Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gaules, and beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdome of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Army, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending war against Antigonus, and the giving liberty to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important than war against a Prince already vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedæmonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Country, had betaken himself to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdom. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himself as an open enemy; excusing himself and his former dissembling words with a jest; That he followed herein the Lacedæmonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as falshood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwayes practised in wisedom, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremity. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Town; causing such as could beare armes to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the most part, hard to approach) the lower & more accessible places, were fenced with wals, at the present only trenches were cast, & barricadoes made with carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three dayes together it was assailed by Pyrrhus exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the town the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn in ſunder the Barricadoes. Preſently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta with a good ſtrength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in war) with two thouſand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Country ſtood, untill he was almoſt at home. Theſe ſuccours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a deſire to prevail againſt all impediments. But the third dayes work ſhewed how great his errour had been, in forbearing to aſſault the Town at his firſt coming. For he was ſo manfully repelled, that he ſaw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwiſe than by a long ſiege: in which tedious courſe he had no deſire to ſpend his time.

Antigonus had now raiſed an Army, though not ſtrong enough to meet the Enemy in plain field, yet able to hinder all his purpoſes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diverſly affected, by the difficulty of his enterpriſe in hand, and the ſhame of taking a repulſe in his firſt attempt. Whileſt he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promiſe to deliver that City into his hands.

Civill diſſention raging then hotly in Argos, cauſed the heads of ſeverall factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of theſe two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them deſirous to rid their hands of ſuch powerfull aſſiſtants, as each of the two Kings pretended himſelf to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to ſave them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus: and that he would be gone, if they needed not his help. On the other ſide, Pyrrhus would needs perſwade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them ſafe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they ſo deſired.

The Argives took ſmall pleaſure in hearing the Fox and Kite at ſtrife, which of them ſhould keep the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both to divert their powers ſome other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condeſcended, and gave hoſtages to aſſure his word: for he was the weaker, and ſtood in need of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promiſe: Hoſtages he would give none to his inferiours: eſpecially meaning deceipt. This made them ſuſpect his purpoſe to be ſuch, as indeed it was. Yet he leſſe regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of aſſurance, by giving ſuch a bond, as he intended to break ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City ſhould be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army without any tumult entred the City: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to paſſe the Gate. The taking off, and ſetting on again of thoſe Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarme to the Citie, and ſome leaſure to take order for defence, before ſo many were entred, as could fully maſter it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vantguard) being ignorant of the wayes in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other ſide, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-paſſage: and ſetting upon the enemies on all ſides, did put them to great loſſe and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore underſtanding by the confuſed noiſe, and unequall ſhoutings of his own men, that they were in diſtreſſe, entred the City in perſon, to take order for their relief, and aſſurance of the place. But the darkneſſe, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, untill break of day. Then began he to make his paſſage by force, and ſo far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is ſaid, that ſeeing in that place the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in ſuch poſiture as if they had been combatant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he ſhould behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the reſcue, the diſorder and confuſion of his own men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reaſonable cauſe to have retired out of the City, though the Wolfe and Bull had been away. The tumult was ſuch, that no directions could be heard; but as ſome gave back, ſo did others thruſt forward, and the Argives preſſing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait with his own own ſword. The tops of the houſes were covered with women, that ſtood looking on the fight. Among theſe was one, that ſaw her own ſon in dangerous caſe, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore ſhe took a tile-ſtone, or ſlate, and threw it ſo violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground aſtoniſhed with the blow; and lying in that caſe, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the reſtleſſe ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith poſſeſſed the Army, the body and the children of his Enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable buriall, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his ſon; which young Prince he graciouſly ſent home into his fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the poſterity of Seleucus reigned over Aſia and Syria; and the houſe of Ptolomy had quiet poſſeſſion of Egypt: untill ſuch time as the Citie of Rome, ſwallowing all up, digeſted theſe, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD;

Intreating of the times from the ſettled rule of ALEXANDERS Succeſſors in the Eaſt, untill the ROMANS, prevailing over all, made Conqueſt of ASIA and MACEDON.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the firſt Punick War.

§. I.

A diſcuſſion of that probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have reſiſted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the Engliſh.

THat queſtion handled by Livie, Whether the great Alexander could have prevailed againſt the Romans, if after his Eaſtern conqueſt, he had bent all his forces againſt them, hath been, and is the ſubject of much diſpute; which (as it ſeems to me) the arguments on both ſides do not ſo well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his dayes. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferiour to Alexander, though to none elſe, could with ſmall ſtrength of men, and little ſtore of mony, or of other needfull helps in war, vanquiſh them in two battels, and endanger their Eſtate, when it was well ſettled, and held the beſt part of Italy, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting onely matter of employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half ſo well ſettled? It is eaſie to ſay, that Alexander had no more than thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe (as indeed, at his firſt paſſage into Aſia, he carried over not many more) and that the reſt of his followers were no better than baſe effeminate Aſiatiques. But he that conſiders the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus and Lyſimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded onely ſome fragment of this dead Emperours power, ſhall eaſily finde, that ſuch a reckoning is far ſhort of the truth.

It were needleſſe to ſpeak of Treaſure, Horſes, Elephants, Engines of battery, and the like: of all which the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick War, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting upon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practice the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceive how far too weak they would have proved in such services.

Now for helpers in War; I do not see why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in ballance against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Eastern world, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have affoorded unto the Macedonian: let us onely conjecture, how the States of Sicil and Carthage, neerest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders coming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy to them that were fain to get the help of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his own besieged City, could by adventuring to saile into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it self, in extreme hazzard; shall we think that they would have been able to withstand Alexander? But why doe I question their ability, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew neer them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forsook them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good military discipline, against the power of all Countries to them known, if they would have made resistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match; it is uneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the unfortunate: for whosoever contends with one too mighty for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke both to be overcome, and to be cast down so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might without partiality, deliver mine own opinion, and preferre that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of War, before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall alwayes, hold? Alexander was victorious in every battell that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of every war. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration; I think it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three yeers after his death, the two Roman consuls, together with all the powers of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld up their arms. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equall to his followers: that the same conceipt should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding such a controversie, me thinks it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to give such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Ardeates and Aricini, that strove about a piece of land; saying, that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman were the best Warriour? I will answer: The Englishman. For it will soon appeare to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in war, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; against no savage or unmanly people; the enemy being far superiour unto us in number, and all needfull provisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of War.

In

In what ſort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perſians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquiſhed; as likewiſe of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, againſt ſuch armes as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing ſtory of them, doth ſufficiently underſtand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very ſeldom, able to ſtand againſt the Roman armies; which were embattelled in ſo excellent a forme, as I know not whether any Nation beſides them have uſed, either before or ſince. The Roman weapons likewiſe, both offenſive and defenſive, were of greater uſe than thoſe with which any other Nation hath ſerved, before the fiery inſtruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to doe, we finde, that they which did over-match her in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons; and that they, of whom ſhe had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This alſo (as Plutarch well obſerveth) was a part of her happineſſe; that ſhe was never over-laid with two great wars at once.

Hereby it came to paſſe, that having at firſt increaſed her ſtrength by acceſſion of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, againſt which ſhe adventured her own ſelf, as it were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her ſelf Princeſſe of Latium, ſhee did afterwards by long war, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-neer oppreſſed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenary; ſo that for want of proper ſtrength, they were eaſily beaten at their own doores. The Ætolians, and with them all, or the moſt of Greece, aſſiſted her againſt Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat the ſame Ætolians. The wars againſt Antiochus, and other Aſiatiques, were ſuch as gave to Rome ſmall cauſe of boaſt, though much of joy: for thoſe oppoſites were as baſe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicil, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by uſing her aide to protect them againſt the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I ſhall not need to ſpeak of her other conqueſts: it was eaſie to get more when ſhee had gotten all this. It is not my purpoſe to diſgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemiſh the reputation of ſo many famous victories: I am not ſo idle. This I ſay; That among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the Engliſh. If my judgement ſeem over-partiall, our wars in France may help to make it good.

Firſt therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the world beſides) had never any ſo brave a Commander in war as Julius Cæſar: and that no Roman army was comparable unto that which ſerved under the ſame Cæſar. Likewiſe, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which had given faire proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian war, when it firſt entred into Gaule; was nevertheleſſe utterly diſheartned, when Cæſar led it againſt the Germans. So that we may juſtly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæſars men, to their long exerciſe, under ſo good a Leader, in ſo great a war. Now let us in generall compare with the deeds done by theſe beſt of Roman Souldiers, in their principall ſervice; the things performed in the ſame Country, by our common Engliſh Souldiers, levied in haſte, from following the Cart, or ſitting on the ſhop-ſtall: ſo ſhall we ſee the difference. Herein will we deale fairly, and beleeve Cæſar in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Hiſtorians to witneſſe, what actions were performed by the Engliſh. In Cæſars time France was inhabited by the Gaules, a ſtout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were ſubdued; even when the Romans gave them aſſiſtance. The Country of Gaule was rent in ſunder (as Cæſar witneſſeth) into many Lordſhips: ſome of which were governed by petty kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in ſuch ſort as might make it appliable to the neereſt Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not onely in general through the whole Country, but betweeen the petty States, yea in every City, and almoſt in every houſe. What greater advantage could a Conquerour deſire? Yet there was a greater. Arioviſtus, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in ſubjection, little different from meer ſlavery: yea, ſo often had the Germans prevailed in war upon the Gaules, that the Gaules, (who had ſometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themſelves no way equall to thoſe daily Invaders. Had France been ſo prepared unto our Engliſh Kings, Rome it ſelf by this time, and long ere this time, would have been ours. But when King Edward the third began his war upon France, he found the whole Country settled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no less than his puissance at home; under whose ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serve in person; at whose call the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes; finally, a King unto whom one (a) Prince gave away his Dominion, for love; (b) another sold away a goodly City and Territory for mony. The Country lying so open to the Romans and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meer vanity to match the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military vertue. Cæsar himself doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their own ignorance in the Art of war, and that their own hardinesse was overmastered by the skill of their enemies. Poor men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of battery, raised and planted against their walles, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Romans; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the skie, are commonly put to the worse by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were never able to make use of opportunity: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellowes; and sometimes driven to give or take battell upon extreame disadvantages, for fear lest their companies should fall asunder: as indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break, and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant victories. What such help? or what other worldly help, than the golden mettle of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of war? Yea, did they not think themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in arms, in horse, and in all provision, exceedingly beyond us? Let us heare what a French writer saith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set upon the Black Prince, at the battell of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, both of number, force, shew, Country and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choice of all his horsemen (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

JEAN auoit tout l'auantage par dessus EDOVARD, le nombre, la force, le lustre, le pay, le preuuge (qui n'est pas commancement une consideration de peu d'importance aux affaires du monde) & auec soy l'élite de sa Cauallerie, lors estimeela meilleure de tout son Royaume.

I think it would trouble a Roman antiquary to finde the like example in their Histories; the example I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with forty thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of half Scullions, as Livie rightly termes them, nor those cowardly Kings, Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that have read of Cressi and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alledge the battell of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, then ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Crosse-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weaknesse or sicknesse, or a sore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall he perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battell. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: but this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wan so many great battels, having no advantage to help him? I may, with beſt commendation of modeſty, referre him to the French Hiſtorian: who relating the victory of our men at Crevant, where they paſſed a bridge, in face of the enemy, uſeth theſe words: The Engliſh comes with a conquering bravery, as he that was accuſtomed to gain every-where, without any ſtay: he forceth our guard placed upon the bridge to keep the paſſage. Or I may cite another place of the ſame Author, where he tells, how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policy to apparell a thouſand and five hundred of their own men in Engliſh Caſſocks; hoping that the very ſight of the Engliſh red croſſe, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not ſtand to borrow of the French Hiſtorians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmylius, report wonders of our Nation:) the propoſition which firſt I undertook to maintain; That the military vertue of the Engliſh, prevailing againſt all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was aſſiſted with all advantages that could be deſired. If it be demanded, why then did not our Kings finiſh the conqueſt, as Cæſar had done? my anſwer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacidæ, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note; Bellipotentes ſunt magis quàm ſapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politick. Whoſo notes their proceedings, may finde, that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, ſave onely King Henry the fifth; the courſe of whoſe victories it pleaſed God to interrupt by his death. But this queſtion is the more eaſily anſwered, if another be firſt made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conqueſt of Gaule before the time of Cæſar? why not after the Macedonian war? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantians? At all theſe times they had good leiſure: and then eſpecially had they both leiſure & fit opportunity, when under the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquiſhed the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the country of Gaule had been piteouſly waſted. Surely the words of Tully were true; That with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gaules for preſervation of their own ſafety.

Therefore they attempted not the conqueſt of Gaule, untill they were Lords of all other Countries, to them known. We on the other ſide, held onely the one half of our own Iſland; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unleſſe perhaps in wealth and numbers of men ſomewhat inferiour) every way equall to our ſelves; a Nation anciently and ſtrongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemy to us. So that our danger lay both before and behinde us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a ſtronger invaſion by land, than we could make upon France, tranſporting our forces over Sea.

It is uſuall with men, that have pleaſed themſelves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Hiſtories; to hold it a great injury done to their judgement, if any take upon him, by way of compariſon, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perſwaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Iſland, hath given more noble proofe of it ſelf, than under ſo worthy a Leader, that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæſar a Monarch; ſo hereafter, by Gods bleſſing, who hath converted our greateſt hinderance, into our greateſt help, the enemy that ſhall dare to try our forces, will finde cauſe to wiſh, that avoiding us, he had rather encountred as great a puiſſance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that, laying aſide compariſons, we return to the rehearſall of deeds done: wherein we ſhall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to ſtrive with Carthage for Dominion, in the firſt Punick War.

§. II.

The eſtate of Carthage before it entred into war with Rome.

THe City of Carthage had ſtood above ſix hundred yeers, when firſt it began to contend with Rome for the maſtery of Sicil. It fore-went Rome one hundred and fifty yeers in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great atchievements, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it ſelf, from the Weſt part of Cyrene, to the ſtreights of Hercules, about one thouſand and five hundred miles in length, wherein ſtood three hundred Cities. It had ſubjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenæan Mountains, together with all the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the West of Sicil; and of Sicil the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirty yeers, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who, besides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence four hundred and seventy thousand weight of silver, which make of our mony (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world fore-shews the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeers after such time as it was cast down, the Senate of Rome caused it to be re-built: and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Gensericus the Vandal, by Belisarius under Justinian, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tied to the main by a neck of land; which passage had two miles and more of breadth (Appian saith, three miles and one furlong) by which we may be induced to beleeve the common report, that the City it self was above twenty miles in compasse; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three walls without the wall of the City; and between each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults under ground, of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: over these they had stables for four thousand horse, and Granaries for their provender. They had also lodgings in these streets, between these out-walls, for four thousand horse-men, and twenty thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline used now by those of China) never pestered the City. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa; to which Servius gives two and twenty furlongs in compasse, that make two miles and a half. This was the same piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when she got leave to buy onely so much Land of them, as she could compasse with an Oxe hide. On the West side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing pool; for a certain arm of Land, fastened to the ground, on which the City stood, stretched it self towards the West continent, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenall, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The form of their Common-weal resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Aristocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in later times usurped too great authority in their Councels. This confusion in government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelty. [a] Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one [b] half of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great offices, not upon gentle & mercifull persons, but upon those who could best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendred them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own best projects, after that good form, wherein they first conceived them, for fear lest the manner of their proceeding should be mis-interpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not onely the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad counsell had prosperous event. The faults, wherewith, in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulnesse,

b The Turks, at this day, do also take the one half of the poor mans corn, that labours the earth: yea, they take tribute both of the bodies, & of the souls of the Christians their Vassals, by bereaving them of their ablest children, & bringing them up in the Mahometan Religion. The Irish take the fourth sheaf: & were wont to eat up with their horsmen, footmen, & dogs, what they pleased, of the other three parts remaining. The husbandman and the yeoman of England, are the freest of all the World: And reason good: for of them have the bodies of our victorious Armies been compounded. And it is the free-man, and not the slave, that hath courage and the sense of shame deserved by cowardise. How free the English yeomen have been in times not long since past, Fortescue hath shewed in his praise of our countries laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than ever: and our Nobility and Gentry more servile. For, since the excessive bravery and vain expence of our Grandes hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by Inclosures, and dismembring of Manors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentry of England, have been dissolved, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little love.

neſſe, and perjury. Whether the Romans themſelves were free from the ſame crimes, let the triall be referred unto their actions. The firſt league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having been made the yeer following the expulſion of Tarquine. In that league the Carthaginians had the ſuperiority, as impoſing upon the Romans the more ſtrict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans ſhould not ſo much as have trade in ſome part of Africk, nor ſuffer any ſhip of theirs to paſſe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the fair Promontory, unleſſe it were by force of tempeſt: whereas on the other ſide, no Haven in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A ſecond league was made long after, which (howſoever it hath pleaſed Livie to ſay, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreaty) was more ſtrict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, or in the Iſland of Sardinia. Liv. Dec. 1. l. 7.

By theſe two treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the ſtate of Africk; but to countenance & uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themſelves might have the better means to occupy all Sicil, whileſt that Iſland ſhould be deſtitute of Italian ſuccours. Hereupon we finde good cauſe of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crown of gold, weighing twenty and five pound, ſent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrown. But the little ſtate of Rome prevailed faſter in Italy, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicil. For that mighty Army of three hundred thouſand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicil, wan only two Cities therein: many great fleets were devoured by tempeſts; and howſoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the aſſiſtance of their good friends out of Greece, did at ſome other time repaire their own loſſes, and take revenge upon thoſe Invaders. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicil, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Iſland in combuſtion; the eſtate of Greece being ſuch, at the ſame time, that it ſeemed impoſſible for any ſuccour to be ſent from thence. But whileſt the Carthaginians were buſie in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italy; where he made ſharp war upon the Romans. Theſe news were unpleaſing to the Carthaginians, who, being a ſubtle Nation, eaſily fore-ſaw, that the ſame buſie diſpoſition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as eaſily tranſport him over into Sicil, as ſoon as he could finiſh his Roman war. To prevent this danger, they ſent Mago Embaſſadour to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were ſorry to hear what miſadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this war with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to aſſiſt the ſtate of Rome, by ſending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needfull, againſt the Epirots. Xen. Graec. hiſt. l. 1.

It was indeed the main deſire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus ſo hardly to his work in Italy, that they might, at good leiſure, purſue their buſineſſe in Sicil: which cauſed them to make ſuch a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refuſed to accept any ſuch aid of their friends, leſt it ſhould blemiſh their reputation, and make them ſeem unable to ſtand by their own ſtrength. Yet the meſſage was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league between Rome and Carthage renued; with covenants added, concerning the preſent buſines; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it ſhould be with reſervation of liberty, to aſſiſt the other, in caſe that Pyrrhus ſhould invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithſtanding, and notwithſtanding that the ſame Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, uſing all means to ſound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occaſion, changeth his own purpoſes) yet Pyrrhus found leaſure to make a ſtep into Sicil: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor ſaver, yet he clean defeated the purpoſes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as far from any end, as when they firſt began.

So many diſaſters in an enterpriſe, that from the firſt undertaking had been ſo ſtrongly purſued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to beleeve, that an higher providence reſiſted their intendment. But their deſire of winning that fruitfull Iſland, was ſo inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they ſtill continued in hope of ſo much the greater an harveſt, by how much their coſt and pains therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their their former courses; and by force or practice, recovered in few yeers all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troup of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the power that they had to do wrong; and with perfidious cruelty, slue those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meer desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their stoutnesse. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ran all the Country round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not onely defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan upon them; yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast upon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerfull Army besieged the City. It hapned ill, that about the same time a contention began between the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeers excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policy of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemency he used at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Governour. This office he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himself within the City; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull party within the Town, and certain mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authority among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two severall parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hasted again towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former victory over the Mutiners) incountred in the plains of Mylæum, where he obtained a most signall victory, and leading with him their Commander captive into Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the severall factions dispatched Embassadours for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captain, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Town reserved for other Masters.

These news did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messana, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the

Mamertines

Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all ſides were cloſed up within Meſſana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navie at Sea, and with an Army on the one ſide of the Town, whileſt Hieron with his Syracuſians, lay before it on the other ſide.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Conſul, with an Army to the ſtreights of Sicil: which paſſing by night with notable audacity, he put himſelfe into the Town, and ſending Meſſengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; ſignifying unto them that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reaſon would not prevaile.

This meſſage was utterly neglected; And ſo began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to ſhew on which part was the juſtice of the quarrell, when ſome actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been firſt conſidered.

§. III.

The beginning of the firſt Punick war. That it was unjuſtly undertaken by the Romans.

WHen Pyrrhus began his wars in Italy, the City of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more diſtruſting the Carthaginians, as likely to ſeize upon it in that buſie time, ſought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, conſiſting of foure thouſand ſouldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and aſſured for the preſent. But after a while, this Roman Garriſon, conſidering at good leaſure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Meſſana (a City in Sicil, ſituate almoſt oppoſite to Rhegium, and no otherwſe divided than by a narrow Sea, which ſevereth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatneſſe of the booty, than the odiouſneſſe of the villany, by which it was gotten; reſolved finally, to make the like purchaſe, by taking the like wicked courſe. Confederating therefore themſelves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hoſts of Rhegium, after the ſame manner; dividing the ſpoil, and all which that State had among themſelves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly ſtained (for no Nation in the world made a more ſevere profeſſion of juſtice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatneſſe) reſolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed ſhortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithſtanding that thoſe Romans in Rhegium (as men for the fouleneſſe of their fact, hopeleſſe of pardon) defended themſelves with an obſtinate reſolution: yet in the end, the aſſailants forced them; and thoſe which eſcaped the preſent fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the uſuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the cuſtome of the country, they had their heads ſtricken from their ſhoulders, and the people of Rhegium were again reſtored to their former liberty and eſtates.

This execution of Juſtice being newly performed, and the fame thereof ſounding honourably through all quarters of Italy: meſſengers came to Rome from Meſſana, deſiring help againſt the Carthaginians, and Syracuſians, that were in a readineſſe to inflict the like puniſhment upon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent requeſt it was, which they made: who having both given example of that villanny to the Roman Souldiers, and helpen them with joynt forces to make it good, doe intreat the Judges to give them that aſſiſtance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-theeves.

The Romans could not ſuddenly reſolve, whether the way of honeſty or of profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They conſidered, how contrary the courſe of ſuccouring the Mamertines was to their former counſels and actions: ſeeing for the ſame offences they had lately put to torment, and to the ſword, their own Souldiers, and reſtored the oppreſſed to their liberty. Yet when they beheld the deſcription of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the beſt part of Aſrica, of the Mediterran Iſlands, of a great part of Spaine, and ſome part of Sicil it ſelf; whileſt alſo they feared, that Syracuſe therein therein seated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferiour to Carthage, and far superiour to Rome it self) might become theirs; the safety of their own estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despaire by the Romans) should deliver up Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage and the Lordship of Sicil: for Syracuse it self could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not onely debarre all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicil; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatned from a-far, did so prevail above all regard of honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatcht away for Messana: into which he entred, and undertook the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and lesse moved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiffe metall of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected sally, to surprise his trenches) arranged his men in order of battell, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazzarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no triall; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the dayes of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it self must have sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stock, which it behooved him to governe well: such another losse would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both field and camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this war; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprise was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnesse; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themſelves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diſtreſſed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde how the meſſengers of thoſe folk, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any ſuch ſurrendry in the publick name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull ſurrendry of themſelves and their poſſeſſions, were become ſubject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans aſſiſt the Mamertines, againſt their moſt ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes, againſt the Samnites, without the ſame condition? which was (as they themſelves confeſſed) by none at all. But let it be ſuppoſed, that ſome point ſerving to cleare this doubt, is loſt in all Hiſtories. Doubtleſſe it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeves, Out-laws, Murderers, or ſuch other Malefactors, can by any good ſucceſſe of their villany, obtain the priviledge of civill ſocieties, to make league or truce; yea, or to require fair war: but are by all means, as moſt pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintain that opinion of ſome Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of theſe; it were a Poſition of ill conſequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to ſuch as theſe, as long as any other is uſing the ſword of vengeance againſt them, without becoming acceſſary to their crimes. Wherefore we may eſteem this action of the Romans ſo far from being juſtifiable, by any pretence of Confederacy made with them; as that contrariwiſe, by admitting this neſt of Murderers and Theeves into their protection, they juſtly deſerved to be warred upon themſelves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Meſſana had been taken, and the Mamertines all ſlain, ere any newes of the Confederacy had been brought unto the beſiegers. The great Alexander was ſo far perſwaded herein; that he did put to ſword all the Branchidæ (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their City, notwithſtanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; becauſe they were deſcended from a company of Mileſians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Country, which theſe of their poſterity enjoyed. Nevertheleſſe, in courſe of humane juſtice, long and peaceable poſſeſſion gives jus acquiſitum, a kinde of right by preſcription unto that which was firſt obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the deſcendants from the crime of their Anceſtors, whoſe villanies they doe not exerciſe. But that the ſame generation of Theeves, which by a deteſtable fact hath purchaſed a rich Town, ſhould be acknowledged a lawfull company of Citizens, there is no ſhew of right. For even the Conqueror that by open War obtaineth a Kingdom, doth not confirme his title, by thoſe victories which gave him firſt poſſeſſion: but length of time is requiſite to eſtabliſh him, unleſſe by ſome alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime, as did our King Henry the firſt, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironſide. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had ſo good) of juſtice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her ſelf, in the time of her viſitation, was burnt to the ground.

§. IV.
Of the Iſland of Sicil.

†. I.
The quality of the Iſland: and the firſt inhabitants thereof.

THE defence of the Mamertines, or the poſſeſſion of Meſſana, being now no longer ſince the firſt victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like caſes we have obſerved, to make a brief collection of things concerning that noble Iſland, which hath been the ſtage of many great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this preſent War.

That

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adjoyning to Italy, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neer unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest severed from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this Plin.l.2.c.91. Sil.l.5. division happened, there is no memoriall remaining in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionysius affirme, that it was caused by an earth-quake; Silius and Cassiodorus doe think it to have been done by the rage and violence of the tide, and surges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubœa severed from Bœotia; Atalante and Macris from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Brittain it self (as may seem by Verstigans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in favour of Jocastus, the son of Æolus, divided it from the maine land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Demie-Isle; that by that means he might the more safely inhabit, and Orion.l.4.c.14. Diod.l.5. Ovid.de Fast.4. possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sundring it from Italy, to Orion: who that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibralter.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantity and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Island, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greek, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corn: to Proserpina, not so much for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as soon as she, uncovering her self, first shewed her self to be seen of him, gave her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertility and riches of this Country, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granary and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the Store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was a well-furnished treasure. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath usually clothed, maintained and furnished our greatest armies Strabo l.6. with leather, apparrell and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoever Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the sun, and temperature of the aire, or by the industry and labour of man, it is accounted next unto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely over-grown with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields neer unto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Island, wheat doth grow of it self without any labour or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it six Colonies, and sixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authors.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Island, as well in peace as War, there be many other things which have made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the ravishing of Proserpina; the Giant Encelladus; the mount Ætna, Scylla and Charybdis, with other antiquities and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician, Archimedes, the famous Geometrician, Euclides, the painfull Historian Diodorus, and Empedocles, the deep Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants, Læstriogones and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and uncivill; all histories and fables do jointly with one consent averre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these savage people dwelt onely in one part of the Island. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some so think) Thucydides and Diodorus doe very constantly avouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelasgi from their own seats, & finding no place upon the Continent, which they were able to master master and inhabite, passed over into this Iland, three hundred years before the Greeks sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eighty years before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making war upon the Sicani, drave them from the East and Northene part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the City Zancle, afterward called Messana; and after that, Catana, Leontine, and Syracuse it self, beating from thence the Aetolians, who long before had set up a Town in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not known, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) won that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Aetolians thereof, but some hundred years after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named with Nea, Hybla, Trinacria, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sat down in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgantum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civill war greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we find the last voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Crete. Thucydides, an Historian of unquestionable sincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such business, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dædalus. The tale goes thus: Dædalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil, to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neer unto Megara, for Cocalus to lay up his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ram in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which he did with so great Art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own strength, promiseth to deliver Dædalus. This he performes not, but in the mean while, kils Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabit a part of Sicil; the better (as it seems) to strengthen himself against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their consent, and builded for themselves the City of Minoa after the name of the King Minos. After, they likewise built the Town of Engium, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the war of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos served with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by treason been made away; they gathered together a great Army, to invade Cocalus: and landing neer unto Camicus, they besieged the same five years, but in vain. In the end (being forced to returne, without any revenge taken) they were rackt on the coast of Italy, and having no means to repair their ships, nor the honour they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between the two famous Ports of Brundusium and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Iapyges and Messapii.

After the taking of Troy, Egestas and Elymus, brought with them certain troups into Sicil, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Egesta and Elyma.

It is said, that Æneas visited these places in his passage into Italy: and that some of the Trojans, his followers, were left behind him, in these Towns of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Æneas himself the founder.

About the same time, the Phœnicians seized upon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybæum, and upon certain small Isles adjoyning to the main Iland: which they fortified, to secure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East-India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambique, & other places. But the Phœnicians stayed not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly City of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seem strange to the Reader, that in all ancient stories, he findes one and the same beginning of Nations, after the floud; & that the first planters of all parts of the World were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Egypt, Lybia and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions had Giants for their first inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones & Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moses make us know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountains and Desarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, S. Augustine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vesputius, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported that himself hath seen the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the self-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicity of life, their mean fare, their feeding on acorns and roots, their poor cottages, the covering of their bodies with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages over great Rivers and Arms of the Sea, upon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats first of twigs and leather, then of wood; first with Oares, and then with Sail; that they esteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandry, of Lawes, and of Policy: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newnesse of time, which we call Ola time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrewes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they began, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophy Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression.

Tertul. de Resurr. August. de Civit. Dei lib. 15. Et quæst. in Gen. Nicep. lib. 2. c. 37. Procop. lib. 2. de Bello Goth. Plin. lib. 7. cap. 2.

But it is certain, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancy. For we have now greater Giants for vice and injustice, than the World had in those dayes, for bodily strength; for cottages, and houses of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of stones; we carve them, we paint them, and adorn them with gold, insomuch as men are rather known by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the covering of our bodies with the skins of beasts, not only to silk and gold, but to the very skins of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excess, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque auxit, longissima subruet: Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall overthrow it.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicill.

WHen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicill: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greek, being driven upon that coast by an Easterly wind, and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his discovery, & proposed unto them the benefit of this easie conquest offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himself in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needy and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the City of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our Westerne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupy the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicill, neer unto that City, called called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part only was then compassed with a wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nasos; the Latines Insula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country: and after a few years, their multitude increasing, they added unto the City of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis, So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertil ty of the soyle, Syracuse grew up in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the world. In short time the Greeks did possesse the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in Trinacia.

Some seven years after the arrivall of Archias, the Chalcidians, encouraged by the successe of the Corinthians, did assail, & obtain the city of Leontium, built and possest by the Siculi. In brief, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Associates, the cities of Catana and Hybla, which in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About 45. years after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus, and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight year after, did erect that magnificent and renowned city of Agrigentum, governed according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their plantation, did set up the city of Acra, in the Mountains; and in the ninetieth year Casmena, in the Plains adjoyning; and agin in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina: and soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Siculi the city of Zancle, which they had founded in the straight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle had been the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorieus the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the same were again ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their own Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest cities in this Iland.

* Syracuse, as Cicero relates, was the greatest, & most goodly City of all that the Greeks possest. For the situation is both strong, & of an excellent prospect from every entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port was (for the most part) environed with beautifull buildings: and that part which was without the City, was on both sides banked up, and sustained with beautifull wals of Marble. The city it selfe was one of the greatest of the world: for it had in compasse (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs, which make of our miles about 18. It was compounded of foure Cities, (Strabo saith, of five) to wit, Insula, Acradina, Tycha, & Neapolis: of which greatness the ruines & foundations of the wals do yet witnesse. After such time as the Dores of Peloponnesus had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly city for a long time became the seat of Tyrants. The first whereof was Gela: The second, Hiero the elder: the third, Thrasybulus: the fourth and fift, Dionysius the elder, & younger: the sixt, Dion; the seventh Agathocles: the eighth, Pyrrhus; the ninth, Hiero the younger; the tenth & last, Hieronymus, who being slain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

†. III.

Of the Government and affairs of Sicil, before Dionysius his tyranny.

THe most part of the cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to usurp the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of brasse, wherein to include men, and scorch them to death: praising the device with this commendation; That the noise of one tormented therein, should be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Inventer; by causing the first tryall to be made upon himself. He reigned one and thirty years, saith Eusebius; others give him but sixteen: Howsoever it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the government of the Common-weale: at which time also Panætius made himself Lord of Leontium, & Cleander of Gela: but Cleander having ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his room, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers others of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made war with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Camerina. But when he had reigned seven years, he was slain in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of government, from Popular to Aristocratical; a preparation towards a principality, whereinto it was soon after changed.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former war, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, between the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Army to the succour of the governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change happened in the second year of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himself, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agrigentum.

Paus. lib.6.

Now this Gelon, the son of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus: to the first of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moved a war against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought unto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossest Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrown by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

Herod. & Dio.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge army past the Hellespont. He, for their relief having armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So he used to their Embassadours only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greek Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great loss received, fearing the invasion of their owne Country, sent to Gelon by their Embassadours, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talents of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for war, they sent unto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crown, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The wars ended, & Sicil in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his successour his brother Hiero. Philistus and Pliny report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dog of his, which alwayes waited on him, ran into the fire, and suffered himself to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, covetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as he sought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Divers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Grecians, against him. He also overthrew in battail Thrasydæus, the son of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines to their former liberty. But in the end, he lost the love of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasybulus, who became a most unjust and bloudy Tyrant. Thrasybulus injoyed his Principality no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force force of mercenary Souldiers; which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuſe by the Citizens; to whom, being beſieged in Acradina, he reſtored the government, and was baniſhed the Iland. From whence he ſailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracuſians recovered again their former liberty, as all the reſt of the Cities did, after which they had never ſought, had the Succeſſors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuſe. For in all changes of Eſtates, the preſervation ought to anſwer the acquiſition. Where a liberall, valiant, and adviſed Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himſelfe from being a private man, to the dignity of a Prince, it behoveth the Succeſſour to maintain it by the ſame way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuſe (though not without blowes, ere that ſhe could cleanſe her ſelfe of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now againe become Miſtreſſe of her ſelfe, and held her ſelfe free, well-neer threeſcore years, to the time of Dionyſius, though ſhe were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatneſſe of any one among them, for the future, they deviſed a kind of baniſhment of ſuch among them, as were ſuſpected; taking patterne from the Athenian Oſtraciſme. They called this their new deviſed judgement of exile, Petaliſmus, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive leafe (as at Athens they wrote upon ſhels) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had moſt ſuffrages againſt him, was baniſhed for five years. Hereby in a ſhort time, it came to paſſe that thoſe of judgement, and beſt able to governe the Common-weale, were by the worſt able, either ſuppreſt, or thruſt out of the City. Yea, ſuch as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themſelves as ſecretly as they could, ſeeking ſome place of more ſecurity, wherein to maintain themſelves. And good reaſon they had ſo to do; ſeeing that there is nothing ſo terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law laſted not very long. For their neceſſity taught them to aboliſh it, and reſtore againe the wiſer ſort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practiſed to baniſh one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and ſome other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrowne the Army of the Agragentines) the Syracuſians ſent forces againſt him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their captain made nothing ſo much haſt to finde out Ducetius, againſt whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Army, he led, as ſoone as Ducetius preſented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greateſt number of the Syracuſians periſhed.

But making better choice among thoſe whom they had baniſhed, they levie other troups: by whom, in concluſion, Ducetius being beaten, ſubmitteth himſelfe, and is conſtrained to leave the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-ſide.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a ſort acknowledge Syracuſe: Trinacria excepted; which alſo by force of armes, in the fourſcore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reaſon.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, ſeek aid from the Athenians, about the ſixt year of the Peloponneſian Warre. In this ſuit they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to ſuccour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charœades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with ſome ſupplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracuſians, and their partiſans; wanne and loſt divers places; took Meſſana; and, in the ſeventh year of the Peloponneſian Warre, loſt it again. They alſo at the ſame time, attempted Hymera, but in vain. The fire of this quarrell took hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themſelves on all hands, and yet could ſee none iſſue of the war, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracuſians, and were admitted admitted into their ſociety, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themſelves in Sicil, by the diviſion and civill war, were diſappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cuſtome of popular Eſtates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they baniſhed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, & laid an heavy fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the moſt memorable war, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, againſt the Selinuntines and Syracuſians, in favour of the Cities of Egeſta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppreſt the Egeſtans; and they of Syracuſe the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the war. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aid from Lacedemon was ſent to the Syracuſians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their owne Tribe, that craved their ſuccour, being in diſtreſſe. The Athenians ſcarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were ſo great, as diſcovered their intent to be none other, than the conqueſt of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were ſo blinded with their own paſſions, that they would not beleeve their owne eyes; which preſented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the city of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatneſs of the enterpriſe, but the neceſſity of finiſhing it in a ſhort ſpace of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already been ſhewed in due place) ſtood at that time in ſuch broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open war. wherefore it was thought neceſſary, either to ſpare coſt in this great expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by wars at home, if their proceedings were ſlack abroad. And ſurely, had not the deſire of the Athenians been over-paſſionate, the arguments of Nicias had cauſed them to abſtain from ſo chargeable a buſineſs, and to reſerve their forces for a more needfull uſe. But young counſels prevailed againſt the authority of ancient men, that were more regardfull of ſafety than of honour.

Of this buſineſs, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponneſian war. But what was there delivered in generall termes, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwiſe than by conſequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to have felt a great converſion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed againſt Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

Theſe had commiſſion and direction, as wel to ſuccour the Segeſtans, & to re-eſtabliſh the Leontines, caſt out of their places by the Syracuſians; as alſo by force of armes, to ſubject the Syracuſians, and all their adherents in Sicil, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their ſupream Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were ſent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thouſand one hundred Souldiers, beſides the thirty ſhips of burden, which tranſported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the war: and theſe were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, beſides theſe, ſix thouſand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horſemen.

Thucyd. l.6.c.9. With theſe troups & fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuſe to give them entry; but ſell them victuals for their money. From thence they ſent to the Egeſtans, to know what treaſure they would contribute towards the war, ſeeing for their ſakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their anſwers, that theſe Egeſtans were poor, and that they had abuſed the Athenian Embaſſadours with falſe ſhewes of gold, having in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were diſcouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refuſed to truſt them within their Wals. Hereupon Nicias adviſeth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perſwade them to an agreement with the Egeſtans; as likewiſe to ſee what diſburſements the Egeſtans could make; and ſo returne again into Greece, and not to waſte Athens in a needleſſe war. Alcibiades, on the other ſide, would ſolicite the cities of Sicil to confederacy againſt the Syracuſians & Selinuntines, whereby to force them unto reſtitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he perſwades them to aſſail Syracuſe it ſelf, before it were prepared againſt them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they ſurpriſe Catana: and there they take new counſell how to proceed. Thence they imployed Nicias to thoſe of Egeſta, who received from them thirty talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twenty talents more there were of the ſpoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus the Summer being ſpent in idle conſultations, and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to aſſail Syracuſe. But Alcibiades having been accuſed at home, in his abſence, was ſent for back by the Athenians to make his anſwer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. Theſe Commanders obtain a landing place very neer unto Syracuſe, by this device.

They imploy to Syracuſe an inhabitant of Catana, whom they truſt; and inſtruct him; to promiſe unto the Syracuſians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracuſians draw thitherward with their beſt forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, ſetting ſail from Catana, arrive at Syracuſe, where they land at fair eaſe, and fortifie themſelves againſt the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracuſians had the loſs: but the Athenians, wanting horſe, could not purſue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themſelves, with a reſolution to refreſh their Army at Catana, for the winter-ſeaſon. From thence they made an attempt upon Meſſana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had diſcovered ſuch as were Traitors within the City to the Meſſanians. This he now did, in deſpight of his own Citizens, the Athenians; becauſe they had recalled him from his command, with a purpoſe either to have put him to death, or to have baniſhed him: whereof being aſſured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedæmonians, and to them he gave miſchievous counſell againſt his country. While this winter yet laſted, the Syracuſians ſend Embaſſadors to Lacedæmon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewiſe the Athenian Captains in Sicil, ſend to Athens for ſupplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the ſpring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponneſian war) the Athenians in Sicil ſail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forſaken of the Inhabitants; from whence, for raging the Country, they obtain ſome ſmall victories over the ſtraggling Syracuſians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a ſupply of two hundred men at arms, but without horſe, which they hoped to furniſh in the Iland from the Segeſtans, and other their adherents: they were alſo ſtrengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neer Syracuſe, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracuſians, that ſallyed to impeach their intrenchments. They alſo received from their Confederates four hundred horſe-men, with two hundred other horſe, to mount their men at arms. Syracuſe was now in effect blockt up, ſo as hardly any ſuccours could enter, but ſuch as were able to force their paſſage: yet the Athenians receive divers loſſes; among which it was not the leaſt, that Lamachus, one of their beſt Commanders, was ſlain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Python, with the Lacedæmonian & Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; ſo that with theſe and his own troups, Gylippus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuſe. The Syracuſians ſend a part of their forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrivall neer unto the City upon a place of advantage. At the firſt encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reaſon that the Syracuſian horſe-men could not come to fight in thoſe ſtraights: but ſoon after, Gylippus charging them again, brake them, and conſtrained Nicias to fortifie himſelfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the ſtate of his affairs known, by his letters to the Athenians; ſhewing, that without great ſupplies by Sea and Land, the enterpriſe would be loſt, together with the ſmall Army remaining. Theſe letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demoſthenes, to joyne with Nicias: the one they diſpatch preſently with ſome ſupplies; the other they ſend after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuſe, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, neer unto Syracuse, the Promontory called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacademonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicil, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The losse between them was in effect equall; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with threescore and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmen; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracusians the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great loss. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrivall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe caused them to defer their departure. But this superstition cost them dear. For the Syracusians, Lacedamonians, and Corinthians, with threescore and seventeen saile of Gallies, entred the great Poet of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, & whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port encountred them with fourscore and six Gailies, commanded by Eurymedon: in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians received the more loss by land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by sea, in which kinde they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylippus, to the Syracusians; When any people doe finde themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselves that they exceed all others, they not only lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunk and wrackt, had seventeen taken, and possest by the enemy: and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisado, in one corner of the port, unadvisedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thrust ships into a straight room and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plain field against horse; the one subsisting by being at large, the other by close imbattailing.

The Syracusians, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels; which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusian fleet; which lay but single, because they were forc't to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laid behind them again certain ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunk; or the chain, which joyned them to their fellowes, broken, the Athenians might yet finde themselves, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to break through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and fury. For where the way of any vessell, using oare or sailes, is broken, and their speed foreslowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an invincible resolution they could make their way, and break downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they re-

ſolve to hazard, with all their ſhipping (to the number of one hundred & ten, of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albe t ſome few of them had broken through the chains, yet being ſtopt with the ſhips without, and aſſailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracuſians, which were purpoſely left at large in the ſea, they were either taken or ſunk. Three great diſadvantages the Athenians had: the firſt, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a ſtraight, they had no room to turn themſelves, nor to free themſelves one from another, being intangled; the ſecond, that having overpeſtered their Gallies with Souldiers, who uſed offenſive arms of darts and ſlings, they had not place upon the decks to ſtretch their arms; the third was, the diſcomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paſſage, by which they might ſave themſelves by running away. To be ſhort, the fight was no leſs terrible than the confuſion: the ſlaughter great on all ſides; and the noiſe, and the cryes, ſo lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as ſurvived, were beaten back to the Land, with loſs of threeſcore of their Gallies, broken, ſunk, or abandoned. The Syracuſians did alſo loſe twenty of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The reſt of the Athenian Gallies, running themſelves into the bottome of the Port, ſaved themſelves by the help and countenance of the Land-army there fortified. In this deſperate eſtate, the Athenian Commanders go to counſell. Demoſthenes perſwades them to furniſh with freſh Souldiers thoſe few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracuſians were triumphing, and made ſecure by their preſent victory, to ſet upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athens. This was no ill counſell. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greateſt number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the ſpeedy proſecution of a beaten enemy; ſo might we produce many examples of thoſe, who, having ſlept ſecurely in the boſome of good ſucceſs, have been ſuddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby loſt again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias oppoſeth the advice of Demoſthenes: Others ſay, that the Sea-men were againſt it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all reſolve to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till ſome more favourable fortune ſhould call them thence. On the other ſide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracuſians to put themſelves preſently into the field, and to ſtop all the paſſages, leading to thoſe Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the preſent. Which humour in ſome of our Commanders at Cadez, loſt us both the Indian fleet, and the ſpoiles of many other neighbour places. Hermocrates, the Syracuſian, finding it a loſt labour, to perſwade his Countrimen to any haſty proſecution, deviſed this good ſtratagem, whereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he ſhould draw them willingly out. He ſent two or three horſe-men out of Syracuſe by night, willing them to find Nicias, and (after they had aſſured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away overhaſtily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracuſians had lodged their Army, which could not long ſtay there, upon the paſſages and places of advantage, leading towards the cities of their Allies. Theſe tidings Nicias eaſily beleeved, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the moſt part) more fearfull than wiſe; and to them, every thiſtle in the field, appears, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and purſued with the lamentable out-cries of thoſe that were ſick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies ſwords. The reſt march away, to the number of forty thouſand; and make their firſt paſſage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of their enemies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracuſian horſe-men, beaten in from forraging and proviſion of food, they grow weak and heartleſs. The Syracuſians alſo poſſeſs the Mountain Lepas, by which they were to paſs towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coaſt, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard ſhifts they made, in difficult paſſages, and blinde marches by night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vaunt-guard; and Demosthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leaving Demosthenes to make the retrait: who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies far worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Army of Demosthenes being dissolved, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken, upon the passage of the River Assinarus, rendred himself to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a Noble Enemy to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Army, dissuaded the rest, by all the art he had, for using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruell and cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: which took end at the River Assinarus, the four and twentieth day of May, in the fourscore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late war had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought help from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their City, as their vassals. The Carthagians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Diminion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, and their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appear by what is past. In the end the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should think meet to allow them. The Syracusians approved the motion; for it tended to their own honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a business that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imployment, that he might take revenge as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them having been slain by the Himerans, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of arms, sackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place, where Amilcar was slain, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracusian forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so far prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meer vertue, at such time as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians, in their war against Athens; wherein he did great service. All the honester sort within Syracuse were sorry for their injury done unto him, and sought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himself, returning into Sicil, gathered an Army of six thousand; with which he began to repair Selinus; & by many noble actions laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherfore he was advised to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends within the Towne, might have the better means to rise against the adverse party. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to arms, and set upon him; in which conflict he was slain. But his Son-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them wish Hermocrates alive again.

†. IV.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

THe Syracusians had enjoyed their liberty about threescore years, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty toward strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their own best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the principality of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it self. For, being made Prator, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himselfe so well, that he got a generall love among the people, and men of war. Then began he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of six hundred men, to defend his person: under pretence, that his private enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had layed plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would incourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himself. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had been banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards, at his devotion, as obliged unto him by so great a benefit. His first favour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to reign over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as fetters imprisoning their liberty, the bars that held it under safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the City to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but five and twenty years of age when he obtained it: belike it was his desire to reign long. His first work, of making himself absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadel, wherin was much good provision, and under it the Gallies were mored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himself without all shame or fear. The Army, the chief Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needy sort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-towns, bound unto him, either for his help in war, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present, were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Cittadell into his hands, he needed no more, save to assure what he had already. He strengthened himself by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparinus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse; which bare unto him many children, that served to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (envying his prosperity) incited the multitude, and took armes against him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians wast all, that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to help them: there they forced his Palace, ransacked sacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the grief thereof she poisoned her self. But he followed their heels apace; and firing a Gate of the City by night, entred soon enough to take revenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his known, no not his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, unstript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people that ever reigned in any State, and withall the most unrespectively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the City, called the Iland, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his Treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make war upon the free Cities of Sicil: but while he lay before Herbesse, an in-land Town, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the City, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he again recovered the mastery over the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their harvest, he disarmed all the Towns-men remaining, and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threescore thousand labourers, he finished within three weeks, being two leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies; and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with fourteen thousand corslets; and all other sutable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly infeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns, which they held in Sicil, he would make war upon them: and, not staying for answer, he took the spoil of all the Phœnician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the war in our late Queens time. He then goes to the field with fourscore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Towns which held for Carthage yeelded unto him; saving Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyra, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Army, by a sally of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives; but, ere he took land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fifty ships of war, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, he recovered again Motya upon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messana, he took Lypara, and (soon after) Messana, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and he himself took the field again, with four and thirty thousand foot; and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over-land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slain, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; That one City should be able to furnish five hundred sail of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this war) and more strange it is, that in a battail at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should be slain in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we hear of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charles the fift went to besiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fifty sail of ships, and threescore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought help from all the Cities and ports of Spain, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, upon extremity, as many as were needfull, of all that could bear armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeed, is it often requisite. Upon this overthrow, Dionysius postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco followes him, and besiegeth the Town by Land and Sea. But the having received aid from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himself to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens, who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sink four. Hereupon, finding their own successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands, they consult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding advantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent among the Carthaginians, as it is said, that above an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having slain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great sum of money; on condition, that he should steal away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing have I noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monsieur de Piles, was very suitable to this treachery, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendred S. John d' Angelie to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. He rendred it, upon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himself, of the Duke of Anjou his brother, Generall of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set upon and broken in his March; spoiled of all that he had, and forced to save his life by flight; leaving the most of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with ensigns displaid, and withall his goods and provisions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore seem strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victory, took care to re-edifie Messena. Mago, who stayed in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourscore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago, but these take egges for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, overcame, and gave their City to his mercenary Souldiers.

He then past into Italy, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourscore thousand crowns, to furnish him with threescore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future observance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to perform unto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want victuall for his Army, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantity at his comming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusall the cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aid him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reign, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobility upon him for a wife; they answered, that they had not any one fit for him, save the Hang-mans daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgave many sharp swords, but never any sharp tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errours.

and certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to apprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publick.

It is said, that Henry the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, that he used against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracy with the Spaniard or Savoyan: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, & drawn their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir John Parret used of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfeit letter of the Romish Priest produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than he, that thereby ran the same, and a worse fortune, soon after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. He assaulted their Town on all sides, which he continued to doe eleven moneths, till he won it by force. He used his victory without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it. 10

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this City; and those with variable successe. For, as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the son of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptines, with fourteen thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prosperity and Adversity, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirty years, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gave order to have him slain, or sold for a slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his cruelty, The hate of evill men; and his lawless slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of vermine, which poyson all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valianteſt men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and, as our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love her own. 20

To this Dionysius his son of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdome and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himself the peoples affections; he cast off the sheeps skin, and put on that of the wolf. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himself, he caused them all to be slain; and all the kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched. 30

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sons and two Daughters: of which the elder, called Sophrosine, he gave in marriage to his eldest son, and her half-brother Dionysius; the younger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death Dion took her to wife, being his Neece. 40

This Dion, a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly given over to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the young King. And having perswaded the King to entertain him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyranny into Monarchy; and to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the love of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions severity, wrought him out of the Tyrants favour, and caused him soon after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great fear; or (at least) if they refused it to furnish him with fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the war against them: his enemies 50

found means, by sinister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his mind, and to make him neglect his owne affairs, by the study of Philosophy; whilest Dion in the mean time having furnished fifty Gallies, under colour of the Kings service, had it in his own power either to deliver to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Soveraign of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which he made, to serve the King with so great a preparation, at his own charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had served the King for none other end than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already been raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to stile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his own people, of whose spoiles they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West-Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himself above him; and to have it said, that what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first to send him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his movables, at his own pleasure: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleased to live well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seek the restitution of his Countrey to liberty. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberality, had purchased much love in Greece. This love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose help he might returne into Sicil. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carryed the matter closely) to follow him in his adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuse, entred the City without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, save the Citadell.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy, but he quickly had advertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vain treaties of peace, and some forcible attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the Custody of Apollocrates his eldest Sonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries liberty, had the same reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the City. He retired himselfe to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuse, new troups enter the Castle: they sally out, assail, spoyle, and burn a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle sally again, with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Countrey surmounting all the injuries that he had received. He sets upon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had wel-near burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father, into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For he was soone after his victory, murdered by Gylippus; who after he had, with ill successe, a while governed Syracuse, was slain with the same Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten years after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recovers his estate, and returnes to Syracuse, driving Nysæus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius, but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their City. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the businesse. He tels them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land an Army in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more inraged than disswaded, sent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies, to deliver Syracuse from tyranny. In the mean while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himself a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to inlarge his power, than how to deliver his Countrey. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to return his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captains advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himself over-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliver unto him those arguments, for his return, which they had used to him in private; that he might, by publick testimony, discharge himself to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loss, and far more easie, than that of many blowes, and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and having set sail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governor. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprising Icetes his Army, he slew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adranitans joyned with him, and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld up himself, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within fifty daies after his arrivall, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still invaded by the armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vain) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send unto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are stayed in Italy by foule weather. Icetes is strengthned with threescore thousand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fifty Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the wals of that City. With this great Army Icetes assaileth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes do therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and took that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched toward Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes

being

being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for fear of further punishment he hanged himself. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feed on the grass growing in the market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for people to re-inhabit it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storm ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybæum, with threescore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the passage of a River.

A tempest of rain, hail, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, ten thousand slain, five thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand corslets guilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, & following his victory, took him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wives & daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife, and a young child of his, with Aristomache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He again prevailed against Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it self. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the town; delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition that they should not passe the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buryed by them in the Market-place of their City: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyranny of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the Inhabitants enjoyed their liberty in peace, about twenty years. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safety; and the Labouring men enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to govern them; should any long time subsist.

Twenty years after the death of Timoleon, there started up one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition, who from a Begger, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captain; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor; finally, became Lord and Soveraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the principality. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their wars against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable service: and on the contrary, as memorable service for the Murgantines against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so straightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himself and the Syracusians; binding himself by promise and oath to remain a friend and servant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilcar entertained the business, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertains five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poor and discontented Syracusians (the City also being divided into many factions) he assails the Senators, kils all his enemies and opposites; divides the ſpoile of the rich among the poor; and gives liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to raviſh, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and ſtrewed the ſtreets with ten thouſand dead carkaſſes, beſides thoſe that had broken their necks over the wals; their fury had no further ſubject to work on.

Agathocles, in an aſſembly of the people (being an eloquent knave) perſwaded them, that, for the violent ſickneſs, by which the commonwealth was utterly conſumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies which he had adminiſtred; and that he affected no other thing than the reducing of the ſtate from an Oligarchy, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magiſtrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democraty, by which it had been governed, from the firſt inſtitution, with ſo great glory and proſperity. This he did, to have the Crown clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as he knew that he had left none living, within the City, fit, nor able, to exerciſe the office of a Magiſtrate: ſo knew he right well, that all they which had aſſiſted in the murder and ſpoil of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the ſupport of a lawleſs Lord, who had been partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again ſaluting and adoring him, by that name, as if it had been given to him by ſome lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of baſe, the other of Kingly parents; the one took liberty from a common-weal, the other ſought only to ſucceed in a Monarchy; the one continued his cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, ſought, by making good lawes, to recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by Juſtine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the ſumme whereof is this. The ſame Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuſe, and that had lent him five thouſand men to help in the maſſacre of the Citizens, was alſo content to wink at many wrongs, that he did unto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpoſe of Amilcar, to ſettle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vexe and waſt the whole Iland: becauſe it was thereby like to come to paſs, that he ſhould reduce all Sicil into ſuch terms as would make it become an eaſie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, ſent their Embaſſadours, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (ſo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meer falſhood) ſhewed it ſelf very honourable in taking order for the redreſs. Embaſſadours were ſent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captain appointed to ſucceed in his charge, with ſuch forces, as might compell Agathocles to reaſon, if otherwiſe he would not hearken to it. All this tended to ſave their Confederates, from ſuffering ſuch injuries in the future. For that which was paſt (ſince it could not be recalled) they took order to have it ſeverely puniſhed. Amilcar was accuſed ſecretly, and by way of ſcrutiny: the ſuffrages being given, but not calculated; and ſo reſerved untill he ſhould return. This was not ſo cloſely handled, but that Amilcar had ſoon notice of it. In managing his buſineſs with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made ſuch a compoſition with the Syracuſian, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelf, both in power and authority, even againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtome of thoſe, that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices, thinking to deal ſubtlely and finely, they ſpin their threads ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar ſaw, that his Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deal ſubſtantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into ſo much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which ſome of his foregoers had taught him; and, for fear of ſuch a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerved to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolved to get the ſtart of them in action. He diſſembled no longer; but, in ſtead of ſpoile and robbery, made open war upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his own, ere the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to have incountred an ill-eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them ſharp entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Navie was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their buſineſs undone, and returne into Africk.

Carthaginian

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furniſhed, was broken by foule weather; and the beſt part of it caſt away, even whileſt it was yet within kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the ſon of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of his ſhip-wrack, was bold to paſſe over into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was ſoon ready to examine the cauſe of their comming. Many skirmiſhes paſſed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſſe begat preſumption; whereby he loſt a battell more important than all the other fights. One adverſe chance is enough to overthrow the ſtate of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumſpection. The war was ſoon transferred to the wals of Syracuſe; within which Agathocles was cloſed up, and driven to make his laſt defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great Maſſacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the moſt part) ſuch, as had been either mercinary Souldiers, infranchiſed ſlaves, or baſe and needy people; helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent Government, and Executioners of the murders, and ſpoyle committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerved, and (withall) ſo fearfull, that they durſt not ſtir. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and inforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſity Agathocles adventured upon a ſtrange courſe, which the event commended as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in thoſe veſſels that rode in the Haven; and committing the government of the City to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himſelf of a mean, both to raiſe the ſiege, and to repair all other loſſes. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keep the beſieged from iſſuing forth.

Now, at ſuch time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertiſement came, that many ſhips of burden, laden with corn, and other proviſions, were drawing neer unto Syracuſe. To intercept theſe the Carthaginians hoiſe ſail, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles, iſſuing forth of the Port, with purpoſe (as they thought) to give convoy unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amain toward him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the City, but made all ſpeed towards Africk; and was purſued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean ſeaſon the victuallers were gotten to Syracuſe; which was the more plentifully relieved by their comming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no ſmall number. When the Carthaginian admirall perceived, firſt, that by purſuing two fleets at once, he had miſſed of them both; and ſecondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to ſeek his fortune elſewhere, he thought it good to purſue thoſe that were fled, and to attend ſo well upon them, that they ſhould not have leiſure to do miſchief in ſome other part.

The Carthaginian Navie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of ſuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after ſixe dayes. He had (at the firſt) a great ſtart of them; ſo that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearyed themſelves in ſeeking their own misfortune: for he fought with them, and beat them; and, having ſunk or taken many, drave the reſt to flye which way they could, laden with ſuch ſtrange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he diſcover unto them his project, letting them underſtand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthagians, not only from Syracuſe, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the war to their own doors. For here (ſaid he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take armes againſt them, as ſoon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which dares to look upon their wals. Their Townes are ill fortified, their people untrained, and experienced in dangers; the mercenary forces, that they levy in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting him have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can do, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remain, save only in victory. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had throughly sacked, they burnt to the ground: as a mark of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army destroyed in Sicil. This impression so dismales them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they fear, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspected their principal Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raise a great Army, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Army levied, which far exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldome happens, that dissension between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessity drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deal with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victory against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stir, but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victory, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victory, winneth many Towns, and sends word to Syracuse of his good success. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilest he was travelling in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce retain his own Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracusians: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a pretty (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dream which told him that he should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancy begot this dream, and he verily beleeved it. He made more haste than good speed toward the City: and comming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was caryed prisoner into the City; in which it was likely that he had no great chear to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himself King of Africk. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliver the Country into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient unto himself to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this war ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murther this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his villany found good success; and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leasure to make a step into Sicil. Many Towns in Sicil had embraced a desire of recovering thair liberty; thinking it high time to fight at length for their own freedome, after that they had so long been exposed, (as a reward of victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their owne countrey. These had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of

Sicil he returned into Africk, where his affairs stood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his sonne had lost a battell; and (which was worse) had ill means to help himself: his Army being in mutiny for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great booty and spoyle. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtain, they would (questionlesse) have given to him both money enough to pay his army, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their City had been distressed, not only by this his war, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himself Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage it self: out of which dream he was awaked, by the losse of a battell, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this war, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained ever since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battell, to offer unto the said Idoll, in way of thankfulness for their victory. The fire, with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the lodgings neerest unto the Altar; and spreading it self farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is usuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them beleeving, that the noyse in the adverse Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retrait: Agathocles, by a second errour, fell into a new calamity. In the beginning of this his flight in the dark, he met with his own African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battell) he began to assail them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blinde fight above four thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the neer hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safety, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his head; which was, to steal closely a-boord his ships, with his younger son (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flye into Sicil; thinking it the best course to shift for himself, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Army. His elder son Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him and put him under custody: but by means of a sudden tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behind him. His flight being noysed through the Army, all was in uproar; and extremity of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but even such as had been friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two sons, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extreamly base, I need not use words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequell doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headless company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteen talents. Likewise, Agathocles himself, having lost his Army, did nevertheless, by the reputation of this late war, make peace with Carthage upon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from forain enemies, discovered his bloudy nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants and his fears, urged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He devised new engines of torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brass, that should serve to scorch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their misery. So devilish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outragious, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Country took armes against him, and drave him into such fear, that he was fain to seek the love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered livered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Towns of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of corne, and with four hundred talents of gold and silver. So (though not without much trouble & hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and setled his estate. Having no further business left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italy. There he subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he beleeve those to be gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himself escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sickness fell upon him, that rotted his whole body, spreading it self through all his veins and sinews. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, save only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his own, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seek to end the controversie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slew his Uncle, and got his grandfathers Kingdome, without asking any leave. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with fear and sorrow. He saw himself without help, like to become a prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himself, or by those, whom only he now held dear, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he advised her and them to fly before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no means avoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gave them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbark themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himself into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines, his Souldiers, traiterously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot find. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driven to send for Pyrrhus to help them, who had marryed with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soon weary of the Country (as hath been shewed before) & therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our story will declare.

A recontinuation of the Roman war in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

WHen Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his victory gotten at Messana, brought the war unto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seek peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himself by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without fear of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the mastery. In this good mood the new Roman Consuls M. Valerius, and C. Octacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use

These Consuls had brought a great Army into Sicil: yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hiero to their side. If the Syracusian held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of service) all the whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour than it was to his commodity. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his own Kingdome to run into manifest perill of subversion, for their sakes that should have received all the profit of the victory: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse, in the dayes of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to bear a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending help: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to try the uttermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his own tyranny: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the love of his people by seeking their commodity; but including his own felicity within the publick, laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithful dealing. Hereby it came to pass that he enjoyed a long and happy reign, living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himself, ere he left their society, made unwilling to seek his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made unable to compasse it.

§. V. I.

How the Romans besiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a fleet. Their first losse, and first victory by sea. Of sea-fight in generall.

Hieron, having sided himself with the Romans, aideth them with victuals and other necessaries: so that they, presuming upon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, having made peace with Hieron, return into Italy; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They go on towards * Agrigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fifty thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Countrey to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sally furiously, and indanger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the town with great losse; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the

* Agrigentum was a goodly City, built by the Grecians, under conduct of Antiphemus & Pystilus. The compasse was ten miles about the wals: and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This City, by reason of the fertility of the soyle, and the neighbour-hood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The plenty and luxury thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, that the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuosity, as if they meant to live for ever; and made such feasts, as if they meant to dye the next day. But their greatest pomp and magnificence, was in their goodly temples, and theatres, water-conduits, & fish-ponds: the ruines whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome it self could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Jupiter Olympius, (by which we may judge of the Temple it self) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen: on the other side the warre of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that war; all of the like beautifull stone, and of equall stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind, are but petty things, and meer trifles. It would require a volume to expresse the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Æsculapius, Concord, Juno Lucina, Chastitie, Proserpina, Castor & Pollux, wherin the Master-peeces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Zeuxis, Myron, & Polycletus, were to be seen. But in processe of time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of war: whereof this war present brought unto it not the least.

Romans

Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep trench between the wals of the City and their Camp: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a sally, nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any relief of victuals, and munitions, whilest the Syracusian supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage, after they had been in this sort pent up five moneths. The Carthaginians imbark an Army, with certain Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno put himself into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a City wherein the Romans had bestowed all their provision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman Camp no lesse straightly assieged by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: insomuch, as if Hieron had not supplyed them, they had been forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them battell. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to change the Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly encamped, waiting untill some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signs as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his own Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopelesse of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this dayes victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and past by the Roman camp without resistance. The Consuls persue him in the morning, but in vain: sure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victory, pursued rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being favoured with the winde of good successe, to sail over into Africk. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortall men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as well to equall themselves in every kind of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of wind thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a pattern, and by it they began to set up an hundred Quinqueremes which were Gallies, rowed by five on every bank; and twenty, of three on a bank: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea-sands

many seats, in order of the banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their water men, and taught them to beat the sand with long boares, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learn the stroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed every year) was made Admirall: who being more in love with this new kind of warfare, than well advised, past over to Messana with seventeen Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he stayed not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of service. Hannibal a Carthaginian was at the same time Governour in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sea mans arrivall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twenty Gallies to entertain him. Boodes, falling upon the Consul unawares, took both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull; he grew no lesse foolish hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himself to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their own coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; sought them out with a fleet of fifty sail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seventeen, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fifty.

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeem him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heavy and slow, the African Gallies having the speed of them, devised a certain Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done the weightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serve them, nor their mariners craft; the vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carryed by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush, and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady; and those that best kept their feet, could also best use their hands. The example may be given between one of the long boats of his Majesties great ships, and a London Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a fight at Sea, must be skillfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must beleeve, that there is more belonging to a good man of War, upon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deal of difference, between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Guns of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of war: for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Strossie lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the year 1588. if he had not been better advised, than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himself with those great and powerfull Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twenty of ours to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, & held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Here to speak in generall of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Presse,) I say, that a fleet of twenty ships, all good sailers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships and of slower sailing. For if the fleet of an hundred sail keep themselves near together, in a grosse squadron; the twenty ships, charging them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their own next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made unserviceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twenty ships, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillery, by clapping clapping into the wind, and staying, they may give them the other: and so the twenty ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall volly; whereas those, that fight in a troup, have no room to turn, and can alwaies use but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred sail give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet prevail, either against those that are a-rear and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of over-sailing their fellowes keep the winde: and if upon a Lee-shore, the ships next the wind be constrained to fall back into their own squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequall speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of War by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or modern: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their advantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, have lost fifty sail of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to sail about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed unto Segesta by the Carthaginians, and won the Town of Macella, with some other places.

§. VII.

Divers enterfeats of warre, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: and obtain a great victory at Sea.

THe victory of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Navall Triumph, that was ever seen in that City; so gave it unto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceed in their wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicil, but all the other Iles between Italy and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soon after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might help to recompence the late misfortune: and being advertised, that some quarrell was grown between the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe apart, he sent forth Hanno to set upon them; who taking them unawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-war in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Sea from Sicil, arrived in the port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, and took the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himself hardly escaping the danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligence: for (as it hath been said of old) Non est bis in bello peccare; In war it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till * Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had sought in vain to draw the Cartha-

* If we may give credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus a diligent writer, hath left us in his history of Sicil: Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the first cities that hath been built in all Europe. For whereas Thucydides seems to make it a Colonie of the Phœnicians; Ranzonus, in libello de Panormo lib. 6. affirmes that it was first and long before the time which Thucydides set down founded by the Chaldæans, & Damascenes. To prove which he tels us of two inscripions upon marble in the Hebrew Character found at Panormus in the time of William the second, King of Sicil, that were then beheld of all the Citizens & other strangers, which being translated into Latine, say as followeth; Vivente Isaac filio Abrahæ, & regnante in Idumea, atque in valle Damascene, Esau filio Isaac, ingens Hebræorum manus, quibus adjuncti sunt multi Damasceni, atque Phœnices, profecti inhanc triangularem insulam sedes perpetuas locaverunt in hoc amœnissimo loco, quem Panormum nominaverunt. In the other marble are found these words; Non est alius Deus præter unum Deum; non est alius potens præter eundem Deum, &c. Hujus Turris Præfectus est Saphu filius Eliphaz, filii Esau fratris Jacob filii Isaac, filii Abraham: & Turris quidem ipsi nomen est Beythsed. Turri huic proximæ nomen est Pharah. And this inscription (saith Fazellus) was found intire in the Castle Beych, in the year 1534. Now whether these inscriptions were truly as ancient, as these men beleeve they were, I leave every man to his own faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Greeks past first into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians inhabited Panormus: which certain it is they did in the first Punick war; wherein the Carthaginians, who were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius, and C. Cornelius, commanding this Army) took it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracuse, it sent him in aid 3000 Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subject to the Romans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free cities of Sicil. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first city and Regall seat, as well of the Goths and Saracens in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians, which honour it holds this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which growes about it.

ginians into the field; being unable to force that great City, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and took certain In-land Towns, as Mytistratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Messana.

The year following, C. Atilius the Consull who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: &, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the hast he made, and lost all, save the Gally which transported him: wherein himself escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten up: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victory remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty, * Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolve to transport the war into Africk, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred rowers to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman fleet was divided into four parts, of which the three first made the form of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flanks, and the third squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admirals) looking toward the enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After all came up the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thin: so that the hornes of it incloséd all the third squadron, together with the corner of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their fleet was thin, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haye, a long front of horse, and thin: which forme, since the Pistoll prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behinde this first outstretched front, their Battalions were more solid: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Carthaginians had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that, when the first fleet of the Romans hasted to break through the first Gallies, they should all turn tail, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, and, for eagernesse of taking the Run-awayes, leave their own three squadrons far behind them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third squadron towed their horse boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin front of the Carthaginian first fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the body of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) received a great losse, untill their second squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Consuls came to the aid of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Consuls, joyning their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardinesse of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after joyne himself unto any of his other squadrons, that remained, as yet in a fair likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon equall termes, and but squadron to squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Romane fleet uningaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppreſt. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but four and twenty of theirs; whereas

* The Quinquiremes are Gallies, wherein every Oare hath five men to draw it: the Quadriremes had four to an Oare: and the Triremes, three. Some have thought, that the Quinqueremes had five ranks of Oars, one over another; and the other Gallies (raueably) fewer. But had this been so, they must then have had five decks each over other: which hath seldome been seen in ships of a thousand tuns, neither could the third, fourth, & fift ranks, have reached unto the water with the Oares.

whereas the Africans loſt thirty that were ſunk, and threeſcore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had alſo divided his fleet into four ſquadrons, (beſides thoſe that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whileſt he himſelf fought with one ſquadron that charged him, all the reſt of the enemies fleet had been at the ſame time entertained, he had prevailed: but the ſecond ſquadron, being free, came to the reſcue of the firſt, by which Amilcar was oppreſt: and Amilcar, being oppreſt and ſcattered, the Conſuls had good leiſure to relieve both the third and the fourth ſquadron, and got the victory.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the ſecond his ſonne, where he adviſeth him concerning War againſt the Turkes, tels him, that in all battels between them and the Chriſtians, he ſhould never fail to charge the Janiſars in the beginning of the fight, & to ingage them at once with the reſt. For (ſaith he) the Janiſars, who are alwaies reſerved intire in the Rear of the battell, and in whom the Turke repoſeth his greateſt confidence; come up in a groſs body, when all the troups on both ſides are disbanded and in confuſion; whereby they carry the victory before them without reſiſtance. By the ſame order of fight, and reſervation, did the Romans alſo prevail againſt other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in ſtore (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-ſhot and laſt blow. A great and victorious advantage it hath ever been found, to keep ſome one or two good troups to look on, when all elſe are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevail in Africk. Atilius the Conſul propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made priſoner.

NOw the Romans, according to their former reſolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, ſet ſail for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, ſomewhat to the Eaſt of the Port of Carthage, and ſome forty leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilcar himſelf as yet ſtaid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coaſted the Eaſt-ſide of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about fifty Engliſh mile from it. There they diſ-embarked, and prepared to beſiege Clypea; which, to eaſe them of labour, was yeelded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africa ſide; without which all invaſions are fooliſh. By this time were the Africans alſo arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman fleet and army had directed themſelves thither: but being advertiſed that they had taken Clypea, they made proviſions of all ſorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans ſend to Rome for directions, and in the mean while waſte all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, That one of the Conſuls ſhould remain with the Army, and that the other ſhould returne, with the fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Conſul is ſent home to Rome; whither he carryed with him twenty thouſand African Captains, with all the Roman fleet and Army; except forty ſhips, fifteen thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, that were left with Atilius.

With theſe forces, Regulus eaſily wan ſome Towns and places that were unwalled, and laid ſiege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Bagrada, he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he ſlue, not without loſſe of many Souldiers, being driven to uſe againſt it ſuch engines of war, as ſerved properly for the aſſaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Boſtar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicil five thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe to ſuccour his Country. Theſe (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africa, by wary protraction of time, than to undergoe the hazard of a main fight. They were carefull to hold themſelves free, from neceſſity of comming to blowes: yet had they a great deſire, to ſave the Town of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpoſe, and yet to diſturbe him in the ſiege of Adis, they incampe neer unto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they lose the services, both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus discovers, and makes use of it. He assails them in their strength, which they defend a while, but in fine the Romans prevail, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their camp. Following this their good fortune at the heels, they proceed to * Tunis a City within sixteen miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this battail at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their misfortunes; invade, and spoil their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the wals of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out: yet he feared lest it might defend it self, untill his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now so courageous and disdainfull, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty, or die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troup of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received neer unto Adis, gave it out publickly; that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruite, ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himself into the field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberties, Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were mis-numbred; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: were it not commonly found that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own doors.

* This city was taken from the Turks by Charles the fift in the year 1536. and was one of the three Keyes, which he gave in charge to Philip the second his son to keep safe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa: Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands: and Kadez, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip so lost, that he never found them again; the third, our Englishmen were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we staid not to pick any lock, but brake open the doors, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troups upon fair and levell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battell. The Romans wondred much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soon bee abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts upon the enemies, or at least break their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battails deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the lesse subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed unto the violence of horse, wherein the enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one rank, before his Army; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battail was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons nevertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the field, began to charge the Roman battalions in flank, and put them in great distress; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward nor yet retire; but had very much adoe to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearyed with labour and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equall termes. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoyled to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these troups, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Roman Army, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Consull. Of their own they lost no more than eight hundred Mercenaries, which were slain, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them; and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soever they had been in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which she never gave nor sold to any mortall man. With what joy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to pass in the world, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Eurypides, Mens una sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus, returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envyed than honoured, or for what other cause, it is unknown.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange & ransome of prisoners on both sides: giving his faith to return if the busines were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly perswaded to have the prisoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancy and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemy, that neither in his prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamity would have the naturall care, to preserve himself and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious forwardnesse, rather than from any necessity of State. For the Exchange was made soon after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more grievous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans deserved to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captains of their enemies whom they took, yea although they were such as had alwayes made fair wars with them. Wherefore it seems not meet, in reason, that they should cry out against the like tyrannicall insolency in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians fear was changed by meer desperation; cals to remembrance, the like insolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been been denyed. In ſuch caſes I never hold it impertinent, to adde unto one, more teſtimonies; approving the true rules, from which our paſſions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genowaies won ſo faſt upon the Venetians, as they not only drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Venice it ſelf. This bred ſuch an amazement in the Cities of Venice, that they offered unto the Genowaies (their ſtate reſerved) whatſoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blown up with many former victories, would hearken to no compoſition; ſave the yeelding of their City and State to his diſcretion. Hereupon the Venetians, being filled with diſdain, thruſt out to Sea with all their remaining power, and aſſail Doria with ſuch deſperate fury, that they break his fleet, kill Doria himſelf, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourſcore boats of Padoa, and four thouſand priſoners, recover Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies baſely to beg peace, to their extream diſhonour and diſadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greateſt honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withall an over-cruell revenge upon the Gantois, he refuſed mercy to the reſt, who in all humility, ſubmitting themſelves to his obedience, offered their City, goods, and eſtates, to be diſpoſed at his pleaſure. This when he had unadviſedly refuſed, and was reſolved to extinguiſh them utterly; they iſſue out of their City with five thouſand choſen men, and armed with a deſperate reſolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquiſhed followers; and enforce him to hide himſelf under an heap of ſtraw, in a poor cottage; out of which with great difficulty he eſcaped, and ſaved himſelf. Such are the fruits of Inſolency.

How the affairs of Carthage proſpered after the victory againſt Atilius: How the Romans, having loſt their fleet by tempeſt, reſolve to forſake the Seas: The great advantages of a good fleet in warre, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had been loſt in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea ſtands out; before which the Carthaginians ſit down, and aſſail it, but in vain: For the Romans, hearing of the loſſe of Atilius, with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was beſieged, make ready a groſs Army, and tranſport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Æmilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Conſuls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, ſet out of purpoſe, upon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their coſt. For the Romans took by force an hundred and fourteen of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they ſtaid no longer, than to take in their own men that had been beſieged: and this done, they made amain toward Sicil, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this haſty voyage they deſpiſe the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find harbour in time, for that the ſeaſon threatned ſome violent ſtormes, which ever hapned between the riſing of Orion, and of the * Dog-ſtarre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coaſt of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to ſave themſelves upon ſuch an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perſwaded, that the wind and ſeas feared them no leſſe, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themſelves. So refuſing to ſtay within ſome Port, as they were adviſed, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking a matter much helping their reputation, after this victory againſt the Carthaginian fleet, to take a few worthleſs Towns upon the coaſt. The mercileſs winds in the mean while overtake them, and neer unto Camerina, overturn and thruſt headlong on the rocks, all but fourſcore of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory was devoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome.

* There is no part of the World, which hath not ſome certain times of outragious weather beſide their accidental ſtormes. Wee have upon our coaſt a Michaelmas ſtaw that ſeldome or never failes: In the weſt Indies, in the moneths of Auguſt and September, thoſe moſt forcible winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North winds, are very fearfull: and therefore they that navigate in thoſe parts, take harbor till thoſe moneths take end. Charles the fift being as ill adviſed, in paſſing the Seas towards Algire, in the Winter quarter contrary to the counſell of A. Doria; as he was in like unſeaſonable times to continue his ſiege before Metz in Lorraine, loſt an hundred and forty ſhips by tempeſt, and fifteen Gallies, with all in effect in them, of men, victuallers, horſes, and munition: a loſſe no leſſe great, than his retrait, both from before the one and the other, was extreme diſhonourable.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repair all their warlike vessels hoping once again to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the overthrow of Atilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and forty Elephants imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and fleet he arrives at Lilybæum; where he begins to vexe the Partisans of Rome. But adversity doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ships; with which, & the remainder of their late shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chief City of the Africans in Sicil, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, return to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoil they made upon the coasts of Africk: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were first set upon the sands, and like to have perished, neer unto the lesser Syrtes, where they were fain to heave all over-boord, that so they might get off: then, having with much adoe doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italy, they lost an hundred and fifty of their ships by foul weather. A greater discouragement never Nation had; the god of the wars favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, four hundred and six Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to give over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-army into Sicil, under L. Cæcilius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transport in some threescore ordinary passage boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not above a mile and a half broad from land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholerick against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two years after, they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Navie, much lesse to maintain the war in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicil, making sometimes a march of above an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed without an Army, & the provisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteen dayes; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, between Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navie and Army, and could not prevaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and sailed to the West, landed in Dorset-shire, so drawing Edmond and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again shipt his men, and entred the Severne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcester-shire, by him greatly spoyled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back again to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Army from place to place, unwearyed, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have been able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captains, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carryed his Army by Sea, with forty Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Boisleduc, or Gertreviden Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and victuals. But as soon as the wind served, he suddenly set sail, arriving in the mouth of the Menze, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Yssell, and sate down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could could march over-land round about Holland, above fourscore mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spanish Army had overcome this wearisome march, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to sail up the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing down the stream, he was set down before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he also took, before the Spanish Army could return. Lastly, the Spanish Army was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulst, set sail again, and presented himself before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and mastered it.

And to say the truth, it is impossible for any maritime Countrey, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it self against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the year 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would have kept off the English, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armado, by the fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him, to prepare an Army, that should be able to resist our eleven thousand. But where should this his Army have been bestowed? If about Lisborne; then would it have been easie unto the English, to take, ransack, and burn the Town of Croin, and to waste the Countrey round about it. For the great and threatning preparations of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquesse of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hasty levy of eight thousand under the Earle of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Associates: considering that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, took their campe; took their Generals standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them over all the Countrey, which they fired. If a Royall Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the war in Galicia; I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their St. Jago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his main intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Army, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they have hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land and Penicha, and march over the Country to Lysborne, six dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the River of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let us consider of the matter it self; what another Nation might doe, even against England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an invading Army may be resisted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemy from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we fail, then must we seek to make him wish, that he had stayed at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not unto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positive, Whether England, without help of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is unable so to do: and therefore I think it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the incouragement of a first victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most perillous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guyenne, they of the Protestant Proteſtant Religion, after the battail of Moncontour, entred that Country, and gathered great ſtrength and relief thence; for if the King (ſaith he) would have given me but reaſonable means, j'euſſe bien gardé à Monſieur l' Admiral de faire boire ſes Chevaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horſes in the River of Garonne. Monſieur de Langey, on the contrary ſide, prefers the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, & commends the delay; which courſe the Conſtable of France held againſt the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverſe conſideration to be had, between ſuch a countrey as France is, ſtrengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invaſions upon firm land, that theſe great Captaines ſpake: whoſe entrances cannot be uncertain. But our queſtion is of an Army to be tranſported over Sea, and to be landed again in an enemies countrey, and the place left to the choice of the invader. Hereunto I ſay, That ſuch an Army cannot be reſiſted on the coaſt of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coaſt of France, or any other Countrey: except every Creek, Port, or ſandy Bay, had a powerfull Army, in each of them, to make oppoſition. For let his whole ſuppoſition be granted; That Kent is able to furniſh twelve thouſand foot, and that thoſe twelve thouſand be layed in the three beſt landing places within that Countrey, to wit, three thouſand at Margat, three thouſand at the Neſſe, and ſix thouſand at Folkſton, that is ſomewhat equally diſtant from them both; as alſo that two of theſe troups (unleſſe ſome other order bethought more fit) be directed to ſtrengthen the third, when they ſhall ſee the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I ſay, that notwithſtanding this proviſion, if the enemy, ſetting ſail from the Iſle of Wight, in the firſt watch of the night, and towing their long boats at their ſternes, ſhall arrive by dawne of day at the Neſſe, and thruſt their Army on ſhore there; it will be hard for thoſe three thouſand that are at Margat, (twenty and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neſſe. Nay, how ſhall they at Foulkſton be able to doe it, who are nearer by more than half the way? ſeeing that the enemy, at his firſt arrivall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or four hundred ſhot of great Artillery, and quickly put the firſt three thouſand, that were intrenched at the Neſſe, to run; or elſe give them ſo much to doe, that they ſhall be glad to ſend for help to Foulkſton, and perhaps to Margat: whereby thoſe places will be left bare. Now let us ſuppoſe, that all the twelve thouſand Kentiſh Souldiers arrive at the Neſſe, ere the enemy can be ready to diſ-embarque his Army, ſo that he ſhall finde it unſafe, to land in the face of ſo many, prepared to withſtand him; yet muſt we beleeve, that he will play the beſt of his own game; and (having liberty to go which way he liſt) under covert of the night, ſet ſail towards the Eaſt, where what ſhall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elſewhere, before they at the Neſſe can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more eaſie than to do it. Yea the like may be ſaid of Waymouth, Purbecke, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coaſt. For there is no man ignorant, that ſhips, without putting themſelves out of breath, will eaſily out-run the Souldiers that coaſt them. Les Armees ne volent point en poſte; Armies neither flye, nor run poſt, ſaith a Marſhall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ſhips may be ſeen at Sun-ſet, and after it, at the Liſard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Army of foot ſhall not be able to march it in ſix dayes. Again, when thoſe troups lodged on the Sea-ſhores, ſhall be forced to run from place to place in vain, after a fleet of ſhips; they will at length ſit down in the mid-way; & leave all at adventure. But ſay it were otherwiſe; that the invading enemy will offer to land in ſome ſuch place, where there ſhall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, ſhall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the year 1588.) to attend the perſon of the Prince, and for the defence of the City of London: they that remain to guard the coaſt, can be of no ſuch force, as to encounter an Army like unto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma ſhould have landed in England.

The Iſle of Tercera hath taught us by experience, what to think in ſuch a caſe. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and ſtrengthned by art: it being every where hard of acceſſe; having no good harbour wherein to ſhelter a Navie of friends, and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monsieur de Chattes, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or six thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse having shewed himself in the Road of Angra, did set sail, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, far distant from thence; where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vain, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strossie, slain the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold bloud; had instructed de Chattes, and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying relief to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and back again, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one half when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse is able to follow, cannot be denyed to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, unlesse it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alledged against this: which example moves me no way to think, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal my self, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I find an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a civill interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due unto it. There were indeed some which were in that voyage, who advised me not to undertake it: and I hearkened unto them somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired me to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to understand, the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place, yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safety. For I thought it to belong unto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders should not think any advantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was unwilling, that some Low-Countrey Captains, and others, not of mine own squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would have been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their help I was driven to turn tail. Therefore I took with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brook, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henry Tinnes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captain Laurence Kemis, Captain William Morgan, and others such as well understood themselves and the enemy: by whose help, with Gods favour, I made good the enterprize I undertook. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the Rest for us, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could have done with lesse danger, so that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed even in this example: but the reasons before alledged, (together with other reasons well known to some of the Gentlemen above named, though more private, than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the shorter course; having it still in mine own power to fall off when I should think it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small piece of service, by seeking to prove him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine own followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concernes the proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were slain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when he had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Town, were driven by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to an hasty trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall never come to tryall; his Majesties many movable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation under heaven can do, to be beaten upon their own ground, or elsewhere by a forraign enemy; yet to etertain those that shall assail us, with their own beef in their bellies, and before they eat of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To do which, his Majesty, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt again to get the mastery of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entred Lilybæum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans by reason of grievous losses received, under Claudius and Junius their Consuls, abandon the Seas again.

WHen, without a strong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolved once again, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of war. So causing fifty new Gallies to be built, & the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Atilius, & L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the overthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were less daring then they had been in the beginning of the war: & withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy, with the one half of the Army, & that Cæcilius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consul was better advised. For when Asdrubal had made his approaches somewhat neer the Town, Cæcilius caused a deep trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the City: between which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattail a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust upon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled & beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it self, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously upon their own foot-men, and utterly disordered them. Cæcilius espying his advantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome; the whole state, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred sail, which they sent into Sicil, to give end to that war, that had now lasted fourteen years. With this fleet and Army the Romans resolve to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) save Drepanum, that was near adjoyning. They set down before it, and possesse themselves of all the places of advantage neer unto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground

sixe Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of War. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certain Lievtenants, and other petty officers, that conspire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly in danger of the like treason, saved Agrigentum. Himilco useth the help of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, & imployeth Hannibal to appease the troups of the Gaules, which did waver, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancy and truth; so that the Traitors, being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman campe as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the mean while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal the son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in despight of all resistance, entred the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolve to set upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of battery. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the uttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the service; and having received his dispatch, sails with one Gally to Ægusa, a little Iland near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gally, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set sail, and shipped his Oares (his Gally being exceeding quick of steerage, and himself expert in all parts of the channell) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himself out of danger of being encompassed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre off, the advanture which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of war will not fear to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouthes against him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sueden were at Warre, our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatned to sink their ships if they came through the straights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a ship of her Majesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the adventure, and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or sink them, at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat down, with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibility to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the banke of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but comming to find a good market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extream dear in Antwerpe passed in boats of ten or twelve Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it; when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood favoured them; as also with a contrary wind, and an ebbing water, they turned back again: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvellous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the year 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with four demi-cannons within point blanque, from six in the morning till twelve at noon. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be given for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driven to turne upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all help of wind and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great use, and fearfull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our adventurous Rhodian: He arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take upon them to do the like, and performe it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choak the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tides clears it again in part: but they grounded so many of those great bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heap, like a ragged Iland, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gally, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran her selt aground thereon, and was taken. Now comes that brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him; he finds what she is, both by her form and by her swiftness: and being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worn with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they over-topt the wals of Lilybæum, were over-turned. A Greek Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistless, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rams. Hereupon, despair and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to starve the defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consull. He arrives at Messana, and marcheth over land to Lilybæum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplyed the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This service the Captains and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarques his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent man of war, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but haivng recovered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, then to be encloseđ. Herewithall he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrust into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, deceived of his expectation, cals back the formost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal finds and followes his advantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himself, having the land on his back: hoping thereby to keep himself from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, so straightned, as he could not turn himself any way from his enemies, nor range himself in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirty Gallies, besides his own, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet to the number of ninety and four ships, were taken or sunk by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they send away L. Junius, their Consul, to take charge of their businesse in Sicil. Junius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepting which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twenty Gallies he had: and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary provisions for the Army. With this great fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stayes a while; partly to take in corn, partly to wait for some, that were too slow of sail, to keep company with him along from Messana. In the mean time he dispatcheth away towards Lilybæum his Questors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one half of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their convoy.

Adherbal was not careless after his late victory: but studied how to use it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered thirty to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten more under his own charge; and sent him to try what good might be done against the Roman fleet in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to his direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Camp takes alarm, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distresse, gives Carthalo good leisure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South coast of Sicil, devising how to work mischief to the enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a fair occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had discryed, near at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victuallers, which the Consul Junius, more hastily then providently, had sent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to hear of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey than a fleet likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight: but were glad to seek shelter in an open Road, full of rocks under a covert of a poor Town, belonging to their party; that could help to save them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those rocks, but would be forced by any great change of wind, either to put out into the deep, or to save their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loss of all their shipping. Whilest he was busied in this care, the Consull Junius drew near, and was discovered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Consul had neither means to flie, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creek; thinking no danger so great as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian seeing this, betakes himself to a Station between the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it self into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, between the Promontory of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the wind stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we do in the West of England, before a Southernly storm) hasted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrailes of their beasts, their Soothsayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly overtaken with a boisterous South wind, and all the Gallies forced against the rocks, and utterly wrackt.

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved again to forsake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions upon firm ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at sea, or else they must not make war in an Iland, against those that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldome or never find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises with an invincible constancy, they have annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthrows, mutinies, heat & cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases both old and new, together with extreme poverty, and want of all things needfull, have been the enemies wherewith every one of their most noble discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many years have passed over some of their heads in the search of not so many leagues: yea more than one or two have spent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in search of a golden kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not been disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries and Paradises which they enjoy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The City of Eryx is surprised by the Romans, & recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds war with them five years. The Romans, having emptied their common treasury, build a new fleet at the charges of private men. The great victory at Sea of Luctatius the Consull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace between Rome and Carthage.

THe Romans were carefull to supply with all industry, by land, the want of strength at sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybæum, and seek to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring relief. The Consull Junius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had received, bethought him what enterprises to undertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the faireſt and richest of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated between Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both of which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth year of this war, the Carthaginians set forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and Army, who sailing to the coasts of Italy, did throughly repay the spoyles which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrians, and of the Bruttians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil, and finding there no walled City in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infest the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himself between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized upon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunity to scoure all the coast of Italy with his fleet, wasting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard work: lying near unto Panormus, where in three years abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himself and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a strange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Legions, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountain, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveighed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the middest of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountain, were straightly held (as it were) besieged. And no less was Amilcar himself restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieve them. There he found them pastime about two years more; hoping still to weary out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the prosecuting of this business at Eryx. Wherein it seems true (as Hannibal, in Livie, spake unto Scipio) that the affairs of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the war, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly upon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistless; Amilcar, with a small Army, had so well acquited himself, to the honour of his countrey, that by the tryall of five years war, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been devised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasury was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite unto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden upon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose ability would not serve to doe the like, joyned with some others, and laying their money together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repayed, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their pattern, that excellent swift rowing Gally which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lutatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicil the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, indeavouring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late losses which his Predecessors had received; he was carefull to put himself in order, against their arrivall. Liv. Dec. 3. l. 10.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I do not find; but it was upheld by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himself. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is adverse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by every loss received. More particularly, he was gratious among the people, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressours of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great loss. He had ere this being imployed against the Numidians and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those fugitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his own great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsel, when, having shewed himself an unworthy Captain, he betook himself to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man; and one that studied how to preserve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deserved of his own Country, it will appear hereafter: how beneficiall he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that peace which he thence-forth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Navie, with all needfull provisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexterity in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had had neither been carefull in training his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with ſtout fellowes. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſſe force of tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the ſeas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or elſe was ſent forth well inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſail to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his ſhips of their lading: and having thus lightned himſelf, he meant to take aboord ſome part of the Land-army, together with Amilcar himſelf, by whoſe help he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make his enemy repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good courſe, if it could have been performed. But Catulus uſed all poſſible diligence, to prevent the execution of this deſign: not becauſe he was informed of the enemies purpoſe, but that he knew it to be the beſt for them, & for that he feared no danger ſo greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherfore although the weather was very rough, and the ſeas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was diſcried; yet he rather choſe to fight with the enemy, that had the winde of him, than to ſuffer his convoy to paſſe along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno ſhould have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exerciſed his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all unneceſſary burthens; and he had taken aboord the choyce men of the Roman Land-ſouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the firſt encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having fifty of their Gallies ſtemmed and ſunk, and ſeventy taken, wherein were few leſſe than ten thouſand men, that were all made priſoners: the reſt, by a ſudden change of wind, eſcaping to the Ile of Hieroneſus.

The ſtate of Carthage, utterly diſcouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to reſolve. Means to repair their fleet in any time there were none left; their beſt men of war by Sea were conſumed; and Amilcar, upon whoſe valour and judgement the honour and ſafety of the Common-weal reſted, was now ſurrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make diſpatch unto Amilcar himſelf, and authorized him to take what courſe ſhould ſeem beſt unto his excellent wiſdome, leaving all concluſions to his election and ſole counſail.

Amilcar, whom no adverſity, accompanied with the leaſt hope or poſſibility of recovery, had ever vanquiſhed, looking over every promiſe, true or falſe, that the preſent time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) reſolved to make triall, whether his neceſſity might be compounded upon any reaſonable termes. He therefore ſent to Lutatius the Conſull an overture of peace: who conſidering it well, gathered ſo many arguments from the preſent poverty of the Roman State, waſted beyond expectation in the former war, that he formerly hearkned unto it. So, in concluſion, an accord was made, but with proviſion, That it ſhould hold none otherwiſe, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: Firſt, that the Carthaginians ſhould clearly abandon the Iſle of Sicil. Secondly, that they ſhould never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuſe, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they ſhould ſet at liberty, and ſend back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they held priſoners, without ranſome. Laſtly, that they ſhould pay unto the Romans two thouſand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteen hundred and twenty thouſand crowns: the ſame to be delivered within twenty years next following.

Theſe Articles were ſent to Rome, where they were not throughly approved: but ten Commiſſioners were ſent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. Theſe Commiſſioners added a thouſand talents to the former ſum, and required a ſhorter time of paiment. Further alſo they took order, that the Carthaginians ſhould not only depart out of Sicil it ſelf, but ſhould alſo with-draw their Companies out of all other Ilands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole intereſt therein.

Such was the end of the firſt Punick Warre, that had laſted about twenty four years without intermiſſion; in which time the Romans had loſt, by fight or ſhipwrack, about ſeven hundred Quinqueremes, & the Carthaginians about five hundred: the greatneſſe of which loſſes, doth ſerve to prove the greatneſſe both of theſe two Cities, and of the War it self; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captain.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing between the first and second Punick Warres.

THe Romans having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, & all the little Ilands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leisure to help themselves in a following war, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quòd leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiantur a victis; That lawes are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or else had forgotten to follow it in this weighty business. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you give us, it will be perpetuall; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer the Senate, at that time gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; an credi posset, ullum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea conditione, cujus eum pœniteat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? that it was the speech of a manly, and free man; for who could beleeve, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meer necessity did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgement of those Nations, who had little else besides their manly resolution, to defend their liberty; surely, they grosly flattered themselves, in presuming that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour unto themselves, would sit down any longer by the losse and dishonour received, than untill they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after the first Punick war was ended, Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conveniently the Army might be transported into Africk: the care of which business he committed unto Gesco, to whom as to a man of approved sufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Gesco had an especiall consideration of the great sums, wherein Carthage was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by handfuls a few at a time; that so the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a City as Carthage, unto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasury did require: so that the first might have been friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the second and third, whilest their disjunction had made them them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped, by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the City, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place, where they might be less troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiving every one a piece of gold, to bear his charges in the mean while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compell them to truss up their fardels, that they might have none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their own pay. Business they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutiny: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to every single share: and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captains, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to mind, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some unordinary largesse.

Thus the time passeth away, untill the whole army being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So think they all; and assemble themselves to hear what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memory, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the poverty of Carthage; tels them how great a sum of mony is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the excessive charges whereat the Common-wealth had been in the late war; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the City, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Army was composed of sundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different languages. Yet they stared upon him, & were (as I think) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serve to appease them.

Hanno would fain have asswaged their fury, but he knew not how: for he less understood their dissonant lowd noises, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many Countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutiny, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can do, is to use the help of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some for want of skil; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his errands in the worst sense, are best beleeved. Finally, they think themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their own in peremptory terms, at a nearer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as far as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own errour. It is a good rule,

Curandum

Curandum inprimis, ne magna injuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.

Have speciall care, that valiant poverty
Be not oppreſt with too great injury.

But this proud City, having neglected the rule, hath alſo been careleſs in providing to ſecure her ſelf againſt the inconvenience that might follow. She had ſuffered the whole multitude, whereunto ſhe was like to give cauſe of diſcontent, to joyn it ſelf into one body, when the ſeverall troups might eaſily have been diſperſed: ſhe hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of theſe poor men, which had ſhe retained in ſhew of kindneſs, ſhe might have uſed them as Hoſtages for her own ſafety; and by imploying a miſerable penni-father, in her negotiation with men of War, ſhe hath weakned the reputation of her braveſt Captains, that might beſt have ſerved to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no deſire to be uſed as an inſtrument in defrauding his own Souldiers of their wages: eſpecially conſidering, that as he beſt could bear witneſs of their merits, ſo was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable conjecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldneſs to impoſe the blame of his own wretched counſell, upon the liberall promiſes made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wiſely, in ſuffering thoſe that maligned him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deal the cards which themſelves had ſhuffled. This they continue to do as fooliſhly as they had at firſt begun. They furniſh a market at Tunis, for the Souldiers; whom they ſuffer to buy what they liſt and at what price they liſt. They ſend ever and anon ſome of their Senatours into the Campe; who promiſe to ſatisfie all demands, as far forth as it ſhould be poſſible. And thus by ſhifting from one extreme to another, they make the Souldiers underſtand, into what fear the City was driven; which cannot chooſe but add much inſolency to the paſſions already ſtirred up.

This ſudden change of weather, & the true cauſe of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wiſe, and finding the ſeaſon fit, labourſto make a great harveſt. Money muſt be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have loſt their horſes in publike ſervice of the State. The State ſhall pay for them. They had lived ſome years, by making hard ſhift, without receiving their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ſhips did bring in proviſion, or their Captain direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ſerve. They ſaid that they had been ſometimes driven to buy; and that (ſince they could not remember how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their proviſion during the whole time, and according to the deareſt price that wheat had borne, whileſt the War laſted. Such are now the demands of theſe Mutiners; who might eaſily have been ſatisfied with far leſs charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the firſt. But now they make no end of craving. For whileſt the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this Corn-mony; the Souldiers have deviſed many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater ſum of money, without all regard of ſhame. Since therefore no good end could be found of theſe controverſies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, ſhould be choſen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army condeſcended, and made choiſe of Geſco: partly out of good liking to him, who had ſhewed himſelf at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, eſpecially when they were to be tranſported into Africk: partly out of a diſlike which they had conceived of Amilcar; for that he had not viſited them in all this buſie time. So Geſco comes among them; and to pleaſe them the better, comes not without money: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. He cals unto him firſt of all the Captains, and then the ſeverall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had paſſed; adviſing them temperately concerning the preſent; and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained ned them, and would needs alwaies be mindfull of their good services. After this he began to put had to his purse, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet pass, if two seditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a sturdy fellow, and audacious, but a slave; that in the late war had fled from a Roman, whom he served, and therefore stood in fear, lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raising such troubles as might serve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himself one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been so forward in stirring up the tumult, as he could not choose but fear, lest his own death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Countrimen the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worse condition, than either the Gaules, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any forrein mercenaries. For (saith he) These our companions have no more to do, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but we that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of accompt, when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home beggers, rather then loaden with the money, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. Ye are not ignorant, how tyrannically those our haughty masters of Carthage doe reign over us. They think it reasonable, that our lives and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times been accustomed to take from us even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their soveraignty: what will they now doe, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as freemen, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? Ye all do know, that it were a very shame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of war, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithstanding ye may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soon as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are content to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and fear us: their hatred will shew it self when their fear is once past: unlesse we now take our time, and whilest we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly, that their hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithall they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. The best army that ever served them, whereof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawn, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for help? The case it self is plain. But we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing these Gaules and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joyning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over cruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthily a wretched slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his own liberty.

By such perswasions Matho wins the African Souldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of mony, as of quarrell; which he that seeketh will not misse to find. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more convenient time; they break into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuell to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a showre of stones, flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath been said already by those good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only Throw, throw.

Now

Now the rebellion begins to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crue of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himself upon their fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while he works with the severall Nations, putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gesco knowes: he sees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tels them, That they may do well, if they stand in want of money, to seek it of their Captain Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes begin to grow calme, by his fair language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can find; that so the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open war. Matho solicites all Africk, and his Embassadours are every where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to use perswasion: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversity hath never been untold of her errours: and as she is ever assured to hear her own, so commonly with her own she undergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they took from them the one half of their corn; that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only such as can bear Armes are ready to doe service in this great commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for the maintenance of so just a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aid of threescore and ten thousand Africans: and are moreover furnished with money, not only to satisfie the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the war begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Divers observations upon this war with the Mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are fain to use the help of Mercenaries.

HEre let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travell. Behold a tyrannicall City, persecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly war. It is a common thing, as being almost necessary, that a tyranny should be upheld by Mercenarie forces: it is common that Mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all war made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldome hear, that ever the ruine of a tyranny is procured or sought by those that were hired to maintain the power of it: and seldome or never do we read of any war that hath been prosecuted with such inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call tyranny, is, A violent form of government, not respecting the good of the subject, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say, that it is the unjust rule of one over many: for very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the

the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other, than a meer tyranny; though it were so, that they themselves were a great City, and a popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this form of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardless of his life and welfare; unlesse himself be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of love. The practice of tyranny, is not alwayes of a like extremity: for some Lords are more gentle than others, to their very slaves; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it self unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of severall men, it is commonly seen, that the taste of swe etness, drawn out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: but every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hath enough: but (as Covetousness is never satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleased with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, & he knows it well: but he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into fear. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none unjustly, he may be said to deal craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any conspirator to stand in fear, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other security, than to dis-arm all his Subjects; to fortifie himself within some strong place; and, for defence of his Person and State, to hire as many lusty Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his own Country: for if not every one, yet some one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publick misery. This considered, he allures unto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most unhonest that can be found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and wil therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained. Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickedness, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his sword against the Tyrant himself: they shall all be permitted to do as he doth; to rob, to ravish, to murder, and to satisfie their own appetites, in most outrageous manner being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hateful to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what language I write; I must be fain to say, that these are not dreams: though some Englishman perhaps that were unacquainted with History, lighting upon this leaf, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyranny growes to stand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how those mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured unto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects is worse, than the tyranny of one man: and that a tyrannicall City must likewise use mercenary Souldiers.

NOw concerning the tyranny wherewith a City or State oppresseth her subjects; it may appear some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearfull of her life: the less need hath she therefore to secure her self by cruelty. A City is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the lesse to pluck from her Subjects. If war, or any other great occasion, drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary summes of money; the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous & hateful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And Juvenal reckons it, as the compelment of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her slaves, that whilest she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signs of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignity: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keep a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintain them in all villany, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must do: her own Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a City is scarce able to deserve the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, that the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heavy, as the burdens imposed by a cruell City. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was fain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and generall approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysicall abstraction of the universall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore, (as I have said elsewhere) That it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set down, but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearyed; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him; all which failing; yet is there hope, that his successour may prove better.

Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawfull Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannicall City, have no such hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reins, untill they be pulled out of her hands, and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mightier Chariotter. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same sore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor kindred and friends, who mean not to return home empty to their hives, without a good lading of wax and honey. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour, (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successour of this man, he is more loving than could be wished in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civill war. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, Of Recovery, against extorting Magistrates: yet we finde, that it served not wholly to restrain their provinciall Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome tributes; they loved not to hear, that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly divised by one Magistrate, served as presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: the government of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that is lively set out by Tullie, may serve to inform us, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation, as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more generall proposition; That a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyranny of a City is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and again, sutable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African souldiers; in Africk it self they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own countries; Vt Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurus uterq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; that the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, & carried into the field, not only by reward, but by duty. Yet seeing their duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenary Souldiers, and forrain Auxiliaries.

THe extreme danger, growing from the imployment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithfull, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereinto they are drawn; as being held by no other bond, than their own commodity. Yea, that which is most fearfull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States that have trusted them. Those mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy when Charles the eight of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queen Joane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like unto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaves, even with the very same army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the son of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the treachery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own father had been. For, having waged an army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the help of forrain Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by perswasion or force, set them again over the sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon after followed.

followed. Alexander the son of Cassander, sought aid of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Egypt by Samar the Soldan, against his opposite: but this Turke did settle himself so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdome, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Country; & Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland; but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two kingdomes.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the united Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late war. Indeed these Low-countries have many goodly & strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they have seldome been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: and the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: and therefore could ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped wel. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercenary Souldiers. Many fruitless attempts, made by the Prince of Orenge, can witnesse it: and that brave Commander Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt, to his grief, in his retrait from Græningham; when, in the very instant that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meer covetousnes, have ruined in one hour the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forrain Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Country, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling yoak upon the peoples neck? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilest he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginary sorrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeving the Town to be surprised and won; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own troups, informed him better what had hapned; shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of pity. Then was his feigned passion changed into a very bitter anguish of mind, wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon dieu, que veux tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using Mercenary Souldiers, or the help of forrain Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soveraignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall war; when the heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just & wise (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his own inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose confidence in the forces of these their Neighbour Countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the cause that they took in hand: or, if any were cold in his devotion, unto the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had been corrupted by

by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custody of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons: the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shal agree so wel, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming to them all) a Neighbour-Country of the same religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a country be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like success. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenary and forraign auxiliary forces are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

§. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to use the service of their own subjects in their wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyranny, which hindreth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

HEre it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use service of other souldiers in their many great wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? for if it were their manner to arm their own subjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is, that their Armies were compounded usually of their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did imploy so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other help had been wanting; which served to keep in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinity were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priviledges and immunities, which they injoyed, made them assured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almost at liberty, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in war. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soever, seems troublesom to the neck that hath bin accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italy have taken occasion of severall advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have bin reclaimed by war, the Authors of rebellion hath sharply bin punished, and the people by degrees have obtained such liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common city of all Italy. Yea, in processe of time it was granted unto many Cities, and those far off removed, even to Tarsus in Cilicia, where S^t. Paul was born, that all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it self. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some; upon some, with restraint of giving voyce in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release unto their new subjects half of their tribute which they had bin wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to fear a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their own present estate. Wherefore it is no marvell, that Petellia, a City of the Brutians in Italy, chose rather to endure all extremity of war, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to help these their subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithfull to the utmost. Such love purchased these mild Governours, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is; they had, of their own, a strong army; they doubled it by adjoyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

Liv. Dec. 1. l. 3.

Liv. ibid.

The moderate use of soveraign power being so effectuall, in assuring the people

unto their Lords, and consequently in the establishment or inlargement of Dominion: it may seem strange, that the practice of tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity, whatsoever. For it is lesse difficult, (whosoever think otherwise) and more safe, to keep the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turn aside from it; yet commonly our passions do lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least-wise, taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyranny it is not so: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to insinuate it self into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires have bred many Tyrants: yet so that these desires have seldome been hereditary, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the government hath been reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must be fain to say, That Tyranny is, by it self, a vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt even by Nature, to command or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise unto brute beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Fear, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise naturall, in convenient measure, both unto Mankinde, and to all creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civill form of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and usefull. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an unproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than unto brute beasts, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are the more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more horrible, and punished more grievously, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or that nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and overloaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist: yet the defective dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which meer necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas tyranny is more active, and pleaseth it self in the excesse, with a false colour of justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are every where to be found: for this quality troubles not it self in seeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himself in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend, or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also cruelty doth help to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned unto those, that know how to increase, or preserve humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, Empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, have un-made and slain, each of them; more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the errour of Mans judgement in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it growes to ripeness, is none other than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no less than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityocamptes, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius, and Agathocles, whose mischievous heads were assisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen and slaves.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of parents over their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himself; so that it is alwayes, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authority, which one Freeman can have over another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole country: which he that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater and more Masterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said; Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which also he continueth unto Noah and his children, saying, The fear of you (and the dread of you) shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea: into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this power hath since extended it self, over a very great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to governe themselves, proves them, according to Aristotles doctrine, to be naturally slaves.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant to oppress men with bondage: unless the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a servant, whom he hath slain by correction, if the servant live a day or two, because he is his money: or else by the captivity of the Midianitish girls, which were made bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtless the custome hath been very ancient: for Noah laid this curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-servants and maid-servants, which were none other than slaves. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this old kinde of servility: but surely they are deceived that think so. Saint Paul desired the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of request, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth unto servants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherin he was called: art thou called, being a servant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured liberty unto many; not only in regard of piety, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear of being discovered by their slaves, unto the persecutors of religion. Mahomet likewise, by giving liberty to his followers, drew many unto his impiety: but whether he forbade it, as unlawfull, unto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tel; save that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it seems he did not. In England we had many bond-servants, untill the time of our last civill wars; and I think that the Laws concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great use and service, there are grown up a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurses, and other the like trades; slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

Exod.21.21. Num.30.40. Gen.9.25 Gen.12.16. Epist.to Phile. vers.14. 1 Cor.7.20,21.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well proved, that it is naturall. And certainly, we finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the elect & reprobate) the wisest excel the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason, we shall find, that nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of servile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries have subsisted long without the use of any servility; as also it is true, that some countries have not the use of any tame cattell. Indeed the affections which uphold civill rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needfull, unto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust, and the like; or of every one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and servile dispositions have liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the dangerous toile of Sea-faring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are weary of their own more painfull condition. This may suffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingraffed even by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the general custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we find no cause to marvell, how Tyranny hath been so rife in all ages, & practised, not only in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but ever by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since other vices have likewise gotten head, and born a generall sway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? in the government of wife and children, some are utterly careless, and corrupt all by their dull connivency: others, by masterly rigour, hold their own bloud under condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: and to prefer the Weal publick above all respects whatsoever, is the Vertue justly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle as one of them; & deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans own Country. But if we consider, that a love of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodnesse: we shall find, that no morall vertue, how great soever, can by it self, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Josias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soon be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can find a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversity, or of some regard of state; a procurer of a generall peace and quiet; who not only useth his authority, but addes the travell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to do justice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, civility is infused, even into those places, that have been the dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throats; one that hath quite abolished a slavish Brehon Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdome doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the bloud, the wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chief commendations belonging unto some good princes, to appear lesse regardable: he, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to adde unto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King, it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shal flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknown; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happiness of his subjects, shall cause the Nations far off removed, to wish him their Soueraign. I need not adde hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, do partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unspeakable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible majesty, with both of which himself is indued, as far as humane nature is capable) do also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Lest any man should think me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I adde hereunto, hereunto, that such a King is nevertheless a man, must dye, and may erre: yet wisdome and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodness. The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not only loving to their Severaign Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, & slaves outragious, for a time: but among spirits that have once yeelded unto slavery, universally it is found true, that Homer saith, God bereaveth a man of half his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Hom. Odyss. l. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannicall rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it self, as is this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the war against the Mercenaries was diversly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable successe. The bloody counsels of the Mercenaries; and their finall destruction.

BEing now to return unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus far digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all been subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These, using the advantage of their present strength, besieged * Vtica and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated upon the western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing inwards upon the great Lake, Vtica further out upon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the countrey: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected perill, any man may conceive. But the business it self awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore travelled their brains to the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who, sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came unto the very wals of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoever was needfull, as well to relieve a Town besieged, as to batter and assail any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vtica, so suddenly, that the enemies as men surprised, forsook their Trenches, and retired themselves unto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome was, after any loss, to flie two or three whole dayes journey off; presently entred the Town; to shew himself after this his victory. But these good fellowes, against whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceived, that he knew not how to use a victory; they assailed their own camp, and with great slaughter, drave the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within Vtica; and got possession of all the store that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This bad beginning Hanno followed with suitable indiscretion: losing the benefit of many fair opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm land.

* Vtica is seated in the great bay that enters towards Carthage, not far within the Promontory of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Biserta, and by the Africans themselves, Geral Oselbe. Nigar saith, that the town it self is ruined, and the place whereon it stood, now called Mazachares. It was very ancient, & built before Carthage, saith Silius. As it flourished before Carthage was set up, so did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans in the third Punick war. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cæsar. Villar that worthy Divine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Genserick the Arrian, who lived all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the story of his cruelties.

The

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shete-anchor; sending to the field their great Captain Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seventy elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do, before he should be able to meet with the enemy upon equall ground. For, besides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to win the only bridge, by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travell into the Continent. This River had not many foords, nor those easie for a single man to get over: but upon them all was kept such guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it self, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a town, wherein to lye commodiously, intentive only to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with sand and gravell, that was driven in by certain customary winds, and could not be driven out again, by force of that slow river, till the wind failing, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportunity passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius look about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their own Master in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was soon changed into presumption; when more than fifteen thousand of their own society, were come from Vtica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Army was far greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their own judgement, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beat him down, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attend upon him, watching for some advantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Rear, had a great mind to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as took from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way toward the Bridge, keeping himself on plain grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Army. Neither made he shew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnesse of his enemies to encrease, till it should break into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so near, as would be little for their good, if he should turn unto them, he hasted his march, even to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plain flight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; beleeving, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heels of those that had the Rear; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so that, amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this overthrow there were six thousand of the Mercenaries slain, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Campe at Vtica, others to the town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled unto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many townes revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himself in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never, to do their best, for the recovery of their freedome; he perswaded Spendius, and Autaritus, that was a Captain of the Gaules, to wait upon Amilcar, and alwayes to keep the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and he himself continued to presse the Town of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such wayes as there were: for all the Country lay not levell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, and once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plain, surrounded with hils, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Numidian

Numidian and African succours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his perſonall worth did greatly benefit his Country. For Naravaſus, a young gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occaſion, ſerving to get the acquaintance and love of ſo brave a man, which he much deſired: and therefore came unto Amilcar ſignifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all ſervice. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promiſed unto him his own daughter in marriage; and ſo wan from the enemies two thouſand horſe, that following Naravaſus turned unto the Carthaginians ſide. With this help he gave battell unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were ſlain ten thouſand of Spendius his fellowes, and four thouſand taken priſoners; but Spendius himſelf with Autarius the Gaule, eſcaped to do more miſchief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his priſoners: pardoning all offences paſt, and diſmiſſing as many as were unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they ſhould never more bear arms againſt the Carthaginians; threatning to take ſharp revenge upon all that ſhould break this Covenant.

This humanity was vehemently ſuſpected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, as tending to win from them the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they reſolved to take ſuch order, that no man among them ſhould dare to truſt in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any ſafety whileſt Carthage was able to do him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertiſement, wherein was contained, that ſome of their company, reſpective only of their private benefit, and careleſs of the generall good, had a purpoſe to betray them all unto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needful to look well unto Geſco, and his companions, whom theſe traitors had a purpoſe to inlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and ſhewing with many words, that the ſeeming humanity of Amilcar, toward ſome, was none other than a bait, wherewith to intrap thm all at once together; as alſo telling them what a dangerous enemy Geſco would prove, if he might eſcape their hands. Whileſt he is yet in the midſt of his tale, were letters come to the ſame purpoſe. Then ſteps forth Autarius, and ſpeaks his mind plainly: ſaying, that it were the beſt, yea, the only way, for the common ſafety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if ſome were deviſing to make their own peace, it would go hard with thoſe that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Geſco his life, than to trouble themſelves with looking to his cuſtody; that by ſuch a courſe every one ſhould be ingaged in the preſent Action, as having none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeak here-againſt, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the Souldiers, & could ſpeak ſundry languages, in ſuch ſort, that he was underſtood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geſco, and all the other priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheleſſe there were ſome, that for love of Geſco ſought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith ſtoned to death, as a Document unto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution. Neither were khey therewithall contented, but further ordained, that all Carthaginian priſoners which they took, ſhould be ſerved in like ſort: and that the ſubjects or friends of Carthage, ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home: which rule they obſerved ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need ſay no more, than that it was moſt execrable ferity. As for the counſell of uſing it, it was like unto the counſell of Achitophel; All Iſrael ſhall hear, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſperation. He that is paſt all hope of pardon, is afraid of his own fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the puniſhment of leſſe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull ſpirits of thoſe that have been wronged, are breeders of this deſperation: to which may be added ſome deficiency of Lawes, in diſtinguiſhing the puniſhments of malefactors, according to the decree of their ſeverall crimes. A coward thinks all proviſion too little for his own ſecurity. If Phocas be a coward (ſaid the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be ſtedfaſt and ſure, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defenſative againſt new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianity; and ſuch a quality diſcovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwiſe wise would have repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect even their gentleness, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like unto the errors of Princes and Governours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the lesse offence, and unto the greater; he that hath adventured to rob a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his own security.

Against these inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, used with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his old souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villany with answerable vengeance, casting them unto wilde beasts to be devoured.

Untill this time Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himself apart from Amilcar, and done little as may seem, for that nothing is remembred of him since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the war grew to such extremity, as threatned utter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joyned his forces. By this accesse of strength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Vtica and Hippagreta, that had stood alwayes firm to the Carthaginian party, did now revolt unto the enemy, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buryed. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Army, were lost in foul weather; and Carthage it self stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the safest course, to send forth, in great Expeditions, two generals of one Army. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joyned two chief Commanders in equall commission, upon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point the Venetians have been so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, & not their own in all the wars which they have made. It is true, that the equall authority of two commanding in chief, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in managing the war it self, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In wars made near unto Rome it self, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honour (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years service; it is no marvell, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one war; but each went whither his lot called him, to his own Province; unlesse one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was so, That the Romans did many times prevaile with their joynt Generals: yet was this never so seldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the lesse able Captain, though of equall authority, hath willingly submitted himself to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Army, received great and most dangerous overthrowes; whereof in the second Punick war we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their wars most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldome failed failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appear. Now of those ten Generals, which served the Athenians at the battell of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper been better, than the judgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so over-wary, and the other so hasty, as all came to nought that they undertook: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Country and Common-weal most remarkable service. For it is hard to find two great Captains of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often overslipt, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the prince of Conde was slain after the Battell of Jarnac, (which Prince, together with the admiral Chastillan, had the conduct of the Protestant Army) the Protestants did greatly bewail the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affairs. For so much did the valour of the one out-reach the advisednesse of the other, as whatsoever the Admirall intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sick of their ill grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controversies, unto the Army that served under them. The judgement of the Army was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affairs of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Army neer unto the City; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much, having in their Campe above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the City was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the wars in Sicil he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his own; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principality of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and, for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequell manifestly proved.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that come to their supply: so that finding themselves more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vain attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captain assisting the rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naravasus, made Spendius fearfull to descend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himself to his former method of war, keeping the mountains, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it self, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his own men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plain battell: untill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough to perceive their own disadvantage; and therefore they had the lesse stomach to fight:

fight; but a waiting for help from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present fear, and shut them close up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably, for succour that came not: and having spent all their victuals, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffred patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindfull of them. But when they were driven to such extremity, that they were fain to devour their own companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of relief: their obstinacy was broken, and they threatned their Captains with what they deserved, unless they would go forth to Amilcar, and seek such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autarius, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, unto the death, rather then perish by the hands of their own Companions. Hereupon they send to crave parlie, which is granted; and these three come forth to talk with Amilcar in person. What they could say unto him, it is hard to conjecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seems that they took the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coat. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, & so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle Articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to arms. But they wanted Captains to order them: and the same astonishment, that made them break the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of justice, in accomplishing revenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slain: being forty thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravasus, and Hannibal, carryed the war from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yeeld: Vtica and Hippagreta only standing out, upon fear of deserved vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief strength of the enemy. Comming before this Town, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay toward Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to help one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoved each to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his own destiny, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal: and with so great and unexpected fury he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he took Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loss, to continue the siege; but was fain to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no less within Carthage, upon the fame of this losse, than had been the joy of the late great victory. All that could bear arms, were sent into the field, under Hanno; whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captains surviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them forbidding the imployment of one sole Generall near unto their City (for they are known to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about repealing it. But thirty principall men are chosen by the Senat, to bring Hanno to Amilcars camp, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the careles speesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar & Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this war lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilest it gave some life unto his businesse. He had reason to do as he did: but he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of war, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so far abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one battail: wherein either his own desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matho: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it self in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their friends to help; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battail might have been foretold, without help of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the desire of liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to servitude, as the honour of their State would, in citizens, whose future & present good lay all at once ingaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians wan a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, & therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of favour. But they were soon forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this war. The war had lasted three years, and about four moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHilest Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africk; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own use. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Army (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the sudden. But these companies that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, & present profit, to joyn themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battail, for the good of that common-weal, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to run one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore to take away all jealousie and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrell of an unjust war, to enjoyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to performe some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kinde of cruelty did the ungratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possest himself of their City, by right of war; did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equall freedome, with the rest of the Cities united. These Revolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Ceſont les coups de vieille eſcrime. These (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the souldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolved unto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have risen between Spendius with his Mercenaries, & their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unless the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Country; the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, upon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with corn: of whom the Carthaginians took almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yeelded to release them all. This was so kindely taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Vtica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meer regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilcar: who, had he been overthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one main battail, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one sally made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choise. Wherefore it was not unwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced war against this enfeebled and impoverished City, under a shameless pretence; that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it self. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not not what reason they could alledge) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of war. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the money was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: she her self hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affairs of Carthage went between the African Rebellion, and the second Punick Warre.

THe injurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrell; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: and the best means were thought upon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts upon the Mediterran Seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and soveraign trust was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Countrey did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the generall love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: only they commended peace and quietnesse; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdome.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the straights of Hercules, (now called the straights of Gibralter) and landed on the western coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a battell that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his son in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of war; but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of armes. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City, upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselves in a war of far lesse importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to help this, at the present they know not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: it is enough if he requeſt, request, since his request shall have the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours, but in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pils, to avoid all occasion of war with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more fastidious, and resenting the injury, return such answer, as would intangle his whole Country in the quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent covenant inserted into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and sought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for fear of present war, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be mistresse over them, stood in fear her self, of receiving blowes from a stouter Dame; there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull unto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemy in war to the Carthaginians) into their society: and unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not pass, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that River, held almost all the Country. Howsoever it were, this indignity was not so easily digested, as former injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries, or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: war against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight years: (being slain by a slave, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, son of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the first Punick war; and the vacation following, between it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as the an after-spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a form of liberty: in petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captains, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each upon such towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; & some States were risen to such greatnes, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdome of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus the son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning six and thirty years; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly won it. This hapned unto him, by the revolt of his souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gaules, he was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young son Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep rocky hill on the North side of the town, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Ægean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle was able to cut off all passage by land, from one half of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious havens. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, untill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and seek her marriage. The foolish old widow perceived not how unfit a match she was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of marriage; wherto the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the middest of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousie had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity beseeming his old age. But as he had stollen it; so was it again stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his father, reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, was a young child when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his uncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince;

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crown at his death; This Antigonus, was called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Willgive, because he was slow in his liberality. He represſed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reign. Upon confidence of this good service, he took state upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutiny; but were soon appeased by fair words, and a seeming unwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaians took from him the city of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not been endangered by a neerer enemy. But civil dissension, which had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most; overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickneſſe; and gave to this Antigonus no lesse authority therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Lawes, and by their clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of weights, measure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclidæ, when Tisamenus the son of Oreſtes possest the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall government of their Predecessors into Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the reign of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battail of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a war, no lesse fooliſh than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or near it, Ptolemy the son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimæi, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-union, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amity, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimæi, to whom also the Cities of Titræa, and Phara, joyned themselves; Ægira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Achaians; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and soon after by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile, whilest his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own city by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against against Antigonus, whose subtlety was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsail of Aratus delivered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league; so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Energetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong & sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pieces, wherein the workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by some theeves that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his souldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kind of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open field, and plain battail, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began battail; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, & in a manner confined unto severall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplyed with much instruction, use, good successe, and other help, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Country he was ur reprovable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truly testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Troezenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerfull, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians, & Argos & Megalopolis, from tyrants that held them. The enterprise upon the Athenians was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the City by shew of love; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now grown honest slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carryed more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the City, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedome; sundry times, and with diverse events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battail; but all sufficed not: untill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired by Aratus, that he consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilest this business with the Argives was on foot, Lysiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two years together by one man:) every second year, for a certain while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysiadas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appear in due time.

The

The Achæans having obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open War upon Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battail, the Athenians wore Garlands, in sign of joy; to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheless when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by money, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achæans, loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by justice and honesty; so did the Ætolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it self, wax very powerfull, by sturdinesse of body, and rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do and suffer much, partly by the natural strength and fastnesse of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captains to other businesse, as hath been related. They had molested Cassander, in favour of Antigonus, & were themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the son of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often war with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardned with perpetuall travail; seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserved the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship, measuring all things by their own intolent wils, and thinking all people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themselves.

These Ætolians had lately made great spoils in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achæans; taken and sacked Pallene; where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gain made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatas: who prest them so hardly, that they were driven to seek help of the Achæans; which they obtained. The war which the Achæans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged; though very basely the Ætolians, giving thanks in words, devised how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achæans were desirous to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance & Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Ætolians laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedæmonians and Achæans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called in to help (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdome had sustained by the Achæans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedæmonians cause to take Arms. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: & not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedæmonians to look about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was alreay become Achean.

The City of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an

an Army, had carryed away fifty thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime been their general vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands: all the rest were needy people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himself a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends & Counsailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their own private commodity. They were hasty to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the division of Lands they afterwards hindred, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the lawes, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and served to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoin Lacedæmon to the Achæans Common-wealth: though it were great injustice to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it self, if it could have been wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also requite the injust attempts of the Achæans, even in their own kinde: obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponnesus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, should have been the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slain, took his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gave her in marriage (perforce) to his own son Cleomenes. This young prince fell greatly inamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himself to be King, whilest he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title, he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegea & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacademonians: wherin, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights travel, & discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have stayed the quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lysiadas and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the Achæans, (He and Lysiadas being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No disswasions of Aratus would serve, therefore he came in person, and took part of a business, little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himself against Aristomachus, who desired to give battail. Yet had the Achæans twenty thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedæmonian, & raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lysiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Nevertheless the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the year following; against Lysiadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himself, it behoved him to confute, with deeds, the slanderous words of Lysiadas. Therefore he purposed to set upon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battail, and drave him to hide himself all night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his own more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whilest there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantinæans, who did let him into their city. These Mantinæans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before joyned themselves with the Achaians; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achæan society. As this good success repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battail almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred near unto Megalopolis; where the Achæans had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lysiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; & taking with him all the horse, brake upon the Lacedæmonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slain by them and his followers driven back upon their own Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse and incensed the Achæans against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the war nevertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wan some Towns, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being weary, and the Spartan King intentive to another business.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull journeys, forsook the Achæan war on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slew the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gave he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched upon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the City; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplyed the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of Mercenary help, as it lately had done, to save it self from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himself ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any advantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for fear of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Country of Megalopolis, had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinæa; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to hear worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed and by better men. His Lacedæmonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himself had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the possession of a few Towns: but adventured to win or lose all.

all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantineæ, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and saw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he advised how to provide against the worst, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruine. The office of Generall, when it was next put upon him, he refused; fearing to be so far prest, as to hazard in one battail all the force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, overcharged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the Weal-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of battail; that Mantineæ had not only opened her gates unto Cleomenes, but slain the Achæan Garrison that lay therein; that other Towns had yeelded unto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Achæans, was now revolted unto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too far of to help; and the nearness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be usefull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his own profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose; and instructed them how to deal both with Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest unto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achæans, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should be sent unto the Generall Councel of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their necessity. This was granted, for lack of what else to answer: and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time borne unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more generall matter; wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans under the Patronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth, as it might stand with the Achæans good liking. Particularly he commended himself by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his own Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: & are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Achæans were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; & therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent; and praised the wisdome of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate; in that which himself of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurably, the generall consent.

Nevertheless

Nevertheleis, in true eſtimation, this fitneſs of Aratus might have been uſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrary courſe For it had bin more honourable to make an end of the war, by yeelding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: ſince thereby he ſhould both have freed his country from all further trouble, and withall, ſhould have reſtored unto the univerſall ſtate of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereſt it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pity) that Vertue, having riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelf, (as it were) in the ſeat of principality, by length of time, and ſucceſs of many actions, can ill endure the haſty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelf likely to be overtopped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelf more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was juſtly plagued, when he ſaw his own honours reverſed by the inſolent Macedonians: and in ſtead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long race of Kings, the poſterity of Hercules, was fain to do ſacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god, and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobility was but of five deſcents, and whom perhaps he might have ſeen his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolemy was loſt: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes; though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberality, as he had uſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeem, by their example, to be more wary both in truſting and diſburſing. Cleomenes himſelf, whileſt this buſineſs with Antigonus was a-foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achæans to battell. At the City of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their eſtate, without ſeeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had ſo great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamity was ſuch, that Aratus himſelf durſt not take upon him to be their Generall, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for peace; which was granted upon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate unto themſelves the command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would condeſcend, he promiſed unto them, that he would preſently reſtore all places taken from them, and all his priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans: who deſired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held, for the concluſion of the War.

Now ſeemed the affairs of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order, than they had ever been ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Wars, yea, or ſince the Perſian invaſion: when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extreme ſick, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neverthleſs he ſent home the chief of his priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his friendſhip: who aſſembled again at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it, and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of reſolving. When all would not ſerve turn, he betook himſelf to his cunning; and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hoſtages for ſafety of his perſon. Cleomenes, was already far on his way, when he met with this advertiſement; and took it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had been an eaſie matter, to have told him ſo much at the firſt, and not have made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſſe. Yet that which chiefly ſeems to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deal only with themſelves and their Meſſengers, or if he would adventure himſelf into the City, then to deprive him of all Royall ſhew, that might breed reſpect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, & for which he ſought to hinder his comming thither in perſon; leſt the people, hearing the promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, ſhould preſently be won with his gentle words, and finiſh the bargain without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining againſt theſe juggling tricks: and Aratus was not far behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Aſſembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were to fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their preſent weakneſſe, and renewed the War. Many Cities yeelded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wan Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this caſe Aratus ſent his own ſonne to Antigonus, intreating him to defer no time, but come preſently to relieve the diſtreſſed Achæans. Antigonus gave good words as could be wiſhed: ſaving that he utterly refuſed to doe any thing, unleſſe he might firſt have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was ſomewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promiſed to help the horſe againſt his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horſe ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be ſaddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honeſt colour to do it: ſeeing the Corinthians had no way deſerved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occaſion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arreſt him. So he withdrew himſelf out of their City, and ſent word to Antigonus, that their Caſtle ſhould be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other ſide ran to Cleomenes; who loſt no time, but made haſte with them to Corinth, where he ſought how to get poſſeſſion of their Caſtle, or at leaſt to ſave it from Antigonus, by ſurrounding it within Trenches, that none might iſſue nor enter without his leave. Whileſt this was doing, he took ſpeciall order, that Aratus his houſe and goods within the Town, ſhould be kept for the Owner; to whom he ſent Meſſenger after Meſſenger, deſiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponneſus; promiſing, that if he would hearken to theſe perſwaſions, then would he give him double the ſame penſion, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolemy. As for the Caſtle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponneſus, and without which none could hold aſſured ſoveraignty of the Country; he deſired that it might not be committed unto his own diſpoſition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty ſerved to no purpoſe. For Aratus, rejecting utterly the motion, ſent his own ſon as an Hoſtage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achæans, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes underſtood, he ſeiſed upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and waſted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Adverſary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Iſthmus; having paſſed with his Army through Eubœa, becauſe the Ætolians held the ſtraights of Thermopyla againſt him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatneſs, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good ſucceſs of this journy. At his comming thither he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with ſufficient ſtrength; yet with no purpoſe to hazzard battell, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, againſt which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able ſo to doe: he ſecretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loſs of men; finally he reſolved to turn aſide, and ſeek a paſſage over the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or ſome other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not eaſily made.

In this perplexity, newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no leſs troubled his enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that City; and the Garriſon which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly diſtreſſed, and ſtood in need of preſent help. Argos had alwayes been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbare to chaſe out thoſe whom he moſt ſuſpected, partly at the entreaty of friends, and partly, for that they all made ſhew to be glad of his proſperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elſewhere, as many as hoped tha the would cauſe all debters to be diſcharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan inſtitution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achæans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces the rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continual messengers, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos were almost lost: he began to fear lest his labour in guarding the entry should grow frivolous; the Achæans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his comming to Argos, that both Argives and Achæans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets: when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afar off, hasting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, then to make a safe retrait. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans; to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behind with him; but made him Captain-Generall over them and their Confederates: and further entred into covenant with him, That they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town, (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes, that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achæans. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be indured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left unto himself at his earnest intreaty. It might therefore appear, that this God was also spightfull. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the aid of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had been ohce Tyrant of Argos: afterwards Generall of the Achæans, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantinæans, for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achæans. For he slew all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bondslaves: dividing the spoyl; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The Town it self was given by Antigonus to the Argives; who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the flattery which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of servility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speak of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought in the Civil State of the Achæans, let us return unto this war against the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinæa, Orchomenus, Heræa, & Telphussa: Mantinæa he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achæans, with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; & that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reason reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinæa, & to those other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Egyptian promised much, but would perform nothing, unlesse he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt, yet the aid came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumised all the Helotes, which were the Lacedæmonian slaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis, that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The town he wan: but after he was entred, all that were fit to bear Armes rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them again, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great booty that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achæans at Ægium: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in comming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of his unlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achæans. When he had lain a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamors and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resign his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words; rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requite these bravadoes of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other side, laboured to keep the war from his own gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where he made such havock, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in scorn, to borow the keys. These were light things; yet served to dis-hearten the Achæan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting up his rest, without any more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans; and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus, comming unto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly encamped, upon and between the hils of Eva and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assailing their well defenced Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eva. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the straight valley between those hils, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only

disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the battail, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Euclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopœmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on horse, as a private young man, among the Achæans. Hee seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them; perswaded the Captains of the Achæan horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their places, untill they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopœmen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, intreated some of his own Countrimen to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he allighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to do the like: the folly of Euclydas being manifest, who kept the top of the hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plain, where they might fight upon even termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, untill the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, was like to have been surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawn himself with an extraordinary speed. In this battel ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta; where he had no desire to stay, finding only two hundred left, of six thousand Spartans that he had led unto this battail, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselves unto Antigonus; and promising to do all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and imbarqued himself for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Euergetes, who undertook to restore him to his Kingdome, and (perhaps) meant no less, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the mean season, he had a pension allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his son Ptolemy Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and base Men, unminded of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to return into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seem to invite him; Ptolemy and his Minions, would neither give him aid; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to try his own friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakness of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was, that with thirty of his Countrymen, he undertook a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seek their liberty. In which attempt he slew some enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalf) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolemy was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had been sent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudy end, as now befell his owne Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: wherein to never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own lawes and Government: tarrying there no longer than two or three dayes; after which he haſtned out of Peloponneſus, and never returned. The cauſe of his ſpeedy departure was, an advertiſement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran, and deſtroyed the Country. Had theſe newes come a little ſooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at leaſt-wiſe tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdome of Lacedemon would have ſtood, and perhaps have extended it ſelf over all Greece. But God had otherwiſe determined.

Antigonus fought a great battell with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-ſtraining his voyce; wherewith he brake a vein that bled inwardly, and in ſhort ſpace finiſhed his life, who was troubled before with a conſumption of the lungs. His Kingdom deſcended unto Philip the ſon of Demetrius, being then a boy: as alſo about the ſame time it was, that Antiochus, ſurnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemy Philopater, began to reign in Aſia and Egypt; Boyes all. Of theſe, Ptolemy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he firſt was King, yet continued a Boy all the ſeventeen years of his reign. The unripe age of Philip & Antiochus, bred ſuch inteſtine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is uſuall in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occaſion, when it comes, we ſhal more ſeaſonably ſpeak of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infeſted the coaſt of Greece; and how they were ſubdued by the Romans.

WHileſt things thus paſſed in Greece, and whileſt the Carthaginians were buſie in their conqueſt of Spain; the Romans had found themſelves work among the Sardinians and Corſicans, that were eaſily ſubdued at firſt, and eaſily vanquiſhed again, when they rebelled. They made alſo war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that laſted not long; being rather, as Livy ſaith, a tumult than a war. So that by all theſe light exerciſes their valour was hardly kept from ruſt. How the got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, it hath been ſhewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be utterly ſilent.

Liv. lib. 21.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia; a troubleſome Nation, impatient of reſt, and continually making war for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, king of Macedon, to help the Mydionians his friends, that were beſieged by the Ætolians; for that they refuſed to be of their ſociety. Before the Illyrians ſuccours came, the Mydionians were ſo far ſpent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chief Magiſtrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the victory, and the diviſion of the ſpoyl to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the ſiege to an end, and won the town: others, that were in hope to be choſen into the Office, contradicting this, and deſiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretty ſtrife, and ſomewhat like to that of the French in latter ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the victories, which anon they loſt, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wiſely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, That the old, and the new Prætor ſhould be joyntly intituled in the victory, and have equall authority in diſtribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finiſhed the ſtrife much more elegantly, and after another faſhion. They arrived and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians; and though good reſiſtance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own buſines, but ſtoutly ſallied out of the town. Many of the Ætolians were ſlain, more were taken, their camp and all their baggage was loſt: the Illyrians took the ſpoyl, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inſcribing the names both of their old and new Magiſtrate (for they alſo choſe new officers at the ſame time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The ſucceſſe of this voyage highly pleaſed Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his aſſiſtance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquiſhed the ſtouteſt of the Greeks, he found it not uneaſie to enrich himſelf by ſetting upon the leſſe warlike. For joy of this he feaſted, and drank ſo immoderately, that he fell into a Pleuriſie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left unto Teuta his wife.

Teuta gave her people free liberty to rob all ſorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if ſhe had been ſole Miſtreſs of the ſalt Warers. She armed a fleet and ſent it into Greece; willing her Captains to make war where they found advantage, without any further reſpect. Theſe fell on the weſtern coaſt of Peloponneſus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Meſſanians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and ſtayed at the City of Phœnice, to take in victuals and other neceſſaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gaules, that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, firſt Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheleſs revolted, and were for their miſdeeds diſarmed and ſent to ſea by the Romans, yet entertained by theſe Epirots, and truſted to lye in Garriſon within their Town. The Gaules were ſoon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which deſerved none other, in truſting them. All Epirus was preſently in arms, and haſtned to drive out theſe unwelcome gueſts. But whileſt the Epirots lay before the Town, there came news into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queen Teuta had ſent to help his fellowes. Upon this advertiſement, a part of them is ſent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Town, and the ſtraights adjoyning, by which theſe new commers muſt enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phœnice, to continue the ſiege. Neither the one nor the other ſped well in their buſineſſe. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyn with his fellowes; and they that were beſieged within Phœnice, ſallied out of the Town, and gave ſuch an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them deſpair of ſaving their Countrey, without great and ſpeedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embaſſadors were ſent to the Achæans and Ætolians: craving their help, with very pitifull terms of intreaty. They obtained their ſuit; neither was it long, before an Army, ſent by theſe two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to preſent battail unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Teuta the Queen, that ſignified a rebellion of ſome Illyrians againſt her: ſo that he had no mind to put his forces to hazard, but offered compoſition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ranſome their Town, and all their people that were priſoners; and that the Illyrians ſhould quietly depart with all their booty and ſlaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own country by land, ſending their booty away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no ſuch great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occaſioned in this voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandement of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whiles they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made unto the Roman Senate, were ſo frequent, that Embaſſadours were ſent to require of Teuta, that ſhe ſhould abſtain from doing ſuch injuries. Theſe Embaſſadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that ſhe had, in ſhort ſpace, tamed her rebels, and brought all to good order, ſave only the town Iſſa, which her forces held ſtraightly beſieged. Swelling with this proſperity, ſhe could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pirucy, required amends. Yet when their ſpeech was ended, ſhe vouchſafed to tell them, That injury in publick ſhe would do them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their ſubjects to get commodity, how they beſt could by Sea. But (ſaid the younger of the two Embaſſadours) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publick, of thoſe private wrongs that are born out by publick authority: therefore we ſhall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. Theſe words the Queen took ſo impatiently, that no revenge could ſatisfie her, but the death of him that had ſpoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, ſhe cauſed him to be ſlain: as if that had been the way to ſet her heart at reſt; which was indeed the mean to diſquiet and afflict it ever after.

The

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred sail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: for this injury is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall war. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of war and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, and in safety, between enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull to use violence to those Embassadors (thus employed to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, & subjects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practice against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any law whatsoever. For whereas the true office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amity; if it be not lawfull for one Prince to practice against the life of another; much less may an Embassadour do it without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no priviledge at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an errour, that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and less than she, both before and since: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had she easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater than of ten thousand men; and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her self. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it self, and one part of it fell with [a] Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In [b] Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achæans where called in to help; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: losing, besides others of less note, Marcus Carynensis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Corcyra, dismayed with this overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius Pharius, who took possession of it with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the mean season, Teuta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to try any other course, rather than to trust her.

[b] Corcyra, an Iland of the Adriatick sea, not far from Durazzo, called now Corfu, and in the possession of the Venetians.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely it was that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; where he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed along the coast to [c] Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he used thenceforth as his counsellor and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Army, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but upon news of the Roman army they disperse themselves.

[c] Apollonia, a City near Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, upon the Sea-coast. Pintus cals it Sissipolis.

From

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Partheniа; beat the Illyrians by sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queen Teuta to forsake the coast, and to cover her self in Rison far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans hast them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behind, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace; which she obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her ships of war towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to their country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good success upon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vain Greeks, & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the war between the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of Hannibal into Italy.

THe Gaules that dwelt in Lombardy, were the next, against whom the Romans took Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they took Rome and burnt it: though the issue of that war proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times their success was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrowes they received; and if they got any victory, it yeelded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well advised: lightly stirred up to war, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, less than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gave alwayes carefull heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertain; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were called wars, but tumultus Gallici, tumults of the Gaules: and rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italy, and used to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest ten or twelve years, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensive war, had leisure to grow, by setting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: that the Gaules never fell upon Italy with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was travelling in the same enterprize; or in either of the two former Punick wars: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious City. But it seems that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to use their times: & were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punick War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to set upon the Gaules in their own Country: and that was three years before the comming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battail, and slain L. Caecilius, with the most of his Army. Manius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassa-

Embaſſadours they ſlew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it ſo well, that they expelled theſe Senones out of their Country, and ſent a colony of their own to inhabit it. This cauſed the [a] Boji, another people of Gaule, to fear the like meaſure: who thereupon took arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their ſide. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battails; and thereby made them ſue for peace, which laſted untill the end of this Illyrian war.

a There were divers nations of the Boji, as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germany, in Bourbonois, in France, and in Aquitaine; but theſe Boji were of French race, and dwelt at this time about mouth of the river Po.

It vexed the Gaules to ſee a Roman colony planted in their Country; who had been accuſtomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Tranſalpines (ſo the Romans called thoſe in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to us they were neerer; like as they called Ciſalpines, or by-hither the Alpes, thoſe who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reaſonably preſuming, that as their disjunction had cauſed their loſſe, ſo their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the buſineſs was ſo fooliſhly carryed, that the Ciſalpines and Tranſalpines fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soon after, they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more ſubſtantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propoſed a Decree, which was ratified by the people; That, beſides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more ſhould be carryed thither, as would ſerve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly thoſe Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it ſelf, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the commonalty of Rome took this in ſo good part, notwithſtanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadfull Preſident extremely diſpleaſed the Boji, who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like diſplantation. And becauſe the reſt of the Gaules had reaſon to reſolve, that themſelves alſo ſhould be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Inſubrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joyned with the Boji, & upon a common purſe entertained the Geſſates, nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in theſe times. The Geſſates having received a great impreſt, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings Concolitanus and Aneroeſtus: who with the Boji and Inſubrians, compound an Army of fifty thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand horſe, and thoſe of the beſt men, and beſt appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom the Senogalli, that had been beaten out of their poſſeſſions, gave a great increaſe of ſtrength. On the contrary ſide, the Venetians, and the [b] Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeving in their proſperity and riſing fortune. For fear of whoſe incurſions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: with the reſt of their forces they entred into Tuſcane. The Romans hearing of this danger, ſend Æmilius to Rimine, to ſtop their paſſage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Conſul, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuſcane.

b Cenomanni are the people about Bergamo, on the North ſide of the river Po in Italy. There were alſo of theſe Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Country of Main.

Being at this time greatly troubled with the conſideration of this powerfull Army, which the Gaules had aſſembled, they cauſed a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of thoſe of their Allies: who were no leſſe willing than themſelves, to oppoſe the incurſions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cauſe, that their own deſtruction could not be prevented otherwiſe, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muſter, deſerve to be recorded: becauſe they ſet out the power of the Romans in thoſe dayes. With the Conſuls they ſent forth to the war four Legions of their own: every Legion conſiſting of five thouſand two hundred foot, and three hundred horſe; and of their Allies, thirteen thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe. There were alſo appointed for ſupplies (if any miſadventure came to theſe) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fifty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Sarſinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twenty thouſand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twenty thouſand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the Generall Army of the Gaules ſhould be thereby greatly diminiſhed. There were beſides theſe, to be ready againſt all uncertain chances of warre, thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, garriſoned in Rome it ſelf, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Over and above these great troups; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbred fourscore thousand foot, and five thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seventy thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand; in that of the [g] Japyges & Messapyges, fifty thousand foot, and sixteen thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the [h] Marsi, [i] Marrusini, [k] Ferentani, and the Vestini, of twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand four hundred foot, and four hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campanes joyntly, reckoning men armed, and fit to bear arms, there were registred two hundred and fifty thousand foot; and of horse three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and about six thousand horse. Calling up the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their confederates, it amounted to seven hundred thousand foot, & seventy thousand horse. But the number is somewhat mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to inrich himself by the dead payes: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he fals short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great soever this muster was, it seems to have been like unto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth invaded Milan; at what time, the better to encourage himself and his subjects, he took a Roll of all persons able to bear armes, within the Dutchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a teath [f] part of them into the field. Certain it is, that the battels of Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans fain to arme their slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Cannæ. Wherefore the marvell is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified with report of such a multitude For all heads are not fit for Helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter preparations, the Gaules keep on their way: and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had missed of them, came again fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem, that shewed no great fineness of wit, but such as wel beseemed those that had none other occupation than war; and stood them in good stead at the present In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not far, leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retrait; as if they had not dared to abide battell. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure as the Gaules desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules return, charge them, and kill six thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, & defend themselves, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Upon the comming of the Consull, the Gaules consult, whether they should give the Romans battell, or forbear. In which dispute, Anerostus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to return into their own Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoils and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the war, being without carryage, pester, or other impediment. This advice they all embrace; for, seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoils of their enemies, they thought it wisdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had been in sight. But as well in the wars of these later ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn head; yet in alwayes going on from the pursuing enemy, they find, within a few miles, either straight, hedge, ditch or place of disadvantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes knowes it as well as the Captain, that he which forsakes the field, perceives and fears some advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those succours that reason offereth, when it hath once possest the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make the retrait, are alwayes in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retrait be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503. upon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no lesse. For although a great troup of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot overtook, and defeated them utterly. During the wars between the Imperials and the French, Borsi and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs see the enemy, before they left the field. So was Strosi overthrown by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other the most advised Captains, (not finding themselves in case to give battell) have done. Je ne trouve point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraitte; I finde nothing in the art of war so difficult as to make a safe retrait. A sure rule it is, that there is less dishonour to dislodge in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la None gives this judgement of a dayes retrait, made in France; presently before the battell at Moncountour. For (saith he) staying upon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeed, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruin. And yet did that wo thy Gentleman Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncountour with so great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my self was an eye-witnesse, and was one of them that had cause to thank him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the safe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilius followes them as near as he can, without ingaging himself, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Atilius the other Consull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gaules inclosed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front. To sustain Emilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois; in the Front they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gaules inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Aneroestus; with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatall overthrow, the Gaules lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the year following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to use their victory: they gave not ten, twenty, or thirty years time to the Gaules, to repair their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boii; but by reason of the great rains that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Furius and Flaminius invade the Milanois; and prevail very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Nevertheless these Consuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resign their Office: because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the contents, was not hasty to open them: but first gave battell unto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then perused the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Country of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by a way of Delegacy, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself and his fellow Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in processe of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being disposed, M. Claudius Marcellus, & Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that year. The Gaules about this time desired peace; & were like to have obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present war, was at an end. So the Consuls hasted into their Province, where they besieged Acerræ, a town not far from Novara (so far had the Romans pierced already) in the Dutchy of Milan. To divert them from this siege, Britomarus sat down before Clastidium, a town in the same Tract, with a great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerræ, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deal well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls comming, and met him upon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his own personall valour, that he rode out single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in the presence of both Armies: whereby his own men took such courage, and his enemies were so dismaied, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his own hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipio's, and divers of the Roman Captains, especially Cæsar, were better men of war than any of these three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima Spolia, The Armour of a Generall slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to do.

After this victory, Acerræ was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan soon after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City it self, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territory possest by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countreys, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlawes and Theeves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twenty years, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it standing alwayes open, when they had any war) save once, in the reign of Numa; nor in long time after, untill the reign of Augustus. But this their present happiness was not to last long: a dangerous war, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilest the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the son of Amilcar, was about six and twenty years old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army, as soon as Asdrubal was dead: & the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno & his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barcas) that had command in chief, over the men of war. Which honour would perhaps have been lesse envied, by these domesticall enemies, if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar in saving his Country from imminent ruine, inlarging the Dominion thereof, and inriching it with treasures and great revenues; so was it retained, by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was unreprovable; nor to performe the like services unto the Common weal; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of War, and cautelous advice of not provoking the Romans. This they seasoned other-whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to bear ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himself. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were she never so quiet, and officious; unlesse she would yeeld to become their subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than untill the Romans could finde some good advantage, to renew the war: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their own state was in good case, the war should begin; than that in some unhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld unto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time devised of this businesse) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should find friends and assistance, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forrain wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to hear that he had set the war on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his design. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might seem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignity of that Spanish Towns alliance with her half friends. So should he assay both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his own Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he nevertheless went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the war against Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore he entred upon the Territory of the * Olcades; and having besieged Althæa (Livie calleth it Carteia) their chief City, he became, in a few dayes, Master not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he first undertook, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he rested his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoils he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the war against the [a] Vaccæi: and without any great difficulty, wan first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, [b] Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all such of the Vaccæi, as were able to bear armes, being made desperate, by the spoil of their country, with those of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had escaped in the late overthrow, joyning themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. These four Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never saw enemy, upon whom he durst not give charge; were throughly resolved, that his naturall valour would at this time no less neglect the cold advice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to use it. But he that makes himself a body of Crystall, that all men may look through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition, makes himself (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wise men, though they have single hearts in all that is just & vertuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others look into being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he served under Asdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the most adventurous, but that which may beseem a Captain, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwayes become a Chief; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have been found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of war knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himself from the River-side, as if fearfull to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude, from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in fury and disorder, into the swift stream, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defences on the contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well near over; he turned back his Elephants to entertain them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kinde of Lance de Gay, sharp at both ends, which they held in the middest of the staffe; had such an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their strokes, clattered together, and unable to move or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they slue all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadours to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeed; onely because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cry out, that War should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carryed it. So it was only concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their confederates: which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended war against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselves, upon the report of these Embassadours; and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serve to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius an Historian of sincerity less questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptory Embassage (as Livie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the covenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was sent upon none other pretence, than prevention of war.

* A people (saith Stephanus) neer the River of Ebro. But in the old description of Spain, in Ortelius, they are found near Tagus, and by Sadar, not far from New Carthage.

[a] A people of Castile the old.

[b] Arbucala, or Albricala, an in-land City of the Vaccæi in Aragon.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his help against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, & having many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among neighbours) of which, Hannibal himself had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but sat down with his whole power before their Town. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions, not only because the War, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their own. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, untill they had an Army in readiness to be sent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himself over-straightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an unthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward the fame of the Carthaginian war, emboldned him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazzard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Iles of Greece; against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and seised upon some places, that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might have sped better. For the businesse with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun, when he declared himself, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Æmilius, was sent against him: who in seven dayes wan the strong town of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terrour upon the Country round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebell had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Army, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert, presenting himself the next morning, with twenty ships before the town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consull, and was soon intercluded from the town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creek, where he had shipping ready for him, and imbarqued himself: leaving all his estate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This business, though it wer soon dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sate down, ere Æmilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lye many dayes unable to move. Nevertheless he was not unmindfull of his work in the mean while; but gave order to raise certain movable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applyed, had soon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was given: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which upon the first fury they had won; but they were pursued even to their own trenches and camp. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, whe rein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did so weary the Townsmen with continuall travail, that at length it got within the wals; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the City, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himself out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered were so severe, and without all compass of honour, as Alcon durst not return to propound them to his Countrymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the City: yea, the City it self to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assign some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustain themselves, than the cloathes on their backs or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they far better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have injoyed their lives, and saved the honour of their wives and daughters) then to have rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soon after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were defloured before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and sell their bloud at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying unrevenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great; Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Army: the slaves, and other booty, he divided among his Souldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slowness, in forbearing to send help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their honour, by taking sharp revenge. To this end they sent Embassadours again to Carthage: demanding only, Whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with milde words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the generall of our Army in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his own counsail; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske us. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull or unlawfull for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults & errors; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lutatius the Consull, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lutatius, to your own disadvantage, you cast it upon your Consuls presumption as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and people of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disavow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargains, which Asdrubal hath made for us, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meer cavill. For Lutatius the Consul, in his Treaty of peace with the Carthaginians, had expresly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better, to have dealt plainly; and to have alledged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjury the State of Carthage, being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treaty of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Asdrubal, and all other businesse between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoever we require; else will we make War, without regard of our oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Livie himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge: we may reasonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the war, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plain termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his gown, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to imbrace. Hereat all cried out at once; Even which of them you your self have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and share it among you. Which the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make War, it was meerly frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to sustain the War. The rusty sword, and the empty purse, do alwayes plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the war brake out; Don John with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spain, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he took all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he

he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soon as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain, and Africk. His journey into Italy.

WArre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his sword which he had drawn against the Saguntines, untill he had therewith opened his passage unto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punick War; second to none, that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the mean while he gave instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the government of Spain in his absence. He also took order, to send a great many troups of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the number of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that so the one Nation might remain as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteen thousand; eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the * Baleares. Besides these he selected four thousand foot, all young men, and of quality, out of the best Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it self, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serve for hostages: for among those four thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their severall States, had their Sons or Kinsmen. He also left with his brother, to guard the coasts and Po ts, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the war. Of Africans and other Nations, strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spain aud Africk; he sent discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenæan Mountains, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadours to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gaules, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadours and Discoverers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past over the River of Iberus, with an Army consisting of fourscore and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spain, into which he had not entred before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who sate stil at Carthage) to govern Spain on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also do, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journey seemed the lesse tedious unto those that accompanyed him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaule. He found the Gaules that bordered upon Spain, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Country: but won them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the bank of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the River, a people called Volcæ. These were unacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keep him from passing over the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vivarets and Lyonnois. For although many of them had transported themselves & their goods, into the Country of Dauphine thinking thinking to defend the further bank against him: yet such as remained, being very desirous to free their country of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Countrymen well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own store of corne and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boats; informed him of another more easie passage, higher up the River: & lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Army were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the son of Bomilcar, up the River: himself in the mean while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was: that Hanno charging the Gaules unawares upon their own side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further bank was won, though with some difficulty; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants; who marvellously feared the water. He was therefore driven to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and Turfe; whereof he fastned one to each bank, that might serve as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose upon which the beasts were towed over.

Having past this first burnt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of those that defend it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes; that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himself extremely incombred by the Savoyans; and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other side. And whereas his journey over the Mountains cost him fifteen dayes travail, he was every day, more or less, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this passage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory: gave them great comfort and encouragement to go on: having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to over-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vain solicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THe Countries of Spain and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadours, who had denounced the war at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spain in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spain; from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise than so; For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, have been utterly rooted out, & destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us, That for our parts (and so I think, I may answer for the rest of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands; who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volcians, the Embassadours took their way towards the Gaules; using their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy, through their Territory: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, selves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to scorne, and had hardly the patience, to hear them speak. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italy, entertain a war which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the war among our selves, and in our own Territory, by force which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, toward our ancient enemies? Have the Romans deserved so well of us, and the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our own houses, to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance: and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who have no way as yet offended us, nor we them.

With this unpleasing answer the Embassadours returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to help them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gave hasty proof. For when the newes was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre up the Boji, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it seems they could not win; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flie to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the relief of the besieged. But the Gaules, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running, a little village, but defensible; upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent, to relieve the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Army, and supplyed by a new levy.

As the Gaules were too rash and hasty; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war. They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost servilely endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so brave and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy it self. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls to make warre in Spain, the other in Africk: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africk, with an hundred and sixty Quinqueremes, or Gallies of five to an oare, which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the winde also favourable, as in five dayes he recovered Massilia. There he was advertised, of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found busie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arrivall: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry, as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred, and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to look upon the wals of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Nevertheleſſe he ſent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greateſt part of his fleet and Army, to try what might be done againſt Aſdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in the Country. He himſelf, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Piſa; and ſo paſſing through Tuſcane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troups of Manlius & Atilius that lately had been beaten by the Gaules: with which forces he made head againſt the enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travail of his painfull journey.

§. IV.

Scipio the Roman Conſul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum: Both of the Roman Conſuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battell at Trebia.

FIve Moneths Hannibal had ſpent in his tedious journey from Carthagena; what great muſter he could make, when he had paſſed the Alpes, it is not eaſily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thouſand, and his horſe at twenty thouſand; others report them to have been only twenty thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe. Hannibal himſelf in his Monument which he raiſed, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter ſumme. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increaſed his Army, in ſhort ſpace. But when he marched Eaſtward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thouſand foot, & eight thouſand horſe; of which, all ſave thoſe remembred by himſelf in the Inſcription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have periſhed by diſeaſes, enemies, Rivers, and Mountains; which miſchiefs had devoured, each their ſeverall ſhares.

Having newly paſſed the Alpes, and ſcarce refreſhed his wearyed Army in the Country of Piemont; he ſought to win the friendſhip of the [a] Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held war at that time with the Inſubrians, which were his good friends; and refuſed (perhaps for the ſame cauſe) his amity. Wherefore he aſſaulted their Town; and wan it by force in three daies. Their ſpoil ſerved well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell unto his ſide: many for fear, many alſo for good-will, according to their former inclination. This diſpoſition ran through the whole Country: which joyned, or was all in readineſs to joyn with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Conſul his arrivall, made ſome to be more adviſed, than the reſt. The name of the Romans was terrible in thoſe quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſul was already gotten through the moſt defenſible paſſages, ere any ſpeech had been heard of his approach: many ſate ſtill for very fear, who elſe would fain have concluded a League with theſe new-come friends; and ſome, for greater fear, offered their ſervice againſt the Carthaginians, whom nevertheleſs they had wiſhed well to ſpeed.

[a] These dwelt about Turine, a goodly City, now ſubject unto the Duke of Savoy which from them took the name of Auguſta Taurinorum.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the tryall of a battail. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it ſtrange that the Conſul, whom he had left behinde him on the other ſide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himſelf in the Plains; Scipio admiring the ſtrange adventure of paſſing thoſe Mountains, and the great ſpirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibals ſucceſs, and ſudden arrivall. Wherefore they diſpatched a Meſſenger in all haſte unto Sempronius, the other Conſul, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to underſtand hereof: & letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the war in Africa, it was now their pleaſure that he ſhould forbear to proſecute any ſuch attempt, but that he ſhould return the Army under his charge, with all poſſible ſpeed, to ſave Italy it ſelf. According to this order, Sempronius ſent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to land the Army at Ariminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haſte. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come ſo near, that fight they muſt, ere they could part aſunder. Hereupon both of them prepared the mindes of their Souldiers, by the beſt arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a preſent example, that he ſhewed upon certain priſoners prisoners of the Savoians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having been no less miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be delivered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slain, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftains of the Gaules were wont to use in single combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his own lot might speed; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolvedly: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poor creatures were willing, upon whatsoever uneven termes, to ridde themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but even him also, who being slain in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their own condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their own estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetuall slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himself any hope of life by flight; since the Mountains, the Rivers, the great distance from their own Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their own case; seeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own soil, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many wayes to save themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertain such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seems impossible) did no way presse them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no mean between victory and death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Captain of France) La commodite de la retraitte advance la fuite; The commodity of a retrait, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to use the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late war they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troup of Brigants and Theeves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustain the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (said he) yee your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after so many travails and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roan, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himself, fearing our approach, ran head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, then by the sharp swords of the Romans, which had so often cut down his people, people, both in Africa, and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the gross of his Army, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their troups, to assist them: himself with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to try the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courragiously, & were as courragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for fear of being troden down by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding the Gaules maintained the fight and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consull unmindfull to relieve them: their hardiness deserving his aid; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he adventured himself so far, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been left in the place, if his son (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Consull; an unexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Romans in flank, and to compass them about, whilest he with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ran away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose looks were fastned upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all betook them to their speed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Army thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of wisdome, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest overtook him. For he saw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battail of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner stole the retrait; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left six hundred of his Rear behinde him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to break the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of war, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be understood in this sort: If a Generall of an Army, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or finde his Army fearfull or wavering, it is more profitable to steal a safe retrait, than to abide the uncertain event of battail.

It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could pass the River; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himself of his wound in Placentia. But as soon as Hannibal presented his Army before the Town, offering battail to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Camp; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftains and Souldiers, than Aneroestus, Britomarus, and Gessates, were come to help them: if they had the hearts to help themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell upon the Roman Camp; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and presented their service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their own places: as men likely to be of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other service at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a retrait, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, sent the Numidians after him: following himself with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoil, had not staid to ransack their camp: and thereby given time to all, save some few in Rear, that were slain or taken, to pass the River of Trebia, and save themselves.

being both unable to travell by reason of his wound, and withall, finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Consul; incamps himself strongly upon the banks of Trebia. Necessity required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeem their own hostages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens & pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their own men and lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clastidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hasty revenge, than any great sorrow for their loss received; seeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him sent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. He therefore hasted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls devised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibals arrivall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gaules.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affairs in those parts; sought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himself the sole glory of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his own time being well-near expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the unskilfulnesse of the new-come souldiers: and withall, gave him good reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally unconstant, were upon termes of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and loss of time. For the strength of his Army, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own home, had many passions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules, inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romans for help: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyn with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injury: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse: which comming unlooked for upon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chaced the rest even into their own camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians sally out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length all the Roman Army was drawn forth; and a battell ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in generall desirous to try the main chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the victory by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a water-course, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their camp, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his Camp, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and cool their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one sixteen, of the other twenty thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse; thrusting their light-armed, & Darters, in loose troups in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies swords: & being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompensed with the loss that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champain, being by far inferiour in horse, and withall, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or un-even grounds and wood-lands, would have bin of no use. His second error was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought; whereby he was grosly over-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his footmen with empty stomacks, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an army tyred with travel, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of minde is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showres; or would not perceive him, because they were over wearyed. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Country that was over-run by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could have made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in chosing new Consuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymene.

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharp, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who, being not able to keep the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet; but vexed them with continuall Alarms: assayled divers places, and taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents, and winning the Ligurtians to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithfull love, with two Roman Questors, or Treasurers, Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in straight places, loaden with irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not only well intreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his party and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswassions. They stood in fear, lest he should make their Country the seat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding upon them, and wasting their territory. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practice against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to use Perwigs of hair, and false beards of divers colours; to the end that he might not be deseryed, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Fain he would have passed the Appenines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gaules, till he had seen more swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddie companions, & bring the war neerer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more serviceable friends abroad, than in their own Countrie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journey. Nevertheless, to avoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travell through the Fens and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogs, he lost all his Elephants, save one, together with the use of one of his eyes; by the moistnes of the air, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deep mire and water. In brief, after he had with much adoe recovered the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served so again, unlesse he quickly finished the war. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his adversaries, by faining some religious impediment, should detain him within the City, or find other business for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Conntry between Fesulæ and Arretium he put to fire and sword, even under the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stir, that would not have sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captain of France hath said; Pays gaste n' est pas perdu; A wasted Country is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians went burning down all Italy before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest; saying, that the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded that it should be digged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withall, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousie, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Cortona, as far as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he pursued Hannibal so unadvisedly, that he fell with his whole Army into an ambush cunningly laid for him, between the Mountains of Cortona and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all sides, (save only where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make resistance. So was he slain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thousand dead carkasses of his Countrymen. About six thousand of his men, that had the Vantguard, took courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If these had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which, kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardiness, was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair of saving their lives by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not any way discovering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noon the ayre was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellowes. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone ere they were descryed and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no minde to return unto the fight. For descryed they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who over-took them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring up their armes, upon his promise of their lives and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirm; saying, That it was made by Maharbal without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own honour) what it was to keep no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawfull unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or adde unto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be fain to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperity, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fifteen thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he set free without ransome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyranny, that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters, making them learn to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italy, if not a love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall safety, but only the preserving of her own neck from the yoke of slavery, which her over-strong enemies would thrust upon her in revenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by succesſe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battels. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battell of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with four thousand Roman horse, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was sent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but, comming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost half of them, drave the rest unto an high piece of ground, whence they came down, and simply yeelded to mercy the next day. Servilius himself was in the mean while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular jealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is, that all men are far better taught by their own errours, than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had been taken up but the year before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered he himself to be caught soon after in the same mannner. He had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battell, without help of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with shame and losse; else would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been so hasty to fight, before the arrivall of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consull Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his government of France ten years, Cæsar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there been every year a new Lievtenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have been subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to inform it self, within one years compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to prosecute a War to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them have returned as wise as they went out; others have profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of War, and government, fitting the Country, they have bin called home, & new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever been the course of the World rather to follow old errours than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours to uphold their slothfull ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other ages and people; though neither likenes of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring War. Minutius the Master of the Horse honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successefull attempting; adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Army, but rescued by Fabius.

GReatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill success, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than ever did war since Rome it self was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could work wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded upon hate: he only sought honour, and fought (as it were) upon a bravery: demeaning himself like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his ability, which to withstand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto controll of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but upon some extremity, and for no longer time than six moneths. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood upon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time the one Consul being dead, and the other too far off, the People took upon them, as having supreme authority, to give the Dignity by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus; the best reputed man of war in the City. Novum factum novum consilium expetit. Contrary windes, contrary courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which officer was customarily as the Dictators Lievtenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of Religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion been also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the Books of Sibyl were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of devotion; then must we beleeve, that those books of Sibyl, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an evill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this war to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before: also that great playes should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumpery. This vehemency of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemency of fear. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons return alive from Thrasymene, may serve to bear witness though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The wals and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges upon Rivers were broken down; and all care taken for defence of Rome it self. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Ostia to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levied in haste: and from Arminum he received the Army which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

Liv. lib. 22.

With these forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwayes lodged himself on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the mean while, pursuing his victory, had ranged over all the Country, and used all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches for Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Having refreshed his army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City: only he had assayled Spoletum, a Colony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Army found true at Poictiers, a little before the battel of Moncountour; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Jean d' Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himself in any such enterprise, as should detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battell, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences between souldiers bred up, ever since they were boyes, in war and in bloud, trained & hardned in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no ofter seen the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neer, as he kept him from stragling too far; and preserved the country from utter spoil. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and he brought them first to look on the Lyon afar off, that in the end he might sit on his tail.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardize and fear. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moved with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth it self sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battell: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Appenines, and to fal upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded to adventure the Roman Army in battell: but being far too weak in horse, he alwayes kept the Hils and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though afar off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was loaden with spoil, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can be done he must passe along by the Dictators camp, that hung over his head upon the hils of Cellicula, and Casilinum: for otherway there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly garden-country, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer errour of his guide, that he first entred within these straights. For he would have been directed unto Cassinum, whence he might both assay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under hand, and hinder the Romans from comming near it to prevent him. But his guide misunderstood the Carthaginian pronuntiation, and conducted him awry another way, from Cassinum co Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose hornes he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driven up the hils. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly affraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them, and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army, recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him & the City, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barnes and Store houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtilty and ambush, which he thought himself wise enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthynesse to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; and the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at home bearing office in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, took he the matter never so hainously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therfore he drew near, & to provoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Army to waste the Country. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutius, by plain force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himself thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good heart against the next summer: if besides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, incourage his own men, terrifie his enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Country at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battail to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and loaden with booty, could make no resistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakness, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Asdrubal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldned Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not such hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own camp; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: saving that he chose such a worthy Lievtenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearfull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his own place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to do so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe issuing from bad counsell was more to be feared, than calamity; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Against these sermons every one cryed out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which office warranted him to speak, and do what he list, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Town, in our greatest necessity, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himself can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborn to spoil some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into envy and suspicion,) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the war to last long, that he himself might be long in office, and have the sole Government both of our City and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should again take it from him and conferre it upon one more worthy. But lest, in moving the people hereto, I should seem to doe him injury; thus far forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming benefic all at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to think that his generall intent and care of the Weal publique, was less than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both unto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) unto that dignity, whose great power had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prætor, was glad of such an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the son of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew by often brabling, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very basenesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot invective, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobility; saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they sought to humble the Commons by poverty, and to impoverish them by Warre; especially by war at their own doors, which would soon consume every poor mans living; and finde him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise; and since they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deserts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius: and, having finished all requisite businesse, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude in hindering the decree. The newes of Minutius his advancement, was at the campe as soon as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successively, for some longer time, should command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should never be his superior: He would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with half of the Army he could not work such wonders as other wise he hoped to accomplish. Nevertheless he meant to do his best, and so taking his part of the Army, incamped about a mile, and a half from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Livie seems to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two severall Commanders are not subordinate one unto another, nor joyned in Commission, but have each intire and absolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp shall not hold them both, without great inconvenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief successively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius, by turnes. He saith that Minutius was very refractary; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to divide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loose from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the proof and assurance of their liberty.

It

It behoved the Master of the horse to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no less carefull of getting occasion to fight than was Fabius of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many & spacious caves; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But lest by any misadventure they should be found out, and buryed in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to business little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which not long before had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it, he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his own troups with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught, & so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest the Romans defended themselves losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew near, in very good order to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving afar off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly thrown himself and his followers, did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himself by hasting to do good, than by suffering his enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himself to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to have been saved. So from this time forwards the war proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilest his Office lasted which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vain a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italy; took hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed over into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoyl the country, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicil; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the camp, with his fellow-Consul, where they took charge of the Army.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the war quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces levyed against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

WIth little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome hear the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but he had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was never heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man to discharge the grief and anger of his own private losse, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike, whilest the Iron was hot: his own worth being little or none, and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Comminalty were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplyed all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, that Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but, had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius when he commanded over all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the war would never be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians as had long since been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobility, and contemned the meaner sort, ever since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meer new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well deserving of them. By such perswasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alledged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose; and he again deposed: either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum took name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in use at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred parted themselves into Tens or Decuries, and governed successively, by the space of five dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only upon the chief of them with these Ensigns of power. This custome was retained in times of the Consuls; and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to slip five dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well asswaged. Upon such change of those, that were Presidents of the election, it was also lawfull unto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publickly declare themselves to seek those offices. But no device would serve against the generall favour borne unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed over, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleeved) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had urged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who few years since had overcome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was urged by the Nobility to stand for the place; which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himself any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, He, and M. Livius that had been his companion in office, where afterwards injuriously vexed by the people, and called unto judgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grievous losse; the other bravely winning, in the most happy victory that ever befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the war: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders

he would work, and that he would aske no more, than once to have a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day: yet the providence and care of Paulus travelled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls Servilius and Atilius, desiring them to abstain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might finde the four old Legions well accustomed to the enemy, and the enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assist him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised, it is uncertain. Fourscore thousand foot, at the least, and six thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barly, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own estate would fall to ruine, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsell, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Otacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicil, that he should accordingly pass over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicil, twenty five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gaules, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip, the son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavill about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilest the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could without incurring the necessity of a battell. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the misery following. Hannibal for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans to be near him, lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all necessaries, to the loss of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouthes to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battell, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand how this Peece taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battell with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheleſſe anſwer was returned unto Servilius, that he ſhould have patience yet awhile: for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a power ſufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the ſeaſon of the year commodious to take the field, the two Conſuls, with their Army, ſet forth againſt Hannibal: This was alwayes done with great ſolemnity: eſpecially, whenſoever they went forth to warre againſt any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and ſolemne Vowes, were made unto Jupiter, and the reſt of their gods, for good ſucceſs and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principall men, (not only ſuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Voluntaries, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanyed on their way, and diſmiſſed with friendly leave-taking, and good wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Æmilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his country remarkable ſervice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troup no leſſe in greatneſs, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to have exhorted the Conſul Paulus, with many grave words, to ſhew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious folly of his fellow-Conſul. The anſwer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would doe his beſt for his Country: but if he ſaw his beſt were likely to be ill taken, he would think it leſſe raſhneſs to adventure upon the Enemies ſword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diſſenſion between the two Roman Conſuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans preſſed him to fight. The great battail of Cannæ.

THeſe new Generals, arriving at the Camp, diſmiſſed M. Atilius, one of the laſt years Conſuls, requeſting it becauſe of his age and weakneſſe: Servilius they retained with them, as their Aſſiſtant. The firſt thing that Æmilius thought neceſſary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad ſucceſs hitherto, had gathered more cauſe of fear, than of courage. He willed them to conſider not only now, their victories in time paſt againſt the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no leſs than all that Rome at the preſent was able to ſet forth. He told them in what danger their Country ſtood; how the ſtate and ſafety thereof reſted upon their hands; uſing ſome ſuch other common matter of perſwaſion. But the moſt effectuall part of this Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambuſh he had ſtolne the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia & Thraſymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconſiderate raſhneſs of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one ſaw not his enemies, untill he was ſurrounded by them; the other ſcarce ſaw them, when they ſtruck off his head, by reaſon of the thick miſt, through the darkneſſe whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their ſnares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had againſt the Enemy; and how deſtitute the Enemy was of thoſe helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed againſt them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their beſt. They were eaſily perſwaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Armes, gave them cauſe to think, that under a Captain ſo well experienced, and every way ſufficient, as Æmilius was known to be, they ſhould eaſily prevail againſt the Carthaginians, that came ſhort of them in all things elſe, ſave craft; which would not alwayes thrive. But in one thing they miſtook the meaning of their Generall. It was his deſire that they ſhould have heart to fight; not that they ſhould loſe the patience of a waiting a convenient ſeaſon. But they, having pre-conceived a victory, thought all delayes to be impediments: and thereby ſought to robbe themſelves of their beſt help; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the war quickly; wherein since Æmilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to use it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius; who was no less popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus whi'e the Romans think themselves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places less fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last years provisions, return into Campania to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varro) savour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth savour no less of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably every day. Æmilius lodged six miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come; he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running til they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheless he sate down close by Hannibal: who, as an unbidden guess, gave him but rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell upon the Roman Vant-courrers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loss, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troups weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces over the water, to lye upon the Easterne bank, where they entrenched themselves. He never was more unwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occasion should draw him to more equall termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches; but fortified himself; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Army forraging the Country, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Livie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of base courses that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Livie) but ten dayes provision of meat. He had not money to pay his souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that he knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run over to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himself was once upon the point, to have stoln away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot unto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsail, he resolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithful Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilest he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him to that, which he most desired, even to fight a battail upon open Champain ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livie, to speak the best of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their own great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he saith, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam (dicitur) agitasse; Hannibal (is said) to have have bethought himself of flying into Gaule: where he makes it no more than a matter of hear-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the process it self, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuals enough, and all things needfull unto his Army, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to do the like this year; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harvest; since he had long been Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions? Sutable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corn and cattell, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Country, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and loaded his followers with spoil: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie, to do the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who give it as a principall commendation unto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men soever fought bravely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested and swore, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserve and seek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a senseless device. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, took so little pleasure in the Country and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his horse? or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to live; having betrayed all his Army, and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butchery of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal takes in a manner all his directions from Livie. But of this & the like it is enough to say, That all Historians love to extoll their own Country-men; and where a loss cannot be dissembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the Enemy, & given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgovernment of their own forces: as if they might easily have won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the River Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vain, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to use his own authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the first break of the day he began to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him, and sought, as in former times, to have disswaded him from putting the estate of his Country to a needless hazzard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could alledge none other than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battell at their Trenches: should they endure this Bravado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Camp; and drave them shamefully to run within their defences, which also they made offer to assail: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Æmilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater camp opposite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was less able to spare from the battail, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Consuls went over the water with their Army to the lesser Camp, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battail: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay passed likewise over, somewhat higher up the stream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own camp so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bad them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune than to joyn battail with the Romans upon such a levell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevail? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was fain to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may even encourage your selves, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as seen. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaule; and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many hours passe, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what work they were likely to have with these Romans? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replyed) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them never so diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad mood of his brother with a jest, and shew himself merry unto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himself had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battail of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fift: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners, and enow to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when battail is at hand, to work upon such passions, as must govern more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is wanting; without which they are but vain boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himself; expressing no lesse perfection of his military skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his enemies to battail; He marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troops, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name, Enfans Perdues; but when we use our own termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deep in File. Between these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed each after their own Countrey manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules using long broad swords, that were forcible in a down-right stroak; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their navell upwards, as confident in their own fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giving charge, but soon wearyed, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more wary; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to return, and renew the fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; so the place which they held in this battail, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present war. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilest the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the uttermost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the enemy could not presse far upon them, without further ingaging himself than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had hapned, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should be overhardly pressed. So, casting them into the form of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vant-guard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as serving only to guide it orderly back, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthned and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have been so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behind it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I have seen of this Battail, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood between the last ranks of his long Battalions, and in the head of his Rear; doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battalion and the River Ausidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, under the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Livie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Rear. The whole summe of Hannibals Army in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and He, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deep than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had been found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rear, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, under shelter whereof the disordered troups might re-ally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of imbattailing was very unprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Æmilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other associates: Cn. Servilius the former years Consul, had the leading of the battail. The Sun was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, between the Roman Velites, and Hannibal his Darters and slingers of the Baleares: Asdrubal brake upon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of service on horse-back, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to to pierce and break thorow. Wherefore they not only used their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so their horses running from under them, fell many to the ground; where starting up again, they began to deal blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were over born, and driven by plain force to a staggering recoile. This the Consull Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequall both in number, and in horsmanship. When the battails came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and somewhat more than enough, to break that great Crescent, upon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battail drew towards the midst; by whose aid, these opposites were forced to disband, and flye back to their first place. This they did in great haste and fear: and were with no lesse haste, and folly pursued. Upon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foul; both for that there was void room enough; and forasmuch as the Rear, or Hornes of this Moon, pointed into the safe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight of the Gaules and Spaniards, it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limb or utter compass of the half Moon, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inside outward: the horns or points thereof, as yet, untouched, only turning round, & recoyling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an half circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming unable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they enclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not pass far, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undiscerned, untill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themselves, as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have been so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulk of their Army, into the throat of slaughter; had they seen those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnes of inferiour Captains: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in war, being vanquished in horse, had put himself among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that he and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, having broken the troups of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed upon them along the River side, beating down and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himself was either driven upon his own Legions, or wilfingly did cast himself among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheles he cheared up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own stout behaviour: beating down and killing many of the enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battail; and with better suces. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troup of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakness, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company company alighted, thinking that the Consul had given order so to do: as in many battails, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consul had willed his horse men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand & foot: meaning that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was marvellously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and down about that great sandy Plain, raised a foul dust; which a strong South wind, blowing there accustomarily, drave in- to the eyes and mouthes of the Romans. These, using their advantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearyed the Consull and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battails were even ready to joyn; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behind their backs, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing down their armes, rendred themselves. This was good luck to begin withall, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as he bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Under their Jackets they had short swords and poniards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were slain, and therewithall flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plain levell ground, found means to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal, having in short space broken the Roman troups of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Company of Æmilius that rushed into the gross of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their own Battalions; did not stay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearfull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more work toward, than they could hope to sustain; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no less wise than they, in apprehending the greatnes of his own perill; nor more desperate, in striving to work impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shrank from him, to sustain the impression alone, which he could not have indured with their assistance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heels of him and his flying troups, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himself, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whither or which way, whilest every one sought to avoid those enemies, whom he saw neareſt. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmelius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do; yet I will rather believe it, than suppose that Livie so reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Consul sitting all blouded upon a stone, intreated him to rise and save himself; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to shift for himself, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought again into judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himselfe ſelf of that dayes loſſe. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as faſt as well they could, and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindfull of his wholeſome counſail. Theſe words (peradventure) or ſome to like purpoſe, the Conſul uttered to Lentulus, either when againſt his will he was drawn to that Battail, or when he beheld the firſt defeat of his Horſe; at what time he put himſelf in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he ſaid a good while before this; when he thought the Conſul and his troup, in little better caſe than if they had been bound. The whole Groſſe of the Romans, was incloſed indeed as within a ſack; whereof the African Battalions made the ſides; the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Aſdrubal with his horſe, cloſed up the mouth: in which part, they firſt of all were ſhuffled together, and began the Rout, wherein all the reſt followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not ſit his horſe, whileſt the battail yet laſted, and whileſt the ſpaces were ſomewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himſelf; was now (had he never ſo well been mounted) unable to flye, having in his way ſo cloſe a throng of his own miſerable followers, and ſo many heaps of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It ſufficeth unto his honour, That in the Battail he fought no leſſe valiantly, than he had warily before, both abſtained himſelf, and diſſwaded his fellow-Conſul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly loſt, it had lien in his power to ſave his own life unto the good of his country, never more needing it; I ſhould think, that he either too much diſeſteemed himſelf; or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankfull Citizens. But if ſuch a reſolution were praiſe-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour, then was the Engliſh vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viſcount Liſle, ſon to that famous Earle of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battell of Chaſtillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grievouſly, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, eaſily able to have eſcaped, and not anſwerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refuſed to forſake his Father; who foreſeeing the loſſe of the battail, and not meaning to ſtain his actions paſt by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble ſon to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, ſave two or three thouſand, who (as Livie ſaith) eſcaped into the leſſer camp; whence the ſame night, about ſix hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with ſuch of thoſe in the greater camp, as were willing to try their fortune, conveyed themſelves away ere morning, about four thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, partly in whole troups, partly diſperſed, into Cannuſium: the next day the Roman camps, both leſſe and greater, were yeelded unto Hannibal by thoſe that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this eſcape: only he reports, that the ten thouſand, whom Æmilius had left on the Weſt ſide of Aufidus (as was ſhewed before) to ſet upon the camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their deſire, which they had well-near done, the battail was loſt: and Hannibal, comming over the water to them, drave them into their own camp; which they quickly yeelded, having loſt two thouſand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the firſt ſight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of theſe did flie; and thereby eſcaped, whileſt their fellowes, making defence in vain, retired into their camp, and held the enemy buſied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whoſe fault or fortune was like) that having ſerved at Cannæ, were afterwards extremely diſgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horſe what numbers eſcaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that ſaved themſelves in the firſt charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Conſul recovered Venuſia, with threeſcore and ten at the moſt in his company. That he was ſo ill attended, it is no marvel: for Venuſia lay many miles off to the Southward; ſo that his neareſt way thither, had been through the midſt of Hannibals Army, if the paſſage had been open. Therefore it muſt needs be, that when once he got out of ſight, he turned up ſome by-way; ſo diſappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of ſuch as could not hold pace with the Conſul, but took other wayes, and were ſcattered over the fields; two thouſand, or thereabout, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made priſoners: the reſt were ſlain, all ſave three hundred; who diſperſed themſelves in flight, as chance led led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battail of Cannæ, besides L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourscore Senators, or such as had borne office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last years Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battail, Livie makes no greater than three thousand foot, & three hundred horse: too few to have defended for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Livie saith, to have been over-cowardly yeelded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yeelded in the greater camp, when their company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning fals out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some four thousand Gaules, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the war had presently been at an end. But he beleeved not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victory.

Of things following the battail at Cannæ.

NOt without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthagian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, unto whose honour they consecrated their travails, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemn this liberty of censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantiall arguments, to justifie his own Relation; and confuteth the vanity of those former authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than he deserved, of his owne Country. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some works of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least hear both sides speak: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and beleeve so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) fair probability. This attentive circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnancy, or forgetfulness, which we find in the best Narration of things following the Battail of Cannæ. For it is said, that foux thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia, that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusium, choosing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well-near ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had been taking order for pacifying those tumults in the City, which grew upon the first bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent unto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while before he wrote those letters, which overtook (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the overthrow overthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuall dependency in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman camp, and trussed up the spoils, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman party, and make alliance with Carthage. The first town that opened the gates unto him, was Cossa, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him; not only in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Country, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving respect unto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he used unto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now after this great victory at Canna, He had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate against him that had sought to deliver them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their love by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all wayes and means, to make them his, whilest all other motives were concurrent. At this time also he began to deal kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred unto their Estate; but being provoked by injuries, sought to right himself and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of these two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should bear soveraign Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Noble man of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feel the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much adversity, and could stoop unto desire of peace. But with the Romans these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or most of them, save the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their losses past; but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Bruttians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not untill the former generation utterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italy most bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as straightly conjoyned, as were any save the Latines, changed on a sudden their love into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italy, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, answerable unto the country, whereof it was Head, so great, fair, and wealthy, that it seemed no lesse convenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, bravery is the least requisite unto soveraign command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like Jayes by their feathers, despised the unfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard unto the Majesty of Rome, and could not indure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was up-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their city to the Carthaginians shortly after the battail of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania: the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the neerenesse of the Roman Army, or some other fear of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actuall rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacy: or had leisure served, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle usage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) unable to hold any such negotiation, without advice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld up their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithful meaning, were driven to sit still in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no smal number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of liberty; that even the lawful government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to fear lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans bring them under a more straight subjection, than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into some outrage, Pacuvius made use of, to serve his own ambition. He discoursed unto the Senate, as they sate in Counsel, about these motions troubling the city: and said, That he himself had both married a Roman Lady, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking of the Roman party was not now the greatest: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to joyn themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and save them harmless. This he spake, as a man well known to be beloved himself by the People, and privie unto their designes. Having throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promised nevertheless to deliver them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them, that these wicked Governours were surprised by his policy, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger upon the old. So rehearsing unto them the names of one or two Senators; he asked what their judgement was of those. All cryed out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for such an election, was silent; until at last some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were utterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, baseness and insufficiency; or else even because they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest man to be substituted, having been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtless) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for saving all their lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this by all obsequiousness, to court the People; giving the reines unto their lawless Wil, who else were likely to cast them down. All the city being thus of one mind; onely fear of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battail at Canna, this impediment was removed: and few there were that would open their mouthes to speak against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campans, did then serve the Romans in the Ile of Sicil; the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadours were sent unto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Fear. These, whersoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented unto them the greatness of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campans must now, not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themselves, but make war in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto he is said to have added a foolish Invective against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carkases, & to feed upon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campans themselves,

He

He put them in mind of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; with money, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before they were somewhat timorous in adventuring to seek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadours were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, upon these conditions; that the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should be subject unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soever, whether in War or Peace; and that Hannibal should deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as themselves would chose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, opposed himself earnestly: using, in vain, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadours unto Hannibal, and this also did he, when the new alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of service, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speak with him in the camp. This Magius refused: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginians; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himself towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, and was not well provided to lay siege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pomp: all the people issuing forth of the town, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly City, and passed over his first entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy and Rome it self, should be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not think him a Campan, but a traitor to the State, and use him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand upon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal: who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal setled his friendship with the Campanes: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speak against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whilest he was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the town (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other towns thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Acerræ, were the Cities next adjoyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled towns; but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants. Rome it self was in extreame fear of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the overthrow at Canna: and the grief of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the losse already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courtiers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had throughly enformed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatall books buried alive two men and women, Gaules and Greeks, in their Oxe-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions; we may justly think that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Divel. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollo; & enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatnes of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Otacilius, whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africk. In these were contained newes of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; & of another fleet, riding among the Iles Ægatis, which was in readines to set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soveraign charge of the Weal publique, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weal-publick. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the generall reputation. If this comming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchednes, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Livie would have us think, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeve him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised four new Legions, and 1000. horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very boyes. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in accompt of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; four new ones of Prætextati, or striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them 8000. sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manfull service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, That whosoever ought money & could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arme these Companies, they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoils of their enemies that had been there set up: among which, were 6000. Armours of the Gaules, that had been carryed in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were fain to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was that Carthalo with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor kinsfolk, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their

their ſuit; which yet they obtained not. Beſides the generall cuſtome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and ſtrengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken priſoner in the former War) not to be too tender of ſuch as had yeelded to the enemy; much was alledged againſt theſe who now craved ranſome: but the ſpecial point was, that they were wilfully loſt ſince they might have ſaved themſelves, as others did. It ſufficed not unto theſe poor men, to ſay, that their offence was no greater than the Conſuls; they were told, that this was great preſumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuſes, whereby to avoid the diſburſement: whether it were ſo, or not, that any ſuch Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we finde recorded. Neither muſt we regard it, that the ſlaves which were armed for the war, are ſaid to have coſt more, than the ſum did amount unto, that would have ranſomed theſe priſoners. For this is but a tale, deviſed to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been ſevere; when as indeed they were ſutable to the preſent fortune, poor and ſomewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued thoſe Roman ſlaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Maſters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranſome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for ſlaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet muſt we withall conſider, that theſe private men did only lend theſe ſlaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchiſed) untill the War ſhould be ended. If Hannibal would have given ſuch long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, ſeeing he dealt only for ready money, they choſe rather to ſay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like auſterity, upon the ſame reaſon, but contrary pretence, was uſed toward the Souldiers that eſcaped from that great Battell. Theſe were charged for having fled: as the priſoners were, for not flying, when they might have done ſo. True it is, that in ſuch caſes (if ever) that which they call Raggione del Stato, may ſerve for an excuſe: when the Common-wealth, being drivn to a miſerable exigent, is fain to help it ſelf, by doing injuries to private men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerved at Canna, to be tranſported into Sicil; and there to ſerve, not as others did, untill they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or elſe were fifty years of age, but untill this War ſhould be ended, how long ſoever it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thrifty cenſure was afterwards laid upon others, for their miſ-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, ſave only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brain'd fooles his companions; who, being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of ſo great a loſſe, were deviſing, after the battell, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſtfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheleſs it was quietly digeſted, the excuſe being no leſſe apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having diſpatched all needfull buſineſſe within the Citie, took the field with five and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot finde: nor more of him than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater evill: for of any evill done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak eſtate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oſtia, with a Fleet ready to ſet ſail for Sicil, having one Legion aboord his ſhips; and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Iland, and do what harm he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, he ſent theſe of his new Levie to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Canuſium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven, whereby it stood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoyl of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Country. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid wast, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: & such talk used some, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chief; a stout young Gentleman, and Souldier of especiall mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Cannæ; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greatest thanks he could unto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman state, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius so far in love with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by composition; and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrell, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Town; which he sought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town should presently rise; and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him busied within the City, whilest the Carthaginians should scale the wals; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the Enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three severall gates, looking towards the enemy: he gave a straight command, that all the Citizens should keep their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the wals were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals, and thought nothing less, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected sally the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The sudden terrour was more available unto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that War, forasmuch as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, took a strict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above threescore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the mean season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisedome to lose time in perswasions, but laid siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrified the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore, before his Works were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal; as being unwilling that an enemy so near should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slain in plain battail, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great fear they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that having three years since demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to hear, That in a skirmish not far from Rome, he appeared to be a man, and not resistlesse. At Casilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Prænestines there were, and about four hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battail at Cannæ, being sent by their severall States to the Camp: whither whilest they were marching the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and sent them back sorrowfull; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many trains laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Western part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountred with greater forces: but these few found him more work than he expected. Divers assaults he gave, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who fain would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him an expresse charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the overflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his journey, such entreaties were needless. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarryed at Rome so long, as till extream famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of corn were sent by night, floting down the River; and when some of these, being carryed awry by an Eddie of water, stuck among the Willowes on the bank, whereby this manner of relief was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the stream, which faintly sustained the poor besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and whatsoeuer grew green under the Wals was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seed. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Casiline untill the Rapes were grown. Wherefore though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy: yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ransome; which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them, according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casilinе, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he restored it. To the Prænestine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were in Prænestе: which is no weak proof, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Casilinе was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For winter overtook him long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintred at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

WHen Mago, the son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battell at Canna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded or slain, how the stout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to battell; That not without reason their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that followed the fortune of those great victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief seat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had been entertained, where he meant to rest that winter attending their supply. As for the war, He said it was even at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Country: that so many battels had much diminished his brothers Army: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corn, and other necessaries; but that these things must be sent from Carthage; which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, he caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatnesse of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the * principall of that order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punick Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopeful advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvell, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader unto peace with Rome, Whether

* Thus Livie reports it; and credible it is, that while Rome was poor, the bravery of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would have permitted, though otherwise Jus Annuli, The wearing of the Ring, was the generall priviledge of the Roman Equites.

Whether he were ſtill of opinion, that Hannibal ſhould be yeelded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for this their good ſucceſs. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the ſame formall anſwer, which Livie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conſcripti, by a term proper to the Romans; and putting them in minde of his own ſhamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Ægateis: yet the ſumme of his ſpeech appears to have been no leſſe malicious than it is ſet down, forasmuch as Hannibal himſelf, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed againſt the wickedneſs of this Hanno; ſaying, that his hatred againſt the Barchines, had oppreſſed their Family, when otherwiſe it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made ſuch a jeſt of theſe victories, as is reported; ſaying, It ill beſeemed him, who had vanquiſhed the Romans to call for more help as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their camp, filled forſooth with ſpoil, to make requeſt for meat & money. To theſe cavils, if anſwer were needful, it might be ſaid, That other booty than of horſes and ſlaves, little was to be found in the Roman camp: the beſt of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few * ſilver ſtuds in the bridles and trappings of their horſes. If Hannibal had taken any main convoy of money and proviſions, going to ſupply all wants of a great army in ſome other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards ſaid to have done, when they wan the camp of Aſdrubal, that carryed along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italie) then might ſuch an objection more juſtly have bin made unto his demand of a ſupply. But the moſt likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he beſt might hope to prevail, contained a perſwaſion to uſe their fortune with moderation; and now to ſeek peace, whileſt they had ſo much the better in war.

What would have been the iſſue of this counſell, if it had bin followed, it were not eaſie to ſay. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italie from the danger of war; yet it is not likely, that the faith, ſo often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have bin kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of ſo many ſhamefull overthrowes; ſince after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no ſubmiſſive behaviour could preſerve Carthage from ruine, longer, than untill ſuch time as Rome was at leiſure from all other wars. This counſell therefore of Hanno, though it might ſeem temperate, was indeed very peſtilent; and ſerved only to hinder the performance of a noble reſolution. For it was concluded by a main conſent of the Senate, that forty thouſand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of ſilver, ſhould be ſent over to Hannibal: and that, beſides theſe, twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, ſhould be levied in Spain; not only to ſupply, as need ſhould require, the Armies in their Province, but to be tranſported into Italy.

This great aid, had it been as carefully ſent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Hiſtorians would not have found cauſe, to taxe the retchleſſe improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreſhing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finiſhed the buſineſſe, with leſſe dangerous adventure; and the pleaſures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanes, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be imployed in the following Warre. But either the too much careleſneſſe of thoſe, that were loth to make haſte in laying out their money, before extreme neceſſity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than ſenſe of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been ſo well ſet down. The * Elephants were ſent: and ſome money peradventure, uncertain it is how long after. But thoſe great forces of threeſcore thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, came not into Italy, till much was loſt of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was firſt conſumed by time, and ſundry accidents of warre. Only ſome ſmall numbers, no way anſwering unto the proportion decreed, were ſent into Spain; and the journey of Aſdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were paſt, and the Romans had recovered their ſtrength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by

by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse of Ægatis. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans on the other side, having three or four years together been forced to some extraordinary cost, are fain to go upon credit, even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arme for their defence. Such advantage in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-City in the bottome of the straights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would again rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to performe whatsoever should be enjoyned them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded up all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) This Trade of Merchandice, by which ye now live, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thus I think, and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his own private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the war strongly) was over-past, go more leisurely to work, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy; so going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdome to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazzard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so do) finished the war, might easily make Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conquest of Rome.

* Of such ambition Hanno directly accused Hannibal, saying, that he made war, that so he might live compassed with Legions, as knowing no other way to make himself a King. Liv. l. 21.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own slackness, incredulity, dulness, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursments in Spain, than to set up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible to hold a Country of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being, (as in a new conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been, to make a running Warre, by which

which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their main intendment against Rome it self, untill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporiæ have been besieged and forced: which, by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the town of Emporiæ, was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified: a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Græcians, though not over much trusted. Wherfore to force this town of Emporiæ, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have been a work of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battell at Cannæ: yea, it had been in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the war; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, near unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making strong war upon their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seat of the war transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their own purposes, did make them easily wink at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the purse full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travell for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had bin somewhat more than needful. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were far lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weal publick above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complain, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon successe of things in Italie, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard, and almost impossible to set down. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livie, the tender love of his own Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others; yet must we not, for his sake, beleeve those lyes, which the unpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found Pol. l. 1. in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we finde in the life of Amilcar, set down by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall, infusing such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberall. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catulus when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their Arms and forsake Sicil, threatning, that otherwise he would not talk of any composition:

Amilcar

Amilcar boldly bad him chuſe, whether he would talk of it or no; for that the Armes which his Country had put into his hands to uſe againſt her enemies, it was not his purpoſe to yeeld up unto them. Now ſince the Romans, contrary to their cuſtome upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his wil, & not to ſtand with him upon point of honour, whileſt otherwiſe they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man conſumed with miſeries, as Fabius would have him ſeem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth, ſaying, that howſoever Amilcar and his Souldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themſelves as men that had no ſenſe thereof; and were as far from being either vanquiſhed or tyred, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as alſo perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman ſtory) & thoſe that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty city of Rome: we muſt take it in good part, that howſoever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very fooliſhly his own ſhamefull overthrow at the Ilands * Ægateis, with the great ſervices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet [a] elſwhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the ſame Hanno his mouth, making him ſay, That the affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the loſſe of their Fleet in that battail at Sea: wherein himſelf was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cauſe to wiſh, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, & others of the like ſtamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not cauſed him to think too well of their relations; which are ſuch as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italy.

IT hath been ſhewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul returning from Gaule into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his deſcent from the Alpes, ſent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with fourteen thouſand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horſe, had been allotted unto the Conſul, therewith to make war in Spain againſt Hannibal: who, ſince he was marching into Italy with the ſtrength of his Army, P. Scipio beleeved, that a good part of theſe his own forces might well be ſpared from the Spaniſh Expedition; & therefore made bold to carry ſome of the number back with him, ſending on his brother with the reſt, as his Lievtenant. Publius himſelf remained in Italy all the time of his Conſulſhip: which being expired, he was ſent Proconſul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of eight thouſand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of theſe two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and as they are reported, ſomewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain, againſt the Carthaginians: whom they vanquiſhed in ſo many battails, and withdrew from their Alliance ſo many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cauſe to wonder, how the enemy could ſo often finde means to repair his forces, and return ſtrong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might eaſily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durſt adventure to break it: ſo the ancient reputation of the firſt Conquerors might ſerve to arme the Naturals againſt theſe Invaders; and to reclaim thoſe, that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of ſuch ill ſucceſſe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treaſure: which eaſily raiſed Souldiers, among thoſe valiant, but (in that Age) poor, and gold-thirſty Nations. Neither was it of ſmall importance, that ſo many of the Spaniards had their children, kinſmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or ſerving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if we durſt be bold to ſay it, the victories of the Scipio's were neither ſo many, nor ſo great, as they are ſet out by Livie. This we may be bold to ſay, that the great Captain Fabius, or Livie in his perſon, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extreamly dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Asdrubal, being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battell, save only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troups, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; upon which he fell with more than threescore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so have they said to have done in the last battell between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us; unto whom it were no wisdome to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporiæ, an Haven town, not far within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the story begins of him, I could easily beleeve, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and having no jurisdiction in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to have none other errand, than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or fear; especially when he had won a battail against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is, that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgate, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiors; Majestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conservent, which is; as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindely) uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implyed it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ; of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargusians; Hannibal had found at his comming among them such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heirs,) He made him not onely Lievtenant-generall over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferiour Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyn; it being the custome of all conquered Nations in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present evill which they felt, then regardfull of the greater mischief, whereinto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of this Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which, it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battail with Scipio; wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stissum, a town hard by, and won it, it. But Asdrubal having passed Iberus, and comming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far from Tarracon, whom he found careless, as after a victory, roaving abroad in the country; and with great slaughter drave them aboord their ships. This done, he ran up into the Country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where having set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his comming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force; having lost Athanagia their chief City, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vain, that the sharp Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were fain at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to help their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold War against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeve, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stir, untill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deep snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably think, that they sought their own benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening again unto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live uuder their own Country Lawes, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar, till when they were never throughly conquered. Liv. lib. 21.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ran not too farre on ground, he took: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flye into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himself in Lucitania. Yet it followes, that the Ilergetes did again rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him hostages. These took from the Carthaginian three Towns, and vanquished him in two battails; wherein they slew fifteen thousand of his men, and took four thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and hence forward the two brethren joyntly administred the business in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did haud cunctanter, without both fear or doubt, passe over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it; and, among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Asdrubal. Bostar, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the countrey, was by freely restoring unto them their hostages; as resting without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the hostages, carryed them all to the Roman Generals: perswading them, as he had done Bostar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much love, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we finde that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleeve so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The year following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet; and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Masters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navie. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These do much mischief, so that Asdrubal is fain to make a journey to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assail him, that they drive him for very fear, to encamp himself strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battail. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kils the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should lead his Army forth into Italy; which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplyed him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needs have it so, that then they must send him a successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to imploy they should finde work more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse; Asdrubal must needs be gone: Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that service, both by land and sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherfore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himself with store of mony, that he might have wherewithall to win the friendship of the Gaules; through whose Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembring to ease him of his care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects: and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest town in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him and fight a battell with him: which they win the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, & afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slain: and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battails were fully joyned. Their Campe the Romans take and spoil: whereby (questionlesse) they are marvellously enriched; all the mony that could be raked together in Spain being carryed along in this Italian expedition. This dayes event joynes all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisements is sent to Rome; and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither mony, apparell, nor bread, wherewith to sustain their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: so as unlesse they may be supplied from

Rome

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evill season; the State being scarcely able, after the loss at Cannæ, to help it self at home. Yet relief is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhe e, into the relation of things whereof the truth is less questionable. At the comming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we think, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his own safety? They find him, and Mago and Amilcar the son of Bomilcar, with an Army of threescore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably conjecture to have stood, where Carinnena is now in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Ilergetes their neareſt Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The town is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and having victualled the place, incourage the towns-men to defend their wals as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threescore thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and took that day, besides prisoners and other booty, fifty and eight Ensignes. Liv. lib. 23.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by war, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Countrey, wanting money of his own; and being beaten in his journey, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Camp was taken after the battell by Ibera. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten again at Incibili: where there were of them above thirteen thousand slain, Liv. ibid. and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius, Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Livie gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubil; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum Album, a place in the midway between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Countrey round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some stragglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behovefull, to retire unto some place more assured. So Publ. withdrawes himself unto Mons victoriæ: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, over-looketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himself to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, untill his brother Cn. fetcht him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great city of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Bætis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians passe over Iberus, to besiege Iliturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the year before. But thither they goe: and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them the next day, and in two battels kils above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with six and thirty Ensigns. This victory (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Munda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great battail fought, that lasteth four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable victory: and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carryed into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians again: but kils not half so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troups of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gaules, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entred into this war. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Countrey once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for having so long forborne to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to performe. At the present they won Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof unto such of the poor dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them if they had been able.

Liv. lib. 24.

But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporia, an Haven town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phocæans, kin to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They have easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost again, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their own unsetled passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held intire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleeve, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we think, that all those battails lately remembred, after every one of which Asdrubal sate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the war from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their own places of strength, and therein to attend the levy and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two years business. Of these Celtiberians we hear before, That they have yeelded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serve in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; perceive; unleſs pehaps in thoſe daies it were the Roman cuſtome, or rather the cuſtome of ſome bad Author whom Livie followes, to call every meſſenger, or ſtraggler, that entred their camp, an Hoſtage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, ſend an Army of thirty thouſand to help the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fitteſt men are choſen, and carryed into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any of theſe three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him ſuch newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the leſs unwilling to follow Aſdrubal, when he ſhall next have a deſire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when theſe mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, preſuming on this acceſs of ſtrength, divide their forces, and ſeek out the Enemies, who lie not far off with three Armies. Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar, is neareſt at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being deſtroyed; Mago the ſon of Geſco, hearing the newes, will make uſe of their diſtance, which is five dayes march, and, by running into the furtheſt parts of the Country, ſave themſelves from being overtaken. Publius therefore muſt make the more haſte, and take with him the better ſouldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army; leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes ſomewhat the ſooner to his lives end. Mago, and Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, are not ſtudying how to run away: they finde no ſuch neceſſity. They joyne their forces together; meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him ſo hardly, that hee is driven to keep himſelf cloſe within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himſelf not well aſſured. Eſpecially he is vexed by Maſaniſſa, Prince of the Maſſæſyli, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chief honour of this ſervice is aſcribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous caſe, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spaniſh Prince, is coming with ſeven thouſand and five hundred of the Sueſſetani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be ſtraight ſhut up, and beſieged, he iſſues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way; leaving T. Fonteius his Lievtenant, with a ſmall company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the firſt incounter. The fight continues ſo long, that the Numidian horſe appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all ſides: neither are the Carthaginians far behinde; but come ſo faſt upon him in Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turne, yet fighting and animating his men, where need moſt requireth, is ſtruck through with a lance, and ſlain: very few of his Army eſcaping the ſame deſtiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Aſdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forſake him; pretending that they had war in their owne Country. If Anitorgis, where Aſdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it, a Celtiberian town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may juſtly beleeve, that they were won by Aſdrubal, and eaſily perſwaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they ſhould have had for hazarding their lives. Cn. Scipio therefore being unable to ſtay them, and no leſs unable, without their help, either to reſiſt the enemy, or to joyn with his brother, maketh a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Aſdrubal preſſeth hard upon him: and Mago, with Aſdrubal the ſonne of Geſco, having made an end of Publius, haſten to diſpatch his brother after him. Scipio ſteals from them all by night; but is overtaken the next day by their horſe, and arreſted, in an open place of hard ſtony ground, where growes not ſo much as a ſhrub, unfit for defence of his Legions againſt ſuch enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of eaſie aſcent on every ſide; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-ſaddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliſado. Theſe weak defences the Carthaginians ſoon tear in ſunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that ſaving themſelves, I know not how, within ſome woods adjoyning, eſcape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before ſaid. It is a terrible overthrow, they ſay, out of which no man eſcapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and shrowd themselves within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's camp, on the North side of Iberus, fearfull (as may be supposed) of his own life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to chose a Generall by most voices, prefer this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lievtenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, comming upon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slain) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beats the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely sounds the retrait; reserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now again little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former security; and utterly despising him, set neither Corps de garde nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Souldiers with lively words; and tels them, That there is no adventure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being undertaken. They are soon perswaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and steals upon the Camp of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleep, or very drowsie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbines, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all affrighted the Carthaginians runne head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Camp, Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the Rampart: which as many do, as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two camps he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarm before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soon as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning upon this further camp: which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can save themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seven thousand of the enemies perish in this nights work; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius addes, that the camp of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slain: and that in another battail with Asdrubal, there were slain ten thousand more; besides four thousand three hundred and thirty taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livie therefore hath elsewhere well observed, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battails. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livie reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distress, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far less than that which is here set down.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vice-gerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, He stiled himself Propretor. The Fathers were no leis moved with the tidings than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies levied to serve that Province, could be sent away; yet could they not stay a tide for defence of the City it self, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for the title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise the victories of Martius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the overthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaim, it would not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no issue, but only through a straight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himself thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition that he and his Army might be thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this business; That night by night he conveighed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Countrey, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep out by night, the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far lesse value. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needfull to work regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the son of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the war into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly wel conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase love; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, savouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he used to walk alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; How a Dragon (which must have been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entring her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to adde unto the glory of Rome: that this noble City might seem, not only to have surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsull was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principall Citizens offer himself as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreams: and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I find in the too partiall Roman Historians, I do not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; & with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carryed with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a majesty, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly affraid of him: and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the lesse they could give any reason of it. If we must beleeve this, then must we needs beleeve, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some think, all the next year) he did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Town by Land and Sea; and won it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the wals; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing upon a demy-Iland, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Western side of the wals, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding some part thereof a shelf, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navill, Scipio thrust thereinto some companies of his men; who recovered the top of the wals without resistance: the place being left without guard; as able to defend it self by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City, easily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livie himself cannot certainly affirm; but is fain to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spain was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie; restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neareſt Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly fugitives use, of the pleasure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies, but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio: then could nothing have been devised more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans never masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himself the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet nevertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, having stoln a Town by surprise, was too far transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his mood, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, undertook new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, sate down before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amisse, if the passage over the Lake had been undiscovered, and the Town held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingring War of taking and retaking Towns, whilest the main of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal, the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: even to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming upon Asdrubal; his Vant-currers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small piece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the foreside; by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he strongly encamped himself: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plain; into which he descended, more upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battail, for which this was no equall ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flye. Out of such a battell, wherein he had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troups, to have marched toward the Pyrenees, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, are reported after this to have consulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have too long detained us.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumius the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gaules. Philip King of Macedon enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joyning with the Ætolians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WEE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans corn into his own barns, and to drive away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled towns in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Casinæ: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, untill corne were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such imployment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first comming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battail; if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the wals of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unless they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and travell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege unto that proud City, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the winter was passed over joyfully, saving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring grew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was e're these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alpes, had been lost in his journey through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spain and Gaule, as he himself had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the main strength of their City, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially waming a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seek, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year served, He took the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himself Master of some good Haven-town thereabout; that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to do what else was needfull, He sent Himilco unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Iles of Sicil and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or overtaken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue above two thousand of his men; with the loss of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped far better. By help of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia, or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia, and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over against Sicil.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanes and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seem to prove the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soveraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for help: where their messengers received answer from the Senate, That the publick misfortunes had not left means, to relieve their Associates that were so far distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publickly sent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Town, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation again: and having throughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to give any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own safety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and having striven in vain to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility gave to the Carthaginians a bloudy victory over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them into terms of great extremity. For whereas, in a great bravery, before their loss at Canna, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithstanding the great war that lay upon them so near at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pineus they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past; willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver Hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gaules, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to pass. Against his comming, the Enemies had sawed the trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules that lay about the wood, began to cast down the trees: which falling one against another, bore all down so fast, that the Romans were overwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious work of sawing so many trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blown all down before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject; I do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplyed with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Country now so Civill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleansed and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no less than the calamity. But sorrow could give no remedy to the mischief: and anger was vain, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I find, that any was a second time demanded; this we find, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even termes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their duty, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having having assured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leisure to look into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadours to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman war, untill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoil therein to be gotten, should be left entire unto the State of Carthage; and that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, untill he had subdued all his enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving semblably unto him the full possession of that countrey, and the Iles adjoyning. But such predisposition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly comptrolled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes It selfe; not (as Herodotus falsly termes it, and like an Atheist) envious or malicious, but very just and majesticall, in upholding that unspeakable greatnes of Soveraignty, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and people, and offer his help in this time of great necessity. These newes were so welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should lead them the way, and shew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the camp of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the business, about which they came, upon the points before remembred. In their return homeward, they happened again unluckily to be descryed by the Roman Fleet; which mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chace. They did their best to have escaped: but being overtaken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it again, That having been sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were not able by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Bostar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquisition served to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals own letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole businesse confected. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome; where the chief of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carryed word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; only with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian war, in an evill hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble resolution, and sutable unto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegeance, not only of the Latines, and other, their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all priviledges of the City, it will appear by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begun. Philip was busie about the Sea towns, that looked towards Italy, setting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum; which he won, and so returned to Apollonia again. The Epirots craved help of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to do. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Towns-men in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Town; and sent thence a thousand thousand men, under Nævius Crispus, an undertaking and expert Captain; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River, so that he was fain to burn his ships, (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crown of Macedon: and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath else-where been shewed) to make strong war on Philip: wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moved the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promise, as if already it had been his own. So a league was madde between them: and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, that from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should be subdued, and left unto the Ætolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer than whilest he abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the only point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalf, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, unlesse it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reserved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Plenratus, and Scerdilætus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so far from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates are thrust into the Treaty, rather to give it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, & chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the only men of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had only the title of Navarre, was said to court the Maiors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Army; made a countenance of war upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdome of Macedon; wasted the Country about Oricum and Apollonia; and overrunning the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came down into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stir up all the Greeks adjoyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Country. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perseus, his son and heir, with four thousand men, upon their borders: with the rest of his Army, before greater businesse should overtake and entangle him, He made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Medes, that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whensoever the King was absent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and win their little Country, ere he should be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently situated to let in an Army; and consigned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) every mothers son of them, in defence of their Countrey; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Ancyra, which they took: the Romans assailed by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the spoil.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consull at Rome; and P. Sulpitius sent in his stead, to keep the war on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman help, Attalus out of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved by his own jealouſie of Philips greatneſs: though ſomewhat alſo tickled with the vanity of being choſen by the Ætolians their principall Magiſtrate; which honour, though no better than titulary, he took in very loving part. Againſt the forces which Attalus and the Romans had ſent, being joyned with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battails: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, theſe his troubleſome neighbours deſired peace of him, and uſed their beſt means to get it. But when the day appointed for the concluſion thereof, was come: their Embaſſadours, in ſtead of making ſubmiſſion, propoſed unto him ſuch intolerable conditions, as ill beſeemed vanquiſhed men to offer: and might therefore well teſtifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being beſieged in their own Towns, that had made them deſirous of compoſition. This fear being taken away, by the incouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever: and thruſt a garriſon of their own, and ſome Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the ſtraight from Naupactus, waſted the country in a terrible bravery: wherein Philip required him; comming upon them in great haſt from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and ſending them faſter away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Pruſias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no leſs than Attalus held ſuſpected the power of Philip, ſent a Navie into Greece, to aſſiſt the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and upon greater reaſon; as being more intereſſed in the ſucceſs of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man ſome two hundred ſhips, yet the veſſels were ſuch, as could not hold out againſt the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him, to uſe the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came ſomewhat too late: which might better at firſt have kept thoſe Enemies from faſtening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could ſerve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needful that he ſhould correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in aſſailing their Town, he was encountred by the Ætolian and Roman garriſon, which drave him back with ſome loſs. In ſuch caſes, eſpecially where God intendeth a great converſion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his retrait from Elis: rather he had given teſtimony of his perſonall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horſe was ſlain under him. He had alſo ſoon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thouſand, with ſome twenty thouſand head of Cattell, which they had brought together in a place of ſafety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had hapned, that in his purſuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horſe running haſtily under a low tree, had torn off one of the hornes, which (after the faſhion of thoſe times) the King wore in his Creſt. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carryed it home, & ſhewed it as a token of Philips death. The horn was well known, and the tale beleeved. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar: and not only the borderers, ready to fall upon the Countrey, but ſome Captains of Philip, eaſily corrupted; who thinking to make themſelves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into ſuch treaſon, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuſe. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thouſand men, to aſſiſt his friends the Achæans. He alſo took order, to have Beacons erected, that might give him notice of the enemies doings, upon whom he meant ſhortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his preſence quickly eſtabliſhed. But in Greece all went ill-favouredly: eſpecially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betraied to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it: where alſo the ſtrong City of Chalcis was likely to have been loſt, if he had not come the ſooner. He made ſuch haſty marches, that he had almoſt taken Attalus in the City of Opus: This City, lying over againſt Eubœa, Attalus had won, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had uſed: now becauſe the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the ſack of Oreum, and taken all to themſelves; it was agreed, that Attalus ſhould make his beſt profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his ſharers. But whileſt he was buſie, in drawing as much mony as he could out of the Citizens: the ſudden tidings of Philips arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and run away to the Sea-ſide, where he got aboord his ſhips, finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this miſadventure, or tydings of Pruſias the Bithynian his invaſion upon the kingdome of Pergamus, made Attalus returne home, without ſtaying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many ſmal towns in thoſe parts; performing likewiſe ſome actions, of more bravery than importance, againſt the Ætolians. In the mean ſeaſon, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been buſie in Peloponneſus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chooſe two new kings, & to conform themſelves to their old manner of government. But their eſtate was ſo far out of tune, that their hope of redreſſing things within the City, proved no leſs unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant roſe up among them: upon whom ſucceeded this Machanidas, and ſhortly after came Nabis, that was worſe than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman ſide, for fear of the Achæans, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of theſe we ſhall ſpeak more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and ſeeing his preſence had brought the contentment of aſſurance to that Countrey; ſpake brave words to the Aſſembly of their States, ſaying, That he had to do with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Orcum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, ſuch haſte they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he ſaid, was not alwaies proſperous: he ſhould one day light upon them; as ere this he ſundry times had done, and ſtill to their loſſe. The Achaians were glad to hear theſe words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he reſtored unto their Nation ſome Towns that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewiſe to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had been taken by the Romans, and ſold for ſlaves, he ſought out, ranſomed, and put in quiet poſſeſſion of their own City. Further, paſſing over the Corinthian Gulfe, he fell upon the Ætolians, whom he drave into the mountains and woods, or other their ſtrongeſt holds, and waſted their Country. This done, he took leave of the Achæans, and returned home by Sea, viſited the people that were his ſubjects, or dependants; and animated them ſo well, that they reſted fearleſſe of any threatning danger. Then had he leiſure to make war upon the Dardanians, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheleſs he was not ſo far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himſelf Maſter of the Sea; the Romans (ſince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or purſue him, when he lately ran along the coaſt of Greece, faſt by them where they lay.

This good ſucceſſe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make ſtrong war upon the Ætolians, at their own doores. As for the Romans either ſome diſpleaſure, conceived againſt their Confederates, or ſome fear of danger at home, when Aſdrubal was ready to fall upon Italy, cauſed them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therefore being driven to great extremity, were fain to ſue for peace unto Philip; and accept it, upon what ever conditions it beſt pleaſed him. The agreement was no ſooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, and thirty five gallies, came over in great haſte (though ſomewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aſide to Dyrrachium & Apollonia, making a great noiſe, as if with theſe his own forces he would work wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to viſit him, and found him tame enough. The King preſented him battell, but he refuſed it: and ſuffering the Macedonians to waſte the Countrey round about, before his eies, kept himſelf cloſe within the wals of Apollonia, making ſome overtures of peace: which cauſed Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not ſo great cauſe to bediſpleaſed with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithſtanding the royall offer that he made them, to ſerve their turn in Italy, and aſſiſt them, in getting their hearts deſire, before he would expect any requital: they had not ſent any fleet, as in reaſon they ought, and as (conſidering his want of ſufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to ſecure the tranſportation of his Army, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Onely once they came to his help, which was at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone again before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his own Navie, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This retchless dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hanno his tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to hear that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as envie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian wars so mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might finde this Enemy work abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was ingaged in the warre, be urged unto the prosecution, by his own necessity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might addresse their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsell of Hanno and his fellowes were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes; but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerly his own, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or four Towns of Illyria, which they had recovered in this war, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, that somewhat might seem to have been gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would seem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their league with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were never slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians, they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting down of their names in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busie people, and ministred occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their Common-weal.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halves: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole Warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour had become the less harmfull, if their care of Italy had been such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himself with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from year to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could have desired. The death of Posthumius, and destruction of his whole Army in Gaule; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicil; as also that War, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have sunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new concurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian War, should have been strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troups, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the Warre in Spain; the lingring aide which they sent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten down; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hasty catching at Sicil: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the main point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered a part by it self, was no otherwise to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition. That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himself to Necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but alwayes with bad sadnes. Once Marcellus fought a battel with him there: yet under the very Walles of the Town; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvell; his forces being then divided, and imployed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in those dayes, a strong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force.

Wherefore the earneſt deſire of Hannibal to get it, was alwayes fruſtrate. Upon the town of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They ſent to the chief Magiſtrates of the Cumans, deſiring them (as being alſo Campans) to be preſent at a ſolemne ſacrifice of the Nation, where they would conſult about their generall good: promiſing to bring thither a ſufficient guard, to aſſure the whole Aſſembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made ſhew to entertain; but privily ſent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Conſul.

Gracchus was a very good man of war, and happily choſen Conſul in ſo dangerous a time. His Colleague ſhould have been Poſthumius Albinus, that was lately ſlain by the Gaules: after whoſe death Marcellus was choſen, as being judged the fitteſt man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found ſome religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at leaſt they fained ſo to have done, becauſe this was the firſt time, that ever two Plebeian Conſuls were choſen together. Marcellus therefore gave over the place; and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was ſubſtituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion or ſuperſtition: wherewith Rome was commonly, eſpecially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Conſular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the enemy in field; yet intentive to all occaſions, that ſhould be preſented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no ſmall part of his followers. Theſe and the reſt of his men, he continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skilfull in the exerciſes of war, than to keep it from quarrels that might ariſe by upbraiding one another with their baſe conditions.

Whileſt the Conſull was thus buſied at Linternum, the Senators of Cumæ ſent him word of all that had paſſed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occaſion to fleſh his men, and make them confident againſt the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himſelf into Cumæ: whence he iſſued at ſuch time, as the Magiſtrates of that City were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ: three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chief Magiſtrate of Capua, with fourteen thouſand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deviſing how to ſurpriſe others, than fearing himſelf to be aſſailed. The Conſul therefore, ſuffering none to goe forth of Cumæ, that might bear word of him to the Enemies, iſſued out of the town when it grew dark: his men being well refreſhed with meat and ſleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights ſervice. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and ſlew more than two thouſand of them, together with their Commander, loſing not above a hundred of his own men. Their camp he took; but tarried not long to rifle it, for fear of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his providence, he eſcaped a greater loſs, than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde thoſe young ſouldiers, and ſlaves, buſied in making ſpoile, and loading themſelves with the booty. But they were all gotten ſafe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for deſire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal aſſailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill ſucceſſe, the Carthaginians and their fellowers ſpent about this town. They raiſed a wooden Tower againſt it, which they brought cloſe unto the wals; thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inſide of the wall, raiſed againſt this an high Tower; whence they made reſiſtance, and found means at length to conſume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buſie in quenching the fire, the Romans, ſallying out of the town at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their Trenches, with the ſlaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Conſull wiſely ſounded the Retrait, ere his men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readineſs to requite their ſervice. Neither would he, in the pride of his good ſucceſs, adventure forth againſt the Enemy; who preſented him battell the day following, near unto the wals. Hannibal therefore, ſeeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the ſiege, and returned to his old camp at Tifata. About theſe times, and ſhortly after, when Fabius the other Conſull had taken the field; ſome ſmall towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people ſeverely puniſhed for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Army was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must do) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it self, was driven in the mean time to alter his course of war: and, instead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invasion upon the whole Country, to passe from place to place; and wait upon occasions, that grew dayly more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done, when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the Soveraignty. They held it reason, that they should be protected by such as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old, the more easie means to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentive, as necessity constrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and joyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon just reason, commended, That being himself Consul; and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formality, or regard what men might think of his ambition, but caused himself to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, served to put the Campani in fear, that Capua it self should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-town of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vain, hoping to have wonne it. The garrison in Puteoli was six thousand strong: and did their duty so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could only shew his anger upon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a journey against Beneventum: and T. Gracchus, the last years Consul, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about seventeen thousand foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelve hundred horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. He held the Roman work four hours, ere it could be perceived to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaves, had received from their Generall a peremptory denunciation, That this day or never they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vain labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slain enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindred the service by imployment of so many hands in a work so little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own errour, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have liberty immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong upon the Enemy; whom their desperate fury had soon overthrown, if the Roman horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard upon the Romans battell, that four thousand of the slaves, (for fear either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatned before the battell unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to save himself by flight, when the Grosse of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand, most of which were horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman Generall gave unto all his Souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but unto those four thousand, which had recoyled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unlesse sickneſſe forced them to break his order. So the victorious army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Souldiers were feasted in publick by the townſ-men; some sitting, some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custome of slaves manumised) with caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the comming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired the great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasury was so poor, that no industry nor art could serve to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse do than before; as living upon the same trade; and subject to the same inconveniencies, which enfeebled Rome it self. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now do least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore diligently considering the greatneſſe of the warre within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to finde him work at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother over the Alpes, as soon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driven almost even to extream want of counsell. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without the which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to assembly; wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor laid open the publick wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuffe, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities and labours, untill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain, as well supplyed, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, Marcus Attilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Censors; taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the City, were chiefly intentive to the correction of those, that had mis behaved themselves in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus; who after the battell at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than lost. After him they took in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtfull only in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate,

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serve untill the end of the Warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to chooſe or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those, whose unhoneſt or unseemly behaviour fell not within the compass of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publick Horses of service, unto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their mis behaviour. Generally, they had the oversight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much reverenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick Works; as mending of High-wayes, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-wayes, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publick Revenues to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this Office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were alwayes of that Order, and carefull to uphold the reputation thereof. But the Commonweal being now impoverished by Warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus & Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, becauſe they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the Warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had been infranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, untill the City were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as farre forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Questor kept a Book of all that was laid out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whileſt the whole stock was used by the City. This good example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded half so much commodity, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheleſs if we consider things aright the calamities of this Warre did rather inable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom she forthwith undertook, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngeſt of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Commonwealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happineſse of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose dimension or stemme is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchy: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say that our Age hath seen a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches, and ſtrength grew chiefly from that ill aſſurance, which each of their Towns, or almoſt of their Families, perceived it ſelf to hold, whileſt the generality was oppreſſed by the Duke of Alva; were it ſo, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as by extreme induſtry, and ſtraining themſelves to fill their publick Treaſury, they are all grown wealthy, ſtrong at Sea, & able to wage great Armies for their ſervices by Land. Wherefore if we value at ſuch a rate as we ought, the patient reſolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magiſtrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Common-weal, which was found in Rome in theſe dangerous times: we may truly ſay, That the City was never in greater likelihood to proſper. Neither can it be deemed otherwiſe, than that if the ſame affections of the people had laſted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautifull, ſhould in all reaſon have been more dear unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Aſia had not infected them with ſenſuality, and carryed their appetites mainly to thoſe pleaſures, wherein they thought their well-being to conſiſt; if all the Citizens and Subjects of Rome could have beleeved their own intereſt to be as great, in thoſe wars which theſe latter Emperours made for their defence, as in theſe which were managed by the Conſuls: the Empire, founded upon ſo great vertue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never ſo many. But unto all Dominions God hath ſet their periods: Who though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of thoſe waies, by which Kingdomes riſe and fall; yet hath left him ſubject unto the affections, which draw on theſe fatall changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIIII.

The Romans win ſome Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The ſiege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome ſtrained themſelves to the utmoſt, for maintaining the Warre: ſo their Generals abroad omitted no part of induſtry, in ſeeking to recover what had been loſt. The Town of Caſilme, Fabius beſieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garriſon; and likely to have been relieved by thoſe of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the aſſiſtance of his Colleague. Nevertheleſs, the place held out ſo obſtinately, that Fabius was purpoſed to give it over: ſaying, that the enterpriſe was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He ſaid, That many ſuch things, as were not at firſt to have been under-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be proſequuted unto the beſt effect. So the ſiege held on: and the Town was preſſed ſo hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearfull, and craved parlee; offering to give it up, ſo as all might have leave to depart in ſafety, whither they pleaſed. Whileſt they were thus treating of conditions: or whileſt they were iſſuing forth, according to the compoſition already made; (for it is diverſly reported) Marcellus ſeizing upon a Gate, entred with his Army, and put all to ſword that came in their way. Fifty of thoſe that were firſt gotten out, ran to Fabius the Conſul, who ſaved them, and ſent them to Capua in ſafety; all the reſt were either ſlain, or made priſoners. If Fabius deſerved Commendations, by holding his word good unto theſe fifty; I know not how the ſlaughter of the reſt, or impriſonment afterward of ſuch as eſcaped the heat of execution, could be excuſed by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himſelf, after the Roman faſhion, with ſome æquivocation, but he ſhall pay for it hereafter. In like ſort was Mount Marſam in Gaſcoigne taken by the Marſhall Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whileſt he entertained parlee about compoſition; the beſieged ranne all from their ſeverall guards, upon haſty deſire of being acquainted with the conditions propoſed. The Marſhall therefore diſcovering a part of the Wals unguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all ſave the Governour unto the ſword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marſam committed two groſs errours; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themſelves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee without Pledges for aſſurance given and received. Some ſuch overſight the Governour of Caſilme ſeemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable.

rable. When this Work was ended, many ſmall Towns of the Samnites, and ſome of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or ſlain about five and twenty thouſand of the Enemies; and the Country grievouſly waſted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ſick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum; waiting to hear from thoſe, that had promiſed to give up the Town. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thruſt ſo many men into it, that the Traitors durſt not ſtir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was fain to depart, having wearied himſelf in vain with expectation. Yet he waſted not the Countrey, but contented himſelf with hope, that they would pleaſe him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he choſe for his wintring place; and began to victuall it when Summer was but half paſt. It is ſaid, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his winter more timely than otherwiſe he required, He did not like the Romans; whom neceſſity inforced, to make their Summer laſt as long as they were able to travell up and down the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicil, whither Marcellus the Conſul was ſent, to take ſuch order for the Province, as need ſhould require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Conſulſhip, we will ſpeak hereafter.

The new Conſuls, choſen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the ſonne of the preſent Conſull, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique ſervice, to imploy oftentimes their beſt able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and chooſe ſuch as had lately held their places before; without regarding any diſtance of time, which was otherwiſe required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his ſon: which was perhaps the reſpect, that moſt commended his ſonne unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his ſonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Conſul, ſuffered him, in regard of due reverence, to paſſe by them on horſe-back, which was againſt the cuſtome. But the ſon perceiving this, commanded the laſt of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conſul on his feet. The father chearfully did ſo; ſaying, It was my mind, ſonne, to make tryall, whether thou diddeſt underſtand thy ſelf to be Conſul. Caſius Altinius a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who after the battell at Cannæ, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, ſeeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conſul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conſul purpoſed to follow old examples: and to make this Altinius a pattern to all traytors; uſing him as Camillus and Fabricius had done thoſe that offered their faithfull ſervice againſt the Faliſci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and ſaid, it was a matter of dangerous conſequence, That it ſhould be thought more ſafe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he ſhould be ſent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as priſoner; untill they could better reſolve, what to do with him, or what uſe to make of him. Hannibal underſtanding that Altinius was gone and among the Romans, took it not ſorrowfully; but thought this a good occaſion to ſeize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might ſeem rather ſevere, than covetous, he ſent for the wife and children of Altinius into his camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more ſtrictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treaſon, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himſelf. Fabius the Conſul ſhortly after came to Arpi: which he wonne by Scalado, in a ſtormy and rainy night. Five thouſand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the town; and of the Arpines themſelves, there were about three thouſand. Theſe were thruſt formoſt by the Carthaginian Garriſon; when it was underſtood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the townſ-men ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſdome to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: proteſting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes: and were become ſubject to the Carthaginians, againſt their wils. In proceſſe of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Prætor went unto the Roman Conſul: and receiving his faith for ſecurity of the Town, presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is that Hannibals men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Romans side, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman again, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time Clisternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Prætors: and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Prætors, an hundred & twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their service upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans towards Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yeelded themselves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captain, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in forraging the Countrey, was slain by Hanno; with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to pass: and being loth to hazzard his forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence; He contented himself with taking in some poor Towns of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Philcas, that was of their conspiracy, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveighed them by night out of the City. But he and his company the next day were so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome, where they suffered death as traytors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their business the more diligently as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent again to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chief among them, used much to goe forth of the Town on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or never they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seem to have been abroad upon other occasion: From the camp of Hannibal, it was about three daies journey to Tarentum, if it should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place the less to be suspected: as also to make his enemies the more secure, He caused it to be given out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order; He took with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before break of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourscore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for fear lest he, and his troup following him, should be discovered. It had been often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a sign, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gave order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their booty, and send them gone. But when it grew dark night; Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came close to the town: where according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to shew his arrivall; Nico, that was within the town, answered him with another light, in sign that he was ready. Presently Nico began to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make hast, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heavy, that scarce two men could stand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondring at the largeness of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-spear: and letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon all the watch; whom when he had slain, he entred the great gate. So the Army of Hannibal entring Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good chear. All the Town was in an uproar: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskilfully sounded by a Greek in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal assembling the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressours; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten such spoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addressed himself against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would sally out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery sallying forth, gave charge upon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and so far from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a sign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drave him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood up on a Demi-Iland, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall against the Town, whereunto it was joyned by a cawsey. This cawsey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themselves from all danger thence. His work in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the piece it self, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his works, there came by sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counsell. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not pass forth, whilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely that the Town would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilest the Roman garrison by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town standing in plain ground, and their streets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwise busied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutuall loss on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing dayly stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great City of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hasty growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Cannæ had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were fain to take up young Boyes that were under seventeen years of age: and to send Commissioners above fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appear serviceable, and pressing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of service, whereinto they were bound by order of the City, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had been of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campans felt great want of victuall, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyl, which the Romans had in fore-going years made upon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. He gave them comfortable words, and sent Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of grain, that had been laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horses, as if this had been enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesness of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day; against which he made provision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needful for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their Camp; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set upon a great harvest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assail the enemies camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that he was there with the first break of day. By comming so unexpected, he had well near forced the camp on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the less desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to go more leisurely and substantially to work; to send for his fellow-Consul, with the rest of their Army; and to lye between Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retrait; he saw that some of his men had gotten over the enemies Rampart. There was great booty; or (which was all one to the Souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore some Ensign-bearers threw their Ensignes over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unless they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Fear of such ignominie, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and incouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the camp was wonne: in which were slain above sixe thousand; and taken above seven thousand, besides all the store of victuals, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pitifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love that he was wont to protest unto their City; and how he had made shew to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoil, whilest he himself was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many Towns adjoyning, to yeeld unto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Grecks, inhabiting that Eastern part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Græcia. These people took to heart the death of their Hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, upon the like reason, had not some companies lyen in their Town;

Town; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Nevertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their service to Atinius the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed up their gates. A little formality they used in pretending fear, lest the enemy should break in together with the Romans, in saving Atinius himself, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chief men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilest the Consuls fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves to the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Consul, was slain, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that businesse. The Volones or Slaves lately manumised, forsook their Ensigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, & drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hostility, which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; insomuch, that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went severall waies: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a stout man, & one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier, how mean soever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand: and he himself being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slain, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius a Roman Prætor with eighteen thousand men was in Apulia, very careless, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he hasted to visit him: hoping to deal the better with the main strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, under men of small ability. Comming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, he soon had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape alive; leaving all, save two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, received the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Nevertheless, all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should go substantially forwards with the siege of Capua: which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate down before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Sueſſula, to their assistance. They made Proclamation That [illegible] would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should have his pardon, and be ſuffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being paſt, there ſhould be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliouſly rejected; the Capuans relying on their own ſtrength, and the ſuccours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was cloſed up, they ſent meſſengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brunduſium. He had made a long journey in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brunduſium, upon advertiſement that he ſhould be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earneſt words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them conſider, how a few dayes ſince he had chaſed the Conſuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would preſently come thither again, and ſend the Romans going as faſt as before. With this good anſwer the Meſſengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almoſt intrenched round. As for Hannibal himſelf, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendſhip, would hold out a long time, and thereby give him leiſure to do what he thought requiſite among the Tarentines, and in thoſe Eaſtern parts of Italy; whileſt the Roman Army ſpent it ſelf in a tedious ſiege. Thus he lingred, & thereby gave the Conſuls time, both to fortifie themſelves at Capua, and to diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates in Rome; whileſt he himſelf purſued hopes that never found ſucceſs.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the ſiege at Capua; retaining the ſame Armies as Proconſuls. The Townſ-men often ſallied out; rather in a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying cloſe within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to ſubdue them by famine. Yet againſt the Campan horſe (for their foot was eaſily beaten) the Romans uſed to thruſt out ſome troups, that ſhould hold them skirmiſh. In theſe exerciſes the Campans uſually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who ſcorned to take foile at the hands of ſuch Rebels. It was therfore deviſed, that ſome active and couragious young men ſhould learn to ride behinde the Roman men at arms; leaping up, and again diſmounting lightly, as occaſion ſerved. Theſe were furniſhed like the Velites, having each of them three or four ſmall darts: which alighting in time of conflict, they diſcharged thick upon the Enemies horſe; whom vanquiſhing in this kind of ſervice, they much diſheartned in the main. The time thus paſſing, and famine daily increaſing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the ſame time the Capuans iſſued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deviſe: ſetting all their multitude of unſerviceable people by the wals, which with a loud noiſe of Pans and Baſons, troubled thoſe that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius oppoſing himſelf to the Campans, eaſily defended his Trenches againſt them; and ſo well repreſſed them, that he drave them at length back into their City. Nevertheleſs, in purſuing them to their gates, He received a wound that accompanyed him in ſhort ſpace after to his grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his task by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman camp was even at point to have been loſt; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or elſe (for the report varies) being ſome of them ſlain upon it, fell into the ditch; & filled it up in ſuch ſort, that their bodies ſerved as a bridge unto the Aſſailants. It is ſaid, that Hannibal in this tumult cauſed ſome fugitives that could ſpeak Latine wel, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Conſuls name, That every one of the Souldiers ſhould ſhift for himſelf, and flie betimes unto the next hils, for as much as the Camp was already loſt. But all would not ſerve. The fraud was detected: and the Army having ſitten there ſo long, had at good leiſure ſtrongly intrenched it ſelf, ſo as little hope there was to raiſe the ſiege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchaſe of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it ſelf: and now his deſire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-near loſt Capua; in reſpect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a deſperate anger with himſelf and his hard fortune, that of ſo many great victories he had made no greater uſe: on the ſudden he entertained an haughty reſolution, even to ſet upon Rome; and carry to the wals of that proud City, the danger of Warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a mean, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, unto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the Campans, should well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terrour of his comming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His only fear was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should think he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveighed himself thence over the innermost Trenches into the City. The journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good success resting in the suddenne sse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to have in a readiness ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Army over the River Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals, by some fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diversity of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsell to let alone Capua, yea, and all places else, rather then to put the Town of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so far from allowing of this, as they wondred how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himself strong enough to win Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serve the turn well enough, to keep him out and send him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius & Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoovefull: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Army: with which he hasted toward Rome, leaving App. Claudius, who could not travell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal having passed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boats; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down by the people of Fregellæ: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him: driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the City; some few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the streets and Temples in Rome were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their hair, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hasting to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconsull did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by comming into the City in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should have equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so took they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Town; whence he advanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way under the Wals, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted aside, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Town, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their service might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden wals lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the wals. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattell, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoyning, that the passage was stopt up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the house tops, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Wals. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had been Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should have authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed over Anien, and presented battell to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertook it. It is said, that a terrible showre of rain, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their severall Camps: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking up and clearing as soon as they were departed asunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not indure to stay there, untill his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals comming to the City, how great so ever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soon abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time the supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, were sent out of the Town, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrours, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men have fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had sent the Asse into the Camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seem to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that fear, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignity comming to his ear, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made port-sale of the Silver-smithes shops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own title to the houses within the Town were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceived; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed unto himself, this journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what spoil he could of the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest over the Country, and ran toward the Eastern Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the City of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that fair City, since he had no other way to vent his grief.

Q. Fabius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation a new, that whoso would yeeld, before a certain day, might safely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his own evill deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again; if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians: who running as fugitives, out of the Town into the Roman camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conveigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make Warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, whersoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now began to faint under the burden of that Warre, wherein as afterward he protested he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. Liv. lib. 26.
It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Campans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble and consult, about the yeelding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators and such as a few years since, had been most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good chear, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruell revenge, which the Enemies sought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking poyson. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman camp. At their comming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the generall multitude, they were reserved unto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, & having given his daughter in mariage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for fear, lest upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoovefull to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear and want of ability to resist. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young gentlemen burning with fire of revenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in diverse places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the sum of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their Wals: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day, and confined unto severall places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious site: but no corporation or form of polity was allowed to be there in; only a Roman Provost was every year sent to governe over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present war. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oil being far spent; and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicil, held War against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

WHilest things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: above thirty thousand being up in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harsicoras with his son Hyestus, mighty men in that Iland, were the Ring leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so careless, as in the rest of their main undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that main business in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harsicoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Mutius the Prætor: who lay sick in the Province; and not more weak in his own body, than in his train. But whilest they sought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enter-enterprise was such, as may seem to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Asdrubal, surnamed the Bald, with a competent fleet and Army, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neer kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was cast upon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such evill plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and uphold in their severall provinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had been first subdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron; the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in every Province, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harsicoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we have spoken before: he landed at Calaris, or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemy. Hyostus, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battell to the Romans at his own discretion. So he rashly adventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day above thirty thousand of his followers. Hyostus himself, with the rest of his broken troups, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soon after this defeature came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians; too late to win all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindred his voyage: yet soon enough, and strong enough to save the Town of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himself back to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance, their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the rebels, with whom they had refused to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where, if he had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would have sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appears to have been greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in few skirmishes, Manlius adventured all to the hazzard of a battell; wherein he slew twelve thousand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four hours the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had been broken in their unprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of young Hyostus, and of his father Harsicoras, that slew himself for grief, together with the captivity of Asdrubal himself, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Army fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space won the Town. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded unto the Roman; who, imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best sorted with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The war in Sicil was of greater length, and every way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victory brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not only favers of their own, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Country, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after after the battell of Cannæ, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a stedfast friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present war. He left his kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo his sonne, that should have been his heir, being dead before. To this young King his successour, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the same art, whereby himself had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many coadjutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and said, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of government, gave himself wholly over to his pleasures: or, if he had any regard of his Royall dignity, it was only in matter of exterior shew; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never seen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, suitable to his outward pompe, he gave proof, that in course of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it self. Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thrasō continued in grace with him, and were his Counsellors, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about the main point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleasure, which was set on change: but Thrasō, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amity with Rome. Whilest as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull which way the King would incline, a conspiracy against his person was detected by a Groome of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was appprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speak any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had been set on by Thrasō; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were near in love or place unto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and never shrunk for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremity. Thus they all escaped, and soon after found means to execute their purpose. The King himself, when Thrasō was taken out of the way, quickly resolved upon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, love to seem wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the Liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessity, had of late been such, as might have been termed excessive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he took order for his own Estate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers farre off, regarded only the things present; the weakenesse of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vain, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusian. These grew into such favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Cannæ, that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himself; saying, that he could hardly beleeve the Carthaginians;

ſo wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Having thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadours to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould reign over all Sicil; and the Carthaginians reſt ſatisfied with what they could get in Italy. At theſe doings Appius Claudius did not greatly ſtir: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertain more quarrels, than were enforced upon them by neceſſity; and partly (as may ſeem) for that the reputation, both of himſelf, and of his City, had received ſuch blemiſh, by that which hapned unto him in his journey, as much diſcountenanced him when he came into Sicil, and forbade him to look big. The money that Hiero had beſtowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their neceſſity, this Appius was to carry back unto him: it being refuſed by the Roman Senat, with greater bravery than their preſent fortune would allow. But in ſtead of returning the money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noiſed abroad that he ſhould do: the war againſt Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide their vain-glory, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſign that money over to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwiſe wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oſtentation of the Roman magnanimity, into ſuch a pitifull tune of thankſ-giving, as muſt needs have bred ſorrow and commiſeration in ſo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of paſtime and ſcorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whileſt Hieronymus was more deſirous of war, than well reſolved how to begin it: his own death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the ſtate of Syracuſe; which thereby might have proſpered more than ever, had it been wiſely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we ſpake before, were ſent about the Countrey with two thouſand men, to ſolicite the Towns, and perſwade them to ſhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himſelf with an Army of fifteen thouſand horſe and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Iſland fall to him in all haſte; and accept him for Soveraign. There the Conſpirators took him on the ſudden, as he was paſſing through a narrow ſtreet: and ruſhing between him and his guard, ſtrook him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the ſound of that word ſo joyfully anſwered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Maſters death. Yet, for fear of the worſt, a great largeſs was promiſed unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought ſo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army, as in deteſtation of his bad life, ſuffered his carkaſſe to lie unburyed. Theſe newes ran quickly to Syracuſe; whither ſome of the Conſpirators, taking alſo of the Kings horſes, poſted away; to ſignifie all that had paſſed, to ſtirre up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowers would make offer to uſurp a tyranny. The Syracuſians hereupon preſently took armes, and made themſelves maſters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other ſide fortified the Palace, and the Iſland; being yet uncertain what to do: between deſire of making himſelf a ſoveraign Lord, and fear of ſuffering puniſhment as a Tyrant, if his enterpriſe miſ-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cheriſhed him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that wel-known Proverb, which Dionyſius had uſed; That a Tyrant ſhould keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on horſe-back. But fear, and better counſell, prevailed ſo far, that Andronodorus, having ſlept upon the matter, diſſembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a ſpeech unto the people; telling them, that he was glad to ſee, how prudently they behaved themſelves in ſo great a change; that he had ſtood in fear, leſt they would not have contained themſelves within the bounds of diſcretion; but rather have ſought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, ſince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to raviſh their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his ſtrength, and ſurrendred up the charge committed unto him, by one that had bin an evill evill master both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (as in former times) to govern the City, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But such was his desire of Soveraignty, and so vehement were the instigations of his wife, that shortly he began to practice with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himself strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had been with the Syracusian Prætors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Captain, had done him, whilest he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to return home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed, and with a convoy, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the business for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carryed with the like passions of his own, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were slain out of hand: and afterward accused to the people, of all the evill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessary to this dangerous treason: and that the unquiet spirits of these women would never cease to work, untill they had recovered those royall ornaments and Soveraign power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die, and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heavy sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sosippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassadour to King Ptolemy, &c. he durst not return home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardoning themselves) all cryed out upon the Authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slain: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But having striven in vain, and seeing that the people stood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicil; they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be re-confirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word unto the Syracusians, that they had already broken

the league; and that the peace would never be kept sincerely, untill this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the war, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himself unto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late served one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should bear Dominion over those that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that such their arrogancy should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals unto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicides told them, that in this noveltie of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been subdued by the same hand, which took liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yeelded unto Syracuse, and been subjected unto that City, by what forme soever it was governed; this claim of liberty was rather seasonable, than just. Nevertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: insomuch that when messengers came soon after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargains for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing justice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with took the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault Leontium was taken, all save the Castle; whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and stealing thence away by night, conveighed themselves into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains used after victory, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaves and renegado's, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he took to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slain Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Town to sack. These newes met the Syracusian Army upon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had been sent forth of Syracuse, under Sosis and Dinomenes, two of the Prætors, to serve against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had been so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turne their unquiet thoughts another way, and set them awork in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their service. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, devising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanied, that they seemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the vantguard; that that had been well uſed by Hieronymus: and ſome of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them priſoners in the Italian war, and lovingly diſmiſſed them. Theſe Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good chear, ſaying, That no man ſhould do them harme, as long as they could uſe their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a ſtand; and the rumour of this accident ran ſwiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by ſeverity, which would not ſerve. For when they commanded theſe two traitors to be laid in Irons, the exclamation was ſo violent againſt them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what courſe to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deviſed a trick, whereby to help himſelf, and better the uncertain caſe wherein he ſtood. He cauſed Letters, of his own penning, to be intercepted by ſome of his moſt truſty Cretans, directed (as they made ſhew) from the Syracuſian Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the ſword among the Leontines: but that it further behoved him, to make the like diſpatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuſe; which were offenſive, all of them in generall, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epiſtle was openly rehearſed, the uproar was ſuch, that Soſis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forſake the Camp, and flie for their lives. All the Syracuſians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the ſedition had not ſaved their lives; rather to keep them as pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They perſwaded alſo a miſchievous knave, that had ſerved amongſt the Leontines, to juſtifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuſe, as an eye-witneſs. This incenſed not only the multitude, but ſome of the Senate; and filled the whole town with cauſeleſſe indignation. In good time (ſaid ſome) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like ſort gotten into Syracuſe, would have dealt much worſe, where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whileſt they were thus diſcourſing, and deviſing how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unleſs for want of help, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the beſt and wiſeſt of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the ſouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-ſtrong fury of thoſe within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entred, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forſaken by all men) he put to the ſword, and made ſlaughter of them and their followers untill night. The next day he went openly to work: and, after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all ſlaves and priſoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worſt and baſeſt ſort, made himſelf and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuſe.

When Marcellus was advertiſed of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to ſit ſtill, and attend the further iſſue. He ſent Embaſſadours to Syracuſe, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chaſed out as enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a half of the Town, ſent before him, ſome to require a parlee. Theſe were entertained without the wals by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpoſe to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracuſians, which were oppreſſed by Tyrants; and to puniſh thoſe that had murdered and baniſhed ſo many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that thoſe worthy men, their Confederates, which were chaſed out of the Town, might be ſuffered to returne and enjoy their own; as alſo that the Authors of the great ſlaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly anſwered, that if their errand had been to him, he could have told what to ſay to them: but ſince it was directed unto others, they ſhould doe well to return, when thoſe to whom they were ſent, had the government in their hands. As for the war which they threatned, he told them, they ſhould finde by experience, That to beſiege Syracuſe was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he ſent them gone; and returned back into the City. Immediately began the ſiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected, The quick and eaſie winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that ſo long a circuit of wals as compaſſed Syracuſe, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Nevertheless all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill success of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despair of hasty victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuse Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of War, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gun-powder; had they in that age been knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proof of this bold assertion, he performed some strange works; which made the King entreat him to convert his study unto things of use: that might preserve the City from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall works, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, unto the workmanship, and gain, of base handy-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed unto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly task a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were published: and being once made known, to be under-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit; and things that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discovery, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he under-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proof. He that looks upon our English Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will think it ridiculous to hear one say, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the less, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handy-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being devised, and bettered, by great scholars and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily over, and feed their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others that have, or would seem to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of injustice, that the long travels of an understanding brain, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth; yeeld less benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Envie have in it any thing allowable and naturall, as having Anger, Fear, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serveth against those, which would usurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Nevertheless, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every own ought to bear unto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his sunne to shine upon the just, and unjust: it will appear more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish unto the world, those good things that lye buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evill men to a mischievous use. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: much better it were, that such a jewell remain close in the hands of a wise and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to use the remedy, by teaching the worst men how to do mischief. But the works which Archimedes published, were such as tended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them, but reserved so much to his own direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his own making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certain of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wal. Against these Archimedes had sundry devices; of which any one sort might have repelled the assailants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He shot heavy stones & long pieces of timber, like unto the yeards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come nearer the wals, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted up, shaking out all the men, and afterwards falling down into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted up into the ayre, where turning round a while, they were broken against the wals or cast upon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten that they durst never come to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land army handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like hail, did not only over-whelme the men, but brake down the Roman-engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For the remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get near unto the wals, they should be (as it were) under the point blank, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond up hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vain hope cost many of the assailants lives: For the shot came down right upon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the wals, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were ready to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that fear, against the cause whereof he knew no remedy. If the engines had stood upon the wals, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some device, to make them unserviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streets behind the wals; where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate piece of work. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so soon to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make war upon the Romans in Sicil by Land. He took many Towns; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians, did yeeld unto him. To remedy this mischief and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded unto him. He took also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poor, and his Army must have somewhat to keep it in heart. His especiall desire was to have saved Agrigentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately issued out of the City, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, horſe, intending to joyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an eaſie victory againſt the diſperſed and half unarmed Syracuſians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ranne over all the Iſland at his pleaſure, and preſented battail to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wiſely refuſed it. Bomilcar alſo a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuſe, and victualled the City. After this, the diſpoſition of the Iſlanders changed ſo again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which eſcaped from Himilco, and ſafely arrived at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and ſlew or betrayed the Roman Garriſons.

In the midſt of theſe troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving ſome of his Army before Syracuſe, that he might not ſeem to have given over the ſiege, went unto Leontium, where he lay intentive to all occaſions. In the beginning of the Spring he ſtood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of beſieging Syracuſe, or to turn all his forces to Agrigentum, againſt Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuſe, as unable to prevail: and he himſelf was of an eager diſpoſition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feiſible, an enterpriſe that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuſe: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth ſomewhat, which might fulfill his deſire. Eſpecially he aſſayed to prevaile by treaſon, againſt which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracuſian Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practiſe with their friends that remained in the City. This was not eaſie for them to do, becauſe the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a ſlave unto one of theſe baniſhed men, making ſhew to runne away from his Maſter, got into Syracuſe; where he talked in private with ſome few, as he had been inſtructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conſpirators uſed to ſend him advertiſement of their proceedings, by a fiſher-boat that paſſed forth in the night: but when they were grown to the number of fourſcore, and thought themſelves able to effect ſomewhat of importance, all was diſcovered; and they like Traitors, put to death. In the mean while, one Damaſippus a Lacedæmonian, that had been ſent out of the Town as an Embaſſadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very deſirous to ranſome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpoſe, not farre from the wals. There, one of the Romans looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometry, fell to numbring the ſtones: and making an eſtimate of the height, judged it leſs than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who cauſing better notice to be taken of the place; and finding that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all thing ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakeſt part of the Town, and therefore the moſt ſtrongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force againſt Archimedes, if they failed to take it by ſurpriſe. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great feaſt was to be held unto Diana, which was to laſt three dayes: and that, becauſe other good cheer was not ſo plentifull within the City, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the people, had made the more large diſtribution of wine. A better opportunity could not be wiſhed. Wherefore Marcellus in the dead of the Feſtivall night, came unto the wals, which he took by Scalado. Syracuſe was divided into four parts (or five, if Epipolæ were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diſtinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten ſome pieces, he had the commodity of a better and ſafe lodging, with good ſtore of booty; and better opportunity than before, to deal with the reſt. For there were now a great many, as well of thoſe in Acradina & the Iſland, inner parts of the Towo, as of thoſe that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto compoſition, as being much terrified by the loſſe of thoſe parts, which the Romans had taken and ſackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, unto thoſe that were ſheltred under ſtrong houſes: although it may ſeem, that the inner wals were not altogether unfurniſhed of his help; ſince they held out a good while, and were not taken by

by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegado's, were more carefull than ever to defend the reſt of the City: being ſure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whileſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradina upon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part, that the Aſſailants were repelled. Nevertheleſs, they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtraightly beſieged, as he himſelf did beſiege the Town. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and cauſed the reſt to diſſodge. The Romans were (though ſomewhat leſs) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, inſomuch that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to do his Countrey ſervice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a ſtrong fleet: where he ſtaid; being loth to double the Cape; for that the winds did better ſerve the enemy than him. Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he ſtood off into the deep, and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durſt not Epicides return into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could ſafely, unto Marcellus, and ſome of them, in a ſtrong town three miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicil was given as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave eat: for he had ſtayed there long enough; and had cauſe to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong again. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they ſhould be Maſters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper lawes; yet ſuffering the Romans to poſſeſſe whatſoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Prætors choſen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman fugitives diſturbed all. Theſe perceiving their own condition to be deſperate, perſwading the other Mercenary Souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themſelves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently took Armes, and fell upon the new choſen Prætors; whom they ſlew, and made election of ſix Captains that ſhould command over all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitives. The Treaty was therefore again ſet on foot, and wanted little of concluſion: which yet was delayed; either by ſome fear of the Citizens, that had ſeen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the ſack of Epipolæ, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might uſe the liberty of a Conqueror, & make it wholly ſubject to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the ſixe Captains that had been choſen in the laſt commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as uſually is found in Mercenaries; holding his own particular benefit above all other reſpects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: having a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Roman Embaſſadors, daily paſſing to and fro. This crafty Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purpoſed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where elſe; it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himſelf to the will of the Roman Generall. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captain was eaſily won, and ſent forth his own brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadours to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot wel be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been ſuch, as deſerved not to be requited with the ruine of his Country: much leſſe, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, ſhould miniſter unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yeeld unto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately slain many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also been slain, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascality, and some ill advised persons, joyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treaty of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home: but the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, and promise of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many wayes important. Nevertheless if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by evill neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed: we may truly affirme, That it received no small benefit, by becomming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forraign enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; wherewith by Marcellus his victory it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable: unless we should approve the answer of that Thief, who being found to have stollen a silver cup from a sick man, said, Hee never leaves drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to have been no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it self; that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so busie about his Geometry, in drawing figures, that he hearkened not to the noyse, and uproar in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life-time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great Artist better, than the devising of all those engins, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the money lost, that had been spent upon a son, whose studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicil yeelded unto the Romans, except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his own name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town, and not behave themselves as men expecting to bee besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and again he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envie in Epicides & Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Mutines, to be his companion, and to take upon him, like as good a man as himself. The indignity seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside unto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemy, untill his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell unto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behinde in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the oddes between the Captains. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of war. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vain-glorious envie of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish desire to get victory, without the help of Mutines their Countreyman. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not have hazzarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and soon upon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foot, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, took it very hainously, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent far from home, and not suffered to return back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his countrimen the Numidians, & like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prætor, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those In-land Towns that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from over-running all the Countrey; yet he hindred the Countrey from revolting unto Mutines. Above threescore Towns, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agrigentum was the principall, and far bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succour of his own adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have share in the honour of these Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should have been regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: He took away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his own sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spightfull dealing occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Countryman, being such a brave commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his own disposition. M. Valerius Lævinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook

theſe indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by thoſe that bore all the ſway in Carthage: He thought it the wiſeſt way, to play the beſt of his owne game, and forſake that City, which was likely to periſh by the evill counſell that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countrymen had lately done, content himſelf to ſee his Adverſaries reap the bitter fruits of their owne malicious over-weening: and to ſuffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conſpired againſt them to deliver up Agrigentum, and to help to expell them utterly out of Sicil. The Conſull was glad of his friendſhip; and carefully followed his advertiſements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly ſieze upon a gate; whereat they let in ſome Roman Companies, that lay near in a readineſſe for the purpoſe. Hanno, when firſt he heard the noiſe, thought it had been no worſe matter, than ſome ſuch tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when, making haſte to pacifie the trouble, he ſaw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among thoſe diſcontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betook himſelf to flight: and ſaving himſelf, with Epictades, in a ſmall Bark, ſet ſail for Africk; leaving all his Army and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued maſters of the whole Iland.

Lævinus the Conſul having taken Agrigentum, did ſharp execution of juſtice upon all the Citizens. The principall of them he ſcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the reſt of them he ſold for ſlaves, and confiſcated their goods; ſending home to Rome the money that was raiſed of the booty. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome ſtood in no leſſe neceſſity of gold, than of ſteele: which may have been the reaſon, why Lævinus dealt ſo cruelly with the Agrigentines. Nevertheleſſe the fame of ſuch ſeverity bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians, ſo that in great haſte they ſought to make their peace. About forty Towns yeelded themſelves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treaſon; and ſixe only ſtayed to be wonne by force. Theſe things done, Lævinus returned home to Rome, carrying with him about four thouſand men from Agatirna; that were a company of out-lawes, bankrouts, and baniſhed men, accuſtomed to live by ſpoile of others in theſe troubleſome times. He beſtowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exerciſe their own occupation againſt the Brutians; a theeviſh kinde of people, that were enemies unto thoſe of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journey againſt Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is ſaid) very eſpeciall ſervice. So by this enterpriſe of Sicil, the Carthaginians waſted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire poſſeſſion of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the war paſſed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory at Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good ſervices done in the Iland of Sicil, he had granted unto him the honour of the leſſer Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denyed him: becauſe he had not finiſhed the warre, but was fain to leave his Army behinde him in the Province. He ſtayed not long in Rome, before he was again choſen Conſull together with M. Valerius Lævinus, who ſucceeded him in the government of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making war againſt King Philip in Greece. Great Complaint was made againſt the Conſul Marcellus, by the Syracuſians, for that which he had done unto them: they alledging their great friendſhip to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppreſſed by ſuch Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome than to all good men that lived in Syracuſe. The Conſul, on the other ſide, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoan themſelves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their neceſſity; and not unto the the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversie, as best agreed with the benefit of their own Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Lævinus, were appointed to make war as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil fell unto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not seem hindred by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his business with them was dispatcht, he gently undertook the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family, to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicil, whose doing there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the war, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Navie. They were all of the poorer sort, that used to be employed in Sea-services, especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there money enough in the Treasury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustain all publick charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter unto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could undergoe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Nevertheless it was impossible to maintain the war against the Carthaginians, or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That since the common Treasure was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no perswasions would be so effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasury, all the money that he had; and that no Senator should keep any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoever; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings unto the gods; as also a Ring for himself, with such other tokens of ingenuity for his wife and children, as every one did use, and those of as small value as might be. This advice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publick necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimity deserved well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal; & Lævinus toward Sicil. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seem to remember him, and think upon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loss of Capua: which gave them cause to look unto themselves; as if in his help there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Towns that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his Army, that he should not be able to keep the field: or else he must leave them to their own fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealousie grew so outragious, that he sacked and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himself; and make unprofitable to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The town of Salapia yeeded unto Marcellus; and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater losse, than the Town it self. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dasius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dasius in private; and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convented and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denyed it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meer malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his adversary anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that he who could not be beleeved by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul took by force, Maronea and Meles, Towns of the Samnites, wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once: but was fain to catch advantages; where he might get them; the Romans now being grown stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearyed themselves with ill speed in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow business of far less importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had been so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it self might have been strucken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannæ. But since that which is past cannot be amended; Hannibal must force himself to make a good countenance; and tell his followers; that this mighty succour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set sail for Spain; whither when he came, it was appointed that Asdrubal should forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had been so much talk. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal & his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans to prevent the threatning mischief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor lay near unto Herdonea to get the Town by practice. It was not long since near unto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonea ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As soon as he came, he offered battail to the Roman Prætor; who accepted it with more haste than good speed. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himself, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slain, the number is uncertain; some reporting seven, others thirteen thousand. The Town of Herdonea, because it was at point to have yeelded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carryed away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good cheer; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and overtaking him at Numistro in the Country of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted untill night; & ended, by reason of the darkness, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and sought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battail, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus passed the time away, untill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that year to besiege Tarentum: which if he could win; like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the year before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to help Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battail, but upon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong untill the comming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be lusty, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captain, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; untill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battail; wherein Hannibal had the victory; took fixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of mark. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to hear, he did so vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight again; since all other motives continued the same, and his men had been heartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of revenge, and of repairing their honour lost, which affections gave a sharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battail Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so dear a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slain, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battail, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Nevertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consull hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul about the same time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscentes, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns: whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had been authors, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeves, which Lavinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also set on work to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, sate down before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof she gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her lover was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in love, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistris, to doe what she would have him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to convey himself into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own perswasions, partly by the flattering entreaty of his sister; wanne him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consull, to the end that he might seem to have wonne the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasury, whither it was carryed, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carryed away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit & posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming: but he was so near, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consull; he incamped a few dayes together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two young men of the same city; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed again: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where, save only at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellowes, that it may seem good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered; that the Legions of Canna, and those unhappy Companies that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of men, and impositions of money: in every of which years they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new souldiers were dayly pressed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never returned. Such talk was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans their farther help. This was thought the likeliest way to obtain peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadours of these Towns make such declaration, and protest their disability of giving any farther help: they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not serve, the Embassadours continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteen Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergo whatsoever should be layed upon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good services, this their present love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed upon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadours of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retain them in the City, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own consideration of their ill deserving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought in those that were so willing to help the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italy. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Nevertheless, they were fain to open their most privie treasury; and thence take out the gold that had been laid up to serve them in cases of greatest extremity. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consull, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Nevertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at less warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiss to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessity of money, were driven to furnish the Army in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stock that was left: it must needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far less than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet won it: howsoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soon after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, & T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Asdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy untill the year following. After the great battell at Cannæ, Hannibal had lost much time about Cumæ and Naples, in seeking to make himself Master of a good Haven; for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turn his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a party against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, and many other towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian towns, from hearkening to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, & the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army comming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consull into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrefie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the year following they were devising how to break out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors, partly by terrour of severe judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils, and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong War upon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battell they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a Fleet out of Sicil to help him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battell. This great man of War had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wisdome. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater imployment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battell, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman Fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and save their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should straggle from the Roman camp; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fit to remove their camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellowes who discovered not themselves, until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campthat was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell down dead; then began every one to shift for himself, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their camp: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himself, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was faln into the custody of Hannibal; who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had hapnnd were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithall signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite: For his messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such imployment as he should think needfull. The device was plain, and no lesse plain was the revengeful minde which he bare against that City; because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any sign of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readiness, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troup of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate, for the Consul was there. The gate was opened fair and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this stratagem, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Cicil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Camp, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the surviving Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Comwon-wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himself was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so near unto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men as were not only valiant, but well advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himself so strangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had borne the same Office long before. This M. Livius had been Consul with L. Æmilius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this Warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned; Æmilius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankfull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battel of Canna, it was apparent, what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himself anew upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will so continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the city, and lived in his countrey Grange; still vexing himself with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lævinus, being Consuls two or three years agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented sort, as might appear, both by his careleſneſs in apparell, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenſors, to poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he uſed to ſit ſilent, and ſignifie his aſſent or diſlike to what was propoſed, either in ſhort formal words, or in paſſing from ſide to ſide, when the houſe was divided. At length it hapned, that in ſome buſineſſe weightily concerning one that was his kinſman; he ſtood up and made a ſet ſpeech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much altered ſince he had left it; many brave men were loſt; new ones were choſen; ſuch as rather ſerved to fill up the number, than to anſwer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left of ancient ſtanding, had even ſpent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to ſay; that it was great pity, ſo worthy and able a man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth ſtood in great need, yet had not uſed in this dangerous war. Now ſeeing that the Conſuls ought, one of them, to be choſen a Patrician, the other of neceſſity a Plebeian: and ſince neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lævinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livie would not endure to hear of this. He ſaid it was unreaſonable, that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man, ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe, and the like phraſes he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions, and examples rehearſed, of ſuch as had patiently digeſted injuries done by the people, and repayed good for evill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelf to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for ſhelter in a ſtorme. Such unthankfulneſſe, to well-deſerving men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the ſecond King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to priſon, upon ſome ſmall offence conceived, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſervice of a man more than ordinarily ſufficient; he ſtood no longer upon the ſcanning of late diſpleaſures; but employed the ſame Duke, whom he had newly diſgraced. Thus is wiſdome often taught by neceſſity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were choſen Conſuls. Aſdrubal was already come into France, and waited only, to have the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warm weather, for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans uſed at this time the ſervice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not imployment for many more, if they had known how to levie and maintain them. Of theſe which they had, four ſerved in Spain, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeverall parts of Italy, where need ſeemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution: and would not be tyed to the punctuall obſervance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not ſtirre out of Rome, againſt ſo mighty a power as followed Aſdrubal, untill he had firſt obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be ſpared from other imployments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true, that two Legions appointed to ſerve under Lucius Porcius a Prætor of that year, among the Ciſalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom th War againſt Aſdrubal was allotted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, near unto Tarentum, under another of the Prætors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was ſent againſt Hannibal. Nevertheleſſe, the Conſuls, by the eſpeciall inſtance of Livie, did obtain, that all might be left to their own diſcretion. For newes came, that Aſdrubal was already paſſing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Country about Genua, with their neighbour people, were in readineſſe to joyne with him; and L. Porcius ſent word, that he would adventure no further, than he ſafely might. When all was ordered as themſelves thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the City; each his ſeveral way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, affected, than they had been, when L. Æmilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and win the victory betimes: but rather they stood in fear, lest all diligence, wisdome and valour should prove too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not been slain; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyne, and make short work with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to finde. With extream difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever since the battell of Cannæ: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed a man of more sufficiency than Hannibal himself. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Army: this Asdrubal in the same places, had multiplyed his numbers; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations, and the like, of which fear presented many unto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait upon their Consuls out of the Town, like a pensive train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus; upon whom in the like sort they had given attendance the last year; but saw neither of them returne alive, from a lesse dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstain from giving, or taking battell, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, that he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory; or by seeing the overthrow of his own unjust Citizens, satisfie himself with the joy of a great, though not an honest revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his journey into Italy; such mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livie. Yet I think it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his History concerning that accident: Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain; by reason of those Captains that were sent from the City of Carthage, to joyn with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus far forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courtes undertaken, it cannot be known: since of those books, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining only a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of War than himself, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceive, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischievous Partizans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Nevertheless, Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His journey into Italy being resolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not far from the Mines of silver; whence be was to furnish his Expeditions. Thither came Scipio: and drave him out of his Camp; though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could, or would come to his assistance. The overthrow seems not to have been so great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a provident man, and seeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, sent away all his money with his Elephants before him: but staid behind himself to sustain the Romans a while, untill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retyred in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed over Tagus. Then taking unto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gesco; that thought himself the fittest man for the administration thereof. Fain would Scipio have stopped him on his journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the mountains. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his mony that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Army well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to winter in their Country; whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journy over the Alps, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal; when he travelled thorow their Country. For these poor men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattell; and to make spoil of that little wealth which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in process of time, they were better informed. Therefore understanding, that there were two mighty Cities, far dis-joyned asunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alps did only lye in the way: they gladly condescended to take their part in the fortune of the Invaders. The like affection upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also joyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Country. There was no other Roman Army near, than L. Portius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Asdrubal set upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Town. But there he lost a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintring Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to sit still a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battell to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Country of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the journey intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucans; he there fought unprosperously with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless, he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him, and had there again the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed again, to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came again to Venusia, having Nero still at his heels. Thence went he over the River Aufidus, to Canusium, where he sate down, not far from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit down by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well; that his brother might with little impediment, overcome the way to Canusium: where if he could once again deal with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Country. If this had so faln out; Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to with any second victory, in the naked Campans about Cannæ; if such an Army as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilest Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was comming to their succour: he was advertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livie the Consul. Of these news Claudius Nero was nothing joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howsoever the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of so strong a war at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planers: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few years, was like to work most lamentable effects. It seemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could do service in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himself to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making shew, as if he would only step aside, to do some small piece of service near at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him with victuals, and all other necessaries for his Army. Livius the other Consul, at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within half a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his journey thither; and when he drew near, sent Messengers before him, to give notice of his comming. Livie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert untill dark night, and then enter secretly into the Camp: lest the Enemy, perceiving this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsels. This was done: and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him, should be lodged and entertained by men of their own sort. Their Company was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with him on the way. Nevertheless it was not needfull that the Quarter which received them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsell of Warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new arrived Companies to refresh themselves a few dayes after their weary journey, before they should be drawn forth to battell. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make use of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own camp, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battell would not have been undertaken, without this their comming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Councell brake up, that the signe of battell should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coat over the Generals Pavilion.

Asdrubal was no less willing than the Romans to come to battell, having long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long journey. Hereupon he began to with-draw his Army back into the camp: and gave order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the Enemies camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The camp, as hath been said was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded only once in the Quarter of L. Porcius the Prætor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the the quarter of Livius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himself perhaps with over-strongly fortifying his own camp. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keep himself as long as he could, from necessity of battell. But whether it were so, that his guides did steal away from him in the dark, so that he could not find the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heavie, and hindred his speed: far he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horse, and stayed him from passing any further. Soon after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battell. Asdrubal, seeing himself overtaken with necessity to fight, omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficulty, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himself with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants he bestowed in the front of his battels. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battell. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was unto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; that they were to fight with men desirous to have fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Livius the Consull with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans, by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the less, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Livius therefore, and Porcius found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain against a steep Hill, was unable to come to blowes with the Gaules, that stood opposite unto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who, seeing his own left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remain idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compassed, he fell upon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flank. Here began the victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal his battell: and falling upon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part was slain. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants four were taken alive: the rest were slain: some by the Enemies weapons, others by their own guides that rode them. For when any of them, being sore wounded, began to waxe unruly, and rush back upon their own battels following them, the guide had in readiness a Mallet, and a Chizzel, wherewith he gave them a stroke between the eares, in the joynt of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beasts upon a sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the squadrons following them, is said to have been the device of Asdrubal himself, who dyed in this battell.

Great commendations are given to Asdrubal, both by Polybius and by Livie. He is said at all times to have shewed himself worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother: to have striven with great patience against many difficulties, whereinto he fell fell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this last battell all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally, when he saw the losse irrepairable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battell, the report of Livie, and of Polybius do very much disagree. For Livie saith that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Cannæ; that fifty sixe thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken prisoners, and above four thousand Roman citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered; and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slain eight thousand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes, but in gold and silver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have bin as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with mony. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battell of Metaurus, a parallel unto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side; & two thousand of the Roman, to have bin slain. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battell. Whereby it may seem that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no lesse in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever since it were known in what sort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his comming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazzard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, & either pursue him, or set upon the Army that staid behind, much weakned, and without a Generall? Thus did they talk; yet reserving their censure unto the successe; with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the mean time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ran to the temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsell, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates; as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske every ones help. In brief, they were all so full of melancholy, that when the first newes of victory came, there were not many that would beleeve it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Coniuls, with Letters containing all that had passed, there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private business; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) and attending their own affairs in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his camp, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound, sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might have served well enough to certifie Hannibal of the mis-adventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seem, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weal: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civill; and lesse prone to the insolency of revenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deep impression of fear into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himself, being over-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperity. For it was the battell of Metaurus that weighed down the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not after wards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy fight (besides the worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, with-drew himself into the Country of the Brutians: and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too far asunder.

Where-

Wherefore he drew them all into a leſſer compaſs in the utmoſt corner of Italy, it being a country of much faſtneſs, and the people exceedingly devoted to his ſervice. In this buſineſs Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either becauſe Hannibal was too ſtrong for him, having all his forces united; or becauſe it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harveſt was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Conſull tarryed among the Ciſalpine Gaules untill the end of ſummer; there to ſet things in ſuch order as he thought requiſite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well diſcharge the place. For this cauſe, he deſired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well underſtood his meaning: which was, to have the honour of triumph as he well deſerved. But foraſmuch as it was well known what intereſt Nero had in the late victory: order was ſo given, that not only Livie with his Army ſhould come home; but likewiſe Nero, though leaving his Army behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof, Livie made the greater ſhew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; becauſe in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Army alſo being preſent at the triumph. But Nero, that rode on horſe back, and without ſuch attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly aſcribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Lievtenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good ſervice. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be choſen Conſuls: and Conſuls they were choſen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Conſulſhip. Neither indeed from this year, which was the thirteenth of the preſent war, untill the eighteenth year wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; ſave only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by ſurpriſe. For Hannibal wanted ſtrength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himſelf upright. And ſurely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius, whom Livie therein followes: That making war upon a People, of all other the moſt warlike, he obtained ſo many victories by his own good conduct: & that leading an Army, compounded of ſo many ſundry nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, & Greeks, which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in ſuch good order, that they never fell to ſedition among themſelves, or againſt their General. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he ſuſtained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry ſoile of the Brutians: which, when it was beſt manured in time of peace, could hardly ſuffice to nouriſh the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Army in ſuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatneſſe of reward and booty: ſince, after the death of Aſdrubal, hee made no invaſion upon the wealthier parts of Italy, but held himſelf ſtill among the poor Brutians. Where we muſt leave him; untill he be drawn into Africk by Scipio; whoſe doings will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman made entire conqueſt of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Iſle of Gades.

MAgo and Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. Theſe agreed together, that Mago ſhould make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levie a ſupply of men;

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately been imployed in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that son of Amilcar, whose authority had been greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it self, against that noble race of Warriours; when it should appear, that things did prosper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set upon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by mony, and over perswasions, he levied above nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himself in the Eastern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may seem, to the proceedings of Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the Consuls. But hearing of the levie made by Hanno and Mago among the Celtiberians, he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, becaus they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neer to these Celtiberians: and falling upon them on the sudden, gave them such an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, instead of heartening and re-inforcing them, became partakers of the loss. Mago saved himself with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten dayes journey brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken prisoner; though he kept himself out of the fight untill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saved most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, by the comming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his own Country; or was perhaps, about to send them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentive to the necessity and successe of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that served under Hannibal, and those that had been sent over into Africk, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, that all which had followed Asdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his army was closed up in a straight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themselves unto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italy, which gave such confidence unto Scipio; it was the more probable, becaus he took not this great enterprise in hand, until the summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore used the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Army into many Garrisons, hindered the Enemy from doing any great exploit before winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, caused Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his brother L. Scipio took by assault the Town of Oringis.

Against the next years danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor travell, in strengthening himself, for the tryall of his last fortune in Spain. With seventy thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I beleeve, that he could hardly have raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to incounter with such a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needfull to use the help of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Colchus, that was Lord of eight and twenty towns, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his service: he resolved to make use of those, and some few others, that might help to make a shew; and yet not be able to do any great harme, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy; near unto whom he incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masanissa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilest he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain troups of horse in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betook themselves to plain flight. After this incounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himself into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many dayes together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same form; and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before designed. But Scipio, when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his men and horses to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to train out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: using herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battell of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battell. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertain the Romans; whilest he himself arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since, being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retrait unto their foot; and one troup seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the enemy. But about noone he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battell of Spaniards far behinde them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, levied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed; and with much difficulty made resistance. The Carthaginians would fain have succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was comming against them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Army stood idle, untill the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he must have cast himself into the open space that lay before him between the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himself inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battell of Canna. Wherefore he did only imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In processe of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lusty; when the others began to faint with travell and heat of the day.

Where-

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly; and gave not over, till they had forc't the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retrait; and afterward again, to have caused his men turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, led by the obstinate passion of fear, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Camp of Asdrubal had that day been taken, if a storm of rain, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to give over.

The same night Asdrubal gave no rest to his men: but caused them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the camp; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soon after two strong Towns were yeelded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems that the perverse fortune of this late battell, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleeve the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himself, and marched away faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so oft ento make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, save only seven thousand that with Asdrubal himself recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea side, that was not farre thence, he took shipping, and set sail for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to besiege their camp (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanissa staid in it) whilest he with the rest of the Army did what was needfull in the Country abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Masanissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it self; some flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they liked. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of war against the Romans: of which only Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison, consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight in the late overthrows. Hereby it seems that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that City. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes bin inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and slew the poor men that escaped thither from the overthrows. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not untill the next year) Scipio went against these, and took himself Illiturgi, and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroied by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was thrown all the gold, and silver, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a sure guard, that should kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This provision being made, all the Inhabitants that could bear Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they were every one slain. Then was the Town forthwith set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilest they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Massæsili, a people of the Numidians, hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings port: who landing at the same time, carryed Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethink himself, how to finish the war, by putting them to the like distresse in Africk. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seek revenge. He had also bin beholding to P. & Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Captain into Africk; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons, the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the city in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africk, upon the friendship of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. Lælius his Embassador, to deal with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spain, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time with Asdrubal. This would have bin very dangerous unto him, had he bin descryed by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbare to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himself, by want of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Scipio returning into Spain, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, & Astapa, as hath been said before. The conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull that he should trouble himself with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as Voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give proof in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countreys. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controversies, to tryall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orsua; Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers son: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tanistry. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the principality: which, though himself received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his son would not let it go back, but claimed to hold it as heir unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vain, to take up that quarrel; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battell, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wils: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the fool-hardinesse of the younger.

Such combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We read of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one between Paris and Menelaus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that between David and Goliah; and others performed by some of Davids Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kinde appertains the fight between twelve of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Benjamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren, Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of less importance, ae having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Canutus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdome. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort, against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Dutchy of Britain; there was a fight for honor of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverlie, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, & did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of severall Nations; for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accusation for life; or upon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kind, was that, of which we spake even now, between Corbis and Orsua. Unto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; such as were that between David and Goliah, or that between the Horatii and Curatii: in which without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Boulinbrook Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ansley and one Cattrington: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henry of Essex. The like also, between a Navarrois, and one Welsh of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belyed him, and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our tryall by battell do determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had been due to the offender, if the accusation had been proved; I cannot affirme. But we every where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, He shall suffer the pains appointed for those crimes. In combats for tryall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to do, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten or yeeldeth, loseth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats upon accusation, or tryall of right, fought in open field, as are those of bravery; but in Camp close, that is, within rails. Now this tryall by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the fair his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his own Jurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And upon this custome grew the French Proverbe, which they use when as any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement; saying, That He was tryed by the Law of Loray, or Berne; ou le battu paye l' amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of these frequent trials trials by battell that great learned man Yvo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kinde of tryall, was retrenched by S. Lewis, and Philip the fair; so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himself. It hath since been regranted, though more sparingly, by the French King, as to the Lord of Carogues, against Jaques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro his countriman: wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces deffences par un dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taisiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie unto the Emperor Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: every petty companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lie mortality it self, holding it a matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles the fift had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryall of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half so many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these dayes, wherein every man takes unto himself a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats, the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philosophy of quarrell; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no less ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a far greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one having relation to a slave, the other to a souldier. I confess that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speak and swear falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworn to pay the monies & other things they borrow, do not break their word and promise as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lyed to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now-adayes? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have, used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid not good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and Court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) un marché & complot fait ensemble, se mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kind of merchandise, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and so far now-adayes in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted either dull dull or Cynicall. True it is notwithſtanding (omitting the old diſtinction) that there is great difference between theſe mannerly and complementall lies, with thoſe which are ſometime perſwaded by neceſſity upon breach of promiſe; and thoſe which men uſe out of cowardize and fear: the latter confeſſing themſelves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other ſtiled the moſt villanous. But now for the Lie it ſelf, as it is made the ſubject of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I ſay, That whoſoever giveth another man the Lie, when it is manifeſt that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainouſly taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promiſe which he hath otherwiſe made. For he that promiſeth any thing, tels him, to whom he hath promiſed, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he had made himſelf a Lier. On the other ſide, He that gives any man the Lie, when he himſelf knowes that he, to whom it is given, hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himſelf. And what cauſe have I, if I ſay that the Sun ſhines when it doth ſhine, and that another fellow tels me I lie, for it's midnight; to proſecute ſuch an one to death, for making himſelf a fooliſh Ruffian, and a lyer in his own knowledge? For he that gives the Lie in any other diſpute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extream rudeneſſe to taxe any man in publick with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice againſt whom the untruth is uttered:) But all that is rude, ought not to be civillized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French cuſtome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counſell of God. But you will ſay, that theſe diſcourſes favour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to fear God or hell: whereas he that is truly wiſe, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing elſe to be feared. For againſt an Enemies ſword, we ſhall find ten thouſand ſeven-penny-men (waged at that price in the wars) that fear it as little, or perchance leſſe, than any profeſt Sword-man in the world. Diligentiſsima in tutela ſui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preſerver of it ſelf. It is (ſaith Ariſtotle) a mediocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna: ſic nec fortem pugna; ſed cauſa: As it is not the puniſhment that makes the Martyr: ſo it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cauſe. In which, whoſoever ſhall reſolvedly end his life, reſolvedly in reſpect of the cauſe, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as he may juſtly be numbred among the Martyrs of God; ſo may thoſe that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devill. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or puniſh the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conqueſt of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cauſe to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our own conſciences; Animaſq; in vulnere ponere; And to drown our ſoules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will again ask me, if I condemn, in generous and noble ſpirits, the defence of their honours, being preſt with injuries? I ſay that I do not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternal Law: & the Lawes of all Chriſtian Kings and States; do favour him that is aſſailed, in the ſlaughter of the aſſailant. You will ſecondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to ſatisfie the challenger in private combat? I anſwer, that he is not: becauſe (omitting the greateſt, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and oppoſite to that, which they call the point of honour; The Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can deſtroy it; except you will ſtile thoſe Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, ſeeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to ſecond the Conqueror, and the Lawes of God appointed the Devill to ſecond the Conquered, dying in malice: I ſay, that he is both baſe & a fool, that accepts of any Cartel ſo accompanied. To this perchance it wil be anſwered, That the Kings of England, & other Chriſtian Kings, have ſeldome taken any ſuch advantage over men of quality, who upon even terms have ſlain their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combuſtion they have not often done it; ſo did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, ſue unto the King, to approve themſelves by battell and publique combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; ſo did they diſdain to ſubmit themſelves unto the ſhamefull revenge thereof; the ſame revenge (becauſe it deteſteth murder) that hath declared againſt a common Cut-purſe or other Theeves:

Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: yet is not the man-slayer freed from his pardon. For these two remedies hath the party grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by battell, upon his appeal, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denyed; and he further saith (for I use his own words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the man-slayer) be convinced either by great Assize or by Battell, upon that appeal; the man-slayer shall dye notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So favourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to justice and to the punishment of bloud violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamy unsufferable? I say, that a Marshals Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands; & for all things else by which the lives of our selves, our wives, and children are sustained, to the Judges of the Law; becaus it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our own: why should we not submit our selves unto the Judges of honour in cases of honour; because to recover our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet again, it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to be much more fearfull unto us, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be so dear unto us, other than a kind of History, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanyed with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publick good? In these, he that is imployed and trusted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult, because even and equall in persons and armes: neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; because the loss or mutilation of an able man, is also a loss to the Common-weal.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to save every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may sustain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For so repent us of any evill words that we have given, and to confesse that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that gives ill words in colour, and suddenly denies them, or repents himself of them upon advisement hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appear by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsier de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshals of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gave judgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chair under the degrees where the Constable and Marshals sate: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himself, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he delivered into Plessis hands, submitting himself to such revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshals having formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to use his own discretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himself, as one beforehand in point of honour, (who struck M. de Plessis like a Ruffian comming behind him, and having the advantage of company, and his horses ready, shifted himself away on the sudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himself in this shamefull manner:) or whether Monsier de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not far juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man judge. To this, if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no disgrace unto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theef, when he is brought to the Gallowes, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no no grace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sins to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for somewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it self, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgement of our own weakness. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men do rather deride petty injuries or sudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, do commonly suspect their own valour; and rather desire, that therby the world should beleeve them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himself indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshals of France have, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose judgement in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preserved, we may therefore as well submit our selves to the Judge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we do submit our selves in all controversies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politick. For the bl ood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honybees, as that of Buls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten up, of severall nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God upon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Majesty therefore (which Henry the fourth of France also endeavoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could never do: in beat ng down and extinguishing that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse hap y in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outragious vanity of Duellists.

Unto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproo and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference between Lies of necessity upon breach o promise, or complementall lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former sort being excusable by weaknesse or levity; the latter being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; & that killing, which the Scripures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes do not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his own priviledge, commandeth that the guilfull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection o his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guilfull murder also, by poysoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, between comming presumptuously upon a man, to slay h m with guile; and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majesty now reigning, have given notable testimony of their justice, upon three Noble men, who committed guilfull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis upon the Lord of Talard: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who l eing of high and ancient linage, and supported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardina l of Bellay (in especiall favour with the King) was one, was not withstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Mary, upon a Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very dear unto her. His Majesty, upon a Baron of Scotland; wh se house was no lesse anc ent and faithfull, than himself valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilfully by poyson, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, every age hath had too many examples. Of k ll ng guilfully by the pen (that I may not spake of any English Judge) the Author o the French Recherches gives unto us two notable instances: the one of des Essars, who (saith Pasquier) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l' opinion celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut il fut pendu & estranglé; Who caused Montaign great Master of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eshars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himself was soon after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot; a man most nobly descended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love growes old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed: The Admirall presuming upon the great good service which he had done the King in Piemont, & in the defence of Marseilles against the Emperour, gave the King other language than became him, and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being easie to provoke an ill disposition) gave commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings advocate, to question the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Judges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharp threats; and with the rest, with so fair promises; as albeit nothing could be proved against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to prevail against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falshood in so great a Magistrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquier) a tout Juge pour demeurer tousiours en soy, & ne laisser fluctuer sa conscience debans les vagues d'une imaginaire faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le submerge; A fair lesson to all Judges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginary favour, which in the end overwhelms them. And as for the Admiral, though it might have bin answered unto his friends, if any bewail his calamity as undeserved, That he was tryed according to his own desire, by the Laws of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Estate.

§. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is chosen Consul.

THe last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, & followed Scipio a while before, to take arms against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spain. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they rashly fell upon the Suessetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Countrey. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of the Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought that the time served very well, to enrich themselves with the spoyle of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should have bridled their fury; they chose out of their own number two base fellowes, Albinus Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to their Commanders. These took upon them all the Ensigns of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whilest they were devising what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent unto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further over-shot themselves; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolved to do exemplary justice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deserved. Therefore he caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis: he caused Albius and Atrius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; he called the Mutiners to Assembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inveighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albius and Atrius, with the other prisoners were haled to the stake; where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was sworn.

Mandonius & Indibilis continued in arms; notwithstanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the severity used to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them, and found them in a valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and sending Lelius with all his horse to fetch a compass about the hils, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preserve themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himself and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanissa; who secretly promised to do him all service, if the people of Rome would send him to make war in Africk. Unto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart from his Fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gaules and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent unto him from Carthage; and he himself laid hold upon all that he could find in the town of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena; hoping to have taken it by surprise. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himself a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not suffer him again to enter into their City. By this he foresaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth unto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein: & himself with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome, he made suit for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bin granted unto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as received that dignity after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But, to make amends for this repulse, the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voice of the city P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custome of those times, go far from the City; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same office, were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being far & long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio, desiring to have the war transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so far off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leave to make war in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniſſa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories againſt Asdrubal and Syphax.

Prb. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craſſus, entring into their Conſulſhip, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio ſhould be allowed, to beſtow part of the money which he had brought out of Spain into the treaſurie; upon the ſetting forth of ſolemn plays, that he had vowed to make whileſt he was buſied in his Spaniſh wars. This helped wel to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he intended to make in Africk. To the ſame purpoſe, did the Spaniſh Embaſſages avail much in the Senate; eſpecially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deſervedly; ſaying, That they were the moſt happy of all their countrimen, ſince they being preſent, had ſeen him choſen Conſul, and ſhould carry home ſuch joyful news. The Saguntine Embaſſadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome (though coſtly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deſerved. Nevertheleſs, when Scipio propoſed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province, there wanted not many, even of the principal men, that vehemently gainſaid him. Of theſe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who ſeems to have been troubled with that diſeaſe, which too often cauſed men, renowned for long approved vertue, to look aſquint upon the actions of thoſe, that follow them in the ſame kinde. He alleaged many reaſons againſt the purpoſe of the Conſul: whereof the chief were, That the Treaſury was unable to ſuſtain the charges of a war in Africk; and that it was extreamly perillous to hazard ſo great forces where they could not at pleaſure be recalled unto the defence of Rome it ſelf, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy ſtood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as alſo concerning the honour of the Conſul; which would (he ſaid) be greater in ſetting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spaniſh wars, as of leſs moment than the intended voyage againſt Carthage, nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having ſuffered Aſdrubal to paſs into Italy: ſhewing, that it was greatly to be feared, leſt the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithſtanding the good ſucceſs of Scipio, (if it hapned to be good) might be ſent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whileſt the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that year a Province: which the Conſul nevertheleſs propounded in ſuch wiſe, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other ſide, inſiſted upon this one point; That it was better to make an offenſive, than a defenſive war: eſpecially againſt ſuch as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furniſh themſelves, by help of mony, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to diſcharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiſing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home; & taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withſtood ſuch a gallant enterpriſe, he propoſed the matter again to the Senate. Much altercation there was about the maner of his proceeding: foraſmuch as it was noiſed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the ancients: who reſented in this honourable man, a little ſpice of that arrogancy, which in following ages grew to be much hotter, in thoſe that had commanded long abroad. But in concluſion, Scipio refered himſelf wholly to the Senates good will and pleaſure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Ile of Sicil might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to paſſe over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furniſh out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the ſudden from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no leſſe terrible invaſion upon Italy, than that which Aſdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raiſe any great Army of the Ligurians: for that he found them diſtracted with civill wars. Therefore he was driven to make choiſe of his his party; and to help those whom he thought fittest for his turn, against the others. This troublesome business, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unsteady Gauls ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aid from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertain) loaden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of mony, heartning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voyage of Scipio into Africk disturbed all; and made him be re-called home.

Against Hannibal was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have been pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punick and Greek letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission and carelessnesse; in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Camp, is said to have been the occasion of this years idleness; which fell out not much amiss for the City of Rome, that was marvellously impoverished by this war; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no losse, the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward unto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councels of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, do carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their own judgements, to the wisdome that hath gotten it self a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himself upon the advice of many, shall often finde himself deceived: the counsell of those many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chief of his imployment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were grown old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the severall Towns: Corn, Iron, Canvas for sails, Axes, Beed-hooks, Hand-mils, and the like implements; Fire for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Spears of all kindes: every place furnished him with that commodity, which it best could afoord.

Unto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of five and forty dayes, he had both fell'd his Timber, built, and lanched twenty Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Army into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himself well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy censure. They had served under Marcellus and Lævinus, at the taking of many Cities and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the War highly, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilest he was providing to have things in a readiness for Africk, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri, (for there were two in the Town) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; & that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their own paucity should make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Consul Scipio. The Towns-men were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate: not only against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctity, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principall offenders; whom they cast into prison, and used according to their deserts: as also they restored unto Proserpina her mony twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp invective that Fabius made, others took courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissoluteness of his Army; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legats were sent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lælius in Africk, rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great booty: and struck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who saw their affairs to be upon tearms of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masanissa, he well informed himself of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyn with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made under-hand with the Romans, Livie doth professe, That there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancy, in following times, must help to prove, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian far inferiour to Livie, both in worth and time) gives one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should have escaped the diligence of Livie, if it had been true: unlesse we should beleeve, that he wilfully forbare to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to think amiss of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus * Appian tels it: and many circumstances of things done, confirm it. Asdrubal, the son of Gesco, had a fair daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loved. Masanissa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his son-in-law. When

Liv. lib. 29.

* Appian. Alex. de Bell. Pun.

When the virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax, without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveighed himself home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus far forth we may beleeve Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seems, that howsoever Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet since this their courtesie proceeded from fear, he thought it wisdome to continue and increase the same their fear, by making fair promises to the Romans, untill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, & the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it self, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Liv. lib. 29.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Desalces the brother, not unto Masanissa the son. But this Uncle of Masanissa shortly dyed: and his elder sonne, who took possession of the kingdome, was vanquished, and slain in battell by a Rebel, that made himself Protector over the younger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himself against Masanissa, whose returne he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memory of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have been glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whilest his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrival, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdome. Nevertheless Masanissa still retained the hearts of his people; & thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good successe, than could be expected from the good will of poor Masanissa, sent an Embassage into Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not choose but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheless he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Adventurers. Lest therefore the failing of this hope, should work too great a change in common opinion, He thought it the best way, to prevent all discourse, and set the war undertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadours he dismissed in haste, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what he had promised, he had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make it good. Having sent them away, He called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which he intended no longer to defer. For, said he, Masanissa hath been with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to mee; greatly wondring upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors, whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet unto Lilybæum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; hasted thither with his Army. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them, which to leave behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them down: since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, near to a fore-land then called the fair Promontorie: which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were that Cape or Headland which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa unto Scipio at his first arrivall, help to confirm the opinion of Xylander, who thinks the fair Promontorie to have been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficulty Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soon after his arrivall, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed within the Promontorie of Apollo, whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roved about the Countrey with a troup of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lælius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compass to Vtica, by Land; when he might have disembarqued nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified unto Lælius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to be such, as not only served to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatned a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might he better advise them to set sail for Vtica, and make war upon the Enemies at their own doors.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gesco, the same that had lately been chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellowes, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troup of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landing; and slain Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveighed aboord his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them back loaden into Sicil. He took likewise a Town called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceive the unskilfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masanissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno so far, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slain. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the town, which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath been formerly made, and sate down before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, assailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Camp, which must be well stored against the year following. Whilest thus necessity urged him to leave Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Asdrubal had made a Levie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw near unto the Romans before the comming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joyning unto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-Camp the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Navie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shoar: in the bottome of the Creek he moored his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole camp he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the year, when it should serve him again to fight. Of cattell and other booty Masanissa had brought in great store, by driving the Country, before the comming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corn also he had gotten some; and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he fraighted homewards with such part of his booty, as he could best spare; especially with captives to be sold for slaves. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the severe institution, which the Romans used in the discipline of war, or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew near, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally unconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearyed himself, by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peradventure no less weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this war: he might be moved with a little entreaty to withdraw himself home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not unlikely, that such a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had been invited, to make a step thither and repose himself a while: his wife Queen Sophonisba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africk, and so make an end of the war: wherewith now both Africk and Europe were disquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the first give ear: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the intercourse of Embassadors; he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabbins, bins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, used coverings of Mats and Reeds; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughs and leaves: under which they lay carelesly without their Trenches. Upon this advertisement he bethought himself, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without help of some such straragem, he foresaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wars when time should serve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, upon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himself, to make some sudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he sent many Embassadours, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concern the intended surprise. With these Embassadours he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers, disguised like slaves; that wandring (as it were) idle up and down the Camp, might observe the waies and entrances, with whatsoever else was needfull. When he had learned as much as he desired: upon the sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vain to hold any longer Treaty, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of war; without whose approbation, all that himself could do, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his design in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensive: as having lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to devise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp, and provoke him to battail in those Plains. This if they could do, they hoped to make his Councell of war repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? Which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian Fleet should do by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victory to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was grown upon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to do somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same piece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behinde him in his Camp. He caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes; that they might be ready for the journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Camp; all the rest of the Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seven miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to undertake himself with the one half of his army; the other half he committed to Lælius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set upon the camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the camp of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seem to have taken hold by casualty upon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and give Syphax warning to look to himself. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and softly; that Lælius & Masanissa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compasse about for fear of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himself, imputed unto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting half asleep; and others, that had sitten up late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were, nor give any remedy to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the sudden mischief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell upon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Countrey, did great execution upon them; having laid all the wates, by which he foresaw that they would seek to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pitifull mischance: so that some ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would serve to quench the fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where, fearlesse of any danger toward themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore lost no time: but setting upon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their camp, which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there did not stand to make resistance, but shifted only for himself, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been said, that with lesse than one half of thirty thousand men, he might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not been only carefull how to save his own fearfull head. Nevertheless Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have been true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would have striven to shew valour, when the Camp was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearfull thing it was, to hear the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands, very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the dark: but they were not many, as after shall appear. Surely it must needs have been very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the dark of night. Wherefore Livie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seem to have followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting up the summe. For he reckons only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped; forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire: and above six thousand to have been taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is far short of fourscore and thirteen thousand, which were in these two Camps.

Asdrubal, putting himself into the next town that was very strongly fortified, thought there to find the Romans work, untill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Town; if the Towns-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Unto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrivall of Scipio would soon give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seek the Victors favour by delivering him up; he shrunk away betimes, and made all hast to Carthage. As for the town which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming: and thereby preserved it self from all manner of losse. The two next Towns adjoyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of war: but their strength not being answerable, they were soon taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, he returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason, when, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessity enforced them to make hasty provision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Army, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, levying in all hast another Army; and sending Embassadours to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the son of Gesco, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queen Sophonisba went forth with Embassadours to her husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as he could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdome. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length she won him to her own desire. And it fell out at the same time, that four thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to serve in Africk. Of these were made such brave reports, as if their courage, and the Armes which they used, were not to be resisted. Even the multitude within Carthage beleeved these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole countrey of Spain had been twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lye; saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made up an Army, consisting wel-near of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called, The great Fields, about five dayes journey from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now been time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and seek to weary out the Enemy by delayes. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to give such directions as best pleased himself. The fourth day the Armies met in battail: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battail. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustain the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even untill they were all in a manner slain: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne Kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio having thus gotten the mastery of the field, took counsail about the prosecution of the war. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himself, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his own Kingdome, where easily else he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it seems that Masanissa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his own Kingdome, usurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himself. According to this order concluded, Lælius was sent away with Masanissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the war from town to town. Many places yeelded for fear; many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid upon them for maintenance of the war in Spain and Italy. What to doe in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Towns: neither durst they make bold to trouble their own subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadours should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilest Scipio himself was busied in the Iland Countreys. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: upon the safety whereof they said all depended: adding, that whilest they were true, and at unity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Nevertheless, it was considered, that thereby they should only protract the warre; without any advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the ships at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come over into Africk, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the Town: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio come to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible piece adjoyning, he easily took; the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soon as he drew near. But whilest he was about there to incamp, and fortifie himself against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceived; and stood in great fear, lest his own ships that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily loaden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assaulting the town) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall service. Wherefore he hasted away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their comming to Vtica, they tarried a while to make a bravado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bravery at Sea; it should little avail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he took his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four fold bridge over the Channell of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and back again upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planks, using the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it self not be torne asunder. Scarce was this work finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight between them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small loss which followed. They that stood upon the Bridge were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for fear of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw upon the masts and yards which served as arches to joyn the bridge together: then rowing

ing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first rank was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next rank of ships, that lay behinde them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their welcome was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage, Lælius and Masanissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without farther contention: the Masæsyli, his subjects, joyfully receiving him, & forsaking the usurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Asdrubal and Sophonuba, he prepared again for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloved wife, the losse of the Masæsyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lælius and Masanissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to think all alike their own, whereof they are in possession, be the title unto some part never so unjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that she had vomited up her own guts, when it was only the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeved the Kingdome of the Masæsyli to be part of his entrails: Lælius and Masanissa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) the King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries, wherein, even to this day though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battail is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent unto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all sorts gathered up in hast: and few of them had seen warre before. Encamping neer unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troups of horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: so that at length Syphax, unwilling to dis-hearten his men by taking any foil at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their own troups of horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battail standing now more firm, than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Masanissa likewise, and his troups grew confident upon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they began presently to dis-band. Fain would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was cast from his horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slain or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lælius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chief City of the Kingdome; whither he himself desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lælius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parlee: wherein by many fair promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yeelded her self into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; & to make good his promise, marryed her himself that very day: thereby to prevent Lælius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lælius, when he came thither, took the matter hainously, so that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over intreated by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captives immediately; following shortly after himself with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship; with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministring to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make war upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him so to do; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himself, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Lælius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcommed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which he should be highly rewarded to his own contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheless intreated, to think upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that she should not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a servant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes used then to have in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it unto her with this message; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her self.

At the receit of this Message and Present, she only said; That if her husband had no better token to send unto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might have dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funerall. And herewithall she boldly drank off the poison. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it down agreeably to that which hath been spoken before, concerning the præcontract between Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadours from Cirta met with Lælius and Masanissa upon their way thither, yeelding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her own private, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she was his own wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keep her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom she might appertain. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Hereuithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poison, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa his love, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him: adde not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) of the sudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had been trained up, and done them great service. Howsoever it were, Scipio, hearing of this tragicall accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crown of gold, with other Royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more chearfull contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him. Lib. 28.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved: yet would not the Title have redounded unto his great benefit; neither should he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these wars, and sustained himself with his troup of horse, in such sort as he did before the comming of the Romans; he might nevertheless have recovered his proper inheritance, by the love of his own subjects without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquished. As for the inlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masæsyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: & the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speak more) which held some pieces of his fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, & promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein, and answered very gravely, That it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State, and in processe of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings, that no way depended upon them, the salutation by * that name, though it were not accompanied with any other favour or profit thence redounding. Liv. lib. 31. * Cæsar. Comm. lib. 1.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce, and break it.

THe Carthaginians were extreamly dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befalne their good friend Syphax, and understood that Masanissa their mortall enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians naus had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadours, Princes of the city, which were their Privie Councel, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him, and of those that sate in Councell with him.

* Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15. Liv. lib. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithall they did not forgot, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadours were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their own necessity unlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the city of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the war. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the wals of Carthage; though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission and told them, That though he came into Africk, to make a conquest, and not Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making war, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these; That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Iland between Italy and Africk: That they should deliver up all their ships of war, save twenty; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certain hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadours unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the war had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lælius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open; and an holy day appointed for thansgiving and supplication to their gods. Lælius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African war, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him, who by rendring them to liberty, should do an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reign. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Masanissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King again; released his Numidians that were captives; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their poverty might serve to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Lælius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without: untill Lælius being sent for, came back from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to win time, and get respite for war; untill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terrour of their great names and Armies, upon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lutatius Catulus, at the end of the former war. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remain in force: neither had there since been any war at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head besieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like sort, without Commission, to pass the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadours make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had been so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that peace made by Lutatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but colluſion, and that they sought no other than to gain time, untill they might repair the war. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lælius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate received advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto conclusion. This may with good reason be beleeved, since it was not unknown, that if the war continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertain issue of one battel between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite lost. Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came back from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africk, to victuall the Roman Camp, was over-taken by foul-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrack, was dispersed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery, and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be medling in uproars: the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvail, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oars, recovered the station whereto their camp adjoyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loss; and for that the Town was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadours unto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, That Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (say they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before us, & kissed our feet App. de bell. Punico. Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15.

after an unusuall manner of humility, confessing your selves to have perfidiously broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deserved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selves worthy to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that ye should consider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stir: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africk, and ready to give us battail: yet should it well agree with your wisdome, to doubt what might befall; remembring that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will ye either swear by, to be beleeved, or call upon in your misery? What words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth use, to move compassion? Surely ye have already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not again deceive us, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no marvell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the general opinion of the city, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not only their hope of the future, but all justification of matters past. And indeed it seems, that the Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearsall of that point which was yeelded unto them, as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians took this in so ill part, that hardly they could retrain from doing violence unto the men, who had used unto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) cals Hanno the Great: or by the very reverence, due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two gallies appointed for their safe convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Utica. He, whether only desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publick order to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the river Bagradas. Their Convoy having brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so took leave of them, as if they had been then in safety, since the Roman Camp was even in sight. The Embassadours took this in ill part; not as fearing any danger toward, but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell upon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more banks of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipt away, and made him over-shoot himself. Yet he gave them chase, and had well-near surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shoar over against them, and therefore adventured to runne their Vessell aground: whereby they saved their own lives, though a great part of their company were slain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcuseable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the war; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same fear, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better advised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treaty; had they not been given to understand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence, but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

§. XX.

In what sort Hanniball spent the time after the battel of Metaurus: The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversly affected by Hannibals departure.

EVer since the loss of that battell at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded unto Claudius and Livius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio, ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal, being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius; and Cn. Servilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitless. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Army, than to keep those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them so ready to stir in his behalf, that if he could have entred their Country strong, it might have proved no less needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal to make speed unto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to imploy one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was uncertain, upon which side Mago would break out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readiness for his setting forwards, he met in the Country of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varrus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battell, wherein though his vertue shewed it self worthy of his Father and Brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: & strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victory should have been carryed before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the troups that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shour of darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these, Mago imployed some of his Gaules, whom he had in readiness for the like occasion. But the Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soon beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, He put himself in the head of his Army; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carryed out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himself (by easie journeys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it self was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued shortly his Army; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out, whilest the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet plain dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply that should have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heels: it is Hanno that hath wrought this noble feat; & overwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that which after came to pass: wherein he imbarqued, besides his own men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunk back from him, and refused to do service in this expedition: of whom, such as he could take, he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no less passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countreys to go into exile. He looked back unto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his own dulnesse, in that he had not led his Army from Canna, hot and bloudyed as it was, directly unto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy: wherein he had lived almost half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertain the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I think) lesse earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought unto the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publickly made, for joy of such happy tydings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remain the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his comming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadours brought unto them a great mass of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted: the treasure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those moneys that had bin borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of means or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and inforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very most of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatness of their spirit) upon the good success of the battell at Metaurus, and the hopes which they repoſed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen: and were informed that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolve a thousand fearfull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no specialty of such great worth, as might promise the like success against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of half skullions, that were good for nothing; being himself a fit Captain for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the son of Gesco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate, but otherwise, one, that in the field was only good at saving himself by a swift retrait. But now there came an Army of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and wearing the spoils, not only of good Souldiers, but of brave Captains, by them slain. Such talk used the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell with many that had slain Roman Prætors, yea, and Consuls with their own hands; with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of severall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in war, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vain; loseth a battell at Nedagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

HAnnibal disembarqued his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the enemy; that he might furnish himself of these and the like needfull helps against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Country gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to have in those dayes the best Horses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and help to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetullus, (the same who had made himself Protector over Masanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Vermina the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assail the places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we find in Livie, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to think, that they had been so base as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilest they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselves of their own sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them appeared greater than indeed they were: then cryed they out earnestly that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him without any further protraction, to do what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Army: but since he was Generall of their forces, He thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to do as a Generall ought to do; and to choose his own times. Nevertheless, to give them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to his Embassadors: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore he sent unto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse apart. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him service in the establishing and inlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his own forces, would but little avail him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his own kingdome; with four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, he made all haste unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lelius and Fulvius: who brought them safe into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived & understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their own heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion:

M. Babius one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them; sending word unto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make War in the Countrey, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coyn, for the injury by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; and commanded Babius to use them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies, & caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victory) far less honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, he made more cruel War upon them than before: taking their Towns by force; and putting them to sack, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to work such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to do, they used oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beasts, that ran athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder: as men delighted in shedding of bloud. This being their practice at other times: it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revengefull minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 10.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay, what they were doing, and as much as might be, of their demeanour. Some of these were taken & brought unto Scipio: who in stead of trussing them up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them up and down, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, He gave them leave to depart; & sent them away safe unto their Generall. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to have an Enter-view, and personall conference; and signified so much unto him by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that He would meet him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masanissa came with his Army: whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Town called Nedagara; near unto which he sate down, in a place otherwise commodious, and close

by a water that might opportunely serve his Camp. Thence he sent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly serve, if he had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within four miles of the enemy: where he incamped well to his own good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driven to take much pains, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals each of them with a troup of Horse, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a piece of ground; which was before well searched for fear of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliver his minde to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited & contained their ambition within the shores of Africk and of Italy; for that the Countreys of Sicil and of Spain, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much bloud as had been shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, unto what extreme dangers their own Cities had been exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition, He affirmed that his own years, and long tryall of Fortune, both good and evill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fixe his minde upon uncertain hopes, than upon a contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are subject. Yet (said he) mine own example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victory at Cannæ, won the greatest part of Italy: and devised with my self, what I should do with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine army to your wals, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant us peace. This may serve as a document of Fortunes instability. I have fought with thy father Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generals that ever met me in the field. I did then little think, that the time would come, that I should have such business, as now at the present, with his son. But this is even one of Fortunes pageants, whereof she hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy self, who knowes how soon? Think upon M. Atilius: If he would have hearkned unto such perswasions, as I now use to thee, he might have returned home to Rome an happy man, and so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatsoever Ilands else are situate between Italy and Africk be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans, to bear dominion therein? Thou shalt have glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for us, our own quiet shall henceforth give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make us faithfully observe the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou must undergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist have without contention. It is now in thine own power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it please thee: stay but untill to morrow night, and thou maist take such fortune as it please the gods. The issue of battail is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and steel we shall each of us bring into the field; but of the victory neither of us hath assurance. Let us therefore without more adoe make peace. And do not tell me that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like treaty: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee, which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintain it, like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the gods did not envie me, the war by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spain which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall issue of the Wars had approved, and would approve to be most just. As for the mutability of Fortune, he

he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence or overweening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain that all these Countreys, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already won from the Romans? If, said he, these conditions had bin propounded whilest as yet ye detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yeelded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Only thou must think, that in like sort it concerns me in honour not to let them be gainers or savers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransome-free, all prisoners that they have of ours, to pay us five thousand talents, to deliver up their Gallies, and to deliver hostages for assurance of fair dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this by their breach of truce, their spoiling of our fleet, and their violating our imbassadours? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done; then will I take advice with my counsell what answer to give you; otherwise you may even prepare for war, and blame your own selves for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his own Camp, with no other newes than war; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battell, wherein should be decided the quarrell between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldome been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battell at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between them: Not far behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the void spaces between the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was usuall, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces between the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites, or those of the light armature that were to begin the fight, he gave direction, that when they found themselves to be overcharged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those lanes that were between the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army; thereby leaving room enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples, which he desired to keep open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing, under C. Lælius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himself riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly; using words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieved, since their comming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the Warre was at an end: and that their victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flie. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own standing Camp: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unlesse they would live like wretched slaves under most mercilesse enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never been known to fail of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourscore, in Front

Front of his Battell. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battell, which was of Carthaginians & Africans, more interessed in the quarrel than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those brave Souldiers which had served him in his Italian wars; and were the only men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lælius, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanissa. He was indeed farre too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Metzetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the four thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be levied in the hast of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make these his companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vermina the son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteen thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay, Hannibal must be fain to comfort himself with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their several conditions: promising unto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards; threatning the Carthaginians with inevitable servitude if they lost that day: but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against far greater numbers. He bade them to look upon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many as that huge Army which they had slaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to run away. He told them, that these Legions, which they yonder beheld, were for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; even such, as for their dastardly slight out of sundry battels, could no longer be trusted to bear Armes in their own Countrey. As for the rest, they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continuall fear of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore he intreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himself, that they would this day strive to make good their honour, and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations used the two Generals before the fight. When they drew near together, the Numidian horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of war, sounded to battell: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwaies an uncertain kinde of help) those that stood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear: and ran upon their own Numidian horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanissa espying this, gave charge upon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-ally themselves, drave them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces between the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed; but ran back upon the right point of their own battell, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gave to Lælius the same advantage that Masanissa had against the Numidians; which he used in like sort. In the mean while, the battels of foot advanced, and drew near together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gave a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacity, and in quickneſse to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell

of the Principes, following somewhat near after the Hastati, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries, received no manner of help or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-levied Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired Souldiers give back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Lagurians, Gaules, and the rest, to think themselves betrayed: whereupon they enclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battell was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their safe retrait, and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Fear and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own fellowes, to turne their armes with an heedlesse fury against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and slain, through their own indiscretion, by their own Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to over-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the ears among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which, hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stir one foot, to help or save these Run-awaies. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his own side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aside beyond his battell, and save themselves in the open field. The ground, over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and so slippery with bloud, that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Army, which he saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the main battell of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the dayes work till now, seemed to have been a matter of pastime, in regard of the sharp Conflict, that was maintained between these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were also far the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps the better men.) They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was uncertain which part had the worse: unless it may seem, that the Romans were beginning to shrink; for as much as the return of Masanissa and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have been most happy and in a needfull time. These upon a sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere; and over-bearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15.

In this battell there eyed of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian side, above twenty thousand; besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius, and was acknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himself. But the the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enjoyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take battell with such disadvantage, he could work no marvels. He saved himself with a few horse; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence he was sent for to Carthage; from which he had been absent six and thirty years. At his comming into the Senate, He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadours again, and try the favour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies and an hundred Ships of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the City, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius, whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lælius away to Rome with newes of the victory, set sail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embassadours from the City: who bearing up with the admirall Gally, began to use the pitifull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it, he returned back to Utica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom in person He set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the son of Syphax, was comming with an Army of more horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seems to have been both careless of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only beat him, but so compass him in, that he hardly escaped himself with a few; leaving fifteen thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great accesse unto the former, yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more pitifull than it had been before, yet procured it less commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this war, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the war against Hannibal at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to pass over into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chase of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suit for the same Province of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might joyn with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readiness for the journey, wherein no man cared to further him, Winter came on, and he was only tost at Sea with foul weather; first upon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the war was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Province, That he said he would suffer nothing to pass in the Senate, untill he had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the war continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadours. He willed them to consider what they had deserved: and in regard thereof, to think themselves well dealt withal, in that he was contented to leave unto them their liberty and their own Lawes, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, that, before he either granted them peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld, then required He, That immediately they should deliver up to the Romans all prisoners, fugitives, & renegado's, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: & all their Elephants. That they should make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yet within Africk, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Towns, goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Masanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him: That they should finde corn for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: that they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the term of fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year, and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages: such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very unpleasing; and therefore one Gesco stood up to speak against them: and exhorted the people, who gave good attention, that they should not condescend unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what favourable audience was given to this vain Oratour, by the unquiet, yet unwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him down from his standing, by plain force. Hereat all the people murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose up and spake unto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the City would allow; forasmuch as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine years old, untill he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excused himself of the disorder, he discoursed unto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves, had the Demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice, they resolved to yeeld unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thousand pounds weight in Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gave injunction, that they should neither in the mean while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismiss any Embassadours to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsels. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related unto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering unto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified unto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately been sent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellowes, and there leving men, made war upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countri-men, that had lately served Hannibal for Pay; and being taken prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to stay behinde, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsell, and very inward with him: one that served not for money, but carryed money with him, and four thousand men, sent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these points, when the Macedonian Embassadours could make unto the Senate no good answer, they were willed to return, and tell their Master, That war he sought, and war he ſhould find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points He had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: firſt, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and ſecondly, in that he had aided their Enemies againſt them with men and money.

Theſe quarrels with Philip, that promiſed to open a way into Greece and the Eaſtern Countreys, helped well the Carthaginian Embaſſadours in their ſolicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Aſdrubal above the reſt was much reſpected, as one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romans from neceſſity of ſending Embaſſadours to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the juſtice of the quarrell had been wholly on the Romans ſide; ſaying, that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the City that had been too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſell. But if Hanno and himſelf might have had their wils, the Carthaginians, even at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould have granted the peace which they now deſired. Herewithall he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no ſmall argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had been victorious. To the ſame effect ſpake the reſt of the Embaſſadours: all of them entreating to have the peace ratified; though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diverſity of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproof of Perjury, as they themſelves might have laid upon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been ſuch as the Romans was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſwear to keep the peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwer; Even by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſevere unto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul, interpoſing the authority of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto concluſion of peace; for that hereby he was like to loſe the honour which he purpoſed to get by making war in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom reſted the Soveraign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates, ſent unto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, upon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carthaginian Embaſſadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might viſit their Countrimen, which were priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carry home with them ſome that were their ſpeciall friends; of whom they gave in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadours would chooſe, ſhould be ſent over into Africk, and be freely reſtored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in commiſſion.

At their comming into Africk, the peace was given, and accepted, without any controverſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitives and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon thoſe of the Romans, than upon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the firſt payment of their money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſury could have ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent; yet ſince the penſion was annuall, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the ſum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; ſo as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwiſe, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Aſdrubal Haedus, and told, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had been the cauſe why all others did weep; He anſwered, That Laughter did not alwayes proceed from joy; but ſometimes from extremity of indignation: Yet, ſaid He, My laughter is more ſeaſonable, and leſſe abſurd, than your tears. For ye ſhould have wept when ye gave up your ſhips and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the uſe of armes, without the good leave of the Romans firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keeps us under, and holds us in aſſured ſervitude. But of theſe matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purſes, purses, ye have thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, that it was the very least part of your misery for which ye have shed these tears. Thus discoursed Hannibal unto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsell, repented when it was too late; and instead of cursing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Army, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him also he consigned over those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romans, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lylibæum, Scipio with some part of his Army took his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he passed along. He entred the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carryed through the City in this Triumph, and dyed soon after in prison; or whether he were dead a while before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea, though they were such, as had alwaies made fair and courteous war. But hereof we shall have better example ere the same age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous war past, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that ever they should set Italy free. This made them look cheerfully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honourable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of less desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated unto themselves the title of Countreys, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the East-Countries, and desirous of War there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Ætolians over-run Peloponnesus. Philip and his Associates make war against the Ætolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

OF the great similitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are lesse to wonder, if we finde lesse variety: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious obnoxious unto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wils of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with such number of men, as might have seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home again, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, devised upon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his wel-trained Army, had made attempt upon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, have been farre different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them to employ the travell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kinde it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Asse. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by mis-understanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foiled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerodach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he undertook as it were for his minds sake: having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own vertue to be of richer metall, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: then did all the bravery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. For since they had overcome the best Warriour in Greece, even Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compasse of 12. years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their own devotion by some good means, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed away: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

* The King of Spain pretended invincible Navie, being beaten out of the British Seas, invited us to those of Spain: and having broken the greatest Fleet that ever the Spaniards gathered together, we never made account of any of his preparations after that time.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soon after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Teuta made at the same time cruell war upon the Greeks: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them, being now the ſubject of our ſtory, it is meet that we ſhould relate (though ſomewhat briefly) the beginning of his reign, and his firſt Actions. It was like to prove a buſie time in the world, when, within the ſpace of 4. years, new Kings began to reign in the moſt of all Countries known; and 3. of them young boies, in 3. of the greateſt kingdomes. This hapned from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Aſia and Syria in whoſe room ſucceeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolemy Philopater ſucceeded in the Kingdome of Egypt unto his father Energetes. And Philip the ſon of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. years old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and moſt of the Greeks, by the deceaſe of his Uncle Antigonus Doſon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the ſame time alſo was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himſelf King over the Lacedæmonians, whoſe Common-weal, ſince the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headleſſe; and Achæus, a kinſman of Antiochus, but a Rebell unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Laſtly, in the ſecond and third years of the 100. and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invaſion upon Italy. Thoſe troubles of the Weſtern world, which were indeed the greateſt, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemy, and the reſt; we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, ſoon after the beginning of his reign, came into Peloponneſus; greatly deſired of the Achæans, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it ſelf by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an eaſie ſubjection unto Cleomenes; was now become no leſſe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it ſhould have been to the Spartan: and therewithall it lay open unto the violence of the Ætolians; who deſpiſed even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Ætolians were no men to be idle: nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Meſſenians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their conſanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the preſent in Peloponneſus. Their invaſion was no leſſe unexpected, than it was unjuſt: whereby with greater eaſe they made ſpoil of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make reſiſtance. The Achæans, were called by the Meſſenians to help: which they did the more willingly; becauſe the Ætolians paſſing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they liſted. Old Aratus could hardly abide theſe Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith moſt ingratefully they had requited no ſmall benefits done to them by the Achæans. He was therefore ſo haſty to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to ſtay few dayes untill the time of his own Office came; being choſen Prætor of the Achæans for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he ſhewed himſelf a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other ſervice, than leading of an Army. He ſuffered them to paſſe quietly along with their booty, through a part of the Country, wherein he might very eaſily have diſtreſſed them; and afterwards preſſed them ſo near, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they eaſily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Achæans, they got hereby only the friendſhip of the Meſſenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians invaded Peloponneſus again; having no more to do, than to paſſe over the narrow Straights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There joyned with them, in this their ſecond invaſion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition impoſed upon them by the Romans, of ſetting out no ſhips of war unto the coaſt of Greece: made bold to ſeek adventures again, and did great miſchief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of theſe Illyrians: who ſhortly repented him of this his voyage; which cauſed him to loſe his Kingdome, as is ſhewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell upon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean ſea: whence returning, he did ſome good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The reſt of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could else-where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havock in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment laid upon the Lacedæmonians, who were thought underhand to have favoured the Ætolians, in meer despight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had been so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstain from comming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant alwayes to remain at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did mis-understand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Achæans, Bœotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining upon the Ætolians: and desiring to have war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certain, they adjourned the Councell unto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesus, and the only man, in a sort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared busily for the war against the year following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with fair words and promises, whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, forasmuch as the Ætolians had cousened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achæans, who had first of all others proclaimed the war in their own Countrey, sent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithfull meaning in that war, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needless point, and desired to be held excused, untill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the war was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders, and said, that they durst not be over-bold, untill that bridle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chief of them studied only, how to manage the treason for which their City had been so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadours of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subject against their wils to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should return out of Egypt to reign over them again, and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publique safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them. And hereto they referred all their counsails: being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themſelves, by adhering firmly to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule over them. Others, and thoſe the greater part, were ſtill devi ſing, how to make all ready for Cleomenes againſt his return; and ſought to joyn with the Ætolians, which were the moſt likely to give him ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durſt more freely ſpeak their minds: but the contrary ſide was the the more paſſionate, & ſpared not by murders or any other violent courſes, to ſet forward their deſire. Neither did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended: fancying unto themſelves the glory of their Anceſtors in ſuch Ages paſt, as were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able man to reſtore them unto their greatneſſe and luſtre; which once he had in a manner performed: But ſince he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deſerving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helps, they muſt continue little better than ſubjects unto the Macedonian, and far leſs by him reſpected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they tranſported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working ſpirits among them, procured the Ætolians to ſend an Embaſſie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durſt have made himſelf the Author. Much diſputation, and hot, there was, between thoſe of the Macedonian party, and theſe their oppoſites: in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded; untill by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chief, that ſpake againſt the Ætolians, the diverſity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had ſpared the City, when they might have deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the chooſing of the one King, that we may juſtly wonder, how they grew ſo careleſſe in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Ageſipolis, the ſon of Ageſipolis, the ſon of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reign over them, as heir apparent to his grandfather. This Ageſipolis was a young Boy, ſtanding in need of a Guardian: & had an Uncle his Fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the ſon, how young ſoever, ſhould have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though ſtanding in need of a man, were ſo punctuall in obſervation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall Family, though there was no want of heirs: yet would not the people trouble themſelves about any of them, to examine the goodneſs of his Claim, but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdome, beſtowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himſelf be ſaluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partiſans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Countrey of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great ſpoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmon. After ſuch open hoſtility, the Lacedæmonians declared themſelves on the Ætolian ſide; and proclaimed war againſt the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the war fell out much otherwiſe, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they firſt made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain anſwer: the Meſſenians would not ſtir: all the burden muſt lye upon themſelves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleaſure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could aſſail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, paſſing over the Bay of Corinth, ſurpriſed the Town of Ægira: which if they could have held, they ſhould thereby grievouſly have moleſted the Achæans, for that it ſtood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sycion, two of their principall Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Ægira was taken by ſurpriſe: ſo was it preſently loſt again, through greedineſſe of ſpoile; whileſt they that ſhould have made it their firſt care, to aſſure the place unto themſelves, by occupying the citadel and other pieces of ſtrength, fell heedleſly to ranſack private houſes, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter back unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territory of the Dymæans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacy. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society in vain. For the Achæans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had covetously with-held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Achæans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick service, & to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Arcadians, that were confederate with Philip & the Achæans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots joyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readiness, drew him to the siege of a Frontier piece, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the business; which tended only to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first comming in; it was thought that he might have had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their main designs. Thus was our King Henry the eight led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperor to the siege of Tournay: at such time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that his Cavallery, wherein rested his chief confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earl of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himself into Britain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not only to over-run Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, he took, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his return; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Peloponnesus, but even to Macedon it self. But this their pride was soon abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their own Countrey, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his work at Ambracus, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He took Phoetiæ, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pæanium, Elæus, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes: and wasted all the Countrey over, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Peloponnesus, and to do the like spoil in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achæan Embassadours; news came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Countrey. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon, and were accustomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismisse the Achæan Embassadours, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So he took his way homewards: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Doson in the wars of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready at their first request, to take part with Philips Captains. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army, and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilest his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Ætolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, & all thought of war, until another year, was laid aside: Philip stole a journey into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, & about four hundred Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth, He commanded the gates to be shut, that no word should be carryed forth of his arrivall. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achæan Souldiers ready to meet him. The enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to fear: since the Achæans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; untill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised, and all made prisoners, or slain. By this exploit which he did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Psophis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He won it by assault at his first comming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not beleeving that he would undertake such a piece of work at such an unseasonable time of the year, was careless of providing even such store of weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Town was preserved by the King from sack; and given to the Achæans, of his own meer motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very fear; hearing how easily he had taken Psophis. This Town also he gave to the Achæans. The like liberality he used towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done sacrifice to Jupiter, feasted his Captains, and refreshed his Army three dayes; He proceeded on to the spoil of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians, in the spoils of their otherwise-deserving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattell he took, with great numbers of slaves, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Towns, whereinto a great multitude of the Country-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his journey, by sending Embassadours to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, took courage to set themselves at liberty, by seeing the King so near: to whose Patronage thenceforth they betook themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Etolian Captains; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Countrey, than the sharpnesse of winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made such hast from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had covered themselves within the Town of Samicum; where they thought to have been safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining license to depart, with their lives and armes. Having performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himself a while in Megalopolis, and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the winter.

Before the Kings arrivall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia, & threatned to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home.

This

This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money, ſo was he neither free from danger of conſpiracies made againſt him; nor from thoſe jealouſies, with which Uſurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himſelf to have beſt right unto the Kingdome, purpoſed to make way thereunto by maſſacre of his oppoſites; & afterwards to confirm himſelf, by propounding unto the multitude ſuch reformation of the State as was moſt popular: namely, by making an equal diſtribution of all the lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient inſtitution of that Commonwealth. He won to his party ſome two hundred men, with whom he fel upon the Ephori, as they were together at ſupper, and ſlew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his houſe: who perceiving the danger, ſtole away and fled. It remained that he ſhould give account of theſe doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto prediſpoſed; they ſo little regarded his goodly offers, as even whileſt he was uſing his beſt perſwaſions, they were conſulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and ſhifted preſently away. So he lived afterwards among the Achæans a baniſhed man, & hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: & ſuſpecting thenceforth all thoſe of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Ageſipolis; whereby he made himſelf Lord alone. His doings grew to be ſuſpected in ſuch ſort, as once he ſhould have been apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have been defended; yet rather than to adventure himſelf into judgement, he choſe to flie for a time, and ſojourn among his friends the Ætolians. His wel-known vehemency in oppoſition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him ſuch good liking among the people, that in his abſence they began to conſider the weakneſs of their own ſurmiſes againſt him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Eſtate. But in time following, he took better heed unto himſelf: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was ſo acknowledged) but by taking order, that it ſhould not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they liſted. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chaſed Ageſipolis out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That his being the firſt of three uſurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the laſt of the three very juſtly deſerved. Whatſoever he was toward ſome private Citizens, in the war againſt Philip, he behaved himſelf as a provident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Philip was miſadviſed by ill Counſellors: who afterwards wrought treaſon againſt him; and were juſtly puniſhed. He invadeth the Ætolians a ſecond time: and forceth them to ſue for peace: which is granted unto them.

WHileſt the King lay at Argos deviſing upon his buſineſſe for the year following, ſome ambitious men that were about him, ſtudied ſo diligently for their own greatneſſe, as they were like to have ſpoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Doſon had left unto Philip ſuch Counſellors, as to him did ſeem the fitteſt men for governing of his youth. The chief of theſe was Apelles; that had the charge of his perſon, & alſo the ordering of his Treaſures. This man, ſeeming to himſelf a great Politician, thought that he ſhould do a notable piece of ſervice to his Prince, if he could reduce the Achæans unto the ſame degree of ſubjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to paſſe; during the late Expedition he had cauſed ſome of the Macedonians to thruſt the Achæans out of their lodgings, and to ſtrip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occaſion fell out, he was bold to chaſtiſe ſome of that Nation; cauſing his Miniſters to take and whip them. If any of them offered (as there were ſome of them that could not refrain) to help their fellowes; them he laid by the heels, and puniſhed as Mutiners. Hereby he thought to bring it to paſſe by little and little, that they ſhould be qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and think nothing unjuſt that pleaſed the King. But theſe Achæans were tenderly ſenſible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to ſuffer any little little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus; and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begun. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought so well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable service, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the head; since, in biting at the tail, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especiall friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needfull in a businesse of more importance, the King by fair words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patræ and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yeelded it up for fear, at his first comming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it upon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyn with him upon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to do, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrain invasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon their Countrey: then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-hasty to beleeve such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutuall diffidence between them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marvailing what should be the cause, that he heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles his Counsellor thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his son together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the son) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a falsehood, devised by Apelles himself, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it over again to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, taking talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such ungratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans, and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his own, or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to give credit, untill he had diligently examined the business. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himself the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few daies: wherein whilest Apelles delayed to bring in the proof which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befaln him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati: which when he found no better than a meer device against his honourable friends; he entertained them in loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unrestfull temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to pass, began (as commonly Ambition useth) to swell and grow venemous for want of his free motion. He betakes himself to his cunning again: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arati: so failing of them, he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himself, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which drave away flyes out of the chimny; but was carved (net and all) into the Aire by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lievtenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, and Megaleas chief of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his own into their rooms. Against Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumniation and privy detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more fineness; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of war, and one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sun. In the mean season Aratus retired himself; and sought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the people. Wherefore a great deal of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corn, wherewith he should have been furnished by the Achæans. This made the King understand his own errour; which he wisely sought to reform betimes. He perswaded the Achæans to rejourn their Parliament from Ægium, to Sycion, the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom therefore he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travell of these worthy men, he easily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand; with great store of Corn: and further decreed, That so long as he himself in person followed the wars in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things go forward so well without his help; even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracy with Leontius and Megaleas: binding himself and them by Oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to do any thing without them, should make him speak them fair, and be glad to submit himself to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilest he was a child, and therefore these wise men perswaded themselves, that by looking big upon him, and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a childe still. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behinde with the King, to play their parts, all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readinesse: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces against the Eleans to whose aid therfore the Aetolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would have fallen, as soon after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achæans, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. He himself with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephalenia: whence the Aetolians, dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he besieged the Town of Palæa, that had been very serviceable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates; and might be very usefull to him, if he could get it. Whilest he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen ships of war from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Town was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carryed a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembring his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slain, not of the worst Souldiers; but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treason of their Captain, and some by him corrupted, had not hindred the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedy; and therefore he thought upon breaking up the siege. For it was easier unto the Townesmen to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed and uncertain what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their own Countrey. The Messenians alledged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Countrey: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Etesian windes which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-dayes and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsell, and prevailed: he shewed how unfitting it were, to let the Aetolians over-run all Thessaly again, and some part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Army farre off to seek small adventures. Rather, he said that the time now served well to carry the war into Aetolia: since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their strength. As for Lycurgus; he was not strong enough to do much harm in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head against them. According to this advice, the King set sail for Aetolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders, and joyned with him as many of them as could bear arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the in-land Countrey: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retrait; He pussed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great fastnesse, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow, steep, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians use to hold all their chief meetings, their Fairs, their election of Magistrates, and their solemn Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoil:

whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Army: and consuming all that could not be carryed away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Ætolians; in remembrance of their like courtesie, shewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour have been forborn. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would do, he beleeved before; and therefore was not taken unawares Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Illyrians; who staying behinde the rest, did set upon the backs of the Ætolians, whilest they were busily charging in Rear the Army that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning down those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him, He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious expedition being every way compleat, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast unto all his friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came because they could not choose: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they took in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himself, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexterity. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him froward answers: insomuch, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischief as he deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why said the King, it was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angry; seeing himself out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to prison; and Leontius becomming Bail for Megaleas. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deal of businesse this year. For as soon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an Expedition against the Lacedæmonians. These and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponnesus, whilest the King was absent. The Achæans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill successe, yet so, as they hindred them from doing such harm as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the countrey about Lacedæmon: & was in a maner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleeve that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and having beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carryed back with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattell, slaves, and other Country spoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadours from the Rhodians and Chians, that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deal first with the Ætolians, who if they would make the same request, should not finde him unreasonable. The Ætolians had sped ill that year: neither saw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean season they had been grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the centre of their own Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was up in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keep the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadours, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sorted to no good effect. The souldiers were easily & quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it self in a noise, and breaking open of doors, without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the Souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it self to their extream danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repair unto Corinth, where he might stand between them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the businesse, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves unto him, and received from him their dispatch in every businesse. Likewise the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (only for fashion sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancy of this great man, in setting himself out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his speciall care, that money and all things needfull for the publique service, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for very need, to sell his own Plate and houshold vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubœa, to the City of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pomp and royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entring the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspition of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his own Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacy, he used him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look to himself, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Tarrion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of service, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalf. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called called forth to triall before their return: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they ſaid they were ready to make a purſe for his diſcharge. This affection of the ſouldiers made Philip more haſty then elſe he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words, and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to ſink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King underſtood more perfectly the falſhood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whoſe cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him ſo poor. Wherefore he ſent one to purſue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his ſon, and another that was inward with him, to priſon; wherein all of them ſhortly ended their lives. Megaleas alſo, neither daring to ſtand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his own life; and ſlew himſelf about the ſame time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this war upon hope of accompliſhing what they liſted in the Nonage of Philip: ſo finding that the vigour of this young Prince tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very deſirous to make an end of it. Nevertheleſſe, being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with ſome indignation thereupon conceived by ſome of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that theſe troubles would be long laſting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing ſorry. For being in good hope throughly to tame this unquiet Nation; he thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War ſhould reſt upon themſelves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aſide all thought of peace, and to prepare for War againſt the yeer following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yeelding to let them winter in their own Country. In his return homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolomy, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treaſons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and ſuffered death. Theſe were the ſame Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his impriſonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels uſe to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won ſome bordering Towns, from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accuſtomed to make rodes into his Kingdome: when he had thus provided for ſafety of his own; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embaſſadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Egypt, and from the Citie of Bizantium, re-continuing the former ſolicitation about the peace. This faſhion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever ſince the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to ſet the whole Country at liberty: No ſooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppreſſed and ſubdued by force of war, but preſently there were found Interceſſors, who pitying the effuſion of Greekiſh blood, would importune the ſtronger to relinquiſh his advantage. By doing ſuch friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad ſought to binde unto them thoſe people, that were howſoever weak in numbers, yet very good ſouldiers. But hereby it came to paſſe, that the more froward ſort, eſpecially the Ætolians, whoſe whole Nation was addicted to falſhood and robbery, durſt enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well aſſured that if they had the worſt, The love of Greece would be ſufficient for to redeem their quiet. They had, ſince the late Treaty of Peace, done what harm they could in Peloponneſus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and ſtanding in fear to be more ſoundly beaten at home, they deſired now, more earneſtly than before, to make an end of the War as ſoon as they might. Philip made ſuch anſwer unto the Embaſſadours, as he had done the former yeer; That he gave not occaſion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the preſent affraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Ætolians, if they had a deſire to live in reſt, muſt firſt be dealt withall, to ſignifie plainly their determination, whereto himſelf would return ſuch anſwer as he ſhould think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battell at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Country should be at peace within it self: and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly serving to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatning them at hand: but being soon after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so far from observing and following their own good counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Country (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for dammages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal against the Romans. The tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THis being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battell of Cannæ: after which he joyned in league with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsell, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equall terms; and thereby, as did Hiero, a far weaker Prince, have both secured his own Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chief place in his friendship. The issue of the counsell which he followed, will appear soon after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon such Conditions that might easily be broken, have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punick War. Wherefore I will onely here set down the tenour of the League between Him and Carthage; which may seem not unworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the form it self then used: though it had been over-long to have been inserted into a more busie piece.

The Oath and Covenants between HANNIBAL Generall of the Carthaginians, and XENOPHANES, Embassadour of PHILIP King of Macedon.

THis is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the son of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the son of Demetrius hath sent unto us, for himself and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo: before * the God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before the Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth: before Rivers and Meddows, and Waters: before all the Gods that have power over Carthage: before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece: before all the Gods that are Presidents of War, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us, that this Oath stand for friendship and loving affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, Upon Covenant, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, using the same Laws, and of the Vticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers & Associates, and of all Towns and Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, & with whom we shall hold friendship, or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preserved by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greeks as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Associates, be saved and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter joyn with Us in Italy. We shall not take Counsell one against the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtlety, We shall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which We have already league and friendship. We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already league and friendship. The War that We have with the Romans, have Ye also with them, untill the Gods shall give Us a new and happy end. Ye shall aid Us with those things whereof we have need, and shall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods shall not give unto You and Us their help in this War against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, We shall make friendship in such wise, that Ye shall be partakers of the same friendship, With Condition, That they shall not have power to make War upon You: Neither shall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyræans, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrhachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render unto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make War upon You or Us; We will succour one another in that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendship. To this league if We or Ye shall think fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

* Dæmon.

§. IIII.

How Philip yeelded to his naturall vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles into which he thereby fell, whilest he bore a part in the second Punick War. He poisoneth Aratus: and grows hatefull to the Achæans.

HItherto Philip had carried himself as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdome, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his medling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his own estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Country. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himself to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloody, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to do what he listed, and not otherwise lifting to do what he ought, than so far forth, as by making a fair shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himself in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policy, to bring the Greeks that were his Associates, under a more absolute form of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boysterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himself deeply wronged, if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man, with the reins in his hand, those affections which himself did onely seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus; which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forreign War) unto domestical objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governors, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, he said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to go roundly to work, ere that he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be easie to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs their guardians were slain. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best friends; he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use:

uſe; for that it was of notable ſtrength, and would ſerve to command the further parts of Peloponneſus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whileſt he was therefore ſacrificing, and had the entrals of the beaſt delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he ſhewed them to Aratus, and gently aſked him, whether the tokens that he ſaw therein did ſignifie, That being now in poſſeſſion of this place, he ſhould quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himſelf. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have ſoothed him a little; were it onely for deſire to make amends for the angry words newly ſpoken by his ſon. But as Aratus ſtood doubtfull what to anſwer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a Sooth-ſayer, thou mayſt go thy wayes, and let ſlip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou muſt not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his horns. Thus he ſpake; reſembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus unto the two horns of Peloponneſus. Yet would Philip needs hear the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Meſſenians: But if, by ſeizing upon Ithome, he muſt loſe all the other Caſtles that he held, and eſpecially the ſtrongeſt Caſtle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his ſouldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any ſtrong places againſt them, to make them of his friends become his enemies.

To this good advice, Philip yeelded at the preſent: but not without ſome diſlike thenceforth growing between him and the Arati; whom he thought more froward than beſeemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man deſirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly diſcovered his tyrannous purpoſes; ſo likewiſe he perceived, that in reſorting to his houſe, he had been diſhoneſt with his ſons wife. He therefore ſtaid at home: where at good leaſure he might repent, that in deſpight of Cleomenes, his own Countri-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponneſus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponneſus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refuſed to bear him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unhoneſt counſells are not ſo profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and ſo they purpoſed to continue. But he would needs have them ſo to remain, whether they purpoſed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his will, he ſeized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid ſiege to Apollonia; having no good colour of theſe doings: but thinking himſelf ſtrong enough to do what he liſted, and not ſeeing whence they ſhould procure friends to help them. Thus in ſtead of ſetling the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, untill it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whileſt he was thus labouring to binde the hands that ſhould have fought for him in Italy, M. Valerius the Roman came into thoſe parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots againſt him, but procured the Ætolians to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrents whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captain: yet when leiſure ſerved, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former deſire, of oppreſſing the liberty of the Meſſenians; but made another journey into their Country, with hope to deceive them as before. They underſtood him better now than before; and therefore were not haſty to truſt him too far. When he ſaw that his cunning would not ſerve, he went to work by force; and calling them his enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could doe little good; perhaps, becauſe none of his Confederates were deſirous to help him in ſuch an enterpriſe. In this attempt upon Meſſene, he loſt Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counſellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worſe that he ſped, the more angry he waxed againſt thoſe that ſeemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore, by the miniſtery of Taurion, his Lievtenant, he poyſoned old Aratus; and ſhortly after that, he poyſoned alſo the younger Aratus: hoping that theſe things would never have been known, becauſe they were done ſecretly, and the poyſons themſelves were more ſure than manifeſt in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Proceſſions, to be celebrated every yeer twice, with a Prieſt ordained unto him for that purpoſe; as was accuſtomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be tranſlated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are ſaid to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have been true, ſince the help of the Divell is never failing to the increaſe of Idolatry.

The loving memory of Aratus their Patron, and ſingular Benefactour, could not but work in the Achæans a marvellous diſlike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He ſhal therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counſell for themſelves. At the preſent, the murder was not generally known or beleeved: neither were they in caſe to ſubſiſt, without his help that had committed it. The Ætolians were a moſt outragious people, great darers, and ſhameleſſe robbers. With theſe the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were ſoon divulged, eſpecially that main point, concerning the diviſion of the purchaſe which they ſhould make, namely, That the Ætolians ſhould have the Country and Towns; but the Romans the ſpoil, and carry away the people to ſell for ſlaves. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make ſtraight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their uncivill diſpoſition; were much the more averſe from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for ſuch did the Greeks account all other Nations except their own) to make havock of the Country. The ſame conſideration moved alſo the Lacedæmonians to ſtand off a while, before they would declare themſelves for the Ætolians, whoſe friendſhip they had embraced in the late war. The induſtry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he ſeemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, ſufficed to retain them: eſpecially, at ſuch time, as their own neceſſity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himſelf the Dymæans by an ineſtimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people whereſoever they might be found, that had been carried away captive, and ſold abroad for ſlaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences paſt; if the malignity of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to underſtand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make ſuch a ſhew of goodneſſe. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not aſhamed; He took Polycratia the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ſerve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of ſuch faults he ſhall be told, when the Romans make war upon him the ſecond time: for, of that which happened in this their firſt Invaſion, I hold it ſuperfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battell between them, wherein Machanidas is ſlain.

IT happens often, that the deceaſe of one eminent man diſcovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there ſtood up Philopœmen: whoſe notable valour, and great ſkill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careleſſe of ſuch protection, as in former times they had needed againſt the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and having no command, did eſpeciall ſervice to Antigonus at the battell of Sellaſia againſt Cleomenes. Thence forward untill now he had ſpent the moſt part of his time in the Iſle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and ſeldome or never at peace between themſelves; he bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horſe: wherein he carried himſelf ſo ſtrictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as alſo he ſo diligently trained them up in all exerciſe of ſervice, that he made the Achæans very ſtrong in that part of their forces. Being afterward choſen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, he had no leſſe care to reform their military diſcipline throughout, whereby his Country might be ſtrong enough to defend it ſelf, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He perſwaded the Achæans to cut off their vain expence of bravery, in apparell, houſhold-ſtuffe, and curious fare, and to beſtow that coſt upon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by ſo much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and ſutable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had ſerved hitherto with little light Bucklers, and ſlender Darts, to caſt afar off; that were uſefull in ſkirmiſhing at ſome diſtance, or for ſurpriſes, or ſudden and haſty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had been moſt accuſtomed. But when they came to handie-ſtrokes, they were good for nothing, ſo long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: cauſing them to arme themſelves more weightily, to uſe a larger kind of ſhield, with good ſwords, and ſtrong pikes, fit for ſervice at hand. He taught them alſo to fight in cloſe order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files ſo deep as had been accuſtomed, but extending the Front, that he might uſe the ſervice of many hands.

Eight moneths were ſpent of that yeer, in which he firſt was Prætor of the Achæans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedæmon cauſed him to make trial, how his ſouldiers had profited by his diſcipline. This Machanidas was the ſucceſſor unto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a ſtrong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta, but to hold the City in obedience to himſelf perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achæans, that were favorers of liberty; but to ſtrengthen himſelf by friendſhip of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of vice or vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people alſo of Lacedæmon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achæans, and Macedonians; were in like ſort (all or moſt of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwiſely. For in ſeeking to take revenge upon thoſe, that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordſhip of Peloponneſus; they hindred themſelves thereby from recovering the Maſtery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own ſecurity, and no ſmall hope of good that would follow, ſuffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him ready to fall upon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whileſt they were enforced, by greater neceſſity, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, eſpecially in the abſence of Philip: whoſe ſudden coming into thoſe parts, or ſome other oppoſition made againſt him, had uſually made him faile of his attempts. At the preſent he was ſtronger in men, than were the Achæans, and though his own men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whileſt Philip therefore was buſied elſe-where, he entred the Country of the Mantinæans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, as having ſtronger friends and weaker oppoſition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantinæa; where was fought between them a great battell. The Tyrant had brought into the field upon Carts a great many of engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his enemies, and put them in diſorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen ſent forth his light armature a good way before him; ſo as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To ſecond theſe, from the one and the other ſide came in continuall ſupply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achæans and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight: being ſo far advanced, each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwiſe be diſcerned which preſſed forward, or which recoyled, than by riſing of the duſt. Thus were Machanidas his engines made unſerviceable, by the interpoſition of his own men; in ſuch manner as the Cannon is hindred from doing execution, in moſt of the battels fought in theſe our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not onely by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well obſerveth) by ſurmounting their oppoſites in degree of courage; wherein uſually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed thoſe that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppreſſed by Tyranny, ſince the one, by doing their beſt in fight, have hope to acquire ſomewhat beneficiall to themſelves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to aſſure their own ſervitude: ſo the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his proſperity, have as good cauſe to maintain his quarrell as their own; whereas they that ſerve under a free State, have no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare ſtipend. Further than this, when a free State hath gotten the victory, many companies (if not all) of forreign Auxiliaries are are presently cast; & therfore such good fellows, will not take much pains to bring the war to an end. But the victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers; because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more subjects; and therefore stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge upon him. The stipendiaries therfore of the Achæans, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they betook themselves to flight; & could not be staid by any perswasions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battell of the Achæans. This disaster had been sufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might restore the victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chace unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battell his Lacedæmonians; whom he thought sufficient to deale with the Achæans, that were already disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight, Philopœmen advanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achæans; who had in a maner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battell; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Achæans, who drave them headlong into the ditch again. Their first rankes being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopœmen getting over the ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chace, but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custody of a bridg that was over the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chace, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet, with a lusty troupe of Horse about him, he made towards the bridg: hoping to find the Achæans in disorder; and to set upon their backs, as they were carelesly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopœmen ready to make good the bridg against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopœmen therefore leaving the charge of the bridg unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the ditch it self, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battell on the Lacedæmonians side about four thousand: and more than four thousand were taken prisoners. Of the Achæan Mercenaries, probable it is, that the losse was not greatly eared for; since that War was at an end, and for their mony they might hire more when they should have need.

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Images. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Achæans learned to think well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferiour to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great use of them. But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He took in hand many matters together, or very neerly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achæans would have done him service, they must, by helping him to oppresse others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Ætolians in war against him.

This

This Atalus, though a King, was ſcarce yet a Nobleman, otherwiſe than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune began in Philetærus his Uncle: who being guelded, by reaſon of a miſhap which he had when he was a childe, grew afterwards thereby to be the more eſteemed: as great men in thoſe times repoſed much confidence in Eunuchs, whoſe affections could not be obliged unto wives or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captain following Antigonus the firſt; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Maſter, that betook himſelf to Lyſimachus King of Thrace. Lyſimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in truſt with his money and accounts. But when at length he ſtood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Aſia, where he ſeized upon the Town of Pergamus, and nine thouſand talents belonging to Lyſimachus. The town and money, together with his own ſervice, he offered unto Seleuchus the firſt, that then was ready to give Lyſimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleuchus, having ſlain Lyſimachus, died ſhortly after himſelf, before he made uſe of Philetærus or his money. So this Eunuch ſtill retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty yeers as an abſolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is ſaid to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before ſuch time they were raiſed by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdom to the elder of theſe, or to the ſon of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the diſſention between Seleuchus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the ſons of the ſecond Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax neer unto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men againſt the Gaules that ſerved under his Enemy, he uſed a pretty device. He wrote the word Victory upon the hand of his Soothſayer, in ſuch colours as would eaſily come of: and when the hot liver of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He publiſhed this unto his Army as a Miracle; plainly foreſhewing that the gods would be aſſiſtant in that Battell.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleuchus: who never durſt attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty yeers, he died by a ſurfeit of over-much drink, and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was ſon unto Attalus the youngeſt brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no leſſe valiant. By his own proper forces he reſtored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievouſly moleſted by Achæus: who ſetting up himſelf as King againſt Antiochus the Great, reigned in the leſſer Aſia. He was beſieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Tectoſages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, he recovered all that he had loſt. When theſe Gauls had once gotten footing in Aſia, they never wanted employment, but were either entertained by ſome of the Princes reigning in thoſe quarters, or interpoſed themſelves, without invitation; and found themſelves work in quarrels of their own making. They cauſed Pruſias King of Bithynia to ceaſe from his war againſt Bizantium. Whereunto when he had condeſcended; they nevertheleſſe within a while after invaded his Kingdom. He obtained againſt them a great victory; and uſed it with great crueltie, ſparing neither age nor ſex. But the ſwarm of them increaſing, they occupied the Region about Helleſpont: where, in ſeating themſelves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheleſſe, preſuming afterwards upon their ſtrength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the ſharp exaction whereof, they had no more reſpect unto Attalus, than to any that had worſe deſerved of them. By this they compelled him to fight againſt them: and he being victorious compelled them to contain themſelves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they ſtill to oppreſſe the weakeſt of their neighbours, and to fill up the Armies of thoſe that could beſt hire them.

The Kings reigning in thoſe parts, were the poſterity of ſuch, as had ſaved themſelves and their Provinces, in the ſlothfull reign of the Perſians; or in the buſie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the firſt of their line had married with Atoſſa, ſiſter unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is ſhewed before. But the ſon of that King, King, whom Perdiccas crucified, eſpying his time while the Macedonians were at civill wars among themſelves; recovered his Dominion, and paſſed it over to his off-ſpring. The Kings of Pontus had alſo their beginning from the Perſian Empire; and are ſaid to have iſſued from the royall houſe of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians derived themſelves from Pylæmenes, a King that aſſiſted Priamus at the war of Troy. Theſe, applying themſelves unto the times, were alwayes conformable unto the ſtrongeſt. The Anceſtors of Pruſias had begun to reign in Bythinia, ſome few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay ſomewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the leſſe moleſted. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captains, made an expedition into their Country, where he was vanquiſhed. They had afterwards to do with a Lievtenant of Antigonus, that made them ſomewhat more humble. And thus they ſhuffled, as did the reſt, untill the reign of Pruſias, whom we have already ſometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Town of Cios taken by Philip, at the inſtance of Pruſias, King of Bythinia, and cruelly deſtroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip grows hateſull to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodianss

Pruſias, as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whoſe greatneſſe he ſuſpected. He therefore ſtrengthened himſelf, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary ſide, entred into a ſtrict Confederacy with the Ætolians: Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian war, and was deviſing with Antiochus about ſharing between them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomy Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his ſon Ptol. Epiphanes, a young childe, his heir: the Bythinian entreated this his Father-in-law to come over into Aſia, there to win the Town of the Ciani, and beſtow it upon him. Pruſias had no right unto the Town, nor juſt matter of quarrell againſt it: but it was fitly ſeated for him, and therewithall rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no ſmall part of Greece. Embaſſadours came to him whileſt he lay at the ſiege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: intreating him to forſake the enterpriſe. He gave dilatory, but otherwiſe gentle anſwers: making ſhew as if he would condeſcend to their requeſt, when he intended nothing leſſe. At length he got the Town: where, even in preſence of the Embaſſadours, of whoſe ſolicitation he had ſeemed ſo regardfull, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendred himſelf odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and ernell Prince. Eſpecially his fact was deteſted of the Rhodians, who had made vehement interceſſion for the poor Ciani: and were advertiſed by Embaſſadors of purpoſe ſent unto them from Philip, That, howſoever it were in his power to win the Town as ſoon as he liſted, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embaſſadors ſaid, that he would manifeſt unto the world what ſlanderous tongues they were, which noiſed abroad ſuch reports, as went of his falſhood and oppreſſion. Whileſt the Embaſſadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came ſome that made a true relation of what had hapned: ſhewing that Philip had ſacked and deſtroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruell ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, had made ſlaves of all that eſcaped the ſword. If the Rhodians took this in great deſpight, no leſſe were the Ætolians inflamed againſt him: ſince they had ſent a Captain to take charge of the Town; being warned before by his doings at Lyſimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own) what little truſt was to be repoſed in the faith of this King. But moſt of all others was Attalus moved with conſideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own eſtate. He had much to loſe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a ſtrong party in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchaſing with much liberality the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, having loſt their own. On the friendſhip of the Ætolians he had cauſe to preſume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late war war with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he eaſily drew into a ſtreight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceived againſt Philip.

Upon confidence in theſe his friends, but moſt of all, in the ready aſſiſtance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open war. It had been unſeaſonable to procraſtinate, and expect whereto the doings of the enemy tended; ſince his deſire to faſten upon Aſia was manifeſt, and his falſhood no leſſe manifeſt, than was ſuch his deſire. They met with him ſhortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a battell at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own ſhip on ground, hardly eſcaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battell took harbor under a Promontory, by which they had fought, ſo that he had the gathering of the wracks upon the ſhore: Yet foraſmuch as he had ſuffered far greater loſſe of ſhips and men, than had the enemie; and ſince he durſt not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his enemies. This notwithſtanding, Philip afterwards beſieged and won ſome towns in Caria: whether onely in a bravery, and to deſpight his oppoſites: or whether upon any hopeful deſire of conqueſt, it is uncertain. The ſtratagem, by which he won Prinaſſus, is worthey of noting. He attempted it by a mine: and finding the earth ſo ſtony, that it reſiſted his work; he nevertheleſſe commanded the Pioners to make a noiſe under ground; and ſecretly in the night time he raiſed great mounts about the entrance of the mine, to breed an opinion in the beſieged, that the work went marvellouſly forward. At length he ſent word to the Townſ-men, that by his undermining, two acres of their wall ſtood onely upon woodden props, to which if he gave fire, and entred by a Breach, they ſhould expect no mercy. The Prinaſſians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbiſh by night a great way off, to raiſe up thoſe heaps which they ſaw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the mine. Wherefore they ſuffered themſelves to be outfaced, and gave up the Town as loſt, which the enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not ſtay to ſettle himſelf in thoſe parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too ſtrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haſte back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of purſuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian war, ſeek matter of quarrell againſt Philip. The Athenians upon ſlight cauſe, proclaim war againſt Philip; moved thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory anſwer to the Roman Embaſſadour. The furious reſolution of the Abydeni.

These Aſiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ſerved well to make a noiſe in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a deſire of making war in Macedon, at leaſt with a conceit that it were expedient ſo to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the ſtate of thoſe Eaſtern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordſhip of Aſia. Theſe Greeks were factious, and ſeldome or never at peace. As for the Macedonian; though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece ever ſince the reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturalls: yet moſt of them abhorred his Dominion, becauſe he was originally forſooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had been moſt beholding unto him, were nevertheleſſe weary of him, by reaſon of his perſonall faults. All this gave hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: eſpecially ſince the diviſions of the Country were ſuch, that every petty Eſtate was apt to take counſell apart for it ſelf; without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to ſuch a chargeable enterpriſe. They were already quite exhauſted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republike, all their mony: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive untill fifteene or ſixteene yeers after this, their whole ſum back again. That part of payment alſo which was already made, being not in preſent mony, but much of it in Land: it behoved them to reſt a while; and beſtow the more more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leſſe able to beſtow coſt. Wherefore they took no pleaſure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodians had ſent Embaſſadours to ſolicite them againſt Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Aſia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had ſent letters of the ſame tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by ſetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that ſolicited not onely the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Iſlands in thoſe Seas, viſiting them in perſon, or ſending Embaſſadours, as one that meant ſhortly to hold war with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no ſuch intent: neither was he much too ſtrong, either of himſelf, or by his alliance in Greece, to be reſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians; eſpecially with the help of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his own profeſſed enemies. But ſuch things muſt be publiſhed abroad, if onely to prediſpoſe men unto the war, and give it the more honeſt colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affaires of thoſe that were more mighty than himſelf. He was too unſkilfull, or otherwiſe too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be ſeeking new enemies. And he found them ſuch, as he deſerved to have them: for he offered his helpe to their deſtruction, when they were in miſery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have ſtrained his forces to the utmoſt in making war upon them; or in deſiſting from that injurious courſe, to have made amends for the wrongs paſt, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which is of all other the moſt naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unleſſe they thinke themſelves juſtly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perſwaded, that he might well be ſecure of the Romans, becauſe of the written Covenants of peace between him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby ſuch Articles of peace can be held inviolable, ſave onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Neceſſitie: which whileſt it bindes one party, or both unto performance making it apparent, that he ſhall be a loſer who ſtarts from the Conditions; it may ſo long (and ſo long onely) be preſumed, that there ſhall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquiſhed, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for neceſſity made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage; then was the River of Styx dryed up: and then could they ſwear as * Mercurie did in the Comedy, by their own ſelves, even by their good ſwords, that they had good reaſon to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Aſrick, and the preſent war againſt Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furniſh them with more.

* Plaut. Amphitr.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took ſtate upon them nevertheleſſe, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the myſteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous ſuperſtition, vainly ſaid to be availeable unto felicity after this life) diſcovered themſelves by ſome impertinent queſtions, to be none of thoſe that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer errour, not thinking to have therein done amiſſe; yet, as it had been for ſome haynous crime, they were put to death. All their Countri-men at home took this in ill part; and ſought to revenge it as a publike injury, by war upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip ſome Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who waſted it with fire and ſword; & carried thence a great booty. This indignity ſtirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the preſent they could doe, was to ſend Embaſſadours to king Attalus; gratulating his happy ſucceſſe againſt Philip, and intreating him to viſit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing, becauſe he underſtood that the Roman Embaſſadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpoſe to be there at the ſame time. So he went thither, accompanied, beſides his own followers, with ſome of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being no leſſe glad, when he heard of their purpoſe to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their City, all the Magiſtrates, Prieſts, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as ſolemne a pomp as they could deviſe, to meet and honour the King. They entertained tained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himſelf they omitted no point of obſervance, which their flattery could ſuggeſt. At his firſt coming into the City, they called the people to Aſſembly: where they deſired him to honour them with his preſence, and let them hear him ſpeak. But he excuſed himſelf; ſaying, That with an evil grace he ſhould recount unto them thoſe many benefits, by which he ſtudied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he ſhould deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did ſo. The points of his Declaration were; firſt, what he had willingly done for their ſake: then, what had lately paſſed between him and Philip: laſtly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themſelves againſt the Macedonian, whileſt he with the Rhodians and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refuſed to do, he proteſted, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help. There needed little intreaty: for they were as willing to proclaim the war, as he to deſire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens conſiſted, ſhould be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they alſo decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noiſe of war, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while theſe were vainly miſſpending the time, in ſeeking to draw the Ætolians to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip won the Towns of Maronea and Ænus, with many other ſtrong places about the Helleſpont. Likewiſe paſſing over the Helleſpont, he laid ſiege unto Abydus; and won it, though he was fain to ſtay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obſtinate reſolution, and hope of ſuccour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it ſelf againſt ſo mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians ſent thither onely one Quadrireme Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men, far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embaſſadours wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken ſo much upon them.

Theſe Embaſſadours, C. Claudius, M. Æmylius, and P. Sempronius, were ſent unto Ptolomy Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory againſt Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as alſo to thank him for his favour unto them ſhewed in that war; and to deſire the continuance thereof, if they ſhould need it againſt Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth yeer of his reign, which (as his father Philopater had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courteſie for which the Romans were to thank him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately been ſupplied with corn, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miſeries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This meſſage could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: ſince it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themſelves againſt him, conſpiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reaſon be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, ſhould offer to ſupply the Romans with corn: ſince this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Eſtate no leſſe than theirs.

But as the errand was for the moſt part complementall; ſo had the Embaſſadours both leiſure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmylius the youngeſt of them ſhould ſtep aſide, and viſit Philip, to trie if he could make him leave the ſiege of Abydus; which elſe he was like to carry. Æmylius, coming to Philip, tells him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made war, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydus, which he was now beſieging, had a kinde of dependancy upon Attalus. Hereto Philip anſwered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made war upon him: and that he did onely requite them with the like. Do you alſo (ſaid Æmylius) requite theſe poor Abydeni with ſuch terrible War, for any the like Invaſion by them firſt made upon you? The King was angry to hear himſelf thus taken ſhort: and therefore he roundly made anſwer to Æmylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beauty, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus preſumptuous. But I would wiſh ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: If ye do otherwiſe, I will make ye underſtand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no lesse noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Town immediately yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearfull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the City to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of the Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that he said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the town; or hazzard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fools.

The Romans decree war against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerly resembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to help themselves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should win, then rested there no more to do, than that he should presently embarque himself for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sailing. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africk; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Gountry. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleeve, that this War with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hasted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadours, of their constancy (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to think it a benefit unto themselves; that any Greek Town, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their help against him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts, had reason to give thanks unto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadours into all parts of the World, even to Ptolomy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence; the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He sailed not about Peloponnesus, but took the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of Apsus, between Dyrrhachium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming, the Athenian Embassadours were with him, and craved his help: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliver them.

them. For which cauſe he ſent unto them C.Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the proſecution of a greater deſigne. The Athenians were not indeed beſieged: onely ſome Rovers from Chalcis, in the Iſle of Eubœa, and ſome bands of adventurers out of Corinth, uſed to take their ſhips, and ſpoile their fields, becauſe they had declared themſelves againſt King Philip, that was Lord of theſe two Towns. The robberies done by theſe Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From ſuch detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and ſhortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, eaſily preſerved them. As for the Athenians themſelves, they that had been wont, in ancient times to undertake the conqueſts of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make war upon the great Perſian King, and to hold ſo much of Greece in ſubjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the reſt; had now no more than three ſhips, and thoſe open ones, not much better than long boats. Yet thought they not themſelves a whit the worſe men, but ſtood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Anceſtors, as if it had been ſtill their own.

§. X.

The Town of Chalcis in Eubœa taken and ſackt by the Romans and their Aſſociates, that lay in Garriſon at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by ſurpriſe: waſteth the Countrie about, and makes a journey into Peloponneſus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. Philip offers to make war againſt Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he ſpoileth again: and provides againſt the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyn with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the war.

PHilip returning home from Abydus, heard news of the Roman Conſul his being about Apollonia. But ere he ſtirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well reſolved, whether it were beſt a while to ſit ſtill, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make oppoſition, and reſiſt theſe Invaders with all his forces: he received advertiſement from Chalcis of a grievous miſhap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C.Claudius with his Romans, finding no ſuch work at Athens as they had expected, or was anſwerable to the fame that went abroad, purpoſed to do ſomewhat that might quicken the war, and make his own imployment better. He grew ſoon weary of ſitting as a Scar-crow, to ſave the Athenians grounds from ſpoile; and therefore gladly took in hand a buſineſſe of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Townſ-men, who repoſed themſelves upon their Garriſon. Hereof Claudian having advertiſement, ſailed thither by night, for fear of being deſcried: and arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He uſed no mercy, but ſlew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it, (unleſſe he ſhould have left the heartleſſe Athenians to their own defence) he ſet it on fire; conſuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all proviſions for War, which were plenteouſly filled. Neither were he and his Aſſociates contented with the great abundance of ſpoil which they carried aboard their ſhips, and with inlarging all thoſe, whom Philip, as in a place of moſt ſecurity, kept there impriſoned: but to ſhew their deſpight and hatred unto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they haſted away towards Athens: where the news of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about ſome 20. miles thence; whither when theſe tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he ſaw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haſte to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their truſty friends, buſie at work in ranſacking the Town, and loading themſelves with ſpoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thouſand light-armed foot he had with him, and three hundred horſe: whereof leaving at Chalcis onely a few to bury the dead, he marched from thence away ſpeedily toward Athens: thinking it not unpoſſible to take his enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-poſt that ſtood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not deſcried him afar off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Town asleep, as fearlesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarm, and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation usuall in such a case, understood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the Town some mercenary Souldiers, which they kept, of their own, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular proof of his valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drave them with great slaughter back into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harm taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the gate, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their own people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, neer adjoyning unto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Achæans were devising upon war: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started up in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his mercenaries: and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, since his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleecing their wives; whom she would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their jewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her; and apparelled it with such costly garments as she used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apega stood, and there use all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses; then took he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who sate by in a Chair) could perswade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that rose up and opened the arms, as it were for imbracement. Those arms were full of sharp iron nails, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poor wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopœmens vertue he stood in fear; and therefore durst not provoke the Achæans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a far worse Captain, was their Prætor, and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopœmen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of War; then did Nabis fall upon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their own safety in the Towns.

Against

Againſt this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them; and had ſet down what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation ſhould furniſh out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themſelves with the care of this buſineſſe; forasmuch as he alone would eaſe them of this War, & take the burden upon himſelf. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whileſt he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns unguarded. In which reſpect he thought they would be pleaſed to ſend a few men to Corinth, and ſome Companies into the Iſle of Eubœa; that ſo he might ſecurely purſue the War againſt Nabis. Immediatly they found out his device; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his War againſt the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliadas made him anſwer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than thoſe for which it was aſſembled. So paſſing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War againſt Nabis, he brake up the Aſſembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Paraſites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpoſe with the Achæans. Nevertheleſſe he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and ſo returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captains, that with two thouſand men had been doing what harm he might unto the Countrie. With this addition of ſtrength, he attempted the Caſtle of Eleuſine, the Haven of Pyreus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made ſuch haſte after him by Sea, thruſting themſelves into every of theſe places; that he could no more than wreak his anger upon thoſe goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time ſingularly beautified. So he deſtroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty of their own; or, having long ago been Maſters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where beſt choice was found. Neither did he onely pull all down: but cauſed his men to break the very ſtones, that they might be unſerviceable to their reparation. His loſſe at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made proviſion, both againſt the Roman Conſul that lay about Apollonia; and againſt the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infeſt him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whoſe Parliament, ſhortly to be held at Naupactus, he ſent an Embaſſage, requeſting them to continue in his friendſhip. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpitius the Roman Conſul encamped upon the River of Apſus. Thence he ſent forth Apuſtius his Lievtenant, with part of the Army, to waſte the borders of Macedon. Apuſtius took ſundry Caſtles and Towns; uſing ſuch extremity of ſword and fire at Antipatria, the firſt good Town which he won by force, that none durſt afterwards make reſiſtance, unleſſe they knew themſelves able to hold out. Returning towards the Conſul with his ſpoil, he was charged in the Reer, upon the paſſage of a brook, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of theſe enemies, took priſoners many more, to the increaſe of their booty, with which they arrived in ſafety at their Camp. The ſucceſſe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet ſerved to draw into the Roman friendſhip thoſe that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. Theſe were Pleuratus, the ſon of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the ſon of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their aſſiſtance unto the Conſul, who thanked them: and ſaid, That he would ſhortly make uſe of Pleuratus and Bato, when he entred into Macedon: but that the friendſhip of Aminander, whoſe Country lay between the Ætolians and Theſſaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to ſtir them up againſt Philip.

So the preſent care was wholly ſet upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embaſſadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian ſpake firſt, and ſaid: That as there was nothing fallen out, which ſhould occaſion the breach of peace between his Maſter and the Ætolians; ſo was it to be hoped, that they would not ſuffer themſelves, without good cauſe, to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to conſider, how the Romans heretofore had made ſhew, as if their war in Greece tended onely to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithſtanding had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants, but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alledged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew such masters into Greece, must not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to consult about War and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went every yeer from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilest one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occasion, they hapned to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeers ago made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to break it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speak next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few dayes past, made War upon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pitifull rehearsall of their own calamities: and said, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feel the same that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens it self, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman arms had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their own oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the point in hand. They said, that they had of late made War in the Ætolians behalf, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselves, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them aid convenient; so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their war and victory, unless they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried unto the War by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to help those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatory answer: though he told his Countri-men, That by reserving themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall terms; That over-much haste was an enemy to good counsell: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, he passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of such affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHilip was glad to hear, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great help; and meant himself to disappoint them of another. His son Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians; having with him him ſome of the Kings Councell, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may ſeem, that the preſence of the Kings ſon, how young ſoever, would both encourage his Followers, and terrifie the Enemies, by making them at leaſt beleeve, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reaſon, why the ſame Perſeus, a few yeers before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earneſt buſineſſe called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would ſerve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his journey Weſtward againſt Sulpicius the Conſul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Deſſaretii, a people in the utmoſt borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North, untill they joyn in the South with Pindus, incloſe the Weſtern parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in ſight the one of the other, without making offer of battell. The Conſul was the firſt that iſſued forth of his Camp into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to ſend forth ſome of his light-armed Mercenaries, and ſome part of his horſe, to entertain them with ſkirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was ſo, that the King was unwilling to hazzard all at firſt upon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his own forces: yet being no leſſe unwilling to loſe too much in reputation; he made ſhew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein he beſtowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and ſo gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; inſtructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themſelves reſpectively, as opportunity ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh, having fought upon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him ſo hotly, that they drave him to an haſty flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targettiers, not ſtaying to let them run into the danger, diſcovered themſelves before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the work, to which they were appointed. The Conſul hereby gathered, that the King had ſome deſire to trie the fortune of a battell: which he therefore preſented the ſecond time; leading forth his Army, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kinde of help which the Romans had never uſed before, but had taken theſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was ſcarce above fourſcore yeers ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never ſeen any of thoſe beaſts before. But now the ſame Romans (whileſt poſſibly ſome were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wiſely; for the Roman had greater need to fight, than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to looſe time: neither could he without great danger, lying ſo neer the Enemy, that was ſtrong in horſe, ſend his men to fetch in corn out of the fields. Wherefore he removed 8. miles off: preſuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground; and ſo the more boldly he ſuffered his Forragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing ſorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleaſure: even till their preſumption, and his own ſuppoſed fear, ſhould make them careleſſe: When this was come to paſſe, he took all his horſe, and light-armed foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, between the Forragers and their Camp. There he ſtayed in covert with part of his forces, to keep the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt he ſent abroad the Country, to fall upon the ſtragglers: willing them to put all to the ſword, and let none run home with news to the Camp. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcowre the fields, lighted all or moſt of them upon the King and his companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had hapned to themselves, raised a great multitude. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them help their fellows where they saw it needfull: He himself with the Legions followed. The companies of horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with advertisements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvassing the field, took their task where they found it: But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himself. They had the disadvantage; as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away; as their fellows also might have been, if the King had well bethought himself, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedy about a poor gleaning; the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safety. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogs, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slain under him: and there had he been cast away, if a loving subject of his had not alighted, mounted him upon his own horse; and delivered him out of perill, at the expence of his own life, that running on foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnesse; & the Consul, with as much dulnes, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would have delivered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Camp, at such time as he fled thither, half amazed with fear of being either slain or taken, they might have won it. But that noble Historian, Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay safe in his Camp; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himself, he was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do somewhat betimes; that he might set the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards look unto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleer himself of the Romans, as soon as he might. And to that purpose he sent unto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddy ground) by cutting down trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) laid open unto the Consul some poor Towns thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for fear. But the spoil of these, and of the fields adjoyning, was not sufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themselves apace out of the Country. The King sent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilest he himself went against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reserved himself and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again; as also that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen upon Macedon; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had been wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaim War, joyned his forces with Amimander the Athamanian; and made invasion upon Thessaly. They took, and cruelly cruelly ſacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they liſted. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay diſperſed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his own mountainous Country.

About the ſame time the Roman Fleet, aſſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken ſome ſmall Iſlands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewiſe the Town of Oreum in the Iſle of of Eubœa; and ſome other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the ſame Compact that had formerly been made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans; and the people, for ſlaves. Other attempts on that ſide were hindred; either by foul weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII

Villius the Roman Conſul waſtes a yeer to no effect. War of the Gaules in Italy. An Embaſſadour of the Romans to Carthage, Maſaniſſa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is ſent againſt him.

THus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Conſul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldeſt Souldiers: whereof two thouſand, having ſerved long in Sicil and Aſrick, thought themſelves much wronged, in that they could not be ſuffered to look unto their own eſtates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had ſerved at Cannæ: as may ſeem by their complaint, of having been long abſent from Italy; whither faine they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were ſhipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertaine. For the Hiſtory of his yeer is loſt: whereof the miſſe is not great, ſince he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we finde in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit againſt Philip. Yet ſince Livie himſelf, an Hiſtorian to whom few of the beſt are matchable, could finde no ſuch thing recorded in any good Author; we may reaſonably beleeve, that Villius his yeer was idle. Liv. lib. 32

In the beginning of this Macedonian war, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gaules. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and ſtrong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Aſdrubal, had been able to force; was taken by theſe Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like ſort Cremona was attempted; but ſaved her ſelf, taking warning by her neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that ſtayed behinde Aſdrubal, or Mago in thoſe parts; was now become Captain of the Gaules, in theſe their enterpriſes. This when the Romans heard, they ſent Embaſſadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to underſtand, That if they were not weary of the peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilcar; who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps leſt the meſſage might ſeem otherwiſe to have ſavoured a little of ſome feare) That of the fugitive ſlaves belonging to the Romans, there were ſome reported to walk up and down in Carthage: which if it were ſo, then ought they to be reſtored back to their Maſters; as was conditioned in the late peace. The Embaſſadours that were ſent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Maſaniſſa, as alſo with Vermina the ſon of Syphax. Unto Maſaniſſa, beſides matter of complement, they were to ſignifie what pleaſure he might doe them, by lending them ſome of his Numidian Horſe, to ſerve in their war againſt the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchſafe unto him the name of King: and promiſed thereafter to deſerve it, by his readineſſe in doing them all good offices. But they were ſomewhat ſcrupulous in the matter: and ſaid, That having been, and being ſtill (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought firſt of all to deſire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they uſed not to conferre upon any, ſave onely upon ſuch as had royally deſerved it at their hands. The authority to make peace with him; was wholly committed unto theſe Embaſſadours, upon ſuch termes as they ſhould think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then buſied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle anſwer, That they wholly diſclaimed Amilcar: baniſhing him, and confiſcating his goods. As for the Fugitives: they had reſtored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as far as was requiſite, requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian horse: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainement, on the borders of his Kingdom; and without any disputation, agreed with them upon terms of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they laid siege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a battell with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battell: and the fruit of the victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of war among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to think upon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellour whom they hated; as also to assure unto himself the Achæans, by rendring unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not onely by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consull, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make war by negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battell to the Enemie, as soon as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Towns: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his own weakenesse. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learne of the subtle Greeks, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not grown so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and stood indebted, * many yeers after this unto private men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punick War. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian War; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the lesse need to relie upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other meanes could well have served, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Army: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many and too far from home) have bred some jealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies, more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himself unto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to looke unto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to use the aide of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunity, and could also bee well contented to affoord it; That they could not not honeſtly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, againſt Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embaſſadors, and (as common friends unto both of the kings) do their beſt to perſwade an atonement between them. In ſuch loving faſhion did they now carry themſelves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded theſe terms of friendſhip, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very ſoon appear.

T. Quintius haſting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the ſupply decreed unto him; which conſiſted, for the moſt part, of old Souldiers, that had ſerved in Spaine and Aſrick. He found Villius the old Conſul, (whom at his coming he preſently diſcharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one againſt the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apſus, or Aous. It was manifeſt, that either the Romans muſt fetch a compaſſe about, and ſeek their way into Macedon, through the poor Country of the Deſſaretians; or elſe win, by force, that paſſage which the King defended. In taking the former way; they had already two yeers together miſ-ſpent their time, and been forced to returne back without profit, for want of victualls: whereof they could neither carry with them ſtore ſufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get over theſe Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Theſſaly, then ſhould they enter into a plentifull Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheleſſe, the deſire of winning this paſſage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Apſus, running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Mariſh and unpaſſable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius aſſailed to climbe in the Mountains: but finding himſelf diſappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very eaſie; he was compelled to ſit ſtill, without doing any thing for the ſpace of forty dayes.

This long time of reſt gave hope unto Philip, that the war might bee ended by compoſition, upon ſome reaſonable terms. He therefore ſo dealt with ſome of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Conſul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conſul would have him to ſet all Towns of Greece at liberty; and make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to thoſe whom he had ſubdued of late: but unto ſuch, as had been long ſubject unto him and his Anceſtors, He thought it againſt all reaſon, that he ſhould relinquiſh his claime and dominion over them. He alſo ſaid, That as far forth as it ſhould appeare that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatſoever, He could well be pleaſed to make ſuch amends, as might ſeem convenient in the judgement of ſome free State, that had not been intereſſed in thoſe quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not ſatisfied. There needed (he ſaid) no judgement or compromiſe; foraſmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had alwayes been the invader; and had not made War, as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they ſhould come to particulars: and when the Conſul was required to name thoſe Towns, that he would have to be ſet at liberty; the firſt that he named were the Theſſalians: Theſe had been ſubjects (though conditionall) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever ſince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as ſoon as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded what ſharper condition He would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquiſhed. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refuſing to heare any more of ſuch diſcourſe.

After this the Conſull ſtrove in vaine two or three dayes together, to have prevailed againſt the difficulties of that paſſage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himſelf, and could not reſolve what courſe to take: there came to him an Heardſ-man ſent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beaſts in thoſe Mountains, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, & therefore undertook to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they ſhould have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was faſt bound: and being promiſed a great reward, in caſe he made good his word, had ſuch Com-

Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moon) and rested in the day-time, for fear of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them, because at their banks) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gave notice of their successe unto the Consul. Some skirmishes; whilest these were on their journy, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians; thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainely, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as neer as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, untill the shoutings of those that ran down the hill, & charged Philip on the back, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betook themselves to flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troups, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Camp and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equall ground. Neither was Philip himself much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retrait he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himself took it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hinderance did serve, to make him break off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readinesse to invade Thessaly; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their severall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreslowed not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their harvest, could not finde enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoide. T. Quintius won Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded unto him. Rhage he besieged: and having made a faire breach, yet was unable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consull, having well-neer spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to prevaile at Rhage; brake up his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an Haven Town of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocis he won by assault: many were yeelded up unto him for fear; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this war, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat help forward the Achæans, in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to passe, that Corinth it self, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very ſhortly ſhould be rendred unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Achæans to preferre the friendſhip of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accuſtomed. For this King had ſo many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the beſt courſe to rid their hands of him; whileſt being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of ſuch counſell as they ſhould hold the ſafeſt. His tyrannous practiſes to make himſelf their abſolute Lord: his poyſoning of Aratus their old Governour: his falſe dealing with the Meſſenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his own dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; and cauſed them long ſince to hold him as a neceſſary evill, even whileſt they were unable to be without his aſſiſtance. But ſince by the vertue of Philopœmen, they were grown ſomewhat confident in their own ſtrength, ſo as without the Macedonians help they could as well ſubſiſt, as having him to friend: then did they onely think how evill he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer neceſſary. It angred him to perceive how they ſtood affected: and therefore he ſent murderers to take away the life of * Philopœmen. But failing in this enterpriſe; and being detected, he did thereby onely ſet fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopœmen wrought ſo with the Achæans, that no diſcourſe was more familiar with them, than what great cauſe they had to withdraw themſelves from the Macedonian. Cycliadas, a principal man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for ſhewing himſelf paſſionate in the cauſe of Philip; and Ariſtænus choſen Prætor, who laboured to joyne them in ſociety with the Romans.

Theſe news were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embaſſadours were ſent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans, making promiſe, that they ſhould have Corinth reſtored unto them, if they would forſake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and reſolve in this weighty caſe. Therein the Romans and their adherents deſired the Achæans to joyne with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwiſe, the Embaſſadours of Philip, whom he had alſo ſent for this buſineſſe, admoniſhing the Achæans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him; requeſted them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate requeſt of Philips Embaſſadors did no way advance their Maſters cauſe. Rather it gave the Achæans to underſtand, That he, who could be ſatisfied with ſo little at their hands, knew himſelf unable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell, who remembring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earneſtly for the preſervation of the ancient League. But in fine, the ſenſe of late injuries, and expectation of like or worſe from him in the future; prevailed againſt the memory of thoſe old good turns, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly ſold unto them, & partly had uſed as baits, whereby to allure them into abſolute ſubjection. Neither was it perhaps of the leaſt importance; That the Romans were ſtrong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree paſſed, That they ſhould thence-forward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians they forthwith entred into ſociety: with the Romans (becauſe no League would be of force, untill the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any ſociety at the preſent, untill the return of thoſe Embaſſadors from Rome, which they determined to ſend thither of purpoſe. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their beſt for the Macedonian, as by many reſpects they were bound, roſe up out of the Councell, and departed before the paſſing of the Decree; which they could not reſiſt, nor yet with honeſty thereto give aſſent. For this their good will, and greater, which they ſhortly manifeſted, the Argives had ſo little thank; that all the reſt of the Achæans may be the better held excuſed, for eſcaping how they might, out of the hands of ſo fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a ſolemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens diſcovered it ſelf ſo plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partiſans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his hands, if they might have any ſmall aſſiſtance. Philocles a Lievtenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended againſt the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conſpirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a ſudden, and finding the multitude ready to joyn with him, he eaſily compelled the Achæan Garriſon to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and ſome other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, ſo they gave him hope to obtain ſome good end by Treaty, whileſt as yet with his honour he might ſeek it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conſul would ſhortly be choſen; who ſhould take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the ſooner. Titus had the like reſpect unto himſelf; and therefore thought it beſt, ſince more could not be done, to pre-diſpoſe things unto a Concluſion, for his own reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-ſhore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Gulf of Ziton, in the Ægean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embaſſador of Attalus; the Admirall of Rhodes; and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his own Captains, and Cycliadas, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achaia. He refuſed to come on ſhore: though fearing (as he ſaid) none but the immortall Gods: yet miſdoubting ſome treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans, were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewiſe whatſoever he held of theirs in Illyria: and whatſoever about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolomy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made, entire of Ships, Towns, and Temples by him taken and ſpoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have again the Country of Peræa, lying over againſt their Iſland; as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his garriſons out of divers Towns about the Helleſpont, and other Havens of their friends. The Achæans deſired reſtitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjuſtly, quarrell with him; the other had been long his own by their conſent. The Ætolians took upon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Country, leaving it free; and withall to deliver up unto them, whatſoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithall content: but inſolently declaimed againſt him, for that which he had lately done in Theſſaly; corrupting (as they ſaid) the rewards of the Victors, by deſtroying, when he was vanquiſhed, thoſe Towns, which elſe they might have gotten. To anſwer theſe malapart Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be rowed neerer the ſhore. But they began to plie him afreſh: telling him that he muſt obey his betters, unleſſe he were able to defend himſelf by force of Arms. He anſwered them (as he was much given to gybing) with ſundry ſcoffes; and eſpecially with one, which made the Roman Conſul underſtand what manner of companions theſe Ætolians were. For he ſaid, That he had often dealt with them; as likewiſe the beſt of the Greeks; deſiring them to abrogate a wicked law, which permitted them to take ſpoile from ſpoile: yet could he get no better an anſwer, than that they would ſooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondred what might be the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable cuſtome, as often as War happened between their friends, to hold up the quarrell, by ſending Voluntaries to ſerve on both ſides, that ſhould ſpoile both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he ſaid it was ſtrange that the Ætolians ſhould be ſo carefull thereof, ſince divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Grecians: wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make ſlaves of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat ſmiled, and was no whit offended, to hear the Ætolians well ratled up; touching whom he began to underſtand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that generall demand of ſetting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beſeem the greatneſſe of the Romans; though he would alſo conſider, what might beſeem his own dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petty Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might he ſhould be thereunto compelled: it was, he ſaid, a ſtrange and ridiculous inſolence. The Achæans he charged with much ingratitude; reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their own; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheleſſe he ſaid, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himſelf.

Thus

Thus he addreſſed himſelf wholly to the Roman Generall; unto whom if he could give ſatisfaction, he cared little for all the reſt. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late war (he ſaid) was onely defenſive; they having been the offerers: or if he gave them any occaſion, it was onely in helping Pruſias, his ſon-in-law; neither did he ſee why they ſhould rather ſeek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that ſpoiling a Temple of Venus, he had cut down the Grove, and pleaſant walks thereabouts: what could he do more, than ſend Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would ſtand to aſk ſuch recompence? Thus he jeſted the matter out: but offered nevertheleſſe, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Perræa to the Rhodians; as likewiſe to Attalus, the Ships and Priſoners of his, whereof he had then poſſeſſion. Thus ended that dayes conference, becauſe it was late: Philip requiring a nights leiſure to think upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counſell, wherewith to adviſe about them. For your being ſo ill provided of Counſell (ſaid Titus) you may even thank your ſelf; as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to adviſe you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, untill it was late at night; excuſing his long ſtay by the weightineſſe of the things propounded, whereon he could not ſuddenly tell how to reſolve. But it was beleeved, that he thereby ſought to abridge the Ætolians of leiſure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he deſired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The ſum of his diſcourſe, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Achæans both Argos and Corinth; as alſo that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians what he had promiſed the day before; likewiſe to the Ætolians, that he would grant ſome part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatſoever they did challenge. This when Titus his aſſociates heard, they exclaimed againſt it, ſaying, That if the King were ſuffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would ſhortly get poſſeſſion of all which he now rendred up. The noiſe that they made came to Philips ear: who thereupon deſired a third day of meeting; and proteſted, that if he could not perſwade them, he would ſuffer himſelf to be perſwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with ſincere affection hearken unto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of thoſe Conditions which he had already tendred; or otherwiſe, that they would make truce with him for the preſent, and let him ſend Embaſſadours to Rome, where he would referre himſelf to the courteſie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it: who ſtood in doubt, leſt a new Conſul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the War. So he eaſily prevailed with the reſt to aſſent hereunto: foraſmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for ſervice in the War; and ſince, without authority of the Senate, he ſhould be unable to proceed reſolvedly either in War or Peace. Further, he willed them to ſend their ſeverall Embaſſadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, ſhould eaſily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the reſt, he perſwaded King Aminander to make a journey to Rome in perſon: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of ſo many Embaſſadors, would ſerve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the ſame end had he dealt with ſome of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not ſo much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reaſons which they alledged unto the Senate.

The Embaſſadours of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, ſpake bitterly againſt the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more deſirous of victory, than of ſatisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpoſe of the Romans, in undertaking to ſet Greece at liberty. But this (they ſaid) could never be effected; unleſſe eſpeciall care were taken, that the King ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of Corinth, Chalcis, & Demetrias. In this point they were ſo vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonſtration how thoſe places held all the reſt in ſervility; that the Senate agreed to have it even ſo as they deſired. When therfore the Embaſſadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middeſt of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Maſter would yeeld up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made anſwer, That concerning thoſe places, the King had given them no direction or commission what to say or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours have truly said, That neither the Ætolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded up. For which of them indeed could make any claim to either of these Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stoln it from one Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain unto another) Philip had already condescended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even against the Greeks, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might have had honour to conclude the war, if a succession had been decreed unto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himself, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to give care unto any talk of peace.

Philip seeing that his Achæans had forsaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himself unto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeers past, since the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help than their own strength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himself King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned over into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lievtenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giving some daughters of his own in marriage unto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Town of Argos; unless by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argives: but found them so averse, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philocles, without more a doe, to make over the Town which he was ready to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forsaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himself master of all the gates. A few of the principall men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chief Citizens that stayed behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of mony was laid upon all those that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more a doe. But if any stood long upon the matter: or played the theeves in purloyning their own goods; they were put to the whip, and besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular laws: namely, such as might serve to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poor. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath been an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he took the paines to crosse over the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cavill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Achæans, upon a Truce for four moneths, reserving the finall conclusion of peace between them untill the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIIII.

The battell at Cynoſcephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquiſhed by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as ſoon as he underſtood that he was appointed to have command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleaſure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent purſuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leſſe failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War; meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himſelf.

Titus had in his Army about ſix and twenty thouſand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others ſtrength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Theſſaly, and thereupon addreſſed himſelf to ſeek him out. They had like to have met unawares, neer unto the City of Pheræ: where the vant-currers on both ſides diſcovered each other; and ſent word thereof unto their ſeverall Captains. But neither of them were over haſty to commit all to hazard upon ſo ſhort warning. The day following each of them ſent out three hundred Horſe, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better diſcovery. Theſe met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their ſeverall Camps, with little advantage unto either ſide. The Country about Pheræ was thick ſet with trees: and otherwiſe full of gardens and mud-walls; which make it unproper for the ſervice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diſlodged, intending to remove back into Scotuſa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ſerved with all neceſſaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purpoſed alſo to march thitherwards; were it onely to waſte the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what courſe the other took. Nevertheleſſe they encamped not far aſunder, both the firſt and the ſecond night; though neither of them underſtood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempeſtuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging where he found it by chance. Then ſent they forth diſcoverers again, in greater number than before. Theſe meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at firſt the Macedonians had the worſe. But Philip anon ſent in ſuch ſtrong ſupply; that if the reſiſtance of the Ætolians had not been deſperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all reſiſtance notwithſtanding, the Macedonians prevailed: ſo that Titus himſelf was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little diſcouraged, by the defeat of all their Horſe, to animate thoſe which were in flight.

Plut. in vit. T. Q. Flam.

It was altogether beſides the Kings purpoſe to put the fortune of a battell in truſt that day, with ſo much of his Eſtate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuouſly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own, if he could uſe an occaſion, the like whereof he ſhould not often finde. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattelled his men; & climbed up thoſe hils, which, for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynoſcephalæ. As ſoon as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to ſee that they of his own light armature were buſie in fight, almoſt at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled ſo far. He had alſo liberty to chooſe his ground, as might ſerve beſt his advantage; foraſmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great uſe: the roughneſſe of the place among thoſe Dogs heads, as they were called, ſerving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheleſſe he found convenient roome, wherein to marſhall the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the reſt; embattelling them as they might. Whileſt he was doing this: He perceived that his Horſemen and light armature began to ſhrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He ſets forward to help them: and they no leſſe haſtily draw unto him for ſuccour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded thoſe of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx being a great square battell of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our modern Wars: and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it self held together undissolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first rank had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvell if the Romans gave back; every one of them being troubled (as it were) with ten enemies at once; and not able to come neerer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it, was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) upon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder he made great and present use. He caused the right wing of his battell to march up the Hill against these ill-ordered troups: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well advised what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons unusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having six and twenty thousand in his Army (as he is said to have been equall to the Enemy in number) had four thousand Horse, four thousand Targettiers, and four thousand light-armed: so shall there remain fourteen thousand Pikes; whereof himself had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having usually sixteen in File, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, have well-neer four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would serve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or seven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foot of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very neer a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champain, free from incumberance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disjoyn this close battell of the Phalanx; was not every-where to be found. Here at Cynoscephalæ Philip had so much room, as would onely suffice for the one half of his men; the rest were fain to stand still and look about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughness of the Dogs heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindred from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in mastering those Enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpfull to making of the victory compleat. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on so far, as that himself with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rere. The hindermost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed save the first five, were accustomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it served neither for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the four sides of it were as so many Fronts looking sundry wayes, waies, becauſe he expected that he ſhould be encompaſſed round: yet is it to be underſtood, that herein he altered the uſuall form; as alſo at the ſame time he embattelled his men in looſe order, that ſo with eaſe they might turn their weapons which way need ſhould require. Likewiſe it is to be conſidered, That Alexanders men being thus diſpoſed, were fit onely to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unleſſe their hindmoſt ranks could have marched backwards. But in this preſent caſe of Philip, there was no ſuch proviſion for reſiſtance. Therefore his men, being otherwiſe unable to help themſelves, threw down their weapons & fled. The king himſelf had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, & the day his own. But hearing the noiſe behind him, and turning a little aſide with a troup of horſe, to ſee how all went; when he beheld his men caſting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he preſently betook himſelf to flight. Neither ſtaid he afterwards in any place (except onely a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this overthrow) untill he was gotten into his own kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battell, about ſeven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thouſand were ſlain; and five thouſand taken priſoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

THe Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themſelves; and deſired to have it noiſed through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoſcephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the moſt of the booty by ſacking the Macedonian Camp, whileſt the Romans were buſied in the chaſe. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition; purpoſed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as ſlightly, as they thought highly of themſelves. He alſo well perceived, That by uſing them with any extraordinary favour, he ſhould greatly offend the reſt of his confederates in Greece; who deteſted the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this diſpleaſure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battell, Titus made haſte unto Lariſſa, a City in Theſſaly, which he preſently took. Before his coming, Philip had ſent thither one of his Courtiers to burn all his letters, and paſſages whatſoever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of ſo much adverſity, he forgot not to provide for the ſafety of his friends. Yet by thus doing, they of Lariſſa might well perceive, that he gave them as already loſt. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the ſame time, the Town of Leucas, bordering upon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very ſoon after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip; gave up themſelves unto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynoſcephalæ. The Rhodians alſo were then in hand with the conqueſt of Pærea, a Region of the Continent over againſt the Iſland; whereof they had demanded reſtitution, in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks: foraſmuch as they awaited not the good leaſure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and ſome help which they borrowed of the Achæans and other their friends, gave battell to Dinocrates the Kings Lievtenant, wherein they had the victory, and conſequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worſe than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdome; waſting and ſpoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their diſcretion. This made him gather an Army in all haſte of 6000. Foot, and 500. horſe: wherewith coming upon them, he drave them, with little or no loſſe of his own, and great ſlaughter of theirs, haſtily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Theſſalonica.

In this one enterpriſe he had ſucceſſe anſwerable to his deſire: but ſeeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the ſame time, he thought it wiſdome to yeeld unto neceſſity; and therefore ſent in all haſte Limnæus and Demoſthenes with with Cycliadas the banished Achæan, in whom he repoſed much confidence, Embaſſadours unto Titus. Theſe had conference a long while in private, which Titus and ſome of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wiſe diſmiſſed. It ſeems that they had Commiſſion, to refer all unto Titus his own diſcretion; as Philip himſelf in few daies after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen daies: in which time, the King himſelf might come and ſpeak with the Roman Generall. In the mean ſeaſon, many ſuſpicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of theſe bruits the Ætolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither friendſhip nor honeſtie, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men elſe. But againſt the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had ſent letters unto his Aſſociates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the treaty ſhould be held. There when they were all aſſembled, they entred into conſultation before the kings arrival, what ſhould be moſt expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every ſtate in particular. The poor king Aminander beſought them all, and eſpecially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and, conſidering his weakneſſe which he confeſſed, make ſuch proviſion, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him who was not able to reſiſt. Then ſpake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus forſomuch as he had thus aſſembled the Confederates to adviſe upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpoſe which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither aſſure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he ſaid, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpoſe of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the fair promiſes made by Titus himſelf unto the Greeks, than the chaſing of Philip quite out of his kingdom. And to this effect he made a long diſcourſe. But Titus anſwered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleaſure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable cuſtoms which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to ſeek the utter deſtruction of any King or Nation, at ſuch time as they firſt made war with them; untill by ſome rebellion they found it a matter of neceſſity, to take ſuch a rigorous courſe. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece, it was (he ſaid) expedient, that the kingdom of Macedon ſhould be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it ſhould be utterly deſtroyed: foraſmuch as it ſerved as a bar to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other ſalvage Nations, which would ſoon over-flow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdom were not interpoſed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld unto thoſe demands, wherewith he had preſſed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reaſon to deny him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwiſe, it ſhould be at their own pleaſure, to take counſell apart for themſelves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Ætolians, to ſay, that all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no leſſe than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bade him leave his babling; ſaying, That himſelf would take ſuch order, as that Philip, were he never ſo deſirous, ſhould thenceforth not have it in his power to moleſt the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus uſed friendly: and ſuffering him to repoſe himſelf that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded unto all that had bin required at his hands; offering yet further to ſtand to the good pleaſure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, inſulting over him, ſaid, It was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of Towns, (which he there named) bidding him ſpeak whether he would or no. His anſwer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoſing himſelf, ſaid it ſhould be otherwiſe. Theſe were Theſſalian Towns, and ſhould be all free: one of them onely excepted, which not long ago had refuſed to commit it ſelf to the faith of the Romans, & therefore ſhould now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the

Towns

Towns that had ſometime belonged unto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to conſider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing ſave the pillage and captives. It is true, that there had been ſuch a condition in the former war: but it ceaſed to be of any validity, as ſoon as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to underſtand; aſking them whether they thought it reaſonable, that all the towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compoſition, ſhould be delivered into ſubjection of the Ætolians. The reſt of the Confederates were very much delighted with theſe angry paſſages between the Romans and the Ætolians: neither had they great reaſon to fear any hard meaſure; ſince Titus was ſo earneſt in behalf of thoſe Theſſalians, to give them liberty, though they had ſtood out againſt him, even till very fear made them open their gates. Wherefore they oppoſed not themſelves; but gave their conſent willingly unto a Truce for four Moneths.

The chief cauſe that moved Titus to grant peace ſo readily to the Macedonians, beſides that laudable cuſtom by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an army from Syria, and drawing neer toward Europe. He had alſo perhaps yet a greater motive; even the conſideration that his ſucceſſor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the war ſhould happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, and ſundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Conſuls were choſen: who (eſpecially the one of them) ſtood very earneſtly againſt the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own ſuſpition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the war. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embaſſadours of Philip, offering to ſtand to whatſoever was demanded; and the letters of Titus, preſſing them to accept this offer, on the one ſide, and the importunity of the Conſul on the other; who ſaid, that all theſe goodly ſhews were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as ſoon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Aſſembly of the People; by whoſe ſoveraigne authority it was concluded, that peace ſhould be granted to the King. So ten Embaſſadors were ſent from Rome, over into Greece: in which number were they that had been Conſuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus ſhould go through with the buſineſſe of Peace. Theſe would very fain have retained thoſe three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, untill the eſtate of Greece were ſomwhat better ſettled. But finally, Titus prevailed ſo, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred unto the Achæans; and all the other Greek towns which Philip held, as well in Aſia as in Greece, reſtored unto liberty.

The Conditions of the Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Iſthmian Games, He ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of all the Greek towns which he held, and confine them over to the Romans: That he ſhould deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewiſe all his ſhips of war, reſerving to himſelf onely five of the leſſer ſort, and one of extraordinary greatneſſe, wherein ſixteen men laboured at every oare: Further, that he ſhould pay a thouſand talents, the one half in hand, the other in ten yeers following, by even portions. Hereto * Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make war out of Macedon, without permiſſion of the Senate. But I finde not that he obſerved this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger ſon Demetrius, to remain as hoſtage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at ſuch time as he lately ſent his Embaſſadors to Rome: when it was promiſed, that the money, and his ſon, ſhould be reſtored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleaſed with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thouſand talents, I cannot finde: and it ſeemeth otherwiſe, foraſmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with thoſe four hundred talents, was given for hoſtage, remained ſtill in cuſtody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters alſo were then ſent by Titus unto Pruſias King of Bithynia: giving him to underſtand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reaſonable, that the Ciani, moſt miſerably ſpoiled and oppreſſed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his ſon-in-law, ſhould be reſtored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the ſame benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did.

did. What effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise, that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselves agrieved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who, seeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne unto him; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Army, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans: in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Arms against them, yet such of them as they found straggling from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the country. This was detested within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred souldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he falls to wasting their country; and besiegeth two such towns of theirs, as did seem to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this war; yet besought him rather to grant peace unto the Bœotians) prevailed so far with him, that he was pacified with 30. talents, and the punishment of such as were known offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian war served as an introduction to the war to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great solemnity and concourse; Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at liberty, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnesians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout, yet presently they cried out to hear it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Craftsmasters in the Art of giving thanks, which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-neer smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans in their war against Antiochus, than could have been the possession of a few Towns, yea, or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gave audience to Hagesianax and Lysias, king Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the free cities in Asia, and not vex them with war: as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe over his Army into Europe; adding, That ſome of them would viſit him in perſon ere it were long, to talk with him further concerning theſe points. This done, they fell to accompliſhing their promiſes unto the Greeks; to the reſt they gave what they had promiſed. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wiſdom to offend overmuch, being ſhortly to take a greater work in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed unto the Theſſalians; all ſave the town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the ſame which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the laſt Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earneſtly about Pharſalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory anſwer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howſoever ſomewhat the Councell might favour them, yet was it not meet that they ſhould have their will, as it were in deſpight of Titus. So the Achæans were reſtored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as abſolute manner as they could deſire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were beſtowed thoſe Caſtles, which he had gotten from Philip during this war; to reign in them, and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their own Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore loſt his ſhare. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the towns of Oreum and Eretria, in the Iſle of Eubœa, to his ſon and ſucceſſor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that theſe as well as the reſt of the Eubœans, ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy their liberty. Oreſtis, a little Province of the kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded unto the Romans long ere this, and ſince continued true to them: for which cauſe it was alſo ſet at liberty, and made a free eſtate by it ſelf.

Theſe buſineſſes being diſpatcht, it remained, that all care ſhould be uſed, not how to avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accompliſh it with moſt eaſe and proſperity. Wherefore Embaſſadours were ſent, both to Antiochus himſelf, to pick matter of quarrell; and about unto others, to pre-diſpoſe them unto the aſſiſting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War againſt this King, the Romans now had, or ſhortly after found: as alſo how their Embaſſadors and Agents dealt and ſped abroad; I refer unto another place.

CHAP. V.

§. I.

Seleucus Nicator, the firſt of his race, King of Aſia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherouſly ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is ſaid) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I never have read that any mans life hath been preſerved, or any miſchance avoided by the predictions of ſuch Divelliſh Oracles. Rather I beleeve, that many ſuch predictions of the Heathen gods, have been ante-dated by their Prieſts; or by others, which deviſed them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the ſon and heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his father: who ſurrendred unto him his own wife Stratonica, when he underſtood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cauſe to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevenged by this his Succeſſour. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words, containing himſelf within Aſia; and letting Ceraunus enjoy that quietly, which he

he had purchaſed in Europe, with the blood of Seleucus. It is ſaid of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his fathers life, yet out of modeſty he forbore to imbrace her, till his father was dead. So that perhaps his inceſtuous love was partly, if not chiefly, the cauſe of his not proſecuting that revenge; whereunto Nature ſhould have urged him. Afterwards he had wars with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alſo Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captains of the Gauls, were ſet upon him by the ſame Nicomedes. With theſe he fought a great battell: wherein, though otherwiſe the enemies had all advantage againſt him, yet by the terrour of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horſes and them, he won the victorie. He took in hand an enterpiſe againſt Ptolomy Philadelphus: but finding ill ſucceſſe in the beginning, he ſoon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldæan dedicated his Hiſtory of Aſſyria; the ſame which hath ſince been excellently falſified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one ſon, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the Kingdome of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteen yeers.

Genebrard. l. 2. Juſt. Mart. in Paræn.

Antiochus, ſurnamed Theos, or the god, had this vain and impious title given to him, by flattery of the Mileſians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppreſſed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitleſſe war with Ptolomy Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomy.

Of theſe two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other Interpreters have underſtood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South ſhall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (ſetting apart his inceſtuous marriage with his own ſiſter Arſinoe) a very excellent Prince: howſoever, the worthieſt of all that race. It was he that built, and furniſhed with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, and to honour the more, he ſent unto Eleazar, then high Prieſt of the Jews, for the Books of Moſes and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews had formerly been very great: for he had ſet at liberty as many of them, as his father held in ſlavery throughout all Egypt; and he had ſent unto the * Temple of God in Jeruſalem very rich Preſents. Wherefore Eleazar, yeelding to the Kings deſire, preſented him with an Hebrew copie: which Ptolomy cauſed to be tranſlated into Greek, by ſeventy two of the moſt grave and learned perſons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy, Jeſus the ſon of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to have been one: who that he lived in this Age, it ſeems to me very ſufficiently proved by Janſenius, in his Preface unto Eccleſiaſticus. The whole paſſage of this buſineſſe between Philadelphus and the high Prieſt, was written (as [a] Joſephus affirms) by Ariſtæus that was employed therein. Forty yeers Ptolomy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had been in his former yeers: in which time he boaſted, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have ſtood with reaſon: otherwiſe, the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his own errour. He was the firſt of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Succeſſors, that entred into League with the Romans: as alſo his off-ſpring was the laſt among thoſe Royall Families, which by them was rooted up.

* Aug. de civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 42.

[a] Joſ. ant. l. 12. cap. 2. Concerning that Book which now goes under the name of Ariſtæus; many learned men, & among the reſt, Ludovicus Vives, hold ſuſpicion that it is counterfeit, & the invention of ſome late Author. Surely if it were to be ſuſpected in the time of Vives; it may be now much more juſtly ſuſpected: ſince a new Edition of it is come forth, purged from faults, (as the Papiſts term thoſe Books, wherein they have changed what they pleaſe) and ſet forth by Middendorpius at Colen, An. Dom. 1578.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at ſuch time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomy. After his ſecond marriage, he uſed his firſt wife with no better regard, than if ſhe had been his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventured not to ſeek revenge, untill her own ſon Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three yeers after the death of Ptolomy Philadelphus: at what time ſhe poyſoned her huſband Theos; and, by permiſſion of Seleucus her ſon, murdered

Berenice,

Berenice, together with a ſonne that ſhe had borne to Antiochus. Juſtine reports, that Berenice ſaved her ſelfe, together with the yong Prince her childe, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only ſome Cities of Aſia prepared to ſuccour her, but her brother Ptolomy Evergetes, King of Egypt, came to reſcue her with an Army; though too late, for ſhe was ſlaine before. Juſt. lib. 27.

With ſuch cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, ſucceeding unto his Father, that had fifteene yeares beene King, began his reigne. His ſubjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they diſcovered in his firſt entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Eſtate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolomy Euergetes, who came againſt him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by ſome Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes againſt Ptolomy, in defence of their owne King: but rather they ſided with the Egyptian; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as ſhe had well deſerved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invaſion, by occaſion of thoſe domeſticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Egypt; went about a dangerous piece of worke, even to make Warre upon his owne ſubjects, becauſe of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bin much better, by well deſerving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furniſhing and manning whereof he was at ſuch charges, that he ſcarce left himſelfe any other hope, if that ſhould miſcarry. Herein he embarqued himſelfe; and putting to Sea, did meet with ſuch a tempeſt, as devoured all ſave himſelfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly eſcaped. This calamity, having left him nothing elſe in a manner than this naked body, turned nevertheleſſe to his great good; as anon after it ſeemed. For when his ſubjects underſtood in what ſort the gods (as they conceived it) had puniſhed him for his offences: they had commiſeration of his Eſtate; and, preſuming that he would thenceforth become a new man, offered unto him their ſervice with great alacritie. This revived him, and filled him with ſuch ſpirit; as thinking himſelfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpoſe. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. Hee was vanquiſhed by Ptolomy in a great battel: whence he eſcaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late ſhipwracke. Haſting therefore back to Antioch; and fearing that the enemy would ſoone be at his heeles; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Aſia, praying him to bring ſuccour with all ſpeed; and promiſing, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Aſia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeares old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of ſuch an occaſion to make himſelfe great. Hee levied a mighty Army of the Gaules; wherewith he ſet forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himſelfe. Hereof Ptolomy being advertiſed: and having no deſire to put himſelfe in danger more then he needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeares. No ſooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himſelfe to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquiſhed againe; and ſaved himſelfe with ſo few about him, that he was verily ſuppoſed to have periſhed in the battell. Thus did Gods Iuſtice take revenge of thoſe murders by which the Crowne was purchaſed; and ſetled (as might have beene thought) on the head of this bloudy King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby he had purchaſed his hearts deſire. But the Gaules, his Mercenaries, were gladder then hee. For when he led them againſt Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conqueſt in the beginning of his Reigne: theſe perfidious Barbarians tooke counſell againſt him, and deviſed how to ſtrippe him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall houſe to make head againſt them; it would be in their power, to doe what ſhould be beſt pleaſing to themſelves, in the lower Aſia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ranſome himſelfe with money, as if he had beene their lawfull Priſoner. Neither were they ſo contented; but made him enter into ſuch Compoſition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie: and prepared once more to try his fortune againſt his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the ſeaſon fit for himſelfe, to make his profit of their diſcord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvell, ſince he had great reaſon to ſtand in no leſſe feare of the Gaules, his own ſouldiers, than

than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawk, (which surname was given him, because he sought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his own Gaules. Having fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived: and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himself upon Ptolemy; his own conscience telling him, what evill he had meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeves, by whom he was murthered. Near about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arsaces founder of the Parthian Kingdome: wherein his evill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arsaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his neck by a fall from his horse, and so ended his unhappy reign of twenty years. He had to wife Laodice the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captains: which was father unto that Achæus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he stiled himself) a King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sons; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned only three years; in which time he made War upon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weak of body through sickness, and in want of money, he could not keep his men of War in good order: and finally he was slain by treason of Nicanor and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was revenged by Achæus, who slew the Traitors, and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus the brother of Seleucus being a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reign. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo: an expedition of Antiochus against him. The recontinuance of Antiochus his Egyptian war: with the passages between the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemy, and peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

ANtiochus was scarcely fifteen years old, when he began his reign, which lasted fixe and thirty years. In his minority, he was was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmfull it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himself; the successe of things will shortly discover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his reign, Ptolemy Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heir Ptolemy Philopater, a young Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus & the Achæans: who afterwards took part with Cleomenes; & lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good king of that race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoils which he brought home, after his victories ctories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer covetousnes of mony, refused to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wisdome of Josephus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farm the Tributes and customes that belonged unto him in those parts of Syria which he held. For Cœlosyria, with Palastina, and all those parts of the Country that lay neareſt unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptian; either as having fallen to the share of Ptolemy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slain in the battell at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemy Euergetes reigned six & twenty years; and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seem by that which we find in the Prologue unto Jesus the son of Syrach his book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty years were the years of Jesus his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto war against the Egyptian; for the recovery of Cœlosyria and the Countries adjoyning. This counsell was very unseasonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himself absolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stiffely, that it was most expedient and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithfull; whilest he in person made War upon one that was like himself, a King. No man durst gain-say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenætas an Achæan, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebel; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Cœlosyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so over the Desarts into the Vally of Massias, between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that served under Ptolemy. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came news, that Xenætas, his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Army; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenætas, whilest he was yet on his journey, and drew near to the River of Tygris; received many advertisements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils drawn by their Commander to bear arms against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himself stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenætas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to pass the River by Boats in face of his enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Camp; and with all the flour of his Army went over Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not so be stopped, He himself dislodged, and took his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his own souldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy; the great folly of Xenætas made his stratagem prosperous For Xenætas, having born himself proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now presume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Camp: or rather he commanded them so to do, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish up themselves against the journey, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily return the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilest they were yet heavy with the Wine and other good cheer that they had spent at supper. So Xenetas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the rest were slaughtered without making resistance; and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the hear of this victory, the Rebell marched unto Seleucia, which he presently took: and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Country down to the red Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hasted unto Susa; where at his first comming he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this businesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Mapsyas; filled him with great sorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took counsell what to do in this needfull case; and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of War he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of Celosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counsell was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to hear good counsell given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any oddes which he had of the Rebell in strength. Molo distrusted his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good success, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to return back to his Camp: which by some errour, took alarm at his return; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giving battell to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few men or Ensignes: but all the left wing of the enemy which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the victory: but Molo shortned the work, by killing himself; as did also divers of his friends, who for fear of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their own swords.

After this Victory came joyfull newes, that the Queen Laodice daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a son. Fortune seemed bountifull unto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what use he could of her friendly disposition while it lasted. Being now in the Eastern parts of his kingdome, He judged it convenient to visit his frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counsellor Hermias gave assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himself. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualty: then made he no doubt of becomming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthening his own Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greatest part of his kingdome situate between the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearfull; and therefore yeelded unto whatsoever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physitian of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus beleeved this, as having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for fear of him to utter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have used so much art in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoever he seemed gracious whilest he was alive: yet they that for fear had been most obsequious to him, whilest he was in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speak of him as he had deserved, when once they were secure of him: yea, his wife and children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wives and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to set a Diademe upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and study to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote unto him, signifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these means he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Cœlosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemy Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong City near to the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemy Euergettes having lately won it, might if it had so pleased him, have changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endless memoriall unto their names, by works proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the same greatness hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himself to Antiochus, and defended Cœlosyria in the behalf of Ptolemy; was now grown sorry, that he had used so much faith & diligence, in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his own profit: which thinking to find greater, by applying himself unto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two Kings; he offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest he was devising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captains, that was more faithfull than himself. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captain who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not only of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens: but of so many other Towns in that Countrie, as emboldned him to think upon making a journey into Egypt it self. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemy himself being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be for the War: and nevertheless at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heat of this business, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the usuall courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated them to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilest this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the War: wherein these two Counsellors perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get, for mony, a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemy, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, comming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one maner, as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles & his fellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himself, at the long siege of a Town called Dulow moneths, with promise that he would be ready to hearken unto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would fain have seemed, but only to lull his enemies asleep, whilest he took time to refresh himself; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, He used himself; as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needfull; for that the Towns would voluntarily yeeld unto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Nevertheless, he gave audience to the Embassadours, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himself well, to dispute about the justice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battell at Ipsus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said that Ptolemy the son of Lagi, had won Cœlosyria, and the Provinces adjoyning, for himself: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were in the end of their disputation, as far from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Also Ptolemy would needs have Achæus comprehended in the League between them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deal so with another, as to take his rebell into protection, and seek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Soveraign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolemy, with a very puissant Army, was comming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountred on the way by those Captains of Ptolemy, that had resisted him the year before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence nevertheless he drave them: and proceeding onward in his journey, won so many places, that he greatly encreased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captains of Ptolemy forsook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers, (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gaules;) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Arsinoe his Sister and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the brave deeds of his Ancestors; as not having of their own, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants, as also his being of Asia, had they been fewer, would have beaten those of Africk. Wherefore by the advantage of those beasts, He drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the battell wherein he fought himself. But Ptolemy had the better men by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his enemies battell, and won the victory; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following upon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above seventy thousand foot, and six thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in fear, lest Ptolemy and Achæus, setting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemy to vexe himself thus with the tedious businesse of War. So Ptolemy having staid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the league between these two Kings: or if he had been been included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the pains, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himself strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: for besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, he had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of war, and commanded a strong Army. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebell had been, one of mean regard otherwise, and carryed beyond himself by apprehending the vantage of some opportunity: but Cousin-german to the King, as hath been shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queen, Antiochus his wife. These things had added Majesty unto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemy of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battell at Raphia, and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell between sons-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not only slothfull, but hindred by a rebellion of his own subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemy, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serve in the late expedition; began to entertain a good opinion of their own valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they less esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greeks; which had hitherto kept them in straight subjection. Thus brake out a war between the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemy thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have been spent, as he thought, much better in revelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of war against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and find him work on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent up Achæus into the City of Sardes; where he held him about two years besieged. The City was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first years siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Castle it self was upon a very high rock, and in a manner impregnable; as also the Town-wall apjoyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner situate upon steep Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung over a deep bottome, whereinto the dead carkases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, used to be thrown. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, used to flye up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the wals, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himself, and concluded that those parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his judgement, and gave unto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and whilest a generall assault was made) entred the town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Cræsus thought himself secure on that side. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a losse many ages past: and therefore out of memory. Achæus held still the Castle: which not only seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries, & manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it: having none other hope to prevail, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the usuall tediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Ba- etrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, upon which they still incroached. But he thought it not safe, to let Achæus break loose again. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemy the Egyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole study, how to deliver this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appear in the Countries under Taurus, he would soon have an Army at command, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the waies in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rocks, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolemy, as well as of Achæus; to do his best for performance of their desire. He undertook the business: and gave such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus, by one Arianus, a trusty messenger, whom Bolis found means to conveigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none save he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a trusty fellow, and one whom Achæus found by examination, heartily affected unto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, that he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had won unto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardes. Never theless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himself to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himself should come speak with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, save only by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen,* same few excepted, have been, and still are,) false knaves. These two held a consultation together, that was, as a Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deliverance they undertook, nor touching the discharge of their own faith; but only how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveal the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readines on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Castle, and conveigh Achæus thence: He first went with Cambylus to speak with the King, who gave him very private audience; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull unto Ptolemy, whom he had long served, he accompanied Arianus up into the Castle. At his comming thither, he was lovingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But he discoursed so well, and with such gravity; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or judgement. He was an old Souldier, had long been a Captain under Ptolemy, and did not thrust himself into this businesse; but was invited by honourable and faithful men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countriman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times given safe passage and repassage unto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said, that he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or four of his friends; from whom when he received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himself. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he to play'd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, that he had to do with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambilus had laid their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Asiaeus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; & Bolis following behinde, should have an eye upon Achæus to prevent him, not only from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwise killing himself: to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Asiaeus going before as Guide; the rest following as the way served, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his speciall friends to bear him company. They were all disguised: and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongue, speaking and answering as need should require for all, as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily devising upon his business and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischief of another; yet could he not see in the dark, n or know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himself were there. The way was very uneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to stay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus, lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gave Bolis to understand, that he was the man: and so by their unseasonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whistled, and presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stir. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carryed forthwith to Antiochus; who sate up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound unto him, did so astonish the King that he was unable to speak a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes, assembling his friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him these tears: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in imploying two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverb, A un traydor dos alleveſos. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment upon those which held the castle, that after a while they gave up the place and themselves unto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some years passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater, to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes, then to Antigonus: and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whose posterity they continued untill the Reign of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolency of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gaules; did stir up Arsaces, a noble man of the Country, to seek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebell. So he slew the Kings Lieutenant; made himself king of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and took Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battell, whom he royally entertained and dismissed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawfull king: and by good government of his Countrey, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his successours; like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucidæ beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that they durſt not meet him in plain field; but kept themſelves in woods or places of ſtrength, and defended the Straights and paſſages of mountains. The reſiſtances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him ſo great a multitude, and ſo well ſorted, as he needed not to turn out of the way, from thoſe that lay fortified againſt him, in Woods and Straights between their mountains; it being eaſie to ſpare out of ſo great a number, as many as fetching a compaſſe about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often imploy againſt them his light armature: wherewith he cauſed them to diſlodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durſt not adventure themſelves in open ground. Arſaces, the ſecond of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own ſubjects; yet feared to encounter with ſo mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad waies and Deſarts would have cauſed Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not ſo falling out: He cauſed the Wels and Springs in the Wilderneſs, through which his Enemy muſt paſs, to be dammed up and ſpoiled. By which means, and the reſiſtance before ſpoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himſelf out of the way; ſuffering the Enemy to take his pleaſure for a time, in waſting the Countrey: wherein without ſome victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arſaces was nothing ſtrongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where he wan Tambrace, the chief City of that Province. This indignity and many other loſſes, cauſed Arſaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that ſeemed ſtrong enough, to adventure a battell. The iſſue thereof was ſuch as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accompliſhing his deſires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arſaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiſſe, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a ſubject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was againſt Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled againſt him or his Anceſtors: but having gotten the Kingdome from thoſe that had rebelled, kept it himſelf. With Euthydemus he fought a battell by the River Arius, where he had the victory. But the victory was not ſo greatly to his honour, as was the teſtimony which he gave of his own private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageouſly, than did any one man in all his Army. His horſe was ſlain under him; and he himſelf received a wound in his mouth, whereby he loſt ſome of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himſelf back unto the furthermoſt parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the War, ſeeking how to end it by compoſition. So Embaſſadours paſſed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjuſtly uſurped from him: Euthydemus anſwering, That he had won it from the children of the Uſurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, ſave by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they ſhould join, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behinde them. Theſe allegations, together with his own wearineſs, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reaſonable Conditions. Demetrius, the ſon of Euthydemus, being a goodly gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embaſſador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good concluſion: for Antiochus liked him ſo well, that he promiſed to give him in marriage, one of his own daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdome, cauſing him nevertheleſs to deliver up all his Elephants; as alſo to bind himſelf by oath, to ſuch Covenants as he thought requiſite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucaſus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagaſenus, King of the Indians, the ſociety that had been between their Anceſtors. The Indians had remained ſubject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his War againſt Antigonus, raiſed part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Weſtward, and was overbuſied in a great civill War: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ſtir up his Country men to rebellion; making himſelf their Captain, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office fice and Title he soon changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Majesty of a King. Finally he got unto himself (having an Army of six hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bin Alexanders. In this estate he had well confirmed himself, ere Seleucus Nicator could find leisure to cal him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himself at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his own, so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdoms, was continued by some Offices of love betwen their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian king, to an hundred & fifty: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generations, any business worthy of remembrance with the western countries. The posterity of Sandrocottus is thought to have retained that kingdome unto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with presents, and an Epistle written in Greek, wherein among other things, he said, That he had command over six hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundry Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophagasenus carried himself as the worthier person, receiving Presents, and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Asia, but on the hither side of Taurus, humbled themselves unto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his own greatness within few years ensuing, by presuming to stand upon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was only in seeming.

§. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolemy Philopater in Egypt: with the tragicall end of his favorites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young childe Ptolemy Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

THis expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himself a while; and study which way to convert the terrour of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolemy Philopater died: leaving his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemy surnamed Philopater, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meer derision; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly past, his childhood when he began to reign, may seem to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any mischief, whereof he could be accused. Having won the battell at Raphiah, He gave himself over to sensuality; and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation He murdered his own wife and sister; which had adventured her self with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenantships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agathocles, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy bawd that was mother unto them both. So these three governed the Realm at their pleasure, to the great grief of all the Countrey, till Philopater died: who having reigned seventeen years, left none other son than Ptolemy Epiphanes, a childe of five years old, begotten on Arsinoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governor of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the kings ordinary forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemy the first, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth unto them his sister Agathocles, with the young King in her armes; began a solemne oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister; but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man; who traiterously went about to set the Diademe upon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall he produced before them a witnesse, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shameless dissembler he was to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake up the Assembly: he that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly been his manner; by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious Mis-governours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with feare of harme; which in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe unto the Citie. For he was thought a man most unapt for Government, as afterwards he proved, yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agathocles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproare. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; & delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldier was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all things even in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought unto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldier alone by himselfe, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians of whom he found some in a Temple there by at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus beene used, they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leave him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the City, with lowd clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiers, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter stayed in the Court, until the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked up and downe the streets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, served well to stir up King Antiochus; who had very good leasure, though he wanted all pretence, to make war upon young Ptolomy. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened well, that Ptolomy Philopater in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other; yet had entred into covenant to divide betweene them all that belonged unto this Orphan; whose Father had been Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; He was very soon found busied, with war at his own doors. Also Scopas the Aetolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Army of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I do not finde: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been shewed before. As for Scopas; he shortly after went up into Syria with his Army: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Jewes; who seem to have yeelded themselves a little before unto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his War, & despaired of receiving help from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same year that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephalæ; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battail, and recovered all that had been lost. Among the rest, the Jewes with great willingness returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

* Iust. lib. 30.

Liv. lib. 31.

Vide Ioseph. Ant. Iud. lib. 12. c. 3.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his own in marriage unto Ptolemy: either hoping, as may seem, that the Countrey would willingly submit it self unto him, if this young child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held over-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Attalus, Philip and the Grecks, promised to afford him great advantage, if he should bring his Army to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath been declared, seemed easily to be swallowed up at once. One while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make invasion upon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himself easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, and desisted from that enterprise. Having thus far gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity between him and them. It is not lightly to be overpassed, That these his Embassadours were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their own intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great wars at once. Wherefore, not standing much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the present. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to win some Towns elsewhere, belonging unto Ptolemy; yet withall he sends an Army Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemy, and another to Eumenes the son of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when he sought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carryed with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and overswelling fortunes. However it was, He sent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his sons: willing them there to stay for him; whilest he himself with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to pass along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable act of the Rhodians, that, whilest the war of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this great Antiochus. They sent unto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gave him to understand, That if he passed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cilicia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs unto him; but because he should not joyn with Philip their enemy, and help him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits unto the King: yet he tempered himself, and without any shew of indignation gave a gentle answer; partly himself to their Embassadours;

sadors; partly unto their whole city, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: & willed them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and answer by them newly given to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit, when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian war was ended at the battail of Cynoscephalæ. They knew that Antiochus his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; unless the towns on the South coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemy their friend and Confederate were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore in this time of necessity, gave what aid they could unto all the subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the son of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in marriage: He excused himself, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetærus, his brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he said, that by abstaining from this affinity, it should be in his power to joyn with the Romans, and strengthen himself greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an over-mighty neighbour, if he hapned to win the victory.

Antiochus himself wintred about Ephesus; where he took such order as he thought convenient for reducing of Smyrna and Lampsacus to obedience; that had usurped their liberty, and obstinately strove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed unto the Hellespont: where having won some Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed over into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroied, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to imploy it in the Roman war. The Ætolians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his garrison did not oppresse the town but save it from the Barbarians: who took and sackt it, as soon as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such, might appear by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming thither. For the town was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as also to redeem those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants, and to repleniſh the City with the wonted frequency. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a journey in hand against those barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half to repair the City. These pains he took; partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, & thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shal dearly pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Country, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. III.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their war with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

FOr the Romans, though they were unable to smother their desire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keep the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended war, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and a helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speak for him, because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwaads pass between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into terms of worse, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten counsellors sent from Rome, requited (as hath bin * shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-professed amity, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progress through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a party strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindfull of the business: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deal with the King about those controversies, that were between him and Ptolemy. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there understanding that P. Vilius and L. Terentius, having bin sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsellors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptory Conditions, which the Embassadours present shall expound unto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the business in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver back unto Ptolemy those Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured so much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Army into Europe; for that other cause of his journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make war upon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That he wondred why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith he prayed them to let him alone; even as he, without such curiosity, suffered them to do in Italy what they thought good. As for his comming over into Europe: they saw well enough what business had drawn him thither; namely the war against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging, in Thrace, & Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that country, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversie between him and the other Kings, had been still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians, but had been seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicity of business, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia, since it was his purpose to bestow this city upon one of his sons, that should reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding unto himself, and to joyn ere long with Ptolemy, not only in friendship, but in a bond of near affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refute it; would needs hear further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadours of Lampsacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held some few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Gallo-Greeks, pretend only the goodness of their swords; nor yet over-modestly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their justice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was weary of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certain author, That Ptolemy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Country in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassadour both to Antiochus and to Ptolemy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadours, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his son Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to overlee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he took along with him, and sailed unto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deal with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honesty and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolemy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwrack, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintred: secure as might appear, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadours that had been sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsell, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he advised him to do quickly, before the War brake out with Antiochus, lest otherwise he might seem, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be satisfied with weak excuses In like manner some of the Greeks, were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians,

That

That conſtantly and faithfully they ſhould abide in the friendſhip of the people of Rome. It was needleſs to ſay plainly whereto this entreaty tended: the froward anſwer made by the Ætolians, declares them to have well underſtood the purpoſe. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the victory, as they had been during the War. They that ſo complained were the moſt moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promiſed unto them: upbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their victory over Philip, but even for helping them to ſet foot in Greece, which elſe they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle anſwers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to ſend Embaſſadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs; and then ſhould all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended againſt Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chaſe out of their city this honourable man, whom they ſo greatly hated. He had of late exerciſed his vertue againſt them in the Civill adminiſtration; and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the ſway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having ſubject unto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the reſt. Neither did they uſe this their power with moderation: but conſpired in ſuch wiſe together, that who ſo offended any one of them, ſhould have them all to be his enemies; which being once known, He was ſure to be ſoon accuſed and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the city Hannibal was choſen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though he was ſuperior unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto ſuch an annuall Magiſtrate, as at the years end muſt be accountable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore ſending for one of the Queſtors, or Officers of the Treaſury, to come and ſpeak with him: the proud Quæſtor ſet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverſe Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be choſen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the ſpirit of future Greatneſs. But he had not to do with ſuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal ſent for him by a Purſivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique aſſembly of the people. There he not only ſhewed what the undutifull ſtubbornneſſe of this Quæſtor had been; but how unſufferable the inſolency of all the Judges at the preſent was: whoſe unbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magiſtrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which paſſed with the generall good liking; That the Judges ſhould be choſen from year to year, and no one man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been paſſed, before he paſſed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto neceſſity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levie by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting money in their publique Treaſury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needfull charges. Hannibal conſidering this, began to examine the publique Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treaſurie, by wayes and means whatſoever; and in what ſort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhauſt the Treaſury: but that wicked Magiſtrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greateſt part of the monies to their own uſe, were thereby fain to load the people with needleſs burdens. Hereof he made ſuch plain demonſtration, That theſe Robbers of the common Treaſure were compelled to reſtore, with ſhame, what they had gotten by knavery: and ſo the Carthaginians were freed from the neceſſity of making ſuch poor ſhifts, as formerly they had uſed, when they knew not the value of their own Eſtate. But as the vertue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: ſo they of the Roman Faction, which had, ſince the making of the peace untill now, little regarded him, began to rage extremely; as being by him ſtript of their ill-gotten goods and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themſelves to have been in full poſſeſſion of the vanquiſhed Carthage. Wherefore they ſent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong again, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionless, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasury, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That having done their best already to keep all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of War. But having none other matter to alledge, than their own inventions: they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wilde beast, which would never be tamed: That secret messages past between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleness, as if it were harmfull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, every one to the best of his own friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publique notice of their Conspiracy was taken at Carthage, nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him; the man, against whom in war they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal, and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadours they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their comming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Masanissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by slight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shewed himself, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two; which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readiness at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea-side. There had he a ship furnished with all things needfull; as having long expected the necessity of some such journey. So bee bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing over to the Ile of Cercina: He found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectively: and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He said, He went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he entended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their sails and yards to be used in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleep: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neither could they, without some loss of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied a while in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the miss of so great a person was diversly construed. Some ghessed aright, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been seen: and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an evill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that he fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal comming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his son in Daphne: who friendly welcom-

med him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorry; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not prove alike easie unto this great Commander to make stout Souldiers of base Asiatiques; as it had been by his training and discipline, to make very serviceable and skilfull men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardy, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would be far more powerfull in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him less carefull to avoid the war; then should it further serve, to justifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seems indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making war. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Arms; unless by meer violence he were thereto enforced. Only the Ætolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsailers, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should ask. But this promise was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome was of war with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to upbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliverers had laid heavier fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chain, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid upon him: all the Towns of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Country at peace, both with the Romans, and within it self. As for Antiochus; He made it his daily suit, That the Peace between him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Nevertheless, T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize upon Greece, as soon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, he retained still in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrius, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Towns, he might the better withstand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sutable unto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embassadours, that had ben sent over to assist him; when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they said, would questionless fall upon Greece: wherein he should find not only the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intentive to his business. These reports went not only current through the City, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the War, against the King and his

Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the business with Nabis was referred unto Titus; to deal with him as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also he knew that many of the Greeks would not be sorry; though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three years before this, as is already shewed, whilest he had war with Philip: and had further been contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achæans; neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw upon himself this War. He was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that besides his own wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the war with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stir them up and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than only the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble action was in some sort maimed, or incompleat, whilest the noble City of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves. The Athenian Embassadour made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their proposition: wherein unrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poor Associates, they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pity it was to hear, such notable vertue and high deserts ill spoken of by some: which took upon them, out of their own imagination, to foretell what harm these their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would have required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their ancient glory, in those times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honour they were now so far faln, that they became Parasites unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into servitude. Then spake he against the Achæans, Clients that had been along time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip, untill they ran away from his adversity. These, he said, had gotten Corinth, and must now have war be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made war with Philip, and alwaies been friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himself, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; having been alwayes wont to profess, That Greece could never be at liberty, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seek by this discourse of war with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should do well if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Ætolians themselves did promise, & would undertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes to submit himself to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at unity. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Ætolians; as did their own ravenous desire of oppressing others, and getting unto themselves, that worse would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in possession of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achæans, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Ætolian theeves be enforced to keep home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. He cast them off with a sleight answer: telling them, that the ten Embassadors or Counsellors which had been sent unto him from Rome, to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian war: it was very soon ended. For Titus used the help of all his confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to do with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Navie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the service: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans; or whether to make one among the number, in seeking revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their help was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ætolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedæmonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wise, began a conspiracy against the Lacedæmonians that held their Town; meaning to open their gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and slain: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stir within the Wals: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assail Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedæmon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedome whereof since the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the war should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readiness an Army of fifteen thousand, wherewith to defend himself against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his own Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumised slaves, malefactors and base peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an assembly: and compassing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treason: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before-hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourscore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else do than terrifie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it self unto

ſome poor wretches: whom he accuſed of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. Theſe were openly whipt through all the ſtreets, and ſlain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more fredly, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a ſally: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at firſt; but were at length repelled with loſs. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but over-ran the Country; hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battail. The Roman Fleet at the ſame time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid ſiege unto Gytthium, the only or principall Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treaſon. There were two Governours within the Town equall in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or deſire of reward, had a purpoſe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being ſomewhat more faithfull, ſlue the Traitor; after whoſe death, he himſelf alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Army came thither to Gytthium: this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the utterm oſt, and await what either Time or his Maſter might do for him, but was contented to give up the place: yet upon Condition, to depart in ſafety to Sparta with his Garriſon. Pythagoras, the ſon-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government, with a thouſand Souldiers Mercenaries and two thouſand Argives: it being (as may ſeem) the Tyrants purpoſe, to relieve Gytthium: which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was loſt, then began they to think upon finiſhing the war, by ſome reaſonable Compoſition. Pythagoras therefore was ſent his Embaſſadour to Titus: requeſting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and ſpeak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant ſpake very reaſonably for himſelf: proving, that he ſuffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments: whereof the ſum was, That whatſoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the town of Argos, nor for any other cauſe by them alledged, they ought to make war upon him; ſince Argos, and all other their allegations whatſoever, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entring into that League with him; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith ſatisfied. He charged him with tyranny; & gave inſtance, as eaſily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points foraſmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him; it was expedient, that ſome other cauſe of this Invaſion ſhould be alledged. Wherefore he ſaid further, That this tyrant had occupied Meſſene, a town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyn with Philip; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but alſo in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ſh ps, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, ſince in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis, there was no reſtitution mentioned, other than of ſhips, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom he had long held war: it may ſeem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of thoſe complaints, that were otherwiſe very frivolous. As for Meſſene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this tyrant; and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it ſeems that Ariſtænus, the Prætor of the Achæans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting leſt the Romans, (that were wont to talk ſo much of their own juſtice, honour, and faithfull dealing) ſhould now relent, and forbear to moleſt him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong; framed his diſcourſe to another end. He entreated Nabis to conſider well of his own eſtate; and to ſettle his fortunes, whileſt he might do it without hazzard: alledging the examples of many tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to ſurrender their Eſtates, and lived in great ſecurity, honour, and happineſſe, as private men. Thus they diſcourſed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquiſh Argos; and requeſted them, to deliver unto him in writing their other demands, that he might take counſell with his friends. The iſſue of all was, that, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates muſt be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short work) before the City of Sparta they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon such Conditions as Titus should think meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonian to have ought to do in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iland or elsewhere; not to build any Town or Castle upon his own Lands; not to keep any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight years next ensuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himself should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants own son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himself did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this tyranny: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have bin prosecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the spoil of one that had not offended them; nor pleasing to the Achæans, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister unto the Ætolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon, once the most famous City among all the Greeks, was by the same Romans left in possession of a tyrant, that had usurped it [illegible] yesterday: and he therein rooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himself unmercifully dealt withall, by the self-same Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtfull war, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But falsly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falsly was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himself. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, save only that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Agesipolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a young childe was driven out by Lycurgus the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their City and Estates; but only leave required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands: and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soon be weary. But his fearfull nature shortly overcame the resolution; which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yeelding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans far more wicked than himself; and was ready upon the first advantage, to do them all the mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard newes that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carryed thence by Pythagoras to help the tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them joyntly should set their hands to the getting of it, which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcommed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himself thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemæan games; as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The un-sincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making war. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perswading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it self, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near distance appearing, he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate use of their liberty, & the care which they ought to have of living peaceably and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Achæans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be known, what lyers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retain those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greeks testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also at his request they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was urged, left therein behinde him the memory of his vertue and benefits untainted by jealousie and suspicion of any evil meaning. At his comming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had untill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoils of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: Some in the rude Masse unwrought; some in divers sorts of Coin; and some in Vessels of sundry kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were ten shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himself entred the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carryed an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius, the son of King Philip, and Armenes the son of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the shew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsellors; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said unto Titus and his Associates, that they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that having warred together, were upon equall terms of advantage; or between those that had lived alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrell. Unto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Covenants, that else might seem unreasonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten; there was it usuall to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But between those which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their own; and neither carry it self as superiour to the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the league and friendship that had been so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at liberty, from what cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should think fit. Hereto Quintius answered, that since they went so distinctly to work, He would also do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choyce whether to accept: Either that it should be lawful for the Romans to take part in Asia with any that would seek their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstain from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make War with a King that sought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lysimachia, whereon he had of late been at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundation, and repeopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been dispersed, or captive to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alledged: saying, That Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans took upon them as if their cause were far the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose to set at liberty those towns which the King would oppresse and hold in subjection: especially since those towns were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell, in that regard, under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon have left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to say, That unless he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect those which relyed upon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, & were contented once again to send over P. Villius, & others that had bin already with the king at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitless Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years, or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Masanissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for justice in vain.

THe Insubrians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often and (in a manner) continuall war upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, untill such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of their Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath been already shewed; by this their fellowship in Arms, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stir alone; but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardie; it hath been long since rehearsed between the first and second Punick Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this war, had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that alwaies made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Countrey was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken or besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they served excellently well to train up the Roman Souldiers to hardness and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the war which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage; or taking revenge of injuries when they return to minde. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them and any of their neighbours, do use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custome for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Ch. 2. §. 8. of this Book.

Divers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distress, and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Country was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make war, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Oxe-hide: & the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For treading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldome did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay fartheſt, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hard Nation, and easily stirred up to arms; but had not much knowledge in the art of war, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make evacuation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Country, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Countrey; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise, the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had litt'e business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and withal too great for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwaies maintain such Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captains as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did; and thereby held the Country; though seldome in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts, suppressed this rebellion by many victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Countrey; which lasted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War: yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a battell with the Roman Proconsull, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to send thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consull the year following, and sent into that Province; found at his comming little less to do, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the pains that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chiefest of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Country, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebell. He therefore disarmed them: which they took so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well understanding that such desperation might work dangerous effects; He called unto him the principall among them: and commending unto them peace and quietness, which they never had disturbed but unto their own great losse, He prayed them to devise what course might be taken for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsell in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kinde of Subject; He gave expresse charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw down the wals of all their Towns. Afterwards he carryed the war about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a jest, That if he were vanquished and slain, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victrry, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the War to so good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publique Revenues in that Province, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth by a vertue much agreeable to his own peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other useful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any business either private or publique. Many books he wrote: whereof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of mean birth, and the first of his house. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himself to the ancient laudable Customes of the City. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not caused him to malign the vertue of that noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himself, though far less rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, He was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himself to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved business so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himself or accusing others. For at the age of fourscore and six years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accused Sergius Galba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Vtican: one that being of like vertue and fervency, had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such nobility and greatness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Country, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Country seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two every year were sent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely fail of such work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a battell: another took fifty Towns; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, towns, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slain, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to say, That the business in Spain required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, untill the Numantian War broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Masanissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redress, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had been impartial. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Masanissa himself, now very lately pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himself to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masanissa had wherewith to justifie his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent unto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, that certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policy to keep them down.

As for the Country of Emporia: it had alwaies, he said, been theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were known, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their City stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoever they held without such a compass, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masanissa requested of the Senate, that they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Countrey sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherfore, because they would do nothing rashly; they sent over three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chief, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masanissa with a strong army should quickly prevail against those that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from stirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had there to any disposition; but were prepared by little and little, unto their final destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leisure to express the utmost of their hatred.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to war upon the Romans, by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gyttheum, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joyns with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perswasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætolians to think, that they who had promised unto themselves the whole spoil of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not only disappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have sufficed them, if their desires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had unsufferable wrong. Wherefore they devised, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not only perswade Antiochus to make war upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to joyn all together in a new Confederacy: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Ætolians took in hand; and well beseeming them, for they were great darers. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perswasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet shewed himself of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seek any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege unto Gyttheum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affairs of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duty: neither would they have staid long from repressing his violence by open war; had not some of them thought it wisdome to ask Counsell of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a business of such importance. Whilst thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were advised by Quintius to let all alone, and to wait for the comming of the Roman forces, that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to give them juster cause of complaint, by wasting their own Territory.

Philopœmen was then Pretor of the Achæans, who had long been absent in Crete; making War there for his minds sake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans referred themselves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should think best. He made all haste to relieve Gytheum by Sea; fearing lest the Town, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should be lost, if he used any delay. But Philopœmen was so bad a Sea-man, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gally his Admirall, that had fourscore years agoe been counted a gallant Vessell, in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Only it fell out well, that he committed himself to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her talons. For his admirall Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and took in water so fast, that she was fain to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the siege of Gytheum, to stop the Achæans, if they should invade his Countrey. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came unexpected, fired their Camp, and put all, save a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched he with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten miles wherof he was when the tyrant met him, that had already taken Gytheum. It was not expected that Nabis would have been ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gytheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that he must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long troup reaching some five miles; having their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to bear off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome of Philopœmen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his friends, to mark the situation of the Countrey about him; and to discourse what might befall an Army marching the same way. He would suppose, that having with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were upon that ground encountred by a greater Army, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the question, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? What piece of ground it were meet for him to seize upon? and in what manner he might best do it? in what sort he should order his men? where bestow his carriages, and under what Guard? in what sort encamp himself? and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation, He was grown so perfect, that he did never meet with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himself and his followers. At this time he made a stand: and having drawn up his Rere, He encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His baggage with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rock; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was first to minister the like occasion of skirmish. Philopœmen understood this; and laid an ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get between him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recovery of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwise would have been forced.

Some

Some companies he made to ſtay behind, and ſhew themſelves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceal his departure. But Philopœmen was not ſo to be beguiled. He eaſily won the Camp, and gave chaſe to Nabis: whoſe followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about & make head. The enemies being thus diſperſed & fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopœmen conceived aright, that their fear & neceſſity would teach them to creep homewards, and ſave themſelves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the evening, when he had gathered together all thoſe of his light-armature, which had followed the chaſe whileſt it was day, he led forth the reſt that had well refreſhed themſelves, and occupied the two moſt ordinary paſſages unto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopœmens Camp great ſtore of lights; thought that all had been at reſt: and therefore adventured to make an eſcape home. But they were ſo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty daies together after this, did Philopœmen waſt the Country round about, whileſt Nabis durſt not iſſue forth of his town; and then returned home, leaving the tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embaſſadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their party ſtrong againſt Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be ſolicited by the Ætolians. Very fair countenance they alſo made unto Philip; and with comfortable promiſes drew him to make ſhew, what ſoever he thought, of good correſpondence. They promiſed to reſtore unto him his ſon: and were contented to let him hope, that he ſhould receive other favours at their hands; and regain poſſeſſion of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for war againſt Antiochus in Greece, whileſt their Embaſſadours that were with him in Aſia, denied otherwiſe to grant him Peace, than if he would yeeld unto one of the Conditions, by them ſo often propounded. The long abſence of this King in Syria, where he had accompliſhed the marriage between Ptolemy and his daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings ſon, which happened during the Treaty, and hindered, or ſeemed to hinder the King from giving audience in perſon to the Embaſſadors; cauſed them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their anſwer as at their ſetting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficiall unto them, they brought to paſſe during their abode at Epheſus; either by cunning, or (as Livie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they diſcourſed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus, upon a cauſeleſs ſuſpition wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of theſe Embaſſadors; and that he, among other diſcourſes with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged the moſt worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the firſt place: to Pyrrhus the ſecond: and the third he challenged unto himſelf. But Scipio, who thought his own title better, than that it ought to be ſo forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldſt thou have ſaid then, Hannibal, if thou hadſt vanquiſhed me? To whom the Carthaginian replyed, Then would not I have given the firſt place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my ſelf. Now whether this were ſo, or otherwiſe, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embaſſadors, made him ſuſpected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to uſe his counſell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly deſired him to tell the cauſe thereof, heard what it was; he eaſily recovered his former grace and credit. For he told how his Father had cauſed him to ſwear at the Altars, when he was a little boy, that he never ſhould be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain ſurmiſes: but to know thus much, that ſo long as he thought upon war with Rome, ſo long would Hannibal do him all good ſervice: whereas contrariwiſe, if he intended to make peace, then ſhould it behove him to uſe the counſell of ſome other man.

The Ætolians, and their friends, were no leſs buſie all this while, in making their party ſtrong againſt the Romans, than were the Romans in muſtering up their friends in Greece. They had ſo often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themſelves the honour of the victory againſt Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; eſpecially when the Roman Embaſſadors had left him without hope of peace, unleſſe he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like ſort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vain. He understood the Romans, and himself, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own forces to the uttermost: as knowing that all the burthen must lie upon Antiochus and themselves, without help from any, save only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to resolution, the Athenian Embassadours, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemency a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the business worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans, it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign field, on which to the ruine of the Country, the Romans and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do, to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the world in an uproar, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes unto them, to hear those comfortable words; that, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of favour. For with such Terms had they been feasted once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This were only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Countrey at liberty, as also to decide the controversies depending between the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings minde before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as the Ætolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the war they referred unto the more private Councell of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a generall assembly. The Apocleti (so were the privie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to work as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as friends, to conduct home a principall man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driven to flee thence; but was, by intercession of those that loved him, again re-called. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a troup which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banish'd man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it self against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more insolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetorick they prevailed no more, than they could do by plain force.

force. For the Towns-men replyed, That they neither found any abridgement of their liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was dasht. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Town, styling himself King: but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had welnear lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopœmen had lately given him: since he durst not stir abroad; and daily expected the mischief, that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requesting them, That as he had not been slow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what help they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, That the ravenous Ætolians were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Demœritus the Prætor brought into the Counsell of the Apœleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make war with the Achæans, or to do ought else, save only what Alexamenus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætolians, he said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great king; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bin long pent up in the City; and train them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field: riding up and down with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or four horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Ætolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went aside to his thirty horsemen, and bade them remember the task enjoyned them at their setting forth; telling them, that they were all in case of banished men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirty Ætolians never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where in stead of seeking revenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians hasted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the town was shortly in arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royall stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his children; whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chief. So they fell upon the Ætolians that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slain in keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopœmen came thither: who calling out the chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexamenus should have done after he had slain the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians; and the small, but effectuall, travell of Philopœmen, the Achæans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the civill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsell in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young wife, and revels away the rest of Winter. Upon the comming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Straights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flees into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the victors.

ANtiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous, with all speed convenient, to shew himself in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, that in all the country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chain, desiring nothing more, than to break loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to confer upon him the greatness, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilest therefore the king was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, & so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care aside, for that his countrimen had already taken Demetrias, a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatness of his vertue & fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tel the king, first, that it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit man to be employed in the kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, that the king should as greatly feel the losse of a fleet or Army perishing under such a notable commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarryed under one of meaner quality: whereas nevertheless if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honour, & not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, that such a renowned Warriour should be alwaies near unto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good success would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the soveraign Command; even of the King himself. Antiochus gladly hearkned unto this admonition; being jealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Majesty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-side to Ilium; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian; the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chief man, and ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countrimen, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and took it as a sign of good luck, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than forty were serviceable for the Wars, with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and six Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his comming than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their country. He knew before that they would so do; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could devise. Being brought into their Councell, he made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he said, in true estimation, a sign of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hasted unto their aide, even whilest the season was unfit for Navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, travel, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authority out of Greece; leaving the Country free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs intreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many necessaries, that they would help him with Corn and other victuals, whereof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) that they would yeeld unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vain a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himself, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importance upon the promised assurance of a State that is meerly popular. For if the vehemency of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell; the Ætolians, for gain of two or three Towns, yea, for hope of such gain that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirty Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of War for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behinde him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chief Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, set Greece at liberty. But such liberty as might be true and usefull, they said, would never be obtained; untill by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mighty, every severall estate had where to finde redress of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them only, so to joyn with him in League, as that if either the Romans or he should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redresse at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginary, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirm of all the Greeks: forasmuch as none of them paid any tribute, was kept under by any Garrison, or lived otherwise than by their own Lawes, and without being tied unto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himself to deliver Cities that were already free. But since he, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship; they besought both him and the Ætolians, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soon after, he brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over late to have defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little town of Bœotia, lying over against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated unto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, & beholding the things there to be seen, whilest others were busied as they found cause, without fear of any danger; as being in such a place, and no war hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himself in many vain Treaties of peace took advantage of their carelesnes, and used them with all extremity of war. Very few of them escaped: fifty were taken, and the rest slain. Hereat Quintius was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make war upon the King.

Antiochus liked wel these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserved themselves untill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, he must hold them excused for not daring to stir; or if he came, the Romans must pardon their just fear, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay far off, joyned with him in true meaning, save the Eleans, that alwaies favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the Achæans to his party. Nevertheless he assayed them, upon a vain hope, that the envie which Titus was said to bear unto Philopœmens vertue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Ægium that spared not brave words, if the Achæans would have been so taken. The Kings Embassador told of great Armies and fleets that were comming; reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans, and Caducians; names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydomans, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphilians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well known, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwaies thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late war made against Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too far different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly look on, whilest he took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassador, and further added, that in the battel at Cynoscephalæ, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both he and his Army had bin there destroyed, had they not been protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councel, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have been desired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embassadour, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those unto whom they addressed addreſſed their Orations; as to vaunt themſelves the one unto the other. So as a man might well diſcern, what good correſpondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even ſuch brags as here they made before the Achæans, who knew them to be lyars, had the Ætolians alſo made unto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory over Philip to be meerly their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they been feaſted by the King, with ſuch tales as his Embaſſador told even now; of Dahans, and Arabians, and Elimæans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, ſuch as were wont to be ſold about for bond-ſlaves, and good for little elſe. Theſe divers names of raſcall people were, he ſaid, like to the diverſity of Veniſon, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no ſuch vaunter as were theſe Embaſſadors) had ſometime feaſted him. For all that variety, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Hoſt then merrily told him; than ſo many pieces of one tame ſwine, dreſt after ſeverall faſhions, with variety of ſawces. Setting therefore aſide this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the great King, by his preſent doings. He had notwithſtanding all this great noiſe, no more than ten thouſand men about him: for which little Army he was fain in a manner to beg victuals of the Ætolians; and take up money at uſury, to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there ſhut out, to Demetrias again. Theſe were the fruits of lies: wherewith, ſince both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they ſhould, as perhaps already they did, repent, whileſt wiſer men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much perſwaſion is needleſs. The Achæans did not love ſo wel the Ætolians, as to deſire that they ſhould become Princes of Greece: but rather wiſhed to ſee them, of all other, made the vrieſt abjects. Wherefore they ſtood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he ſped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War againſt him, and againſt the Ætolians.

How the hatred between theſe two Nations grew inveterate; ſufficiently appears in the ſtory foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwiſely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent ſpirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at reſt: there was nothing more greatly to have been deſired, than that they might never finde occaſion to return with an Army thither again. And in this reſpect ought the Greeks to have ſought, not how Smyrna and Lampſacus might recover their liberty (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, untill now of late) but how the powers of the Eaſt and Weſt, divided and kept aſunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Iſthmus, or neck of land, might be kept from overflowing the bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their ſeeking to make free thoſe baſe Aſiatiques, who originally were Greekiſh; than the general applauſe, wherewith all the nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lyſimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cauſe of feat, that ſhould move them to take arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made interceſſion, and requeſted that things might continue as they were, promiſing joyntly to aſſiſt the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whenſoever King Antiochus ſhould make the leaſt offer to ſtir againſt them: then had not only this quarrell been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Country, had been far from growing, as ſoon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generouſly declared themſelves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the reſt gave doubtfull anſwers of hope unto both ſides: or if ſome few, as did the Theſſalians, were firm againſt Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarel, nor ſhewed themſelves his enemies, till he preſſed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly received him, as ſoon as he entred upon their borders, not ſo much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had been ſomewhat hardly uſed. Aminander the Athamanian, beſides his old friendſhip with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more fooliſhly ſwallow, or Antiochus caſt out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himself to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sons, in that regard, Philip & Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poor Court of Athamania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedegree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him beleeve, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoof: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himself, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own phrenzie in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects: or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynoscephalæ, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended meerly unto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein soever they should be pleased to use him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, and Athamanians, having now all joyned with him; Antiochus took counsell of them about the prosecution of the War in hand. The chief question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessaly, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone untill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his own sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been cast aside, as a vessell of no use, but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would have spoken, had his counsell at any time before been asked since their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poor estates, that wanting force of their own, did adjoyn themselves for fear unto him, that was strongest for the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same fear for their excuse? Wherefore he thought it most behoovefull to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to sustain the Roman War with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to joyn with them; the benefit likely to redound unto himself, by their society, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope: For, said Hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motives which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that king to some wild beast, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would fain break loose. If this be so: let us break his chain, and pull down the grate, that he may regain his liberty, and satisfie his angry stomack, upon those that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his fear be greater than his indignation: then shall it behove us to look unto him; that he may not seek to please his good masters the Romans, by offending us. Your son Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage, let Seleucus be in readinesse to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then given ear, the Romans by this time should have heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy & Gaul should have bin on fire with war, and little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet & Army hither (but in any case let ships of burden come along with them, loaden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouthes) Wherefore let the one half be imployed against Italy; whilest you in person with the other half, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affairs of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of war; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine own. Of this Counsell which I give, I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution: but what counsel soever you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken bravely; but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the mean while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chief of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Fabius, a Roman Proprætor, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himself enemy unto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountains tops afar off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been comming upon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the year; He brake up his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Town; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the winter following as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon the War in hand. His great men and Captains followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his Army had passed the winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shal meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looseness of nuptiall Revels, by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica, his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long since, in time of the Punick War, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very fear and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, that none other man than the very best, should entertain an old stone, which they Devil then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province; or arrogate more unto himself, than his lot should afford him. This unpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make War against the Bojians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand foot, two thousand horse, and fifteen Elephants. Ptolemy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Aetolia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolemy sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young and dwelt too far off. So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refused. Unto Philips Embassadors answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that he should give to Acilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of grain; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masanissa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to set out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-money which was behind, & ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet; nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn, it was accepted, with condition, that they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hasty and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noise and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Asiatique souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few towns of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by fair words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to prove their excuse, when they should again forsake him. But King Philip and Fabius having recovered many places; and the Roman Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; he was glad to withdraw himself. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking-stock, and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities one after another, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behinde, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himself to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cryed out upon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deal of toyle during one half of a winter, and spent the other half in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which in time of need, he found all the promises of the Ætolians meerely verball: and himself reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea, a very Prophet, that had foreseen all this long before. Nevertheless, He sent word to the Ætolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no lesse than his. But the Ætolians had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus; who having promised to do great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellowes had done their best in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He seized upon the Straights of Thermopyla; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, untill more help should come.

L. 3. c. 6 §. 3. Of the Straights of Thermopyla, there hath been spoken enough * before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to passe that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece; unlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a World of men comming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great miracles, and effect what he listed himself in Greece: did commit himself unto the safety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whilest he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus; but at least wise now to help, and keep the tops of the mountains, lest the Romans, finding any by-path, should come down upon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the few passages: by which only and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consull in like sort prepared to force the Straights; without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himself encouraged his Army: not only by telling them with what base conditioned enemies they had to deal: but what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battell. All that night Cato had a sore journey (for what hapned unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, save only that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up steepy Rocks and crooked waies: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilest he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himself. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not hanted, because in time of peace, there was a fair way through the Straights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylæ been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bog at the end, which would suffer him to pass no further. So he staid there untill day-light: by which he discovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him; and some of the Ætolians very near unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lusty Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service; and willed them by any means to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Ætolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set upon the Ætolians, overthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found it in a manner a desperate piece of work to assault the Camp it self, which occupied the whole breadth of the Straights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of service; but by Archers & Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and powred down a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Ætolians had been comming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and ensigns were discovered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsook the camp, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badness of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this daies losse drave Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and intreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only standing out, because they knew not what else to do. Neither did the Consul give them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyn with him against Antiochus: over whom since the victory was already gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his work hard; especially Philip, who fain would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Myne, were overmuch hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoil of these towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius that could so ill indure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory got not Lamia himself: untill such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight: intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from comming in person, at least wise to help them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour; but appertained unto his own safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a sum of money, that might serve to defray the charges of the War: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain peace, upon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other business in hand; only he granted them ten daies of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himself. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing unto the faith; signified, in their use of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said he; I command you first of all, That none of you presume to go into Asia, upon any business private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicæarchus the Ætolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countrimen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phaneas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greeks, who had yeelded themselves unto his faith; not unto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chain. With that, chains were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumb and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phaneas also spake for himself: and said, That neither he, nor yet the Apoclets or ordinary Councell for the Nation, were able to fulfill these injunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten daies respite; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of War, during ten, and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea: when Philip had been commanded away from Lamia, that else he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this War: He was desired to set upon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that he could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Perrhæbia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War, yet they could not endure to hear more talk of Peace. And it happened, that that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with mony & hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea & Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gon thence. His mony Nicander conveighed into Lamia, by very unusuall dexterity. But he himself being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good; but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity, of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his servants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himself being then at supper, did visit him as soon as he rose up: giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madnesse; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus but himself, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they never made any triall: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutuall catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signifie unto his Countrimen; and privately to hold in mind the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the crown of Macedon: so as in the war of Persens he made himself suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission in such wise as he required it: he forthwith meant to prosecute the war against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Acilius stood upon point of honour; wherin he thought that he should have been a loser by rising from before it without Victory. So he staid there well-neer all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian king and the Achæans made far better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrias, and with an hasty course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to account the Eleans and Messenians: which had long been addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble a while. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other help when the Achæan Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that unto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did suffice to call home the Army, and finish the War: as also the peremptory Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Achæans, and become part of their Common-weal. Such was now the Majesty of a Roman Embassador. Titus did favour the Achæans; yet could not like it wel, that either they or any other should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus; which had once bin Philips, and was afterward given by him to Amynander, who sent a Governor thither. But when Amynander in this present war, was driven out of his own Kingdome by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Iland to the Achæans; whom he found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victory which they had obtained. It was bootleſſe to diſpute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themſelves unto his diſcretion. So he told them, that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoiſe, whereof Peloponneſus was the ſhel: and that, holding themſelves within that compaſſe, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they ſhould lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having ſetled things thus in Peloponneſus, he went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conſul had lain two moneths, that might have been far better ſpent. There, whether out of compaſſion which he had upon the Ætolians, or out of diſlike of King Philips thriving ſo faſt: he perſwaded the Conſul to grant unto the beſieged, and to the whole Nation, ſo long truce, that they might ſend Embaſſadors to Rome; and ſubmitting themſelves, crave pardon of the Senate. Moſt like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: elſe would not the Ætolians have made ſuch earneſt ſuit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had bin ſure to carry it in any ſhort ſpace, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; ſince the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flour of the Nation, would have made the promiſed ſubmiſſion much more humble and ſincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of theſe two; That either they ſhould wholly ſubmit themſelves to the good pleaſure of the Senate; Or elſe pay a thouſand talents, and make neither peace nor war with any, further than as the Romans ſhould give approbation. They had not ſo much money: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they ſhould give themſelves away unto diſcretion; which what it ſignified, they now underſtood. Wherefore they deſired to have it ſet down, in what points, and how far forth they ſhould yeeld unto the good pleaſure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain anſwer: ſo that they were diſmiſſed as enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whileſt the Ætolians were purſuing their hopes of peace, the Conſul had little to do in Greece; & therefore took upon him gravely to ſet things in order among the tractable Achæans. He would have had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhip of their Commonwealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans ſhould be medling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to be admitted, and ſaw that they ſhould have their deſire, without ſuch compulſive mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Livius, much about the ſame time, fought a battell at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty ſail of Rhodians came after the battell, when they were following the Chaſe. The Kings Fleet was the better of ſail; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquiſhed in fight, was yet out of danger; as ſoon as he betook himſelf to a ſpeedy retrait.

And ſuch end had the firſt years war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuſe themſelves by fear; thinking themſelves happy when by Embaſſadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrary ſide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now ſend to gratulate this their victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reſtored unto him Demetrius his younger ſon; whom ſome few years they had kept as an hoſtage. Alſo King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, ſent word how greatly all Aſia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard he deſired the Senate not to foreſlow time; but to ſend an Army, as ſoon as might be, into Aſia: promiſing, that his aſſiſtance, wherein ſoever it pleaſed them to uſe it, ſhould not be wanting. This Ptolemy was the ſon-in-law of king Antiochus: but he was the friend of fortune. He underſtood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The ſame did Antiochus now begin to ſuſpect, who had thought himſelf a while as ſafe at Epheſus, as if he had been in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not ſo far out of Greece into Aſia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would ſoon be there, and make him trie the chance of a battell for his kingdome.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lievtenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea, and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handfull of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battell of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lvcius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazzard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time bin put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an unblamable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the war against Antiochus, He himself would follow his brother in that war, as his Lievtenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controversie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppose, than Scipio: that had bin victorious against that same great Worthy? But indeed a worser man might have served well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no absolute command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation: where his wisdome was much approved, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance, as a sign of the freedome that he used in his censures, even whilest he lived in such a Court. Antiochus mustered his Army in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may seem, to have made him wish, that he had bin served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of gold, silver, and purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himself with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning that all his cost upon the backs of cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoil to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the king, it is easie to guess. The little use that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the use of his service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinqueremes Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same year for that voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphyssa a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town, but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left unregarded the last year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphyssa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalf of the Ætolians:

lians: entreating him to ſtand their friend, and help them in obtaining ſome tolerable condition of peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to perſwade the Ætolians, that they ſhould faithfully and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many meſſages paſſing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul make ſtill the ſame anſwer, with which they had bin chaſed from Rome. The Concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from war: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpfull commodity which time ſhould afford. So they obtained half a years truce: after which, the winter was like to afford them another half years leiſure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loſt, which with-held the War from paſſing over into Aſia.

The buſineſs of Ætolia being thus laid aſide, and the old Conſul Glabrio ſent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Theſſaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidered, that hereby they muſt commit themſelves unto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either do them ſome miſchief by the way, if he were diſpoſed to watch a notable advantage: or at the leaſt, would he be unfaithful; though he were not ſo couragious, yet might he take ſuch order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they ſhould be diſgracefully forced to return. He had promiſed them the utmoſt of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant ſincerely, they thought to make ſome triall; by cauſing a Gentleman to ride Poſt unto him, and obſerve his doings as he ſhould take him on the ſudden. The King was merry at a feaſt, and drinking when the Meſſenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and ſhewed him the next day, not only what proviſion of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges over the rivers, and mended the bad waies by which they were to paſſe. With theſe good newes Gracchus returned back in haſte unto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readineſs, that might help to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Helleſpont: where they ſtayed a good while, untill their Navie was in readineſs to tranſport them into Aſia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though, for the moſt part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a baniſhed Rhodian: true to the King; and deſirous of revenge upon his Countrymen, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to do ſomewhat upon thoſe that were ſo early in their diligence, before their fellowes ſhould arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work, and ſent word, as in great ſecrecy, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the ſentence of his baniſhment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many paſſages to and fro, this was beleeved: and the Rhodian Admirall grew ſo careleſſe, expecting ſtill when he ſhould receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas that he himſelf was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet ſetting forth from Epheſus by night; and, for fear of being diſcovered, reſting one day in harbour by the way, came the ſecond night to Samos: where, by morning it was ready to enter the Haven. Pauſiſtratus the Rhodian Admirall ſeeing this, thought it his beſt way of reſiſtance to beſtow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; ſo to guard the mouth of it: for that he ſaw no likelihood of defending himſelf by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed ſome Companies in another part of the Iland: which falling upon the back of Pauſiſtratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confuſion: ſo as the enemies took him out of all order, and ſunk or boorded all his Navie, five excepted, that by a ſudden device made ſhift to eſcape. Each of them hung out a burning Creſcent upon two poles, at the Beak-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the enemy: who having not bethought himſelf what ſhift to make againſt ſuch unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto theſe deſperate Gallies; for fear leſt they ſhould burn, together with themſelves, a part of the Kings fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had ſome loſs by tempeſt: whereof Polyxenidas could not take ſuch advantage as he had hoped; becauſe, putting to Sea for that purpoſe, he was driven back again by the like foul weather. But the Rhodians, to ſhew that they

they were not diſcouraged, ſet forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans alſo with King Eumenes, repaired their fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery, preſented battell to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Epheſus. When he durſt not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perſwaded by ſome appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by ſtormes at Sea; and another while by ſtrong reſiſtance made againſt them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forſake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdome. For Antiochus waſted all the grounds about Elea and Pergamus: and leaving his ſon Seleucus to beſiege the royall City of Pergamus, did with the reſt of his Army ſpoile the whole Country thereabout. Attalus the brother of king Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay againſt it. Wherefore he had reaſon to ſtand in fear; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thouſand foot, and an hundred horſe of the Achæans: old ſouldiers all, and trained up under Philopœmen, whoſe Scholar, in the art of war, Diophanes their commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the wals of Pergamus, which was an high town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to diſdain that ſuch men as they ſhould hold them beſieged. For Seleucus his army which was encamped at the hill-foot, ſeeing that none durſt ſally forth upon them, grew ſo careleſs: as otherwiſe than by ſpoyling all behind their backs, they ſeemed to forget that they were in an enemies country. Diophanes therefore ſpake with Attalus: and told him that he would go forth to viſit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he ſaid, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achæan would needs have his wil: & iſſuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the beſiegers, they wondred at firſt what his meaning was: but when they ſaw that he held himſelf quiet, they made a jeſt of his boldnes; & laughed to ſee with what an handful of men he looked ſo ſtoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence & diſorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as faſt as they wel might: and he himſelf, with the hundred horſe, brake out on the ſudden upon the ſtation that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their horſes ready ſadled, but more few, or none had the hearts to make reſiſtance: ſo as he drave them all out of their Camp; & chaſed them as far as he might ſafely adventure, with great ſlaughter of them, and no loſs of his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the wals of the town, men and women, to behold this ſpectacle) were very joyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of theſe Achæans. Yet would they not therefore iſſue forth of their gates, to help the Achæans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped half a mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and againſt him went forth Diophanes the ſecond time; who quietly reſted a while in his old Station. When they had ſtayed many hours, looking who ſhould begin: Seleucus, in fair order as he came, withdrew himſelf toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whileſt the enemy was in ſight: but as ſoon as the ground between them hindred the proſpect, he followed them in all haſte, and ſoon overtaking them with his horſe, charged them in Rere; ſo as he brake them, and with all his forces purſued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldneſs of the Achæans, and the baſeneſs of his own men, cauſed Seleucus to quit the ſiege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of theſe Aſiatiques, Philopœmen had cauſe to tell the Romans, That he envied their victory. For when Antiochus lay feaſting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his ſouldiers betook themſelves to Riot, as it had bin in a time of great ſecurity: a good man of war might have cut all their throats, even as they were tipling in their victualling houſes; which Philopœmen ſaid that he would have done, had he bin Generall of the Achæans, and not as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of buſineſs: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travell, brought almoſt nothing to paſſe. He had been at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himſelf with a few of his Horſe and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his ſon, as before hath been ſhewed, and went to Elea: whither he heard that Æmylius the Roman Admiral was come to bring ſuccour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of peace: about which to conſult, Eumenes was ſent for by Æmylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was conſidered, that no concluſion could be made without the Conſul: this Treaty brake off. Then followed the

the overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in a manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the war, the last and greatest was a victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battell was fought by Myonnesus a Promontory in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourscore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last year, That his Armada should cover all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodians more light-timbred and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran upon the enemy: who declining them for fear, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoysted sail: and, having a fair wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had bin remaining to defend those places that he held in Europe, he presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept even till the end of Winter following, and having reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto termes of great extremity. He also gave over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consull, without impediment, not only came to the Hellespont, but had yeelded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was also then in a readiness to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that he landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Country had been his already. The first newes that he heard of the enemy, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had been the places about which they varyed. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia, and was further purposed, not to strive with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with war? If it was their desire, that any other Towns upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at liberty, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain, and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewise bear half the charges, whereat they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassador seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should bear all the charges of the war, since it began through his own fault: and that He should not only depart out of those few Towns, which he held in Æolis and Ionia, but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himself on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantity of gold, together with the free restitution of his son; who (it is uncertain by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his son, than upon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publique businesse: He only said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the war to take hold on his own Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would advise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with his advice. For seeing that the Consull demanded of him no lesse, than if he had been already subdued: little reason there was that he should fear to come to battell; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give way. He had with him threescore and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants; and many Chariots armed with hooks or sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to hear that the Consul drew near him apace, as one hastening to fight. But howsoever he was affected; He made so little shew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elaa, He sent thither unto him his son without ransome: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickenesse, and withall not desirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own safety. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to do such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards have been little worth; than to stay untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recovery of his son: so as the joy thereof was thought, to have been much available unto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He said only thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by advising him not to fight untill he shall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his counsell: and therefore withdrew himself from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magnesia by Sypilus: where encamping, he fortified himself as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul, and sate down within four miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse, driven back over the River. Two dayes were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, untill they came within two miles and a half of Antiochus his Camp. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps de garde repelled. Four dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fift day the Romans came half way forward, and presented battail; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all winter, far from any Country of their friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unlesse they would stain their honour by returning far back, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the war untill the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Cry, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans took the field again, and ordered their Battels:

He alſo did the like; and advanced ſo far, that they might underſtand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army conſiſted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thouſand and four hundred men. The Latines, as uſually, were in the points; the Roman, in the mean battell. All of them, according to their wonted form, were divided into Maniples. The Haſtati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at ſuch diſtance as was uſuall; and laſt of all, the Triarii. Now beſide theſe, there were about three thouſand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans, and partly ſuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Utmoſt of all (ſave ſome five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almoſt three thouſand Horſe: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the reſt being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the bank of the River: yet four troups of Horſe were placed there, though ſuch help ſeemed in a manner needleſſe. Two thouſand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Camp. The Conſul had with him ſixteen African Elephants, which he beſtowed in his Rere: foraſmuch as had they come to fight with thoſe of Antiochus, they only would have ſerved to diſcourage his men; as being ſure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater, and more courageous beaſts: whereof Antiochus had likewiſe much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diverſly appointed, and not all accuſtomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the ſeverall kindes, in ſuch wiſe as each might be of moſt uſe. The main ſtrength of his Foot conſiſted in ſixteen thouſand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. Theſe he placed in the midſt, and divided into ten Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beaſts, and ſuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Creſts, Towers on their backs, and beſides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible ſhew. On the right hand of theſe were fifteen hundred horſe of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thouſand Barbd Horſe: and a Regiment of almoſt a thouſand Horſe, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and accompanied by ſome others. All which Troups of Horſe, divided in their ſeverall kindes, do ſeem to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been ſtretched out in Front. Adjoyning unto theſe, were ſixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings own Regiment; called the Argyraſpides, or Silverſhields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like ſo valiant as thoſe of the ſame name, that had ſerved under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on horſeback, three thouſand light-armed Foot, two thouſand and five hundred Archers of Myſia; with four thouſand ſlingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barbd Horſe: as alſo two thouſand horſe that were ſent from Ariarathes, with two thouſand and ſeven hundred of divers Nations; and a Regiment of a thouſand Horſe more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all theſe Horſe were the Chariots armed with hooks or ſythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon ſate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would ſerve to reach from thoſe high Camels. Beyond theſe were, as in the right wing, a rable of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphylians, Piſidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and many others, having alſo with them ſixteen Elephants. Antiochus himſelf commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The firſt onſet was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horſe; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eaſily made fruſtrate the danger threatned by them both. For with ſhoutings, and noiſes, and ſome wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running back upon their own men, did the ſame harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horſe following this advantage, charged upon the left wing: whereas they found no reſiſtance; ſome being out of order; others being without courage. It is ſhamefull to rehearſe, and ſo ſtrange, that it may hardly ſeem credible: that the Phalangiers, with with such variety of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner, as soon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himself, being in the left wing of his own battail: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Æmilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, issued forth with all his power to help his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; He not only turned his Horse about, but ran away upon the spur without further tarriance. The Camp was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this battell fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custody of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Towns-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded up themselves by Embassadours: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Camp: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that War, they required fifteen thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and people of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thousand, in twelve years next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded four hundred talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corn, that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with some others who had stirred up the King to this war, delivered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassador had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, & Cn. Manlius Volso. The Ætolians desired peace, but could not obtain it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed; That one of the Consuls should make war upon the Ætolians; the other, upon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battell, and had submitted himself unto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so throughly setled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, acompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea, by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deserts, and comparing himself with Masanissa hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had been to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was only such in title; and since both he and his Father had alwayes been their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would have: He still referring himself to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speak plain. At length he craved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had had no purpose to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving liberty to many of the Greek Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it self had been subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alledged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifully gave away so much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the war against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the pomp whereof exceeded in riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of the Asiatique: which the fortune of his Victory had no lesse deserved, though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by Sibyl. of Sibyls Propheſies; the Books of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

Marc. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now stiled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it self to the Roman Majesty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly terms than any other of the Greeks. The best was that so great a storm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadours were utterly denyed peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedy; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well devise, even upon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poor King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilst Philp of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that many of them bore a naturall affection to their own Prince) having been long accustomed to serve a Mountain Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, used by the Captains of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, & offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet, assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty adventurers, having divided themselves into four parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, four of the chief Towns in the Country, to his use. The fame of this good successe at the first; with divers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lievtenants of Philip unable to think upon resistance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few dayes; giving thereby some leisure unto his King to pro-provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all save two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athenæum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argithea, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldnesse to descend upon Argithea, for that they might perceive the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come down upon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retrait: especially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retrait was in manner of a plain flight, with great losse of men and armes, few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, untill Philip his return.

The Ætolians having found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged unto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolians again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These took Armes at first: but soon laid them away; seeing their neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their own King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of these victories the joy was the lesse, for that newes came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consull his hasting with an Army into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in despight, that he had recovered his own from Philip with such help as he could get. Neither seems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharp correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unlesse they would adventure to fight upon equall ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driven from their new conquest, by Perseus the son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the mean while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came, who besought the Consull to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seem to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend half his time about one City, and so be driven to leave unto his successour the honour of finishing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and bade them seek peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it overdear, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Aminander, offering his service as a mediatour, to put himself into Ambracia, and try what good his perswasions might do with the Citizens. So after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not unsufferable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanyed those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly solicite. The Ætolians were bound to uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Country. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaans, by stiffely pressing their own right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbear the Country. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others might lay claim, there was set down an order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Judges of their controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time war in Asia, with the Gallo-Grecks and others. His Army was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victory, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at wars, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From every of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even loaden with booty, when, having fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame & terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves far the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safety, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Country, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their own Nation, that had been friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then was no counsell thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high mountains of Olympus and Margana. These mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled, and that finally, when he had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For, whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careless of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came far otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Armes than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally the Barbarians, wanting defensive Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and the weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a peece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong down the steep rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their wives, children and goods became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soon after, at the other mountain: only more of them saved themselves by flight, as having fairer way at their backs.

These wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retain as Proconsull, his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for fear of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto he swore, and received the Kings oath oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoil, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many years extorted from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull use, which the Roman Souldier had been wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous houshold-stuffe, and slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seeds of that luxury, which finally over-grew and choaked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellespont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stir. But when Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himself was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his own Kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made war in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himself three thousand talents, and fifty ships of war, to take part with him and the Ætