons TUBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Japheth among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhets sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the division were made at Phalegs birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the years after the Floud one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sons of Japhet were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Islands adjoyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Ægeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it self is (in effect) surrounded with water, saving that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwest, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittannie and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilatet Deus JAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) JAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of SHEM. For though Junius here useth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet: and the Geneva persuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japhets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Annius, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reign depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth year of NIMRODS Reigne, GOMERUS GALLUS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth yeare of the same NIMRODS Reigne TUBAL seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeares after the Floud, according to BEROSUS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues, the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building of such a City & Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready meanes to performe such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the mountaines. Sure that both this City and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witnesse: but the

Gen. 9. v. 27

the Lord came downe to ſee the Citie and Tower which the Sonnes of men had builded. Let us then but allot a time ſufficient for the making of brick to ſuch a Work, of the greateſt heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation anſwerable) that ever was. For where the univerſall Floud covered the higheſt Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a Citie and Tower (ſaith NIMROD) whoſe top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raiſe their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the higheſt Mountaine, otherwiſe they could not aſſure themſelves from the fear of a ſecond inundation: a great part whereof was finiſhed before it fell, and before they left the work. They alſo began this building upon a ground, the moſt oppreſſed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which theſe waters, forcibly over-bearing and over-flowing, made in the time of the ſucceeding Emperours, is made manifeſt, approved alſo by the Prophet Jeremy, ſpeaking of Babylon in theſe words: Thou that dwelleſt upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a ſubſtantiall foundation for ſo high a raiſed building on a mariſh ground: and to which, Glycas upon Geneſis giveth forty years. For it ſeemeth, that the Tower was near finiſhed when God overthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord ſcattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (becauſe the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their ſuppoſed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoyning, wherein they inhabited. It is alſo to be noted, that till ſuch time as this confuſion ſeized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) theſe nations did not diſperſe themſelves: for from thence the Lord ſcattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers ſpeech. Now to think that this work in the newneſſe of the World (wanting all inſtruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the ſame year could creep through 3000. miles of Deſart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: Let thoſe light believers, that neither tye themſelves to the Scripture, nor to reaſon, approve it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. years in building, or but near ſuch a time, (and then) when the World had ſtood 1556. years, it were more than fooliſhneſſe and madneſſe it ſelf, to think that ſuch a work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the floud to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had ſpent ſome part in travailing from the Eaſt. Againe, if all Aſia ſet to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they conſumed in that Work 400. years (or be it but halfe that time) and in ſuch an Age as when the World flouriſhed in all ſorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials & carriages: This work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants ſuppoſed) be erected in thoſe few years remembred. And for concluſion, let all men of judgment weigh with themſelves how impoſſible it was for a nation or family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattell, to travaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Deſarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we ſhall finde it rather a work of 100. years than of 100. dayes. For in the Weſt Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in thoſe places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entred the Country ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrods people ſpent many yeares by the account before remembred in paſſing from the Eaſt India, or the higher part thereof, which ſtandeth in 115. degrees of Longitude, untill they came into Shinaar, which lyeth in 79. degrees (the diſtance between thoſe places containing 36. degrees, which makes 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keep the mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biſcay is much more: for the body of Biſcay lyeth in ten degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforeſaid) in 79. ſo the length of way from Shinaar to Auſturia or Biſcay is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to finde Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (ſuppoſing that the Ark reſted in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cauſe to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travaile 3000. miles, to Countries leſs known unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradiſe was known to Noah before the Floud: and ſo was the Region of Eden by Moſes afterward remembred; but what he underſtood of moſt part of the World elſe it is unknowne. And therfore did Annius ill adviſe himſelfe to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of Nim-

Plin.

Isa.66.v.8. rods Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at once? But it may be objected, That the Sons of Japheth might come by Sea, and so save this great travail through Desarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbark so great a people as we may justly suppose those Conducters carried with them, will not easily believe that there were any Vessels in those daies to transport Armies, and (withall) their cattell, by whose milk they lived and fed their children: For milk and fruit were the banquetting dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Herds and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flocks of Sheep, and great Droves, and Herds of their owne, and their own Sheepherds and Herdsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palæstina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granado, Valentia, and other Provinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibralter, disdained all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and have sought out the iron, woody, and barren Country of the world (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonautæ, there were scarce any Vessels that durst cross the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Jason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knows) and perchance such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carried but four and fifty Passengers, yet it was far greater than any of the former times: Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of Ships to them:

Diod.Sicul.l.4. c.4.fol.115.

Tibull. Eleg.7. Strabo.l.16.

Tyrus knew first how Ships might use the Wind.

Diod.Sicul.l.1. Plin.l.7.cap.56 And for those Boats called longæ naves, or Gallies, Pliny saith that Ægesias ascribeth the device to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Jason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Ægeon: to which invention the Erythræi are said to have added certain numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to have increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to foure Banks: the Quinq; Remi first to have been used by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romanes served themselves in the Punick War. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis used them in the passage of her Atmy over Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the invention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) gives it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians used to coast the shores of the Red Sea upon raffes, devised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romanes, the Britans had a kinde of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and covered over with leather: of which kind I have seen at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naves excorio circumsutæ in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor:) of which Lucan the Poet:

On th'out-spread Ocean.

And

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inſpiration was inſtructed in ſo many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were firſt revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Ark of Noah, and ſuch Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories ſhew, that it was long after theſe times, ere any durſt preſume upon any long voyages to Sea, at leaſt with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as alſo common reaſon can tell us, that even now when this Art is come to her perfection, ſuch Voyages are very troubleſome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or uſe of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had paſſed themſelves and their people by Sea; the excerciſe of Navigation would not have beene dead for ſo many hundred yeares after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men elſe to their fancies, who have caſt Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moſes and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joyned both Nature, Reaſon, Policie, and Neceſſitie: and to the reſt, neither probabilitie, nor poſſibilitie.

§. IV.

Of GOG and MAGOG, TUBAL, and MESHECH, ſeated firſt about Aſia the leſſe; out of EZECHIEL, CAP. 38. 39.

NOw although many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not where by led) a Plantation of the World, which alſo hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excuſed, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was alſo in ſome things much miſtaken: and for Joſephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall; ſo was he in the Plantation of the World very groſſe and fabulous; whereby both Euſebius, Hieroſolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his teſtimonies for currant, have beene by him farre miſſe-led. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the firſt ſonne of Japheth poſſeſt, as alſo Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: becauſe the Scriptures take moſt knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, ſaith Matth: Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find moſt judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts againſt Iſrael. For beſides the portions of Europe, and the North-eaſt parts of the greater Aſia, which Japheths Iſſues poſſeſt, all Aſia the leſſe was peopled by them. And that thoſe of the Iſſue of Japheth (whom Ezechiel ſpeakes of) were ſeated hereabout, it may beſt appeare, if we conſider the circumſtances of the place, and the dependencie upon the former Propheſie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel propheſieth of the uniting of the two Kingdomes of Iſrael and Juda, after their deliverie from captivitie. c. 37. v. 19.

By which Propheſie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purpoſed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, & to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpoſe it is written; And DAVID my Servant ſhall be King over them, and they ſhall have one Sheepheard, (that is) they ſhall be united as they were in Davids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezechiel propheſieth againſt thoſe Nations, which ſhould ſeeke to impeach this Union, and diſturbe the people of Iſrael, whom God purpoſed to receive to grace, and promiſed to reſtore. And ſo in the ſame Chapter are thoſe Nations coupled together, which infected the Iſraelites after their returne, and ſought to ſubject them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cœloſyrians, next bordering Paleſtina, or the holy Land, followed alſo by the reſt of the Nations of Aſia the leſſe, which lay North from Judea. The words of Ezechiel are theſe: Son of man, ſet thy face againſt GOG, and againſt the Land of MAGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESHECH (or MOSOCH) and TUBAL: and afterward; Behold, I come againſt the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TUBAL: and in the ſixth verſe; GOMER and all his Bands, and the Houſe of TOGORMA of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel having firſt delivered c. 38. v. 2.

the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanitie assayle Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierome) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus
In Ezech. erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devill under humane forme. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of, or, from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pintus; at least in this not amisse, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which agreeeth this observation of Beroaldus, Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Heliajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29 Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee GOG the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TUBAL. This must needes be meant by the Successours of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Jewes their Tributaries only, but indeavoured by all means, and by all kinde of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead
L. 2. de Fide. Images. Saint Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela drives the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greekes Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slaine Candaules the Lydian, gave his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth Strab. lib. 13. in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Rivers of Hillus, and Mænander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had subdued the Gountrey about the River Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontorie Trapese after his owne name Gyges.
Said. Col. 207. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Son Crœsus;
Jun. in Ezec. 38 who (as Junius further notes) having mastred all those Regions as farre South as Libanus, in that Border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Cœlosyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Jewes.

Now that Magog is found in Cœlosyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Cœlosyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur: Syris verò, Magog; Cœlosyria hath in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying, that the Citie had anciently another name, which he yet expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as sounding nothing ele-Strab. l. 16. gantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleeve Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palæstina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I do not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cœlosyria, and the North parts adjoyning be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denyed, that the Scythians

in

in old times coming out of the North-eaſt waſted the better part of Aſia the leſs, and poſſeſt Cœloſyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plain: for this Citie Hieropolis or Magog ſtandeth due North from Judæa, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters thoſe Nations ſhould come. For as the Kings of the South which infeſted the Iſraelites were the Ptolomies, Kings of Egypt: ſo thoſe of the North were the Kings of Aſia and Syria, the Succeſſors of Seleucus, the Succeſſors of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to have been called Bambyce, as we have ſaid, but alſo Edeſſa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the ſame name: now the known name is Aleppo: for ſo Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for ſo the word Hierapolis ſignifieth) yet was it a place of moſt deteſted Idolatry, and wherein was worſhipped the Idol of the Mermayde Atergatis, or Atergitis, according to Plinie, which the Greeks call Dercето. Lib. 4. cap. de bello Sacro.

If then we confer the words of Ezechiel in the third verſe of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meſhech and Tubal; and withal remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which alſo is ſeated directly North from Judæa: with whom alſo Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) ſafely conclude, that theſe Followers and Vaſſals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in reſpect of Judæa) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the leſſer Aſia, and Cœloſyria: and therefore that the opinions of Beroſus, Ioſephus, and whoſoever elſe hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Ioſephus refer himſelf to later times, and think that ſome Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Aſia paſſe into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (moſt part poſſeſt by the Georgians) then is his judgement of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in proceſs of time theſe people might from their firſt habitation, paſs into the Countries neer the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Ioſephus makes mention of the Iberi, ſaying, that they were anciently called Thobelos; as of Tubal; from whence (ſaith Iuſtine) they paſſed into Spaine to ſearch out the mines of that Region: having belike underſtood that it was a Southerly Countrie, and Mountainous. For it ſeemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witneſſeth in theſe following Verſes, telling how the Argonautes did viſit them:

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas ſcindit ſub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta miniſtrant.

The Calybes plough not their barren ſoyle,
But undermine high Hils for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchaſe of their endleſs toyle
For Merchandize, which their poor lives ſuſtains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was firſt peopled by the Africans, who had ever ſince an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthagimians of old, who were eaſily drawn to paſs over the Streights into that Country: and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeers, till the time of Ferdinand and Iſabel. And either of theſe opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth yeere of Nimrods Reigne, Tubal paſt into Spaine, and therein built Saint Uval: a poor Town, and a poor device, God knowes. Certain it is, that we muſt finde Moſhoch or Meſhech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not far off, or elſe we ſhall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meſhech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their aſſiſtants. And that Meſhech inhabited Aſia, Funckius (though he followed Beroſus) confeſſeth, for theſe be his words: MESACUS, qui à MOSE MESECH, priſcos Meſios ab Adula monte uſque ad Ponticam regionem poſuit: hæc regio poſteà Cappadocia dicta eſt, in qua urbs Mazaca, &c. hæc eſt terra MAGOG principalis; MESACUS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient Meſians

Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coasts of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Countrey of MAGOG. And this doth Annius also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous: Spain lying directly West, & not North from Judæa: Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophecieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal joyntly. And for a finall proofe, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how farr soever stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleeve that these troups came out of Spain over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compasse of the then known World; he may be called a strong beleever, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrarie, it is knowne, that Seleucis was a Province neighbouring Palæstina or Judæa, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely; the Seleucida) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet possest Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesbech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himselfe with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germanie, rested long in France and Brittanie, and possessed the utmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melanthon well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Utmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne upon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities M. Willian Cambden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessity inforcing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere joyned, as afterwards in the feates which they possessed. For that the Warlike nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gaules, the authoritie of Cæsar affirming it, is proofe sufficient. But in times following they persued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupyed those parts, which had formerly beene held by their Progenitours. I say not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothes, for his excellent wisdome sirnamed Dis, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japhets sons) they must finde him in some old Poet: for Functius, a great Berosian, confesseth: Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum est; Who this Samothes was, it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that same Dis, whom Cæsar saith the Gaules suppose to be their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confesseth with Functius: Mays on ne scayt qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

In Chron. Cæsar. Comment Vigni. part. 1. Chron.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUt before I go on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it is necessarie to disprove the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himselfe; an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authors of whom him himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annius seeks to perswade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he lived 92. yeeres. This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineve by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disprove the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian, in his Oration against the Greekes, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annius hath devised five Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may beleeve Eusebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) consumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arrivall into Italy there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz in the worlds yeare (as some reckon) 2717. after the Floud 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeares after the Floud: and so there past betweene Janus of Italie and Noah surnamed Janus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fiftie yeares, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fiftie years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

Ann. de Hetrus. Pisa de aut. seculo. Cato de origin. Lavin. illust. de Gall. Joseph. l. 1.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Iavan, the fourth son of Iapheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Iavan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the son of Madea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes though they were descended of a farre more ancient Father, (to wit) Madai the third son of Iapheth.

Erec. 27. 19, 13. and so the place of Esay 66. 19. (for Javan) Hellada: and (for the plural Javanim) Hellena.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish Language hath remained among us above 2000. yeeres, and the English speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italie his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have beene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are meerely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Græcian Janus which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fift King: which also Saint Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camasena) the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleeve that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungratefull, to set up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any Ceremonie, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his son TOGORMA of the Posterity of JAPHETH, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spred Westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turne now to the sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Floud: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplyed in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: becaus the Land was yet Desart, and over-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldæa, downe the River of Gehon, by which he might passe to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa neer the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the same river get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: becaus the Dominion and Empire, was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppresst, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and son of Cush, tooke both Bankes of Tygris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Havilah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desart, where Ptolomie placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Ptol. Asia. Tab. 4.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia fœlix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Persian gulfe, which washeth the bankes of Arabia fœlix on the East side: so as those sons of Cush might take Land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Citie of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said river of Tygris, and from thence a Colonie past to Charran, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japheths sons settle themselves together, and tooke their seates in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, sate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palæstina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spred themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatian. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnesse Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountaines about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a City of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion, but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the unhealthfull waters savouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

Lib. 4.

The children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meschech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolomie calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaines Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaines Moschici, and the Mountaines Pariardes: out of whose North part springeth the River Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meschech are descended also the Moscovians (saith Melanæthon) and it may be, that in processe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanæthon) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth.

forth. Togorma alſo at firſt did inhabit amongſt his parents and kindred: The Togormians were alſo called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phœnicia, the ſame which Plinie calleth Caben: from whence Solomon had his moſt excellent Maſons, which hewed ſtones for the Temple of Hieruſalem. Thence the Togormians ſtretched into the leſſe Armenia, whoſe Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokartæ: of which Cities Tigranes, ſubdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hieroſolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary; forgetting the propheſie of Ezekiel againſt the Tyrians: They of the houſe of Togorma, brought to thy Faires, horſes, and horſe-men, and mules; which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Ioſephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not deny, but they might be in the enſuing ages: and ſo might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iews conceive that the Turkes came of thoſe Togormians, becauſe their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldæans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turks deſcended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muſcovia. But for theſe ſubderivations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the firſt and ſecond plantation, and of the firſt Nations after the floud, is the matter which I labour to diſcover; and therein to open the ignorance of ſome, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we muſt Note, that thoſe grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of leſſe underſtanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies ſent out, their proper habitations could be hardly knowne: onely reaſon hath taught us, that they dwelt among the reſt, and were covered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion over the reſt.

Of Javan the forth ſon of Japheth: and of Meſceh of Aram, and Meſhech of Japheth.

OF Iavan the fourth ſon of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and ſo the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Iavan write Greece, as in Eſay: Et mittam ex iis qui ſalvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will ſend thoſe that eſcape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Geneva here uſeth the word (Tarſhiſh) for Tarſus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarſis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva uſe the names Tubal and Iavan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the ſame Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themſelves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Anceſters, and growing (as it were) out of the ſoile it ſelfe: who abounding in people, ſent Colonies into Aſia the leſſe, of whom came the Iones of thoſe parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the ſon of Xuthus, the ſon of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iavan mars the faſhion of that ſuppoſition, who ſo many yeeres preceded Xuthus, Ion or Deucalion. Pauſanias tels us that Xuthus ſtole out of Theſſaly with all his Fathers treaſure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciouſly received by Erictheus, who gave him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he received two ſons Ion and Achæus, the ſuppoſed Anceſters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, ſaith Plutarch in the life of Theſeus;) who, when he had joyned Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Iſthmos or Strait, which faſteneth Peloponneſus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the Eaſt, theſe words: Hæc non ſunt Peloponneſus, ſed Ionia; Theſe Countries are not Peloponneſus, but of Ionia: and on the other ſide which looked towards the South, and into Peloponneſus, this: Theſe parts are Peloponneſus, and not Ionia.

Touryd.

Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth that the Iones came out of Aſia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece tranſporting certaine companies into Aſia the leſs, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themſelves, yet I find this conjecture of Hecatæus reaſonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet ſure I am that Aſia the leſs had people before Greece had any: and that Iavan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the neereſt way, leaving his own name to some maritimate Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleeved, that Ionia tooke the name from Ion the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite unto them, which they held for divers yeeres. And howsoever the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested betweene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Iustine out of Trogus, in the warre between Vexorus of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all salvages, without law or religion, living like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) lived together with Moses.

Lib.18. de Civ. Dei, c.10.

The sixth son of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosech: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betweene Mesech the son of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosech) the son of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Mesech, the son of Aram, Mes; the Geneva, Mash; Iunius, Mesch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalme: that either Meshech the son of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Mesch the son of Aram. For David bewayling his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Mesech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius converteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenitæ Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldæan otherwise, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asianis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I have travailed among those of Asia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petræa; and the Chaldæan putteth Asia in stead of Mesech, but the Hebrew it selfe hath Mesech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mesh the son of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Meshech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Meshech or Mesh, both bordering Judæa, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Mesech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mesech out of the word Mosoch (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. Sure I am that David never travelled so far North; (for to him Muscovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a city on the mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosoch the Father of the Muscovians: and herein also Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mesech in Muscovia, though with some better advice of judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travailing Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalme, (Hei mihi quòd exulo in Mesech) to signifie, Gentis ejus feritatem insignem esse; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenesse or brutality of the Muscovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northern Muscovians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fiercenesse to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being foreshewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. *v.*12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedræi Southward, both which joyne together upon the Nabathæi. So it appeareth (as before before) that Meſech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Iſrael, and that Kedar alſo did joyn to Meſech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Aſia the leſs, commanded by the ſucceſſours of Seleucus, enemies of the re-eſtabliſhment of Iſrael and Juda. But (as I have already ſaid) it might well be, that long after the firſt plantation the iſſue of Meſech (or Moſoch) might paſs into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the mountains Moſchici in the other, and from thence might ſend people more northerly into Muſcovia, and ſo all opinions ſaved. But all ſalvage nations over-grown & uncultivated, do (for the moſt part) ſhew a late plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witneſſe antiquity.

Psal.120.v.5.

Gen.25.13.

Tyras, the ſeventh ſon of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the ſons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Joſephus was the firſt that determined hereof: and becauſe the Scriptures are altogether ſilent, what part of the world Tyras peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of diſpute. It followeth now to ſpeak of the Sonnes of Gomer, which were three, of Aſcanez and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Aſcanez, Riphath, and Togorma.

Mont. in Chr.

§ VIII.

Aſcanez was the Father of thoſe which the Greeks call Regini, (ſaith Joſephus) but he gives no reaſon why.

Euſebius makes Aſcanez the Father of the Goths. The Jewes in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their expoſitions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Aſcania in Phrygia, near the Rivers of Hilas and Cios: Melanchton being of the ſame opinion, that the Tuiſcones were deſcended of the Aſcanez: (for Tuiſcones, ſaith he, is as much to ſay, as of the Aſcanez, præpoſito articulo die Aſcanez) and that the word ſignifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient ſuperſtition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the lake Aſcania, known by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the ſuccour of Troy, was Aſcanius (Deo ſimilis, ſaith Homer) like unto God: becauſe he was beautifull and ſtrong: for in the ſame manner doth Virgil grace Æneas, Os humeroſq; Deo ſimilis; in face and body like one of the gods: Virgil alſo remembreth ſuch a River, together with the Hils Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſq; ſonantem Aſcanium; Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara, & the roaring Aſcanius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the deſcription of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Erillion upon the River Aſcanius, which is adjoyning to Myſia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the lake Aſcanez he directs us to finde by the deſcription of Pruſia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Pruſia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this lake lieth, even between Pruſia and Nicea. And ſo Iunius (as I conceive him) takes them of Aſcanez, to be the inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and thoſe North parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Vrbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas: ſaying, that there was another of that name in Myſia. Of Aſcania a lake of Bithynia, Ptolomy witneſſeth: and Strabo giveth Aſcania both a Lake, a River, and a Town in Myſia, neer unto Cio; which alſo agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Pruſia (before ſpoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Iſlands before Troy, Aſcanes.

Melanch. in Car. lib. 1.

Hom. Iliad. 2

Virg. Georg. l. 3.

Now, whether theſe places took name of Aſcanez the ſon of Gomer, or of Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas, it might be queſtioned: ſure it is, that Aſcanius which brought ſuccour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Æneas ſonne, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it ſeemeth that the Countries whence thoſe ſuccours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myſia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Aſia the leſs, which by Hieremy is called Aſcanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of thoſe teſtimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy wee ſhall learne of what Nation the Aſcanez were, whoſe words are theſe: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the trumpet among the Nations againſt her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Aſcanez, C. 51. v. 27.

against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the mountains of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name, (saith Junius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palæstina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the story of Jacob and Esau, and call it Aram-Padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians and Ascanez joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoile of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Askenez Germany or Almaine: for we hear of no swart Ruttiers at that siege. But the Askenez were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who cals them Rhegini; or of the Iewes, who will have them to be Almaines; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will think as they doe.

Of Riphath the second son of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius think that he wandered far off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his Plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might seat himself with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no room or soyle in those dayes for all the Sons and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greeks afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polae: which being first called Riphei (for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, desirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soyle of fruit and wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land between the Baltick and Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possest of Lituania and Polonia, disturbed the plantation of the Boii and Hermonduri. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Riphath, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembred, chiefly between the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth wandering or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by white-meats and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Melanch. in Carion.

Of the third son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Iavans children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of foure sonnes of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea,

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Helenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iavan, it is probable that the Æoles and the Elei took name of Elisa his eldest son. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa, Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis Elisæ facta sunt operimentum tuum: blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was their covering. The Chaldæans for Elisa, write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius, keep the word Elisa: and so I think they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italy in

in those daies, nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better conjecture the Iles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Getulia.

Tharsis, the second Son of Iavan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldæan Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Solomon went every 3. yeares to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldæan Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Solomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esion-Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, near unto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petræa, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sailed to the higher part of the East India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three years in the passage between Iudæa and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been sailed in six or ten dayes. And if so great riches might have bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that trade also. But this enterprise of Solomon is in this sort written of in the 1. of Kings: Also King Solomon made a Navy of Ships in Esion-Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brink of the Red Sea in the land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Navy his servants, that were mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we use it ordinarily wheresoever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out every year, or every three year to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it self. But in this place, Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chief City in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second son of Iavan, or by his Successours in memory of their first Parent. To this City arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himself into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extream fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sons inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adjoyning) Iavan, who was to pass over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gave the Islands between Asia the lesse and Greece to Elisa, and left Tharsis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third son of Iavan was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and signifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esay 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab Esai prædicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, ventiros esse eversores Tyri ex terra Cittim; This calamity (saith Melanchton) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, saith Beroaldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophesie which took effect by the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, who after 7. moneths siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seven thousand principall Citizens; strangled 2. thousand, and changed the freedom of 13. thousand others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainely in the first of the Maccabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the City Citium, the Countrie of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesse Laertius;) which City Pintus upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in S. Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too straight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his father and brothers, he sent Colonies over the Ægean Sea, & inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) sate down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirme. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far less Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epyrus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance not so ancient as Dodanim himself, yet his Posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successours many years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerours newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestours, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldæa, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sons of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travailed Southward in Arabia fælix, & Southwestward into Arabia Petræa: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palæstina adjoyning. The sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the sons of Cham or Ham; which were four:

Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

‖. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalme, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great City in Thebaida, called Cheranis: (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will adde some farther proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desart: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate down all together. And there is nothing which so well cleereth this Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nabuchodonozor's Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chush for Æthiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appeare that Josephus was grosly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus presuming that Chush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. v. 1. is called a woman of Chush) was a woman of the land of Æthiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Æthiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Father's City; and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lieth thus in Josephus. After he hath described the strength of the Æthiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desidere exercitum otiosum ægrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum Regi filia nomine Tharbis, &c. which tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to hand-strokes, there happened this accident in the mean while. The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given, beheld the person of Moses, and withal admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; Which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

A dispute against the tale of Josephus.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia it self to have been the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabæans are Arabians, and not Æthiopians; except Josephus can perswade us, that the Queen of Saba which came from the South to hear the wisdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or Black-moor. And though Damianus à Goes speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John, of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perswade the Portugals, that he was descended of the Queen of Saba and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it bin true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem his Brother (the Son of Saba and Solomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprize, as also given aid and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to have bin an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the daughter of Jethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and neer Esion-Gaber, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa joyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petræa by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived forty years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exod. the second; Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his Father in Law Priest of Madian, and drave the Flock to the Desart, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrie and friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or, Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianites. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people first and last. For Moses, sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

V. 15.

Exod. 2.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Iethro had been an Æthiopian, it had beene a farre progress for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petræa (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandred forty years, and did by these late travails of his, seek to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milk of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiff plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Desarts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysamensis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Zephora: His own words have this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceive these things feigned by them? for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that joyneth to Arabia: So far Chrysamensis.

Chush ill expounded for Æthiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

NOw as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Æthiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Æthiopissa: so in the conquest of Nebuchodonosor is Æthiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nebuchodonosor was never in Æthiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come upon upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waſte and deſolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the blacke-Moores: which laſt words ſhould have beene thus converted: From the Tower Seveneh to the borders of the Chuſites or Arabians betweene which two is ſituated all Egypt. For to ſay, from the borders of Seveneh to the Æthiopians, hath no ſenſe at all, Seveneh it ſelfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Æthiopia, or the Land of the blacke-Moores. So as if Nabuchodonoſors conqueſt had beene but betweene Seveneh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to ſay, and did expreſſe no other victory than the conqueſt of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middleſex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyne together; or all the North parts of England betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the ſame ſenſe with the former, if any man ſought to expreſs by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, ſeated in Thebaida, which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonoſor never entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Æthiopia for Chuſh.

‖. IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. verſ. 9. in the like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezechiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort converted: In die illa egredientur nuncii à facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in Engliſh by the Geneveans: In that day ſhall there Meſſengers goe forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſſe Moores affraid. Now the Latine for (ſhips) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three bankes, and not ſhips. But that in this place the Tranſlation ſhould have been (as in the former) amended by uſing the word Chuſh or Arabia for Æthiopia or the black-Moores, every man may ſee which meanly underſtandeth the Geography of the world, knowing that to paſſe out of Egypt into Æthiopia there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to paſſe out of Northampton into Leiceſterſhire: Æthiopia being the conterminate Region with Egypt, and not divided ſo much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonoſor ſhould ſend Gallies alongſt the coaſt of the Red Sea, by which an Army might be tranſported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (ſparing the long wearifom march over all Egypt, and the Deſart of Pharan) which Army might thereby ſurpriſe them unawares in their ſecurity and confidence. For when Nabuchodonoſor was at Seveneh within a mile of Æthiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to paſſe into it; being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, than one In-land ſhire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleaſure, he could not have done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and ſteepy Mountaines) called Cataduрæ Nili, were at hand.

Laſtly, as I have already obſerved, the ſons of every father ſeated themſelves as neer together as poſſibly they could, Gomer and his ſons in Aſia the leſſe; Javen and his ſons in Greece, and the Iſlands adjoyning; Shem in Perſia and Eaſtward. So the Sons and Grand-children of Chuſh from the River of Gehon (their Fathers firſt ſeate) inhabited upon the ſame, or upon ſome other contiguat unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one ſide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the reſt) did on the other ſide. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had never acquaintance or fellowſhip, any warre, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Æthiopian black-Moores, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradiſe.

‖. V.

A place, Eſay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chuſh for Æthiopia.

AND as in theſe places before remembred, ſo in divers others is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia or Chuſh, which puts the ſtory (where it is ſo underſtood) quite out of ſquare; one Kingdom therby being taken for another. For what ſenſe hath this part of of Scripture, Esay 18. Væ terræ Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Æthiopiæ; or according to the Septuagint in these words: Væ terræ navium alarum quæ est trans fluvios Æthiopiæ, Woe to the land shaddowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadours by sea, even the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Væ terræ umbrosæ oræ; Woe to the Land of the shadie coast, saith Iunius. The former Translators understand it in this sense; That the waters are shaddowed with the sails, which are significatively called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shaddowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Esay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Esay repeateth, and by the former translation every man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next unto Judæa, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeed that lyeth between Judæa and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated under the Equinoctiall Line. And of this, Beroaldus asketh a material question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, & placeth it beyond the rivers of Æthiopia. Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now if Æthiopia it self be under the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledg of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

||. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the story of Senacherib, and Zera in the story of Asa are unadvisedly made Æthiopians.

AND by this translation is the story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retrait. For Senacherib was first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judæa: when having certaine knowledge that Thirrhaca, (which all the Interpreters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himselfe: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatning Messengers to Ezechia King of Juda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabsekeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those cities in Judæa & Benjamin with a third Army, (which himself commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus calls Tharsices) Rabsakeh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthoropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Jerusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largly written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Iews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacheribs knowledge, that the Armie which was a foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Iews) marched towards him by the way of the Desart: Now the Desart which lay indifferent between Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part: the Desart, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desart between Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet beene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, ver. the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense have all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse:

Joseph. l.10.c.1.

2 Kings 19.

Antiq.l.10.
2 Kings 19.

Lib.10.c.1.

He

He heard alſo men ſay of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia &c. whereas it ſhould have been thus converted with Iunius : Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chuſbi; He heard alſo of Thirrhakeh King of the Chuſhites. For they were the Chuſhites and Arabians, whoſe houſes and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very ſmoake of Iuda flaming was blown, being their neereſt Neighbours : and ſo were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors under the Equinoctial, whom neither war nor peace (which diſcovereth all Regions) ever found out, ſaith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Aſa King of Iuda, with an Army of a Million, and three thouſand Chariots. Indeed, how ſuch an Army and thoſe Chariots ſhould paſs through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how theſe Regions are ſeated, and how far diſtant, judge. For Princes do not eaſily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever ſuch ſtrength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elſewhere. Neither are theſe Æthiopians ſuch travailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah alſo called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chuſh being firſt ſo converted for Æthiopia, the reſt of the Interpreters (not looking into the ſeats of Kingdoms, or the poſſibilities of attempts, or invaſions) followed one another in the former miſtakings.

Plin. l. 5. c. 91.

2 Chron. c. 14.

‖. VII.

A farther expoſition of the place, Eſay 18:1.

COncerning theſe words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſay, Navium alarum, Winged Ships, (ſo the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) ſayls whiſtling in the winds, or terræ umbroſæ oræ (after Iunius) the Land of a ſhadowed coaſt, or, the Land ſhadowing with wings, as our Engliſh Geneva hath it. The two firſt interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome, have one ſenſe in effect. For the ſailes are commonly called the wings of a ſhip; and we uſe to ſay ordinarily when our ſhips ſaile ſlowly, that ſhe wanteth wings : (that is) when her ſails are either worn or too narrow: and we alſo uſe the ſame phraſe of the winde whiſtling in the ſails. And it may be that the Egyptians imployed ſo many of thoſe ſmall ſhips, as their ſails were ſaid to give a ſhadow over the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Eſay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth ſignifie both to ſhadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline ſound : ſo as the meaning of this place (ſaith Pintus) is this : Wo to thee, O Egypt, which doſt promiſe to others ſafeguard, under the ſhadow of thy wings; which (indeed) ſeemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Eſay : and this phraſe is often elſewhere uſed, as in the ſixteenth Pſalm : Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the ſhadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reede ſpoken of are of two kinds; either of baſket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built upon both ſides with Canes. Of the one ſort I have ſeen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

‖. I.

That Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt : and the reſt of the ſons of Ham, were ſeated in order one by another.

THe ſecond ſon of Ham was Mizraim; (who according to the place of a ſecond brother) was ſent ſomewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chuſh firſt poſſeſt Chaldæa on the Weſt ſide of Gehon chiefly : and from thence, as he increaſed in people, ſo he entred Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the Southeaſt ſide of Iudæa. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) paſt over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thruſt farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coaſt, and held the ſide of Palæſtina : and theſe foure brothers poſſeſt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldæa, as far to the Weſt as the Mediterran Sea : comprehending all Arabia Deſerta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilæa, Samaria, and and Judæa; with the two Egypts, whereof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterran Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopians or black Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their sons again, and all the sons of the rest of Noahs children, sort themselves.

‖. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeers, which made their antiquities seem more fabulous.

THis flourishing Kingdom possest by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some think) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeers after the Floud, in the time of Josua, as S. Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odysses it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who consumed 393 yeers. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the Floud. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grosly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon faineth, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330 Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeares; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Iupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

> Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.
> The Arcadians the earth inhabited
> Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Iove was bred.

But for those 13000. years it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their yeers by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. yeers, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary yeers to have been of the first kinde of 27. daies and eight hours; or otherwise 29. daies and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary yeers.

‖. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Floud: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Floud: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeers after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastia (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to have been in the yeare of the World 1846. which Euſebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynaſtia was begun but in the 292 yeers after the Floud, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynaſtia to endure 115. yeers, Euſebius reckoneth many of them at leſſe than 100. yeers: for the 28. had but ſixe yeers, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeers.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all theſe 15. Dynaſties laſted but 162. yeers: and that the firſt of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the floud: ſo as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the floud, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the floud, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falſhood cannot be hidden, though diſguiſed. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and aſſertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod, with the ſons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: ſo he forgets the time which was conſumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confuſion of Speech there was no diſperſion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he haſtily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spaine, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrival into Babilonia) yet herein he is more unadviſed. For he makes Egypt poſſeſt, and a government eſtabliſhed in the very firſt yeere of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition far off or neere in queſtion: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord ſcatter them upon all the earth.

‖. IV.

Againſt Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at leaſt, that both it, and the moſt parts of the World were peopled before the Floud.

But whereas Pererius ſeeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynaſties, (which Euſebius doth not altogether deſtroy, but leſſen) I do not find any great ſtrength in this opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impoſſible that Egypt ſhould be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the firſt Age. And whereas he ſuppoſeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Floud, I do verily beleeve the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all World was then peopled: Pererius his words are theſe; Quomodo enim priſtos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum uſq; habitandum & complendum propagata ſit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be ſo multiplied in the firſt two hundred, or in the firſt hundred yeers of the World, and ſo propagated as to inhabite and fill Egypt? for allowing this (ſaith Pererius) we muſt alſo confeſſe, that there were then both the Aſſyrians and other Nations.

Now ſeeing that the Scriptures are ſilent herein, and that it is no point of our ſaving beleefe, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like queſtions by the beſt reaſon, circumſtance, and likelyhood; and herein, as in the reſt, I proteſt that I do not gainſay any mans opinion out of any croſſing or cavilling humours: for I thinke it the part of every Chriſtian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is poſſibilty of of union, than out of froward ſubtlety, and prejudicate reſolvedneſſe, to maintaine factions needleſſe, and dangerous contentions.

Firſt therefore, for this opinion, that Egypt was not planted ſo ſoone after Adam, no, not at all before the Floud, I ſay, that there is no reaſon why we ſhould give a leſſe increaſe to the ſons of Adam, than to the ſons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded thoſe which came after the Floud double, and (after a few yeers) treble, is an infallible proof of their ſtrength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they obſerved no degrees of kindred, nor conſanguinity. And that there was a ſpeedy increaſe of people, and in great numbers, it may in ſome ſort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would have beene revenged on him) withdrew himſelfe from the reſt, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne iſſues, built a City, (called Enoch) after the name of his firſt-borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with ſo many multitudes, as ſufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increaſe there was given but 130. yeeres by Beroſus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly underſtood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah,Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age,when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years,the same (if not a greater)number might be increased;and so within 70.years after (that is,by such time as the World had stood 200.years) as well Assyria, Syria,and Egypt might be possest before the floud, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first 100. or 130. years after the floud,came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himself came out of the East,as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it self denies it. Again,those multitudes and powerfull numbers which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India,considered with her own Army of three millions,(and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) do well prove,that if the World had such plenty of people in so few years after the floud, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account,Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. years after the floud of Noah.And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdomes,from Media to the Mediterran Sea;when there had now past from the floud to the time of this her invasion somewhat less or more than 360. years: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confess,that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Army,and the incredible multitudes gathered,this is as short a time as can well be given.And if but one half be true of that which is said,That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reign, the greatest part of Asia(whence her huge Army was gathered)was full of people:yea Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren)must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled;when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations,entred(notwithstanding)in league with the King thereof:whom therefore he either feared,or sought his assistance.And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleeve Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Justine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent nation before Ninus was born.For these be his own words,speaking of Ninus:Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Ægypti,&c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians:of which the one invaded Pontus,the other Egypt.And how full of people all that part of the World was,the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes,and afterward the Bactrians; yea,all that whole body of Asia on this side India.For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbreth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster,at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen:& the stories generally shew,that though Zoroasters Army was far short of this,yet it was greater than any that those parts of the world ever since beheld.But to what end should I seek for forreign authority? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was possest by Mizraim, the son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time,the Scriptures tell us.And sure,to prepare and cultivea desolate and overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few daies:and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200.years after the floud;and in the same time(if not in a shorter)before the floud. For if so many millions of men were found within 300. yeares after the generall floud;so as not onely Babylon,and Assyria,Bactria,Armenia,Media,Arabia,Egypt,Palæstina, yea the far-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other,and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be compresst,which 1656. years brought forth before the floud? even necessity, which cannot be resisted,cast the aboundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known world;especially where death forbare the father,and made no place for the son,till he had beheld living Nations of his own body.

Of ſome other reaſons againſt the opinion of Pererius.

FOr what a ſtrange increaſe did the long lives of the firſt Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. years? Surely we have reaſon to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather than that they were not ſpread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50. years, ten for one are cut off in that paſſage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay we know the multitude ſuch, as if by Wars or peſtilence they were not ſometimes taken off by many thouſands, the earth with all the induſtry of man could not give them food. What ſtrange heaps then of ſouls had the firſt Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. years, as aforeſaid? Theſe numbers, I ſay, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the ſame reckoning in effect, as if all thoſe which have been borne in Brittaine ſince 3. or 4. hundred years before the Norman Conqueſt (ſaving ſuch as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to theſe there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increaſed. For (to omit, that the Gyants and mighty ones of the firſt Age obſerved no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that thoſe lovers of the World and of pleaſure, when they knew the long and liberall time which nature had given them, would not willingly or haſtily preſent themſelves to any danger which they could fly from or eſchew. For what humane argument hath better perſwaſion to make men careleſs of life, and fearleſs of death, than the little time which keeps them aſunder, and that ſhort time alſo accompanied with ſo many pains and diſeaſes, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and ſoweth with the ſeeds of mankinde?

Now if that Beroſus or Annius may be alledged for ſufficient Authours, whom Pererius himſelfe in this queſtion citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Joſephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was ſeated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I ſee no cauſe why Palæſtina (which is alſo a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left deſolate both all the life time of Cain, and all thoſe times between his death and the Floud, which were by eſtimation 700. or 800. years. And ſure though this fragment of Beroſus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or loſt) yet all things in Beroſus are not to be rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome, for ſuch Authors gives a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us chooſe what is good in them, and reject the reſt. And certainly in the very beginning of the firſt Book, Beroſus agreeth (in effect) with Moſes, touching the generall Floud: and in that firſt part Beroſus affirmeth, that thoſe mighty men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and ſubjected the univerſal World: and though that phraſe (of all the World) be often uſed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the ſecond of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hieruſalem Jewes, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by the words which follow in Beroſus, it is plain, that his words and ſenſe were the ſame: for he addeth, from the Suns riſing to the Suns ſetting; which cannot be taken for any ſmall part thereof. Again, we may ſafely conjecture that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his ſons at adventure, or left them as Diſcoverers, but directed them to thoſe Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more paſſable and eaſie to travail over before the floud, than after it. For Pererius himſelf confeſſeth, that Attica (by reaſon of mud and ſlime which the water left upon the earth) was uninhabited 200. years after Ogyges floud; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleaſure in paſſing into far Countries, after the generall deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) incopſed for 100. or 130. years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautifull, and leſs cumberſome to walk over, in the firſt Age, than after the generall overflowing.

‖. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LAstly, whereas Pererius drawes this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the Floud: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Floud; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: The Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the floud; inferring, that before the floud the nations were divided out of others, though after the floud out of these onely. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the floud, or to any plantation or division in that age: for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the floud, but Noahs sons, wherein doth that necessary division controul the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general plantation: as Berosus saies well, that when mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. years after the Floud, there were gathered together into two Armies such multitudes, as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palæstina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleeve Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World, but (within 140. years after the floud) Spain, Italy and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the floud, in the time of the chief strength of mankinde, they were replenished with people. And certainly, seeing all the world was overflown, there were people in all the World which offended.

Lib. 3.

‖. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Ægyptian antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another son of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

THerefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the floud, and 200. or 300. years more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of stone or mettall) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the floud, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldæans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634. years before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. years before the floud, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his comming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterran Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the forme of the Greek letter Delta, which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-eaſt and imbraced the Sea, next unto the Deſarts of Sur & Pharan, had on it the City of Peluſium, where Senacherib was repulſed: The other branch, which yeelded it ſelf to the Salt-water towards the North-eaſt, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Æthiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates, and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Dioſpolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which ſignifieth multitudes of inhabitants, exceeding belief. Joſephus calls Egypt Merſin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais. Ioſ. l. 1. Ant. c. 7. Hiero. Epiſtle.

Phut the third ſonne of Ham took the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whoſe people were anciently called Phutei, (ſaith Joſephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the mountain Atlas (known to the inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be diſtant the ſpace of two hundred miles. It alſo appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chuſh, and Lud were contermini and aſſociates with the Egyptians. L. 5. c. 1.

§. XII.

Of the e'even Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

‖. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sonnes.

CAnaan (the fourth ſon of Ham) poſſeſt all that Region called by the Romanes Paleſtina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Judæa; in the later times knowne by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are preciſely ſet downe by Moſes, Geneſis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goeſt to Gerar untill Azzah, and as thou goeſt unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Laſha. Now howſoever theſe words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goeſt) be converted, Moſes meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrah the Eaſt, and the other Cities named, ſtood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar ſtandeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermoſt Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the ſons of Canaan which poſſeſt this Country, and inhabited ſome part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebuſi or Jebuſæus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgeſhi or Girgeſeus.
6. Hevi or Chiveus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Sinæus.
9. Arvadi or Arvadæus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamatheus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the moſt renowned were the Hethites, Gergeſites, Amorites, Hevites, Iebuſites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were deſcended of Zemari or Samareus, or from ſome of his.

‖. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

ZIdon the firſt borne of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Aſſer: for Aſſer, Zabulon, and Nepthali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia diſtributed among them; but the Aſſerites could never obtain Zidon it ſelf.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Gen.10.19. Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, Gen.23. having the Desart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus juramenti) four miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs buriall.
Gen.27.46. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Kin.7.6. nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

‖. III.
Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebuseus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Country near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amoreus was the fourth son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Iordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the mountains of Galaad on the East, and Iordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Cœlosyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their be-Deut.1. Num.13. ing in the mountaines of Iuda, and in Idumæa near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full.
Amos 2. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and hee was strong as the Oak.

‖. IIII.
Of the Gergesites, Hevites, and Harkites.

THe fift son of Canaan was Gergesius, or Gergeson, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomy sets the City Gerasa, which Iosephus calls Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possessed with devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: becausse their swine, filled with the evill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeseus also built Beritus (sometime Geris) afterward Fælix Iulia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large priviledges.

Hevens the sixth son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the War of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Iudges the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the commandements of God.

The seventh sonne was Araceus or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

‖. V.

‖. V.
Of Sini and Arvadi.

SIneus the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorsa, which Ptolomy finds in Judæa, not far from Jebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome cals Sim: Ptolomy, Simyra: Mela and Pliny, Simyrus: Brochard, Sycon; (called Synochis) neer Arca. Pererius thinkes that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Sinochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini written with the letter C. (otherwise Kenæi) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinæi were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinæi, Balaam prophecied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians. Judg. 4. Jos. 19.33.

The ninth son was Aradeus or Arvadeus, who in the Isle of Aradus built the City Arados: opposite against which Island on the Maine of Phœnicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of Skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners. Gal. Tyr. Vit. Cap. 27. v. 8.

‖. VI.
Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth son, there are divers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Cœlosyria at Edessa, and founded Samarsim, which in Josua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarajim (of the same orthography) upon the Mountaine of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chr. c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amisse (saith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Pliny cals the Hemisseni, in Cœlosyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the 1 of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountain Samaria or Shemeron of one Shemar, for two talents of Silver, and built in the Mountaine; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jewes stood up, they alwayes called themselves Jewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then utterly denyed to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturals. Beroal. in Chro. l. 4. 1 Kin. 16.28.

‖. VII.
Of Hamathi.

THe last of Canaans sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath, (saith Beroaldus:) of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present. Josephus and S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountaine Cassius and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betweene

Apamea

Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea betweene it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces Laodicea and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Josua is directly proved. For Josua counting the lands that remained unpossest, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sun-rising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because David accepted the pre-2 *Sam.*8.9. sents of Tohu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be
*Cap.*11.*v.*24. considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the land promised, according to the description of Moses and Josua: for Emath is indeed situate on the other side of the Mountain of Hermon, which joyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Josua 19. *v.*35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the Mountaines, and the City in Nephtalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephtalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Assedim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath; Josephus, Hamah; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people
*Cap.*18. & 19. Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabsakeh vaunteth in the second of Kings. Where is the god of Hamath?

§. XIII.

Of the sons of Chush (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.

The Sons of Chush were, { Sheba, Havila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the Sons of Raama were, { Sheba, and Dedan. }

‖. I.

That most of the sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Job: and of the Queene that came to Solomon.

SEba or Saba was the eldest son of Chush, the eldest son of Ham; to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama or Regma, (or Ragma after Montanus:) his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the son of Regma with an (S) asperat, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest son of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the son of Regma, possest both the shores of Arabia fœlix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neerest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chushites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabæi, Arabum populi, propter thura clarissimi ad utraq; maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabæans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, à populi mixtione, saith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolomy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the Citie Rhegama towards the Persian; with whom also we may leave Sabta: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomy, because becauſe he remembreth a Nation (called Stabæi) neere the Perſian Sea; and Maſſabathæ which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or (as he cals him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Joſephus, who onely attended his owne fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it ſtrange, that the Sabæi, which ſtole away Jobs Cattle, ſhould runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petræa, and finde out Job in Traconitis, betweene Paleſtina and Cœloſyria, 1200. miles off. Now, as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, ſo do I thinke, that neither the Sabæi on the Red Sea, nor thoſe toward the Perſian Sea, could by any meanes execute the ſtealth upon Job, which ſoever Beroaldus ſhall take for neereſt. But theſe were the Sabæi of Arabia the Deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his own experience, that the Citie Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolomy calls Save, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Deſart, came thoſe Magi or Wiſe men, which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe words are theſe: The Magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtome, Hierome, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wiſe men doe beleeve, but out of Saba in Arabia the Deſart: which City, when my ſelfe was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that theſe Sabæi were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well thoſe on the Perſian Sea, as thoſe on the Red Sea) are ſo diſ-joyned with large Deſarts, as there is no poſſibilitie for ſtrangers to paſſe them, eſpecially with any numbers of Cattell, both in reſpect of the mountains, of the ſands, and of the extreme want of water in thoſe parts: Ubi nec homines, nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, ſed non niſi montes ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, aſperimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beaſts, no not ſo much as birds, or trees, nor any paſture or graſſe, but onely ſharpe, and high, ſtonie, and craggie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive, that the Queen of Saba which came to viſit Solomon, was of the Sabæi on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia fœlix; but the contrarie ſeemeth more probable, and that ſhe was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, betwixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as far downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queene of Saba, which inhabited the Weſt part of Arabia Fœlix, being his neighbour, might without any far travell enter his Territories, free from all danger of ſurpriſe by any other Prince or Nation.

But to avoid tediouſneſs, it is manifeſt that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sons Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the poſſeſſors of Arabia the Happy, and the Deſart: onely Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the Eaſt ſide of Chuſh, who held Arabia Petræa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the City of Sabbatha or Sabota in the ſame Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomy; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the wals whereof there were ſometimes found ſixtie Temples. Ezechiel joyneth the Father and the ſon together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Eaſtern Arabians, their merchandiſe witneſſeth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradiſe. For Joſephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Aſtabari, they be not worthy any farther anſwer than hath already beene given: eſpecially ſeeing theſe Cities, preſerving the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in ſome letters changed. As alſo in the coaſts adjoyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cuſh, with little alterations are preſerved. In Arabia the Deſart is found the City Sabæ or Save, (now Semiſcaſac) with the Citie of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomy himſelf called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citie of Rhegama, & Rabana; which alſo keepeth the ſound of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the Eaſt-coaſt of Arabia: as alſo the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the bodie of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the Weſt of Sabatha towards the Red Sea, the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adjoyning, Sabæi; and to the South thereof againe toward the ſtreight enterance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all theſe his brothers and nephewes which were ſea ed on the Eaſt ſide of Arabia, Havilah by the paſſage of Tygris was a neighbour, to whom he might paſſe by Boate even unto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, ſet neere the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Perſian Sea, which ſtood in Ptolomies time.

‖. II.

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have beene seated in the West Æthiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

AND whereas Josephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the son of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezech. should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) above foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Æthiopians never saw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrie being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or iron chiefly.

But in those dayes, the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the Negroes of the West Æthiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterran Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet; let us heare Hieremy his owne words: Fly, ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Esau upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Province of Arabia Petræa: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia fœlix, joyned in that part to Petræa, the seat of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumæans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

AFter Chush, it followeth to speake of Mizraims sons, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the son of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud; the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who joyned them in this sort together: Come up yee Horses, and race ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Blacke-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joyned together. Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel, c.30. v.3. and Phut, and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush, (which were the Chusites) the sons of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeve it: because Hieremy joyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to bee called Lubim or Lubæi, a name somewhat neere the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) underſtandeth that which is ſpoken in the third Verſe of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatning to be meant againſt the people of Lyda, a City (ſaith he) between Egypt and Palæſtina, which opinion I could not miſlike, if the City of Lyda were ſo ſeated. But Lyda (which ſhould be written Lydda with a double D, and is the ſame City which was afterward Doiſpolis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the palſey) ſtandeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not far from Joppe the Port of Hieruſalem. Yet it is not impoſſible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and far aſunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, ſo of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third ſon of Mizraim: and ſo doth Poſtellus; and either opinion may be true.

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plural number, as eim, of the dual.

The reſt of Mizraims ſons have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, ſaving Caſſuhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philiſtims, whom the Scriptures call Peleſet.

Theſe Caſſuhim inhabited Caſſiotis, a Region lying in the enterence of Egypt from Paleſtina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Caſſius are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim ſeated neer Caſſuhim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrotis, not far from Peluſium. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the ſame which Ptolomy calls Hercules parva. Of the Caſſuhim and Caphtorim came the Philiſtims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a ſtrange kindred. Theſe Philiſtims inhabtied the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palæſtina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (ſaith Iſidore) doe not uſe the letter (P) but in ſtead of it (ph.) Their principall Cities were Gaza, Aſcalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gaſæi, Aſcalonitæ, Azotii, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ: Iſidore affirmes, that Aſcalon was firſt called Philiſtim: and of that City the Country adjoyning. But where Iſidore had it, I know not.

The firſt knowne King of the Philiſtims, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was alſo King of the Philiſtims, in theſe words: Wherefore Iſaac went to Abimelech King of the Philiſtims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or ſome ancienter Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glory, the reſt of his ſucceſſors called themſelves by the ſame name. The Philiſtims commanded that Tract of Land upon the mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Caſtle of Pilgrims (otherwiſe Cæſarea Palæſtinæ, or Stratons Tower) which was the South border of Phœnicia, to Gaſa, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or ſtrong Gyants were of theſe Philiſtins: and Goliah was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had ſomtimes five Kings, ſaith Lyranus. They maſtered the Iſraelites at ſeverall times above 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampſon and Samuel; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themſelves.

It is objected, that becauſe theſe Cities and the Countries adjoyning, were held by the ſons of Mizraim, therefore did the Iſraelites diſpoſſeſſe the ſons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing thoſe places.

To this ſaith Pererius, that although the Palæſtines or Philiſtims held it in the time of Joſua, yet at the time of the promiſe it was poſſeſt by the Canaanites; as in the ſecond of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvell, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philiſtims were of Caphtor, and ſo of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, beſides Moſes, the Prophet Hieremy witneſſeth: The Lord will deſtroy the Philiſtims: the remnant of the iſſue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philiſtims are ſaid to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Have not I brought up Iſrael out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philiſtimes from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? ſo I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Palæſtinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this converſion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly Weſt from Egypt, betweene Ptolomais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Aſia under the Aſſyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and ſo hath the Geneva.

Hier. l. 47. 4.

Amos c. 9. v. 7.

But

But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palæstina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, aswel as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seemes to understand this Kir for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captived.

Of which see in the second Book, Chap.7. Sect.3. ‖.5.

Cap.26.v.9.

§. XV.
Of the issue of Sem.

‖. I
Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad onely, and only the children of him & Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehersal of their names, saving that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, somtimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saving India) which I beleeve Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Havilah the sons of Joctan afterward repaired, Hi filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Asiæ usq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Joseph. Ant.l.1.c.7

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred, Acts 2.v.9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seate of Persia (witnesse Daniel: And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Ulai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Ptol. Asiæ tab.5

Dan.8.2.

Assur (as most Historians beleeve) the second son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shal in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath beene in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the ſtate of the Aſſyrians of any ſuch power, after ſuch time as Sardanapalus loſt the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfulleſt Princes among them, had yet the mountain Taurus for the utmoſt of his Dominion toward the North-eaſt, and Syria bounded him toward the Weſt, notwithſtanding theſe vaunts of Senacherib in Eſay the 37. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have deſtroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hena and Ivah? All theſe were indeed but petty Kings of Cities, and ſmall Countries, as Haran in Meſopotamia: Reſeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Ituræa, under Libanus: the Iſle of Eden: Sephar, and others of this ſort. Yea, Nabuchodonoſor, who was moſt powerfull, before the conqueſt of Egypt, had but Chaldæa, Meſopotamia, and Syria, with Palæſtina, and Phœnicia, parts thereof. But in this queſtion of Aſſur, I will ſpeak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whoſe plantation I have omitted among the reſt of the Chuſites, becauſe he eſtabliſhed the firſt Empire: from whom the moſt memorable ſtory of the World taketh beginning. Eſay 37. Verſ. 11.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldæans, ſaith Saint Hierome and Joſephus; but it muſt be thoſe Chaldæans about Ur: for the ſons of Cham poſſeſt the reſt. It is true that he was the father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth ſon of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Aſia the leſs, is the common opinion, taken from Joſephus and S. Hierome; but I ſee not by what reaſon he was moved to ſtraggle thither from his friends.

§. II.
of Aram, and his Sons.

Aram the fift and laſt Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſaith Euſebius out of Joſephus) which Syrus lived before Moſes was borne; the ſame which others call the ſon of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajim, which is as much to ſay; as Syria duorum fluviorum; Syria compaſſed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Meſopotamia ſimply. Eſay 7. 8. Euſeb. p. 10. C.

Ariſe and get thee to Padan Aram (ſaith Iſaac to Iacob) to the houſe of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo alſo remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram, or Aramea, as theſe his own words converted witneſſe: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Aramenios & Arameos vocant; Thoſe which we call Syrians (ſaith he) themſelves call Arameniens and Arameans. Gen. 28. 2. ſee Gen. 25. 10. alſo Deut. 23. 4. Judg. 3. Paral. 1. 19. Pſal. 59. Strab. l. 1.

Againſt this opinion, that Aram the ſon of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not onely of thoſe in Syria Inter-Amnis, which is Meſopotamia) ſome read, Geneſ. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel, the ſon of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to underſtand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of ſome one of note; the rather, becauſe in the hiſtory of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before Kemuels Poſterity could be famous) we finde Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: ſometimes with Naharajim, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from another Aram, which (as it ſeemes) then alſo was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks in his notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be reſtrained to ſome part of Meſopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Ancobaritis (ſo called from the River Chaboras, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiſcuous uſe of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajim (which latter appellation queſtionleſs comprehends the whole Meſopotamia) may ſeem to refute this opinion: eſpecially ſeeing the ſignification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it ſignifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: becauſe the two Rivers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Aphadana: (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

The sonnes of Aram were, { Uz, or Hus. Hul. Gether, and Mesch or Mes.

Hieron. in trad. Hebraic. Uz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus and S. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest son of Aram dwelt near unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoyning to Arabia the Desart, & to Batanea or Traconitis, whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adjoyning to Basan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the son of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (saith St. Hierome) and married Dina the daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hieron. Lam. cap.4.ver.21. Cap.25.v.20.

Hul the second son of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians, and Gether the third son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolomy setteth the City of Cholle, Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Bactrians: but Josephus gave all Noahs children feathers, to carry them far away in all hast. For mine own opinion, I alwaies keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Gether seated himself near his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes or Mesch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the mountain Masius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the desart parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policie held them together for a while; so ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sons of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some on large Kingdomes; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one emulating and disdaining the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are unaccessible to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap.8.Sect.7 Mes the fourth son is made the Parent of the Mæonians: of whom something hath bin spoken already. Arphaxad the third son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sons, Phaleg and Jectan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth divided.

ll. III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THe many people which at the division (at Phalegs birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the year after the floud 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, makes 340. And therefore was it ſo many yeares after the floud, ere the children of Noah ſevered themſelves. But to this opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make how in ſo few years as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) ſo many people could be increaſed, Pererius gives this anſwer, That if 70. perſons of the Family of Jacob increaſed to 600000. fighting men in 215. years, (beſides women, children, and impotent perſons) how much more is it likely, that ſo ſoon after the Floud the children of Noah might in a ſhorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the bleſſing of God, Increaſe and multiply, and fill the earth? What ſtrength this anſwer hath, let others judge: for the children of Iſrael were 70. and had 215. yeares time: and the ſons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. years of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the diviſion, in memory thereof: as Joſephus and S. Auguſtine, who reaſon in this manner. If the diviſion were at Phalegs death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. years before his birth) then was the diviſion 38. years after Ninus, who governed 52. years: in the 43. year of whoſe Reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Aſſyrians, 80. years before this diviſion (as this diviſion is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chryſoſtome) then was the earth ſo peopled in all the Eaſt and Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time ſince. For Ninus aſſociating to himſelf Ariæus King of Arabia, a people who at that time (ſaith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis præſtabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, ſubdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and ſeven Children; vanquiſhed all thoſe Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdomes of Syria, and all the Nations of Perſia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Cteſias) againſt Zoroaſter and others: and Zoroaſter on the other ſide, who made reſiſtance with 400000. prove it ſufficiently, that if the diviſion had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diviſion at that time at all. For ſome of them were ſo ill ſatisfied with their partitions, as they ſought to be maſters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Per. in Gen. lib. 15. c. 10.

But for that conceit, that if the diviſion had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then ſufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was never meant that the earth could be filled every where at the very inſtant, but by times & degrees. And ſurely whatſoever mens opinions have beene herein, yet it is certaine, that the diviſion of tongues and of men muſt goe neare together with the ceaſing of the work at Babel: and that the enterpriſe of Babel was left off inſtantly upon the confuſion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diviſion; and ſo neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeare 101. after the Floud, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten years after he arrived, ſaith Eroſus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymology of whoſe name ſignifieth diviſion) muſt have lived without a name, except the name had bin given him at the time of this confuſion and partition: to this objection it may be anſwered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Iſrael after he had wreſtled with the Angel; Abraham was firſt Abram; and Edom, Eſau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this diviſion had his firſt name upon this accident changed, it is moſt probable.

And laſtly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chryſoſtome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his ſonne the name of Phaleg, he foretold the diviſion which followed: to this I ſay, I doe not finde that Heber deſerved any ſuch honour, if he had thereupon ſo called his ſonne: for diviſion and diſperſion followeth increaſe of people of neceſſity; and this Propheſie (if any ſuch had been) might alſo have reference to the diviſion, which afterwards fell amongſt the Hebrewes themſelves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

‖. IV.

Of the sonnes of Joctan, the other sonne of Heber.

The sonnes of Joctan were,
1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Jare, or Jaraah, or Jerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
13. Jobab.

ALl those sonnes of Joctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general: And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were onely three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the sons of Chush, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba, or Sheba, his grand-childe by his wife Ketura. But Seba the son of Chush, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we have left in Arabia felix: and Havilah the son of Chush upon Tygris. Saba the grand-childe of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabæans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention. Primùm Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagardæ; prope verò hos sunt Tasci: The first are Sabæans; after these be Passagardæ; and neer these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But unto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his sonne (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country: Hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the son of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East-Country in respect of Judæa; which also Ovid setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abrahams sons seated themselves on the borders of Judæa, I rather choose to leave Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desart, where Ptolomy setteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the son of Joctan, the son of Heber, (as I conceive) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis hos inter medios habitatq; Sabæus; In the middest of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith Dionysius.

τῶν Ἀμέτρων ναίων σαΒὰ ἠδὲ τάξιλος αὐδήσει.

‖. V.

Of Ophir one of Joctans sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

OPhir also was an inhabitant of the East India, and (as S. Hierome understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsulæ: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as S. Hierome doth, but but he ſets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther Eaſt.

Arias Montanus out of the ſecond of Chronicles, the third Chapter and ſixth Verſe, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the Weſt Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words in the ſecond of the Chronicles are theſe: And he over-layed the houſe with precious ſtones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembred by Moſes in the deſcription of Paradiſe: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene a Province of Suſiana, called Barbatia; ſo called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence thoſe Kings ſubjected by David, brought this gold, with which they preſented him; and which David preſerved for the inriching of the Temple. Gen.2.11.& 12 Plin.l.6.c.28.

But this fancie of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Pleſſis, who alſo took Ophir for Peru. And that this queſtion may be a ſubject of no further diſpute; it is very true that there is no Region in the world of that name: ſure I am, that at leaſt, America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountain ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcovered thoſe Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferiour to none) ſome of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſignes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a river or torrent, or brook that ran by, the Indians anſwered Peru, which was either the name of that brook, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly underſtood them, ſet it down in the Diurnall of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent over to Charles the Emperor, all that weſt part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever ſince, as divers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Jeſuite in his natural and moral Hiſtory of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jokan, who as he ſuppoſeth navigated from the utmoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Jucatan is nothing elſe in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the ſalvages anſwered Jucatan (which is) What ask you, or What ſay you? The like happened touching Paria, a mountainous Country on the South ſide of Trinidado, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcovered, pointed to the Hils afar off, one of the people anſwered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as, high Hils or Mountains. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledge of mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and ſo hath that Country ever ſince retained the name of Paria.

The ſame happened among the Engliſh, which I ſent under Sir Richard Greenevile to inhabite Virginia. For when ſome of my people aſked the name of that Country, one of the ſalvage anſwered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay, as You weare good clothes, or gay clothes. The ſame happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iſland Trinidado: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelf place which the Sea incompaſſed, they anſwered, Caeri, which ſignifieth an Iſland. And in this manner have many places, newly diſcovered, been intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we muſt leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout ſuch an Iſland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it ſelf (towards Perſia) in Havilah, now Suſiana, and all alongſt that Eaſt Indian ſhore; yet the greateſt plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain Iſlands planted by the Spaniards, from the Eaſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Solomons Ships made from the Red Sea (which was 3. years in going and comming) it ſeemeth they went to the uttermoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed theſe that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that navigation in two years, and ſometimes leſſe: and Solomons Ships went not above a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But we muſt conſider, that they evermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the uſe of the compaſſe was known, it was impoſſible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Solomons Ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of gold in the East India Islands, farre above the mines of any one place of America) to sail every year to the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they have built a City called Manilia. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantastical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose mountains of gold are kept by Griffins: which mountaines Solinus affirmed to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent universa, alites ferocissimæ, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold and rich stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a nation of people called Arimaspi make War. These Arimaspi are said to have been men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Book: and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own opinion) I beleeve none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first given them by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eies; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a nation in the extream North, at a place called Gisolitron, or the Cave of the North-east winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded upon some true stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heat, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be feigned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend mountains of gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable mountains, which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel beasts: unto which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to finde the same war which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seek to defend that mettall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow inraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those pearls which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the pearl, yet they find savour in the flesh and bloud of the Indians, whom they devour.

Of Havilah the sonne of Joctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Sepher named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the sonne of Joctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Islands adjoyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, which took name of Havilah the son of Joctan: but Havilah, which Pison compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the son of Chush, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah as thou commest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made War in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen sons of Joctan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Ophir; though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Masius or Mesh, Gen. 10.30. (to wit) between Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themseves or their issues removed into the East India, leaving the other Families of Joktan, to fill the Countries of their firſt plantation, which the Scripture defines to have been from Meſh unto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Meſh to be a Region of the Eaſt India, and Sephar a Mountain of the ſame (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) thoſe fancies are far beyond my underſtanding. For the word (Eaſt) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judæa, is never farther extended than into Perſia. But Meſech is that part of the Mountaine of Maſius in the North of Meſopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras ſpringeth, which runneth by Charran: and in the ſame Region we alſo finde for Sephar (remembred by Moſes) Sipphara by Ptolomy, ſtanding to the Eaſt of the Mountain Maſius; from whence Joktan having many ſons, ſome of them might paſs into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in proceſſe of time.

The other faſhion of planting I underſtand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reaſon and poſſibility. And that this Mountain in the Eaſt was no farther off than in thoſe Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the ſame phraſe is uſed: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountaine of the Eaſt; which was from the Eaſt part of Meſopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Meſopotamia, (witneſs this place of Deuteronomie:) Becauſe they hired Balaam the ſonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curſe thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluviorum, which is Meſopotamia, as aforeſaid. Verſe 7. Cap. 23. ver. 4.

This plantation of the World after the floud doth beſt agree (as to me it ſeems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And theſe be the reports of reaſon and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have choſen to goe after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the diſcovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himſelf hath diſguiſed all things: ſo the factious and hireling Hiſtorians of all Ages (eſpecially of theſe latter times) have by their many volumes of untrue reports left Honour without a monument, and Vertue without memory: and (in ſtead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to thoſe, whom the darkeſt forgetfulneſs ought to have buried, & covered over for evermore. And although the length & diſſolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds firſt planters after the floud (I mean the greateſt number and moſt part of them) yet all the footſteps of Antiquity (as appeares by that which hath been ſpoken) are not quite worn out nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the ſound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldeſt ſon of Canaan gave name; ſo hath Cilicia, Tharſis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Libyans, Moores, and other Nations, have preſerved from the death of forgetfulneſs ſome ſignes of their firſt Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and eſtabliſhing of Government.

§ I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt Government under the eldeſt of Families to Regall, and from Regall abſolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had ſcarcitie of people) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Elderſhip. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldeſt of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes uſed both for the Magiſtrate, and for thoſe of Age and Gravity: the ſame bearing one ſignification almoſt in all Languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers, God commanded Moſes to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gover-Governour over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleeved them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedæmonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so they are called Eldermen: and again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and advisement were not in old men, our Ancestours had never called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Governours or Counsellours of State, there is a sign that the first Governours were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietie, or propet power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or masterslip: the correlative of the one is the subject, of the other the slave. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietas; Cæsar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his owne: and again, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began aboundantly to increase: so obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent seed seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly over-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternal perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the Original and first giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evill, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their own fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while wisedome was severed from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wise and foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a general floud of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to order and dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equall from equall received equal harms. Insomuch that the licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better triall, no less perillous than unindurable bondage.

Necessitas est firmum judicium, & immutabilis providentiæ potestas.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, & to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse evill, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved soveraign power, bethought it self of certain equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of Lawes, private affections in supream Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance, both good and evill.

For as wisedome in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other lawes than the wils of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love sees one while too much, another while stark nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeares (for direction and restraint of Royal power) Lawes were established: and that Government which had had this mixture of equality (holding in an even ballance ſupreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God eſtabliſhed in favour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authority, Princes as they were choſen for their vertues onely, ſo did they meaſure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (ſaith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia juſti erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dicti; Princes becauſe they were juſt and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De antiq. ſacrorum part 1.

And though (ſpeaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be aſcribed to Reaſon and Neceſſity; yet it was God himſelf that firſt kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they ſaw that they could not live and be preſerved without a Ruler and Conducter: God himſelfe by his eternall providence having ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order impoſed) watch for their owne ſafety. The moſt High beareth rule over the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth over it whomſoever he pleaſeth. By me (ſaith Wiſedome, ſpoken by the ſon of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule; and it is God (ſaith Daniel) that ſetteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Chriſt himſelfe witneſſeth, ſpeaking to Pilate; Thou couldeſt have no power at all againſt me, except it were given thee from above. Dan. 5. 21. Prov. 8. 15. Dan. 2. 21. John 19. 21.

It was therefore by a threefold Juſtice that the World hath beene governed from the beginning, (to wit) by a Juſtice natural: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephewes, and Families; in which government the Obedience was called naturall Piety: Againe, by a Juſtice divine drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conſcience: And laſtly, by a Juſtice civill, begotten by both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by theſe three thoſe of the eldeſt times were commanded, and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is moſt evident: for Adam, being Lord over his own Children, inſtructed them in the ſervice of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankinde.

§. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Government with their oppoſites: and of the degrees of humane ſociety.

WHat other Policy was exerciſed, or State founded after ſuch time as mankinde was greatly multiplied before the Floud, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it ſeeme by probable conjecture, that the ſame was not without Kings in that firſt Age: it being poſſible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembred among their antiquities) were before the generall Floud: and very likely, that the cruell Oppreſſions in that Age proceeded from ſome tyranny in Government, or from ſome rougher forme of Rule, than the Paternall.

Beroſus aſcribeth the rule of the World in thoſe dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who maſtred (ſaith he) all Nations from the Sun-riſing to the Sun-ſet. But in the ſecond Age of the World, and after ſuch times as the rule of Elderſhip failed, three ſeveral ſorts of Government were in ſeverall times eſtabliſhed among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People. Beroſ. lib. 1.

The firſt, the moſt ancient, moſt general, and moſt approved, was the Government of one, ruling by juſt Lawes, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is oppoſed, being alſo a ſole and abſolute Rule, excerciſed according to the will of the Commander, without reſpect or obſervation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magiſtrate (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity: and of this condition ought every Magiſtrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers ſhalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And theſe ſhall judge the people with righteous judgment. Deut. 16. 18.

The ſecond Government, is of divers principal Perſons eſtabliſhed by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Ariſtocracy, or Optimatum poteſtas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and uſurpation of a few great-ones) is oppoſed: as the Decem viri, or Trium viri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the State, contrary to their own Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly expresst by Tholosanus; unius, paucorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy since the second increase of mankinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family gave Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many housholds (man by nature loving society) joyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greek οἶκος, which signifieth a House; or of the word (Via) becaus it hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeke πήγη which signifieth a Fountaine: becaus many people (having their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some thinke) Shires, answereth not unfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Race of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to joyne and set together divers of their Villages, invironing them first with banks and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which, being so compassed, were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Becaus wals were opposed against Enemies; or ab opibus, becaus thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe; becaus when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very wals and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coivit, of comming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is also a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken a Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Megistos:) and so the Greekes call them Megistanes whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

Ethic. 5. The office and duty of every Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and finall, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and office. A Magistrate is
Rom. 13.4. the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe evill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evill. He also
Ver. 1. 2. teacheth in the same place; That every soule ought to be subject to the higher powers, becaus they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and Ibid. v. 5. fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subject to the judgment and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not becaus of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, becaus they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyranous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremy commanded Hierem. 29.7. Gen. 20. 17. & 27.10. the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt): And it is acceptable in the ſight of our Saviour (ſaith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for ſuch Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Chriſtian Kings and Magiſtrates. And ſo much did Saint Chryſoſtome in his Homily to the people prefer Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they ſhould be wanting: Præſtat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which alſo Tacitus ſubſcribeth: Præſtat (ſaith Tacitus in the firſt of his Hiſtory) ſub malo principe eſſe, quàm nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally preſuppoſed) then is there no liberty more ſafe, than to ſerve them: Neq; enim libertas tutior ulla eſt (ſaith Claudian) quàm Domino ſervire bono: No liberty (ſaith he) more ſafe for us than to be ſervants to the vertuous. And certainly howſoever it may be diſputed, yet is it ſafer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000. Tyrants: under a wiſe man that is cruel, than under the fooliſh and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Ageſilaus anſwered a Citizen of Sparta that deſired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would diſdaine in his owne houſe, were very unfit to governe great Regions by.

Laſtly, as many Fathers erected many Cotages for their many children: and as (for the reaſon before remembred) many Houſholds joyned themſelves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: ſo when theſe Cities and Citizens joyned together, and eſtabliſhed Laws by conſent, aſſociating themſelves under one Governour, and Government; they ſo joyned, were called a Common-wealth: the ſame being ſometimes governed by Kings; ſometimes by Magiſtrates; ſometimes by the people themſelves.

§. III

Of the good Government of the firſt Kings.

NOw this firſt Age after the Floud, and after ſuch time as the people were increaſed, and Families became ſtrong, and the diſperſed into ſeveral parts of the world, was by ancient Hiſtorians called Golden: Ambition and Covetouſneſs being as then but green, and newly grown up, the ſeeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then ſought for no larger Territory than themſelves could compaſs and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than ſufficient to defend them from cold and tempeſt: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curioſitie of dyet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the cold, the raine and the Sun.

And ſure if we underſtand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient ſimplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be caſt upon thoſe elder times: but if it be taken otherwiſe, then, whether the ſame may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I mean to one limited time and none elſe) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both ſorts. And as the infancy of Empiry, (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then onely woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age; ſo may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then beſt purchaſed; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deſervings have commonly the leaſt impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the ſame is then beſt warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time do not onely harden and ſhrink the openeſt and moſt Jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne eſtates before their eyes, and (withal) perſwadeth them to compaſſionate themſelves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whoſe means are anſwerable unto other mens deſires: yet ſuch as value all things by their own reſpects, do no ſooner finde their appetites unanſwered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, ſo doth it in the life of every man, if his daies be many: for our younger years are our Golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praiſe thoſe ſeaſons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our ſelves, and the pains and diſeaſes which never part from us but at the grave, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how just soever: Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to pass (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we alwaies extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errours of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti; That they are praisers of fore-passed times, forgetting this advice of Solomon: Say not then, Why is it that the former daies were better then these? for thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Majores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur posteri querentur, eversos, esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancestors have complained, we do complain, our children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are usually the discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus: quibus cœpit nova fuit & repentina. Whatsoever is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they took beginning were also new and sodain. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set down for certain, That as it was the virtue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono servit omne bonum; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one onely: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience: For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without virtue.

Verus nobilis non nascitur sed fit.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age to these daies. But this Nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in virtue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Hierome judged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtus & antiquæ divitiæ; Virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of virtue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of virtue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remain but the dregs and vices of ancient Virtue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains,

if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertili producitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poysoning Henbane, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being descended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Authour calleth personal, (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also personal; yet if Vertue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such a one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Potshare body and barren minde? for (according to the same Father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris hujus, & malè coronatæ nitorem gloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly: for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Mytre, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is born, and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily perswade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade
Of virtuous life; not in the fleshly Line:
For blood is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And howsoever the custome of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Solomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow-Princes: There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an errour that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth: Folly is set in great excellency.

Eccles. 10.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like a Soveraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THE first of all that reigned as Soveraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of fame, and that took on him to command others: or else in that he was begotten by Chuſh, after his other children were alſo become Fathers; and of a later time than ſome of his Grand-children and Nephews. Howſoever, ſeeing Moſes in expreſs words calleth Nimrod the ſon of Chuſh, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have no reſpect.

This Empiry of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the ſame beginning in Babel, (which is) confuſion. But it ſeemeth to mee that Melanchton conceived not amiſſe hereof: the ſame expoſition being alſo made by the Author of that work called Onomaſticum Theologicum, who affirmes that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or ſevere Governour, becauſe his forme of rule ſeemed at firſt farr more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore is he in this reſpect alſo called a mighty Hunter: becauſe he took and deſtroyed both beaſts and Theeves. But Saint Auguſtine underſtands it otherwiſe, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter againſt God: Sic ergo intelligendus eſt Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be underſtood, a Hunter againſt the Lord.

But howſoever this word (a mighty Hunter) be underſtood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all thoſe which went with him from the Eaſt into Shinaar: ſo, this charge was rather given him, than by him uſurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himſelf, or any of the Sonnes of his own body came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the ſucceeding ſtory of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this diſobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The ſame is alſo confirmed by divers ancient Hiſtorians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Joſtan, were the Captains and Leaders of all thoſe which came from the Eaſt. And though Sem came not himſelf ſo farre Weſt as Shinaar (his lot being caſt on the Eaſt parts) yet from his Sons Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southermoſt parts of Chaldæa, about the City of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And becauſe thoſe of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldæa, were no partners in the unbeleeving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retaine the firſt and moſt ancient language, which the Fathers of the firſt Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his iſſues: In familia Heber remanſit hæc lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (ſaith Saint Auguſtine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham uſed; yea, it was anciently, and before the Floud the generall ſpeech: and therefore firſt called (ſaith Cœleſtinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moſes, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howſoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability reſolve, that none of the godly ſeed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this preſumptuous multitude. And ſeeing it is not likely, but that ſome one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by juſt authority, than violence of uſurpation.

§ II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three diſtinct perſons.

Berzo, and out of him Nauclerus, with others, make many Nimrods, Euſebius confounds him with Belus, and ſo doth Saint Hierome upon Oſe; and theſe words of S. Auguſtine ſeem to make him of the ſame opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat poſt mortem patris ſui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his father Belus, who firſt governed in Babylon ſixty five yeares. But it could not be unknown to Saint Auguſtine, that Nimrod was the eſtabliſher of that Empire: Moſes being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (ſaith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cæsar overthrew the liberty of the Romane commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraign authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

was

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of soveraign rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeares after the floud (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and the Towns adjoyning: but the first and most famous work of Ninus was the City of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppreſt the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdaine thereof fall from his obedience, whom hee recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

——Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with wals of brick the City did incloſe.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings aswell. For if we may beleeve Justine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will bee found great difference betweene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of languages, to have invaded & mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time; in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the floud, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint cals Archad; & Epiphanius, Arphal; Junius takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others under-understand Nisibis and Ninive to be one City: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Achad: and so doe the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg, and Pagninus, Erec; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Camagena, called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalneh) some take it for Calimisis: of which Am. Marcellinus. S. Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others doe think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldæa (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farre removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva translation favouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldæ, from Babylon in Egypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrods Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

Cap. 6. v. 2.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23.13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOw as of Nimrod; so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controversie wearisomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not dis-joyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris: è terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi ædificavit Ninivem; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the Land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth down the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom, sonnes were borne after the Flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noahs sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because he was first to bee spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japhets eldest sonne; and then speakes of Javan and his sonnes: for of the rest reſt of that Familie he is ſilent. Anon after he numbreth the ſons of Ham, of which Chuſh was the eldeſt: and then the ſons of Chuſh and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan; leaving Shem for the laſt, becauſe he would not diſ-joyn the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, & Heber, unto Abraham, and ſo to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the ſons of Shem in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been againſt order; neither would Moſes have paſt over ſo ſleightly the erection of the Aſſyrian Empire in one of the ſons of Shem, if he had had any ſuch meaning: it being the ſtorie of Shems ſons which he moſt attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the reſt of the ſons of Chuſh, becauſe he founded the Babylonian and Aſſyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to ſpeake of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with thoſe other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, ſo alſo in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till ſuch time as he had finiſhed ſo much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the iſſue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Iſrael. And of Junius opinion touching Aſſur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comeſtor, in hiſtoria Scholaſtica, gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in ſome other ſenſe, he uſeth theſe words: Vel intelligendum non eſt de Aſſur, filio Sem, &c. ſed Aſſur (id eſt) Regnum Aſſyriorum) inde egreſſum eſt, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum eſt; (which is) Or elſe it is not to be underſtood of Aſſur the ſon of Sem, &c. but Aſſur (that is, the Kingdome of the Aſſyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this ſort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the firſt Erecter of the Aſſyrian Empire, or the firſt Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Reſpecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is alſo true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem; Regarding the inlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Aſſur to be the ſon of Nimrod: and ſo doth Methodius, and Viterbienſis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now laſtly Torniellus: who (ſaith he) took upon him that name of Aſſur after he had beaten the Aſſyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his Conqueſt in Africa: and that Aſſur was a common name to the Kings of Aſſyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Pſalme 81. Eſay 10. Oſe. 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the ſonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbiſhop of Mentz in the yeare of Chriſt 854. an ancient and learned Writer, underſtands this place with Commeſtor, or Commeſtor with him, agreeing in ſubſtance with that tranſlation of Junius: to which words of Moſes he giveth this ſenſe: De hac terra Aſſyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Aſſyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, ſo named of Ninus the ſonne of Belus. On the contrary Calvin objecteth this place of Eſay: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this was no people, Aſſur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderneſſe; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diverſitie in the tranſlation and underſtandings; inſomuch as Michael de Palatio upon Eſay (though in all elſe very diligent) paſſeth it over. But Calvin ſeemeth hereby to infer, that becauſe Aſſur founded the ſtate of the Chaldæans, therefore alſo Aſſur rather than Nimrod eſtabliſhed the Aſſyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former tranſlation of Junius, & to his own opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes tranſlation) it may be gathered, that Aſſur both founded and ruined this Eſtate or City of the Chaldæans, by Eſay remembred: unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot truſt, or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldæa, and that Eſtate, an example unto thoſe Phœnicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which City of Chaldæa being of ſtrength, & carefully defended, was (notwithſtanding) by the Aſſyrians utterly waſted and deſtroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible, as themſelves thought) ſhould alſo ſoon after be over-turned by the ſame Aſſyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonoſor. And theſe be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Aſſur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxerunt robuſtos ejus, ſuffoderunt domos ejus, poſuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldæorum, & hæc desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet then shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldæans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their wals fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus: Ecce terra Chasdiim, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ædes ejus, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof; and again brake down the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Junius in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choise to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose trade the state and greatnes of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Grecians under the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldæans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chief merchandize came in by the City Ur, or Urchoa in Chaldæa, where the body or chiefe stream of Euphrates (even that streame which runneth through Babylon & Otris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be stopped up. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; & of Euphrates, that is, from Ur, or Urchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over land they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldæa, through which, that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopt up. Ejus cursum vetustas abolevit (saith Niger.) And Pliny: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum; Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terrour of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Ur; and by (Hecatæus) Camerina; by Ptolomy, Urchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldæopolis, The Citie of Chaldæa: which the sons of Shem, untill Abrahams time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the son of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Ur of Chaldæa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted (by ships) doe bear that sense, the same may be the better approved, because it was a Port Town: and the River so farre up as this City of Ur was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other unto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth desart Lands, because it joyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ituræans) addeth, that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Assur is in this place diversly taken (as for the son of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Ur; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainely the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posterity of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove that the same Assur built Ninive, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Family of Sem, as he must be if he founded Ninive, then all those which seeke to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainely he was very unworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe, or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the story of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere unto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which work his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the City which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Ninive: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit instaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up againe some part of the wall, over-borne by the furie of the River: which work of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built? Dan. 4. 27.

§ IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Julius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4. Cities before remembered; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propogated his Empire into Assyria, and in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adjoyning, and that his travailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terræ motu divisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeares; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fens and over-flowne Marishes which adjoyned unto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose son and successor Barzanes became subject and Tributarie to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

§. V.

§. V.

That we are not to marvell how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soone after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For opportunitie being a Princesse liberall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisedom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding mindes of men receive all those helpes and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the division of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made unto them, held the power which they possest, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankinde straggled abroad like beasts in a Desart; but that by agreement they disposed themselves; and undertooke to inhabite all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus time, would not have beene possest in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travailled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous successe) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their owne Travailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatnesse, either possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the son of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to us known, when he first tooke on him Soveraigntie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the east into Babylonia: though in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his son and Successor) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerful to resist his attempts; which Sabatius I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Justine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me, rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Sesostris, that lived certaine Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

See more of this, l. 2. of this first Part, cap. 2. Sect. 6.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affines unto it.

WHence this second King and Successour of Nimrod had the name of Bell, or Belus, question hath beene made; for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldæan Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldæan Princes, and Babylonian Satrapæ: so was it used (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) thoſe voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belſebub, and Beelſephon. Thoſe that are learned in the Hebrew and Cha'dæan, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militiæ, Chief in the War; though Daniel was ſo called (ſaith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honour of his expounding ſecrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the ſame ſignification: and ſaith, that the Idol of Babylon was ſo called, which Ninus in memory of his father ſet up to be worſhipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (ſaith Lyranus) came Idolatry, and the firſt uſe of Images into the World. Iſidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Aſſyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sun: ſo, in the Punick or Carthaginian Language, it ſignifieth God: Glycas makes it an Aſſyrian name properly: and Joſephus a Tyrian. He alſo affirmeth that the Idol which the Moabites worſhipped (by them erected on the Mountain Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the ſame which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which alſo was the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel or Beel, was as much to ſay as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel ſoundeth (God) and Sebub (Flies or Hornets:) by which name (notwithſtanding) the Jews expreſs the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Oſe teacheth us the proper ſignification of this word from the voice of God himſelf; And at that day (ſaith the Lord) thou ſhalt call me Iſhi, and ſhalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal or Bahal, be juſtly to be uſed towards God; yet in reſpect that the ſame was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbad it. And the uſing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sun, was not becauſe it properly ſignifieth the Sun, but becauſe the Sun there was worſhipped as a God: as alſo the Fire was, tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belſephon, Belſephon is expounded out of Facius, Dominus ſpeculæ vel cuſtodiæ: The Lord of the Watch-Tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worſhipped. It is alſo written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they ſay) is as much as Denudavit; and therefore the word joyned, expreſſeth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the ſon of Saturne: for it was uſed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the ſon Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regumq; qui urbes condiderunt ſeniſſimi; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules verò nepotes eorum fortiſſimi; The ancienteſt of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their firſt-borne, Jupiters and Junoes; their valiant Nephewes, Hercules. But this Belus (ſaith L. Vives) was famous by reaſon of his warlike ſon Ninus, who cauſed his father to be worſhipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (tranſported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (ſay they) upon Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Jupiter Belus, who was father to Ægyptus. They adde, that this Belus, carrying a Colonie to the River of Euphrates, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Prieſts after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the ſon of Epaphus and Iſis or of Neptune and Lybia, or (with Euſebius) of Teglonus, who after the death of Apis married Iſis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the ſame was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we ſpeake, but rather ſome other Belus, of whom the Egyptians ſo much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worſhipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the moſt ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Aſtronomie, if Plinie ſay true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the ſame Author affirmeth that it did remain in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Over the River, ſaith he, there are gardens, where they ſay the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a ſquare Pyramis made of Brick, a furlong high, and on every ſide it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril againſt Julian, that he obtained divine worſhip yet living:

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseverârunt igitur Assyrii, & finitimæ illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honored by their subjects with title of Deitie; (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering nations have persevered, sacrificing to him. Even Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninias, was made an Idol-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninias) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Japheth, slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statuæ were first erected without divine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterward the Devil crept into those woodden and brazen carcasses, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt, homines fuerunt, & pro uniuscujusq; vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud suos post mortem cœperunt: sed (Dæmonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos existimârunt: ad ista verò magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to be honoured of his own: But at length (the Devils perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory: Gentilitas (saith he) inventrix & caput est Imaginum; Gentilisme is the inventresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose, Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image of God. Euschius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshiping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et verentur (saith Lactantius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

Greg. Nyssen. Ambr. in Psal. 108.
Euseb. l. 7. c. 18. Aug. c. 13. Lact. lib. 2. c. 2.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shift this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workemanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious & learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not onely no where warranted, but expresly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expres Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any perswasions lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likenesse of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisedome, That, the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribah eum mente tua: Do not imagine any forme to be in God, least thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do thoſe men preſume that put him under the greazie Penſil of a Painter, or the ruſty Axe or other Inſtrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this diſhonour to the infinite and incomprehenſible God, began in Babel: ſo did the Devil tranſport and ſpread this invention into all the Regions adjoyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romanes for a while reſiſted the erection of theſe Idols and Images, refuſing to ſet them in their Temples for 170 yeers; obſerving the Law of Numa, who thought it impiety to reſemble things moſt beautiful, by things moſt baſe. But Tarquinius Priſcus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a Nation of all others under the Sun moſt deluded by Satan) ſet up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Auguſtine witneſſeth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis ſupplicant, genu poſito illa adorant; & cùm hæc ſuſpiciant, fabros, qui illa fecere, contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worſhipped, thoſe they pray unto, with bended knees thoſe they adore; and while they ſo greatly admire them, they contemn the Handi-craftſmen that made them: which alſo Sedulius the Poet in this ſort ſcoffed at: Aug. de Civit. l. 4. c. 31.

Heu miſeri qui vana colunt, qui corde ſiniſtro
Religioſa ſibi ſculpunt ſimulachra, ſuumq;
Factorem fugiunt, & quæ fecere, verentur.
Quis furor eſt? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt volucrem, turpemq; bovem, torvumq; Draconem,
Semi-hominemq;-canem ſupplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worſhip vanities,
And conſecrate dumb Idols in their heart,
Who their own Maker (God on high) deſpiſe,
And feare the work of their own hands and art.
What furie? what great madneſs doth beguile
Mens minds? that man ſhould ugly ſhapes adore
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile
Half-dog-half-man on knees for aid implore.

And though this device was barbarous, and firſt, and many yeers practiſed by Heathen Nations onely, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to ſcorn the ignorant ſtupiditie of his Nation: but Juſtin Martyr remembreth how the Sybils inveighed againſt Images: and Hoſpinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the ſouls of men to erect and adore thoſe babels. Strabo and Herodotus witneſs, that the Perſians did not erect or ſet up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impiety to repreſent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Euſebius alſo witneſſeth in his ſixt Book de præparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brackmans in India, that Images ſhould be worſhipped. The ſame do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authours might be remembred, that witneſs the diſdain which the Heathen themſelves had of this childiſh Idolatry: of which Hoſpinian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly ſaid, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt, All ill examples have ſprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at firſt made theſe Statuæ and Images, but in memory of ſuch remarkable men, as had deſerved beſt of their Countries and common-wealths: Effigies hominum (ſaith Pliny) non ſolebant exprimi, niſi aliqua illuſtri cauſa perpetuitatem merentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for ſome notable cauſe to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papiſts, ſome have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea diſcerent homines Deum inviſibilem cognoſcere: Images ſay they, (and ſo before them the Heathen ſaid) are inſtead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inviſible God: in which underſtanding perhaps they no otherwiſe eſteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel ſet up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the moſt reverenced Idol of the World, by which ſo many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himſelf) were miſled and caſt away: ſo thoſe very ſtocks & ſtones,

and

and painted canvases (called the pictures of Christ, our Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Book of Wisdome) when we pass through the raging waves, on these stocks more rotten than the Ship that carrieth us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dii consentes, seu majorum gentium, selecti, Patritii, insigniores, dii medii: Counselling gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobility, select gods, Patrian, gods of mark, and Common gods (which the Romanes called Mediocxum) dii infimi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Civitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable souls and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which stood with the same title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devil had so many yeers led and mis-led them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them, as Jupiter in Crete, Isis in Egypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Juno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but every Citie, and almost every Family had a god apart. For, as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Babel made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asshima, and the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sephervaims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esay derided? Men cut down Trees, rinde them, burn a part of them, make readie their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to believe the Commandements of God so direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flye from Idolatry; I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

Lib. 14. Cap. 17. v. 18. 31. Cap. 44.

§. VIII.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and lastly of his War against Zoroaster.

UNto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first that without shame or feare committed adultery in publique. But as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of profane Authors) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented upon by Annius, hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chrytæus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnasseus, and others: yet Lodovicus vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragments; proving directly that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by Athenæus and Josephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Sceatades, and to the times of Josua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers; or some few lines of the Chaldæan and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errours.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a City joyning to Halicarnasseus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes ces with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his works, saving some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgement, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can express them. S. Augustine affirms that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wan it all, save India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entered into a straight league of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and a Chusite, and the neerest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the sodain, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their king Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The king of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his War against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himself that way toward the East; but that ever he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not believe, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third War was against Pharnus, king of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murthered with his seven Children, though others affirme, that they all died in one battaile against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Nineve, or after, it is uncertain. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and set the work of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000 Foot, and 200000 Horse, and 100000 six hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaster with four hundred thousand. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster being slain, he entred farther into the Country, and besieged the chief City thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault given by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and possest. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external beauty, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he took her from her husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yeelding to the passion of love in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himself, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishonour, cast himself headlong into the water, and died.

of ZOROASTER, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventer of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

ZOroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham the son of Noah: A fancy of little probability. For Cham was the Paternal Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that Book which was called Scripturæ Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and so intituled: of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholastical Historie: which Art (saith he) with the seven liberal Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: seven of which were made of brass, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Floud; and seven of brick, against the injury of fire. There was also another devised discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like to this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre justo, &c. Cham (the son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any book or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the Inventer of naturall Magicke and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Plinie and Justine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Nativities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and mineralls, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldæa is also made the Inventer. I rather think that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Josephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdome of aftertimes in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giver of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and universall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdome, Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all. Wisd. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a spirit (being in the middest of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Josephus and Cedrenus affirm, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Stars, and other motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgement, he might adde somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to posterity. Scalig. in Euseb. Joseph. lib. 1. Antiq. c. 4.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse jangling about the word and art of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dinon seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldæan, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third, was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who lived in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threescore and eighteen yeers. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Persomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldæan. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainely, that the Author of them was a Chaldæan by Nation, though the word (Chaldæan) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldæi and Magi divers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldæan both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldæan tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§ II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

NOw for Magick it selfe; which Art (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few understand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignotos semper allatrant; As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amisse (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof. Pic. Mir. fo. 81.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with evil spirits, usurped that title. For Magick, Conjuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the art after long study and labour altogether ridiculous. Plin. l. 30. c. 1. Nat.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is expresst such a one as is altogether conversant in things divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (μαγος) saith, that the Persians called their gods μάγους: whence he addeth, that Magus is either ἀγαθὸν φύσει θεὸν or διαφερόντως θεὸν (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Mat. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolominie calleth divine Magick: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes, or Wisemen: For, the fear and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians, Branchmans: which name they somewhat neerly retain to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrews they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldæans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hostanes, one of the ancient Magicians) useth these words: Et verum Deum merita majestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, ejus venerationi novit assistere. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Sosthenes (for so M. Felix called him, not Hostanes) ascribeth the due majestie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath delivered that there are Devils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankinde. Piccol. de Def. Proverb. 1. 7. John Hug. Lingu. hot. In octavio Minutii Felicis cum Arnobio. p. 360.

His Majestie also in his first Book of Demonologie, c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much a contemplator of divine and heavenly sciences; but unjustly so called, because the Chaldæans were ignorant of the true divinity. And it is also right which His Majestie avoweth, that under the name of Magick all other unlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majestie distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Majestie condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a party. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kindes of those Wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldæi. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophistas: Vatablus and Pagninus Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum scientiam profitentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greek and the English call them Inchanters; Junius, Magicians; Castalion, Conjecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wisemen of Babel. Daneus. l. 2. cap. 1.

The second sort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierom, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches or Poysoners: in Junius, Præstigiatores of Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poysoners; and that indeed there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Art of Magick or Necromancie use the help of the Devil to do mischiefe, His Majestie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Divell prepared; and at other times to make pictures of wax, or clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Devill by other means bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldæans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Stars by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magicke, having chiefly sought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferiour degrees.

A second kinde of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Stars into those lower Elements.

Philo Judæus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Stars and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldæa: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem, (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomie, who before Abrahams coming unto them knew none of these sciences.

De exit. sanct. Glyc. Annal. fol. 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garsias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientiâ omnium præstantissimus, Chaldæos primùm, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & divina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirme, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldæans, then the Phenicians; lastly, the Egyptian priests, Astrologie and divine knowledge.

See upon his Comment. in Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 2.

The third kinde of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane use: Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better understood the power of Nature & how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyanæus remembred by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Thespian: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profest, is thus defined: Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant, non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes, which other men divide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned; especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the creator of the Universall: he beleeveth of the * Trinity, which he could not investigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approveth the immortality of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: Which Oracles of his, Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others have gathered and translated.

* Toto in mundo lucet Trias, cujus Minus est princeps. Cuncta namq; perfecit pater, & menti tradidit secunda. Psel. & Ficin. de prap. Evang. l. 1. c. 7.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, using Zoroasters owne words: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibiipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina justitiam perdoctus, naturâ perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the onely inventer thereof.

Lib. 2. fol. 26.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdome of the Chaldæans, doth distinguish those wise men men into five orders, (to wit) Chaſcedim, or Chaldæans : Aſaphim, or Magicians : Chartumim ; (which he tranſlates Ariolie, or Sophiſts) Mechaſphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poyſoners ; and Gazarim, Augures, or Aruſpices, or Diviners.

Chaſcedim were thoſe which had the name of Chaldæans, which were Aſtronomers : Hi cælorum motus diligentiſſimè ſpectârunt ; These did moſt diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens : whom Philo in the life of Abraham deſcribeth.

Aſaphim were in the old Latine tranſlation called Philoſophers : of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians : Qui de omnium tam divinarum quàm humanarum rerum cauſis Philoſophati ſunt ; Who diſcourſed of the cauſes of all things, as well divine as humane : of whom Origen makes Balaam (the ſon of Beor) to be the firſt : but Laertius aſcribeth the invention of this art to Zoroaſtres the Perſian. Laert. l. 1.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Diſciples (ſaith Saint Auguſtine, Plinie, and Juſtine) of another Zoroaſtres : who corrupted the admirable wiſdome of the Magi, which he received from his Anceſters.

Mechaſphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are thoſe which we have ſpoken already out of His Majeſties book of Dæmonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruſpices (after Saint Hierome) which divine from the entrailes of beaſts ſlain for ſacrifices : or by Gazarim others underſtand Augures, who divine by the flying, ſinging, or feeding of birds.

By this diſtinction we may perceive the difference between thoſe wiſe men which the kings of Babylon entertained ; and that the name and profeſſion of the Magi among the ancient Perſians was moſt honeſt. For as Peucer truely obſerveth, Præerant religioni Perſicæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, ſtudiiſque veræ Philoſophiæ dediti erant : nec quiſquam Rex Perſarum poterat eſſe, qui non antea Magorum diſciplinam ſcientiamque percepiſſet ; The Magi (ſaith he) were the chief Miniſters of the Perſian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the ſtudies of true Philoſophie : neither could any be King of the Perſians, who had not firſt been exerciſed in the myſteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senenſis, in the defence of Origen againſt Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kindes of Magicke, his own words are theſe : Et ne quem moveant præmiſſa Polychronii & Theophili teſtimonia, ſciendum eſt duplicem eſſe Magiam ; alteram ubique ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur ; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis philoſophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium ; That the teſtimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (ſaith he) may not move any man, it is to be underſtood that Magick is of two ſorts, the one every where condemned by Origen ; which worketh (whether truely or ſeemingly) by covenants made with Devills ; the other commended by Origen ; which appertaineth to the practick part of naturall Philoſophie, teaching to work admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and ſuffering reciprocally. Peucer. de Divinat. in c. de mag. fol. 135, 136. Bibl. l. 6. fo. 424

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the firſt of his Commentaries upon Daniel : where conſidering of the difference which Daniel makes between theſe foure kindes of wiſe Men formerly remembered, he uſeth this diſtinction : Quos nos hariolos ; cæteri ἐπαοιδοὺς (id eſt) incantatores interpretati ſunt, videntur mihi eſſe qui verbis rem peragunt ; Magi, qui de ſingulis philoſophantur ; malefici, qui ſanguine utuntur & victimis, & ſæpe contingunt corpora mortuorum : porro in Chaldæis Genethliacos ſignificari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Conſuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem ſuam, eo quòd ſint Philoſophi Chaldæorum : & ad artis hujus ſcientiam, Reges quoque & Principes ejuſdem gentis omnia faciunt ; unde, & in nativitate Domini Salvatoris, ipſi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes ſanctam Bethlehem, adoraverunt puerum, ſtella deſuper oſtendente ; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, ſeem to me ſuch as performe things by words ; Magicians, ſuch as handle every thing philoſophically ; Witches, that uſe bloud and ſacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead : further, among the Chaldæans I take them to be ſignified by the name of Conjecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common cuſtome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwiſe reputed in their owne Nation : for they are the Philoſophers of the Chaldæans : yea, King and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art : whence, at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they firſt of all underſtood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethlehem, did worſhip the Childe : the Starre from above ſhewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto utitur diaboli opera ad rem quamcunq; That he is called a Magician now-adaies, who having entred league with the Divel, useth his help to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisedome of Nature; other Arts which undergoe that title, were invented by the falshood, subtilty, and envie of the Devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies, Per malâ fidem; By an evill faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work, to things that suffer. And though by the Jewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) understandeth Witches under the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expaveſcis Magi nomen formidoloſe, nomen Evangelio gratioſum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, ſed ſapientem ſonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearfull one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch, or Conjurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession, but onely idle ignorance, the Parent of causeless admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procuratione dæmonum, naturas ipsas vel conjungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujsmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropriè vocant: The marvellousnesse of some works, which (indeed) are naturall, hath been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of Divels, joyning the natures together, or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the Divels by the ignorant. Among these works is naturall Magick, which men call very improperly Necromancie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further; For by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of naturall agents we are assisted to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) ignoratis terminis potentiæ & virtutis rerum naturalium, stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not understood, wee must needs doubt whether those very workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hæreticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholikely, that by such Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencill, and by a power infinitely supreame and divine; and thereby those that were faithless, were either converted or put to silence.

§. III

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Divel here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evill things, under the name and colour of good things.

SEeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinorum cultor & interpres: A studious observer and expounder of divine things: and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of Naturall Magick) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio; Than the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophy: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no no way sorteth with wise and learned men, promiscue, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawful and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Divell hath shuffled, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceless men. For if we condemn natural Magicke, or the wisedome of Nature, because the Divell (who knowes more than any man) doth also teach witches and Poysoners the harmfull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemn the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Divell also in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of judgement is ignorant, that the Divell from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same imployment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giving a divine power to the Starres, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting observeth) it is true, that judiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art, considering that heavenly bodies (as even generall experience sheweth) have, and exercise their operation upon the inferiour. For the Sun, and the Star of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and governe the Tides of the Sea. Againe, the Planets as they have severall and proper names, so have they severall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beautie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starrs, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledg of the celestial influences, the Divel ceaseth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers and Incantations; and taught men to beleeve in the strength of words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equal his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things. Bunt. in Chro. Psal. 147.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wise and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and fly into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crowes and bating of Ducks, foreshew raine: for they feele the Ayre moistened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Stork in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemie of Mankind, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to judge of good or ill successe in the War: and (withall) to looke into their entrailes for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the livers & bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreams not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by Dreame informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Solomon, Paul, Annias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Job: In Dreames and Visions of the night, when sleepe falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprise: therefore, I say, doth the Divell also practise his Divinations by Dreames, or (after Parisiensis) divinitatis imitationes, his mock-divinitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romans finding the inconvenience hereof, because all dreams (without distinction of cases) were drawne to Divination, forbad the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedie in his Dreame for two grievous diseases that oppresst him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomies poisoned wound; nor that which S. Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise; whose son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dream where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: not that Gen. 12. v. 17. Job 33. 17. G. Parisien. de leg. 24. cap. Codex. de maleficis & Mathematic. leg. & si acceptâ. Aug. de cura pro mortuis agenda.

that of Astyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for asmuch as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

§. IV.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie all their practices.

BUt it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hastie sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldæa, and in a sort forbad it? especially consi-
Deut. 13. & 18. Levit. 20. dering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine. To this, divers answers may be given. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldæans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the king, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldæans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evill or unlawfull Arts, but were meerely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had bin taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldæans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that judgement, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawfull arts (though not unlawful according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Divell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right use of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evill, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleannesse and purity: The good, The truth, The puritie in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forebare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Divel in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeve the most an-Euseb. ex Artemon. & Polybi. cient and religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost vertues sometimes taught by the Divell, and applyed by his Ministers to harmefull and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Divell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreames; so far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as signes of good or evill success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any observation Deut. 18. 10. not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For if we confound Arts with with the abuſe of them, we ſhall not onely condemne all honeſt Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deceive in all profeſſions) but we ſhall in a ſhort time bury in forgetfulneſſe all excellent knowledg and all learning, or obſcure and cover it over with a moſt ſcornefull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we ſhould ſhew our ſelves ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankfull we ſhould ſhew our ſelves towards thoſe, who with paines and care have diſcovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not onely theſe natural knowledges are condemned by thoſe that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks alſo and Profeſſers thereof: though thoſe, that are excellently learned, judge of it in this ſort: In ſpeculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni ſcibili quæritur, elucet; non modò remota ſimilitudine, ſed fulgida quadam propinquitate; In the Glaſſe of the Mathematickes that Truth doth ſhine, which is ſought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obſcuring, but in a neere and manifeſt repreſentation. Cuſan. Com. Tocolog. c. 1.

§. VI.

Of the divers kindes of unlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may ſo call them, which are covered with the name of Magicke: and eſteemed abuſively to be as branches of that Tree, on whoſe root they never grew. The firſt of theſe hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this againe there are divers kindes. The one is an Invocation at the graves of the dead, to whom the Divell himſelfe gives anſwer in ſtead of thoſe that ſeeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortall ſoules of men doe not inhabit the duſt and dead bodies, but they give motion and underſtanding to the living: death being nothing elſe but a ſeparation of the body and ſoule: and therefore the ſoule is not to be found in the Graves.

A ſecond practice of thoſe men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring or of raiſing up Divels, of whom they hope to learne what they liſt. Theſe men are ſo diſtract, as they believe that by terrible words they make the Divell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Mouſe) they therein (as they ſuppoſe) inſconce themſelves againſt that great Monſter. Doubtleſs, they forget that the Divel is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodneſs, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to ſit in Gods ſeat, that he made no ſcruple to tempt our Saviour Chriſt, whom himſelfe called the Son of God. So, forgetting theſe proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet reſolve himſelfe, that he can draw the Divell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraſe: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Divels ſeeme to uſe, is but thereby to poſſeſs themſelves of the bodies & ſoules of thoſe which raiſe them up; as His Majeſtie in his Book aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Divels obedience is only, ſecundum quid, ſcilicet ex pacto; reſpectivè, that is, upon bargaine. Sunt in mundo genus quoddam poteſtatum valde diverſum, indiſcretum & inconſideratum; & quod neque verum à falſo neque poſſibile diſcernat ab impoſſibili.

I cannot tell what they can doe upon thoſe ſimple and ignorant Divels, which inhabit Iamblicus imagination; but ſure I am the reſt are apt enough to come uncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their ſervants and vaſſals, doe no way need any ſuch inforcement.

Or it may be that theſe Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardans mortall Divels, following the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphirius, who taught that theſe kinde of Divels lived not above a thouſand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatiſe de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Divels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwayes fear thoſe words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly maſtered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when he had lifted him up in the Ayre, caſt him headlong out of his clawes, when he was ſure he ſhould periſh with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the ſame prancke at other times upon his owne accord the Divell played with Theodotus: who tranſported (as Simon Magus was ſuppoſed to have beene) had the ſame mortal fall that he had. The like ſucceſſe had Eudas, a principall pillar of the Manichæan Heriſie, as Socrates in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory witneſſeth: and for a manifeſt proofe hereof we ſee it L. Vives in 2. p. 11. lib. 10. Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 10. Caſa exerc. l. 2. Euſeb. hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. c. 16. Lib. 1. c. 21.

every day, that the Divell leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himselfa Pegasus, to conveigh them in haste to places far di-2 Thes. 2. stant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that received not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions: Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majestie in the second Book and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are meerly illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Cry-
Exercitat. l. 2. stals; of whom Cusanus: Fatui sunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nails or in Glass: for a Spirit cannot be incloſed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withall. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministery of infants, by fasting and abstinence in generall; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances, and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, are men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Divinations; as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Mataeotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no less envious and cruell, revengefull and bloudy, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures having sold their souls to the Devil, work two waies; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poysoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of pettie witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Fal-Ælian. l. 6. nat. histor. conrie, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his break-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by In-Lucil. in Satyr. chantments (which the Marsians, a people of Italie, practised: Colubros disrumpit Marsia cantu: inchanting Marsia makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath beene used it appeares, Psalme 58.6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde, and even by natural causes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magicke or Inchantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheese.

§. VII.

Of divers wayes by which the Divel seemeth to work his wonders.

BUt to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not give to the Divell any other dominion than he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason disswading them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the onely certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatas (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharaohs Sorcerers produced, were not naturall, but that the Divel (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For as Varius observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof saith S. Augustine: Nec sanè Dæmones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creatæ sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Devils create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giveth the reason. Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Devil fils with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the minde is wont to open the light of reason. Sinl. paris. de universo. p. 2. c. 70. Maxima vis est phantasiæ ad errores.

And as Tertullian in his Book de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazel those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil entreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his companions into Birds, per activa cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine believed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned also, confirmeth. For speaking of natural Magick he useth these words: De hujusmodi autem operibus & subita generatione ranarum, & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumq; animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verùm adhibitis adjutoriis, qua ipsa semina naturæ confortant & accumt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such works (saith he) the sodain generation of Frogs and Lice, and Worms, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvail not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two waies the Devils do most frequently work, (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God onely. De leg. c. 23. fol. 6, 7.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also natural? Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancie of the world to this day, and observed the success of every counsail: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsail with all those that study and practise subversion & destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, & can thence better judge, than those that inhabite the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes gues rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men do Eph. 2. 2. & 6. 12. Diabolus magnam habet rerum usum: quæ res multum habet momenti in quorundam gestis. Aug. de Anima c. 26. 27. &c.

oftentimes by comparing like causes, conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles: as Crœsus Halym penetrans magnam sub vertit opum vim:

If Crœsus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Devil may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God onely, as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times and certainly what is to come. Solius enim divinæ intelligentiæ ac sapientiæ est, occulta nosse & revelare; It is onely proper to Gods understanding and wisdome to know and reveal hidden things.

Gui. Parisiensis de legib. c.24.

§. VIII

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Devils acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animæ priorum à corpore separatæ, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum verò ad æternam mortem quæ secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant; The soules of the godly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternall life, and of the wicked to an eternall and second death.

Just. Martyr in colloq. cum Tryphone in resp. ad Orthod. quæst. 52. Ambr. in Luc. l.1.c.1. Lyra in Reg.1. Aug. ad Simpl. l.2.q.3. De Civit. Dei, l.13.c.8.

And (besides S. Augustine) Justine Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyrill) quum à corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris Bonitati divinæ commendari; We must believe when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Unum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdom. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Glosse upon the same Text finds it ridiculous: Credunt, & malè, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Glosse) They believe, and they believe amisse, because they be but Phantasmes or Apparitions. For whereas any such voyce hath been heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Absit ut animam cujuslibet sancti, nedum Prophetæ, à dæmonio credamus extractam; God forbid that we should think that the soul of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

Aug. de ver. Apost. 18. Just. Martyr ad Orthodox. q.75. Hilar. Psal. 2. in fine. Tert. de anima in fin. Athanas. q.13. Chrys. hom. 9. in Evang. Mat. 2615. Episcopi.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so do they the wooden images, Cherubins: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26 of Ecclesiasticus (a book not numbred among the Canonicall Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Syracides, following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: For though the Devil would willingly per-swade, that the souls (yea even of just men) were in his power; yet so far is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as S. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that book before cited) might rightly term it a detestable opinion so to think. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by Dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were sottish to conceive, that he would permit the Divell, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his own divine Law to ask counsell of the dead; as in Deuteron. 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

1 Kin. 17. 22. 2 Kin. 4. 34. Nullus enim magus aut daemon mortuum verè unquam excitavit, Wier. de fascin.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Devils which S. Augustine calleth Ludificatores animantium sibi subjectorum; Mockers of their own vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their ears like the voices of men, do also perswade their graceless life and accursed attendants, that themselves both possesse, and have power over the souls of men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives; The Devil beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devils power, whom if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntary vassall: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine; He can allure, but he cannot enforce to evill. Such as think otherwise, may go into the number remembred by Lucretius:

Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atque omnia cæcis
In tenebris metuunt: sic nos in luce timemus.

We fear by light, as children in the dark.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his wife Semiramis, and of other her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Nineve by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUt to come back to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Nineve: whether hee performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the City it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compasse 440. stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth as three Chariots might passe on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campsor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Nineve begun by Nimrod in Chaldæa, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Nineve, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth: and purposing to follow follow the conqueſt which her huſband had undertaken, gave that beauty and ſtrength to Babylon which it had.

§ II.

Of the end of Ninus : and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

THis ſhe did after the death of her huſband Ninus : who after he had maſtered Bactria, and ſubjected unto his Empire all thoſe Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea, and Helleſpont (Aſia the leſſe excepted) and finiſhed the work of Nineve, he left the World in the yeer thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeers. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis deſired her huſband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the abſolute ſoveraign power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, ſpeaks of five dayes. In which time (moved either with deſire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her huſband Menon, who periſhed for her) ſhe cauſed Ninus her huſband to be ſlain. But this ſeemeth rather a ſcandall caſt on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howſoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the ſole rule of the Aſſyrian Empire : of which, Ninus was ſaid to be the firſt Monarch, becauſe he changed his ſeat from Babylonia in Chaldæa, to Nineve in Aſſyria. Juſtine reports, that Semiramis (the better to inveſt her ſelfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her ſo great a charge) preſented her ſelfe to the people in the perſon of her ſon Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall form and proportion without any ſenſible difference.

Ælian. lib. 7. ex Dino.

This report I take alſo to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as ſhe ruled long, ſo ſhe performed all thoſe memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and ſubſcribed that letter which ſhe ſent to the King of India (her laſt challenge and undertaken conqueſt) by her owne name. And were it true that her ſon Ninias had ſuch a ſtature at his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very perſonable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that ſhee could have held the Empire from him 42. yeers after by any ſuch ſubtilty : (for ſo long ſhee reigned after the death of her huſband :) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleaſures, as it is written of him) was well pleaſed with his mothers proſperous government and undertakings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphoſis of her mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of baſe parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Beroſus calls her after the name of her City wherein ſhe was born, Semiramis Aſcalonitis, of Aſcalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philiſtims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Aſcalon, exceeding beautifull. Others ſay that this Derceta or Dercetis, the mother of Semiramis, was ſometimes a Recluſe, and had profeſt a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, ſeated on the bank of a Lake adjoyning to Aſcalon; and afterward falling in love with a godly young man, ſhe was by him made with childe, which (for fear of extreme puniſhment) ſhee conveyed away, and cauſed the ſame to be hidden among the high reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake : in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beaſts) the ſame was fed by certain birds, which uſed to feed upon or neer thoſe waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that foſtered Romulus. For ſome one or other adjoyning to this Lake, had the charge and foſteridge of this childe, who being perchance but ſome baſe and obſcure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her diſhonour and breach of vow; notwithſtanding which ſhe was caſt from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoyning, & (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fiſh, all but her face, which ſtill held the ſame beauty and humane ſhape. It is thought that from this Derceta the invention of that Idoll of the Philiſtims (called Dagon) was taken : for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fiſhes body : into whoſe Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell fell twice to the ground: and at the ſecond fall there remained onely the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For ſo S. Hierome hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius, write it by Dagon onely, which ſignifieth a fiſh, and ſo it onely appeared: the head thereof by the ſecond fall being ſundred from the body.

For my ſelf I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philiſtims was an Idoll repreſenting Triton, one of thoſe imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritimate (as all thoſe of the Philiſtims were, and ſo were the beſt of Phœnicia) uſed all their devotions to Neptune, and the reſt of the petty gods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after diſcomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUt for her Pedigree, I leave it to the Aſſyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I aſcribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and eaſe doe more often accompany licentiouſneſſe in men and women, than labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princeſſe more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the works ſhe did at Babylon and elſewhere, and for the wars ſhe made with glorious ſucceſſe: all but her laſt enterpriſe of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that ſhe never returned: and that of all her moſt powerfull Army there ſurvived but onely twenty perſons: the reſt being either drowned in the river of Indus, dead of the famine, or ſlain by the ſword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reaſon hath numbred; ſo were thoſe that returned leſſe than could have eſcaped of ſuch an Army, as conſiſted of four millions and upwards. For theſe numbers which ſhe levied by her Lievtenant Dercetæus, (ſaith Suidas) did conſiſt of Foot-men three millions; of Horſ-men one million; of Chariots armed with hooks on each ſide, one hundred thouſand; of thoſe which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thouſand; of raw Hides for all uſes three hundred thouſand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thouſand, by which ſhe might tranſport over Indus at once three hundred thouſand ſouldiers: which Gallies were furniſhed with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. Theſe incredible and impoſſible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nouriſh (had every man and beaſt but fed upon graſſe) are taken from the authority of Cteſias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: ſo Diodorus himſelfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whoſe Army (though the ſame was far inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to overload the beliefe of any reaſonable man. For all Authors conſent, that Xerxes tranſported into Greece an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to paſſe the Helleſpont) three thouſand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the ſeverall Provinces whence thoſe Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

Suid. f. 8. 45. ht. S.

But of what multitude ſoever the Army of Semiramis conſiſted, the ſame being broken and overthrown by Staurobates upon the banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extremum; ſhe ſang her laſt ſong; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their enſignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (beſides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a wall carried fourſquare of great heighth and beauty, having on each ſquare certain brazen Gates curiouſly engraven. In the Core of the ſquare ſhe raiſed a Tower of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Baſis of a leſſe circuit) ſhe ſet a ſecond Tower; and ſo eight in all one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldæan Prieſts made the obſervation of the Stars; becauſe this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower have many Travellers been deceived; who ſuppoſe that they have ſeen a part of Nimrods Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thouſand talents of frankincenſe every yeer (ſaith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonoſor adorn with the ſpoils of Hieruſalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which veſſels and ornaments Cyrus re-delivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the ſoile; which Alexander is ſaid to have repaired, by the perſwaſions of the Chaldæans. I deny not that it might have been in his deſire ſo to doe; but he enjoyed but a few yeers after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any ſuch work. The Egyptians (ſaith Proclus) inhabiting a low and levell ground, and given to the ſame ſuperſtition of the Stars that the Chaldæans were, erected in imitation, and for the ſame ſervice and uſe, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were conſpicuæ undique navigantibus, ſaith Plinie. Of theſe Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obſerver of rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by ſteps to the top of the higheſt) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui ſeroit a ſa ſommite, & tirant une fleche in l' air, a peine pourroit l' envoyer hors de ſa baſe q' elle ne ſe tombaſt ſur les degrez; The beſt Archer ſtanding on the top of one of theſe Pyramides, and ſhooting an arrow from thence into the ayre as far as he can, with great difficulty ſhall be able ſo to force the ſame, but that it will fall upon ſome of the degrees or ſteps.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES from the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of SOLOMON.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the Storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

AFter the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of war at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now becaus there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousie he every yeer changed his Provinciall Governours, and built Colledges for the Chaldæan Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successour, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successour of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, invented jewels of gold and stone, and some engines for the war: I will for this present passe them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till we meet these Assyrians again in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes, or Belanius. For otherwise if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us downe without errour, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch up the story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not help us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis, Historiam non constare; No marvell if then in things very ancient, History want assurance. Plut. in Thesee.

The better therefore to find out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeer the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth fortieth three yeer of Ninus was the birth-yeer of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeer after the floud the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeers; others 352. yeers between Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250. yeers from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the fortieth three yeer of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeer of Abrahams birth was in the yeer after the flood 293. or, as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeer 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give reason for my own opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way a part from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envie casteth at Novelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easie wayes of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errours, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the yeer 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeer 352.

THose which seek to prove this account of 292. yeers, between the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70. yeers, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly, upon the opinion of Josephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly look't over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; That Terah at 70. yeers begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth yeer of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set down the genealogie of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130. yeer of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132. &c. Moses having no where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeer, in which his father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. yeers: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100. yeers.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his fathers death.

TO answer all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unlesse the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travells, that serveth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journies into Canaan: the later after his fathers Fathers death, the former presently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture, drawne from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God to goe out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it selfe. Heb. 11. 8.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct and plaine, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journies into Canaan; one before Terahs death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can picke any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that he be beleeved in the rest. But that he performed the commandement of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams comming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jewes, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make us thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despaire, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborne nations: a nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to flie into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no son to inherit the promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent. Acts 7. 4. Heb. 11. 8.

Secondly, let us consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe over; the length whereof was 300 English miles; and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great river of Euphrates, to travell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For if he travailled it twice; then was his journey in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe (that he had not animum revertendi, not any thought of looking backward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham took Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possest, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrivall. For had his Father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation. Gen. 12. 5.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the

the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Father's death, or some time after, being then by their account 135 years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within foure or five years after
Gen. 24. that time his greatest, or (as may seem) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very solemn oath his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travail into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within foure or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely son, who was then five and thirty years old; before which age most of the Patriarchs after the Floud had begotten children: rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat
Gen. 24. 35. 36. &c. happened which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Masters errand, was fain to lay open the whole story of his masters prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had borne to him a son in her old age? If Abraham himself, a more certain Authour, had so lately been among them, would not all this have bin an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how averse he was from permitting his son to be
Gen. 24. 6. & 8. carried thither, even though a wife of his own kinred could not have been obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a
Gen. 28. Wife of his own linage; not without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himself away from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lots wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrews. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel,
2 Kin. 20. it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the propheſie which thereupon he heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsell of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, Psal. 137. when by the waters of Babylon they sate down and wept. Concerning Egypt we reade,
1 Kin. 14. 25. & 2 Kin. 23. v. 29. that Sesac and Neco, Kings of Egypt, brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt I do not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found Deut. 17. v. 16. in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of judgement or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travails of Abraham are precisely set down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, becauſe their flockes and heards of Cattell were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the ſecond time he removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence having purſued Amraphell, and reſcued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa under Abimelec: and after neer unto it at Berſabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his ſon Iſaac on the mountain Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one ſtory, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be ſuppoſed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita his Cabala hath fained, it ſhould in reaſon be therewithall beleeved, that he would in thoſe his firſt travailes have provided himſelfe of ſome certain ſeate, or place of abiding: and not have come a ſecond time with his wife, kinſmen, family, goods and Cattell, not knowing whereon to reſt himſelf. But Abraham when he came from Charran, paſt through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Haie: and ſo from Nation to Nation, to diſcover and find out ſome fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Geneſis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journying towards the South: and alwayes unſettled. By occaſion of which wandring to and fro, ſome ſay, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebræi. Gen. 12. 6.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly beene in the Countrey, we may note, that ere he came unto Bethel and Haie, and at his firſt entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, ſaying, Unto thy ſeed will I give this Land, ſhewing it him as unto a ſtranger therein, and as a Land to him unknowne. For Abraham without any other provident care for himſelfe, beleeved in the Word of the living God: neither ſending before, nor comming firſt to diſcover it; but being arrived, he received a ſecond promiſe from God, that he would give thoſe Countries unto him and his ſeed to inhabite and inherite. Mont. in Cell.

Laſtly, what ſhould move any man to thinke, that Moſes would have omitted any ſuch double journey of Abrahams, ſeeing he ſetteth downe all his paſſages elſe-where long and ſhort? as when he moved from Sichem, and ſeated betweene Haie and Bethel, the diſtance being but 20. miles: and when he moved thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre and ſate downe at Gerar, being leſſe than ſixe miles; No, Moſes paſt over all the times of the firſt age with the greater brevity, to haſten him to the ſtory of Abraham: ſhutting up all between the Creation and the floud in ſixe chapters; which age laſted 1656. yeeres: but he beſtoweth on the ſtory of Abraham, fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleventh, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moſes forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams travels, or other actions: or that he would ſet down thoſe ſmall-removes of five miles, and omit thoſe of three hundred. For ſuch a journey in going and coming would have miniſtred ſome variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inſerting and adding to Abrahams ſtory.

§. IV.

The anſwer to another of the objections propoſed, ſhewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

NOw touching the objection, where it is ſaid, that it was very unlikely that Terah ſhould beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, ſeeing Abraham himſelfe thought it a wonder to have a ſon at an hundred: this is hardly worth the anſwering. This wonder is indeed miſ-caſt, and miſtaken: Abraham having reſpect onely to Sarah his wife, when he ſpake of their many yeares. For when the Angel ſaid unto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe Sarah thy wife ſhall have a Son, it followeth in the next verſe, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and ſtricken in age, and it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then in that it is ſaid, it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his ſecond wife Keturah had many ſons after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Jockſhan, Medan, Midian, Iſbbak, and Shuah: and the eldeſt of theſe was borne 37. years after Iſaac: and the youngeſt youngest forty years after. What strangenesse then, that Terah, being 130 years old, should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despaire of Abraham at one hundred yeers? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the yeare 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat five sons 36. years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. years old: it is not strange that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Jesse, who lived so many years and ages after Abraham, begat sons at 100. years, or neer it, it cannot be marvailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age and seven years after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speak something to the objection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70. years old. For Abrahams age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abrahams age, unlesse we make him the eldest son, is false. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the year of his death: then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That Saint Stephen hath told us, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205. so as the 75. year of Abraham was the 205. year of Terah: which known, there can be no errour in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, and Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel: and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a son at 90. years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-childe of Nahor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-childe also of Nahor: it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Jos. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their naturall Country, and City of Ur in Chaldæa, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldæa; but Lot, his son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charran, gave his sons daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himself having also married in his own Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mix themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seen the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this servant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, go, that she may be thy Masters sons wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often uſing of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, it is a ſigne that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chryſoſtome, and ſome late Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaſter, Muſculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, becauſe he retained certain Idols, or houſehold Gods, which Rachel ſtole from him; yet that he believed in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams ſervant, bleſſed of JEHOVAH, as aforeſaid. So as for my ſelf I dare not avow, that theſe men were out of the Church, who, ſure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham firſt of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldeſt: together with divers reaſons proving that Abraham was not the eldeſt ſon of Terah.

TO the main objection; which I anſwer laſt, becauſe it ſeemeth of moſt ſtrength, by which, thoſe that ſtrive to ſhorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and born in the 70. yeer of Terah's life; grounding themſelves firſt and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived 70. yeers Gen. 11. 26. and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I ſay, that although Abraham in this verſe be firſt named, yet the ſame is no proof at all that he was the eldeſt and firſtborn ſon of Terah. For it is no neceſſary conſequent, that the firſt named in Scriptures was therefore eldeſt in bloud and birth; neither doth it appear, that it pleaſed God to make eſpeciall choice of the firſt ſons in nature and time: for Seth was not the firſt-born of Adam; nor Iſaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Iſaac; nor Juda and Joſeph of Jacob; nor David the eldeſt of Jeſſe; nor Solomon of David: as is formerly remembred.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeers old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: ſhewing that at the 500. yeer of his age he began to beget the firſt of thoſe three ſons. For according to S. Auguſtine, ſpeaking generally, Nec attendendus eſt in his ordo nativitatis, ſed ſignificatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham: The order of nativity is not here to be reſpected, but the ſignification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the ſons of Noah: ſo is it here; where it is ſaid, That Terah lived 70. years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himſelf being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Anceſtors were at 30. The like alſo happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 133. Enoſh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalaleel at 70. Mahalaleel Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. yeers old when he began to beget the firſt of his three Sons, as aforeſaid. And S. Auguſtine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngeſt of Terah's ſons, than otherwiſe: though for his excellency he was worthily named firſt. His own words are theſe: Fieri enim potuit ut poſterior ſit generatus Abraham: ſed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, ſaith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was firſt named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming firſt or laſt proveth nothing who was firſt or laſt born: either in thoſe iſſues of Noah, or in theſe of Terah: Neither hath God any reſpect of the eldeſt in nature, as touching his election or ſpirituall bleſſing; for Moſes nameth firſt the children of the promiſe, and the eldeſt and firſt in Gods favour. Pietas ergo, vel ipſa potius electio divina, quæ comitem ſecum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare: Piety, ſaith he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it or after it, piety and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among thoſe of Thare. Aug. quæſt. ſuper Gen. 25.

For the reſt it is manifeſt, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeer of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Iſmael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Iſaac, when Abraham had conſumed 100. yeers. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham roſe out, when he reſcued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeers: and it is as manifeſt that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Gen. 12. 4. Gen. 16. 16. Act. 7. 4.

Terah

Gen. 14. Terah begat Abraham at 70. yeer old, then must Abraham have been 135. yeares when he first set his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah: which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75. he rescued Lot at 83. he had Ismael at 86. he had Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest son of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeare of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had beene 35. yeares old, and Ismael 49. both which must then have beene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unlesse we should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else beleeve the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word μετα may be transported by the Latine sub, aswell as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to have beene borne in the seventy yeer of Terah; we must give those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authority will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Ur of Chaldæa, nor in Haran, nor in ten yeeres after his arrivall into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeare of the World 2083. and the yeere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094. which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abrahams sons were borne in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah lived; nor in lesse than ten yeeres after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest son of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Gen. 12. Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have beene the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205. yeeres; and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeer of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iscah wanted but ten yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had been the elder brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at nine yeeres old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeer after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeeres as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iscah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Againe, to what end was the word Iscah of Jisbcah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to speake of any thing superfluous, it is not used in Gods Booke: and if Iscah had not belonged to the story, it had been but an idle name to no purpose remembred.

Now if it had beene true (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Bethuel and Rebecca the mother of Israel and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscah in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name, of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproveth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeers old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Harans daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeers as old as Abraham: it may appear to every reasonable man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest son of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first, and before his Father left Ur in Chaldæa. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, upon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but ten yeers younger than Abraham himself. Lyra his words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso

Abraham,

Abraham, ſequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram : imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quòd Abraham fuit ultimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem : & ponendus erat caput ſtirpis & generationis ſequentis : & quia primò facta eſt ei repromiſſio expreſſa de Chriſto, ſicut ſupra dictum eſt de Sem, &c. If therefore (ſaith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himſelfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeers old when he begat Sarah : And therefore it ſeemeth better to be ſaid, that Abraham was the laſt born of the three ſons of Thare, nevertheleſſe he is named firſt for his dignity, both becauſe hee was to be ordained head of the ſtock and generation following, and becauſe the promiſe of Chriſt was firſt made unto him, as before it is ſaid of Sem.

§. VII.

A concluſion of this diſpute, noting the Authors on both ſides : with an admonition, that they which ſhorten the times make all ancient ſtories the more unprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reaſon, that Haran was the eldeſt ſon of Terah, and not Abraham : and that Abraham was born in the 130.yeer of Terahs life, and not in the 70.yeer. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S.Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was 75.yeers old ; theſe two numbers added make 205.yeers, the full age of Terah : ſeeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my ſelfe, I have no other end herein than to manifeſt the truth of the Worlds ſtory. I reverence the judgements of the Fathers : but I know they were miſtaken in particulars. Saint Auguſtine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controverſie. For whatſoever is borrowed from him out of his ſixteenth book de Civitate Dei, cap. 13. the ſame may be anſwered out of himſelfe in his five and twentieth queſtion upon Gen. But S.Auguſtine herein followed Joſephus and Iſidor : and Beda followed S.Auguſtine. And it was out of a fooliſh pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Joſephus ſought to make Abraham the firſt born : as if God had had reſpect to the eldeſt in nature. So did Joſephus together with Nicholas Damaſcenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewiſh Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah : and ſaid that Abraham was followed with 318. Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him ; trecentos & octodecim præfectos habuit : quorum ſingulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharao invading him with a great Army, took from him his wife Sarah : Such fables argue that Joſephus is not to be beleeved, but with diſcreet reſervations. Acts 7.4. Gen. 12.4

This account of times, allowing no more than 292.yeers from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrew. But how ſhould we value the opinion of ſuch Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgement in ſuch matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in ſetting down the ſucceſſion of the Perſian Kings under whom they lived, whoſe Hiſtory was not ſo far remote in time, as theſe antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet groſly have they erred therein, and ſo familiar are their miſtakings in all things of like nature, that we ſeldom find their opinion rehearſed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Romane religion are alſo generally on the ſame ſide : it being a thing uſuall among them, to maintain whatſoever they have been formerly known to hold and beleeve. Contrariwiſe, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and ſome following him : of later times, Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Proteſtants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130.yeer of his father Terah. From theſe (as in a caſe not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the ſame Religion, and thoſe nevertheleſſe good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chytræus, Funcius and others, are very averſe herein, eſpecially Joſephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calviſius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poyſonous. Contrariwiſe, Auguſtinus Torniellus, a Prieſt of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whoſe Annals are newly ſet forth, very earneſtly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered ; not alledging Beroaldus, nor any Proteſtant Writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to heretikes. For my ſelfe, I doe neither miſlike the contrary opinion, becauſe commonly commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approved it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will adde thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgement, that the best approved Historians, divine and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgement to our selves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeers, or thereabouts, between the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeers between the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first born of Thare, in the 70. yeer of his life: the other a younger son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130. yeers. And if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfie our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it above 1072. yeers between the Flood and Abrahams birth: than to take away any part of those 352. yeers given. For if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was born, we shall find that it were very ill done of us by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply between Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neer the quick, the reputation of the whole story might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That whersoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-understood. For in Abrahams time all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palæstina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India: and those not built with sticks, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest and best agreeing with reason & nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish brains, who onely bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the story of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

An. mundi 2008. Ant. 352. natus Abraham, Eus. Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 16. c. 17.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alledged, I conclude, that from the generall Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeers were consumed: and taking the Assyrian history with us, the same number of yeers were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeer of Ninus: in which 43. yeer of Ninus, Abraham was born: which happened in the yeer of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeers, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeers to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30. yeers more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeers to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeers were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was born: and that Raama had that age before any of his sons were were begotten, it may be gathered by example and comparison: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Reu in the same yeer of his life. Gen. 11. 18.

Let us then allow 60. yeers more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brougt forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeer they arrived in Shinaar, whereof there are 6. yeers remaining) we may give them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and cattell: and, as some ancient writers have conceived, and Eecanus of later times, they kept alwayes the mountain sides, for fear of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham born: both which S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeers of the 352. from the Flood to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. necessity bestoweth on Nimrod.

An à salute humani generis ab aquis centesimo primo cœpit regnum Babylonicum sub nostro Saturno patre Jovis Beli, qui imperavit annis 65. Berosus.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod is over-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but one hundred seventy nine yeers: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelve: whereas Sale, who was the son of Arphaxad, the son of Sem, lived foure hundred three yeers: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the son of Chus, the son of Cham.

Now after Abraham was born,
Ninus reigned 9. yeers: which added to 43. make ——— 52.
Ninus dieth, and leaveth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. yeers, and died in the 52. yeer complete of Abrahams life. Of the World. 2017. Of the Flood 761.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeers, in the second yeer of whose reign Abraham left Mesopotamia. 2059. anna. 403. a dil. 2083.

When Abraham was 85. yeers old, he rescued his Nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel king of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeers, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeers after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeer of his age: so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninias the son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeers, as aforesaid, being the 75. yeer of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. yeer of Abraham, and the 33. yeer of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeers: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit, for the times of the Assyrian kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set downe, according to the times noted by Moses in the story of Abraham, it is most certain; unlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impiety, or account the whole History of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fablers. 427. 2093. 437.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinaar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeer of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeer of the reigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time king of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis, or Basan, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was king of Shinaar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeer of Abrahams life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were

Gen. 14. 4. the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelve yeers were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeer they rebelled, and in the 14. yeer came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprise, who was then king of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinaar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, hee should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those foure kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomorra, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels,) yet this makes not the conjecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall at the time of this war: though not long before it commanded all the kingdoms between India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlosyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOw the two other kings joyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellespont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellespont far distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumæa; which Countries these foure kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as Commanders: but used all the art they had to in-Xenophon. vite Cræsus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text)
Gen. 14. made war with Bera king of Sodome, Birsha king of Gomorrha, Shinab king of Admath, and Shemebar king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar. All which five kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Josua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoyning; of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Josua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in kings from Pontus or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotence and weaknesse in the kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that divers kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar; yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatnesse of these petty kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull than fearfull: But the whole Country by these foure kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying between Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the river of Arnon on the South side, and by Libanus on the North, consisting of the two small Provinces of Traconitis or Basan, and the region of the Moabites: a conquest far unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all

all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila convert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as far fetched to joyne with the Assyrians in this War, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest; so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet hee dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Grecian Cosmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Celosyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Celosyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same family, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward again Aretas; as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lievtenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was Generall of his Army, and the principall Commander under him, who was a King of kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the son of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the government of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch here spoken of may with more reason be taken for the king of Arabia, the son of Arius, the Confederate of Ninus: whose sons held league, as their fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chaldæa: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

THe fourth king by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, king of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Calvin of runnagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilæa was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galile, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called king of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilæa was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adjoyning to Phœnicia, and Palæstina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these do also joyne themselves to Mesopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

Gen. 12. 6.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

FIrstly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperour, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall governour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldæa, Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither do I beleeve that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to overlook what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chief Commanders became kings after him. Tamberlain conquered Asia and India with a storm-like and terrible succesſe: but to prevalent fury God hath adjoyned a short life: and whatsoever things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, insolent and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her son having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no lesse feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoyning (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a succesſour. For, in regno Babylonico hic parum resplenduit; This King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is that the necks of mortall men having been never before galled with the yoak of forrain dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery: no long descent having as yet invested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate son of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a mind lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeers, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what hee could not without contentious perill enjoy.

These considerations being joyned to the story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel king of Shinaar was rather an inferiour to the king of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion, I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travell upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldæa to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeer of Ninias, when Abraham, obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. yeers after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis Army of four millions, with her self, utterly consumed in India, and all her Armies and engins of warre, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunitie even to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the son of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subjected them: which needed not if they had not beene revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balaeus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom is said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher; which undertakings had beene no other than the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath beene gathered out of Moses, as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not unprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THe consent of all Writers, whose workes have come to my perusal, agreeing as they doe, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellowes, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce us to thinke that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often else-where in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may we otherwise conceive of this Historie: removing thereby some difficulties, which men perhaps have beene unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had beene a strange conjecture to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian against the Sodomite, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a parte of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldæa, Mesopotamia, Syria, and parte of Arabia, & Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his ear, being dis-joyned by so many great nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himself, yea the kingdome of Ellasar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependances; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorrah? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to imploy the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five pettie Towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer unto him, unsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the Text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it beene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more than madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approched, still to entertaine hope of evasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea between themselves & the river of Indus?

Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no great wisedom, if he, knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lievtenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to countervail one moneths charges of so huge an army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their army in the field? Now the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed so great) make any fearfull matter: but compose the two armies as equally matcht, saying they were four kings against five: yea if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings; of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Ninias who lived foure or five yeeres longer, permit that he should have died so soone: neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure Kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colonie, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usuall manner of those times.

Gen. 14. 17.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troup of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many kings as severall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceive, that it was neither unusuall for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing somtimes one the other, somtimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the sloathfull quality of Ninias then reigning in Assyria: whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed in the reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilst others, more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Under-king or Satrapa of Shinaar, under Ninias; who may be supposed to have had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninive: and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the City of his Mother, whom he hated as an usurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might erre: then can I think that the opinion, That those four Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Persian King, than King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy mans son, was very well pleased, to give passage and assistance to these Captains or pettie Kings. These and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shal seem better than these. But of what countries or people soever these 4. were kings, this expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sons, and of his Nephews Esau and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that even in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing kingdom; it will not be amisse in the next place to speak somewhat of the antiquities and first kings thereof.

we

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

SOone after the confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham with many of his issue and followers (having doubtlesse known the fertility of Egypt before the Floud) came thither and tooke possession of the Country; in which they built many Cities: and began the kingdome one hundred ninety one yeers after the deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewn in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
2269.	613.	Typhon } Hercules. }
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesostris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Busiris or Osiris the second.
2476.	820.	Acenchere or Theruutis, or Meris.
2488.	832.	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Chencres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table, and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity, manifest and restlesse truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests: who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted unto strangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent works and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are never found found but in States that have greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of marvellous greatnesse, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own name such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were inforced them upon us by their authority. A third and generall cause of more than Egyptian darknesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by John Annius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may adde mine) I think thus; that Annius having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved writers confirm him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Annius his Authors: The profane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the yeer after the Floud. 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controversie, the best mean is by help of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is joyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeer of Ninus: in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve, which were called the greater gods: so that all the yeers of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie endured fourteen yeers: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. These three last are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeers. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bin mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this onely reason, that Annius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the yeer of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161. yeers, which according to our account were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. years, which were between the Floud and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reign in Egypt, was in the yeer 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinaar, arrived at Babel, Anno à diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourty yeers, as Glycas recordeth: whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattel, and substance through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogs, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seventy one yeers had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow twenty yeers: and these sums being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeers after the Floud, before they arrive at Babel, 40. yeers for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Egypt, and settling there, make up the sum of 191. yeers; at which time we said that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeers if we adde the 161. yeers of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the yeer of Abrahams birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their severall times above 161. yeers: Let it ſuffice that had they laſted longer, then either muſt Ægypt have been peopled as ſoon as Babel after the Floud, or the Dynaſties (as Mercator thinks) muſt have been before the floud. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeers before the plantation of Egypt, after the floud, enough hath been ſaid to prove: and that the Dynaſties were not before the floud, the number of the long-lived generations betweene Adam and the floud, which was leſſe than the number of the Dynaſties, may ſufficiently witneſſe. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynaſties, then may this have beene as well after the floud, as before: conſidering that the ſons of Noah did not in every Countrie ere ſuch forme of Policie, as had bin uſed in the ſame ere the Deluge: but ſuch, as the diſpoſition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumſtances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That theſe Dynaſties were not divers families of Kings, but rather ſucceſſions of Regents, oft times many under one King.

THe ſhort continuance of the Dynaſties, doth ſhew that they were not ſeverall races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to ſtile them. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted. For in reſtitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more eaſie to denie than to affirme. But this may be ſaid, partly upon good circumſtance, partly upon the ſureſt proofe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countrie into the hands of ſome truſtie Counſellor, onely reſerving the Soveraignty to themſelves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Maſters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Viſier. This is confirmed, firſt by the number of the Dynaſties, wherof many are under Cham, and more than one under Oſiris or Mizraim; and muſt therefore have bin ſucceſſions, not of Kings, but rather of Counſailors and Regents. Secondly, by cuſtome of ſuch Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philiſtim in his dealing with Abraham and Iſaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoſt: though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleaſure. Likewiſe of Abimelech the ſon of Gideon it was ſaid: Is not he the ſon of Jerubbaal? and Zebul is his officer? Alſo Iſhboſheth the ſon of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoſte. Yea, David himſelfe hating Joab for his crueltie, did not puniſh him in regard of his greatneſſe, which was ſuch, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and diſpoſition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idleneſſe and pleaſure, to have laid the burden of government upon others; and upon jealouſie, the companion of unworthineſſe, to have changed his Lievtenants often. Above all other proofes is the advancement of Joſeph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh ſaid to Joſeph; Only in the Kings throne will I be above thee: behold, I have ſet thee over all the Land of Egypt. William Archbiſhop of Tyre, who flouriſhed about the yeere of our Lord, one thouſand one hundred eightie, affirmes that the like or very ſame forme of government by Viceroys, was in his time practiſed in Egypt, having there beene in uſe (as he beleeved) ever ſince the time of Joſeph. He plainely ſhewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrie, however they have been ſo deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of ſubjects unto the Calphe: who reſiding in a moſt magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of civil government, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office and authority royall, into the Soldans hands. He that ſhall reade in William of Tyre, the ſtate of the Caliphe, or Atulene Elhadech, with the forme of his Court, ſhall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lievtenant, as great in authority as Joſeph was, though far inferiour in wiſedom.

Will. Tyr. de bell. Sacro l. 19. c. 17. 18. 19. & 20.

Lib. 19. c. 22.

To think that many names of ſuch Regents or Lievtenants as Joſeph was, have crept into the Liſt of the Egyptian Kings, were no ſtrange imagination. For Joſephs brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrie: beſides, it is not unlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian Prieſts would as eaſily report him a King to poſterity, as ignorant men and ſtrangers deem him ſuch, under whoſe hand all diſpatches

of

of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Josephus brethren, doth sufficiently witnesse. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus, and Sesostris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas; which could not have been, if Menas had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry linages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoever meanes a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that was the Kings gift and free choice, that gave the office. But the Crowne royall alwayes passed by descent, and not by election: which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby either have beene inthralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or injoying their Fathers land, though not his estate, have bin more mighty than the king: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the king himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esay it is said of Pharaoh: I am the son of the ancient King.

Esay 19.

§. IV.

Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Osiris.

THat the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the posteritie of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris called himselfe the eldest son of Cham, saying, Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needes be understood of Cham: for this Saturnus Egyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not far from Egypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in quæstionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrie Ham: as in foure severall places in the Psalmes this Countrie is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrie of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, ut puto (saith he) à Chamo Noes filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Ægyptum usq; hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alledged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem lived 600: Arphachshad and Shelah each above 400. But strange it had beene, if one Saltis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Bæon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus, and Sesostris. Reineccius in histor. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris, according to Diodorus: who, saith he, was the son of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitie and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the son of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineccius, citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mezre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeer of his death is no where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus, to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebæi began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius: who avoucheth avoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well beleeve; assenting so far to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named onely, according to the severall seats of the kings.

Psal. 78. 51. 105. 23. 27. 106. 22.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reign ended: and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the son of Osiris.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the son of Mizraim, called Hercules Lybius, made war in Italy, to revenge his fathers death on the associats of Typhon, in the 41. yeer of Baleus King of Assyria: before which yeer hee had made many great wars in Egypt, Phœnicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spain: and having ended his Egyptian wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus far Berosus, or Authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon infers, that six yeers may be allowed to the wars, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Egyptian wars were ended: so should the death of Osiris have been the 34. of Baleus, when himself had reigned 297. yeers. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholar than Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a far longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time, though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had been the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Egypt but seven yeers before the death of Osiris: and have lived there in the reign of Typhon. A thing not easily beleeved. For it was the same king who advanced Joseph, bade him send for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his fathers Funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh yeer of Israels coming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeers from that number, which Krentzhemius conjectures his reign to have continued: namely, seven which hee should have lived after Jacobs coming into Egypt; nine in which Joseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming: and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Josephs advancement.

Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 1. Plut. l. de Isid. & Osid.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have endured ten yeers: After which proportion we may well give not onely six yeers, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars, in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute unto Orus the 13. yeers, which passed between the time of Josephs being sold into Egypt, unto his advancement, considering that Potiphar who bought him, and whose daughter he may seem to have married, continued all that while chiefe Steward unto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Potiphar for his faithfulnesse to Orus, the son of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reign made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Joseph, and finding him a just man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Josephs hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further, and say, That when the saying of Joseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his servants; then Potiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Joseph, the ancient graces of God, and his injurious imprisonment: whereupon he gave him his daughter to wife; and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward unto him, who afterward in regard of Potiphar, did favour the Priests, when he bought the lands of of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike to the Friarly book of Asenath, Potiphars daughter: but unto such as consider that God works usually by meanes; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died: it would seem a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the wars of Hercules, in which by this reckoning hee should have spent 42. yeers after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises and atchievments proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us: or if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the undisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless, I freely grant that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of divers errours about the former Sesostres.

CONcerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three yeers to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proofe, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alledging no witnesse, but as it were saying, Teste me ipso: yet herein we may think him to speak probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his fathers revenge; and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other wars, in the same quarrell, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Aventinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleeve it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, seven yeers were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven yeers after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable I think hee wanted not. Now whereas hee alloweth 90. yeers of the 18. Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seems that the reign of Orus lasted 115. yeers. From the death of Orus, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeers by our account: who (according to Beroaldus and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130. yeer of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus: From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham ——— 352

From that time to the { vocation of Abraham ——— 75 departure out of Egypt ——— 430

Summa ——— 857

which summe divers other waies may be collected. Since therfore to the departure out of Egypt there do remain (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeers from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesostris, or Sesonchosis: who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonii: not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, is by many histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Asia: to have built a fleet of ships on the red Sea: & so to have entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justine erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris: For Justine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the father in law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gerar, and gave it to his daughter: (as we may reade more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldæans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostris. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Judæa with with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided; unleſſe it be ſufficient proofe of his own opinion, that he himſelf placeth Seſoſtris next to Orus; following the Scoliaſtes Apollonii. But further anſwer may be made to ſhew that they were not one. For, as Juſtine witneſſeth, Seſoſtris, otherwiſe Vexoris, made war on people far removed, abſtaining from his neighbours. Seſac came up purpoſely againſt Hieruſalem. Seſoſtris, as Diodorus witneſſeth, had but 24000. horſe, Seſac had 60000. Seſoſtris had 8020. chariots, Seſac 1200. Seſoſtris made his expedition for no private purpoſe, but to get a great name: Seſac, as moſt agree, had no other purpoſe than to ſuccour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign; whom he had favoured even againſt Solomon: therefore Seſoſtris muſt needs have reigned whileſt Iſrael abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: becauſe thoſe Hiſtorians affirm that he reigned next after the gods; it moveth me nothing. For Oſiris did ſucceed thoſe fifteen gods; namely, the twelve greater, and three leſſer: himſelf alſo (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as alſo Menæus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: though miſtaken by ſome as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni ſignifying an Arithmetician, which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Oſiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philoſpher, and Benefactor to mankinde, by giving good laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In proweſſe and great undertakings Seſoſtris was no whit inferiour to Oſiris. For he ſought victory not for gain, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and ſubmitted themſelves to his wil and royall diſpoſition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great Treaſon, the houſe in which hee was being by his own brother purpoſely fired: which nevertheleſſe he is ſaid to have eſcaped, and to have reigned in all thirty three yeers: after which time he choſe rather to die than to live; becauſe he fell blinde. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Seſoſtris left a ſon, whoſe name was Pheron, or Pherones: who afterwards took the name of Seſoſtris; but was nothing like to his father in glory: for he ſhortly fell blind. The cauſe of his blindneſſe, Herodotus attributes to his aſſaulting the river Nilus with a javelin: which tale Diodorus having likewiſe heard, yet reports as a fable, ſaying that perhaps he took the diſeaſe naturally from his father. How long this man reigned, it is no where expreſſed: yet foraſmuch as Orus the ſecond, (otherwiſe Euſiris) who ſucceeded him, began 14. yeers after that this Seſoſtris had been king, it muſt needs be that this reigned 14. yeers at leaſt. That Euſiris began not untill theſe 14. yeers at leaſt were expired, the very account of time from the firſt of Euſiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Egypt, plainly ſhews, being almoſt generally agreed upon, to have been 75. yeers. That none came between Seſoſtris the ſecond, and Euſiris or Orus the ſecond, it ſtands onely upon probabilities: which are theſe. After Seſoſtris had reigned ſome while, he fell blind; after certain yeers he recovered his ſight, as is ſaid: which may have been true, but is more like to have been a fable: ſurely the manner of his recovery, as it is ſet down, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking upon a woman, or waſhing his eyes with her water, who had onely known her own huſband, he got his ſight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindneſſe, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. yeers: ſo his works which were great, do much more ſtrongly argue, that his reign was not very ſhort. His works are largely ſet down by Herodotus and Diodorus: a part of which may ſeem to have been the finiſhing of that which his father had begun, about the channels and ſluces of Nilus: whom I think he rather frighted, (as his father had done) with ſpades and ſhovels, than with darts and javelins; and by his diligent overſight of that work, was like enough to loſe both his eye-ſight and his peoples love; whom his father had very buſily employed in exceſſive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queen Thermutis that took up Moses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the son of Solomon. For that Busiris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesostris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatnesse with the king by industry; and afterward with the people, by incensing them against their new king, as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: unlesse he have either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he sought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his own people was very plausible: who (as Exod. 1. appeares in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris, was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers; who also think that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the king who knew not Joseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reinecius doth shew; who also thinks him Author of the bloudy Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reign five yeers after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87. yeers, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindnesse of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-Royes in Egypt was; and how great confidence the kings did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that hee bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread; Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and soveraign authority; it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especiall reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many have done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reigne was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did usurp the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himself: it might wel be said that Pharaohs daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after, king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind king Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil nature even when he first arose: I think it more likely, that Busiris did it, using at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeers which passed between the beginning of Sesostris his reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Busiris, or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeers, according to Eusebius: whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moses out of the water, is said by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. yeers. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Muthis, according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Acencris; and out of Artabanus his History, Meris: Joseph calls her both Acenchere, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith, that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter.

Amenophis

Amenophis indeed is ſet next before Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, by Euſebius and others: but whether he were a King, or onely a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus Diodorus, and the ancient Hiſtorians name the ſon of Seſoſtris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Neece or Grand-childe, than the daughter of Pharaoh, becauſe of the glory of Seſoſtris, and the diſ-reputation of his ſon. If ſo, and if that Buſiris or Orus the ſecond marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our conjecture ſtrengthened, and then was ſhe both daughter, grand-childe, and wife unto Pharaoh: and ſurviving him, Queen of the land, 12. yeers. But if ſhe were daughter of Orus the ſecond, and ſiſter of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whoſe conjecture I will not oppoſe mine, then may it ſeem, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moſes was born: and who it was that periſhed in the Red Sea.

SHe had two brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who ſucceeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Euſebius; but his linage and off-ſpring deſcribed by Reineccius. Rathoris after his ſiſters death reigned nine yeers: after whom Chencres, thought to be his ſon, reigned ten yeers, and then periſhed in the Red Sea. During the reign of Chencres, Euſebius ſaith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io: of which Hiſtory elſewhere he reporteth otherwiſe. After the death of Chencres (whom ſome call Acencheres: but all or moſt do ſtile Ἀντίθεον, a fighter againſt God) Acherres reigned 8. yeers; and then Cherres 15. This deſcent ſeems from father to ſon. In the 11. yeer of Cherres it is ſaid by Euſebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwiſe was not unlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the deſtruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea: elſe could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his poſterity, ſeems to have taken all from Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. For whereas Armais is ſaid to have reigned four yeers after Cherres: and Armeſis one after Armais: theſe two kings are by Euſebius and others accounted as one, and his reign ſaid to have been five yeers. His name is called Armeus, otherwiſe Danaus: and his pedigree thus deſcribed by Reineccius in hiſtor. Julia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Buſiris.

Ægyptus or Rameſſes, who gave name to the Countrey, having expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lynceus, married to Hypermneſtra.	Danaus or Armeus expelled by his brother Ægyptus, after hee had reigned five yeers, became king of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to paſſe that the Nephews ſons of Epaphus ſhould have occupied the Kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to ſay: conſidering that Epaphus himſelf is reported by Euſebius to have been born in the time of Chencres. But foraſmuch as the Hiſtory of Epaphus his birth, is diverſly related by Euſebius, it may ſuffice, that Belus the father of Danaus and Ægyptus, otherwiſe called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally diſtant from Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, with Cherres the grand-childe of Chencres. And that the poſterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the Hiſtory of these two brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the latter 50. sons: perhaps, or rather questionlesse, by divers women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succeed Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeers. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. yeers. This Rameſſes or Ægyptus, is that Armeſeſmiamum, or Armeſeſmiamus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seems to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same king under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Ægyptian at the 40. yeer of his age: and fled into the wildernesse, and there abode for fear: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common errour, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Ægyptian kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeers more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Themosis (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference between Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses born under Armeſeſmiamum, and Israel delivered in the dayes of his son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharartes, of which name one was thought to have flourished either as a king, or a wise man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharartes, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the world is bound for his many notable works: yet my assent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Chencres was king, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place. Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Eusiris and all his children, than of one king alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first book against Julian the Apostata, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeers old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then king of Egypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeers: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea: of which our opinion being already layed open, I think it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-passe.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

TRue it is that the History it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations upon S. Augustine citeth very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: But if he did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories divine and human; while that Semiramis lived, she commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolomy a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Amesses in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke History, the first Booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though he cite some authorities; that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fiftly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numinius the Philosopher, who took Musæus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanas, who confesseth that Moses was called Musæus, by the Grecians: and who farther delivereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses, vir Deo conjunctissimus, is called Musæus Judæorum. Eusebius in his Chronoligy, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Iphereus, governed Assyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Criasus the Argives; that then (Sesostris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if we beleeve Saint Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moses ex Ægypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropis Athenienssium Regis; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved S. Augustine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne, Saphrus governing Assyria; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeers; his successor Mamelus 30. yeers; Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whose fourth yeere Cecrops began to governe in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41. So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criasus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeer of the Assyrian Saphrus: for take one yeer remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeeres of Mamelus, and the 40. yeeres of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeers yeers of Cecrops his 50. yeers: then take nine yeers out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus succeſſour, thoſe nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moſes left Egypt: and adde theſe nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly ſpent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50. and ſo it falleth right with S. Auguſtines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moſes led the people of Iſrael out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrews were oppreſt in Egypt, ſeemeth to have had beginning ſome eight or nine yeers before the birth of Moſes, and 54. yeers, or rather more after Joſeph: between whoſe death and the birth of Moſes, there were conſumed 64. yeers, ſome of which time, and 80 yeers after, they lived in great ſervitude and miſery. For as it is written in Exodus: They ſet taske-maſters over them, to keepe them under with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramaſes, &c. And by cruelty they cauſed the children of Iſrael to ſerve; and made them weary of their lives, by ſore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a maſtering power and ſtrong hand, they endured to the time by the wiſdome of God appointed: even from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Joſeph, who left the World when it had laſted 2370. yeeres to the eightieth yeere of Moſes, and untill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And becauſe thoſe things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be underſtood, I thinke it neceſſary to ſpeak a few words of the principall place therein named, in this diſcourſe.

Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elſewhere in the Scripture.

THis City which the Hebrews call Zoan, was built ſeven yeers after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes; and ſo doth Hieremy; the Septuagint, Tanais; Joſephus, Frotaidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegeſippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the land of Goſen, and is the ſame, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was ſtoned to death, for preaching againſt the Egyptian and Jewiſh Idolatry.

Num. 33. Ezechiel 30. Hierem. 2. 43. 44. 46. Joſeph. l. 1. c. 9. Tyr. de Bel. ſac. l. 19. c. 23.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moſes time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly reſided; and not unlikely to be the ſame City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Euſebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did reade Aſtronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhiſtor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwiſe, ſaying, that Abraham inſtructed the Egyptian Prieſts, and not the King; both which authorities Euſebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our Engliſh call it On; and Ptolomy, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other ſomewhat lower on the Eaſter-moſt branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Peluſium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Trojan, was the ſame which Vatablus and our Engliſh call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the ſame which Pomp. Mela, and Plynie call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Prieſt, or Prince, whoſe daughter Joſeph married. In the Territory adjoyning Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the high Prieſt of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Hieruſalem (Ptolomy Philopater then governing in Egypt) which ſtood in the time of Veſpaſian, 333. yeers after the foundation by Onias, whom Joſephus falſly reporteth herein to have fulfilled a prophecy of Eſay, c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti; In that day ſhall the Altar of the Lord be in the middeſt of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occaſion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Laſtly, there it was that our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus remained, while Joſeph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neer which (ſaith Brochard) the fountain tain is still found, called Jesus well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the City of Noph, remembred by Esay and Ezechiel, the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it took from a Mountain adjoyning, so called; which Mountain Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldæans name it Alchahyr; and Tudalensis Mizraim. Esay 19. 13. Ezech. 34. Hosea 9. 6. Lib. 2.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium. G. Tyr. l. 20. c. 17. lib. 2. c. 5.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future. Ezec. 30. 15, 16

Eubastus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Pibeseth. Ezech. 30. 17.

To make the story the more perceivable, I have added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethshemes, Balsephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stony. For all story without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we reade, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation and education.

BUt to return to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slavery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, quæ præerant (saith Comestor) multitudinis obstetricum, who had command given them over all mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now whether these two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is divetsly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulensis, and Pererius believe them to be Egyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witnesse both the wickednesse of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded Ver. 16. Joseph. ant. l. 2. c. 5. Abul. & Per. in exod.

commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children born within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affoording them the justice which every King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have imployed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giveth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a child, who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the laws of heaven and of nature) he stretched out his bloudy and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall Kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been temporall, he caused all the male children at that time born, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his own words, in the tenth verse of the fift of Exodus: Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there be war, they joyn themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkened understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of reeds, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princesse having beheld the child his form and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not onely preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her own, and with equall care to the son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, she called the child Moses, as it were, extractus or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or after Iosephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expressing water, and Hises, as much to say, as that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised before he was put into the Ark of reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most understanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, præfestisei sapientibus Ægyptiorum Magistris, à quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; unto whom she gave princely education, appointing over him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructers. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses, and the reign of Iosua.

Phil. de vita Mos.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians of his war in Æthiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

WHen Moses was grown to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius out of Artapanus, tell us of ten yeers war that he made against the Æthiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses, called Meroe; and how he recovered that City by the favour of Tharbis, a daughter of Æthiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Comestor a pretty tale of Moses, How after the end of that war, Tharbis resisting his return into Egypt, Moses most skilfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to be ingraven in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetfulnesse. These he set in two rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself: which ring of forgetfulnesse, after she had a while worn, she began to neglect the love she bare her husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeer of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppreſſed Hebrews, moved by compaſſion, in reſpect of his brother, and ſtirred up by diſdain againſt the other, in the contention he ſlew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a diſpoſition in ſome of his own Nation to accuſe him, for whoſe defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whoſe choſen ſervant he was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forſaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous ſtrangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleaſed God (working the greateſt things by the weakeſt worldly means) to make the watering of a few ſheep, and the aſſiſting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianite, an occaſion whereby to provide him a wife of one of thoſe, and a father in law, that fed him, and ſuſtained him in a Country neereſt Egypt, fitteſt to returne from; neceſſary to be known, becauſe interjacent between Egypt and Judæa, through which he was to lead the Iſraelites; and wherein God held him, till the occaſion which God preſented, beſt ſerved. And laſtly, where the glory of the world ſhined leaſt, amidſt mountainous Deſarts, there the glory of God, which ſhineth moſt, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings ſon, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meek and humble ſhepherd, ſitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of thoſe poor beaſts onely.

Ægyptian

In that part of Arabia neer Madian, he conſumed 40. yeers, And though (as Philo in the ſtory of Moſes life obſerveth) he did not neglect the care of thoſe flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Paſtorall knowledge; yet in that ſolitary Deſart he enjoyed himſelf: and being ſeparate from the preaſſe of the world, and the troubleſome affairs thereof, he gave himſelf to contemplation, and to make perfect in himſelf all thoſe knowledges, whereof his younger yeers had gathered the grounds and principles: the ſame Author alſo judging that his Paſtorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Eſt enim (ſaith Philo) ars Paſtoralis, quaſi præludium ad regnum, hoc eſt, ad regimen hominum, gregis manſuetiſſimi. Quemadmodum bellicoſa ingenia præexercent ſe in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod poſtea in militia & bello perfectura ſunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At verò præfectura manſueti pecoris, habet quiddam ſimile cum regno in ſubditis; ideoq; Reges cognominantur Paſtores populorum, non contumeliæ, ſed honoris gratia; The art of keeping ſheep is, as it were, an introductory exerciſe unto a Kingdom, namely, the rules over men, the moſt gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before-hand exerciſe themſelves in hunting, practiſing on wild beaſts thoſe things, which after they will accompliſh in warfare: thoſe brute beaſts affording matter, wherein to train themſelves, both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of reſemblance unto a Kingly rule over ſubjects; therefore Kings are ſtiled ſhepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moſes, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Pererius ſuppoſeth, I cannot judge of it, becauſe it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I ſubſcribe to Pererius opinion, That Moſes while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Geneſis; although I cannot deny the reaſon of Pererius conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might ſtrengthen the oppreſſed Hebrews: and by the promiſes of God to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, put them in aſſurance of their delivery from the Egyptian ſlavery, and of the Land of reſt, and plentie promiſed. Perer. in 3. c. Exod.

Of this calling back into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the marvails and wonders which he performed, thereby to perſwade Pharaoh, that he was the meſſenger of the moſt High, the particulars are written in the firſt fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needleſſe. But for the firſt, it is to be noted, that when Moſes deſired to be taught by God, by what name he ſhould make him known, and by whom he was ſent; he received from God ſo much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he diliver-red him in the firſt part of his anſwer, a name to be conſidered of by the wiſeſt: and in his ſecond, to be underſtood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it ſelf, but the Eternall: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment: their ſubſtance waſteth, and is repaired by nutri-ment, Exod. c. 3 v. 13. 14. & 15.

ment; never continuing at one ſtay, nor being the ſame ſo long as while one may ſay, Now. Likewiſe, whatſoever is conſumed in the longeſt continuance of time, the ſame in every ſhorteſt piece of time ſuffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one ſtate. Una eſt Dei & ſola natura quæ verè eſt: id enim quod ſubſiſtit, non habet aliundè, ſed ſuum eſt. Cætera quæ creata ſunt, etiamſi videntur eſſe, non ſunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & poteſt rurſum non eſſe, quod non fuit; It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himſelf, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they ſeem to be, yet they are not; for ſometimes they were not: and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in reſpect of the divine nature, the ſaying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Tota rerum natura umbra eſt, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a ſhadow, either empty or deceitfull: in compariſon of whom (ſaith Eſay) all Nations are as nothing, leſſe than nothing, and meer vanity.

Hier. ad Dam.

C. 40. v. 13.

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Egyptians were ſtrucken, the firſt was by changing the Rivers into bloud: God puniſhing them by thoſe waters, into which their Forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water ſay, Lord, thou art juſt, which art, and which waſt; and holy, becauſe thou haſt judged theſe things; for they ſhed the bloud of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore haſt thou given them bloud to drink.

C. 16. v. 5.

The reſt of the plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or ſtinging Waſps; by the death of their Cattell; by leprous Scabs; by Haile and Fire; by Graſhoppers; by Darkneſſe; after which Pharaoh forbad Moſes his preſence: moved the hardned heart of the unbelieving King, no longer, than the pain and perill laſted; till ſuch time as his own firſt-born, and the firſt-born of all his Nation periſhed. He then, while he feared his own life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) ſtood upon no condition: whereas before, he firſt yeelded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reſerving their beſtiall; but he was now content for the preſent, that the Iſraelites ſhould not onely depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels, of his own people: of which (the fear being paſt) he ſuddenly repented him, as his purſuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moſes received) ſlain a Lamb, without ſpot or blemiſh, for the Paſſeover, (a Sacrament of the moſt clean and unſpotted Saviour,) and with the bloud thereof coloured the poſt and lintern of the doors; the Angell of God in the night ſmote every firſt-born of Egypt, from the ſon of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Iſraelites excepted. At which terrible judgement of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yeelded, as before is ſaid, to their departure. The Egyptians (ſaith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with bloud, which the Iſraelites uſed after the Paſſeover; aſcribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely mark their Sheep and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preſerve them from lightning and other harms.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs purſuit of the Iſraelites: and of their paſſage towards the Red Sea, ſo far as Succoth.

NOw, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardned by God) he bethought him as well of the honour loſt, as of the ſhame remaining after ſo many Calamities and Plagues, in ſuffering them to depart with the ſpoils of his people, and in deſpight of himſelf. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readineſſe, he conſulted with himſelf what way the Iſraelites were like to take. He knew that the ſhorteſt and faireſt paſſage was through the Country of the Philiſtims. But becauſe theſe people were very ſtrong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he ſuſpected that Moſes meant to finde ſome other out-let, to wit, through the Deſart of Etham; and there, becauſe the Country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard acceſſe, and that Moſes was peſtered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, he thought it impoſſible for the Iſraelites to eſcape escape him that way. In the mean while having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittains used against the Romanes, while they made the war for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might joyn themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforc't him at this time to give an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partiall in this affair, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day he went on sixteen miles: which, in so hot a countrie, and to drive their cattell and sheep with them, pestered with a world of women and children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprizes; so he lay not still in the ditch crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wise man, and a valiant and skilfull Conducter; as by all his actions and counsells from this day to his death, well appeared.

*Exod.*14.7. Joseph. ant. l.2.c.6. *Exod.*14.7.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passeover, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrews at Ramases, in the territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Countrie the dispersed Hebrews: and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of dough, and paste, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the moneth Abib: which moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first moneth of the yeer. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their yeer in some other moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their politick yeer, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happning among them, unto the beginning, middest, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick yeer is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in every moneth, and the whole form of their yeer, like enough it is that Moses himself in fourty yeers space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew yeer: with the difference between them and other Nations in ordering the account of time.

The territory of Gosen was afterward called Ramases, after the name of this City, as appeareth in *Gen.*47. & *Num.*33. *Exod.*13.

§. VI.

Of the Solary and Lunary yeers; and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew yeer, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The first Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
The second, Jar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
The third, Sivan, or Sinan, or Siban.	3. May.
The fourth, Tamuz.	4. June.
The fifth, Ab.	5. Julie.
The sixth. Ehul.	6. August.
The seventh, Tisri, or Ethavin, or Ethanim.	7. September.
Ant. l. c. 4. The eighth, Marchesuan, or Mechasuan, or Bul, or with Josephus, Morsonane.	8. October.
The ninth, Chisleu, or Casleu.	9. November.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December.
The eleventh, Sebeth, or Sabath.	11. January.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.	12. February.

VE Adar was an intercalory moneth, added some yeers unto the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary yeer agree; which (besides the generall inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed especiall Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a moneth of the yeer, and withall on a set day, both of the Moon and of the moneth; as the feast of the First-fruits; the new Moons, and the like: which could not have so been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in some other part of the moneth, or the moneth it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the yeer. Deut. 16.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, & to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commodity of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeers unequall, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the errour committed in foregoing yeers required. The errour grew at first, by not knowing what number of dayes made up a complete yeer. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough, even to the most savage of all people, when a yeer hath passed over them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter tally, makes this long measure of whole yeers insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affaires. Therefore men observed the monethly conspicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the yeer into twelve parts, subdividing the moneth into 29. dayes & nights, & those again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are sensible and easily discerned; so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing lesse time by 11. dayes, or thereabout, than the yeerly course of the Sun through the Zodiack, in the space of sixteen yeers, every moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeer, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some dayes to the yeer, making it to consist of 12. moneths, and as many dayes more as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errours. For neither did the Sun determine his yeerly revolution by any set number of whole dayes; neither did the Moon change alwayes at one hour; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certain rule. 30. & 29.

Here lay much Wisdom and deep Art, which could not soon be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeer to contain three hundred and sixty dayes, wherein most of the Greeks concurred with them. That 360. dayes filled up the Grecian yeer (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of Plin. l. 34. c. 6.

Demetrius

Demetrius Phalereus, which were (ſaith he) 360. whileſt as yet the yeer exceeded not that number of days. By this account neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their moneths; neither could their moneths continue many yeers in their own places: but muſt needs be ſhifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inſerted into the Almanack by men, but not forgotten by the ſuperiour bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, becauſe the ſolemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moon, and withall, on the 15. day of the moneth Hecatombæon (which anſwereth in a manner to our June) they were carefull to take order, that this moneth might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding ſome two dayes to the laſt moneth of every yeer; thoſe games being held once in four yeers. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter even; which cauſed them ſometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeer, which was the ſecond of the moneth Bædromion; (agreeing neerly with our Auguſt) ſometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to inſert another for it in their fourth Lunary yeer, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding, their moneth of June would every yeer have grown colder and colder, had they not ſought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeer, one whole moneth, which they called the ſecond Poſideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one moneth of 29. dayes, another of 30. dayes, & ſo ſucceſſively through the whole yeer. Thus with much labour they kept their yeer as neer as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but theſe marks which they obſerved, were found at length to be deceitfull guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth yeers intercalation, that it ſhould not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the leaſt, or ſome wayes in 34. hours and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would in few Ages have bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeers intercalation, deviſed a Cycle of 19. yeers, wherein the Moon having 235. times run out her circuit, met with the Sun in the ſame place, and on the ſame day of the yeer, as in the 19. yeer before paſt ſhe had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been uſed; for by the intercalation of 7. moneths in the 19. yeers, all was ſo even, that no ſenſible difference could be found. Yet that errour which in one yeer could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of thoſe Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and ſome minutes of the preciſe rule. Therefore Calippus deviſed a new Cycle, containing four of Metons, that is to ſay, 76. yeers; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Aſtrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding ſome errour in the former obſervations, which they diligently corrected. The laſt reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Cæſar made, who by advice of the beſt Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courſes of thoſe heavenly bodies, reduced the yeer unto the form which is now in uſe with us, containing 365. dayes and ſix hours, which hours in four yeers make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth yeer, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian yeer by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Dom. 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall conſent; it was indeed but as a note added unto the work of Cæſar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obſerved, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Æquinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeer 1582. ten dayes ſooner found, in that time Pope Gregory ſtrook out of the Kalendar ten dayes, following the fourth of October, ſo that in ſtead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moveable Feaſts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in ſuch time, as at the Nicene Councell they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundred yeer, the Leap-day ſhould be omitted, excepting ſtill the fourth hundred: becauſe the Sun doth not in his yeerly courſe take up full ſix hours above the 365. dayes; but faileth ſo many minutes, as in 400. yeers make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 29. yeers, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of houres, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the dayes of the whole yeer, neglect the dayes of the Moon, confounding one moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwaies the Kalends or first day of the moneth was at the new Moon; and because that day was festivall, they were very carefull as well to observe the short yeer of the Moon, passing through all the 12. Signes in one moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan their first moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Jar their second moneth 29. dayes; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that every two moneths of theirs contained somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. dayes 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made up 7. moneths in 19. yeers; to 6. of which, 7. were commonly given 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeer (as appeareth by the severall dayes of each moneth) contained 354. dayes, which fail of the yeer, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one yeer, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeers were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day of the yeer, moneth and week, yea, commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it 19. yeers before.

Divers have diversly set down the form of the Hebrew yeer, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every second yeer they did adde a moneth of 22. dayes; every fourth yeer a moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moons, to fulfill a yeer of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes: and therefore to have added so many dayes to the end of the yeer, had been the way to change the fashion of all the moneths in the yeers following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that every third yeer, or second yeer, as need required, they did intercalate one moneth, adding it at the yeers end unto the other 12. This I beleeve to have been true; but in which of the yeers the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evennesse, untill the very last of the 19. yeers. For (to omit such as erre grosly) some there are who say, that after three yeers, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moon, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeer; then did the Hebrews adde a moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were, in plusage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth yeer; at which time, besides the Intercalary moneth, remained six dayes, namely, three surmounting that moneth, and the Epact of three yeers, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18. yeer; at which time they have 18. dayes in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeer, make up a moneth of 29. dayes, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Sig. de rep. Heb. lib. 3. c. 1.

Genebr. Chron. lib. 2.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeer, every moneth were removed from his own place by the distance of 48. dayes, that is, half a quarter of the yeer and more; which inconvenience by such a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore, I prefere the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the moneths, by setting down a more convenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeer. For the 6. dayes remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixth yeers, added unto the 22. dayes, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeers, do fitly serve to make up a moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeer following; and this borrowing of two dayes is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the yeers ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of every moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew moneths and yeers, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the divers waies leading out of Egypt.

FRom Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desart of Etham, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of that Wilderneſſe, though he intended nothing leſſe than to go out of that way, of all other the neereſt. But being aſſured of the multitude of Horſemen and armed Chariots that followed him he kept himſelf from being incompaſſed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he reſted but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the diſtance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia, being then in ſight thereof, it ſeemeth to proceed from three reſpects; the firſt two, naturall; the third, divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moſes took, perſwaded himſelf, that the numbers which Moſes led, conſiſting of above a Million, if not two Millions of ſouls, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of ſundry ſorts of people went out with them) could not poſſibly paſſe over thoſe deſart and high Mountains with ſo great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that faſtneſſe he ſhould have overtaken them, and deſtroyed the greateſt numbers of them. For theſe his own words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderneſſe hath ſhut them in, do ſhew his hopes and intents; which Moſes, by turning another way, did fruſtrate. Secondly, Moſes by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the Eaſt-ſide of the Land of Goſen, or Rameſes: from whence (miſſing Moſes there) his purſuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reaſon of the roughneſſe of the way; and howſoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better ſecured from the over-bearing violence both of the Horſe and Chariots. Thirdly, Moſes confidence in the All-powerfull God was ſuch, by whoſe ſpirit, onely wiſe, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an eſcape the next way, or by the ſtrength of his multitude, conſiſting of 600000. men, to caſt the ſucceſſe upon his own underſtanding, wiſe conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles diſtant; and ſate down between two ledges of Mountains adjoyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Baalzephon towards the South; the ſame which Oroſius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there ſtood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word ſo compounded, is as much to ſay, as, Dominus ſpeculæ, ſive cuſtodiæ; Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at leaſt made their ſlaves believe, that if any of them offered to eſcape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arreſt them, and force them to return to their Lords and Maſters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Ægyptii diis fœcundi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, ſaith Saint Hierome. But Moſes, who encamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of ſouls, or as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower aſleep, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all thoſe Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moſes at his departure.

Climax is rather ſo called in reſpect of a paſſage up and down, than that it is any proper name.

Now theſe two paſſages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm land, Moſes refuſed, as well that of Peluſium and Caſiotis, the faireſt and ſhorteſt of all other, in reſpect of Judæa, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reaſons before remembred, and took the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, between the Mountains, which made a ſtreight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made ſo great ſpeed with his Horſe-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to reſt them after ſo long a march; but gate ſight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and waſh of the Sea: inſomuch as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaohs ſudden approach, began to deſpair, and to mutine, at that time when it behooved them moſt to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moſes charge, that themſelves foreſaw thoſe perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, Which, ſaith the Book of Wiſdom, is the betraying of thoſe ſuccours which reaſon offereth, made them both deſpair in Gods former promiſes, and to be forgetfull of their own ſtrength and multitudes. Exod. 13. 17. Cap. 17. 11.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it self.

BUt Moses who feared nothing but God himself, perswaded them to be confident in his goodnesse, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; using this comfortable and resolved speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom yee have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, received incouragement, and commandment to go on in these words: Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel go on dry ground through the middest of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night finding the sands uncovered, past on towards the other side and coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entred the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern wind, and by Moses rod to prepare.

Exod.14.13.

Exod.14.16.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written: The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them; also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministery of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmfull speed. But in the morning watch, Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawn of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas return, hasted himself towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moved by the power of God, ran back towards the land with unresistable fury and swiftnesse, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being strucken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrews, their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawn out: the Sea coming against them with supernaturall violence.

Exod.14.27.

Lyranus upon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearfull to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Juda first made the adventure; and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the prophecy of Jacob, *Gen.*49.8. Thy fathers sons shall bow down unto thee. But Hierome upon the 11. of Hosea condemns this opinion. And though it be true, that Juda had the first place in all their marches in the Desart, and, as we now call it, led the Van-guard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himself was the Conducter of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalm: Thou didst lead thy people like sheep by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm, according to the vulgar: Divisit mare rubrum in divisiones; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became as a green Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written *Psal.*77.*v.*16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy waies: and in the last Book of Wisdom, *ver.*7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chencres, perished in the 16. yeer of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostratus in his third book noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow strait between Arabia the Happy and Æthiopia, or the land of the Abyssins: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomy calleth Possodium, to the other Land of Æthiopia, hath not above ſix leagues in breadth, and the ſame, alſo filled every where with Iſlands, but afterwards it extendeth it ſelf 58. Leagues from Coaſt to Coaſt, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa, on one ſide, and Æthiopia and Ægypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turk now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Coſmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moſes paſt, is called Heropolites, of the City Hero; ſometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plynie cals it Cambiſu, by which name it was known, ſaith he, before it was called Hero many yeers. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum: King Juba Læniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomy, Elana: Plynie, Læna: Joſephus, Ilana: and Marius Niger, Aila: there is alſo Ilalah in Aſſyria, to which Salmanaſſer carried the Iſraelites captive, 2 Kin. 8. 11. which Ilalah in Aſſyria the Septuagint call Elæa: and in the firſt of Chr. the 5. Ala. But as for this Red Sea on the parts thereof, thus diverſly named, the Moors and Arabians (Vaſſals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythræum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythræus: and becauſe Erythros in the Greek ſignifieth Red: hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythræus, the ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda, yet it took the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius conjectureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it ſeemeth to me by the view of a Diſcovery of that Sea in the yeer 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the Eaſt India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was ſo called from a reflection of redneſſe, both from the banks, clifts, and ſands of many Iſlands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Caſtro, a principall Commander under Gama (which diſcourſe I gave Maſter Richard Hackuit to publiſh) that there is an Iſland called Dalaqua, ſometime Lequeo, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, ſands, and clifts, of which Iſland, being of a reddiſh colour, ſerve for a foile to the waters about it: and make it ſeem altogether of the ſame colour. Secondly, the ſame Caſtro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coaſt 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the clifts and banks are of red earth or ſtone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams, give a kind of reddiſh luſter to the waters. Thirdly, thoſe Portugals report, and we know it by many teſtimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea towards the ſhore, great abundance of red ſtones, on which the greateſt ſtore of Corrall grows, which is carried into moſt parts of Europe, and elſewhere. There are alſo on the Iſlands of this Sea many red Trees, ſaith Strabo, and thoſe growing under water may alſo be a cauſe of ſuch a colour. Of theſe appearances of redneſſe by the ſhadows of theſe ſtones, ſands, earth, and clifts, I ſuppoſe that it firſt took the name of the Red Sea, becauſe in ſo many places it ſeemeth to be ſuch: which Johannes Barros in his ſecond Decade, eighth Book and firſt Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion-Gaber adjoyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Coſmographers, Sinus Elaniticus, which waſheth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, ſome 3. Leagues, or nine Engliſh miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the firſt 26. have nine miles breadth, as aforeſaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thruſt themſelves into the Sea, and ſtrengthen it ſo faſt, as for ſix miles together it is not above three miles over; from thence upward the land on Egypt ſide, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay or Cove for ſome ten miles together, after which the land grows upon the Sea again, and ſo binds it into the very end thereof, at four miles breadth, or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moſes paſt it over, though others would have it to be over-againſt Elana or Toro, but without judgement: for from Ramaſes to Pihacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not above 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at moſt, which Moſes paſt over in three daies: and between the land of Egypt, oppoſite to Elana or Toro, the diſtance is above 80. miles. For Ramaſes, to which City Moſes came (being the Metropolis of Goſen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his laſt leave, ſtandeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty Engliſh miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, upon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was over-taken by the floud, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that beleeve not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason unto which they fastned themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For whersoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and runne downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as far as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water ten or twelve miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and between it and where Moses past, who entred the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had bin by the ebbe of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharao found the floud increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the tide, on his right hand: and so taken ground again at the end of that Sea, at Sues it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witnesse the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fal away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise Pharao by any returne of waters could not have perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himself. Againe, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne back by a strong East-wind, doe rather prove the miracle, then that thereby was caused an ebbe more than ordinary: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have beene a West and North-west winde, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof, the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being unknowne to Pharaoh: while he was checkt by that Sea which used in all times before to ebbe away, the floud prest him and over-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgement generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the Æthiopians in battels, being imployed by Pharaoh, and wan divers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grosseneſſe, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardneſſe of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaohs approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God: Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at the time of Pharaohs approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands discodiſcovered themſelves between the ſea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moved not, and the ſea which was towards the South on the right hand, So that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters ſo defended them on both ſides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the ſame path, not that the waters ſtood upright as walls do, as ſome of the School-men have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any ſuch buildings in the ſea, they would ſoon have quitted the chaſe and purſuit of Iſrael. Furthermore, there is no man of judgement that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obſervations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the ſluxes and refluxes of the ſea, in his own Countrie, on his own coaſt, and in his own moſt traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein, his people having had ſo many hundreds of yeers experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth moſt heavily on all men, when looking through no other ſpectacle but their own proſperity, they leaſt diſcern it coming, and leaſt fear it. Laſtly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the flood before they could recover their own coaſt; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that ſea, and not have been caſt aſhore on that coaſt of Arabia where Moſes landed, to wit, upon the ſea-bank over againſt Baalzephon, on Arabia ſide: where it was that the Iſraelites ſaw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them: Which flood doth not any where croſs the Channel, and run athwart it, as it muſt have done from Egypt ſide to Arabia, to have caſt the bodies there; but it keeps the naturall courſe towards the end of that ſea: and to which their carkaſſes ſhould have been carried, if the work had not been ſupernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the lives of the Fathers affirmeth, that thoſe of the Egyptians which ſtayed in the Countrie, and did not follow Pharaoh in the purſuit of Iſrael, did ever after honour thoſe Beaſts, Birds, Plants, or other creatures, about which they were buſied at the time of Pharaohs deſtruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden, made a god of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied: and ſo of the reſt. But how thoſe multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reaſon ſhall be given elſewhere. Oroſius, in his firſt Book and tenth Chapter againſt the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived ſome 400. yeers after Chriſt, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheels were to be ſeen at a low water on the Egyptian ſands: and though they were ſometime defaced by wind and weather, yet ſoon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief. Cap.14.v.21.

Num. 33. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall Assembly at Rameses, and marched to Succoth.

Exod. 13. And departing thence, they made their third Station at Etham: and journeying from Etham, they encamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the mountain Baal-
Num. 33. zephon; and in the same night after midnight, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his

Exod. 14. vered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God, for the delivery of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entred the Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding
Num. 33. no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel, prest

Num. 33. proach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neer a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviour; who upon the tree of the Cross changed the bitternesse of everlasting death into the sweetnesse of eternall life. Plinie remembers these bitter Fountains in his sixth Book and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly, Ptolomy the second, began to cut an artificiall river, thereby by boats and small shipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, Exod. 15. from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, Num. 33. a march of eight miles: where finding twelve Fountains of sweet water, and threescore and ten Palm-trees, he rested divers dayes.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Town or City in Moses time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy War, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient City. And at
W. T. Tyr. l. 11. cap. 16. such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Egypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim Civitatem antiquissimam, populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenissent, loci illius incolæ, Regis adventu præcognito, naviculam ingredientes, in mare vicinum se contulerunt; Entring Helim a very ancient City, well known sometime to the people of Israel; whither when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took boat, and shifted themselves into the sea lying neer them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and sate down by the banks of the Red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses, who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrews, appointed to bear arms: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountring with the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion Exod. 16. untill the fifteenth of this second moneth called Zim, or Jiar: and made the eighth Mansion in the Desart of Zin; where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of every severall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quails, as all the Countrie about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their moneth, which served them in stead of bread. For Exod. 16. now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of cattell and sheep among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed themselves with many of those: but reserved them, both for the milk to relieve the children withall, and for breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty miles: the one to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim six miles. Here being again prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessary want, and to undergo the hazzards and travells which every manly mind seeketh after, for the love of God, and their own freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he divided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel brought waters out of the rock, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied. Exod.17.

to

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and ghessed that he meant to lead the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be utterly wasted by so great a multitude of people and cattell) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man, infeebled them. On the other side, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to Josua to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Between whom and Israel the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are unacquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazzard themselves. Exod.17.

After this victory, Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two sons, which either Jethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written in *Exod.*18.1. When Jethro the Priest of Madian, Moses father in law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his son in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges and other Officers over Israel; being himself unable to give order in all cause and controversies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and private controversie.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, *ver.11.&* 17. it is manifest: where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the son of Jethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his tents untill the Plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the rock. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the six sons which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jethro's daughter the mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing *Cap.*15.*v.*18. *Num.*24.28. 1 *Sam.c.*15. *Gen.*25.

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis, ver. 19. these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Gen. 15. Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Ke-
Jud. 4. nite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Cadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abrahams other sons were born; which he did (referring my selfe to better judgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

Gen. 25. 4. And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathens; as those of Madian by the river Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neer the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites as far back as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wives kinred inhabited; seeing himself coming with 600000. able men, was encountred by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himself and Israel had wandred 40. yeers.

That Jethro or Jothor, Raguel or Revel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English, Revel, Exod. 2. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. 1. & 4. 18. & 18. 1. & 6. 9, 10, 12. and in Num. 10. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

THe rest of the moneths of this yeer 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neer the mountain of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai and Horeb were distinct mountains: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exodus 3. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exodus 24. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm, ver. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. And again, Deut. 4. 10. and 15. and Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so is it in the first of Kin. 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus 48. 7. they are named as one. Which heardest (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are dis-joyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius; who in the yeer 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of water into the Valley adjoyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some hundred Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, Pet. Bel. l. 2. c. 62. and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now that there was some such Torrent of water neer Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he encamped thereabout almost a yeer, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he stayed ſtayed a whole yeer, wanting ſome ten or twelve daies: for he removed not till the 20. day of the ſecond moneth of the ſecond yeer; and he arrived about the 45. day after the egreſſion: the Law being given the 50. day.

At this Manſion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (becauſe there is no ſtory nor other paſſage) I will omit the repitition, and in place thereof ſpeake ſomewhat of the Law, and the kindes and uſe thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the ſtory any way diſ-joyned, he may turne over a few leaves, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We muſt firſt conſider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, levell, and ſquare of Laws: ſo it pleaſed God to give thereby unto Moſes the powerfulleſt man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their paſſage, and to eſtabliſh them aſſuredly in their conqueſt. For as the North ſtar is the moſt fixed directour of the Seaman to his deſired Port: ſo is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in generall, to the haven of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the Law humane, depending on both theſe, the guard of Kings, Magiſtrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very ſpirit, and the very ſinews of every Eſtate in the world, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a juſt law, being reſembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without luſt, and to a Minde without paſſion; a Treaſurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and diſtributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, eſteemed ſo highly, that among them, thoſe which were taken for the firſt makers of Laws, were honoured as gods, or as the ſons of gods: and the reſt, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all poſterity for men of no leſſe vertue, and no leſſe liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greateſt and moſt proſperous Conquerours that ever governed them. The Iſraelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one: as the Iſraelites, from Moſes; the Lacedæmonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solan; the Romans, ſometime from their firſt Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themſelves: other from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Chriſtian Monarchies and Eſtates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diverſly, and in an indifferent ſenſe uſed. For if we conſider it at large, it may be underſtood for any rule preſcribing a neceſſary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And ſo the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiours or Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cauſe to be obſerved by force, for their Decrees do alſo uſurp that Title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Eſay, Woe unto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewiſe, the word is uſed for the tumultuary reſolutions of the people. For ſuch conſtitutions doth Ariſtotle alſo call Laws, though evill and inſufficient: Mala lex eſt, quæ tumultuariè poſita eſt; It is an evill law that is made tumultuouſly. So as all ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws. Eſay 10.

The word Law is alſo taken for the morall habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and faſhioning them according to it ſelf, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the law of the fleſh, which the Divines call legem fomitis, is to be underſtood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which ſenſe, as *elſewhere, this morall habit or diſpoſition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: ſo in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But I ſee another law in my members, rebelling againſt the Law of my minde, and leading me captive unto the law of ſin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are ſometime called (a) laws, ſo far as they agree with the reaſon of the law eternall; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

*Ethic. l. 4. c. 1.

*Gen. 6. 5. Item 8. 2.

(a) So Virgil, centum hæc leges æternaque fœdera certis imposuit natura locis; where alſo it is to be noted, that he joyns leges and fœdera together, as in the Scripture the law is oftentimes called the covenant.

Alſo

Also private contracts among Merchants and other Tradesmen, do often put on the name of laws. But law commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, preſcribing a neceſſary mean, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Civill Communitie. The reſt, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quàm leges; rather compulſions than laws: And whatſoever is not juſt, S. Auguſtine doth not allow for laws, howſoever eſtabliſhed: for he calls them iniqua hominum conſtituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec putanda ſunt; The unjuſt conſtitutions of men, which are neither to be termed nor thought laws. For, ſaith Ariſtotle, Legalia juſta ſunt factiva, & conſervativa fælicitatis; Juſt laws are the workers and preſervers of happineſſe: becauſe by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlaſting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, ſaith Plato, is God and his worſhip: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is ſo called by the Latines, à legendo, or à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, ſaith Varro; For after Laws were written and publiſhed, all men might reade them, aud behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymology, à ligando, is no leſſe agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called alſo a yoak, and a band: as confregerunt jugum, diruperunt vincula: they have broken the yoak, they have broken the bands. And in the ſecond Pſalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipſorum; Let us break their bands in ſunder, and caſt away their cords from us.

Ariſt. Ethic. 5. cap. 5.

Plato in Dial. 1. de Leg.

Hieron. 5.5.

Pſal. 2.

The Covenant it is called, becauſe of the conditionall promiſes of God; and becauſe of Gods peoples voluntary ſubmiſſion of themſelves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, uſe the word διαθηκη, a Teſtament, or laſt Will: which name it hath, becauſe it is not otherwiſe effectuall for our ſalvation, but in reſpect of the death of the Teſtator; for without the death of the Teſtator, the Teſtament is of no force, as Heb. 9.17. it is ſaid, Teſtamentum in mortuis ratum eſt.

The Hebrews call the law Thorah, of teaching, becauſe every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nomos, of diſtributing, becauſe it diſtributeth to every man his own due; the power of the law is the power of God: Juſtice being an attribute proper unto God himſelf. Imperium legis, imperium Dei eſt; The reign of the law, is the reign of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philoſophers: Lex eſt vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ ſunt ſequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to ſhun: or Lex eſt omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princeſſe of things both humane and divine. But this deſcription is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wiſdom of Nature: the reaſon and underſtanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called, Index ſui & curvi, the demonſtrance of it ſelf, and of the crooked: ſo is the law, the judge and meaſure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodneſſe of operation: and though law, as touching the ſubſtance and eſſence, conſiſt in underſtanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Jus is alſo diverſly taken, as ſometime for the matter of the law, and for common right: ſometime for the law it ſelf: as Jus civile, or Jus gentium. Iſidore diſtinguiſheth the two generall words, Jus and Fas: whereof jus, ſaith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, Jus lex humana. To go over another mans field, is permitted by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controverſie, Virgil uſed both theſe words: as, Fas & jura ſinunt, God and men permit.

Iſid. Etym.

The word Jus, or Right, is derived or taken from the old ſubſtantive Noune juſſus, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greek Ζευς, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latine genitive caſe Jovis; becauſe, as the Scripture ſpeaks, the judgement is Gods. For as it is certain that jus-jurandum came of Jovis-jurandum, (for ſo we finde it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which ſenſe the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ) ſo alſo we may ſay, that Jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis eſt: becauſe as God is the Authour and Pattern, and Maintainer of right, ſo alſo in his Vicegerents, the Magiſtrates, he is the Pronouncer and Executor of right. Of this Jus the juſt are denominated, juſtus à jure, and juſtitia à juſto; The right gives name to the righteous; and juſtice takes her name from the juſt.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternall.

BUt becauſe laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, firſt to divide and diſtinguiſh them. I mean thoſe ſorts of laws, from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane laws to their infinite and horrible confuſion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex æterna eſt æternus divinæ ſapientiæ conceptus, ſecundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipſo præcognitarum; The eternall law is the eternall conceit of Gods wiſdom as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himſelf. Or, Lex æterna eſt ſumma atque æterna ratio divinæ ſapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad deſtinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipſarum modum aliquem neceſſitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reaſon of divine ſapience: as it directeth all things in ſuch ſort to their proper ends, impoſing a kind of neceſſity, according to their ſeverall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the ſame divine underſtanding directs all theſe to their proper ends; ſo it is called providence: but as it impoſeth a neceſſity according to the nature of all things which it directs, ſo is it called a law. P. 2. q. 2. art. 1. To. q. 36. a. 1. 1.

Of this eternall law Cicero took knowledge, when in his book of Laws, he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad rectè faciendum impellens & à dilecto avocans: quæ non tum incipit lex eſſe cum ſcripta eſt, ſed tum cum orta eſt. Orta autem ſimul eſt cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta adjubendum & ad vetandum, ratio eſt recta ſummi Jovis; That perfect reaſon and nature of things, incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling us back from evill, did not (ſaith he) then begin to be a law when it was written, but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with divine underſtanding, and therefore a true law, and a fit Princeſſe to command and forbid, is the right reaſon of the moſt high God. This eternall law (if we conſider it in God, or as God) is alwaies one and the ſame; the nature of God being moſt ſimple: but as it is referred to divers objects, ſo the reaſon of man finds it divers and manifold. It alſo ſeemeth one law in reſpect of things neceſſary, as the motions of the heavens, ſtability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwiſe to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all thoſe that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counſell and providence of God: from this Law all laws are derived, as from the rule univerſall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the ſecond to the firſt.

The eternall, and the divine law, differ onely in conſideration; the eternall directing more largely: as well every creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his ſupernaturall: but the divine law to a ſupernaturall end onely: the naturall law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a ſtream from the fountain. To. & Aq.

The Law humane or temporall is alſo thence drawn: in that it hath the form of right reaſon: from which if it differ, it is then impoſitio iniqua, a wicked impoſition: and onely borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are ſubjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall or morall, and humane. For the Law eternall runneth through all the universall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Psal.148. Directour: as Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: heavens of heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deeps: Fire and haile, snow and vapours, stormy winds, which execute his word: mountains and hils, fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created form, or formall appetites, as that which is heavie to fall downward: things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is apposed. This kinde of working, the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a differeuce used in terms only; it being no other than Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived: there-under subjected: thence-from by his eternall law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex æterna est, qua justum est, ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

L.1. de lib. arb. cap.6. Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first Book of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last untill the time of the Pædagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration some John 18.30. think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But Psal.69.22. I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification, than that now the prophecie of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so Saint John expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the judiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it self; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Solomon, and being one she can do all things, and remaining in her self reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of nature.

Aug. in Ep. ad Hil. 89. & in Evang. Joh. tract. 49. Ulp. de justitia & jure. l.1. tit.1. OF the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I find no definition among the School-men: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of divine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis æternæ in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the naturall law to be the same which nature hath taught all living creatures: Jus naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quæ terra marique nascuntur, avium quoque commune est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth.

But

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that diſpoſition, inſtinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, inlightning our formall reaſon; ſo is it more than ſenſe in Beaſts; and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not ſenſe alone in Beaſts, which teacheth them at firſt ſight, and without experience or inſtruction, to flie from the enemies of their lives: ſeeing that Bulls and Horſes appear unto the ſenſe more fearfull and terrible, than the leaſt kind of dogs; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them never ſeen before, and that as ſoon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it ſenſe which hath taught other Beaſts to provide for winter, Birds to build their neſts, high or low, according to the tempeſtuous or quiet ſeaſons: or the Birds of India, to make their neſts on the ſmalleſt twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elſewhere: to ſave their eggs and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beaſts, whoſe weight ſuch a twig will not bear: and which would fear to fall into the water. The inſtances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that ſome trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not bear any fruit except the male grow in ſight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unſearchable wiſdome of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reaſon of man hath made it ſelf ſubject, and a Vaſſall to paſſions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and cuſtome hath bred in men a new nature, which alſo, as is aforeſaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which S. Auguſtine calleth the law of reaſon, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law conſtrained to become Idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to uſe one anothers wife, and to the women, to chooſe them others beſides their huſbands, to beget them with child: which law in thoſe parts hath laſted long, and is not forgotten to this day. Supra. fol. 4. cap. 1. loco. ad Rom. 7. 23. Theod. l. 5 de curandis affect. Græcorum.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the beſt beloved wives: as alſo they have many other cuſtoms remembred by G. Valentia, againſt nature and right reaſon. Acoſta.

And I know not from what authority it is, that theſe Laws ſome men avow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithleſſe among the faithleſſe: to provide for our ſelves by another mans deſtruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to deſtroy thoſe whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall laws, either out of S. Auguſtine, or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impreſſion of divine light; the other, the dictate, or ſentence of practique reaſon) the ſame can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exerciſe of Juſtice and uprightneſſe: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, ſave that which we would be content ſhould be offered or performed toward our ſelves. For ſuch is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which, according to David, ſheweth us good, that is, the obſervation of thoſe things which lead us thereby to our laſt end; which is eternall life; though of themſelves not ſufficient without faith and grace. Nemo jure naturæ cum alterius detrimento locupletior fieri debet. Pſal. 4.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforeſaid, the impreſſion of Gods divine light in men, & a participation of the law increated and eternal. For without any law written, the right reaſon and underſtanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our ſelves, ſufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evill, which by our gratitude to God and diſtribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchaſe for our ſelves. For when the Gentiles (ſaith S. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature thoſe things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themſelves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the ſame right unto all men, which we deſire ſhould be done unto us, is an effect of the pureſt reaſon: in whoſe higheſt Turrets, the quiet of conſcience hath made her reſting place, and habitation; In arce altiſſima rationis quies habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (ſaith S. Paul) which ſhew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their conſciences for a witneſſe of thoſe effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuſe them. Rom. 2. 14. Rom. 2. 11.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the world by the advantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own soule, by crafty unrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this Maygame of the world, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arescit; Those flowers wither, while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearfull witnesses of our secretest evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum; maximè omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foul or dishonest, saith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all men reverence thine own conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their own form; as fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable minde is the form of man, so is he aptly moved to those things which his proper form presenteth unto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1. The Earth performeth her office, according to the law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the herb which seedeth seed, &c. and the beast, which liveth Job c. 28. thereon. He gave a law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once break the law of their natures and forms; the whole world would then perish, and all return to the first Chaos, darknesse, and confusion.

By this naturall law, or law of humane reason, did Cain perceive his own wickednesse and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgement of well and evill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the law written, Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doe not well, sin lieth at thy doore.

The Schoolmen are large also in this question of the naturall law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this subject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident naturall judgement of practick reason: they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and evill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more universall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as evill (as of the first, to desire to live, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death) in this consi-
Tho. 5. 94 art. 2 deration they divide it, according to the divers kindes of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shun evill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil upon the 44 Psalme approveth: Rectè Ethic. l. 1. c. 1. quidem bonum definierunt, Quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have some men defined good, or goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The

The ſecond kinde of appetite is of thoſe things which appertain to us, as we have ſenſe. Whence, by the law of Nature, we deſire the delights of every ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut us with ſatiety, nor hurt us with exceſſe. For as Senſe it ſelf is for the preſervation of life and being: ſo is it meet, even by the law of Nature, that the ſenſitive appetite ſhould not carry us to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And although (ſeeing both theſe kindes of appetites are in beaſts) we may well ſay, that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which ſenſe the Civilians deſine Naturall right, or Jus naturale, to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the inſtincts of beaſts can be properly called a law, but onely a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of every law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (ſaith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to living creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one jus naturæ, the other Jus gentium: the Divines underſtand the law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictats, precepts, or biddings of divine reaſon, both in beaſts and men; and reſtrain the law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

The third appetite is of thoſe things which appertain properly to man, as he is a living creature reaſonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our ſelves: and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diviſions of this law of Nature anſwering the diviſion of matter, which it preſcribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth; yet is the law of Nature but one law, according to Aquinas: firſt, becauſe it hath one fountain or root in the naturall or motive facultie, which is but one, ſtirring up to good, and declining the contrary: ſecondly, becauſe all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, becauſe all the parts are reduced to one and the ſame laſt end.

That this law of Nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifeſt: and chiefly man; becauſe he is indued with reaſon: in whom as reaſon groweth, ſo this band of obſerving the law of Nature increaſeth; Poſtquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod ſcriptum eſt, Adveniente mandato, peccatum revixit; When reaſon grew to perfection, then it came to paſſe, which was written by S. Paul, When the commandment came, ſin revived. Neither is it a ſmall warrant for this law of Nature, when thoſe which break the ſame, are ſaid by S. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate ſenſe (or minde) to do thoſe things which are not convenient: And again, that their conſciences bear witneſſe, and their thoughts accuſe them. Basil. Rom. 1. 18. Rom. 2. 15.

For, though this law of Nature ſtretch not to every particular; as to command faſting, and the like: yet it commandeth in generall all good, and whatſoever is agreeable to right and reaſon. And therefore, ſaid Damaſcene; Homines facti ſunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam eſt; Men (ſaith he) are made evill, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature: And S. Auguſtine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam eſt; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it. L. 2. Fid. orthod. c. 30.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of Nature ſo ſtraight, but that they ſuffer exceptions in ſome particulars. For whereas by this law all men are born Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequall merit: by taking from the evill, and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all men ſhall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themſelves: according to the rules of juſtice and equity.

And though the law of Nature command, that all things be reſtored which are left in truſt, yet in ſome cauſes, this her law ſhe ſuffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was ſober. But the univerſall principles can no more be changed, then the decrees of God are alterable: who, according to S. Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot deny himſelf. 2 Tim. 2.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of GOD

AFter the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kindes: Divine and Humane. Againe, the divine positive law is double; the Old and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole yeers: and in the 67. day of this yeer, when as Ascatades or Ascades governed the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argives, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeers. And this it seems, was the first written law which the world received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after invented by the Græcians: no not in Homers time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. yeers at least: and Troy it self was cast downe 335. yeers, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law, it pleased God to ingrave in stone, that it might remaine a lasting book of his expresse will in the Church: and that the Priests and people might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 1.

The reason known to us why this law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might easily, without any written law, instruct their own Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evill; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound divine worship, as for those after ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the naturall law; In these respects it was necessary, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not, reade in their own consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the law was written; wherof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giving wisedom to children For the humane law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evill, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our mindes. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our soules, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without errour: and therefore also said David, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giving Wisdome to children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOw, that in all this long tract of time, between the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason & nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first age received many precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea, many particular commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jews afterward ward called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawfull to be uttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding they were sufficiently known. For finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his children and nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain: and Enosh signifieth man, or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being cõmanded to co-habit with their wives, rather than with their father or mother.

That murther and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it self, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankinde by the generall flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them * from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and justice interposing between the untaught, and revenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried up from the earth: Whoso sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dina's forcing: and by the judgement which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise up seed to his brother that left a widow childless, and divers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being delivered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the law of Moses containeth that which is called, The Old Testament, may be said, not onely to have been written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in stone, but also in substance to have been given in precept to the Patriarchs. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew not sin, but by the law: so ever the law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of unwritten law; the Angels intuitively; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

* The common reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the earth: and why may not this preposition in this place have the same force, which it hath according to Junius & Gen. 4.1. Item 44.4. & Deut. 34.1. especially seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, ver. 7. Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. Gen. 9.6. Gen. 9.25. Gen. 34.25. Gen. 38.24.

Of the Morall, Judiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, how the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOw as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain; so the law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly: as somtime for all the Old Testament; as, Now we know whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law. Rom. 3.19.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must be fulfilled Luc. 24.44. which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by Faith, without the works of the law. Rom. 3 28.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum jus: as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace. Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadows and figures; as The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. John 1. 17.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jews Common-wealth; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. Or the law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the law, or the Priests prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed. Gal. 3. 23. Luc. 16. 6. Heb. 7. 12. & 10. 1.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sin and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c. Rom. 8. 2. Rom. 7. 23.

But the Written law of Moses, or the law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined. The law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Justice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is to the observers of the law, and threatning death to those which break the law in the least. For according to S. James, Whosoever shall keep the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the Schoolmen in which both the old and new law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus præscribens modum necessarium, ut aptè provenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humanæ vitæ finis; The divine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary mean, whereby they may aptly attain supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life. James 2. 10.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Againe, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of divine service, and of holinesse; (for externall worship and the order of hallowing our selves unto God is called Ceremony) and the Judiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for justice and equity. And therefore was it said of S. Paul, The Commandment is just, holy, and good: just, or justice being referred to the Judiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Judiciall part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons. Rom. 7. 12.

The Ceremoniall is divided into four parts, according to the four kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruits of the earth; to holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meats, as not to eat the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifyings, annointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnaturall and unproper commixtions, as, Thou shalt not yoak together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth to naturall compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty even to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some refer these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beat down the first buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Morall liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: saving in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God: and to use charity one towards another: which for ever ſhall be required at our hands. Therein alſo are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by ſpeciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth ſtill. For theſe things alſo are commanded in both Teſtaments to be obſerved: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall alſo lived in the things which it fore-ſignified. For the ſhadow is not deſtroyed, but perfected, when the body it ſelf is repreſented to us. Beſides, it ſtill liveth, in that it giveth both inſtruction and teſtimony of Chriſt, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for ſome Ceremonies and Types of holy ſignification, which are ſtill expedient; though in a far fewer number than before Chriſts coming, and in a far leſſe degree of neceſſitie.

Laſtly, the Judiciall liveth in ſubſtance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and univerſall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of juſtification, the Ceremoniall as touching the uſe and externall obſervation (becauſe Chriſt himſelf is come, of whom the ceremonies were ſignes and ſhadows) and the Judiciall is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-weale and policie.

§. X.

A propoſall of nine other points to be conſidered, with a touch of the five firſt.

AS for that which remaineth in the generall conſideration of the divine written law, it may in effect be reduced into theſe nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majeſty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Teſtament.
7. The end and uſe of the Law.
8. The ſenſe and underſtanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is ſufficiently proved by S. Paul, in theſe words: Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, and juſt, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforeſaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall.

2. The Majeſty of the Law-giver is approved in all his creatures: who as he hath given all things their lives and beings, ſo he onely gave the Law, who could onely give the end and reward promiſed, to wit, the ſalvation of mankind: but he gave it not to Moſes immediately, but by the miniſtery of Angels, as it is ſaid: And the law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the Acts, He gave the law by the ordinance of Angels. Galath. 3. 19.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiving the Law, is in three reſpects. Firſt, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and diſſevered. Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promiſe made to Abraham. Prepared they were, becauſe they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and ſevered they were, becauſe of Gods choice and election. Children of the promiſe they were, for the promiſe was made by God unto Abraham and his ſeed: not unto his ſeeds, as to Eſau and Jacob, but to his ſeed, as to Jacob or Iſrael ſingularly, of whom Chriſt. Now to Abraham and his ſeed were the promiſe made: he ſaith not, to the ſeeds, as ſpeaking of many, but, to thy ſeed, as of one, which is Chriſt. Gal. 3. 6.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Auguſtine: that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature, and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moſes: the Law written in the Commandments received by Moſes in the worlds yeer 2514. continued to the Baptiſm of John: from which time, begun the law of Grace, which ſhall continue to the worlds end. Other reaſons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth conſideration is of the efficacy of this law, the ſame being a diſpoſition to, to, or signe of our Justification: but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnes in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the world: and therefore Galath.4. S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly, as containing no

Heb.9. grace, weak, as not able to forgive and justifie. The bloud of Goats and Bulls, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christs blood, Gal.2. which doth cleanse the inward soul. For if the law could justifie, then Christ died in vain.

§. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

THe old and new Testament differ in name, and in the meane & way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by works, the new by grace: but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree: which is, mans happinesse and salvation.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Heb.8.13. old, because it preceded the new Testament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witnesse. Yet the new is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the waies of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the old. For the old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the new was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

The old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The new Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing joyfull news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in generall, as in Esay 52.v.7. concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signifie that most joyfull message of Salvation, as in Luk.2.10. whence also by figure it is taken for Acts 1. the History of Christ: and so we understand the four Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor.9.14. and 2 Cor.8.18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in volumes) is by Danæus comprised in these four.

In their Authour.
In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.
In the foundation, to wit, Christ.
In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and justification.

In the Authour they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end, even the salvation of our souls: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the law, an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with milk and honey, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, Cap.11.v.13. did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrews: All these died in faith, and received not the gent, non attendentes per promiſſa terrena, æterna promitti: Few (ſaith he) do underſtand the old law: not attending that by things earthly, eternall are promiſed. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus paſcere Judæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibuſque, ut Judæi ſomniant; God would not feed the Jews as beaſts with corporall gifts and riches, as themſelves dream. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego ſum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the preſent, or for periſhable things, that God gave them this promiſe, but in reſpect of the future: to wit, the ſafety of their ſouls. For as God created both body and ſoul, ſo hath he of his goodneſſe, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever. In Sophon. c. 3. v. 9.

10 The agreement between the old and new Teſtament in ſubſtance, infers alſo the agreement in foundation. For Chriſt is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apoſtles and Prophets; in whom all the promiſes of God in the old and new, are aſſured: the Fathers having eaten the ſame ſpirituall food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is, in that the knowledge of our ſin and miſery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and, as it were, ſerveth in ſubordination to the Goſpel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and ſalvation: to which the law ſerving as an introduction (for to thoſe which acknowledge their ſin & miſery, God ſheweth his mercy and ſalvation) may be ſaid to agree with the Goſpell in the effect. For otherwiſe, if we ſever the Law from ſubordination to the Goſpell, the effects are very different: the 20 one ſheweth the way of righteouſneſs by works, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Goſpell healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Goſpel allureth: Moſes accuſeth, Chriſt defendeth: Moſes condemneth, Chriſt pardoneth. The old reſtrained the hand, the new, the minde. Data eſt lex quæ non ſanaret (ſaith S. Auguſtine) ſed quæ ægrotantes probaret; The law was given, not to help, but to diſcover ſickneſſe: and S. Chryſoſtome; Data eſt lex, ut ſe homo inveniret; non ut morbus ſanaretur, ſed ut medicus quæreretur: The law was given that man might finde and know his own imperfection: not that his diſeaſe was thereby holpen, but that he might then ſeek out the Phyſician. For Chriſt came to ſave the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moſes was but a ſervant, and Chriſt a Son; ſo the greateſt benefit was reſerved to be brought, as by the worthieſt perſon, ſaith Cyril: for this law 30 made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope. Hom. 4. Rem. Heb. 7.

§. XII.

Of the reſt of the points propoſed.

THe ſeventh conſideration is of the end, and uſe of the law: which is to bring us to Chriſt: for finding no righteouſneſſe in our own works, we muſt ſeek it in ſome other. But this is the laſt, and remote, and utmoſt end: the next and proper end of the law, is to preſcribe righteouſneſſe, and to exact abſolute and perfect obedience to God. Curſed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law. Lev. 18. 5.

40 The ſecond end of the Law, is to render us inexcuſable before God: who knowing ſo perfect a law, do not keep it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or half obedience: but both inward and outward righteouſneſſe, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the law, is, as hath bin ſaid, to ſend us to Chriſt, and his grace, being in our ſelves condemned and loſt. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a moſt violent and fearfull tempeſt, threatning eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to deſigne, and preſerve, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold men in one Diſcipline, and awe, till the coming of Chriſt; after whom the Church was to be diſperſed over the whole world.

50 Theſe be the ends of the Morall law. The end and uſe of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirm the truth of Chriſt, and the new Teſtament. The uſe of the Judiciall, to teach us naturall equity and right, whereto we muſt conform our ſelves.

The ſenſe and underſtanding of the Law is double, literall and ſpirituall: by the literall we are taught the worſhip and ſervice of God: by the ſpirituall, the figures and myſticall fore-ſpeakings of Chriſt.

Laſtly, for the durance or continuance of the † Law, the ſame had being untill the paſſion of Chriſt: before which time, and while Chriſt taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true ſacrifice was offered upon the Altar of

* Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter ſhall not depart from Juda, nor a Lawgiver from between his feet untill Shila come.

of the Crosse, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the conscience any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vaile of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremoniall vails and shadows were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakned at all: otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the observing of the law was by Christ himself severely commanded: our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much rejoyced, as he preferred the observation of the law before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. 1 John 5. This is the love God (saith S. John) that we keep his Commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth. Deu.30.11,12, 13. & 14. Rom.10. v.6. 7,8. This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it, that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very neer unto thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evill, in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his waies, and to keep his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws, that thou maist live, &c. Cap.9.17. Neither is it said in vain in S. Matthew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments: Cap.12.50. and in S. John; Scio quia mandatum ejus vita æterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments: certainly, he is but a liar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mans ability, without the speciall grace of God to fulfill the law (Christ onely as man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandments, we shall finde in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and divine reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of liberty) proposeth to it self. For this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 John 5.12. and if we examine every precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences: it is not hard for any man to judge, by what easie perswasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII.

Of the severall Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

FOr by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceive and know, that infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for every of them, Which giveth to beasts their food, &c. Psal.147 9. there is no doubt but that they would also serve and love him onely.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true; Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. Glosse in verb. Cælum. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: untill (saith Lactantius) the devill crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant souls, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serve himself thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deaf, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse than the most worthlesse of those, that having life and reason, implore their help, which have neither: yea, of more vile prize and baser, than the basest of beasts, who have sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisdome of Solomon) but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journies of him that cannot go, and successe in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the block, to which he prayeth, be more senseless, David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like unto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them. Wisd. 13. v. 19. Psal. 35. 18.

The branch of the third Commandment, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, unlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an advantage. For as our corruptest nature gives us nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custom hath the devil brought up among men, without all subtletie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull advantage over us. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft gives satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to covetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of Gods name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the world do not use it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the labourer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the son of thy maid, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table, to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it self hath taught us towards them, who, after God, gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cherished us in our weak and helplesse infancy, and bestowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Judiciall ordinances, cursing of Parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our own laws, and, in effect, the law of all Nations, have made difference between slaughter casuall, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his own will.

The third of the second Table, commands us from adultery. Now if the preservation of Virginity have been possible for thousands of men and women, who in all Ages have mastered their fleshly desires, and have returned chaste to their grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and injury, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the laws of God and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the desire of beauty and form hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill, did not himself give suck to this infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame. Nuptiæ replent terram, Virginitas Paradisum.

The fourth of the second Table, is, That we shall not steal. And if that kinde of violent robbery had been used in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a-daies in England, and, to the dishonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poor and miserable souls, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth; but of those detested Theeves, who, to maintain themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Braverie, Drunkennesse, and upon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime have laboured for all their lives: impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear, if Princes would resolve, but for a few yeers, to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witnesse: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witnesse, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminall, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falshood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections; and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vain thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for grace. How the word Coveting reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrænatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our naturall frailty, or unadvised errour; But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evill intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the latter sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are unperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quamdiu refragamur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some that they hurt us not; and that then onely they hurt, when we suffer them to bear sway. But these men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not onely the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evill, though it break not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so even the Morall Philosopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as, on the other side, the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evill desires, when they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evill desires of the continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridleth his evill desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth unto them: yet such a man, even according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himself makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree unto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his evill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the continent man the having of these evill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Onely in this we excell him here: that we are able out of divinity to give the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithfull endeavours to keep his commandments, we witnesse our love toward himself: we may not safely give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is justice it self) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keep. For, as he is accursed (saith Saint Hierome) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accursed is he that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weakneſſe also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithfull endevours to observe them: which if we do unfainedly, no doubt but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth: Enter not into judgement with thy servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And again, Who can say, I have made my heart clean? But seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation; let every mans conscience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of losse of his love, to perform some service: if the subject neglecting the same, seek to satisfie his Soveraign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be derided therein.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

AND if we consider advisedly and soberly of the Morall Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his people, it will appear, that such was his mercifull providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain nor profit adjoyned to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these laws, all society of men, and all endevours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and every State and Common-weal in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore these laws were not imposed as a burden, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every man might enjoy the fruits of his own travell, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by justice, order, and peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civill men, and not of savages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these laws.

As first, what would the issue be, if we acknowledged many gods? would not a far greater hatred, war, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremony, and diversity of interpretation hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receive thence-from, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the Name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witnesse for him, when he may justly use his holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath holy, giveth rest to men and beasts, and nature her self requireth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our own children to scorn and neglect us, when our aged yeers require comfort and help at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankinde would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say unto himself; This is my son: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endevour by vertue and undertaking to raise Families: murthers and poysonings between man and wife would be daily committed: and every man subject to most filthy and unclean diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, or live as the salvages, by roots and acorns. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourfold, policy of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would swear against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthy: the idle beggar and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and justice thereby banished out of the world.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wives or goods of our neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most mercifull and provident God ordain them; without the observation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. XV.

Of humane law, written and unwritten.

HUmane law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two: (Viz.) Written, and Unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatæ; to be customes approved by antiquitie, or unwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by use and continuance established into a law: but yet there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written customes received and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundy and Normandy, the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Castile, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty customs, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty customs are seldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitance. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Stannary of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever use and time hath made these customs as laws, yet ought every custome to be rationabilis, as well as præscripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all laws of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law divine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that every custom which is against the law, had his beginning from evill deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature, were but tollerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they have been since continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort over-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius, qui novam legem & novam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

In Reg. Jur. v. 2. § 117. art. 1.

Ulp. l. 29.

Humane law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practick reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed.

rected. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the adviſement of wiſe men, and the reſtraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Iſidore calls the law a Conſtitution written, agreeing with Religion, fitteſt for government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione conſiſtit; All that ſtands with reaſon.

Laſtly, and more preciſely, it is thus defined. Humane law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law naturall & eternall: made by the rationall diſcourſe of thoſe, that exerciſe publike authority: preſcribing neceſſary obſervances to the ſubject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Auguſtine teacheth, ſaying: Mihi lex eſſe non videtur, quæ juſta non fuerit; It ſeems to be no law at all to me, which is not juſt: and juſt it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no law juſt and legitimate (ſaith S. Auguſtine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternall. Nihil juſtum atque legitimum eſt, quod non ab æterna lege ſibi homines derivaverunt.

Greg. de Val. ex Tho. q. 91. art. 3. & 4. 94. art. 2.

Lib. 1. de lib. arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be conſtituted by diſcourſe of reaſon, whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from the law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authoriſed Magiſtracy, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kind ſoever. For it falleth otherwiſe under the title of thoſe decrees called Violentiæ, or iniquæ conſtitutiones; Violences, or wicked conſtitutions.

Of humane law there are four properties, eſpecially anſwering theſe four conditions in the former definition. Firſt, as it is drawn out of the law of Nature; ſo every particular of the humane law may be reſolved into ſome principle or rule of the naturall.

4. Parts.

Secondly, it is to be conſidered as it is referred unto, and doth reſpect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it preſcribeth and directeth all humane actions. And ſo is the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulteriis, alia Cornelii de Sicariis; The law of Julian againſt Adultery, is one, the Cornelian againſt Ruffians, is another. Now the humane law generally taken, is in reſpect of the firſt of theſe conſiderations, divided into the law of Nations, and the Civill.

The law of Nations is taken leſſe or more properly; leſſe properly for every law which is not of it ſelf, but from other higher principles deduced: and ſo it ſeemeth that Ulpian underſtands it: for he defineth Jus Gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongſt men, as Religion, and the Worſhip of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or ſentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet ſo probable, that all Nations do aſſent unto the concluſion, as that the free paſſage of Ambaſſadours be granted between enemies, &c. which Nationall law, according to divers acceptations, and divers conſiderations had of the humane law, may be ſometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, ſometime of the Humane.

Jus Civile, or the Civill law, is not the ſame in all Common-wealths, but in divers Eſtates it is alſo divers and peculiar, and this law is not ſo immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of ſuch principles as all Nations do not agree in, or eaſily aſſent unto; becauſe they depend on particular circumſtances, which are divers, and do not fit all eſtates. Hereof Ulpian, jus Civile neque in totum à Naturali & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei ſervit; itaque cum aliquid addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id eſt, Civile efficimus; The civill law (ſaith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of Nature and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the Civill Law.

In Leg. 6. ff. de Juſtitia jur.

The law now commonly called the Civill law, had its birth in Rome: and was firſt written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeers after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian and other Greeian laws, as out of the ancient Romane cuſtoms and laws Regall. The Regall laws were deviſed by the firſt Kings; and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, becauſe they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then reigning. For though ſo many of the former laws as maintained Kingly Dion. Hal. authority, were abolished with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve Tables. To these laws of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebei-scita, those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annuall Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall laws, and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like collections of Justinian afterward were.

C. Sigon. l. 1. cap. of Pomponius.

The difference anciently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that laws are the constitutions made or confirmed by soveraign authority (be the soveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Jussum magistratus, unlesse by authority it be made a law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most to an Edict, say that it is a law for one yeer: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as, Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain, or proclaim.

Lastly, the Humane law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquility of the Common-weal: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church: Illud naturæ legem, hoc divinam spectat; That respecteth the law of nature, this the law of God. And so may Jus Civile be taken two wayes; first, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and divers from the Ecclesiasticall. But this division of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Civill be the same with the Secular, as the Civill is a law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Civill, and all other laws not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular laws in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weals, there are three kindes; the Civill, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the laws of England called Common, and the laws of custome or Provinciall. In Spain, besides the law Civill, they have the customs of Castill, and other Provinces. In France, besides the Civill, the customs of Burgundy, Bloys, Berri, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situes & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les coustumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customs of that place. There are also in France the customs of Normandy, and these of two kindes; Generall, and Locall: and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customs, before and since their reformation have these words: Nos autem Registrum prædictum, usus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient customs we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirm. The common law of England is also compounded of the ancient customs of the same, and of certain Maximes by those customs of the Realm approved. Upon which customs also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

Art. 3. tit. 5. G. Cust.

These ancient customs of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custom of England, that the eldest sons should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all lands (that have not been resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land have four sons, and the eldest of those four have also a son, the three brothers of the eldest son shall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their fathers Lands before the grand-childe: the custome being grounded grounded upon the reaſon of neceſſity. For the Iriſh in former times, having alwaies lived in a ſubdivided Civill War, not onely the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but every Baron and Gentleman one againſt another, were enforc't to leave ſucceſſors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar and petty Cuſtoms, beſides the great and generall cuſtom of the Land, ſo are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greateſt bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: laws propounded and approved by the three eſtates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, becauſe they are Acts of choice, and ſelf-10 deſire. Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent, quàm quòd judicio populi receptæ ſunt; The laws do therefore bind the ſubject, becauſe they are received by the judgement of the ſubject. Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modò inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane laws have their ſtrength, when they ſhall not onely be deviſed, but by the approbation of the people confirmed. Ulp. ff. de Leg. Leg. 32. Aug. de vera religione. cap. 31. Gratian. in dec. diſt. 4. Cum in ipſis.

Iſidore faſteneth theſe properties to every Chriſtian Law, that the ſame be honeſt, that it be poſſible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the cuſtome of the Country; alſo for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifeſt, and without reſpect of private profit, that it be written for the generall good. He alſo gives foure effects of the Law, which Modeſtinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, 20 and inſtigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice; the latter encourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum: It behoveth the Law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the obſervation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws: and it is two-fold; the one conſtraineth us by fear of our conſciences, the other by fear of externall puniſhment. Theſe two effects the Law performeth, by the exerciſe of thoſe two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The ſecond of theſe two effects remembred by Modeſtinus, is Inſtigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Ariſtotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For 30 laws being ſuch as they ought to be, do both by preſcribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing; laying before us the good and the evill, by the one and the other purchaſed. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evill, are thoſe into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and ſubſtance thereof: ſaying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum, Decline from evill, and do good. Declina Pſalme 37.

§. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what ſort.

40 NOw whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any perſon, it is doubtfully diſputed among thoſe that have written of this ſubject, as well Divines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soveraigne Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforeſaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be ſubject, but not to that which conſtraineth. For as touching violence or puniſhments, no man is bound to give a prejudiciall judgement againſt himſelf; and if equals have not any power over each other, much leſſe have inferiours over their ſuperiours, from whom they receive their authority and ſtrength.

And ſpeaking of the ſupreme power of laws, ſimply then is the Prince ſo much above 50 the laws, as the ſoul and body united, is above a dead and ſenſeleſſe carkaſſe. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum, & lex animata: An animate and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, Princes both add greatneſs to themſelves, & conſerve it; and therefore was it ſaid of Bracton out of Juſtinian, Meritò debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipſe ſit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the Law firſt attributeth to the King; for it is the Law that doth make Kings. Bract. l. 2.

But whereas Bracton aſcribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein miſtaken. For Kings are made by God, and laws divine; and by humane laws onely, declared to be Kings. As for the places remembred by the Divines and Lawyers, which infer a a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God only.

Psal. 50. Tibi soli peccavi, saith David; Against thee only have I sinned: therefore the Prince cannot be said to be subject to the law; Princeps non subjicitur legi. For seeing, according to the Schoolmen, the law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernativæ: non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humanæ non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humanæ non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neque lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kind of organ or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himself, or by his own power be controlled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himself: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it self resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the Law: ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps sive legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his own will and pleasure, deliver himself from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis. Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Ass. de Leg.

Greg. de Valentia de Leg.

Now concerning the politick Laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, That we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, who hath told us, that there are no Laws so righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their severall qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to governe aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman civill Laws did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much unto the naturall customs of the sundry people which it governed. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or peradventure some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty make the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steal, makes the Arabians to be Theeves) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first imbraced, but after with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, me thinks it were not amisse to consider, that the high God himself permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where even the generall nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the Law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evill, which forceth man, as neer as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with so long and so publick approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparrell in Turkie: there may a wise and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somwhat that the rigour of Moses Law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter meerly Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary; which Prayer the Lord heard and granted. 2 Chron. 30. 18, 19.

To this effect it is well observed by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Judicials of Moses do partly binde, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively, that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is not given by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burden more heavie: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becometh not the Gospel. Isa. 9.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judiciall Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwaies been very plausible. And surely howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law: yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equall satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been witnesse, of whom Fortescue, that notable Bulwark of our Laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgement given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a yeer after being convict for the same offence, confest that his Mistris was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented: but this Judge, saith the same Authour, Sæpius ipse mihi fassus est, quòd nunquam in vita sua animum ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to cleer his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld unto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawn propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being; is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountain of truth, whose fear is the beginning of wisdome. To which purpose well saith S. Augustine, Conditur legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulit æternam, de qua nulli animæ judicare datum est; The Author of temporall Laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power given to any soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quàm posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation than the Lord hath laid. Cap. 5. 3.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of MOSES.

§. 1.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

WHen Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and having seene what numbers of Men fit to beare Armes, were found in every Tribe, from twentie yeeres of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in everie Tribe most eminent. The number number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Naasson: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vaunt-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incamping on the East side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the host of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur: in Simeon 59300. under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. under Eliasaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joyned the Regiments of Manasse and Benjamin; who joyned together, made in number 108100 able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. under Elishama: Manasse 32200. under Gamliel: Benjamin 35400. under Abidan.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. under Ahiezer: Asher 41500. under Pagiel: Nephtali 53400 under Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1 & 2. For there arose up against Moses 250. Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principall Mutiners, with those 250. Captains that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes or generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them under their severall Standards in the wildernesse it was observed. For Judah had the precedency & the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Leah, Jacobs wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had under-gone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the son of his Mothers Hand-maid. Joseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogative of the first born a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs prophecy) taking place before the elder, he was assisted by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacobs Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacobs prophecy. He had with him under his Standard none of the Children of Leah, or Rachel, but onely the sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Levites. Neer unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerful Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neer it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was comitted. So sacred was the moveable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the service & attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the Tabernacle; the Gesmrites on the West, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 7500. The Family of Cohath on the South-side guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan; on the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Juda led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the people; under whom, as the chief of all the other Leviticall Families, was Eleazar the son of Aaron, his successour in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle & center thereof. The reverend care which Moses the Prophet, and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Ark and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale born towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull observance in the laying up, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as time would soon bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields and Mountains, & under the hedges; and the offices of the Ministery (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as those places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-government, left to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soon after, as many kinds of Religions would spring up, as there are Parish-Churches within England: every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; insomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrary to it self, the Faith of men will soon after die away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran; Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis: si me aliis adjungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adjoyn my self to you, I am condemned by others; If I joyn with others, I am condemned by you: what I should avoid I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Passeover of the second yeer: the departing of Jethro.

Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the lawes, numbred his Army, and divided them into the battells and troups before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto, the Sanctuary excepted, which for reverence was carried upon the shoulders of the sons of Kohath, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots, in which was conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely, to the Sons of Gershon and Merari. Num. 6.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charger of fine silver, weighing 130. shekels; a silver Bowle of 70. shekels, after the shekel of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of Gold, of ten shekels, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards

The Hebrew Gerah weigheth sixteen grains: so a Gerah of Silver is about three half pence sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs, so a Sanctuary Sicle of Silver is about 7. groats, the common Sicle is but half so much, to wit, ten Gerahs: as it is usually expounded; though Villalpandus labours to prove that the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Num. 9. 5. Num. 10. 11. Exod. 38. 24. Numb. 9. 17.

their conqueſt, beſides the beaſts which they offered for ſacrifice, according to the law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve ſilver Chargers, and twelve ſilver Bowls, amounted unto 2400. ſhekels of ſilver; and the weight of gold in the Incenſe-Cups, to 120. ſhekels of gold; which makes of ſhekels of ſilver 1200. every ſhekel of gold valuing ten of ſilver, ſo that the whole of gold and ſilver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundred and twenty pound ſterling. This done, Moſes, as in all the reſt, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Paſſeover, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the ſecond moneth of the ſecond yeer: and on the twentieth day of the ſame, the cloud was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a ſigne of going forward; Moſes beginning his march with this invocation to God: Riſe up, Lord, and let thine enemies be ſcattered; and let them that hate thee, flie before thee. Then all the people of Iſrael removed from their incamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Army, or great ſquadron of Juda, led by Naaſſon, taking the Vaunt-guard, followed by Nathaniel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Iſſachar and Zabulon: after whom the reſt marched, as in the figure expreſt. And becauſe the paſſage through ſo many deſarts and mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moſes leaving nothing un-forethought, which might ſerve for the advancement of his enterpriſe, he inſtantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promiſing him ſuch part and profit of the enterpriſe, as God ſhould beſtow on them: for this man, as he was of great underſtanding and judgement (as appeared by the counſell he gave to Moſes for the appointing of Judges over the people) ſo was he a perfect guide in all thoſe parts, himſelf inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it ſeemeth) a man of great yeers and experience; for he was then the Prieſt or Prince of Madian, when Moſes fled firſt out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeers before this requeſt made. And though Moſes himſelf had lived 40. yeers in theſe parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travell: yet the better to aſſure his paſſage, and ſo great a multitude of ſouls, which could not be ſo few as a million, it was neceſſary to uſe many guides, and many conductors. To this requeſt of Moſes, it may ſeem by the places, Exod. 18.27. and Num. 10.30. that Jethro, otherwiſe called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is evident, that he went back from Moſes into his own Country. But becauſe it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the poſterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Iſraelites, it is moſt likely that this his return to his own Country, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his own Country, by ſetting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the Mutinies by the way: and the cauſe of their turning back to the Red Sea.

AFter this diſmiſſion of Hobab, Iſrael began to march towards the Deſarts of Paran: and after three daies wandring, they ſate down at the Sepulchres of luſt, afterward called Taberra, or Inceniio: by reaſon that God conſumed with fire thoſe Mutiners and Murmurers which roſe up in this remove, which happened about the 23. day of the ſame month. And from this 23. day of the ſecond month, of the ſecond yeer, they reſted & fed themſelves with quails (which it pleaſed God by a Sea-wind to caſt upon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth; to wit, all the moneth of Sinan, or June: whereof ſurfeiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, anſwering to our July, they went on to Haſeroth, where Miriam the ſiſter of Moſes was ſtricken with the leproſie, which continued upon her ſeven daies, after whoſe recovery Iſrael removed toward the border of Idumæa, and incamped at Rithma, neer Kades Barnea, from whence Moſes ſent the twelve diſcoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themſelves of the fertility and ſtrength of the Country; as alſo to take knowledge of the Waies, Paſſages, Rivers, Fords, and Mountains. For Arad King of the Canaanites ſurprized divers companies of the Iſraelites, by lying in ambuſh neer thoſe waies, through which the diſcoverers and ſearchers of the Land had formerly paſt. Now, after the return of the diſcoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned againſt Iſrael; whoſe ingratitude & rebellion after his ſo many benefits, ſo many remiſſions, ſo many miracles wrought, was ſuch, as they eſteemed their deliverance from the Num. 11. & 13. Num. 12. Num. 21.

the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderneſſe (for so Moſes calleth it) with the victory which he gave them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on and preserved them, but to bring them, their wives, and children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Gyantlike, (for they confest that they saw the sons of Anac there) who were men of fearfull stature, and so far over-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choose them a Captaine (or as they call it now adayes, an Electo) to carry them back again into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every soul of the whole multitude (Josua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neer it; and at the mountain foot of Idumæa, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of fear had bereaved both of reason and common sense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the fear of his bright glory between the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatning an intire destruction, of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercileſſe pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moſes (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so severe a judgment, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and give them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to perform his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitleſſe Desarts. Yet as God is no leſſe just than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand leſs heavie than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity; so by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent: whom, becauſe they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to perform his promises, which have never been frustrate.

§. III.

Of their unwillingneſſe to return: with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOw when Moſes had revealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heavie displeasure towards them, they began to bewaile themselves, though overlate: the times of grace & mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the advice of Moſes; who assured them that God was not among them; and that the Ark of his covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no leſſe sharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no leſſe cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawn his grace, do alwaies follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entered Judæa before their enemies were prepared and joyned; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ran hed-long and without advice into the mountains of Idumæa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites in revenge of their former losse, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour kings, joyned together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painfull passages of the Desarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea again: in which retreat before they came back to passe over Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeers; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Josua, and Caleb excepted, were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborn and carelesse generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of their discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Amos 5.25. Acts 7.42. 2 Kin. 17.16. & c.21.v.3. & c.23. v.4,5, 11. 2 *Chron.*33.3. *Hierem.*19. v.13.&c.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moses according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoars of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma, he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and sate down at Ressa, neer the foot of the mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceelata; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwaies keeping the Valley, between two great ledges of mountains, (those which bound the Desart of Sin, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceelata, and marched Eastward to the mountain of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the twentieth mansion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah, and so to Thara or Thare; the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the Earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgements of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men, who would have usurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and goods; even while they sought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest & Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleaseth him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the 12. Rods given in by the Heads of the 12. Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on every rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Levi, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Blossoms, and ripe Almonds.

*Num.*33.

From Tharah the whole Army removed to Methra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masurit, after S. Hierome) and from Moseroth to Benejacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Mansion; whence from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adricomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian and Asiongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Asiongaber, where Solomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants conveigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also called Jetabata, or Jotbath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Asiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeve, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea. Herod. l. 3.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Esiongaber: which City in Josephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieromes, Essia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Esiongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travelled in that passage. Deut. 2.

It seemeth that Esiongaber, or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the mount Hor, neer the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumæa. And if Esiongaber, and the other places neer the Red Sea, had at this present been subject unto the Idumeans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained those places: for it is said: And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumæa into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a Navie of ships in Esiongaber, besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. Num. 20. 13. 1 King. 11. 18.

§. V.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

FRom Esiongaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the children of Jacan; where they sate down in the first moneth of the fortieth yeer, after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth moneth of the fortieth yeer: the nine and thirtieth yeer taking end at Esiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neer it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulchre was to be seen in Saint Hieromes time, as himself avoweth. From hence ere they departed to the mountain Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own fathers had left their bodies in the Desarts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeer, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of Num. 20. 1. Num. 20. 3.

God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses Num. 20. 9. to strike a Rock adjoyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travells of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which 2553. Mountain of Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his son, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, [illegible] Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites took name which the Idumæans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera, which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esiongaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before he
Num. 33. came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera; Hor neer Mosera: for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red Sea on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumæa, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neerest way of all other from the city of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise, taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might have run into many hazzards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumæa hereunto, Moses remembred him, that he was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sons of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esau his Ancester had made war, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name Edom, or Edumæa. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that he would no way offend his people, or waste his Countrie, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their cattell should Deut. 2. 4. drink. For Moses was commanded by God, not to provoke the children of Esau. But the King of Edumæa knowing the strength of his own Countrie, the same being neer Canaan, rampir'd with high and sharp mountains: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Country, it would rest in their wills to give him law, resolvedly refused them passage, and delivered this answer to
Num. 20. 20, 21. the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his Countrie together, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came
Num. 20. out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Edumæa, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unto himself who was of naturall understanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of war that the world world had, he refused to adventure the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others; and which, by reason of the seat of their mountainous Countrie, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to have conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumæa, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himself towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanched the way of Idumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrie, than to be found by them in his own: which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moses been enforc't first to have made his way by the Sword through Idumæa, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolved to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came neerer his own home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desart, he set upon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of cattell that they drave with them, could not encamp so neer together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surprise. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which joyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israeliter, which without direction from God by Moses, would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, becaus in the first of Deuteronomy 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory over Israel, neer Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessour that then prevailed; this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compasse Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desart, to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third Verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Josua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Desarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the rivers of Zared and Arnon. Num. 14. 45.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self, but that his Territory lay without it, and neer the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom. Num. 33. 40.

Again, Horma (for so far the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Judæa. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Josua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Josua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had past Jordan: Josua then governing them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his City so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compasse Idumæa and the Dead Sea, and to make his enterance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desart was terrible, began again to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandment set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Cœlosyria, encamped at Zalmona: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journies by the edge of Idumæa, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonseca) per viam quæ habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esiongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adjoyning to the Land of Suph a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the monntains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblathaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and encamped in the mountains of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon King of the Amorites: even from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrie: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations of the war he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept which he left to his posterity and successours, for a law of the war; namely, in Deut. 20. 10. in these words; When thou comest neer unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it do accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of Armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

§. VII.

Of the Book of the battels of the Lord mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Num. 21. 14. NOw concerning the War between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book intituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The book of Gods battels: and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things memorable; with with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the book of the battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the book: The war of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Suph, a Countrie bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcircò dici solet in recensione bellorum Jehovæ, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph: & contra Flumina, Flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the battels of Jehovah, against Vaheb in the Countrie of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words hee understands, that amongst the wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memorie in the mouth of most men, concerning the war of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrie neer Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate predecessour of Balac, who lived with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it seems (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were elective, and not successive. And as Junius in this translation understandeth no speciall Book of the battels of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. *Syracides, cap.*46. tells us plainly, that those battels of the Lord were fought by Josua; Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other books written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the books of Henoch, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen περὶ ἀρχῶν, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembred by *Josua, cap.*10.*v.*13. and in the second of *Samuel, c.*1.*v.*18. called the Book of Jasher, or Justorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middest of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also David took the precept of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some think this to be the book of eternall Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth *Psalm, v.*28. where it is said: Let them be put out of the Book of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinks, that David by this Book understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it was the book of Exodus. Others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Josua, by an unknown Authour.

The book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of *Chron.cap.*33. *v.*18. & 19. Of this book, also lost, Hierome conceives, that the Prophet Esay was the Authour.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the son of Solomon: As to the books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jeedo the Seer, remembred in the second of *Chron.c.*9.*v.*29. With these have the books of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of *Chron.c.*12.*v.*15. perished: and that of Jehu the son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehosaphat, cited in the second of *Chron.cap.*20. *v.*34. Also that book of Solomon which the Hebrews write Hasirim, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum, onely remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this divers others of Solomons works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembred by Origen, Josephus, Hierome, Cedrenus, Ciccus Asculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

WHen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabite on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battaile, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently possest by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

Deut. 2. 9, 10, 11, 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desart of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountains to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the floud: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Josua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also bin Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chiefe City was Aroer or Ar, neere the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; Strong men, and fearfull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Jos. 15. v. 13, 14, 15.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrie, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest upon Vaheb the Moabite; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrie of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses wasted with the multitude of his people and cattell. Towards him therefore hasting himself, they encountred each other at Jahaz: where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. Hee also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were, and descended of Emoreus, or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judæa, being at this time, and after this victory at the banks of Jordan: yet hee knew it to be perillous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Tracouitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the onely man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants Cities walled and defenced: lying between the Mountain of Hermon (which Mountain, ſaith Moſes, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Baſan (who attended Moſes coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sehon: for he and his ſons periſhed, and all his Cities were taken and poſſeſt. After this, Moſes with-drawing himſelf back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the proſecution of that war unto Jair the ſon of Manaſſe: who conquering the Eaſt parts of Baſan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Geſſuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities, called the ſame after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conqueſts afterward the half Tribe of Manaſſe poſ-

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moſes his death.

After theſe victories, and while Iſrael ſojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it ſeemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) ſought, according to the advice of Balaam, both 20 by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by perſwading them to honour and ſerve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themſelves: thereby the better both to defend their own intereſt againſt them, as alſo to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoyning. The Iſraelites as they had ever been inclined, ſo were they now eaſily perſwaded to theſe evill courſes, and thereby drew on themſelves the plague of peſtilence, whereof there periſhed 24000. perſons: beſides which puniſhment of God, the moſt of the offenders among the Hebrews, were Num. 25. 1. by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the ſon of Eleazar had piereed the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the plague ceaſed, and Gods wrath was appeaſed. For ſuch was the love and kindneſſe of his all-powerfulneſſe, reſpecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in proſecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews, became an Idolater) as he forgave the reſt of Iſrael, and ſtayed his hand for his ſake.

In this valley it was that Moſes cauſed the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms. 601730. of which as his laſt enterpriſe, Num. 16. 51. he appointed 12000. to be choſen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practiſed with Balaam to curſe Iſrael: and after that, ſought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worſhip of the true God, to the ſervice of Beth-Peor: and to the reſt of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of Num. 31. 8.
40 12000. Moſes gave the charge to Phineas the ſon of Eleazar the high Prieſt: who ſlew Joſ. 13. 21. the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vaſſals of Sehon, as appeareth by Joſuah. Theſe five Princes of the Midianites ſlain by Eleazar, were at this time but the vaſſals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Sehon, ſaith Joſuah. He ſlew alſo the men, male-children, and women: ſa- Cap. 13. 21. ving ſuch as had not yet uſed the company of men, but thoſe they ſaved, and diſperſt them among the children of Iſrael to ſerve them.

And Moſes having now lived 120. yeers, making both his own weakneſſe of body Deut. 31. 1. known to the people, and his unability to travail: and alſo that he was forewarned of Deut. 31. 2. his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to aſcend

And ſo having ſpent theſe his latter daies after the Conqueſt of Og, and Sehon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and expoſition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Auguſtine) uſing both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people, which he *Aug. l. 2. de Mirab. ſacr. §. X.

Obſervations out of the Story of Moſes, how God diſpoſeth both the ſmalleſt occaſions, and the greateſt reſiſtances, to the effecting of his purpoſe.

NOw let us a little, for inſtruction, look back to the occaſions of ſundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moſes, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promiſe, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things elſe by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And ſo we ſhall finde that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increaſe of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cauſe of the ſorrows and loſſe, which befell himſelf, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he ſought by cruell and ungodly policies to cut off and leſſen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be ſlain, God (whoſe providence cannot be reſiſted, nor his purpoſes prevented by all the fooliſh and ſalvage craft of mortall men) moved compaſſion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preſerve that child, which afterward became the moſt wiſe, and of all men the moſt gentle and mild, the moſt excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppreſſed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he ſought by the ſtrength of his men of War, of his Horſe, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the duſt. The grief which Moſes conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own preſence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatning him to diſcover the ſlaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to flie into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of thoſe Siſters: and in that ſolitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Laws ſheep, far from the preſſe of the World, contenting himſelf (though bred as a Kings Son) with the lot of a poor Heardſ-man, God found him out in that Deſart, wherein he firſt ſuffered him to live many yeers, the better to know the waies and paſſages through which he purpoſed that he ſhould conduct his people, toward the Land promiſed: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleaſure for his return into Egypt. The like may be ſaid of all things elſe, which Moſes afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Iſrael before remembred. There is not therefore the ſmalleſt accident, which may ſeem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no conſequence, but that the ſame is cauſed by God to effect ſomewhat elſe by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greateſt worldly importance, either preſently, or in many yeers after, when the occaſions are either not conſidered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Iſraelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moſes and Joſua, with the ſum of the Hiſtory of Joſua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Iſraelites were to have War, were divers waies, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Iſraelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderneſſe, or afterward, we ſhall finde them long before-hand, by the diſpoſing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in reſpect that they were moſt of them of the iſſue of Canaan, or at leaſt of Ham; and the reſt (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Iſraelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Iſraelites ſtill continued ſtrangers, and ſeparate from them: and ſo partly in this reſpect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reaſon of diverſity in Religion, were theſe Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Iſraelites: and ſo to ſerve for ſuch purpoſes as God had reſerved them for. To make theſe things more manifeſt, we muſt underſtand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the ſame mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the Eaſt: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one ſpringing from the ſons of Cham, the other from Sem: but thoſe of Sem, were but as ſtrangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kinred. The other for the greateſt part, were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and poſſeſſors of thoſe Territories, by proceſſe of time divided into ſeverall Families and names: whereof ſome of them were of eminent ſtature and ſtrength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. Theſe (as men moſt valiant and able commonly do) did inhabite the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the reſt were the Zidonians, Jebuſites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the ſons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in generall was ſtill called.

As for the Hebrews which deſcended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and ſtrangers in that Country, eſpecially the Iſraelites: and this was ſome cauſe that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them, no more than the Philiſtims did, who deſcended alſo of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himſelf being a ſtranger, was highly eſteemed and honoured among them; eſpecially by the Amorites inhabiting the Weſt part of Jordan: yet now even they which deſcended from Abraham, or from his kinred, abode and multiplied in thoſe parts, were alienated in affections from the Iſraelites, as holding them ſtrangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the reſt of the iſſue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that theſe Nations deſcended of Abraham, or of his kinred, who had linked themſelves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had ſo far poſſeſt themſelves of the borders of thoſe Regions, as they began to be equall in ſtrength to the bordering Canaanites, if not ſuperiour. For of Lot came thoſe two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Eſau the Idumæans: of Madian the Madianites: of Iſmael the eldeſt ſon of Abraham, came the Iſmaelites, with whom are joyned, as of the ſame Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a Tribe of Edom, becauſe Eſau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifeſt reaſon convinceth it to have been otherwiſe. For the Iſraelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong; whereas contrariwiſe Amalek was curſed, and endleſſe war decreed againſt him: but hereof more elſewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. * It ſeemeth alſo that Hus, the Son of Nahor, and Buz his Brother, planted themſelves in the Eaſt ſide of Jordan, about Baſan: where they finde the Land of Hus, in which Job dwelt as one of the iſſue of Hus, the Son of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend which is called a Buzite. eldest son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathæi. Now even as Abraham besought God to blesse Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For Gen.17. of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to joyn themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolvedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans onely denied the Hebrews a passage, which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountains which divided it
Num.21.24. from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was, that the Moabites might hope, after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites, by speciall occasion, were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kinred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authours of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be, as it were, presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withall, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men, might scorn to give place, much lesse to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esau, Princes of Idumæa, might keep in record, that their Parent was bought out of
Gen.25. his birth-right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers
Gen.27. blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he pro-
Gen.33.14. mised, into Seir or Idumæa.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites.
Gen.36. For Esau took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite; and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon, the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in processe of time corrupted, & drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Wars of the Iſraelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, deſcended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pedigree) we find four named by Moſes: and one and thirty remembred by Joſua, though few of theſe named, otherwiſe than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a ſmall Territory adjoyning, and no other Dominion. Theſe Canaanites in a generall conſideration are to be underſtood for all thoſe Nations, deſcended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebuſites, Amorites, Gergeſites, Hevites, &c. and ſo here we underſtand this name in ſpeaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and ſo alſo we call the Country of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promiſe: for God hath appointed that the ſeven principle Families ſhould be rooted out, and that his own people ſhould inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we conſider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the Eaſt, and by the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choyſeſt places thereof, thoſe Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The firſt King of theſe Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Hevites, whom Simeon and Levi ſlew, together with his ſon Sichem, in revenge of their ſiſters raviſhment. Gen. 34.

Arad was the ſecond King which the Scriptures have remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the ſame which ſurpriſed Iſrael, as they encamped in the Wilderneſſe in the edge of Edumæa. Num. 21. 1.

The third named was Sehon King of Eſſebon, who before Moſes arrivall had beaten the Moabites out of the Weſt part of Arabia Petræa, or Nabathea, and thruſt them over Arnon into the Deſarts, the ſame whom Moſes overthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he took Eſſebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Num. 21. 24. Joſ. 9. Joſeph. ant. lib. 4. c. 5.

Preſently after which victory, Og was alſo ſlain by Iſrael, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Traconi, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was alſo a King of the Amorites. Num. 21 35.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Jebuſites, and of Hieruſalem, with whom Joſua nameth four other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Jarmuth.

Japia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites overthrowne in battell; and hanged by Joſua. After this overthrow Joſua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Joſua 10. Joſeph. ant. l. 5. cap. 1.

Jobab, King of Madon: whom he alſo ſlaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin ſeemed to have ſome dominion over the reſt; for it is ſaid in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all thoſe Kingdoms. Jſ. 11. 1.

After theſe Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confeſt that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of ſeventy Kings, inforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after Juda and Simeon had uſed the ſame execution upon himſelf, acknowledged it to be a juſt revenge of God: this King was carried to Hieruſalem where he died. Jud. 1. Joſeph. l. 5. c. 2.

The laſt King named is Jabin the ſecond, who as it ſeemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joſua. For at ſuch time as he employed Siſara againſt Iſrael, whom he oppreſt twenty yeers, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Debora) overthrew; and his Captaine Siſara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he ſlept in her Tent: Jabin himſelf periſhing afterward in that war. Jud. 4. Jud. 4. Pſal. 83.

The Madianites had alſo their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathea: to the South-eaſt of the Dead Sea. They deſcended from Madian Abrahams ſon, by Cethura. Raguel ſurnamed Gethegleus or Jethres, ſaith Joſephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the firſt of Judges, the ſon of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Jokſham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, Joſeph. l. 5. c. 6. Exod. 3.

Cedren. p. 34. thura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Neece, Moses married, and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderneſſe, and became one of the Israelites: of him descended
Jud. 1. the Kenites, so called of his father Raguels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembred.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Ke-
1 Sam. 15. 6. nites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the Desarts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
Jos. 10. 5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, king of Hierusalem
6. Hoham of Hebron
7. Piram of Jarmuth
8. Japia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
Jos. 11. 10. Jabin of Hazor
11. Jobab of Modon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second King of Hazar.

Of the Madianites these:

* Evi or Evis.

* These five were first all at one time Kings of several portions of the Madianites, slain by Phinehas, and the 12000. which he led against them: Num. 31. 8.

Rekam or Recem who bulit Petra the Metropolis of Petræa, so called by the Greeks: and by Esay. cap. 16. v. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Joktheel.

Zur
Hur and Reba
* Oreb
Zeb Zebah Zalmunna.

* These four last were likewise at one time slain in the pursuit of Gideons victory: Jud. c. 7. v. 25. & c. 8. v. 12.

After the death of Barac, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed Israel seven yeers: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumæans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I find few that are named; and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those barren Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, Gen. 17. 20. Jud. c. 7.

that joyned with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Madianites:) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petræa: For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petræa; which was very fruitfull, though adjoyning to the Desart in which Moses wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the same which neighboureth Judæa on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathei (B) changed into (P.)

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward possest by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountains Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedræans.

Abbeel sat down in the Desart Arabia, neer the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibsam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, neer the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma: who joyned to the Orchens, neer the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athritæ, who bordered the Napatheans in the same happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Jetur the Ituræans, or Camathens: of whom Tohu was King in Davids time. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

Of Naphri the Nubeian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonæans: who were afterward called Asitæ, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians. Junius.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aretas, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished. Exod. 17.

Afterward they joyned with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites neer Cadesbarne. Num. 14. After the government of Othoniel, they joyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Caldæa: from Havilah to Shur.

In Davids time they took Siklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own losse. 1 Sam. 30.

In Ezekias time, as many of them as joyned to Edumæa, were wasted and displanted by the children of Simeon. 2 Sam. 8. 12.

§. IIII.

Of the instauration of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THere lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judæa. For if Pelasgus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acorns, who before lived for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations have vaunted of those their antiquities, accompanied not onely with civill learning, but with all other kindes of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiæ doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdome: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientiæ pertinere; To have reference to wise inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiters fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restlesse desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno cœlo quàm longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleer skie discern a far off the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Japetus, Æsculus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adjoyning, took name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the son of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse divine knowledge. Nec verò Atlas sustinere cœlum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traderetur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellified, unlesse their divine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes expresst Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturn; as, Rheæ conjux alme Promethen. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine have not doubted: For the great judgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith S. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons course, of which Archas the son of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Arcas, Arcadia in Peloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any observation of the Moons course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaëton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses, makes Deucalion the son Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses, after his return from Troy, feigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this later Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that war) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Thessaly, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foul sins perish by waters: as in the time of Noah the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood universall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Vertue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1. Strabo lib. 9.

Non illo melior quisquam, nec amantior æqui
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla dearum.

No man was better, nor more just than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed, that Prometheus fore-told his son Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himself a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily think that Story had been but an imitation of Noahs flood devised by the Greeks, did not the times so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had these two of note; Hellen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas; and Melantho, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 10. ex Eusebio & Hieronimo.

And that which was no lesse strange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also hapned under Phaeton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Istria, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountains of Vesuvius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the god of Theeves, the god of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did their Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which slew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Thevet; whom Philo Byblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians, Thoyth; the Alexandrians, Thot; and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who lived about the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he findes this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-childe of that Atlas, which lived while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives upon S. Augustine seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembred. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Moses and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth yeer Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven yeers; after him Danaus fifty yeers; after him Linceus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-childe, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews: of whom the Phœnicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Jews and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose works he commenteth, to have been four descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counseller and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lod. Vives upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of Saint Augustine, de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was entituled Ter Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-childe, * Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phœnician, who lived shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus; and by the Egyptians, Thoot, or or Thoyt. It may be, that the many yeers which he is ſaid to have lived, to wit, three hundred yeers, gave occaſion to ſome Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by thoſe who have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philoſophy and Divinity, he is found more ancient than Moſes: becauſe the Inventor of the Egyptian Wiſdome, wherein it is ſaid, that Moſes was excellently learned. Vives in lib. 8. c. 26. Aug. de Civit. Dei.

It is true, that although this Mercury or Hermes doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, eſpecially in the approving of Images, which Moſes of all things moſt deteſted: yet whoſoever ſhall reade him with an even judgement, will rather reſolve, that theſe works which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptian Prieſts corrupted, and thoſe fooleries inſerted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and ſpirit deviſed. For there is no man of underſtanding, and maſter of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the ſame Tract, thoſe things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moſes excepted) there was never any man of thoſe elder times that hath attributed more, and in a ſtile more reverend and divine unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if thoſe his two Treatiſes now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themſelves: I think it had not been perillous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moſes himſelf; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deviſed by the firſt, & more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joſeph, the ſon of Jacob: whom, after the expoſition of Pharaohs dreams, they called Saphanetphane, which is as much to ſay, as Abſconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But theſe are overventurous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envie and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whoſoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this ſort: Hic ſcripſit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Majeſtatem ſummi ac ſingularis Dei aſſerit, iiſdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; He hath written many books belonging to, or expreſſing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majeſty of the moſt High, and one God, calling him by the ſame names of God and Father, which we do. Maſſim. L. 1. c. 6. fol. 4.

The ſame Father alſo feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And ſo contrary are theſe his acknowledgements to thoſe Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians: as for my ſelf I am perſwaded, that whatſoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption inſerted. For thus much himſelf confeſſeth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & ſpiritus; & omnia in ipſo, & ſub ipſo ſunt. Verbum enim ex ejus eſſe prodiens, perfectiſſimum exiſtens, & generator, & opifex, &c. God (ſaith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountain and life, and power, and light, and minde, and ſpirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himſelf proceeding, moſt perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitfull nature, made it alſo fruitfull and producing. And he was therefore (ſaith Suydas) called Ter Maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus eſt, in Trinitate unum eſſe Deum aſſerens; Becauſe he ſpake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (ſaith Ficinus) prævidit priſcæ Religionis, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Chriſti, hic futurum judicium, reſurrectionem ſæculi, beatorum gloriam, ſupplicia peccatorum; This Mercury foreſaw the ruine of the old or ſuperſtitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Chriſt, the future judgement, the reſurrection, the glory of the bleſſed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned. In Præf. Mer. Trifmeg.

To this I will onely adde his two laſt ſpeeches reported by Calcidius the Platoniſt, and by Volteran out of Suydas. Hactenus, fili, pulſus à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto. Cumque poſt paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis abſolutus diſceſſero, videtote me me quaſi mortuum lugeatis: nam ad illam optimam beatamque Civitatem regredior, ad quam univerſi cives mortis conditione venturi ſunt. Ibi namque ſolus Deus eſt ſummus Princeps, qui cives ſuos replet ſuavitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam exiſtimant, mors eſt potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O ſon, being driven from my country, I have lived a ſtranger and baniſhed man: but now I am repaired homeward again in ſafety. And when I ſhall after a few dayes (or in a ſhort time) by being looſed from theſe bonds of fleſh and blood, depart from you, ſee that you do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that beſt and bleſſed City, to which all her citizens (by the condition of death) ſhall repair. Therein is the onely God, the moſt high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his citizens with ſweetneſſe more than marvellous:

marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death then a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words: with Suydas: O cœlum, magni Dei sapiens opus, teque O vox Patris quam ille primum emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus Verbum, & Spiritum, cuncta comprehendentem, Miseremini mei: I adjure thee O heaven, thou wise work of the great God, and thee O voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things. Have mercy upon me.

But Suydas hath his invocation in these words: Obtestor te cœlum, magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris, quam loquutus est primum cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitam Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto: I beseech thee O heaven, wise work of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VIII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

THere were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the god of the Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his Commentary upon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with Divels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth: however by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ, or Venefici, and Incantatores; Sophists, Poysoners, and Inchanters: by Hierome, Sapientes, & malefici; Wise men, and evill doers: and so by Vatablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick; calling them φαρμακεῖς, workers by drugs. The Genevian, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Junius, Sapientes, Præstigiatores, & Magi. Magicians and Wise men here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiators are such as dazell mens eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not: as false colours and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other: (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and workings of Moses, and of Pharao's Sorcerers appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Divel changeth himself into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary every work which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or ministery of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to naturall things, are such, as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Bereshith, & opus de mercana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisdome of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis; The Wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in breeding the pied Lambs in Mesopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them: assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Josua, divers other famous men lived in the World, who after their deaths, for their eminent vertues and inventions, were numbred among the gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musicall playes to Apollo Delphicus: thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrennesse and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple, and set it on fire: so did Erichthonius institute tute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyl, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

In this age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these S. Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelve labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, onely nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an *Egyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum Hercu-*10 lem, sed Ægyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith Philostratus) It is manifest, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the straights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Desarts, Dardanus built Dardania.

Lib. de Civit. Dei. cap. 12.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the dayes and age of Moses, there was never any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things; whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; never any man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and deli-20 vered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Universall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithfulnesse and meekenesse, and chose him out of all men.

Syrac. 45. 12.

He is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick: by *Me-*30 gastenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembred by Moses, Estiens, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Elamicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The universall flood which God revealed unto Moses, Eerosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Estiens, and Sybilla have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecatæus wrote a book of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by di-40 vine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrologie of the Caldeans was invented. Is justitia pietateque sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut divino præcepto in Phœniciam venerit, ibique habitaverit; For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book & fifth Chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words: Moses enim affirmavit, docebatque Ægyptios non rectè sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: Itemque Afros & Græcos, qui dis hominum figuram affinxerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos, & terram & mare continet, quod cœlum, & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profectò imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem unde at effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amisse, which attributed unto God the images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred, in giving unto their gods the shapes of men: whereas that onely is God indeed, which containeth both us, the earth and sea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtlesse, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likenesse of those things, which are amongst us. That therefore (all devising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Strabo. l. 16.

Act 7.23. Now concerning the Egyptian wisdome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdome of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words; the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judæus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Divine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish't into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometry which is by interpretation measuring of grounds, was usefull unto them: becaus it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerly overflown and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Country being a levell and spacious Plain, free and cleer from the clouds, yeelded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; becaus without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripatetick all Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies & living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain fovent heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets have their proper souls, &c.

The Divine part of this wisdome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Egypt; partly by means of the temperateness of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in those places: That the soul is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, becaus the true similitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues and benefits bestowed on mankind, have been Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adored for gods: becaus under those Ensignes they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clem. Strom. l. 5. Clemens distributeth the whole sum of this later Egyptian learning into three severall sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotall, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabeticall in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Hornet participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the light of God: becaus Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other symbolicall, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropicall, and Ænygmaticall: Imitative, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon it self: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the divers forms and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, & actions of their gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornet signifieth the Sun, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moon:

by

by the form of a Man, Prudence and Skilfullneſſe: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horſe, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fiſh, Hatred is to be underſtood: Ænigmaticall is a compoſition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which ſenſe, the monſtrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples & Altars, to ſignifie, that to men all divine things are Ænigmatical and obſcure. So the Image of the Sun ſet on the head of a Crocodile, (which liveth aſwell in the Waters, as on Land) expreſſeth that the Sun nouriſheth Meteors in the Aire, aſwell from the Waters, as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, ſignifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have bin delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius ſending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and deſtruction of his Kingdom, unleſſe he would acknowledge ſubjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouſe, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-ſhare: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to ſignifie, that by the Mouſe, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their Lands were ſignified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Soveraigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another conſtruction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did haſten away, as a Bird through the ayre, or creep into holes as a Mouſe, or run into the waters which they had paſſed as a Frog, they ſhould not eſcape his arms, but either be ſlain, or, being made Captives, till his grounds. The ſame Hiſtory is with little difference reported by Herodotus. Herod. l. 4.

The fourth and laſt part, which is Morall and Politick, doth contain eſpecially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, or Ter Maximus deviſed: who in his Books or Dialogues of Pimander and Aſclepius, hath written ſo many things of God, worthy of admiration; aſwell (ſaith Sixtus Senenſis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Chriſt, as of the laſt and fearfull day of Judgement: that (as ſaith the ſame Author, the opinion being alſo ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philoſopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Books of Myſteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Hiſtorians for their Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menætus, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not onely the Inventor of the Egyptian Philoſophy, but of all other learning, called the Wiſdome of the Egyptians, before remembred: and that he wrote of that ſubject 36525. Books, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aëreall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celeſtiall a thouſand; which becauſe they were out of the Egyptians language converted by certain learned Philoſophers into naturall Greek, they ſeemed to have been firſt written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wiſdome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Phyſick, ſix Books; of the orders of Prieſts, ten; and of Aſtrology, four. Clem. Strom. l. 6.

§. VIII.

A Brief of the Hiſtory of Joſua; and of the ſpace between him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of ſome Contemporaries to Joſua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFter the death of Moſes, and in the one and fortieth yeer of the Egreſſion, in the firſt moneth called Niſan, or March, Joſua, the ſon of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wiſdome, took on him the government of Iſrael: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to paſſe the River of Jordan, and to poſſeſſe and divide among the Iſraelites the Land promiſed.

The beginning of Joſua's rule, Saint Auguſtine dates with the reign of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Aſſyria; with Corax the ſixteenth King in Sicyonia; when Danaus governed the Argives; and Erichthonius, Athens. Lib. 18. de Civit. Dei. c. 11.

Joſua imitating in all things his Predeceſſor, ſent over Jordan certain diſcoverers to view the ſeat and ſtrength of Jerico, the next City unto him on the other ſide of the River, which he was to paſſe over. Which diſcoverers being ſaved, and ſent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, becauſe ſhe kept a Tavern or Victualling-houſe, made Joſua know, that the inhabitants of Jerico, and thoſe of the Country about it, hearing of the approach Joſ. 2. 1. Joſ. 2. 11.

Jos. 2. 11. approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeer after the Expression, Josua removed
Jos. 3. 1. from Sittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the banks of the River Jordan; and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of
Jos. 3. 3. God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River; giving them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour
Jos. 3. 13. and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap; whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe over into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

Jos. 1. 12. He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and, as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vaunt-guard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Country and Cities of the Amorites, by the help of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the middest of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East
Jos. 4. 19. side of the city of Jerico, where they incamped the first night. At which place Josua gave
Jos. 5. 2. commandment, that all born in the last fortieth yeer in the Deserts should be circumci-
Aug. q. 3. in Jos. sed, which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this Thom. part. 3. quæst. 70. art. 4. ad. 3. sort; That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passeover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai;
Jos. 5. 10. and now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Country, and having, as it were, surfeited on Man, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Josua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times;
Jos. 14. 3. first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Josua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeer of his government; proved in the 14. of Josua v. 10. and a third di-
Jos. 18. vision was made to the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Josua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Josua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the war, those little kings, or reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their own defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched, ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that war) joyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Josua. Onely five (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Army being by Josua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopeleſſe of mercy by ſubmiſſion, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Joſua drawne forth and hanged. In the proſecution of which victory he alſo took Makkedath, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam King of Gezar haſtened, and periſhed. After which Joſua poſſeſt himſelf of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, deſtroying the Cities with their Princes. Joſ. 10.

In the end, and when the South Countries were poſſeſt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made duſt: the reſt of the Canaaniter, guided by the over-late counſels of neceſſity, united themſelves, to make one groſs ſtrength and body of an Army: which Jabin, King of Hazor, practiſed and gathered together, by Joſua diſcovered, as the ſame reſted neer the Lake of Merom, he uſed ſuch diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining abſolute victory over them, he proſecuted the ſame to the utmoſt effect. And, beſides the ſlaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor onely, reſerving the reſt for Iſrael to inhabit and enjoy. Joſ. 10.

Secondly, I note, that Joſua ſhewed himſelf a ſkilfull man of War, for that in thoſe ancient times he uſed the ſtratagem of an ambuſh in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the firſt five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by ſurpriſe. For he marched all night from his camp at Gilgal, and ſet on them early the next day; when he overthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the beſt profit of his victory, he aſſaulted the great City of Hazor. Joſ. 10. 3.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable; as the ſtay of the River Jordan at the Springs, ſo as the Army of Iſrael paſt it with a drie foot; the fall of Jerico by the ſound of the Horns; the ſhowers of Haile-ſtones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them periſhed than by the ſword of Iſrael: again, the arreſt of the Sun in the firmament, whereby the day was ſo much the more lightened, as the Iſraelites had time to execute all thoſe which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work onely proper to the all-powerfull God. Joſ. 3. 13. Cap. 10. v. 11.

Fourthly, out of the paſſage between Joſua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is ſo plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evaſion, it admitteth no intruſion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiouſnes, and horrible deceit of this later age, called Equivocation. For, notwithſtanding that theſe Gibeonites were a people of the Hevites, expreſly and by name, by the commandment of God to be rooted out, & notwithſtanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and, as it were, deride Joſua, and the Princes of Iſrael, by feigning to be ſent as Embaſſadours from a far Country, in which travell their cloths were worn, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have been warm for newneſſe when they firſt ſet out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken; their ſhooes patcht; and their ſacks rent and ragged: Yet Joſua having ſworn unto them by the Lord God of Iſrael, he durſt not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he ſpared both their lives, and the Cities of their inheritance. Joſ. 9. from the 5. to the 13. verſe. Joſ. 9. 7.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promiſe made, Joſua had it. For firſt, the commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the reſt, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might juſtly have put theſe men to the ſword, and have ſackt their Cities, if there be any evaſion from a promiſe made, whereof the living God is called to witneſs. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, becauſe he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a ſtrange people that he gave faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Iſrael had done in Egypt and over Jordan, ſought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Iſrael made with theſe crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the ſame place, That the Iſraelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had ſaid, and counſelled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, theſe men who were known Idolaters, and ſerved thoſe Puppets of the Heathen, men of an apiſh Religion, as all Worſhippers of Images are, could not challenge the witneſſe of the true God, in whom they believed not. I ſay therefore, that if ever man might have ſerved himſelf by any evaſion or diſtinction, Joſua might juſtly have done it. For he needed Joſ. 9. 7. Joſ. 9. 14.

not in this case the help of Æquivocation or Mentall Reservation. For what he sware, he sware in good Faith; but he sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtilty of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the Name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworn it, were worshippers of the Devill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught, and defie him. If he that without reservation of honour, giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himself, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, promiseth in his Name, and makes him a witnesse of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearfull thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For though it were 400. yeers after Josua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Sauls sons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not onely be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whosoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadeech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Sanar, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syracon to their aid: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge, seeing they had forsworn themselves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slayeth the soul: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most advantagious that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. And though the said King was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battell with 30000. Christians, and his own life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgements upon faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-dayes, is rather made a matter of custome, than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable, That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and, as it is said in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make war. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Josua; but soon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforc't to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest accesse. And those of Juda were not able to be masters of their own Vallies; becausc as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoyning unto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzah, Gath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Jos. 23. Judg. 1. & Judg. 3. 2. Judg. 1. 34. Judg. 1. 19. Jos. 11. 19. 1 Sam. 17. 4.

Neither did the children of Manasse over Jordan expell the Gesburites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nepthalims possesse themselves of Bethshemish, nor of Bethanah; but they inforc't those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor inforc't them to tribute.

Jos. 13. 13. Judg. 1. 31.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Jos. 16. 10.

Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taacnach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea, Hierusalem it self did the Jebusites defend above four hundred yeers, even till Davids time.

Judg. 2. 27.

Now Josua lived one hundred and ten yeers, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty yeers: Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twenty; and Massius six and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteen: Joannes Lucidus, seventeen: Cajetanus, ten: Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty: and so doth S. Augustine: Melanchthon, two and thirty: Codoman, five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480. yeers from the delivery of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Josua onely eighteen of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. yeers from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of errour, such as have inserted yeers between Josua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeers, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Josua: Bunting reckons it nine yeers: Bucholzer and Reusner but one; Codoman, twenty; and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirty: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeers, there can be no void yeers found between Josua and Othoniel, unlesse they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Josua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Josua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

Euseb. 314. Bunt.

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, becausc it is said in the last Chapter, ver. 26. And Josua wrote these words in the book of the Law of God: which seemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Josua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord: which promise Josua caused to be written in the book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceive, that the book of Josua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Justorum, remembred by Josua himself; and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these words of the 26. Verse, And Josua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it: for when the people had answerered Josua; The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Josua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Josua, Erichthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fifty Sons of Ægyptus, all but Lynceus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Josua, Phœnix, and Cadmus, and neer the end of Josua's life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the daughter of Phœnix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this ravishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Trojan war. And so doth Nestor reckon up in the Councell of the Greeks, Theseus and Perithous for men of Antiquity and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

§. 1.

The Proœme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Josua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembred when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographicall description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood, and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do shew what Cities & Places of strength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungratefull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maximè irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet severitatem, ne æternam justè inferat ultionem; The divine goodnesse is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully use temporall severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-weals: and to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this subject: among whom, because I find so great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own reason, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistims, and the Lands of Og and Sehon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Ptol. Asia. tab. 4. Ptol. 5. Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petræa, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews, Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aran Nahairajim is expounded: also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syriæ, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edessa, sometime Reges, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Cœlosyria, which the Latines call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus, and Antilybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: over which Adadezer commanded in Solomons time. Then Phœnicia, and the people Syraphœnicies: and lastly, Syria Palæstina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomy maketh Judæa also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syrea Judæa.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BUt that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Desarts between Idumæa and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermon, Galaad, and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi, or Traconitæ, and Ptolomie, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the son of Cham: Et lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebræa of the Hebrews: who took name from Heber, the son of Sale, according to Saint Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noahs sons, which past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens, of going, or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Judæa from Juda; and then afterwards intituled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was born, and buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. Galilee is double, the superiour called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Judæa are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now besides these Provinces of Phœnicia, and Palæstina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because anciently possest by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastermost parts are again divided into Basan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Macbati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are known to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar untill Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrie North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest unto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboiim, even unto Lasha: by which words Moses setteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the soal of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: Deut. 11. 24.

your coast shall be from the wilderneſſe, and from Libanon, and from the river Perah, unto the uttermoſt Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this deſcription agreeth with the former: onely Libanon is put for Zidon; and the Wilderneſſe for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and Weſt, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promiſed ſtretcheth it ſelf both over Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Iſraelites never poſſeſt; nor at any time did ſo much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perah was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Joſua: Behold, I have divided unto you by lot theſe Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I have deſtroyed, even unto the great Sea Weſtward.

Joſ.23 4.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter ſo far to the East as Aſſyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not poſſeſſing of all theſe Countries give advantage to thoſe that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promiſe of God to the Iſraelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magiſtrates, and People, fell from his worſhip and ſervice, it pleaſed him not onely to incloſe them within that Territory, which was for ſo many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elſewhere to ſubject them unto thoſe Idolatrous Nations, whoſe falſe and fooliſh gods themſelves alſo ſerved and obeyed. And ſure the promiſe by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the laſting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to thoſe conditions, both in the Verſes preceding, and ſubſequent; which the Iſraelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankinde could or can expect; who knew that all ſorts of comforts from the mercifull goodneſſe of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perſevere in his love, ſervice, and obedience. So in the eighth Verſe of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joyned to the proſperity of Iſrael. For therein it is written; Therefore ſhall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be ſtrong, and go in, and poſſeſſe the Land, whither ye go to poſſeſſe it. Alſo that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord ſware unto your fathers, &c.

Vadian. Epitom. trium terræ partium. cap. Paleſtin.

Deut.11.21.

Deut.11.

The like condition was alſo annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the poſſeſſion thereof, ſo long as the heavens were above the earth. For if ye keep diligently, ſaith he, all theſe commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord caſt out all theſe Nations before you, and ye ſhall poſſeſſe great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifeſt, that by reaſon of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worſhip of his all-powerfull Majeſtie, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditionall promiſes of God were abſolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot miſlike that expoſition of Melanchthon: For, ſaith he, Oſtendit promiſſionem præcipuam non eſſe de hoc politico Regno; He ſheweth that his chief promiſe is not of a civill Kingdome. To which agrees that anſwer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretick in his Epiſtle ad Dardanum, who accuſed S. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in queſtion, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viventium terram quæ in cœlis eſt; (that is) Onely to that land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judæorum Regio adeo anguſta ſit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. milliarium, latitudinem verò 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & oppida ſunt plurima, nunquam à Judæis occupata, ſed tantùm divina pollicitatione promiſſa; Becauſe the whole Countrey of the Jews is ſo narrow in compaſſe, that it ſcarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in theſe are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never poſſeſt, but were onely granted by divine promiſe. In like manner the ſame Father ſpeaketh upon Eſay, touching the bleſſings promiſed unto Hieruſalem, where he hath theſe words: De quo diſcimus Hieruſalem nequaquam in Palæſtinæ regione petendam, quæ totius Provinciæ deterrima eſt: & ſaxoſis montibus aſperatur, & penuriam patitur ſitis: ita ut cœleſtibus utatur pluviis, & raritatem fontium ciſternarum extructione ſoletur: ſed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, feſtinaverunt ſtructores tui; From whence, ſaith he, we learn, that Hieruſalem is not to be ſought in that region of Palæſtina, which which is the worſt of the whole Province, and ragged with craggie mountains, and ſuffereth the penury of thirſt: ſo as it preſerveth rain water, and ſupplieth the ſcarcity of Wells by building of ciſterns; but this Hieruſalem is in Gods hands, to which it is ſaid, Thy builders have haſtened: ſo far S. Hierome; where alſo to prevent miſtaking, he thus expoundeth himſelf: Neque hoc dico in ſuggillationem terræ Judææ, ut hæreticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam hiſtoriæ veritatem, quæ fundamentum eſt intelligentiæ ſpiritualis: ſed ut decutiam ſupercilium Judæorum, qui Synagogæ anguſtias latitudini Eccleſiæ præferunt: Si enim occidentem tantùm ſequuntur literam, & non ſpiritum vivificantem, oſtendant terram promiſſionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (ſaith he) ſay I this to diſgrace the land of Judæa, as the hereticall Sycophant doth belie me: or to take away the truth of the hiſtory, which is the foundation of ſpirituall underſtanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the ſtraits of the Synagogue farther than the breadth of the Church: For if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening ſpirit, let them ſhew the Land of promiſe, flowing with milk and honey.

By this it may alſo be gathered, howſoever it be unlikely (ſeeing the Weſt-bound in the place, Dent. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall ſenſe, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the Eaſt-bound, ſhould be taken onely in a ſpirituall ſenſe) yet nevertheleſſe that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be underſtood for Euphrates, and that the promiſe it ſelf was never ſo large: much leſſe the plantation and conqueſt of Iſrael.

And now for a more particular deſcription of this Holy Land, becauſe Aſher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon held the Northermoſt part, and were ſeated in Phœnicia, I will begin with theſe three, taking Aſher for the firſt: of which Tribe yet before I ſpeak, I muſt admoniſh the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reaſon of the divers fancies of Tranſlators, are diverſly expreſſed, ſo that to the unſkilfull they may ſeem divers, when they are one and the ſame: the reaſon of this diverſity (as by thoſe learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly becauſe the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Tranſlators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, becauſe the Ancient expreſſed or omitted divers conſonants, otherwiſe than the later do think fit.

§. III.
THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

‖. I.
The bounds of the Tribe of Aſher.

THe Aſherites deſcended of Aſher the ſon of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increaſed while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde perſons, all men above twenty yeers of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were muſtered by Moſes at Mount Sinai: all which number periſhing in the Deſarts, there remained of their iſſues, beſides women and children, 53400. bodies fit for the wars: which paſt the river of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, & after the conqueſt of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon & the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongſt the Sea-coaſt, containing thirty Engliſh miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the Eaſt border ſome twelve miles: though Antoninus Ant. Itin. makes it ſomewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in wine, oyl, and wheat, beſides the Balſamum, with other pleaſant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecy, Aſſer pinguis panis: Concerning Aſſer, his bread ſhall be fat: And he ſhall give pleaſures for a King. Gen. 40.

‖. II.
Of Zidon.

THe firſt City ſeated on the North border of the Territory of Aſſer, was Zidon, which Joſua calleth the great Zidon, both for ſtrength and magnitude. The Greeks and Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Juſtine derives the name from Juſtin. l. 18.

the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath been called Zidona. But Gen.10. Joseph. that it was far mor ancient, Moses, Josua, and Josephus witnesse, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaans sons: and so strong it was in Josua's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their successours master Esa.23. Hier. 47. Ezek.28. & 32. Zac.9. it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ; a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis:
Pa ol. Steig. f.15. Vadian. Phœn.f.278. Strabo,l.16. and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth between it and Tyre: the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14.thousand paces, saith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissinburie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new scale to the Map and Description of the holy Land.

* Strabo,l.16. Zach.9.2. Herod.l.5. Plin.l.5.c.9. What Kings it had till Agenors time there is no memory: the story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as * Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon; and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became far more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zachary calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by nature and art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessible Rock, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South-side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as unto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece. Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of * Glasse, which they used to make of those sands which are taken out of the river Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neer Ptolomais, or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleer Glasses which they make at Murana: of which S.Hierome and Pliny: Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrariis officinis nobilis; Zidon a famous Glasse-maker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1 *Sam.*31.10.and *Judg.*10.6.) yet especially & peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 *Reg.*11.5. in the story of Solomons Idolatry: where Astaroth is called the god of the Zidonians: and 1 *Reg.*16.33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezabel the daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astaroths in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plurall names of Baalim & Astaroth, 1 *Sam.*12.10.& elsewhere: for even the name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebritian, is plurall; the singular being Astoreth: whence *Judg.*2.13. the Septuagint reade ἐλάτρευσαν τῇ Ἀστάρτῃ · They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Astoreths, may be diversly understood: either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doubtless in divers cities divers. *Augustine quæst.*19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. *Tully, lib.*3. de Nat.Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis: as also *Macrob.*2.*Saturn.cap.*21. sayes, that Adonis was with great veneration

* It seems that even in Josua's time they practised glasse-making, whence Junius for Misphrebooth majim, which ad verbum is as much as combustiones aquarum, reads fornaces vitrarium, *Jos.*11.8. as it seems, because those fornaces were where there was store of water, either for the moving of the bellows by the force of the water, or for other necessary uses. But there are others that take them for salt-pits, and others again for hot baths.

The form of Astoreth (or Astarte) seemeth to have been a sheep, for Deut.7.13. the word in the plurall number signifieth sheep: and this may confirm Augustines opinion, that Astarte was Juno: for the form of her husband Jupiter Hammon was a Ram.

veneration commonly worſhipped of the Aſſyrians: and Hierome upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may ſeem that in the worſhip of Aſtarte or Venus, they did bewail her huſband Adonis: as alſo the Grecians did in their ſongs of Adonis: Mourn for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Oſiris in the ſacrifice of Iſis: whoſe loſſe of her Huſband Oſiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus loſſe of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iſide & Oſiride; that Oſiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may ſeem to be the ſame with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howſoever theſe Zidonians were thus anciently foſtered with the milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Goſpel of Chriſt after his Aſcenſion, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moſes and the Prophets ſo many yeers, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. but I ſay unto you, it ſhall be eaſier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of judgement, than for you. κλαίετε κλαῖε Ἄδωνιν. Mat. 11. 21.

It received a Chriſtian Biſhop with the firſt: who was afterward of the Dioceſſe of Tyre. But in the yeer of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their poſſeſſion till Baldwinus the firſt, then King of Hieruſalem: in the yeer 1111. by the help of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to viſit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Euſtace Gremer, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the yeer 1250. it was reedified and ſtrengthened by Lodowick the French King: while he ſpent four yeer in the War of the Holy Land. Laſtly, in the yeer 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in poſſeſſion of the Turk, and hath the name of Zai. Tyr. 11. *Bell. §. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief Hiſtory of Tyre in the ſame Coaſt.

SArepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) ſtanding in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing neer it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non ſunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Quæque Sareptano palmite miſſa bibas.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had alſo a Biſhop, of the Dioceſſe of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the reſt: and is now called Saphet, ſaith Poſtellus.

Not far from Sarepta was ſcituate that ſometime famous City of Tyre, whoſe fleets of ſhips commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatneſſe and power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyrii tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quaſi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola: in Aſia the leſſe, Dromos Achillis, which City the Scholiaſt of Apollonius placeth neer the River Phyllis, in Bythinia. Virgil. l. 1. Plin. l. 5. c. 19. Marcelin. l. 22.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and ſo it is written in Joſua the 19. taking name from the ſcituation; becauſe built on a high Rock, ſharp at one end. The Latines, as it ſeems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Oſtrum Sarranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruines remain to this day; the place being ſtil known by the name of the ancient Tyre: and becauſe it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Eſay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus alſo confirmeth Gellius. l. 4. c. 6.

Cap.23. confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the son of Japhet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Cap.23. Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie, whose antiquity is of ancient daies?) yet, that Thiras the son of Japhet set himself in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to perswade me.

Justin.l.18. Curt.l.4. Euseb. in Chro. Joseph.ant. l.8. cap.2. Cedren.ja.27. But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Josephus and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomons Temple 240.yeers: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth, that Tyrus the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700. paces from the Ezek.28.2.27. vers.3. Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middest of the Seas, as some reade, or as others, in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he called it scituate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mart of the people for many Isles: and Esay Esay 23.3. 27.8. a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crown of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defendor of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no perill could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoyning, as, notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their walls, he over-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a rank all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold bloud he performed (as some Authours affirm) upon the issues of those slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Joseph.ant. Jud.l.11.c.8. Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provinciall Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Jaddas the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garizim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Jews oppugned, for that De bell.sacr. l.13.c.4. he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil.Tyrius called Sanabula, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with threescore ships of war held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of Josep.ant.lib.9. cap.14. men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve sail scattered that fleet, and took 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lievtenants five yeers, but with ill succesſe. And this ſiege Menander Ephesius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annalls of the Tyrians (which the ſaid Menander converted into Greek) adding, that Elulæus, whom Tyrius called Heliſæus, was then King of Tyre, having governed the ſame ſix and twenty yeers. Soon after this repulſe of Salmanaſſer, and about 200. yeers before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonoſor, at ſuch time as he deſtroyed Hieruſalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that deſpairfull work, of joyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonoſor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the ſtrength of the Sea, the ſame cawſey and paſſage was again broken down, and demoliſhed.

Et cont. Ap. 1. Guil. Tyrius. de Bell. Sacr. 13.4. Joſeph. Ant. lib. 9. cap. 15.

Againſt Nabuchodonoſor, for many yeers, the Tyrians defended themſelves: for ſo long did thoſe Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder made bare, ſaith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Eſay had manifeſtly foretold the deſtruction of this proud place. In the end, and after thirteen yeers ſiege or more, the Tyrians deſpoyled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ſhips, abandoned their City, tranſporting with themſelves the ableſt of all that remained: and with their wives, children, and portable riches, ſayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: ſo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to ſatisfie ſo many labours and perils, or any perſon upon whom to avenge themſelves for the loſſe of ſo many bodies in that War: It pleaſed God in recompence thereof (who ſtrengthened this reſolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonoſor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdom and the ſpoile thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternall happineſſe reſerved for his Servants and Saints: yet ſuch is the boundleſſe goodneſſe of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall bleſſings.

Ezek. 29. 18. Iſa. 23. &c.

Ezek. 29. 19.

Now of this enterpriſe of Nabuchodonoſors againſt Tyre, prophane Hiſtorians have not bin ſilent. For both Diocles, and Philoſtratus, (as Joſephus citeth them) the one in his ſecond Book, the other in his Phœnician Hiſtories remember it.

Joſ. cont. l. 1. c. 13.

After theſe two great Vaſtations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it ſelf again: and continued in great glory about 300. yeers, even to the coming of our Saviour Chriſt: and after him flouriſhed in the Chriſtian Faith neer 600. yeers: the Archbiſhop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Hieruſalem onely, who within his own Dioceſſe had fourteene great Cities, with their Biſhops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwiſe Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæſarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthoſia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Tortoſa) and Maraclea. But in the yeer 636. it was with the reſt of that beautifull Region of Phœnicia and Paleſtina, ſubjected to the cruell and faithleſſe Saracen: under the burthen and yoke of whoſe tyranny it ſuffered, with the other Paleſtine Cities, 488. yeers.

Guil. Tyr. lib. 1. fac.

In the yeer 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hieruſalem 5 but in vain: yet in the yeer 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarch of Hieruſalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the ſecond, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered, and ſubjected to the Kings of Hieruſalem, and ſo it remained 165. yeers.

Guil. Tyr. 11. Bell. facr. 17.

Finally, in the yeer 1189. Saladine having firſt taken Hieruſalem, removed his whole Army, and ſate down before Tyre: drawing his fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Chriſtian power.

The Citizens finding themſelves reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and ſallyed out reſolvedly upon his Army, ſlew ſo great numbers of them; and followed their victory with ſuch fury, as that the Saracens forſaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two yeers after which victory the body of that famous Frederick Barbaroſſa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies over a River unfoordable, periſhed by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedrall Church of Tyre, neer unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and graven with guilt pillers of Marble, 940. yeers before before therein buried: but in the yeer 1289. the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

‖. IV.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

THe third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtain, on the South bound of Asser was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirm, that it took name from Acon the brother of Ptolomie. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

Plin. li. 5. c. 19. In descrip. terr. sanct.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infidelliously wrested from his son in law Alexander, which called himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the said Ptolomie, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Machabæus treacherously surprised and slain, as it is 1 Mac. 12.48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the aforesaid Alexander in the war against Demetrius, one of the sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolomie joyned, overthrown and treacherously murthered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his father in law Ptolomie: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three daies, for God struck him by death.

1 Macc. 11.18.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seat; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferiour to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middest of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those Ships which came neer and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seat of the Dioceese of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeer 636. (a fatall yeer to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the yeer 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the Revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the yeer of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourscore and seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeer of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeer 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

FIve miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Asser, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the River Adonis, and Zidon: his own words are these:

The Valley under this Caſtle ſometime called Aſſer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority ſuffice not, we may rather make the Story allegoricall, figuring the victory of Chriſt, than except of George the Arrian Biſhop, mentioned by Am.Marcellinus.

‖. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtween Ptolomais and Tyre alongſt the Seacoaſt, was the ſtrong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which S.Hierome called Achziph, and Joſephus Ecdippos, Plinie Ecdippa, one of thoſe which defended it ſelf againſt the Aſſerites. Belforeſt findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Caſtle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moſes ſent from Cadesbarn, travelled as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Aſſer, which Rechob, as alſo Berothæ, which by Ezechiel, cap.47.ver.16. is placed in theſe North borders, belonged in Davids time to the King Hadarhezer, as it may be gathered out of the ſecond of Samuel chap.8. ver.8. and cap.10.ver.6. and it defended it ſelf againſt the Aſſerites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did. Hieron. de Locis Hebr. Joſ. Bell. Jud. l.c.11. Plin.l.5.c.19.

This Aphek it was, whoſe wall falling down, ſlew ſeven and twenty thouſand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thouſand had been ſlaughtered by the Iſraelites, under the conduct of Ahab. Here Junius finds that the Philiſtims encamped a little before the battell at Gilboa, though in his note upon the firſt of Samuel the 9.& 1.he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battell the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which *Joſ.*15.and 53. and in the ſecond of Kings 13.17. he reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others convert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek. 1 Kin.20.29. 1 Sam.29.1.

The next place alongſt the coaſt is Sandalium, firſt called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Marcedon built it when he beſieged Tyre: and ſet it on a point of Land which extendeth it ſelf into the Sea, between Acziba and Tyre: which Caſtle Baldwine the firſt rebuilt and fortified; in the yeer of Chriſt 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Caſtle, there ariſeth that moſt plentifull Spring of water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of living Water: from whence not onely all the fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the ſame Spring, which hath not above a bow-ſhot of ground to travail till it recover the Sea, driveth ſix great Mills in that ſhort paſſage, ſaith Brochard. Cant.4. Itin.1.

Within the Land, and to the Eaſt of Acziba, and Sandalium, ſtandeth Hoſa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Achſaph, or Axab, or after S.Hierome, Aciſap, a City of great ſtrength, whoſe King, amongſt the reſt, was ſlain by Joſua, at the waters of Merom. Joſ.12.20.

‖. VII.

Of Thoron, Giſcala, and ſome other places.

FArther into the Land, towards Jordan, was ſeated the Caſtle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Eaſter-moſt hills of Tyre, in the yeer 1107. thereby to reſtrain the excurſions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre againſt the Chriſtians: the place adjoyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleaſant. From this Caſtle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the ſtory of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the bleſſed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Conſtable to Baldwine the 3.King of Hieruſalem, lieth buried: There were five Caſtles beſides this within the Territory of Aſſer: where, whereof four are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum, Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium and Belfort: the first neer the Sea under the Hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possest the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomais Achon. The first fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, neer the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Jos. 19.29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

Harold.l.2.c.4. Continuatores Bell.ac.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Asser, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod furnamed the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weisshenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabol (or Cabul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compasse of the holy Land, though bordering Asher on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the countrey: for it was not lawfull, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appeares, 2 *Chron.*8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobeæ, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate gathering together four hundred Theeves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judæa: by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly indangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forc't it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Major, and * Cades (or Cadessa) of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the evill spirit. Neer the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Machabeus overthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Jos. 19.28. where also we reade of Nebiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beron: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Asserites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, *Judg.*1.30. to which out of Josua we may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Aſſer.

THe Rivers to the North of Aſſer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Zeigler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neer Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws neer unto Zidon: finding his head notwithſtanding where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath alſo a River called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which he alſo citeth Pliny, and the firſt of Machabees the eleventh Chapter; but neither of thoſe authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Aſſer: for this River falleth into the Sa at the Iſle of Aradus: not far from Balanæa, witneſſe Ptolomy: and therefore Pinetus calleth it Valania, and Poſtellus, Velana; which River boundeth Phœnicia on the North-ſide: to which Strabo alſo agreeth: but this principall River of Aſſer, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Chriſtianus Chrot out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicſtan (which Laicſtan in this our age both viewed and deſcribed the Holy Land) calleth the main River Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the ſtreams which runneth into it from the North-ſide, Naar, and another from the South-weſt, Chabul: of the city adjoyning of the ſame name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is alſo another River deſcribed by Adrichome, named Jepthael, which I finde in no other Author, and for which he citeth Joſ. 19. but the word [a] Ghe, which is added there to Jepthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turn it. There is alſo found in Aſſer the River of Belus, remembred by Joſephus and Tacitus, which is alſo called Pagidas, ſaith * Pliny: out of the ſands of this River are made the beſt Glaſſe, which ſometimes the Zidonians practiſed: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedumim, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cendevia, as all Coſmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into thoſe parts witneſſe. It is true that the River of Chiſon taketh water from Chedumim, but not in that faſhion which Montanus hath deſcribed it: neither doth it finde the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South between Caiphas and Sioaminum, witneſſe Zeigler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Beſides theſe Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living waters adjoyning to Tyre: and [b] Maſerephot, or after S. Hierome, Maſerephotmaim, whoſe Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoyning, (they ſay) the Inhabitants by ſeething the water make ſalt thereof, as at Nantwitch.

The Mountains which bound Aſſer on the North, are thoſe of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœloſyria: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phœnicia and Syria, extend themſelves far into the Land Eaſt-ward, 400. ſtadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Cœloſyria, which thoſe Mountains incloſe: but Pliny gives them 1500. furlongs in length from the Weſt (where they begin at Theipſophon, or Dei facies, neer Tripolis to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damaſcus: where Anti-Libanus turneth towards the South. Theſe ledges where they begin to part Traconitis and Baſan, from the Deſart Arabia, are called Hermon: which Moſes alſo nameth Sion, the Phœnicians, Syrion; and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the ſame being ſtill a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremy proveth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting, that this Galaad is the higheſt of thoſe Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the name of Traconitæ: and Ptolomy by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth theſe Mountains bordering Aſſer; Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Coſmographers, but he giveth no reaſon of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, becauſe (according to Tacitus) the higeſt of them are covered with ſnow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos, (ſaith Weiſſenburg) ſignifieth whiteneſſe. Others call them by that name of the Frankincence which thoſe Trees yeeld: becauſe λιβανος is alſo the Greek word for that Gum.

Niger out of Aphrodiſeus affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kinde of honey dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Saccharr, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Asser, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abarim in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

§. IV.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the son of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to bear arms, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their sons, 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty yeers of age. The Land of Nephtalim took beginning on the North part, from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hill of Libanus adjoyning, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-East by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Mountains adjoyning shadowed from the Sun the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldæan Paraphrast; otherwise Bethshemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Gestelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a city in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queen commanded.

Abila also gave name to the region adjoyning, of which Lysanius the son of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Ptolomy gave it the addition of Lysanii, and called it Abila Lysanii. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes, that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Apuleius, not Abuleus. After that this city of Abila or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith; Priscillinus became the Bishop thereof: slain afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Trever. For distinction of this city (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembred, that in the Tribe of [a] Manasse, joyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another city of the same name, saving that it is written with an (ע) for an (א) and called Abela, remembred in the 20. chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for distinction sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Town of Mahaca the wife of Macir, the son of Manasse, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab besieged, because Seba the son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thereinto for succour: but a certain wise woman of the city perswading the people to cast Seba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same city was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

[a] Also a third in Ephraim, called Abel-Mechola, and a fourth in Reuben, called Abel-Sittim, also Abel-Mitsraim, at the Foord of Jordan, and (as it seems) in the same Tribe of Reuben, of all which in that which follows: to which also we may adde Abel-Magnum, the name, as some think, of a City, otherwise called Bethshemes, neer the border of the Philistims, or according to others, of the great stone in the border. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Joseph. ant. l. 7. cap. 10. 2 Sam. 20. 1 Kings 15. 2 Kings 15.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plain ground; and therefore no marvell that many Towns (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places took name; as Bochim, Judg. 2. 4.

and

and ſo doubtleſſe * Abel-Miſraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Junius in his notes upon Num. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was ſo called, rather by reaſon of the plain ground there, (to wit, in the Land of Moab) and ſo perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Town of Eliſha the Prophet: alſo Abel-Vinearum of the Ammonites, whither Jephta purſued them.

* And Abel Magnum. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Judg. 7. 24. & 1 Reg. 19. 15. Judg. 11. 33.

‖. II.

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim was that famous City of Jabin, in Joſua's time called Aſor, (or after the Chaldæan Paraphraſt, Haſzor) by Joſephus, Aſora; by Junius, * Chatzor: which Laiteſtan names Heſron; the Regall City, and Metropolis of Canaan: ſeated in the Weſt part of Nephtalim, towards Aſher. In this city was that great Rendevous and Aſſembly of thoſe four and twenty Kings againſt Joſua: who being all overthrown, ſlain, and ſcattered, this their powerfull city was by Joſua taken & burnt to duſt. But in proceſſe of time the ſame being re-built by the Canaanites, a ſecond King Jabin, 137. yeers after the death of this firſt Jabin, invaded the Iſraelites: and being ordained of God to puniſh their Idolatry, he prevailed againſt them, and held them in a miſerable ſervitude 20. yeers; till Debora the Propheteſſe overthrew Siſera, Jabins Lievtenant, and his Army, neer the Mountain Tabor. This city Solomon reſtored at ſuch time as he alſo re-edified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with [c] Megiddo, Bethoron, and other cities; but about 260. yeers after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalaſar, King of the Aſſyrians. It is now, ſaith Adrichomius, called Antiopia: it was one of the principall cities of Decapolis. There is another city of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, ſeated on the confines of Aſcalon, called the new Hazor, [d] ſaith Hierome.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Juda, ſee cb 9. ſect. 1. Of a fourth in Benjamin, ſee that which follows in this place: of a fifth in this Tribe of Nephtalim, called Hen-Chatſor, we reade Joſ. 19. 27. whereto we may adde Chatſor-Henan, in the uttermoſt North-eaſt of Manaſſe, over Jordan, Ez. 47. Numb. 34. 8. ‖. III.

Of Cæſarea Philippi.

THere was alſo on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned city of Lais, or Laiſeh, as Junius writes it, or Leſchen; which city the children of Dan (being ſtraitned in their Territory under Juda) invaded and maſtered; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Geneſ. 14. at which place Abraham ſurprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diviſion of Syria, otherwiſe called Sophena. And after the poſſeſſion of the Danites, it had the joynt name of Leſchem-Dan. Weiſſenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneva, Laiſh; Joſephus, Dana; Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witneſſe Neubrigenſis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monk, and Poſtellus: who alſo taketh this city to be the ſame, which in Matth. 15. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Mark, ſpeaking of the ſame ſtory, Dalmanutha. At ſuch time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it ſeemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or elſe ſubject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written Judges 18. And there was none to help, becauſe Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no buſineſſe with other men: for it was above thirty Engliſh miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when theſe regions became ſubject to the ſtate of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountain adjoyning ſo called: and therefore Ptolomy calls it Cæſarea Paniæ. Hegeſippus calls it Parnium, ſaith Weiſſenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy; for in Hegeſippus, ſet out by Badius, it is written Paneum without an (R): and at ſuch time as Philip the ſon of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Traconitis, ſometime Baſan: this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tiberius Cæſar, he called it * Cæſarea Philippi: and ſo it became the Metropolis, and head city of Traconitis, and one of the firſt cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the ſucceeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: ſo in S. Hieroms time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and ſo re-called it, with the Territory adjoyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Chriſt healed of a bloody iſſue, by touching the hem of his garment with a conſtant Faith: who afterward, as ſhe was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodneſſe, and no leſſe gratefull for the ſame, as Euſebius and Nicephorus report, cauſed two Statues to be caſt in pure Copper: the one repreſenting Chriſt, as neer as it could be moulded: the other made like her ſelf, kneeling at his feet, & holding up her hands towards him. Theſe ſhe mounted upon two great Baſes or Pedeſtals of the ſame metall, which ſhe placed by a Fountain neer her own houſe: both which (ſaith Euſebius) remained in their firſt perfection, even to his own time: which himſelf had ſeen, who lived in the reign of Conſtantine the Great. But in the yeer after Chriſt 363. that Monſter Julian Apoſtata, cauſed that worthy Monument to be caſt down and defaced: ſetting up the like of his own in the ſame place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts ſundered and ſcattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is alſo confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth Book and twentieth Chapter.

a Joſephus in the book of the Jewiſh war, chap. 18. ſaith, that Philip the Tetrarch caſt chaffe into a Fountain called Phiala, diſtant 120. ſtadia North-eaſt from Ceſaria, which chaffe being carried under ground, was caſt up again at Paneas, or Dan, whereby it is conjectured, that the firſt Spring of Jordan is from this Fountain called Phiala, from whence Jor and Dan receive their waters.

This City built by the Danites, was neer the joyning together of thoſe two Rivers, which ariſing from the ſprings of Jor and Dan, the two[a] apparent Fountains of Jordan, in a ſoile exceeding fruitfull and pleaſant: for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this City it was that S. Peter aeknowledged Chriſt to be the Son of God: whereupon it was anſwered, Tues Petrus, & ſuper hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Chriſtian faith, it was honoured with a Biſhops ſeat: and it ran the ſame fortune with the reſt, for it was after taken and re-taken by the Saracens, and Chriſtians: under Fulch the fourth King of Hieruſalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damaſcus wreſted it from the Chriſtians; and ſhortly after by them again it was recovered. Laſtly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World ſubjected to the Turk.

§. IV.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Caphernaum is not the leaſt: ſo often remembred by the Evangeliſts. This City had the honour of Chriſts preſence three yeers: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he firſt preached and taught the doctrine of our ſalvation: according to that notable Prophecy of Eſay 9. The people that walked in darkneſſe have ſeen a great light: they that dwelt in the Land of the ſhadow of death, upon them hath the light ſhined.

Caphernaum was ſeated on Jordan, even where it entreth into the Sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich ſoile: of whoſe deſtruction Chriſt himſelf propheſied in theſe words, And thou Caphernaum which art lifted up unto heaven, ſhalt be brought down to Hell, &c. which ſhewed the pride and greatneſſe of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were ſome marks of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieroms time, as himſelf confeſſeth; it being then a reaſonable Burge or Town: yet thoſe that have ſince, and long ſince ſeen it, as Brochard, Breidenbech, and Saliniac affirm, that it then conſiſted but of ſix poor Fiſher-mens houſes.

Matth. 4. Mark 7. Luke 8. Nicer. comment. Act. 4. f. 503. Plin. l. 5. c. 18. Opotes a City ſtanding in the Valley of Celoſyria, watered by Chryſorroas, as Damaſcus is. Plin. l. 5.

The Region of ten principall Cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this deſcription often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Mark and Luke alſo remembred; but I find no agreement between the Coſmographers, what proper limits it had: and ſo Pliny himſelf confeſſeth; for Marius Niger, ſpeaking from others, bounds it on the North by the Mountain Caſius in Caſiotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which deſcription it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœloſyria, all Paleſtina, and Judæa.

Pliny alſo makes it large, & for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth four of them to be ſituated towards Arabia: to wit, firſt theſe three, Damaſcus, Opotes, Raphana, then Philadelphia (which was firſt called Amana, ſaith Stephanus, or as I gheſſe, Amona rather, becauſe it was the chief City of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptolo. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, ſometime ſometime Niſa, built (as is ſaid) by Eacchus, in memory of his Nurſe, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethſan; for the ſixth he ſetteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœloſyria, which was alſo called Antioch and Seleuſia:) but it is Gadara in Baſan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, ſeated on an high hill, neer the River of Hieromaix. This River Ortelius takes to be the River Jaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manaſſe over Jordan: but he miſtaketh it; for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Geraſa, whereas Jaboc entreth the ſame Sea between Ephron and Phanuel. For the ſeventh he nameth * Hippos or Hippion, a City ſo called of a Colony of Horſmen there garriſon'd by Herod, on the Eaſt-ſide of the Galilean Sea, deſcribed hereafter in the Tribe of Manaſſe over Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is alſo called Eutis, and Berenice, ſeated in the South border of the Region over Jordan, called Peræa. For the ninth Gelaſa, which Joſephus takes to be Geraſa: and Geraſa is found in Cœloſyria by Joſephus, Hegeſippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomy (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and laſt, Pliny nameth Canatha, and ſo doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegeſippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Baſan over Jordan, ſo called, becauſe thoſe two Hills on which it is ſeated, have the ſhape of a Camell. But the collection of theſe ten Cities, whereof this Region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which make them to be theſe; Cæſarea Philippi, and Aſor, before remembred, Cedes, Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethſaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethſan. For all other Authors diſagree herein, and give no reaſon for their opinion. One place of the Evangeliſt S. Matthew makes it manifeſt, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract between Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed again from the coaſts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the middeſt of the coaſts of Decapolis: ſo that it was bounded by Damaſcus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, between Zidon and Ptolomais on the Weſt: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethſan on the South: and by the Mountains Tracones, otherwiſe Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the Eaſt: which is from Eaſt to Weſt the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neer the ſame diſtance, which may be each way forty Engliſh miles.

* Pliny hath Hippion Dion, for which Volaterran readeſ Hippidon. Ortelius takes them for two Cities.

‖. V.
Of Hamath.

BUt to look back again towards Libanus, there is ſeated neer the foot thereof the City of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they ſay) the Country adjoyning taketh name: the ſame which Joſephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathenſis: [a] Jacobus Zeigler, Itureæa. Ituræa Regio tenet borealia tribus Nepthali, per montem Libanum uſque Trachones. The Country of Iturea, ſaith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis Iturea, he miſtakes the ſeat of this Region: and ſo doth Mercator. For indeed were Iturea (which Hegeſippus calls Peræa, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the ſame with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it ſelf is far more to the Eaſt than Hammath in Nephtalim: for Traconitis lieth between Cæſarea Philippi, and the Mountains Trachones: which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hammath or Chammath is ſeated under Cæſarea, towards the Sea Weſt-ward. And it ſeemeth that this miſtaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Cœloſyria, beyond the Mountains Trachones, which [b] Hierom upon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the leſſer in Phœnicia, and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our Tranſlation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is ſet far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembred in Numbers 34. ver. 8. and Numbers 13. 22. and in Ezek. 47. 16. In the firſt of which places it bordereth the Land of promiſe, theſe being the words: From Mount Hor you ſhall point (that is, direct or draw a line) untill it come to Hamath: In

* The Septuagint write it Ammath, Hierome, Emath, Joſephus, Amath: Joſ. 19. 35. Chammath, cap. 21. verſ. 32. Chammath-Dor, in the firſt of Chron. cap. 6. ver. 76. Chammon, 2 Kings 14. 8. Chammath-Iehuda, as Junius readeſ it, whereas alſo for further diſtinction there is added [in Iſrael] to note, that it was of old belonging to Juda, though ſeated in Iſrael, that is, in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes: the other Chamath, being in Syria Soba.

[a] Zeigler in Nephtal.

[b] So Hierome in his Comment on Amos 6. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it ſeems for diſtinction from the other in Nephthalim, though Mar. Beroaldus, rejecting Hierome, rather follows the opinion of Zeigler above mentioned, as indeed it cannot eaſily be juſtified that either one or other of theſe is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the ſame City which in Joſ 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthalim, was alſo called Chamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath, were framed) may be gathered, partly becauſe the other Hemath, 2 Chron. 8. 3 for diſtinction is called Chamath Tſoba, as this (as it may ſeem by Joſ. 21. 32.) was Chamath-Dor, and Chamath Jude, as we have noted, 2 *Reg.*24. Secondly, because Numbers 34.8. and also *Ezek.*47.10. Chamath in the North side of the Holy Land is placed too neer the West-corner, to be that Chamath Isoba: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Moses to name never a place East-ward along all the breadth of the Holy Land, untill we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hor, *Num.*34.7.) and beyond Hermon East-ward in this North side, they make him to name divers Towns, first Chamath, then Tsedad, then Zipheron, and lastly, Charsar-henan, a thing most unlikely: seeing Israel had little or nothing East-ward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needs expound Hor to be one of the Hills neer Sidon, and so those Towns, as they are named, to lie in order on the North side of Asher, Nephthalim, and Manasses: and in like manner those in Ezekiel, first, Chedad, then Chemath, and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tsedad, Chauran, Charsar-henan. c Of which *Jos.*19.35. d Which Rehob, or Recob, in *Jos.*19.28. is placed in Asher towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthalim.

the second place thus: So they went up, and searched out the Land from the Wilderness of Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath: Then in Ezekiel; The West part also shall be the great Sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath: that is, the coast of the Sea shall be the West border from the Southermost part of the Holy Land, til you come directly over against Hamath Northward: from whence if a line be drawn to the Sea, it will touch the walls of Zidon: which is the c Northwest corner of the Holy Land. Now that this Hamath, or Hammath, which Moses also made the confine of the Holy Land, is that of Nephthalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of d Rehob adjoyning, prove it: the other Hamath, or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the fore-named Mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Ituræa, witnesse e Stella and Laiestan; and not that in Nephtalim, where f Jonathas Maccabæus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

e Tilemanus, Stella and Peter Laiestan in their Tables of the Holy Land.

For though Traconitis be comprehended within Ituræa (and therefore it is said to be finitima Galilææ Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the Mountains Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the Plains of the Territory of Ituræa; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch, or President, both of Ituræa and Trachonitis: both which are over Jordan towards the East. But Chemath in Nephtalim, is on the West side of Jordan towards the Mediterran Sea.

f *Jos.ant.*13.8.

The Country Ituræa was so called of Jethur, one of the sons of Ismael; it is placed in the bounds of Cœlosyria, and Arabia * the Desart.

* That it doth properly belong to Arabia, the name of Jethur Ismaels son, whose issue settled in the Arabian, may in part give witnesse. Also the place of the 1 *Chron.*5. 19. confirms it, where Jethur is named among the Hagareni, against whom the Reubenites and Gadites made war, and whose country they possest in the time of Jeroboam, as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conquest of the Amalekites, 1 *Chron.*5.10. where the country is placed at the East of Gilead.

The people Ituræi were valiant and war-like men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Virgil:

Ituræos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Ituræans bowes were made.

This City Chamath, or Hamath in Nephtalim, seems to have been as ancient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amathæus the eleventh son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tohu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hammath in Nephtalim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subjugation Tohu rejoyced, because Hadadeser, whom the Damascens came to help, was his enemy. This Tohu fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brasse.

But it seemeth that David in such great successe would not have had peace with Tohu, if he had been King of any place in Nephtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tsoba: which City Solomon after his Fathers death made himself Master of, as a part of the lands (a in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after divers mutations and changes, both of name and fortune, being, as it hath been said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While S. Hierome lived, it remained a City well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and divers other Towns.

was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Jerico: and delivered Nabuchodonosor: who to be avenged of Zedekia's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the Princes his children to be slain in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that ever he should behold in this world, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in Iron chains, he was led a slave to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Of which seldom exampled calamity, though not in expresse words, Jeremy the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God; I will bring him to Babel, to the land of the Chaldæans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

Hierem.52.11. &c. Ezek.21.52.

There are, besides these before remembred, many other strong Cities in Nephthalim, as that which is called (a) Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in (b) Issachar, another in Juda, of which *Jos.*15.23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is known by the addition of (c) Nephtalim, as *Jud.*4. It is seated on a high hill, whence *Jos.*20.7. Kedesh in Galilea in monte Nephtali: Josephus calls it Cedesis, and in Saint Hieromes time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

After the King thereof, among other of the Canaanites, perished by the hand of Josua, it was made a City of refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barac born; who overthrew the Army of the second Jabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was somtime possest by Teglatphalasser, when he wasted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seat, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

() See in Benjamin, and in Ephraim.
* Other cities there were of this name, (which is as much as domus solis) as that in Juda, 2 *Kin.*14. 15. where Joash king of the ten Tribes overcame Amasia of Juda, of which also I understand the place, *Jer.*21.15. & 1 *Sa.*6.14. & 2 *Chro.*29.18. A third, as it seems, was in Dan. 1 *Kin.*4.9. which *Jos.*19.41. is written Hirshemes, which is as much as *Civitas solis. Jud.*1.31. Also it appears by comparing of the places *Jos.*21.32. and 1 *Chr.*6.76. Adrichomius both here and elsewhere, deceived by the double name, makes two of one: although I deny not but that there was another Kiriathajim in Reuben, of which *Jos.*13.9.

From Cedes some four Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeers the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those regions, both In-land and Maritimate, neer it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated Northward neer Sephet, this is to be noted, that there are () divers places of this name in Palæstine, all scituate on hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelsum; Ramath with the Hebrews is high.) Also that from this Rama, *Jos.*19.36. they read Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers Towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they reade Arema. From Sephet towards the West, they place * Bethsemes, of which *Jos.*19.38. which defended it self against Nephtalim, *Jud.*1.33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet, towards the East, was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

Adjoyning to which standeth Carthan, (d) or Kiriathajim, a City of the Levites, not far from the Mountain out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi, a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place, or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the (e) Evangelists.

Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, (h) one neer Chamath in the North border, of which *Ezek.*47.6. another (upon a weak conjecture out of *Joseph. ant. l.*5. *c.*2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neer the waters of Merom; because the Kings that joyned with Jabin against Josua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, *Jos.*11.5. are by Josephus said to have incamped at the City Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedesa superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neer Abela (of which Abela, or Abel-beth Mahacah, we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 *Sam.*20.14. where some reade Abel & Bethmahacah, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Eerim, that is, with all the Beræi: for Sheba being of Benjamin (in which Tribe also there is a City called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the men of that City after him.

Adjoyning to these are Magdalel, a place of strength, (f) and Mesaloth, of which we reade, that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the (g) Macchabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berotha's of Nephtalim. For

To the North of Berotha of Nephtalim standeth Sebarim under Libanus, remembred by *Ezek.*47. and Aroseth gentium, neer the waters of Merom, or Samochonitis, the City of Sisara, Lievtenant of the Army of the second Jabin: from whence not far off towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong City: besides many others, whereof I finde no particular story of importance: as Ser in Josua, *c.*19.*v.*35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Assedim and Ser. Then Adama, which they call Edama: also Hion, which they call Abion, of which in the Books of Kings. Then the strong City of Cinnereth, after called Gennezareth, whence we reade of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberius. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which * 1 *Mac.*9.2. also divers others, named *Jos.*19. as Ucuca, or Chukkok Horem and Azanothtabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Josua, Jerzon, Lakkum Jepnael, Heleb, and (k) Raccath; which two last they place neer Cæsarea Philippi: To these they adde out of Josua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Junius readeth Fossa Adamæi, making it no Town, but a Ditch cast by some of Adameth, as it seems; or at least the custodie of which March or Limit belonging to the Town. To these out of *Num.*34.10. they adde Sephana, which 1 *Sam.*30.21. seems to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of *Ezek.*47.16. and the later out of Josua 19.33. it may appear by Junius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediana, and for the later Quercetum. The City of (l) Nephthalim, which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naasson neer unto it, they fetch out of the Vulgar Translation, *Tob.*7.7. but in the Greek Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the sons of Jacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai, 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged unable persons: all which dying in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to bear arms: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the River Chison Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore; of which *Joseph. Ant.*13.*c.*19. Debbaset, of * which *Jos.*19.11. Jekonam, or Jokneham (whose King was (a) slain by Josua, and the City was given to the Levites:) and Gaba, after called the City of Horsemen, of a Regiment there garrison'd by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, (b) burnt to the ground by Cestius, Lievtenant of the Roman Army. Adrichomius makes it the birth-City of (c) Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which *Jos.*19.15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser (d) Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted water into wine: the native City of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it self against Zabulon. Then Jersabe, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far from hence standeth Shimron of Meron, whose King was slain by Josua.

Then Damna, or Dimna, a City of the Levites: then Noa, or rather Neha, of which *Jos.*19.13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joseph found his brethren feeding their flocks: the same wherein Elizæus, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blinde.

Beyond it, towards the East, they imagine (e) Amthar, or Amathar: then Remmon of the Levites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, scituate on the Galilæan Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native City of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous than the Capharnaims, and others, e The Hebrew Hammethhar, (for which the Vulgar hath Amthar, *Jos.*19.13. Vatablus expounds, quæ gyrat; Junius joins it with the word going before it, & reads Rimmenemo Methoarum, *Mat.*8.11. *Mark.*3.6. Luke 4.10.

ther, received the same Curse of threatened miseries, as, Woe be unto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated City of Jotapata, fortified by Josephus in the Roman War: but in the end, after a long siege, surprised by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Josephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Genezzareth within Zabulon, was that of Tyberias, from whence afterward the Galilæan Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cæsar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew from the Toll or Custom-house, to be an Apostle; and neer unto it raised the daughter of Jairus from death: it was built (as Josephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, in the most fruitfull part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quum juxta nostras leges (saith he) ad septem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our law he should be seven daies held as unclean, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some have thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.

* The names of the chief Cities seated about this sea, or lake, thorow which Jordan runneth, were Cæsarea, Tyberias, Bethsaida, Gadara, Tarichea, and they adde Cinnereth, which in foretimes gave name to the Lake and Country. Matth. 9. Luke 5. Jose. Ant. 18. 3. Joseph. 10. 15. Adrich. in Zab.

Neer unto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-west, is Bethulia, seated on a very high hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Judith, such as it is. Neer which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adjoyning unto it Capharath, fortified by Josephus against the Romans: and Japha, an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury slew 15000 of the Citizens; and carried away above two thousand prisoners. Jose. in vit. sua. Joseph. 2. Bel. 25.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Josephus in his own life, then Jasie, according to Adrichomius (of which Jos. 19. 12.) for he thinks that it is not that Japha of which we spake but now out of Josephus. Jideala, of which Jos. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Jadela: under it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seat) and the City Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembred Judith 7. 3. otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazeret is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth-city of Zebedæus, Alphæus, James and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Josephus: Sephorum according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome was called Diocæsarea, the city of Joachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Josephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he saith, Urbium Galilææarum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere he wan it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the Regall seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperiall, saith Josephus; and it is now but a Castle, called Zaphet. Jos. 21. 35. otherwise Kisloth Thabor, as Junius thinks upon Jos. 19. 12. whence 1 Chro. 6. 77. it is called Tzaber. Joseph. de Maccab. 2. c. 4. & 20. Joseph. ant. 18. 3. & in vita sua.

To the South-west of this Sephoris, or Diocæsarea, was that blessed place of Nazareth, the city of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which he himself was conceived: it standeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this city he abode chiefly four and twenty yeers, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many yeers. It was erected into an Archbishoprick in the following age. Neer unto it are the cities Euria (afterward well defended against the Turks) and Nahalal, of which Jos. 19. 15. and Judg. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalol: and Jos. 21. 35. where it is a city of the Levites; neer the Sea, adjoyning to the River of Chison is Sarid, noted in Josua for the uttermost of Zabulon.

In this Territory of Zabulon there are divers small Mountains: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and John: unto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Empresse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

In the chief River of Zabulon is Chison, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one stream stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chison where it riseth, and so far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorseus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorseus by Cæsaria Palestinæ. There is a second Torrent or Brook that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountains of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neer Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dothan, from the name of the city, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so joyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephthael, which Josua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

See Lassans Map in Ortelius. *Jos.*19.14.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISSACHAR.

THe next adjoyning Territory to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Issachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land, 64300.

Tarichea in Sutton.

The first city of this Tribe neer the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somwhat more; a city werein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) tooke arms against Josephus the Historian, then Governour of both Galilees. This city was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jews carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian, who entred it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saving that his fury being quenched with the Rivers of bloud running through every street, he reserved the remainder for slaves and bond-men.

*Jos.*21.28. Kishion, which 1 *Chr.*6.72. is called Kedesh. Josua 15, 1 *Sam.*4.1. 1 Sam 3.19. 1 Kings 20.26. In the later two places Junius makes Aphec in Asser, according to *Jos.*19.30. in the first he placeth it in Juda, out of *Jos.*15.53. 1 Kings 20.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cession, or Cishion, of the Levites, and then Issachar, remembred in the first of Kings, *c.*4.*v.*17. then Abes, or Ebets, *Jos.*19.20. and Remeth, of which *Jos.*19.21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 *Chron.*6.37. or Jarmuth, *Jos.*21.29. this also was a city of the Levites, from whose Territory the Mountains of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran sea, and towards the West as far as the City of Jezreel, between which and Ramoth, are the cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, neer which Saul slew himself: under those, Aphec, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Issachar: between which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thirsty of bloud, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incountered Achab, and were overthrown and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness, boast himself as he that putteth it off: meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the yeer following, in the fields, as they say, adjoining to this city, was the same vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, slain: before which overthrow the servants and counsellors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountains: and therefore if they fought with them in the Plains, they should overcome them.

1 Kings 20.23.

Judith 1.8. & 7.3. 1 *Chron.*6.73. *Jos.*21.29.

Under Aphec, towards the Sea, they set the city of Esdrelon, in the Plains of Galilee; called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggeddo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be seen, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the cities of Casaloth, of which, 1 *Mac.*9.2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim, of the Levites, and Secsima, or Shabatsima, the West border of Issachar, of which *Jos.*19.22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle, invironed with the Sea, sometime the storehouse and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earl of Saint Giles, or Tolouse.

From the Castle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost farthermoſt ſhore beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chiſon, where Elijah aſſembled all the Prophets and Prieſts of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people aſſembled, to make triall whether the God of Iſrael, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worſhipped, by laying a ſacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Prieſts of Baal prayed, and cut their own fleſh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in deriſion told them that their God was either in purſuit of his enemies, not at leiſure, or perchance aſleep, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the fire kindled, notwithſtanding that he had cauſed the people to caſt many veſſels of water thereon: by which miracle the people incenſed, ſlew all thoſe Idolaters on the banks of Chiſon adjoyning.

At the foot of this Mountain to the North, ſtandeth Caiphas, built, as they ſay, by Caiphas the high Prieſt. It is alſo known by the name of Porſina, and Porphyria, ſometime a Suffragane Biſhops ſeat. Returning again from the Sea-coaſt towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chiſon, there are found the city of Hapharaim, or Aphraim, and the Caſtles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chiſon: a beautifull city while it ſtood, in the Gates whereof Chriſt raiſed from death the widows onely ſon. Luke 7.

Then Sion or Shion, named Joſ. 19. between the two Hills of Hermon, in Iſachar: beyond it ſtandeth Endor, famous by reaſon of the Inchantreſſe that undertook to raiſe up the body of Samuel at the inſtigation of Saul.

Beyond it ſtands Anaharath and Rabbith, named Joſ. 19. v. 19, 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Joſ. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This city (which ſtretcheth it ſelf over Chiſon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela ſituate, neer the Caves of thoſe two Theeves which ſo greatly moleſted Galilee in Herods time. It joyneth on one ſide to the Mountain of Iſachar, or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Jeſrael: which Valley continueth it ſelf from Bethſan, or Scythopolis, the Eaſt border of Iſachar, even to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are incloſed by the Mountains of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon and the River Chiſon on the North. In theſe * Plains Gideon overthrew the Madianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought againſt the Philiſtims, Achab againſt the Syrians, and the Tartars againſt the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALF OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

‖. I.

Of the bounds of this half Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therſa, and others.

THe next Tribe which joyneth it ſelf to Iſachar towards the South, is the half of Manaſſe, on the Weſt ſide of Jordan. Manaſſes was the firſt begotten of Joſeph, the eleventh ſon of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Prieſt and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manaſſes, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongſt the ſons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manaſſe there were increaſed in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being conſumed in the Deſarts, there entred of their iſſues, 52700. bearing arms. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manaſſe, was bounded by Jordan on the Eaſt, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt, Jeſrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The firſt and principall City which ſtood in this Territory was Bethſan, ſometime Nyſa, ſaith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurſe there buried, of the ſame name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Aſia the leſſe, and pierc't into the South, to the uttermoſt of Cœloſyria, they built this City a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians, given by the Greeks. Plin. l. 5. c. 18.

Theſe barbarous Northren people conſtrained the Jews to fight againſt their own Nation

Nation and kinred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jews which served them, and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Cœlosyria: and Strabo joynes it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitenæ, saith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Jesrael neer Jordan: after that Jordan strengtheneth it self again into a River, leaving the Sea, or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding Montanus describes it far to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, neer Endor, contrary to Stella, Laicstan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This City was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Judg.1. Jos.17. de Bell. Iud. Over the walls of this Beth-san the Philistims hung the body of Saul, and his sons slain at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocesse, numbred by Tyrius, in his 14. Book and 12. Chapter: but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travailers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that City, goodly pillers and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witnesse the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate Village.

Hierom. in Epist. ad Evagr. & in Loc Hebr. From Beth-san keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient City called Salem, which City the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, do not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a town of that name, neer Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen 13.18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transivitq; in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read venit incolumis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John 3.13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Ænon neer Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam 9.4. This word Junius maketh to be the plurall of Shuhal: of which we read, 1 Sam. 13.17. for as for that which is added out of Canticles 6.12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem neer Ænon, it hath no probability.

This City Bezek by the place, *Jud.*1.3. seemeth to have been in Juda. Jos.ant.6.c.5. 1 *Sam.c.*11. Not far from thence where they place Salem, they finde Bezech the City of Adonibezec, Josephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jabesh Gilead, against Naash the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Neer Bezech is the City of Bethbera, or rather Beth-bara, of which *Judg.*7,24. in the story of Gideon: and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled down and defaced; and neer it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turk to this day: and not far hence,

*Jos.l.*13.*c.*21. eat. between the Village of Asophon and Jordan, Ptolomeus Lathurus overthrew Alexander King of the Jews, and slaughtered, as Josephus numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolomie past by the Villages of the Jews, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jews might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were grown to be man-eaters and strike them with the greater terror.

* This Aner Junius upon 1 *Chron.*6.70. makes to be the same with Tabanac, of which *Jos.*21. 25. Hieronie names it from Aner the Confederate of Abraham. Gen. 14.13. Josua 12.17. 1 *King:*14 Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, *Judg.*7.22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Helisæus the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 *Reg.*4.12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon, to whose charge also Tabanac belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Josua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites.

In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Jordan than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Josua slew: which the Kings of Israel used for their Regall seate, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sons death.

The second was Thebes neer Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt, and Greece, Greece, of great fame: in the aſſault of the Tower of this Town, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Baſtard Abimelec was wounded by a weighty ſtone, thrown by a woman over the wall, who deſpairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to ſlay him outright, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he periſhed by the ſtroke of a woman. But others ſet this Citie in Ephraim neer Sichem, or Neapolis. Judg. 9. 3, 54.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoyning is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies, or governments in Judæa) for which Hierome, 1 Macc. 5. reades Arabathena: but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Iſidore calls it Agrabat. This City had one of the largeſt Territories of all Palæſtine belonging to the Governour thereof. Joſephus remembreth it often, as in his ſecond book of the Jews wars, c. 11. 25, 28. and elſewhere. Hier. Mac. 1. c. 5.

The difference between a Tetrarchy and a Toparchy, was, that the firſt was taken for a Province, and the other for a City with ſome leſſer Territory adjoyning; and a Tetrarch is the ſame with Præſes in Latine, and Preſident in Engliſh, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom; and thereof ſo called. Pliny nameth ſeventeen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and ſo hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemſter, Ulſter, Connath, and Munſter. Plin. l. 5. Euſeb. in Chro.

To the South-weſt of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Joſ. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that theſe two are but one; and that Jibleham, Joſ. 16. 11. is another name of the ſame City.

Then is Jezael a Regall City, ſet at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboe, towards the South-weſt: herein Jezabel, by a falſe accuſation, cauſed Naboth to be ſtoned, to the end ſhe might poſſeſſe his Vineyard adjoyning to the City, which Naboth refuſed to ſell, becauſe it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram alſo was caſt unburied into the ſame field: for which his mother Jezabel murthered Naboth. 2 Kings 9.

Toward the Sea from Jezael is the City which they call Gaber: in whoſe aſcent as Ahaziah King of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had ſlain Joram, he was wounded with the ſhot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Maggeddo adjoyning. The Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Gur. 2 Kings 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, neer unto which the good King Joſias was ſlain by Necho King of Egypt, in a war unadviſedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Aſſyria againſt the King thereof, by the commandment of God; whom Joſias thought to reſiſt in his paſſage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whoſe King was ſlain among the reſt by Joſua: yet they defended their City for a long time againſt Manaſſe. The River which paſſeth by the Town, may perhaps be the ſame which Ptolomy calleth Chorſeus: and not that of which we have ſpoken in Zabulon. For becauſe this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of thoſe that have deſcribed the Holy Land, delineate no ſuch River. Moore onely ſets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which paſſeth by Maggeddo, he underſtandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicſtan and Schrot make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac by the waters of Maggeddo. But theſe Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent ſo called. Judg. 5. Joſ. 12. 17.

But ſeeing that ancient Coſmographers ſtretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, even to Sehaſte, or Samaria; and Strabo far beyond it on the Sea-coaſt: And Joſephus calls Cæſaria Palæſtinæ, a City of Phœnicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Geza: ſeeing alſo Ptolomy ſets down Chorſeus for the partition of Phœnicia and Judæa, this river running Eaſt and Weſt parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the ſame which Ptolomy in his fourth Table of Aſia, calleth Chorſeus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Maggeddo Subimbre at this day. Strab. l. 16. Joſeph. l. 15. c. 13. Niger.

‖. II.

Of Cæſaria Palæſtinæ, and ſome other Towns.

FRom Maggeddo toward the Weſt, and neer the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious City of Cæſaria Palæſtinæ: firſt, the Tower of Straton: the ſame which Pliny calls Apollonia:

Apollonia: though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish't marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: he forced a Harborow of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay: and the winde blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fetcht from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Josephus own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum in commoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magnæ classi recipiendæ sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis verò octodecim, altitudine novem-pedali: fuerunt quædam etiam majora, minora alia; To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compast in a Bay wherein a great Fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fadome deep: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thick: and some bigger, some lesser. To this he added an arm or cawsie of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: the rest he strengthened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the son-in-law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intituled the City it self, Cæsaria of Palæstine: all which he performed in twelve yeers time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, commanding twenty others under it, saith Tyrius.

Joseph. l.15. c.13.

Lib.4.c.12.hel. sacr.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Galasius to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptised by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two yeers prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade, Jos. 1.2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Josua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reades in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 *Reg.*4.11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josua call it Nephith-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as *Jos.*12.23. *Judg.*1.27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull City, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities, or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon *Macchab.*15.11. placeth this between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Chersens: for so some name the river Chorsens, of which we have spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200. talents for the ransom of Jonathan Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Dioceese of Cæsaria.

*Mac.*1.13,15.

Gul. Tyr. de bell. sacr. l.10. c.6.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they finde in these parts neer the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slain by Josua.

*Mac.*17.31.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees, it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Judas Macchabæus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lievtenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judæa by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was Saint Paul carried prisoner from

Hierusalem,

Hierusalem, conducted by 470. souldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the Army of Godfrey of Bulion attempted it in vain: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Assur, saith Erochard. Neer unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three dayes preserved in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territorie taketh name: which Cestius the Romane wasted with fire and sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Neer unto it is the Mountain of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them; after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BEcause these five Tribes, of Asser, Nephtalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasse, possest the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest have perished, it is not strange; seeing so many Volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquest of Heathen Princes have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Cassotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus, that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterran Sea, as far as the River of Chorseus; which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Mageddo. Pliny extends it farther, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budæus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budæus) quæ nunc Palæstina Syriæ dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palæstina of Syria. Ptol. 4. tab. Asia. Plin. l. 5. c. 19.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrie of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judæa, and Palestina, even unto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœlosyria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldom deceived in his own art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestinæ: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eastern world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea. Strab. l. 16. Buda. de Ass. l. 4

The ancient Regall Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Josua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandall wars. But in processe of time the City of Tyre adjoyning, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled. Esay 23.

But after the death of Moses, and while Josua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus,

F. 17. Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possest the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and findes Cadmus his successour, whom he calleth his grandchilde: and it seemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successours of Dido held that name alwayes in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroque poposcit,
Implevitque mero pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl
(Weighty with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were father or grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the son of Neptune by Lybia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the son of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith Saint Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenors successour living at once with Josua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his son. But in stead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of Letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his own Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Josua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Desarts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistims, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoyning unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the Story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josua, and a- Chap. 19. 29. gainst the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josua called the strong Citie Accho, afterward Ptolomais, Achzib, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those dayes.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it self 13. yeers against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor: and that Alexander the Great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed unresistable) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Beroſus out of Joſephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the ſon of Japhet. And for the Region it ſelf, though Caliſthenes derive it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phonos, of ſlaughter, becauſe the Phœnicians ſlew all that came on their coaſts; yet for my ſelf, I take it that Phœnix the ſon of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his ſon in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the diſpute unneceſſary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the firſt light of all thoſe Arts, Sciences, and civill Policies, which they afterward profeſt, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himſelf was inſtructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and ſuperiour Egyptians: from whom thoſe which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they ſay, borrowed their Divinitie and Philoſophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civilitie. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his ſons were Africans; whence Lucan,

Manſuram rudibus vocem ſignare figuris.

Phœnicians firſt (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the ſon of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that anſwer made by Zeno; when he in a kinde of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phœnician:

Si patria eſt Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus & ipſe — Athen. 1. Dipnoſ.
Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was ſo: to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Joſephus the Hiſtorian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians again ſubſcribe to none of theſe reports: but affirm conſtantly, that the great Zamolxis flouriſhed among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, ſome of the French do not bluſh to mainiain, that the ancient Gaules taught the Greeks the uſe of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as thoſe Gaules, and that they ſent their ſons hither to be by them inſtructed in all kinde of learning? Joſeph. contra Appionem.

Laſtly, whereas others beſtow this invention on Moſes, the ſame hath no probability at all; for he lived at ſuch time as Learning and Arts flouriſhed moſt, both in Egypt and Aſſyria, and he himſelf was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that letters were invented by thoſe excellent Spirits of the firſt age, and before the generall Flood: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom elſe God knows; from whom all wiſdom and underſtanding hath proceeded. And as the ſame infinite God is preſent with all his Creatures, ſo hath he given the ſame invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was firſt diſcovered, there was found written Books after the manner of thoſe Hieroglyphicks, anciently uſed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and ſo had thoſe Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutchions, like unto thoſe uſed by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations, Jura naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Naturall laws are common, and generall. Jurisc.

§. 11.
Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUt whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Mnaseas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Josua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what king succeeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phasis governed Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings. Ch ap.27.3.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes Fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subjected by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie propheſied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D.Siculus in his 14. Book.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependancy upon Darius, and that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeers and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himself by the instigation of his subjects (who foresaw their utter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. Lib.4.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers, and singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautifull and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were neer him with an Army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians; he determining to kill himself, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand, and slew him: which done, she also therewith pierced her own body, and died. Athen.l.12. c.13. Hieron.l.1. com. Jovin.

After Alexander was possest of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdome to Hephæstion to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen, no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this honour might be conferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented unto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Justine, Abdolomius, and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his own hands working in his garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: though otherwise a wise man, and exceeding just.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subjected to the Emperours of the East, there remaineth no farther memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Josephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesius, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the son of Sirach mentioneth in his fourtie and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians. Cap. 46.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83. Præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, somtimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Masons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hierusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Solomon: whom he not onely furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great sums of money, but also he joyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. and 3. in Theophilus his third book, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greeks: and in Zonaras, Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, he despised the 20. Towns which Solomon offered him: he defended himself against that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astaroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53. yeers. 2 Sam. 5. &c. 2 Sam. c. 5. 2 Kin. 1. 9, 10. 1 Chron. 14. 2 Chron. 2. 8, 9.

Baleastartus, whom Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeers, according to Josephus. 1 King. 11. Theoph. 17. yeers.

Abdastartus the eldest son of Baleastartus, governed 9. yeers, and lived but 20. yeers, according to Josephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. yeers, and lived 54. who being slain by the four sons of his own Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdom 12. yeers.

Astartus brother to Abdastartus, recovered the Kingdom from this Usurper, and reigned 12. yeers. Joseph 54. Theoph. 58.

Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother, followed Astartus, and ruled 9. yeers, and lived in all 54.

Phelles the fourth son of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned 8. moneths, and lived 50. yeers. Theoph.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astarimus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddesse Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeers; the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezebel, Achab married. Joseph 32. Theoph. 12.

Badezor, or Bazor, the son of Ithobalus, or Ethbaal, brother to Jezebel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeers, and lived in all 45. 1 Kings 16. 31. Joseph. 6. yeers. Theoph. 26.

Mettinus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. yeers (saith Josephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Elisa and Anna. Joseph. 9. Theoph. 29.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettinus his Father 40. yeers, and lived 56. In the seventh yeer of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeers and 8. moneths after the Temple of Solomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeers after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sichens his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleeve Justine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be dispoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barcæ in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon. Justin. l. 11. Virgil. l. 1.

Elulæus

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. yeers: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five yeers, but in vain.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre 13. yeers together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeers a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First, by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerastus, who held it among them some 7. yeers, and odd moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeer: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon, 4. yeers: after him Iromus sent thence also, 20. yeers. In the 17. of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozius his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large, intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who onely is unchangeable, and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozius, inforcing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion; to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edumæans, descended from Esau, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end (besides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hirams good affection when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjecturall arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Plinie, and others, witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Islands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elah and Esiongaber; or under the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Madian the son of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumæans, was an University, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the discourse of Bozius, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Esau brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himself was a profane man, and disavowed by God, the Scriptures in plain terms expresse. That his Posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetuall enemies to the house of Israel, save onely when David & some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant rant of Davids unfriendly behaviour amongſt them, when firſt they were ſubdued? ſurely, it was not any argument of Kinred or Alliance between Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with David; even then when Joab ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill intreated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſdome of Eliphaz the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans puniſhed, for being ſuch as David in his own dayes found them. Although indeed the city of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the ſame name, lying Eaſt from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoyning to Hus, the country of Job: and to Suah the City of Bildad the Suhite; as both ſuch Chorographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy Text maketh manifeſt. For Job is ſaid to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wiſdome, all the people of the Eaſt; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Paleſtina. True it is, that Eliphaz the ſon of Eſau had a ſon called Teman: but that fathers were wont in thoſe dayes to take name of their ſons, I no where finde. And Iſmael alſo had a ſon called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the Eaſt had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the Eaſt are called Iſmaelites. And he that well conſiders how great and ſtrong a Nation Amalec was, which durſt give battell to the Hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleeve that ſuch a people were deſcended from one of Eſau his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberleſſe muſt the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been ſo great? ſurely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoyning could not have held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec, or aſſiſted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it ſelf, if diſtinct from the Iſmaelites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the Founder thereof being ſon to Abraham by Cethura, doubtleſſe was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seigniory of the Red Sea coaſt, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places, as Elan and Eſiongaber on the Red Sea ſhore, yet in Moſes time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moſes himſelf ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſſe all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian ſtood, Moſes muſt needs have known it: becauſe he had ſojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjecturall Arguments, how probable ſoever, are needleſſe in ſo manifeſt a caſe. For in the 83. Pſal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as diſtinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sydonians being one people, as all good Authours ſhew, and Bozius himſelf confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15. & 19. appointed by God to have been deſtroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Aſſer, Joſ. 29. becauſe they were Idolaters, and of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, not Couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame Religion. For though Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed be God that hath ſent King David a wiſe ſon: we cannot infer that he was of Davids Religion. The Turk hath ſaid as much of Chriſtian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sydonians then worſhipped Aſtaroth; and drew Solomon alſo to the ſame Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great proviſion of Corn and Oyle, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly conſider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-peſtered, being otherwiſe apt to yeeld ſilks: as the Andarine ſilks which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corn and Oyle, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well ſpare to Solomon. Alſo Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiſer; who having got the Gold firſt, gave to Hiram the worſt Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary policy which inforced Tyrus to hold league with Iſrael. For David had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thorow which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carry their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyrus: ſo that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to paſſe, could have cut off their Trade.

Eu-

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistims, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvell) that Solomon rather meant, as a man of peace, to imploy his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozius frames negatively upon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours; which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdome excelleth the Vulgar, even of civill people. Neither did the morall wisdome of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Onely they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kinde of devout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, Impios politicos, as if it were impiety to think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozius would better have agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battells did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, save onely that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeal of Bozius, who writing against those whom he falsly terms impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own brains any strange Chimera's of Divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitie it is, that such mad dogs are oftentimes incouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAving now past over Phœnicia, we come to the next Territory adjoyning, which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second son of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts, (Josua excepted) there entered the Holy Land of their children grown to be able men, 32500. who sate down on the West side of Jordan, between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West. Psal. 59. 78. 108. Par. 25.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottome, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cæsar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard observeth, the ruines which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewen and carved stone in great aboundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sons of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cæsar called it Sebaste. Herein were the prophets Heliseus and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Neer Samaria towards the South, is the hill of Bethel, and a town of that name: on the top of which mountain, Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restauration called Neapolis, now Peloſa, and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec evened with the soyl. Jeroboam raised it up again: and the Damascens a third time cast it down. Sichar. Jub. 4. 5. Maberthan. Joseph. 11. ant. 1.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirhathon, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon Judge of Israel. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neer to this City Judas Macchabæus overthrew Seron and Lysias, Lievtenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified. Judg. 12. 15. 2 Kin. 13.

Between Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Jos. 10. and Saron, whose King was slain by Josua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cæsarea Palæstinæ, extendeth it self alongst the coast as far as Joppe, saith Adrichome: though indeed the name Sarona is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitfull plain Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, between Cæsarea and Joppe, but that also between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Assaron: understanding thereby a Plaine neeer Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diospolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judæa, the fift in dignitie (or the third after Pliny) where S. Peter (non sua, sed Christi virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Joppe, Sarona. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Ravens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers Jos. 12. 18. Acts 6. Luk. 23. Niger. com. 4. Asia fol. 503. 14 sturbers of Common-weales, usurpers of other Princes Kingdoms; who with no other respect led than to amplifie their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murthering one another, became a prey to the most salvage and barbarous Nations.

In Diospolis (saith Wil. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Justinian the Emperour caused a fair Church to be built over his Tombe; these be Tyrius his words: Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Joppe, per latè patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertransiuntes, Liddam quæ est Diospolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii usque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, ejus Ecclesiam quum ad honorem ejusdem Martyris, pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta ædificari præceperat, &c. They having left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Towns, Antipatris and Joppe, passing over the great open Plain of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romans, High and mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestnesse and present devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius: by whose testimony, we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slain there in an uprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stande occasioned the uprore of the people against him: as fearing least he would give attempt to overthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had bin gathered up, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honorable order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius above cited, witnesseth to have bin buried at Lidda or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitriac. S. Hierome affirms, that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Of this Saint George see more above in this 2. Book. Chap. 7. sect. 3. §. 5.

Neer to Lidda or Diospolis standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the native City of Joseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda neer Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adjoyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hils of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

See in the Tribe of Benjamin. c. 12. sect. 1.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Josephus in his Antiquities, and in the wars of the Jews. Also Balsalisa (for which Junius, 2 Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Shalisæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Junius upon 1. Sam. 6. where we reade of the Land of Shalisha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other side of the Mountains of Ephraim standeth Gosna, one of the Toparchies, or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies, or Præsidencies of Judæa, which they call Thamnitica, a goodly Citie and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the Hill called Gaas; which City and Territory Israel gave unto their Leader Josua; who also amplified it with buildings, neer which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and over it the Sun engraven, in memory of that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Josua's time.

Judg. 2. 9. It is called Thimnath Chares. Jos. 9. 50.

In the places adjoyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Judas Maccabæus with three thousand Jews overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lievtenant of Syria; neer to Gaser, or Gezer, which Josua took, and hung their King; a City of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slain, and the City razed; Solomon rebuilt it.

Mac. 1. 7. 40.

To

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Jeſleti, of which Joſ. 16. 3. otherwiſe Pelethi, whence David had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, under the charge of Benaia. Then that high and famous Mountain and City of Silo, whereon the Ark of God was kept ſo many yeers, till the Philiſtims got it.

To this they joyn the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Jonathan Macchabæus inhabited, a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It ſtandeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hieruſalem: and is now called Eyra.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul propheſied; and neer it Ephron, one of thoſe Cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboam; after the great overthrow given him.

Then Kimbtſaim, of the Levites, of which Joſ. 21. 22. which Junius thinks to be the ſame with Jokmeham, of which 1 Chro. 6. 28. As for Abſaloms Baalaſor, which they find hereabout, Junius reades it in the Plain of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Juda; as Joſ. 15. we reade of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one neer Kedeſh, ver. 23. and the other the ſame as Chetzron, ver. 25.

In this Tribe alſo they finde the City of Mello; whoſe Citizens, they ſay, joyned with the Sichemites in making the Baſtard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Solomon raiſed a Tribute upon the people. But it ſeems that Mello, or Millo is a common name of a ſtrong Fort or Cittadell: and ſo Junius, for domus Millo, reades incolæ munitionis, and for Solomo ædificabit Millo, he reades ædificabat munitionem, and ſo the Septuagint reade τὴν ὀχυρὰν in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hieruſalem.

The other Cities of mark in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſua; and Janoach, or Janoah, ſpoiled by Teglatphalaſſar; Pekah then governing Iſrael, with divers others, but of no great fame. The Mountains of Ephraim ſometime ſignifie the greateſt part of the land of the ſons of Joſeph, on the Weſt of Jordan: ſeverall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron, or Samaria, 1 Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahaſ, Judg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tſalmon, or Salmon, Judg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Iſuph, or Iſophim, Judg. 9. 5. where Rama-Iſophim ſtood, which was the City of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines upon the ſides of the Mountains, was the occaſion on that Jacob in the ſpirit of prophecy, Geneſ. 49. 22. compared Joſeph's two branches, Ephraim and Manaſſe, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well ſide, and ſpreading her (a) Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory alſo Ezek. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whoſe head was Ephraim) proſecutes: as alſo in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Jacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lion. Upon the top of one of the higheſt of theſe Hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the Plains on both ſides of Jordan, they finde the Caſtle called Dok: which they make to be the ſame with Dagon, of which Joſeph. 1. bell. Jud. 2. in which Caſtle, as it is 1 Macc. 16. Ptolomy moſt traiterouſly at a banquet, ſlew Simon Macchabæus his father-in-law.

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembred in the ſecond of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Junius reade, Hiddai ex una vallium Gahaſi: yet the Vulgar and Vatablus reade Giddai, of the river of Gaas. Alſo in this Tribe they place the River of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was (b) fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travelled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poor widow of Zarepta, whoſe dead ſon he revived, and increaſed her pittance of Meal and Oil: whereby ſhe ſuſtained her life.

a It ſeemeth that Jacob in this propheſie the rather uſeth the word Daughters for branches, thereby the more plainly to ſignifie Colonies: which in the Hebrew phraſe are called Daughters of the Metropolis: as in Joſua, and elſewhere often. b 1 Reg. 17. 6. & chap. 17.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the firſt Kings of Iſrael I omit in this place to ſpeak, and reſerve it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diviſion from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to ſpeak. The firſt of theſe Kings Jeroboam the ſon of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, who being a man of ſtrength and courage, was by Solomon made overſeer of the buildings of the Munition in Hieruſalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time, as he went from Hierusalem, he encountred the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God destinied to be King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumæan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab; which Adad the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; using both him and Jeroboam

1 Kings 14. as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Judæa, that himself might the easilier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth yeer of Rehoboam, Shishak sack't the City of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Adadezer of Soba, with the presents of Toha, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Jeroboam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule should repair to Hierusalem to do their usuall Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of Ambrose upon the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calf in Horeb:) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Judæan Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored: but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened, upon occasion that the Prophet returning, was slain by a Lion; Abijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

1 Kin. 11. 12. &c. He was afterward overthrown by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty yeers; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeer of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted out by Baasha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two yeers.

Baasha the son of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Asa King of Juda: he seated himself in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nepthalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama: but being an Idolater, he was 1 Kin. 15. & 16. threatned by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled four and twenty yeers, and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his son, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slain by Zambris, after he had reigned two yeers: and in him the propheste of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seven dayes; but Ambris in 1 King. 16. revenge of the Kings murther, set upon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and inforc't him to burn himself.

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater
1 King. 16. no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subjected to Tabremmon, King of Syria, the father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the son of Tabremmon was invited by 1 King. 15. Asa King of Juda, to assail Baasha King of Israel, the father of Ela, who fore-went Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve yeers, six in Thersa, and six in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab, or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezabel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam roboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the triall of the sacrifice, and killeth the false prophets; and afterward flieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which, the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michæas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joyning with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Michæas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas: besides seventy other sons by sundry wives and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall: and sent for counsell to Beelzebub the god of Acharon. Elias the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and misliking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, if there were not a God in Israel & Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each 50. souldiers, to bring Elias unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captain besought mercy at Elias's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to passe in the second yeer of his reigne.

Beelzebub was the same with Belus & Pluto, saith Viginere upon Levi. 2 Kings 1.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Desarts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrown: their King flieth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatning, unlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yeeld unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatning, had burnt the King of Edoms son upon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle inraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up. 2 Kings 3.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he doth send to heal a man of his Leprosie & adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians, of Simon Magus. 2 Kings 5.

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consulted in his secretest counsell, sent a troop of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha struck blinde, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and Armour to sound in the aire, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the Kingdome of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramoth-Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed King by one of the children of the Prophets 2 Kings 7. sent by Elisha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which war he was slain, saith Cedrenus; whereof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28. yeers.

Pag. 86.

Joachaz, or Jehoachaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot: and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17. yeers.

2 Kings 13.

After Joachaz, Joas his son governed Israel, who when he repaired to Elisha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisha covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window Westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had so many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the son of Azael, which his father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the war, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Joas reigned sixteen yeers, and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisha exchanged this life for a better.

2 Kings 14.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Joas his father, an Idolater, as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neer Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeers.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the house of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassall, who reigned in his stead, governed six moneths. Shallum held the Kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every man of wealth in Israel. Menahem governed twenty yeers.

2 King. 16. 19.

Pekahiah, or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phacesia succeeded, and after he had ruled two yeers, he was slain by Phaca, or Pekah the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekah's time, Phulassar, or Tiglat-Phylassar invaded the Kingdom of Israel, and won Jion, Abel-Bethmaacah, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captives into Assyria: he was drawn in by Achaz King of Judæa, against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith ingaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inviting of the great Assyrian, was the utter ruine of both States, of Israel, and of Judæa. Pekah reigned 20. yeers.

2 King. 15. 29.

Then Hoshea, or Osea, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoak, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt: which being known to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Ninive in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them: and re-planted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthæ (inhabiting about Cutha, a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Ava, which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neer unto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Havæi, willing to return to their ancient seats.

To

To theſe he added thoſe of Chamath, or Ituræa, the ancient enemies of the Iſraelites, and ſometime the Vaſſals of the Adads of Damaſcus, which ſo often afflicted them. And thus did this Aſſyrian adviſe himſelf better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Veſpaſian had waſted the Cities of Judæa and Hieruſalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few ſimple labourers, beſides their own thin Garriſons, which ſoon decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians & Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this tranſmigration, plantation, and diſplantation, happened in the yeer of the world, 3292. the ſixth yeer of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hoſea the laſt King of Iſrael.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manaſſe.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOw following the coaſt of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land aſſigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I ſpake laſt: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the reſt in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land of their ſons 66400. bearing arms. The firſt famous City in this Ver. 46. Tribe on the Sea-coaſt was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Joſua: one of the moſt ancient of the World, and the moſt famous of others on that coaſt, becauſe it was the Port of Hieruſalem. From hence Jonas imbarked himſelf when he fled from the ſervice of God towards Tharſis in Cilicia.—In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabæus governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garriſon'd in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200. principall Citizens aboord them, and caſt them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which ſought to eſcape to the ſword. Mac. 2. 12.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Ceſtius the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeer of Chriſt, 1250. Lodowick the French King gave it new Wals and Towers: It is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently.

Lib. 3. 1. 15. de bel. Jud. Solin. c. 47. Plin. l. 5. cap. 9.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Machabæus burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seen at Hierusalem, 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seat, saith Will. of Tyre; but there is no signe of it at this time, that such a place there was.

2 Mac. 12. de bell. sacr.

After Jamnia is the City of Geth, or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volatteran. And so Montanus seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volatteran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomy sets Anthedon far to the South of Joppe: and Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteen miles from Joppe: where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anakims, strong and Giant-like men, whom Josua could not expell, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Israelites, till Davids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferiour in strength and stature unto Goliath.

F. 244.

Hieron. in Mich. am.

Roboam the son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the son of Amazia destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the Holy war calls Ibilin, I much doubt: the errour growing by taking Geth for Anthedon.

Lib. 21. c. 18.

Not far from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemes, or the house of the Sun. In the fields adjoyning to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoak of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to look therein, there were slain of the Elders seventy, and of the people fifty thousand, by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great * Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in (a) Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Issachar. Hierome findes a fifth in Benjamin.

1 Sam. 6. 18.

* Or rather not the City it self, but the great stone in the field, upon which stone the Philistims set the Ark, the change being eaſie from Eben, or Aben, which signifieth a stone, to Abel which signifieth mourning.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it self, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Cæsaria Palestinæ. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it self against the Danites and Idumæans. It worshipped Beel-zebub, the god of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Ahaziah King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Eliah meeting by the way, caused them to return with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

a See in Neh. 6. 7. sell. 4. ll. 6.

Christianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekron. This Azotus or Asdod, was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Josua (b) failed to destroy, though he once possest their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the (c) Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it self, after the Ark of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neer it was that famous (d) Judas Macchabæus slain by Bacchides and Alcimus the Lievtenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neer which also he overthrew Apollonius.

2 Kings 1. but was besieged by Psammetichus, the father of Pharao Necho for 29. yeers together, whence Jer. 25. 20. speaks of the residue of Asdod, to wit, the greatest part having perished in this siege.

Gabinius the Romane rebuilt it. It had a Bishops seat while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hieroms time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

c 1 Sam. 5. 4. d 1 Macc. 9. 1 Mac. 10.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Tsorah, or Sarxa, and Esthaol, and between them Castra Danis neer Hebron: though this place where Sampson was born, may seem by the words, Judg. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Jos. 19. 41. Jud. 13. 25. &c. cap. 18. 2.

Judah,

Judah, as the other also were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Daniter, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lievtenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jews, and neer which himself was by the Macchabees overthrown. 1 Mac. 15. 16.

Then Modin the Native City of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heighth, as they served for a mark to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeers after their first setting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witnesse.

There are besides these the City of Cariathiarim, that is, the City of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained twenty yeers in the house of Aminadab: till such time as David carried it thence to Hierusalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the son of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was slain between the Temple & the Altar: also Urias, whom Joachim King of Hierusalem slaughtered, as we finde in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather, as I take it, upon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caspin taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabæus: and Lechis, whose King was slain by Iosua, in which also Amaziah was slain: The same which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda. Alias Cariathbaal & Baal, or Baalpharesim. 1 Sam. 7. 1. & 2 Sam. 6. 2. 2 Chro. 24. 22. Mat. 23. 33. Jer. 26. 20. 2 Mac. 12. 13. Jos. 12. 11. 2 Reg. 14. 19.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Iosua c. 19. from the ver. 41. where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lesbem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrach: but of this City see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Norther-most riseth out of the Mountains of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek, or Sored, whose banks are plentifull of Vines which have no seeds or stones: the wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and savour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loved. Hieron. in Esai. & Michæam. 1. Broch Breid. Jud. 16. 4.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Desarts, there entred the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing arms, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa, of which the first City adjoyning to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Ascalonitæ: of which Volatteran out of Xanthus, in the History of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own name: The same hath Nicolaus in his History, saith Volatteran.

Diodorus Siculus in his third Book remembreth a Lake neer Ascalon, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Dereeto, the Goddesse of the Syrians; having the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæstino sancta Columba Syro.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palæstine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men

* And therefore no marvel that divers places named Jos. 15. in the large portion of Judæ, be reckoned in this Tribe: see Jos. 19. ver. 1. and 9. where thus much is expressly noted. Volat. Geog. l. 11. f. 244.

Vol. ut supra. men (saith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Sosus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the story of Bithynia.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod born, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two yeers old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made War in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instauravit, saith Adrichomius.

Adrith. in Trib. Simeon.

2 Sam. 1. In Davids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinius restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza, the Syrians, Azan, of Azonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other profane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say, as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despight whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desart.

Joseph. 13. ant. 19 Alexander Janneus King of the Jews, surprised it, and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set up in the same place again, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews till it was forst by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself, and in his absence left John his Son and Successour to be Governour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly City, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the River of Besor, standeth Majoma the Port of Gaza: to which the priviledge of a City was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Constance, after the name of the Emperours Son. But Julian the Apostata soon after favouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolura: and Josephus Rhinocorura: (a) Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lot, between the three Sons of Noah.

Joseph. 13. ant. 19. 21. 14. &c. * Junius calls it Vallis Egypti, the name of the stream seems to be Sichor. See in Asser. c. 7. sect. 3. l. 8. in the margent.

Within the Land and upon the River of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh and Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neer to the Wilderness of Beersheba, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvell that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, so sometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdom from the Philistim Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; S. Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. 14. 14.

a Epiph. tom. 2. in vesal. Manich. & in Anchorat. Gen. 10. 19.

1 Sam. 30. More within the Land was Siceleg, or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Josep. 10. 11. 12. Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the City of Letters, the University, as they say, or Academie of old Palæstine. In Saint Hierom's time, it seems, it had the name of

Daama:

Daema: *Jos.*15.49. it is called Urbs Sannæ: from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbahi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Calebs promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Josua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprise, it appears *Jos.*10. 39. This City *Jos.*21.15. is named among those which out of Simeon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this Tribe. *Jos.*11.21.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of lesse fame, as Hajin, of which *Jos.*19.7. which also *Jos.*21.16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon, (for which Junius thinks Hasham is named 1 *Chron.*6.59. though * in the place of Josua these two are distinguished) also Tholad, so named 1 *Chron.*4.29. for which *Jos.*19.4. we have Eltholad. Chatzar-Susa, so named, *Jos.*19.5. for which *Jos.*15. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa Equitatus. * And also 1 *Chron.*4.32.

In the same places of Josua, and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the same with that of which *Num.*14.45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountains of Edumæa. For Israel fled not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Desart. *Deut.*1.

The same places also name Beersheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelec: neer unto which Hagar wandered with her son Ismael. It was also called the City of Isaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Josua, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they help us nothing in story, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being strengthened in their own Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4.39. (the same place which *Jos.*15.36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the Issue of Cham: where they seated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places. Gen.21.31. * As it seems in the Land of Juda. See in the first Paragraph of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan.

The mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefest: unto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are, Besor, and the Torrent of Egypt, called Shichar, as is noted in Asser. *Jud.*16.3.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda, the fourth son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sons there entred the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territory given, called afterward Judæa: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kinde of Soveraignty over them: as Succoth, Cartathiarim, Lachis, Bethsemes, Tsiglag, Beersheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the witnesse of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbred the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judæa from Idumæa: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and took from them some spoyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Israelites, the sons of Keni, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territory: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek. *Num.*21.3. *Jos.*12.14. *Jud.*1.16.

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in *Num.*34.4. *Deut.*8.15.

that that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Acrabathena, was denominated: of which we have spoken in Manasses. On the South side also of Judæa they place the Cities of Jaeur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Asbna, Jethnam, and Asor, or Chatsor, most of them Frontier Towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Juda, of which the Desart and Forrest adjoyning took name: where David hid himself from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Karkah, and Ascemona, or Hasmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa towards the North, we finde the Cities of Dama, Shemah, Amam, the other Asor, or Chatsor, Behaloth, and the two Sochoes: of all which see Jos. 15. also Carioth, by Jos. 15.25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called Is-carioth, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham, the abode of Sampson, which Roboam re-edified. Beyond these, towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the City of Jethar, or Jathir, belonging to the Levites. In Saint Hierom's time it was called Jethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neer unto this City was that remarkable battell fought between Asa King of Juda and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the victory as far as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Jud. 15.8. 1 Chro. 11.6. Jun. out of the 1 Chro. 4.31. notes that this Hetham, though it were within the bounds of Juda, belonged to Simeon. Jos. 15.48. Hieron. in loc. Hebr.

Not far from Jether standeth Jarmuth, whose King was slain by Josua, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Maresa the native City of the Prophet Michæa: between it and Odolla, Judas Macchabæus overthrew Gorgias, and sent thence ten thousand Dragmas of silver to be offered for sacrifice.

2 Macc. 12.35.

Odolla, or Hadullam it self, was an ancient and magnificent City, taken by Josua; and the King thereof slain. Jonathan Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila, or Keila, afterward Ethela, where David sometime hid himself; and which afterward he delivered from the assaults of the Philistims: neer which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained, and was seen by S. Hierome.

Gen. 38.1. Jos. 12.15. 1 Sam. 23.1.

Neer it is Hebron; sometime called the City of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Coriatharbe: the reason of this name they give, as if it signified the City of four: because the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plain by the places Jos. 14.14. and 15.13. and 20.11. that Arbah here doth not signifie four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whose son as it seems Anak was: and Achiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, (whom Caleb expelled, Jos. 15.) were the sons of Anak, Num. 13.23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquem, a chain worn for ornament; and it seems that this Anak, inriched by the spoils which himself and his father got, wore a chain of gold, and so got this name: and leaving the custom to his posterity, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seven yeers before Tsoan, or Tanis, in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given, to wit, the Villages adjoyning, and the rest to the Levites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not far hence they finde Eleutheropolis, or the free City, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon, whose King Dabir associated with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hierusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Josua utterly overthrown. From hence the next City of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government or Præsidencies of Judæa. In sight of this City, Judas Macchabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Gorgias, Lievtenant to Antiochus.

Jos. 10.11. Macc. 1.3. Euseb. in Chron. Jerom. Itin. 6. * Also 1 Chro. 4.39. as is above remembred in the Tribe of Simeon.

In the yeer 1301. it was overturned by an earth-quake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seat of the Dioceese of Cæsarea of Palestine.

From Emaus toward the West Sea, there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which, and of Gederoth, * Jos. 15.36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Josua followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a City of great strength in the Valley of (a) Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17.2. whence (as it seems) they seat it neer unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites.

a Junius, for in Valle Terebinthi, hath in Valle querceti. Vatablus keeps the Hebrew, reading in Valle Elah.

Levites. It revolted from the subjection of the Jews, while Joram the son of Josaphat ruled in Hierusalem: And next unto this standeth Macheda, which Josua utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emaus towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethsor: one of the strongest and most sought for places in all Juda. It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rock, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Judas Maccabæus. Lysias forc't it: and Antiochus Eupator by famine, Jonathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings. Jos.13.ant.9. Macc.1.6.

10 Bethleem is the next unto it within six miles of Hierusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata; which name, they say, it had of Calebs wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, *Gen.*38.16. Of this City was Abessan, or Ibzan, Judge of Israel after Jephtah, famous for the thirty sons and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Juda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter-in-law of Naomi returned to Bethleem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom David. It had also the honour to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ; and therefore shall the memory thereof never end. *Gen.*53.48. Ruth. 1.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same name: aud therefore was this Hieron. in com. super. Mat. c.2. Matth.2.1.

20 of our Saviour called Bethleem Juda.

From Bethleem some four or five mile standeth Thecua, the City of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adjoyning is the City of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethsura and Hierusalem: on whose Hils adjoyning, the glorious guilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Jews. The City of * Bezek was also neer unto Bethleem, which Adoni-Bezec commanded; who had during his reign tortur'd 70. Kings, by cutting off the joynts of their Fingers and Toes; and made them gather bread under his Table: but at length the same end befell himself by the sons of Juda, after they had taken him prisoner. Amos 1.1. 1 Macc.6.32. Jos.ant.12. c.14. 1 Macc.6.36. * See in Manasse.c.7.fol.7. col. 1. Jud.1.6,7.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe 30 by, untill we come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoyning to the Desart of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Clivus floridus, where, in the time of Jehosaphat, the Jews stood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to joyn against Juda: neer which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange a deliverance. Jos.14. ant 22. 2 Chro.20.16. & 26.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tsohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called, because Lot in his prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tsohar, which signifieth 40 a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is *Gen.*14.2. In the Romans time it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hirom's time, Balexona. Then Engaddi, or Hen-gaddi, first Asasonthamar: neer unto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the best that the world had called Opobalsamum: the most part of all which Trees Cleopatra Queen of Egypt sent for out of Judæa, and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her Husband, caused them to be rooted up, and presented unto her: which she re-planted neer Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Chedorlaomer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judæa; and one of the Presidencies thereof. 2 Chron.11. * Some call it Bal-salisa and Vitula consecrata. See in Gad.c.10.fe.5. post principium in Haroleth. Gen.19.20. Hieron. in Ose. Hebr. Constantinum. 2 Chro.20.2. Gen.14.7.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Jesrael: not that 50 which was the City of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the City of Achinoan, the wife of David, the mother of that Amnon whom Absalom slew: also, as some think, the City of Amasa, Absaloms Lievtenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this seemeth to be an errour grounded upon the neerness of the words, Israel and Jesrael: and because the 2 *Sam.*17.25. Amasa's father is called an Israelite, who in the first of the *Chron.*2.17. is called an Ismaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth that Amasa's father is not said to be of the City Jesrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Ismachite. 1 Reg.21. 2 Sam.17.25.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountains; as those of Engaddi upon the the Dead Sea: and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neer Taphna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oak of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which Saint Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, That it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Collis Achillæ, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Jonathan Macchabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with twenty seven high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and Furniture for an hundred thousand men; being, as it seemeth, a place unaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

Hieron. in loc. Heb. & quæst. Hebr. Jos. 14. Ant. c. 20.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnaturall sins.

§. IV.
THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

‖. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites won from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sons inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing arms. But before we speak of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abrahams kinred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Esau, or Edom, the Idumæans: by Ismael, the eldest son of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Ketura, his last wife, the Midianitæ. And again, by Lot, Abrahams brothers son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possest by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoyning.

Esau and his sons held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as far as the River of Tygris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sate down on the North-east side of Arnon, and possest the Tract from Rabba, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border between the River of Jaboc and Damascus, was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emims, a Nation of Giants weakned and broken by Chedorlahomer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory and ancient possession of the Zamzummims, or Zuzæi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Jos. 13.

Num. 21. 24.

G. n. 14.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon over Arnon; and this hapned not long before Moses arrivall upon that border, when Vaheb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the son of Vaheb, but his name was Balac, the son of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Esebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Jephtah the Judge of Israel justly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claim of the Ammonites: because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon: who (saith Jephtah) had 300. yeers time to recover them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claim them now. Judg. 11.

And lest any should marvell why the Ammonites in Jephtahs time should make claim to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehons was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the sons of Moab and Ammon, Madian, Amalec, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief, in Jephtah's time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soveraignty: and again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the Mountains of Galaad, or Gilehad, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought how to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in Numb. 21. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon within the Mountains, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possest, as in the 13. Chapter of Josua, Ver. 25. it appears.

Jf. 13. 25. Junius notes that the one half of the land of Hemon, which in this place of Josue is said to have been given to the Gadites, was taken first from the Ammonites by Sehon: but the place, Deut. 2. 11. proves that aswel Og, as Sehon had gotten lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

‖. 11.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THe chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jethson. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two Verses, 36. and 37. in Jos. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint reade Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slipt into Jethson. Jos. 21. 37.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Desart adjoyning: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Josua, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betser & villa ejus, reads Bosor in solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Misor, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, neer the Dead Sea (for the Countrie between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of note, Lasa or Leshash, of which Genesis 10. ver. 19. The Greeks call it Callirhoe: neer which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soon after their rising, being joyned in one stream, doe make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was desperate of all other help, repaired, but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Macharus, in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenyes, and in Peru, called the Baths of the Ingas, or Kings. The other Town is Macharus, the next between Lasa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain every way unaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinius in the war with Aristobulus, saith Josephus. It was thither (saith Josephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: his Army soon after being utterly overthrown by Aretas King of Arabia, and himself after this murther never prospering. Not far from Machærus was Bosor, or Bozra, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and neer it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

Deut. 2. 26. It was a marginall note out of Deut. 3. where the Sept. kept the word Misor, signifying a plain; which after crept into the Text.

To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel imbraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cosbi with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their sin; and from hence Josua sent the discoverers to view Jericho, staying here untill he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Junius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses called, The plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desart of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East it had Chatseroth, and Dizahab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in Palestina: the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medava, and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Junius edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deut. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

Deut. 34. 1.

* The same as it seems which Num. 21. 30. is called Medeba, whence we reade of the plains of Medeba, Jos. 13. 9. 16. of which also we reade in the wars of David against Hanan the Ammonite, 1 Chron. 19. 7. Also, 1 Macc. 9. 36. Isa. 16. 2. See before chap. 5. sect. 7.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cœlosyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cœlosyria stood: which was in the Region of Decapolis; and, as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be over against or neer unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suphah: which doubtless was about these plains of Moab towards the Dead Sea: where the Country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as also the Red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab, where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say was Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the story of Gideon is called Beth-bara. Josephus sayes it was where after the City Abila stood, neer Jordan, in a place set with Palm-trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the plains of Moab, Num. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim, and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Num. 15. 1. Exod. 25. 10.

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma, and Hesbon the chief City of Sehon, and Elhalel, and Kiriathaima the seat of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which, Junius, Esa. 46. 1. reades Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, Moses before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius doth not take Phasgah, or Pisgah for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgah that top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, What name they used for Nebo it doth not appear: but Baal-meon it seems they named sometime Bajith, as Esay 15. 2. and sometime Beth-meon, Ejey 48. 23.

mentioned

mentioned Jos. 13. 20. called Asdoth-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisgæ: to wit, where the waters did run down from Pisga. In the same place of Josua there is also named Beth-Peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idoll was called Baal-Peor; which, they say, was the same as Priapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-Baal, of which also Jos. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which, Num. 22. 41. they reade, the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

ll. III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THere were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the City of Phalti: to whom Saul gave his daughter Michol from David: but Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. 19. we may say that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well, called Beer: Then Deblathaim, which the Prophet Hieremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab. 1 Sam. 25. ult. Hieron. 48.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chief City of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slain: and their Regall City with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince or Priest, forgat not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painfull travels through the Desarts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes, or petra. It was also called Jocthеel, as appears by the place, 2 Kings 14. It was built (saith Josephus) by Recem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites: slain as before is said: after whom it was called Recem. Now, they say, it is called Crac, and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City: the same perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Province adjoyning took name: which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabajoth, the son of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petræa (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petræa: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, calls Hagarens, of Hagar. 1 Sam. 15. 7. Lib. 4. cap. 7. 1 Chron. 5. 19. & 20.

This City Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Romane Army, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, and to quit it. Yet Amasias King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) wan also this City. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be naturall of this City. In the mean time, when the Christians held the Kingdom of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the river of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38. station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Save: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Wil. Tyr. 20. 3. Num. 21. Deut. 2. 13. Num. 32. 3. Jos. 13. 27. Esay 15. 1.

under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Saveh, which is the Kings Dale, where Absolom set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchizedec King of Salem also encountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neer Bethsan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

‖. IV.
Of the Dead Sea.

NOw because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the Salt sea (in distinction from the sea of Tyberias, which was fresh water) also the sea of the Wilderness, or rather the sea * of the Plains, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a half of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which make 18. of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal lesse: but those that have of late yeers seen this sea, did account it (saith [a] Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut suitas aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superjecta ut solido feruntur, periti, imperitique nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers: it is neither moved nor raised by the winde, nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskilfull of swiming, as well as the skilfull, are born up by this water. At one time of the yeer it casteth up Bitumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like businesses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: The fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitfull, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning; of which the ruines remain, the ground looking with a sad face, as having lost her fruitfulnesse; for whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripenesse, having nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples or Oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltitis. Vespasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not onely unskilfull in swiming, but had their hands also bound behinde them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

* So Junius reades for the Hebrew, Haraloth every where, and so also the edition of Vatablus, Deut.3.17. though Deut. 4.44. it hath mare solitudinis, as also 2 *Reg.*14.25. the reason of this name seems to be, because it joyns to the plains of Moab, which are called Harboth Moab, Deut.34.1. as also we have Ceseloth in Herbah, that is in the plains, to wit, of Zebulon, 1 Mac. 9.2. whence Adrichomius imagines a city in Zabulon, called Araba. a Descr. terr. Sanct.

‖. V.
Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben possest.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben possest (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21. of *Num.v.*14. nameth Vaheb, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the son of Zippor: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaams cursings or inchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God, blest Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to send Madianitish women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen: but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsell, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

*Num.*21.22, 23,24. *Jos.*24.

After

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saving that we finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Joash, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens govenments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hæc prius fuere, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their posterity choose rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there. Ver. 22.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the help of Ammon and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them 18. yeers: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made war, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, & relieved him; knowing that Saul sought his life. Judg. 3. 1 Sam. 22. 1 Sam. 14.

After this, David himself entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shooe: meaning, that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Idumæans. 2 Sam. 8. 1 Chro. 18. Psal. 60. 10.

The next King after Davids time of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mesha: who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fastened himself to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab, 100000. Lambs, and 200000. Rams with the wooll: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda & Idumæa: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is else-where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Jehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious victorie over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many descents: for Mesha lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedechia's time, fourteen Kings of Juda coming between, who wasted three hundred and odde yeers. 2 King. 3. 2 Chro. 20. Hieron. 7.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THe Territory adjoyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the seventh son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desarts, 45550. and of their sons there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearing arms: from the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Hesbon, Elhele, and Aphec. Gen. 30. Num. 1. 32. Jos. 13.

The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Haroheo, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine; Where the city in the river is distinguished from the city upon the bank of the river, as also in like manner (Jos. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Haroher, which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neer Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possest by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haroher, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numbers, ch. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. ver. 25. where Haroher is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Esay 15. Deut. 2.

Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seat not Haroher neer it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here, we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Haroher. And as for * Har (which also gave the name to the coast adjoyning) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Haroher by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jephta, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites, under the conduct of Jephta. In S. Hieroms time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say, was therefore called Vitula conversans, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was thrice overthrown with earth-quakes: for which cause also Hierome seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-Salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2. and Salissa, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Erochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-East border. Between Haroher and Jordan they seat Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Numbers 32.34. though Josua 13. verse 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neer Arnon in Saint Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophesieth, That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrah in this Tribe, Adricomius placeth Jogbeha, and Nobach, or Nobe: of both which we reade in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears, Numbers 32.35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: onely that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith he) went and took Kenath with her Towns, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Verses precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this seat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 34, 35, 36. therefore it may seem that this * Nobach was in that part of Manasse which was in the East of Jordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak (a) in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebah and Zalmunnah rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2 Reg. 3.25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain, that it was still a principall City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Shophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Coronæ.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Bethnimra, of which we have spoken, Jos. 13.27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Josua it is called Beth-haram) some take to be Betaramptha, (of which (b) Josephus) after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in (c) Josephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idoll of those Countries, we reade, Acts 7.43. and to which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1 Macchab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Josephus, sometime Betaramptha) the same Josephus placeth in the Region of Peræa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peræa, as the Greek word signifieth, is Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Of a noble woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged. Josephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she eat her own childe, with other tragicall accidents hereupon ensuing. Joseph. de Bell. Jud. l. 7. c. 8.

Of Succoth (which we said Jos. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is neer unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebah and Zalmunnah, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-Car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod under the Tribulum, and after which sort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattell, Moses, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty yeers in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted. Judg. 8. 5. 2 Sam. 12. 31. Exod. 12. 37. Levit. 23. 43.

Other four Cities of Gad are named Jos. 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaim, Chesbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jahzer, as Chesbon, or Hesbon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Country is called the Land of Jahzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Esay touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Esay, also Hieremy in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammonites) by Judas Macchabæus: as it is 1 Macc. 5. 8. where Junius out of Josephus, reades Jahzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Jos. 16. 3. & 8. and Jud. 1. 29.) was far from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, untill Solomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter. Num. 21. 32. 1 Chron. 27. 31. Esay 16. 8. Hieron. 48. 32.

Of Chesbon it may be marvelled that in the place of Josua, and 1 Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, seeing Jos. 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principall City of the Reubenites: Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Mac. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Macchabæus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seems that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaim, which word signifieth a double Army, we reade Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoast or company, to joyn with his for his defence: as also Lu. 2. 13. we reade of a multitude of the Hoast of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so unto the godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soon after to joyn battell with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the Field where the Battell was fought, in the North-parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Machanaim, David abode during the rebellion of Absalom: and the same, for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Ishbosheth, during the war between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, we reade often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which, King Achab lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mitspa, of which Jos. 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-see and be witnesse to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31.49. That in these parts there was not onely a Town, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appears Jos. 11.3. where we reade of the Chivites under Hermon, in the Country of Mitspa, * the Town of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth ver. following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephta the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mitspa, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mitspa rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Maccabæus this Town of Mitspa (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and the Males of it slain: for it was then possest of the Ammonites.

* Of other towns of this name, see in the Tribe of Benjamin.

Jud. 11.36.

1 Mac. 5.35.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc, was that Peniel, or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishnesse of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they adde Rogelim, the City of that great and faithfull subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Nahanaima, where he sustained King David, during Absaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Town of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ὁ Ἀλίμας, 1 Mac. 5.26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Junius out of Josephus reads Mallæ, for this in Alimis: and understanding Mallæ to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio, (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) he takes this Mallæ to be Mitspa Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. 22.3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5.10. (which Junius takes to be (b) Rithma, of which Num. 33.18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vinearum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther of. For of the two last we reade in Jephta's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was neerer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, as Deut. 3.11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolomie finds in Cœlosyria. Hierome and Calistus, in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but, as it seems, never possest by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length it became the Regall seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Assyrians, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, con-

b The letters D. & R. in the Hebrew are very like, so that one is oft mistaken for another, and sometime without mistaking one is put for another, as for Rodanim. 1 Chr. 7 we have Dodanim, Gen. 10.4.

* Other names of this City, according to Stephanus, were Ammana and Astarte: but in this later perhaps he mistook, which might seem to be the same Astareth, one of the chief Cities of Og, of which in that which remaineth to be spoken of, Manasse Adrichomius sayes, it was also called Urbs aquarum, because of the river tend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeers since that these Zamzummims, or Raphaims, were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kinred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captains of Persia and Assyria (remembred in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became sloathfull and licentious; they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdome and vertue of their Commanders.

Jaboc's winding about it; but in the place 2 Sam. 27. whence he gathers this opinion, Junius reads intercepi ab urbe aquum, if we must read with others. cepi ad urbem aquarum, yet it cannot be taken of Rabba it self, but of some other Fort adjoyning, Gen. 14.

In this City of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth. The City was taken in Davids time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias was shot to death, having been, by direction from David, appointed to be imployed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill successe afterward, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idoll, weighing a talent, which is 60. pound weight, after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, & under him twelve others. Deut. 3. 2 Sam. 12. Wil. Tyr. Bel. sacr. 13. c. 22. Pto.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomy calleth the hills of Hippus, a City of Cœlosyria: and Strabo, Trachones*: the same which continue from neer Damascus, unto the Desarts of Moab: and receive divers names, as commonly Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: for from the South part, as far Northwards as Astaroth, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence North-ward they are known by the name of Hermon, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites, Shenir, others, Seir: of which name all those hils also were called, which part Judæa and Idumæa: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremy makes them all one, calling the high mountains of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These Mountains are very fruitfull, and full of good pastures, and have many Trees which yeeld Balsamum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jaboc: others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan. Strab. l. 6. * τραχὼν is locus asper & scabrosus: whence it appears, that Trachonitis regio, in these parts was properly the hill-country. Deut. 3. 9. Hierem. 22. Hier. 8. & 9.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wan from Og, the King of Basan.

THis Tribe of Gad possest half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the mountains Trachones, or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephta Judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again. Jud. 10.

Afterward we find that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes, 1 Sam. 11.

The

The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may seem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Josephus thinks that this Nahas was slain in the battell, when Saul raised the siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hanun succeeded Nahas: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut of the Ambassadours garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterward, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites, subject to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Istob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were overturned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crown which weiged a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kills. Josaphat governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Ozias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham inforc't to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeers.

Istob, that is, the men of Thob: Thob is a small Territory under Amon hills. Rehob is another between Hazer and Sidon, in the North bound of Canaan, *Num.*13. 22. of which see in the tribe of Asser. *Hier.*40.&41. *2 Chron.*20. *2 Chron.*36. *2 Chron.*26.

The fifth King of the Ammonites, of whose name we reade, was Baalis the confederate of Zedekia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael, of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.
Of the other half of Manasse.

30

THe rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basan, with the land of Hus and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Batania, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan; of which those three later Provinces defended themselves against them for many ages. But Batania Ptolomy setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desart: and all those other Provinces before named with Petræa, and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cœlosyria; as far South as Rabba, or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, saving the Land neer the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petræa: for many of these small Kingdoms take not much more ground than the Country of Kent.

* Another territory adjoyning to Manasse, whose limits were confounded with some of these, was that Thisbitis the country of Elias, as it is *1 Kin.*16.1. and of Tobias, *Tob.*1.2. It lay on the East to the Tribe of Nepth. on the right hand of it, as in *Tob.*1.2 and was possest by Colonies of the Israelites in the time of Saul, after his victory over the Amalekites and Ismaelites in those parts, as it is gathered out of *1 Chr.*5. 10. whence it appears, that it was part of Iturea, of which *chap.*7. *sect.*4. §.5.&6.

Basan, or, after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it self from the River of Jaboc to the (a) Machati and Gessuri: and from the mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of oaks, which bare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias; Howle, O ye oaks of Basban) and by reason hereof they bred so many swine, as (b) 2000. in one herd were carried headlong into the Sea, by the unclean spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it 60. Cities walled and defenced: all which, after Og and his sons were slain, Jair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own name, Avoth Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

The principall Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes (c) Eutis, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Son, Alexander the great, were born. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Jannæus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim, by the River of Jaboc, taken by (d) Judas Macchabæus: where he

Then the ſtrong City of (f) Ephron neer Jordan: which refuſing to yeeld paſſage to (g) Judas Maccabæus, was forced by him by aſſault, and taken and burnt with great ſlaughter.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabeſus, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being beſieged by Nahas (h) King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) elſewhere mentioned. In memory whereof theſe Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed and buried the bodies of Saul and his ſons: which hung deſpightfully over the walls of Bethſan, or Scythopolis. (l) Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, ſeated by Pliny on a Hill neer the River Hieromiace, which River Ortelius ſeems to think to be Jaboc. At the foot of the Hill there ſpring forth alſo hot baths, as at Machærus. Alexander Jannæus after ten moneths ſiege, wan it, and ſubverted it. Pompey reſtored it: and Gabinius (m) made it one of the five Courts of Juſtice in Paleſtine. Hieruſalem being the firſt, Gadara the ſecond, Emath, or Amathus the third, Hierico and Sephora in Galile, the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, ſurnamed Aſcalonita, accuſed him to Julius Cæſar of many crimes: but preceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cæſar, fearing the terrible (n) revenge of Herod, they ſlew themſelves: ſome by ſtrangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themſelves.

To the Eaſt of Gadara they place Sebei (o) in which, Joſ. ant. 5. 13. ſaith, Jephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 12. 7. Sepultus eſt in Civitate ſua Gilehad, (for in una Civitatum Gilehad) imagine Gilehad to be the name of a City, and to be the ſame with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Caſphor for Chesbon; the ſame Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilehaditarum Civitas: ſo of one City Hesbon, or Chesbon, which they call Eſſebon, the chief City of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: This Caſphor in Manaſſes, and a City in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we have admoniſhed the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (ſo called, becauſe the Hill on which it ſtood, was in faſhion like the back of a Cammell) which Joſephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis over againſt Tarichea, which is on the Weſt ſide of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, ſee this Joſephus in the fourth book of the Jewiſh war: where he deſcribes the place by nature to be almoſt invincible: and in the ſtorie of the ſiege, ſhewes how Veſpaſian with much danger of his own perſon, entring it, was at firſt repulſed, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length, after the coming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thouſand, thus periſhed: beſides four thouſand ſlain by the Romans: ſo that none eſcaped, ſave onely two women that hid themſelves.

About four miles Weſt from Gadara, and as much Eaſt from Tiberias (which is on the other ſide of the Lake) Joſephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomie gives the names to the hils that compaſs the plains in which it ſtandeth: ſo that it may ſeem to have been of no ſmall note. It is ſeated far from the hill Country: on the Eaſt of the Lake, as alſo Pliny noteth, lib. 5. cap. 15. It was reſtored by Pompey: after by Auguſtus added to Herods Tetrarchie: it was waſted by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many maſſacres of their Nation, they were inraged againſt their borderers.

The next City of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrehi, or Edrai, wherein Og King of Baſan chiefly abode, when Moſes and Iſrael invaded him: and neer unto this his Regall City, it was that he loſt the battell and his life. It ſtood in S. Hieronus time: and had the name of Adar, or Adara. Not far from theſe townes neer Jordan, in this valley, ſtood Geraſſa, or Gergeſſa, inhabited by the Gergeſites, deſcended of the fifth ſon of Canaan. Of theſe Gergeſites we read Mat. 8. 28. that Chriſt coming from the other ſide of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coaſts: where caſting the Divels out of the poſſeſſed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogges: in which ſtory, for Gergeſites, or Gergeſins, S. Luke and S. Marke have Gaderens: not as if theſe were all one (for Gergeſſa, or Geraſſa is a diſtinct Towne in theſe parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this ſtory. This City received many changes and calamities: of which Joſephus hath often mention.

tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L.Annius, Lievtenant to Vespasian: and 1000.of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the City burnt. In the yeer 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same yeer recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jerusalem: and by him utterly razed. Neer unto Gerasa is the village of Magedan, or, after the Syriack, Magedu, or, after the Greek, Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from Heaven: the same place, or some adjoyning to it, which S.Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which story it appears, that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan, according to Josephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the story, not far hence, towards the North, was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five barley loaves and two fishes.

Mark 15. Mark 8. Brocb. itin. 2. Of this Phiale see in Neph. c.7.fol. 4. ‖.3. Matth. 14. Mark 6. Luke 9. John 6.

On the North of this Bethsaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ, it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Josephus makes this Julias to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Matthew; Woe be unto thee Corazim.

Josep. 18.ant. 3. & alibi.

But the principall City of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrey adjoyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og King of Basan. In Genesis this City is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5.26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Jos. 13.21. it is called Asteroth, without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a pair of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the image of a sheep, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomy signifieth sheep. Others, from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim to have been the name of the people which inhabited this City: and expound it heroes radiantes*. For of old the Raphæi which inhabited this Gity (*Gen.*14.5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words *Deut.*3.11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words *Jos.*13.12. Og ex reliquiis Raphæorum: but if the Karnaim (or Carnajim) were these Raphæi, the word would not have been in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphæi in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphæi in Asteroth of the Raphæi, or some other way fittest for perspicuity: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

*Because horn when it is polished, shineth: hence it is that the Verb of this Noun is sometime Lucere: as it were cornuum esse: whereupon the Vulgar, *Exo.*34.19. reading cornutam carnem, or lucidam faciem, gave occasion to the fabulous Painters to paint Moses with Horns. *Judith.*1.8. 1 *Cant.*5.

Not far from Asteroth, Adricomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This City (saith he) is remembred in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this Citie understand David in his 120.Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be seen, saith Braidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greek hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme do rather prove that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adricomius. For that they speake of Scenitæ Cedareni, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were decolores, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petræa, far fram these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) fain many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historicall circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Country seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded upon him, inferre what his Countrey was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

Of Job himself, whether he was the same Jobab remembred in the 36.of Genesis, descended from Esau King also of Idumæa, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Bellarmine are of another opinon, yet Saint Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie with with Athanaſius, Hippolitus, Irenæus, Euſebius Emiſſenus, Apollinaris, Euſtachius, and other cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epiſt. to Evagrius, take him for the ſame.

The Land of Huts or Hus, wherein Job dwelt, is from the Greek Οὐς, which the Septuagint uſe for the word Huts, tranſlated by the Vulgar ſometime Hus, as Job 1.1. ſometime Auſitis, as Hierem. 25.20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palæſtine and Cœloſyria, beſides Chamatha (or Hamath) under Palmyrene, in the Countrie called by Ptolomy Trachonitis, or Bathanæa, the bounds of which Countries are confounded with Eaſan in this half Tribe of Manaſſes. And that this Land of Hus was thus ſeated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25.20. where he reckons the Huſbites among the promiſcuous borderers of the Iſraelites, whom he therefore calleth promiſcuous, or miſcellaneam turbam, becauſe their bounds were not onely joyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lam. 4. 21. ſpeaking of the ſame Prophecy, of which he ſpeaketh in the 25. Chapter, muſt needs be expounded, as Junius reades them, diſtinguiſhing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edomi, O quæ habitas in terra Hutzi; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwelleſt in the land of Hus. Now becauſe the Vulgar doth not ſo diſtinguiſh, but readeth, Filia Edom quæ habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwelleſt in the land of Hus: Hence, as it ſeems, ſome of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have ſaid, and King of Edom, which if they underſtand by it Idumæa, or Edom, ſo called in Moſes time, they are greatly miſtaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumæa. For it is very probable that Eſau, when he firſt parted from Jacob, did not ſeat himſelf in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judæa, but inhabited Scir far to the Eaſt of Jordan, and held a part of thoſe Mountains, otherwiſe called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Eſau incounter Jacob, when he returned out of Meſopotamia, who paſſed by the very border of Eſau his abiding. It is true, that at ſuch time as Moſes wandered in the Deſarts, that the poſterity of Eſau inhabited Seir to the South of Judæa: for it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did alſo drive the Edomites out of thoſe parts, who thence-forward ſeated themſelves to the South of Judæa, bordering the Deſart Paran, and ſtretched their habitations over the Deſarts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

For o and u are often changed one into the other: whence they uſed Auſitis for Ouſitis, &c. Hence alſo by Junius and others it is called Auſanitis, and ſo as it ſeems they reade it in the Septuagint. Jun. in Gen. 10.23. Deut. 3.9.

Now for this Hus, which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the ſon of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10.23. or rather Hus the ſon of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the queſtion is doubtfull. For my part I rather encline to think, that it was Hus the ſon of Nachor: partly becauſe theſe Families of Aram ſeem long before to have been loſt: and partly becauſe in Job 32.2. Elihu the fourth of Jobs friends, which ſeems to be of Jobs own Country, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the ſon of Nachor: as alſo Jer. 25. in the ſame continuation (though ſome other Nations named between) where Hus is ſpoken of, there Buz is alſo named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job 32. Elihu the Buzite is ſaid to be of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Family of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to underſtand Aram the ſon of Sem, Junius himſelf maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he ſaith, that one of Jobs friends (which muſt needs be this Elihu) was of the poſterity of Nachor (as alſo in this place he confeſſeth ſo much expreſly,) and in as much as he readeth not è familia Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syriæ; like as elſewhere Laban, who ſprung of Nachor, is called a Syrian.

Whence the Septuagint call him ex regione Auſitide.

As for the other three of Jobs friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implyed that they were of other kindreds; as alſo by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Auſitis, it is implyed that they thought onely Elihu to have been of Jobs own Countrie.

See Sixtus Senenſis.

Franciſcus Brochard the Monke, in his deſcription of the Holy Land in the journie from Acon Eaſtward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the Eaſt of the Sea of Galilee: both very neer to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may ſeem to have denominated Eildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job 2.11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Deſart, deſcended of Shuach the ſon of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 25.2. perhaps, ſaith he, the ſame whom Pliny calls Saccæi. So alſo he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was, to have been of Arabia the Desart: and Eliphaz himself to have been of the posterity of Theman the son of Eliphaz, which was the son of Esau. And so also Nahamah, whence Tsophar the third of Jobs friends (which in this place of Job 2.11. are mentioned) is by the same learned Expositor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36.40. is named among the sons of Esau, that gave denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which Jos. 15.41. is reckoned for a City of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neer the Land of Hus, in Basan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasses, there is a Region which (at least) in later times was called Suitis, or of some like name. For this is evident by the History of Will. Tyrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita, or Suites (as he calls it diversly) of exceeding great strength and use for the retaining of the whole Country: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians; having not long before been lost, to the great disadvantage of the Country, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrius described to be sixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius four miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

De bel. sacr. lib. 22. c. 15. & 21.

Other Cities of this part of Manasses named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behesthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilead, we have spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad. The other two were given to the Leviter, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we have both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Josephus. Behesthera is accounted the chief City of Basan by some, but the Writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser, or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a City placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Josua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Josephus calls it. This Lake, being as it were in the midst between Cæsarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leaving the marish ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Jos. 21.27. Deut. 4 43.

Adjoyning to this Lake in this Countrie of Manasses, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this half Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauram, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawn from the West; of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47.15. with which also agrees the place, Num. 34.8. where for Chauram between Tsedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Josephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mahacath, or Maacati, which were likewise borderers to Manasses towards the North-east) are unknown: onely that Gessur was of might, it appears in that David married Mahaca the daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautifull, but wicked and unfortunate Absalom.

The History of the Syrians, the chief borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers fortunes thereof.

Damascus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the City of joy or gladnesse, and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, saith Josephus, think it to have been built by Hus the son of Aram: of which opinion S. Hierome upon Esay seemeth to be: though though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth, that it was founded by Damascus the son of Eliezer, Abrahams Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdome of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadezer their King; but in Solomons time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no title at all or right to that Principality: but David having overthrown Hadadezer King of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba, or Zoba) Razon or Rezon, with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damascena, and possest Damascus it self, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life. In Esa.17. Gen.15.2. 1 *Kin.*11.40.

10 The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypts Wives sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the Line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents, (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians, and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the Rivers of Abanah, and Pharpar: whereof one of them, prophane Writers call Chrysorrhoas, the golden River. Junius takes it for Adonis. The Countrie adjoyning is very fruitfull of excellent Wines 20 and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Cittadell. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Esay, Jeremy, and Zacharias, propheſied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalasser, invited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome upon Esay: which thing was performed by Salmanasser, according to Junius in his note upon that place, five yeers after the Prophecy. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when Syria fell into 30 the hands of the Romanes, it was taken by Metellus, and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Hierome living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomer their King from the Romanes, in the yeer of our redemption 636. and in the yeer 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theoderick Earle of Flaunders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea-coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize. Hieron. in Jos. cap.4. Onuphrius in Chron. Vitric.46.Will. Tyr.hel.sacr.lib. 17. c.1.23.4.5.

In the yeer 1262. Halon the Tartar incompast it, and having formerly taken the 40 King, brought him under the Walls, and threatned extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the son of Halon was by his father made King thereof. Herold.hel. sacr.4.c.14.

In the yeer 1400. Tamberlain Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entred it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Castle adjoyning: he forbare the demolishing of the City, in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with fourty Gates, or sumptuous Porches. It had 50 within it 9000. Lanterns of Gold and Silver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three moneths siege, he forc't it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired mercy. But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them and it to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophee of his victory, he raised three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and re-possest by the Soldane of Egypt with a Garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeer 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Herold. l.6.c.4.

Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOw be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the son of Aram, or by Damascus the son of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till Davids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Josua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it so that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrew Adadezer Prince of Sophena, or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Pliny calleth Nubæi, inhabiting between Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-east parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely, Damascus, or Aram, Sophena, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba; of which these were the Princes in Davids and Solomons times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria Zoba, and Tohu of Chamath. But it seemeth, that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adadezer when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battell slain with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus, Adadezer and Adad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time Tohu King of Chamath, or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in dolo, saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judæans and Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturea; to which I may adde Gesur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joyning in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palæstina it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract:) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

1 Sam. 14. 47. 3082. 2 Sam. 8. 1 Kings 11.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, & left Joab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queens sister, as before; who hearing of Davids death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and, as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adadezer, the son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principality: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his fathers name, as he grew powerfull, took upon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians, saith Macrobius, which signified Oneness or Unity. I also finde a City called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and El adjoyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that David undertook the war: secondly, because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart as far as to Euphrates, according cording to Pliny: and the greatest part of Arabia Petræa, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemie to Israel all the dayes of Solomon. Besides the evill that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeers after he was carried thither. 1 Kings 11.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmum, or Tabremmum; to him Benhadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Juda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Solomon, being vexed & invaded by Baasha, the successour of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baasha sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Country of Nephtalim, and took divers Cities, and spoyls thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasha had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and converted them to his own use. 1 Kin. 15. 18.

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his son: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his son Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father took from thy father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streets or keepers of the borders for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Baasha, at the request of Asa: But this Benhadad that twice entred upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the son of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the son of Tabremmon. For between the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Baasha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeers, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeers of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baasha, and after that 49. yeers ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make war. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pomp; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the son of Tabremmon invaded Baasha and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows: the first at Samaria, by a sally of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec; where, with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 200000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crush't by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab again setteth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those Towns that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three yeers after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Josaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Naaman, to Joram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh a quarrell against Joram: and when Joram, by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heaven, he departed home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the son of Adar: Amos and Hieremy mention the Towers of Benhadad. Josephus writeth that Benhadad and his successour Azael were worshipped for gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeers are complete since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazael, or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elisha, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad hadad should recover his present sickness: He waged war with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jesreel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azael continued war against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joas he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Jehosaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated; and which he himself had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasuries of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to war upon Baasha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judæa, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azael vexed Joahaz the son of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty Horse-men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Footmen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFter Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel with ill success: for Joas King of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

2 Reg 13.
Jos. ant. c. 9.

Jos. ant. l. 7. c. 6. After this Benhadad the son of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the son of Joas, recovered Damascus it self to Juda, saith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Utque recuperabat Damascum, & Chamatham Jehudæ pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judæa; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

1 Kin. 14.28.

And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdome to his son Jeroboam the second; it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Josephus, Rases; after Zonaras, Raason the tenth Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacas King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achab brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order, are thus reckoned:

2 Kin. 16.5.5.
Esay 7.
Jos. ant. l. 9. c. 11.

1 Adadezer the son of Rehob.
2 Rezin the son of Eliadad, or Razin.
3 Hezion.
4 Tabremmon.
5 Benhadad, who invaded Baasha.
6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
7 Hazael, whom Elisha foretold with tears of his advancement; the same who overthrew Joram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the Expedition thirty yeers, and perchance more, more, after the firſt Hazael which ſtifled his maſter Benhadad, and had ſlain Joram the ſon of Achab King of Iſrael. For Joas began to reigne in the 7. yeer of Jehu King of Iſrael; and after he had reigned 23. yeers, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is ſaid that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Jeruſalem. It is alſo ſome proof that Hazael that took Geth, was not the ſame with Hazael that murthered Benhadad, becauſe he could not at that time be of good yeers, being, as it ſeemeth, the ſecond perſon in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benhadads men of war. To this Hazael (be he the firſt or ſecond) ſucceeded.

8. Benhadad the third, whom Joaſh King of Iſrael thrice overthrew.

9. Reſin, or Rezin, the laſt, who joyned with Pekah King of Iſrael, againſt Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalaſſer.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the laſt, Nicolaus Damaſcenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the reſt of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as thoſe of Emath, and Geſſur, we finde that Tohu was King of Emath, or Camath, in Davids time, to whom he ſent his ſon Joram with preſents, after Davids victory againſt Adadezer. Alſo Senacherib ſpeaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not. 2 Sam. 8. 9. Eſay 37.

§. IV.

Of Other leſſer Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Aſſyrians, never recovered themſelves again.

OF Geſſur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur: to Talmai, whoſe Daughter David married, it was that Abſalom fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephena, or Syria, Soba, or Cœloſyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rechob, the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himſelf; and it is plain, that after his death the ſeat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damaſcus, a City better fitting their greatneſſe. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of theſe Kings of Syria, (which became ſo potent, and joyned Soba, Damaſcus, Emath, and the Deſart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin the ſecond of the Adads) as it began with David, ſo it ended at once with the Kingdom of Iſrael. For Ahaz King of Juda waged the Aſſyrian Teglatphalaſſar againſt Pekah King of Iſrael, and againſt Rezin the laſt King of Damaſcus: which Teglath firſt invaded Damaſcena, and the Region of Soba, and took Damaſcus it ſelf, and did put to death Rezin the laſt, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the ſecond time that the Aſſyrians attempted Iſrael. For firſt Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem governing Iſrael) who ſtopt the enterpriſe of Phul with a thouſand talents of ſilver: for this Phul Belochus, whoſe pedigree we will examine hereafter, being ſcarce warm, as yet, in his ſeat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wreſted from Sardanapalus: having beſides this King of Syria in his way, who ſeemed to be a great and ſtrong Prince, was content to take the compoſition of a thouſand talents of the King of Iſrael for that preſent time. But his ſon Teglath following the purpoſe of his father Belochus, and finding ſo excellent an occaſion, as the war begun between Iſrael and Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being alſo wrapt in that war, and waſted in ſtrength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his impreſt and entertainment. So, firſt attempting Damaſcus, which lay in his path towards Iſrael, he carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great eaſe poſſeſt himſelf of the Cities of Nephtalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his ſon Salmanaſſer, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonaſſer, after the revolt of Hoſea, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdom aſunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus ſupplanted; the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglath ſlaughtered; the Kingdom of Iſrael in Hoſea, whom Salmanaſſer overturned; happened neer about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalaſſer, and Salmanaſſer his ſon. For Sardanapalus periſhed, Oſia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdoms were diſſolved, Achaz yet living.

Laſtly, the Kingdom of Juda it ſelf, being attempted by Senacherib, the ſon of Salmanaſſer, in vain, and preſerved for the time by God miraculouſly, was at length utterly utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeers after the captivity of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeer of Hosea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth yeer of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom 3603. Herodotus calleth Labynitus: in all about 200. yeers. After these the Persians from Cy- 3811. rus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeers.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucidæ reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turk, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in war and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Jor-
1 Chr. 8.12. dan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Benjamites, after the return out of Captivity, as Macc. 12.38. is mentioned, Nehem. 11.35. and Esd. 2.35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a City called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Macchabæus.

Samarim, or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemary, one of the sons of Cannan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitfull Valley, adorned with many Palm-trees: and 1 Kings 16.34. Jos. 6.29. therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Josua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste untill the time of Achad: in whose daies Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest son, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest son Segub: according to the curse of Josua: in which and other respects, Hos. 12.14. calleth Josua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and re-built by Adrian.

* 1 Chr. 6.60. This Halmon is called Helemeth, whence they make a new City Almath, as if this Tribe had given five Cities to the Levites.

To the Southeast of Jericho stood * Halmon of the Levites, of which Jos. 21.18. To the South Betharaba, of which Jos. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Josua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desarts, and celebrated the Passeover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11.30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jos. 5.9. Ob devolutionem probri Ægyptiaci, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled down the Hill: which from thence was called Collis præputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appeares by comparing the places, Jos. 15.7. and 18.17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Jos. 22.13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some Deut. 11.30. distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hils Garazim and Hebal: upon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Benjamin (of which also we read oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason (a) Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yeerly to give judgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal, (as is said) was neer Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neer the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

a 1 Sam. 7. 15.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yeerly to come, is (b) Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-jearim, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Josua pitched up the 12. stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe over it: by which Story, as it is set down Jos. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yeerly to give judgment, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levites wife against Gibha, and the Benjamites, Jos. 20. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Macchabæus gathered the Jews, (when Hierusalem was possest by the Heathen) as it is 1 Macc. 3 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationi fuerat Mitspæ ante à Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembrd, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which Jos. 15. 38. (c) Mitspa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitspa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himself, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chief Mitspa of the Benjamites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as we have said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremy, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewrie, as Governour over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: untill (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Juda, as it is Jerem. 41.

b Junius in this place, for Bethel readeth Domum Dei fortis, and interpreters it, Kiriath-jearim, where the Arke abode. For (saith he) by the Law, Exod. 23. 17. the greatest meetings in their annuall feasts were to be where the Arke was, but this place doth not speak of festivall, but of judiciall meetings: and besides the Priests did use to bring the Arke to their great meetings wheresoever they were, as appears 1 Sam. 12. 11. & 14. 18. neither is it easie to expound Bethel otherwise than for the City Bethel: though Junius also take it for the place where the Arke was, 1 Sam. 10. 3.

c It was no other than this Mitspa of Gilead, of which Jos. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Versus orientem, for Josua notes the three quarters, North, West, and East, to which he followed the Canaanites, though Adrichamus and others out of this place imagine a Mitspa or Maspha (as they write it) in the Tribe of Aser.

Neer unto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the Piller or Stone, for a Trophey against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Jos. 18. 22.) and how another City called Luz (d) neer adjoyning to it, was built by the man of the city which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacobs vision: and how Jeroboam, by ereting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it (e) Beth-aven, that is, the house of Vanitie, Hos. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may wel passe them over.

d 1 Sam. 7. 11. Jos. 16. 1.

The Territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adjoyned to the Kingdome of Juda: and so it continued, as appeares by the Storie of Josias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apheræma, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories, or Prefectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephravim, which Jos. 18. 23. is called Hophrani, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

e Borrowing the name of a neighbour

Not far from this Bethel, in this tribe, we finde three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidha, and Geba. Of the name Rama, (b) it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their town in the confines of the Kingdoms of Juda and Israel between Hai and Bethel, Jos. 7. 2. and 18. 12. b See cap. 6. sect. 1.

high situation. But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because *Mat.*2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seems, we have testimonie, *Jos.*19.29. and of another in Nephthalim, *Jos.*19.36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 *Sam.*25.1. which more often is called (e) Ramatha, and 1 *Sam.*1.1. Ramathaim Tsophim: for which the Septuagint have Aramathaim-sophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joseph of *Arimathæa Mat.*27.57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2 *Reg.*8.29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, neer Bethel the uttermost South-border of the kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Baasha in the time of Asa king of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flie from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Joseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captivitie belonged to Judæa, as it appears, Esd. 2.26. wherein that it is joyned with Geba, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1 *Reg.*25.22.) built Gebah ad joyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23.8. we reade that Josiah through all his Kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibba, which was the City of Saul (the wickednesse of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, *Esay.*10.27.) of which word (d) Gibba, in another from Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbaath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears *Jud.*19.13. where the Levite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1 *Sam.*22.6. it seems that there was in this Gibba some Tower or Citadel called Rama: where Junius reads in excelso, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City, was Rama: as it seems that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Najoth. The great City of Hai overthrown by Josua, which *Jos.*7.2. is placed neer Beth-aven, upon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved *Neh.*7.10.30. though it be not named by *Jos.c.*18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is *Jos.*8.28. In solitudinem, in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief note is reckoned Jos 18.25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chief City of the Hevites: whose cunning to binde the Israelites by oath to save their lives, is set down *Jos.*9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinæi, or Proselites, and were bound to certain publique services in the house of God: which oath of saving these Gebeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 *Sam.*21.1. This Gibeon, or Gibbon with Almon and Jebah (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said *Jos.*21.28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjamites. Neer to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1 *Reg.*2.26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, *Neh.*9.31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kireath-jearim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloud-shed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down 1 *Sam.*21. and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it is proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, *Nehem.*9.31. was a place of fame, of which *Esay.*10.28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Camp, 1 *Sam.*13.2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabæus his abode, 1 *Macc.*9.73. Of Giscala in Galilee Josephus makes often mention, but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he sailed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the City of Hierusalem, (e) Of this Amatha I understand the place 1 Macc. 11.34. where it is named for one of the three Præfecturæ which Demetrius yeelds to the Jews out of the country of Samaria: this lying toward the East to Jericho, and Lydda toward the West, and Apherema (of which even now we speak) lying in the middest between the two other. A fifth Rama it seemes there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which *Jos.*19.8. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Baaloth-beer. (d) Gibba in construction, that is, Governing a genitive case, is Gibbath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint reade *Jos.*24. 33. Gibbath Phinees for which Junius hath Collis Phinees (for this word is oftimes an Appellative signifying a Hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his City Gabaath upon this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoyned, note that this Hill was in the mountains of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinim, or Nethinæi, is as much as dati (as it were à Deo dati) or as Junius expounds it, deditiii: it is used 1 *Chro.*9.2. and in Esdra and Nehemias often.

and the Princes and Governours of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Jos. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

§. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

AT what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abraham's time. But, * according to others, that City out of which Melchisedec encountred Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captains, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greeks Solima.

* See in the hither half of Manasse.

Hierusalem (whensoever, or by whomsoever built) was a principall City in Josua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Josua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeers after him: even till David wan it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusai (the children of Jebusæus the son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that Nation relie on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it. 2 Sam. 5. 6.

David, after he had by Gods assistance possest it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit; strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Jebus-salem, the City of the Jebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolyma. After David's time, Solomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the work of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, Gates, and Walls, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides, that it had 150000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rock: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldome been heard of, either since or before. Joseph. Ant. Jud. l. 1. Strab. geog. l. 16

After the death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his Predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idumæan, and Jeroboam Solomons servant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first invaded the Territory of Juda, entred Hierusalem, and sack't it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Solomon, but of all those spoils which David had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sack't, and a part of the wall thrown down by Joas King of Israel; while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda. 2 Chron. 12. 2 Kings 14. 2 Kings 16.

Not long after, Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and presented Teglatphalasser with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the son of Ezekiah, the son of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Joakim then raigning. But this ungratefull, Idolatrous and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City even to the mouth with innocent bloud, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which embraced them, even and levell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heavie yoak of bondage and servitude full seventy yeers, insomuch as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed-up field, Hierusalem an heape of stones, and rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) even the birds of the Ayre scorned to flie over it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soile. 1 Chro. 5. 26. 2 Kings 25. 2 Kings 19. 2 Par. 18. Mich. 3. Hier. 25. 26. 29.

Then 70. yeers being expired, according to the prophecie of Daniel, and the Jews by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was again built, though with interruption Hier. tom. 3. trad. Heb.

and difficulty enough: and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls or other Neh.12.34.&c. defences, for some 60. and odde yeers, till Nehemia by the favour of Artaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lievtenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomæus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and again by Apollonius his Lievtenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crassus in his Parthian expedition took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

* The first of the Egyptian Kings after Alexander Macedon, who dissembling his Religion, came up to Hierusalem to offer sacrifice. Jos.12. ant.1.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompenced by the industry or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the Land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomæus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bounty of his son Ptolomæus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the City or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in
M.T.C. pro Scylla. the reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous works did so adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious than they had been in the dayes of Solomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Hierusalem by the Romanes.

IN this flourishing estate it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about fourty yeers. But then did Titus the Romane, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jews sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Romane Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jews from all parts were come up to the celebration of the Passeover: so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts: and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civill dissension, oppresst them within the Walls; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumæans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jews Kingdome, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there 1 Esd.4.45. perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand souls: and the City was so beaten down and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleeve that there had been any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian Towers, (works most magnificent, and over-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romane Garrisons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and state remaining, after ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining, that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judæa, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Romane State: but after 65. yeers, when they again offered to revolt and rebell, Ælius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another of that ungratefull City. Afterward, when his fury was appeased, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set it in the front thereof, which he did in despight of the Jews Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thence-forth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place over-topping it.

But

But the Chriſtian Religion flouriſhing in Paleſtina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and eſpecially by Chriſtians; and ſo it continued 500. yeers. Guil. Tyr. bell. ſacr. l. 14. c. 12.

It was afterward in the 636. yeer after Chriſt, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odde yeers. Onuphrius Chron.

In the yeer 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by aſſault, with an exceeding ſlaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refuſed to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, becauſe Chriſt, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Succeſſours of Godfrey fourſcore & eight yeers: till in the yeer 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and laſtly, in the yeer 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turks caſt out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jeruſalem alone that hath ſo often times been beaten down and made deſolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in ſeverall times and ages, ſuffered the ſame ſhipwrack. And it hath been Gods juſt will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to puniſh the impiety of men, by famine, by the ſword, by fire, and by ſlavery; but he hath revenged himſelf of the very places they poſſeſt; of the walls and buildings, yea, of the ſoil and the beaſts that fed thereon. Guil. Tyr. l. 8. c. 5. 18. 19. &c.

For, even that land, ſometime called holy, hath in effect loſt all her fertility and fruitfulneſſe; witneſſe the many hundreds of thouſands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding ſtony and barren. It alſo pleaſed God, not onely to conſume with fire from heaven the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very ſoil it ſelf hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not ſpare the beaſts that belonged to Amalek, no not any ſmall number of them to be ſacrificed to himſelf: neither was it enough that Achan himſelf was ſtoned, but that his moveables were ſo conſumed and brought to aſhes.

§. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the originall of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diverſly and injuriouſly. Quintilian ſpeaks infamouſly of them, and of their Leader; who (ſaith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Iſis governed Egypt, the people were ſo increaſed, as Jeroſolymus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moſes and Aaron: for the name of Moſes was accidentall, becauſe he was taken up and ſaved out of the waters. But Juſtine, of all other moſt malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damaſcus, ſaith he, was the firſt: and to him ſucceeded Abraham, Moſes, and Iſrael. He again ſuppoſeth (ſomewhat contrary to himſelf) that Iſrael had ten ſons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; ſo called of Judas his eldeſt, who had the greateſt portion. The youngeſt of the ſons of Iſrael he calleth Joſeph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magicall Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and ſignes prodigious; and this Joſeph (ſaith he) was father to Moſes: who with the reſt, by reaſon of their foul diſeaſes, and leſt they ſhould infect others, were baniſhed Egypt. Further, he telleth how theſe men thus baniſhed, when in the Deſarts they ſuffered extreme thirſt and famine, and therein found relief the ſeventh day, for this cauſe ever after obſerved the ſeventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a law among themſelves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth alſo, that they might not marry out of their own Tribes, leſt diſcovering their uncleanneſſe, they might alſo be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. Theſe and the like fables hath Juſtine. Juſtin. l. 36.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as groſly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmoſt Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Aſſe, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himſelf, having in the fifth book of his own Hiſtory truely confeſſed of the Jews, that they worſhipped one onely God: and thought it moſt prophane to represent the Deity by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumæa, the first parents of the Jews.

Cited by Stephanum in Judæa.

Claudius Iolaus drawes them from Judæus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedæmonians challenged kinred of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Josephus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wrested and perverted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so have they obscured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sons in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews: all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originalls, Josephus against Appion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldæans originally, taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandring, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Goammarian, derive the Hebrews or Jews, from Arabon; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judæans, or Jews: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Judæans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

Tert. in Apol.

Caleb. f. 63.

The government which this Nation under-went, was first paternall: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moses and Josua, by a policie Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom, and his Successours, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their government under Judges, after the death of Josua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

§. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Josua's death: and of Othoniel.

WHen Josua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not onely slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kinde upon his own head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods judgements against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this Inter-regnum (or

(or as some think, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Azotus, Askalon, Ekron, and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Jebusites after re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in expresse words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good successe which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josua governed, as appears, Jos. 10.39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Achsah: which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes sought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories. In which war they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Joseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries, and forc't them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites, unmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely joyn themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia, whom Chusthan Risathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeers, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and to raise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader: who by God assisted, delivered his brethren from oppression, and inforced the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoyning: after which the Israelites had peace fourty yeers, during all the time of Othoniels government. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges, he is twice called Othoniel, the son of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words [Calebs younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kinred. Indeed it is not likely that Calebs Daughter should marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the kinred. Wherefore we may better think that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the son of Jephunneth, and Othoniel the son of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers son; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marry with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.

Jud. 1.19. Jud. 1.25. Jud. 1.30. Jud. 3.10. 2608. 2648.

How long it was from the death of Josua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seems to have been no short time. For many wars were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laish was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josua and Othoniel, that civill war brake out between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as Juda led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done; which sheweth it to have been when Josua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civill war, if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they so weakned the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

THere lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the fifth King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth yeer of Othoniel, and governed forty yeers. He was father to Erictheus: his daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose daughter Semele was born Dionysius, or Liber Pater: under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Atelus, Paphus, and Tharsus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Genesis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologers find in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civit. Dei, and the eighteenth book, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where he that desires his pedigree may find it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica: and the son of Eleusius King of Eleusina: which Eleusius by carefull industry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return and to relieve his people with Corn, from some neighbour Nation: it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the aire.

Gen. 4. 12. Whence came the name of Vulcan by Aphæresis of the two first letters.

Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 13.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conversant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeer when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the fartherst off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authours themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Judges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Solomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seventy Weeks, and in what not? Wheresover the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many wayes to uncover the Sun, that the dayes thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that yeer, I avow it no otherwiſe than as a borrowed knowledge, or at leaſt as a private opinion: which I ſubmit to better judgements. Nam in priſcis rebus veritas non ad unguem quærenda; In ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, ſayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proſerpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tytius, Admetus, and others that lived about theſe times.

AFter the death of Othoniel, when Iſrael fell back to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and ſuppreſſe them: to perform which, he joyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec unto his own, and ſo (as all kinde of miſery readily findeth out thoſe whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his diſpleaſure) theſe Heathen neighbouring Nations had an eaſie conqueſt over Iſrael, whom God himſelf expoſed to thoſe perills, within which they were ſo ſpeedily folded up. In this miſerable eſtate they continued full eighteen yeers under Eglon King of the Moabites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raiſed up Ehud the ſon of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the juſtneſſe of his quarrell, and fearing that the Iſraelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of thoſe valiant Nations, he reſolved to attempt upon the perſon of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguiſh, he aſſured himſelf of the following victory: eſpecially giving his Nation no time to re-eſtabliſh their government, or to chooſe a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which reſolution, Ehud went on as an Embaſſadour to Eglon, loaden with preſents from the Iſraelites, as to appeaſe him, and obtaining private acceſſe, upon the pretence of ſome ſecret to be revealed, he pierc't his body with a Poniard, made of purpoſe with a double edge: and ſhutting the doors of his cloſet upon him, eſcaped.

It may ſeem, that being confident of his good ſucceſſe, he had prepared the ſtrength of Iſrael in readineſſe. For ſuddenly after his return, he did re-paſſe Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army, conſiſting of 10000. able and ſtrong men: whereof not any one eſcaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his Succeſſour had miraculouſly ſlain 600. Philiſtims with an Oxe goad: the Land and People of Iſrael lived in peace unto the end of fourſcore yeers from the death of Othoniel, which term expired in the Worlds yeer 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi, with Elimelech her huſband, and with her two ſons, travelled into Moab, and ſo the ſtory of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourſcore yeers which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Moloſſians, otherwiſe Pluto, ſtole Proſerpina, as ſhe walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hypponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pauſanias) by the River Cephiſus, which elſewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two diſtinct Rivers. This ſtealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theſeus joyned themſelves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto, or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they ſay) a very huge Dogge, which faſtened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had alſo worried Theſeus, but that Hercules ſpeedily reſcued him, and by ſtrength took and maſtered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theſeus out of Hell. But Zezes, as I take it, hath written this ſtory ſomewhat more according to the truth. For Theſeus and Pyrithous, ſaith he, attempted to ſteal Proſerpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Moloſſians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proſerpina: Proſerpina being a generall name alſo for all fair women. This purpoſe of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theſeus and Pyrithous were both taken; and becauſe Pyrithous was the principall in this conſpiracy, and Theſeus drawn on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held priſoner, till Hercules, by the inſtigation of Euriſtheus, delivered him by ſtrong hand. The Moloſſi, which Stephanus writes with a ſingle (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting neer the Mountains of Pindus: of which Mountains

Pauſ. in Ar.

Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessali: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopæi, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erectheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-winde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that she might not complain; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother-in-laws mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloth, and sent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne caused her onely son Itys to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, she caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that she was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias hath built neer the Rocks Mergi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian War, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odrysæ, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his son-in-law: as it is good to beleeve, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdome of Odrysæ, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias sayes, Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembring the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Lib. 9. Paus. in Att. Thucyd. l. 2.

Neer this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

Paus. l. 1. Homer. Odyss. 11. Paus.

In the seven and fortieth yeer of Ehud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Themone the chief Priest of Apollo in Delphos, devised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets have applied to the passion of love: and some to the covetous that dare not injoy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the Ninuph Pleta: Diaconus and Didymus in Zezes, give him another mother. He was said to be the son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening Wisdom and Riches. It is said, that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own son to be slain and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders; whereby was signified, that those men which seek after Divine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own children, of all else the most deareſt. And where it was devised, that he had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his minde being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Euseb. præq. Evan. l. 2. Zezer. hist. 10. Chil. 5.

Quærit

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water ſeeks for water, and doth miſſe
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This puniſhment, they ſay, was inflicted upon him, for that he diſcovered the ſecrets of the gods: that is, becauſe he taught wiſdome and vertue to mortall men: which ſtory Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expreſt in Verſe. Others expound this fable otherwiſe, and ſay, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirſty of more abundance, was never ſatisfied. Of whom Horace againſt covetouſneſſe.

Tantalus à labiis ſitiens fugientia captat
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirſting Tantalus doth catch at ſtreams that from him flee.
Why laugheſt thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambroſia of the gods to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that ſort puniſhed. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quòd furatus,
Coetaneis convivis
Nectar Ambroſiamque dedit.

Becauſe that ſtealing immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambroſia give
To gueſts of his own age, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the ſecrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneſt meats in a foule ſtomack, are therein corrupted, ſo the moſt high and reſerved myſteries are often perverted by an unclean and defiled minde.

To you it is given (ſaith Chriſt in Mark) to know the myſterie of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So it is ſaid of him, that he expounded all things to his Diſciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzene infer upon a place of S. Paul: Quod ſi Paulo licuiſſet effari ea, quorum ipſi cognitionem cœlum tertium & uſque ad illud progreſſio ſuppeditavit, fortaſſe de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius conſtaret; If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third Heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know ſomewhat more of God.

Mark 4. 11.

Mark 4. 34. Greg. in Orat. de vella ratione diſp. de Deo 2 Cor. 12.

Pythagoras, ſaith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wiſe man, Aſinolyram exponere, aut myſteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta Scarabæus: quare ſilentium indixit diſcipulis, nè vulgo divinorum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius quàm loquendo apprehendantur; To ſet an Aſſe to a harp, or to learn myſteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a Violl, or Scarabies, and unclean flies ſoveraigne oyntment. Wherefore he commanded ſilence to his Diſciples, that they ſhould not diſcloſe divine myſteries to the common ſort, which are eaſier learned by meditation than by babling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myſteries among their Prieſts in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their ſecrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might beſtow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is alſo ſaid, that Tityus lived, whom Apollo ſlew, becauſe he ſought to force his mother Latona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the ſon of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where ſhe was delivered of Tityus: whoſe Mother dying, and himſelf therein nouriſhed, he was therefore called the ſon of the earth. Pauſanias ſpeaking of the grave of this Giant, affirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his ſtature out of Homer:

For-

Hom.Od.11.

Porrectúsque novem Tityus per jugera terra,
Assiduas atro viscere pascit aves.
Nine furlongs stretcht lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry Birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; That Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocis, it was feigned by the Poets, to the terrour of others, That he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still lived, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus, King of Thessaly, lived also in this age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced; but having slain Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where, together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him in Ovid, which saith:

Ilion aspicies, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyræ.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wise Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witnesse, saith Pausanias.

Paus.in Att.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the daies of Deborah, lived Perseus, the son of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they sailed out of Peloponnesus, to seek their adventure on Africa side) Meduſa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as she hunted, neer the Lake Tritan, was surprised and slain: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such, and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, That all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Triton a Lake of Africa, which Plinie calleth Pallantias. Dictym. in pereg. Hist.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or, after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reigns, as it is said, in the time of this Judge: of which the first ruled 40. yeers, and the second 31. yeers. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the son of Glaucus, the son of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea, or Sthenobia, the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affairs of weight, between him and his son-in-law Jobates: giving secret order to Jobates to dispatch him: but Jobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, imployed him against Chimæra, a Monster vomiting, or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse, Pegasus, sprung up of the blood of Meduſa, formerly slain by the souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him; a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: upon which beast Bellerophon over-came Chimæra: and performed the other services given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slain him: but being victorious also over all those, he arrived to Jobates in safety: whom Jobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to flie up to heaven upon his Pegasus: whose pride Jupiter disdaining, caused one of his stinging flies so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven: and being fed in Jupiters own stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diversly expounded; as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieve men in their innocent and undeserved adversity, and to cast down those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreme hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing over-

Euseb. in Chro.

proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremitie of sorrow, and ever-during miserie. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrat of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearn, of which three beasts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of sayls (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Æneas. Plutar. in clark matter. L. 5. Æneid.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Javan) derive their name of Iones, is said to have been about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Jaones, which hath a neer resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himself took name from Javan: it being a custome observable in the Histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue. Homer in hymn. ad Apoll.

The invasion of India by Liber-Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Augustine makes him far more ancient: placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Josua. Lib. 18. c. 12. de ci. dei, l. 18. c. 15

About the end of the 80. yeers, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. IV.

Of Debora and her Contemporaries.

AFter Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeers, they again began to forget the giver of all goodnesse, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliverance by Ehud; and after him by Samgar; the rest began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle securitie; so is security as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which, all estates in the world have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sins were again ripe for punishment, Jabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the territory of Israel: and having in his service 900. iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty yeers, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Propheteesse, who incouraged Barac to levie a force out of Nepthalim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nepthalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seem to have proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible than in others, because Hazor and Haroseth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nepthalim. So in the dayes of Jephte the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the War was, pressed most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsell and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoak of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest meanes. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistlesse, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angell, or as he did the Egyptians in Moses time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Josua: sometimes by the ministerie of men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the houshold servants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set upon their own confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them, to kill one another in the sight of Jehosaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Propheteesse speak unto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for 2 Chron. 20. Judg. 4.

the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfulnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these
Jud. 5. v. 8. words: Was there a shield or speare seene among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were severed and amased, some of them confined over Jordan, and verse 17. durst not joyn themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Asherites kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling neer the place of the battell (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesseth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondencie with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, she derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied to her self, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Jabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. yeers. In which time the Kingdome of Argos, which had continued 544. yeers, was translated to Mycenæ: The translation of this Kingdome, Vives out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas the son of Lynceus divided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it self: Prætus his brother possest Pau. in Corinthiacis. Ephyra, or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities, with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthos, which witnesse Prætus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was fore-told by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings son, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this, Perseus, to avoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdoms with his Uncle Prætus: and built Mycænæ. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custodie Horace hath this wittie observation:

Inclusam Danaen turris ahenea,
Robustæq; fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubiæ munierant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:

Si non Acrisium Virginis abditæ
Custodem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Risissent, fore enim tutum iter & patens Converso in pretium Deo.

Aurem per medios ire satellites,
Et perrumpere amat saxa, potentius
Ictu fulmineo.

The

The brazen Tower with doors close barr'd,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,
Kept safe the maidenhead, of Danae from secret love:
Till smiling Venus, and wise Jove
Beguil'd her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden showre,
The god into her lap did poure
Himself, and took his pleasure.
Through guards and stony walls to break,
The thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Than is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argives were these:

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first yeer of Jacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time, to the end of Sthenelus, Castor mis-reckoneth 400. yeers. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to have stood 544. yeers, others but at 417. Io was the daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Pirasus, Phorbas,
Triopas,
Crotopus,
Sthenelus,
Danaus,
Lynceus,
Abas, Acrisius,
Pelops.

After the translation to Mycenæ, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

Perseus,
Sthenelus,
Eurystheus,
Atreus and Thyestes: The sons of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atreus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.
Agamemnon,
Ægysthus,
Orestes,
Tisamenus,
Penthilus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Penthilus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas, who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus, who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronologicall Table, as Contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this age.

Debora and Barac being dead, the Midianites, assisted by the Amalekites, infested Israel. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places

Jud.6. of hardest accesse: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitfull vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattell, destroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thick as grasse-hoppers: which servitude lasted seven yeers.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred up Gideon the son of Joash, afterward called Jud.6.v.5. Jerubbaal: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in Jud.c.6.&7. his enterprize, it is both largly and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terrour than force, with which he gave the great Army of their enemies an alarum: who hearing so loud a noyse, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Army of Israel to be infinite, and strucken with a sodain fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slain. In his return the Ephramites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemie, in which pursuit being tyred with travell, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Zalmunna; whicd fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatned therefore the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Penuel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likly, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zeba and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the war, that both envie and maligne others, if they perform any praiseworthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Basan, as it is thought. Jud.8.10. Now Gideon, how or whersoever it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Zalmunna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprised them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he took Zebah and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gidions brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands, his Son whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unusuall torments, so were his own 70. sons, all but one, murthered by his own bastard Abimelec: The like Analogie is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the river and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first-born by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for his victory, and their own deliverance, as they offered him the Soveraignty over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reign over you, neither shall my childe reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden ear-rings which every man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand & seven hundred shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set up the same in his own City of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house. Judg. 8. 23. Exod. 28. Judg. 8. 28.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Ark: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the Army came in to the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtaly, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this Army Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went down to view the Army of his enemies, who with the noise of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution. Judg. 7. 23.

There lived with Gideon, Ægeus, the son of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Eurystheus King of Mycenæ: Atreus and Thyestes the sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurystheus, the Kingdome of Mycenæ fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in jealousie, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crown, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest; did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not unrevenged. For both Atreus and his son Agamemnon was slain by a base son of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the linage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dædalus and Icarus. Dædalus, they say, having slain his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to have framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cowe, satisfie her lust; a thing no lesse unnaturall than incredible, had not that shameless Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seem, to verifie the old Fable. For so it appears by those Verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

Junctam Pasiphaen Dicteo credite Tauro
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Cæsar, longæva vetustas
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae; Servius makes a lesse unhonest construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsell, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe; and that she being delivered of two sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that she was delivered of the Monster Minotaur, half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dædalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned wings for himself and his son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dædalus framed sails both for his own boat, and for his sons, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himself over-bold, was over-born and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body and head of those men, whom they carried to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

Herod. Plat. Paus. l. 9. With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moons course, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his scholar with his own Harp.

Strab. l. 9. Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rockie and unaccessible Mountain neer Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissolving her probleme, his victorie over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lion, for her cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, & the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightfull part, with her own troop she held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp war upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrown. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharp war with the Megarians and Athenians, because his son Androgeus was slain by them. He possest himself of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every yeer seven of their sons: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judge Thola. In the end he was slain at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

Arist. pol. l. 1.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Antæus the Giant, who was said to have 60. and odde cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Antæus: yet for my self I think it but a loud lie. That Antæus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was feigned to be the son of the earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited neer the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expounded to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

ABout the eleventh yeer of Gideon, was the famous Expedition of the Argonauts: of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the sum of which is this: Pelias the son of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Æson, who was Jasons father, reigning in Jolcos a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited

Jason

Jaſon to him, who coming haſtily, loſt one ſhoe in paſſing over a brook: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what courſe he would take (ſuppoſing he were able) againſt one of whom an Oracle ſhould adviſe him to take heed? to which queſtion when Jaſon had briefly anſwered, that he would ſend him to Colchos to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that ſervice. Therefore Jaſon prepared for the voyage, having a ſhip built by Argus the ſon of Phryxus, by the counſell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the braveſt men of Greece to ſail with him: as Typhis the Maſter of the ſhip, Orpheus the famous Poet, Caſtor and Pollux the ſons of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus ſons of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theſeus, Zetes and Calais the two winged ſons of Boreas, Amphiaraus the great Sooth-ſayer, Meleager of Calidon that ſlew the great wilde Boare, Aſcalaphus and Jalmenus, or Almenus, the ſons of Mars, who were afterwards at the laſt war of Troy, Laërtes the father of Ulyſſes, Atalanta a warlike Virgin, Idas and Lynceus the ſons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Caſtor and Pollux, ſlew Caſtor, and wounded Pollux, but were ſlain themſelves: Lynceus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

Theſe and many other went with Jaſon in the ſhip Argo: in whoſe Prow was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could ſpeak. They arrived firſt at Lemnos; the women of which Iſland, having ſlain all the males, purpoſing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheleſſe contented to take their pleaſure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it ſo fell out, that looſing thence by night, they were driven by contrary windes back into his Port, neither knowing that it was the ſame Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the ſame men: but rather taken for ſome of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blows, inſomuch that the Argonauts ſlew the moſt part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they ſolemnized his funerall. Then departed they again, and arrived ſhortly in Myſia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the ſon of Elates, who went to ſeek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was raviſhed by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Myſia called Cios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myſia the Argonauts ſailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amycus the ſon of Neptune was then King. He being a ſtrong man, compelled all ſtrangers to fight with him at whorlbats, in which kinde of fight he had ſlain many, and was now himſelf ſlain by Pollux. The Bebryces in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions reſcued him, with great ſlaughter of the people. They ſailed from hence to Salmydeſſus a Town in Thrace (ſomewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Sooth-ſayer dwelt, who was blinde, and vexed with the Harpies. The Harpies were ſaid to be a kinde of Birds which had the faces of women, and foule long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furniſhed for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did ſo defile the reſt, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice and direction for their voyage: You ſhall do well (quoth he) firſt of all to deliver me from the Harpies, and then afterwards to aſk my counſell. Whereupon they cauſed the table to be covered, and meat ſet on; which was no ſooner ſet down, than that preſently in came the Harpies, and played their accuſtomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men ſaw this, they drew their ſwords, and purſued them through the aire: Some ſay, that both the Harpies and the young men died of wearineſſe in the fight, and purſuit. But Apollonius ſaith, that the Harpies did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon diſmiſſed. For this good turn, Phineus gave them informations of the way, and adverriſed them withall of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did ſhut up the paſſage; wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the paſſage: and if that paſſed ſafe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazzard themſelves in vain. They did ſo, and perceiving that the Pigeon had onely loſt a piece of her taile, they obſerved the next opening of the Rocks, and then rowing with all their might, paſſed through ſafe, onely the end of their Poop was bruiſed.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them curteously. Here Idmon a Soothsayer of their company was slain by a wilde Boare; also here Typhis dyed: and Ancæus undertook to steare the ship. So they passed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucasus, and came to the River Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the haven, Jason went to Æetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Cammandment of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliver the golden Fleece; which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if he alone would yoak together two brazen hooft Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe Dragons teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These Bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whilest Jason was in a great perplexity about this task, Medæa the daughter of Æetes fell into a most vehement love of him, so far forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came privily to him, promising her help if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Jason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine wherewith she bade him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set upon him To remedy which inconvenience, she bade him throw stones amongst them as soon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Jason followed her counsell; whereto when the event had answered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was so far from approving such his desire, that he devised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burn their ship; which Medæa perceiving, went to Jason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where, they say, it was kept by a Dragon that never slept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medæa cast into a sleep: so taking away the Golden Fleece, she went with Jason into the ship Argo; having with her, her brother Absyrtus.

Æetes understanding the practices of Medæa, provided to pursue the ship, whom when Medæa perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding some, was fain to seek out the rest, and suffer his Daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word signifieth Division. Afterwards he sent many of his subjects to seek the ship Argo, threatning that if they brought not back Medæa, they should suffer in her stead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the slaughter of Absyrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Islands Absyrtides; there the ship Argo, (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Circe, from the murther of Absyrtus. Now they thereupon sailing between the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sea of Sardinia, and alongst the coast of Hetruria, came to the Isle of Æea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they sailed by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well, that he stayed them. Onely Butes swam out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carried to Lylibæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling Rocks, which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sicilie, where the Beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Corcyra, the Island of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchos, that had been sent by Æetes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betook themselves to new habitations: Some of them dwelt in the Mountains of Corcyre, others in the Islands of Absyrtides, and some coming to the Phæaces, there found the ſhip Argo, and demanded Medæa of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made anſwer, that if ſhe were not Jaſons wife, they ſhould have her; but if ſhe were already married, he would not take her from her huſband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherefore they of Colchos, not daring to return home, ſtayed with the Phæaces; ſo the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iſland Minos reigned, who had a man of braſſe given to him (as ſome of the Fablers ſay) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was cloſed up with a brazen naile; his name was Talus: his cuſtome was to run thrice a day about the Iſland for the defence of it. When he ſaw the ſhip Argo paſſe by, he threw ſtones at it; but Medæa with her Magick deſtroyed him. Some ſay that ſhe ſlew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promiſing to make him immortall, ſhe drew out the naile that ſtopt his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that ſay he was ſlain by Pæan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts ſailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for freſh water. And laſtly, from Ægina they ſailed by Eubœa and Locris home to Jolcos, where they arrived, having ſpent four whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jaſon, underſtand the myſterie of the Philoſophers ſtone, called the golden Fleece, to which alſo, other ſuper-fine Chymiſts draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden book of Parchment, which is of ſheep-ſkin, and therefore called golden, becauſe it was taught therein how other metals might be tranſmuted. Others would ſignifie by Jaſon, Wiſdome, and Moderation, which overcometh all perils: but that which is moſt probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the ſtory of ſuch a paſſage was true, and that Jaſon with the reſt went indeed to rob Colchos, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucaſus there are certain ſteep falling torrents which waſh down many grains of gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting uſe to ſet many fleeces of wooll in thoſe deſcents of waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water paſſeth thorow, which Strabo witneſſeth to be true. The many rocks, ſtraits, ſands, and currents, in the paſſage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into thoſe fiery Bulls, the armed men riſing out of the ground, the Dragon caſt aſleep, and the like. The man of braſſe, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazzards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran Sea, diſguiſed, as the reſt, by Orpheus, under Poeticall morals: all which Homer afterward uſed (the man of braſſe excepted) in the deſcription of Ulyſſes his travels on the ſame In-land ſeas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theſeus, Hippolytus, &c.

AFter the death of Gideon, Abimelech his baſe ſon, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembring what offers had been made to his father by the people, who deſired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and, as it ſeemeth, ſuppoſing (notwithſtanding his fathers religious modeſty) that ſome of his brethren might take on them the Soveraignty, practiſed with the Inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himſelf; who being eaſily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily condeſcended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed ſeventy pieces of ſilver of their Idoll Baalberith, with which Judg. 9. 41. treaſure he hired a company of looſe and deſperate vagabonds, to aſſiſt his firſt deteſtable enterpriſe, to wit, the ſlaughter of his ſeventy brethren, the ſons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none eſcaped but Jotham Verſe 5. the youngeſt, who hid himſelf from his preſent fury: all which he executed on one ſtone; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monſter that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whoſe revenges are without date, and for everlaſting) neither hath it reſpect to nature, which laboureth the preſervation of every being: but it rageth alſo againſt her, though garniſhed with beauty which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it self the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearfull and inhumane soever) which may serve it: remembring nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the errour or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praiseth the adventure, than feareth the like successe. It was the first sin that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Divell, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting every age, and mans condition.

Jotham, the youngest of Gideons sons, having escaped the present perill, sought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites from the assisting of this mercilesse Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawfull, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatnesse, the Figge-tree with its sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Soveraignty. He also fore-told them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men back whom rage without right led on) Gaal the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem from the service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the Town, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government, the Lapithæ and Centaurs made war against the Thebans. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to sit them: insomuch, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the Plains, those which had never seen horsmen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans, when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire.

Paleybatus, l. 1. de incredib.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Issachar governed Israel 23. yeers, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22. yeers, who seems to be descended of Jair the son of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty of those Cities which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times Israel, lived without disturbance, and in peace.

Deut. 3. 14. Num. 12. 41.

Judg. 10.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransome, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the Daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helena the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

In Tusc.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Æthra: but Plutarch in the Story of his life, findes him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Grecian Sea between it and Asia the lesse

leſſe took name. For when Minos had maſtered the Athenians, ſo far as he forc't them to pay him ſeven of their ſons every yeer for tribute, whom he incloſed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monſter Minotaur: becauſe belike the ſons of Taurus, which he begat on Paſiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: among theſe ſeven Theſeus thruſt himſelf, not doubting by his valour to deliver the reſt, and to free the Country of that ſlavery occaſioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his ſon.

And having poſſeſt himſelf of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he received from her a bottom of thred, by which he conducted himſelf through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by mean whereof having ſlain Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Ægeus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in ſafety, he ſhould uſe a white ſail in ſigne thereof, and not that mournfull black ſaile under which they left the port of Athens: This inſtruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus deſcrying the ſhip of Theſeus with a black ſail, did caſt himſelf over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægeus.

One of the firſt famous acts of Theſeus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a paſſage between Megara and the Peloponneſian Iſthmos, and threw all whom he maſtered into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wreſtling, who uſed by that art to kill others. He alſo rid the Countrie of Procruſtes, who uſed to bend down the ſtrong limbs of two trees, and faſtned by cords ſuch as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the ſpringing up tare them aſunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other miſchievous theeves and murtherers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazons, who after many victories and vaſtations, entred the Territory of Athens. Theſeus having taken their Queen Hippolita priſoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phædra, falling in love, and he refuſing to abuſe his fathers bed, Phædra perſwaded Theſeus, that his ſon offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Theſeus beſought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his ſons by ſome violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantrge, ſent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus paſſed by the ſea-ſhore, and ſo affrighted his horſes, as caſting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miſerable and undeſerved deſtiny, when Phædra had heard of, ſhe ſtrangled her ſelf. After which it is feigned, that Diana intreated Æſculapius to ſet Hippolitus his pieces together, and to reſtore him to life: which done, becauſe he was chaſte, ſhe led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field ſports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father ſought his life, thinking to eſcape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his paſſage and eſcape; which wounds Æſculapius, to wit, ſome ſkilfull Phyſician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which he paſſed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he moſt delighted. But of thoſe ancient prophane Stories Plutarch ſaith well, that as Coſmographers in their deſcriptions of the World, where they finde many vaſt places whereof they know nothing, fill the ſame with ſtrange Beaſts, Birds, and Fiſhes, and with Mathematicall lines; ſo do the Grecian Hiſtorians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the Tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous diſcourſes. True it is, that Theſeus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his pattern, and was the firſt that gathered the Athenians, from being diſperſed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for deviſing them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungratefull multitude, in the end baniſhed. Some ſay, per Oſtraciſmum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on ſhells, which was a device of his own.

He ſtole Helen (as they ſay) when ſhe was fifty yeers old, from Aphidna, which City Caſtor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Theſeus to recover their ſiſter. Eraſiſtratus and Pauſanias write, that Theſeus begot her with childe at Argos, where ſhe erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and ſo doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Euſebius findes in the firſt of Jair, who governed Iſrael twenty two yeers, to whom ſucceeded Jephta or Jepte, ſix yeers, to whom Ibzan, who ruled ſeven yeers, and then Habdon eight yeers: in whoſe time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theſeus had a childe by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no lesse than fifteen yeers old; for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty yeers old at the destruction of Troy: and when she was stollen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting, with Halicarnasseus, do in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first yeer of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successour of Menestheus, the Successour of Theseus, seventeen dayes before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeer, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides governed Sicyon; Menestheus, Athens; Tautanes, Assyria; Habdon, Israel; then Æneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia, Phæstus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeers, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus, who reigned four yeers, and Polyphides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jair; so is also Menestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Judges, Mitreus, and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt, Amenophis, the son of Rameses, and afterwards Annemanes.

§. VII.

Of the war of Thebes, which was in this age.

IN this age was the war of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truely against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

——Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, semperque æterna fuêre,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojæ,
Non alias alii quoque res cecinere Poetæ?

If all this world had no originall,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes, or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sowe more corn than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of mony was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell: saying, that the golden armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves; and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steal horses or kine was the usuall exercise of their great men. Their Towns were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycenæ the principall City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, & it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Isle of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it wil easily appear to such as consider what Thucidydes the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his History. Wherefore, as in these later later times, idle Chroniclers uſe when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great Froſts, or dry Summers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to reade; ſo did they who ſpake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great Flouds which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or elſe rehearſe fables of men changed into birds, of ſtrange Monſters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that ſavoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the ſon of Laius King of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an infant, becauſe an Oracle foretold what evill ſhould come to paſſe by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage, contending for the way, ſlay his own father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocaſta, called by Homer, Epicaſte: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two ſons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſſe of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his Parents, he underſtood the grievous murther and inceſt he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife (and Mother) did hang her ſelf. Some ſay, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curſing his ſons, becauſe they ſuffered their father to be caſt out of the Town, and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two Sons made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reign one yeer, and the other another yeer, and ſo by courſe rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had after a yeers government reſigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the firſt yeer, he refuſed to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adraſtus the ſon of Talaus then reigned, unto whoſe Palace coming by night, he was driven to ſeek lodging in an out-houſe, on the back-ſide. Hom. Odyſſ. 11.

There he met with Tydeus the ſon of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom ſtriving about their lodging, he fell to blowes. Adraſtus hearing the noiſe, came forth and took up the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the ſhield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembred an old Oracle by which he was adviſed to give his two Daughters in marriage to a Lion and a Bore: and accordingly he did beſtow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their Countries. To this purpoſe levying an Army, and aſſembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous among others to carry Amphiaraus the ſon of Oicleus a great Soothſayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is ſaid to have fore-ſeen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains ſhould eſcape, ſave onely Adraſtus, did both utterly refuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſwaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaraus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that ſhe ſhould cauſe her Huſband to aſſiſt him. The Sooth-ſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her eye ſo precious a Jewell, that ſhe could not refuſe it. Therefore whereas a great controverſie between Amphiaraus and Adraſtus, was by way of compromiſe put unto the deciſion of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by ſolemn oath to ſtand to her appointment: ſhe ordered the matter ſo, as a Woman ſhould that did love a Bracelet better than her Huſband. He now finding that it was far more eaſie to fore-ſee than avoid deſtiny, ſought for ſuch comfort as revenge might affoord him, giving in charge unto his ſons, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their mother, and make ſtrong war upon the Thebanes.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his forces, of which, the ſeven chief Leaders were himſelf, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in ſtead of whom ſome name Meciſteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, ſon of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſome water; ſhe having a childe in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere ſhe returned, a Serpent had ſlain the childe. This woman was Hypſipyle the Daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom ſhe would have ſaved when the women of the Iſle ſlew all the the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her Piety the Lemnian wives did sell her to Pyrats, and the Pyrats to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrey about Nemæa, whose young son Opheltes, or Archemorus she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When upon the childes death she hid her self for fear of her master, Amphiaraus told her sons where they should find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had slain the childe, and in memory of the chance, did institute solemne funerall games, called Nemæan, wherein Adrastus wan the prize with his swift horse Arcon, Tydeus with the whorlbats, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopæus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slain the Nemæan Lion: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set down.

From Nemæa the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envie and malice of the people, who layd fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his return to the Army, of which fifty he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the City as a reporter and witnesse of his valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger, could scarce muster up more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compasse the Towne, Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proëtis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electa, and Polynices at Hypsista. In the mean season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victory to the Thebans, if Menœcius the son of Creon, a principall man of the City, would vow himself to bee slain in honour of Mars the god of war. So full of malice and pride is the Divell, and so envious at his Creators glory, that he not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice withall Divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blind devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maides, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in stead of the living: yet among the salvages in the West Indies these cruell offerings have been practised of late ages: which, as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely covered and hidden by this subtilty among civill people: so it may serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarismes then raigning in Greece. For Menœcius, as soon as he understood that his death might purchase victory to his people, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himself before the gates of the City. Then was a battell fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capanius advancing ladders to the wals, got up upon the rampart: whence, when he fell, or was cast down, or (as Writers have it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this battel, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, slew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sons of Astacus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sons slew Hippomedon, which was one of the ſeven Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the ſeven (who was ſaid to have been ſo faire, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was ſlain by Amphidicus, or, as ſome ſay, by Periclymenus the ſon of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus, by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiaraus, which he cruelly tore open, and ſwallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is ſaid, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter ſuch remedy for his wounds, as ſhould have made him immortall, refuſed to beſtow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortall, did periſh through the beaſtly rage that he ſhewed at his death.

10 The hoſt of the Argives being wholly diſcomfited, Adraſtus and Amphiaraus fled: of whom Amphiaraus is ſaid to have been ſwallowed quick into the earth, neer to the River Iſmenus, together with his Chariot, and ſo loſt out of mens ſight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carkaſſes, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly ſought for. Adraſtus eſcaped on his good horſe Arion, and came to Athens; where ſitting at an altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made ſupplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not ſuffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but cauſed Antigone, the onely daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, becauſe ſhe had ſought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons 20 Edict. The Athenians condeſcending to the requeſt of Adraſtus, did ſend forth an Army under the conduct of Theſeus, which took Thebes, and reſtored the bodies of the Argives to ſepulture: at which time Evadne the wife of Capaneus threw her ſelf into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her huſband. But it little contented the ſons of thoſe Captains which were ſlain at Thebes, that any leſſe revenge ſhould be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the City: wherefore ten yeer after, having levied forces, Ægialeus the ſon of Adraſtus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Therſander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Meciſteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmæon, the ſon of Amphiaraus: with whom alſo went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promiſed victory, if Alcmæon were their Captain, whom 30 afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountred by Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battell, and ſlew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driven to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) ſlain by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter, the Citizens began to deſire compoſition; but in the mean time they conveyed themſelves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and ſo began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Eſtiæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entring into it, ſacked it, threw down the walls, and laid it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome, that the Town was ſaved by Thir- 40 ſander the ſon of Polynices, who cauſing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he ſaved the City from utter deſtruction, it is very likely; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

§. VIII.

Of Jephta, and how the three hundred yeers which he ſpeaketh of, Judg. 11. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with ſome other things touching Chronologie about theſe times.

50 AFter the death of Jair (neer about whoſe time theſe things hapned in Greece, and during whoſe government, and that of Thola, Iſrael lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worſhipped Baal and Aſteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoyning, and imbraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with thoſe of the Philiſtims. And as before it pleaſed God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: ſo now he ſcourged them by the * Ammonites, and afterward by the Philiſtims. Judg. 10. * The perſecution of the Ammonites laſted 18. yeers, & ended in the yeer of the World 2820. in which yeer Jephta began, Jud. 11.

Now among the Iſraelites, thoſe of Gilead being moſt oppreſt, becauſe they bordered upon upon the Ammonites, they were inforc't to seek Jephta, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of deviliſh hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammons right, and fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not onely beat them out of the Plains, but forc't them Judg. 11. 33. over the mountains of Arabia, even to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expresst heretofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he incountred, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience submitted her self, and onely desired two moneths time to bewail her Virginity on the mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more Bor. in Judg. probable, which Borhæus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephta's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephta, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Jephta hereupon inforced to defend himself against their fury, in the incounter slew of them 42000.
Judg. 12. which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistims had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephta, after he had judged Israel six yeers, died: to whom 2925. succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seven yeers: after him Elon was their Judge ten yeers: in 2942. all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephta's account of the times, Jud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then possest the East side of Jordan 300. yeers) to speak somwhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places
Judg. 11. 21. Act. 13. 20. 1 King. 6. 1. of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephta and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephta here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeers: S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Heli, 450. yeers. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeers. To the first, Beroaldus findeth Jephta's 300. yeers to be but 266. yeers, to wit, 18. of Josua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora, Id fecit, numero certo pro incerto, proposito. 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephta (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certain number for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi propè trecentesimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Israeli; So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundred yeer, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more yeers than Jephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captivity, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71. of those yeers the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeers, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justifie this account of 365. yeers, besides the 71. yeers of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. yeers more, and so maketh up the summe of 365. These 28. yeers he findeth out thus: twenty yeers he gives to the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen yeers to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melanchthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeers, is far more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeers of affliction (to wit. 34. yeers of the 71.) if we adde them to the 266. yeers of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300. yeers. Neither is it strange that Jephta should leave out more than halfe of the yeers of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against the 71. yeers, and say, that during these yeers, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeers remembred by Jephta, to bee 306. which odde yeers, saith he, Jephta omitteth. But becaus the yeers of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petræa; which forty yeers of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers judgment herein: for in the dispute between Jephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephta's answer also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Towns, and in Aroer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeers: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300 yeers: and therfore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to possesse it, it seemeth somewhat strained to mee: for we doe not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions. Judg. 11. 28.

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeers hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephta's narration: when he makes a brief repitition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeers (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeers: and not onely the time in which Israel possest Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephta's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. yeers, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Jephta's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephta's three hundred yeers of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephta might say, that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeers, reckoning 266. yeers of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest. Junius in the 11. of Judg. & anno 1. Reade the 24. of Jos. and the 2. of Judg. 7. Funcii Chro. f. 4. Beza in his annotations upon the 13. of Act. v. 10.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Josua, to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeers. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Funcius Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I have not reade his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeer of Heli, but 357. yeers: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. yeers.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seems) findes 450. yeers from the death of Josua, to the last of Heli, and leaves but thirty yeers for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole yeers ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them judges about 450. yeers, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death Act. 13. 20.

of Josua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeers (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. yeers for 300 yeers; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeers: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons yeers) 319. and of yeers of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeers, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. yeers, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. yeers of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. yeers, which two sums put together, make 430. yeers. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeers, he finds 20. yeers to make up Saint Pauls number, to have been spent after the death of Josua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cusban, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeers added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of scriptures, namely the 24. of Josua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the dayes of Josua, and all the dayes of the Elders that over-lived Josua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. yeers, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if here also the 20. yeers of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel should be denied. For they which deny these yeers, and make Othoniels 40. to begin presently upon the death of Josua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20. yeers lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeers of affliction apart from the yeers of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons yeers, and of the forty yeers of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they have 20. yeers more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeers of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one half of the forty of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeers of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeers, besides the 20 while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeers between the end of Josua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the seniors between Josua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeers, to which if we adde the yeers of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. yeers, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty yeers, God suffered their manners in the wildernesse: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and devided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450 yeers, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his yeers spent in the Wildernesse, then in the ninteenth verse he cometh unto the acts of Josua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450 yeers, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The onely inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcileable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. yeers between the end of Josua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeers between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty
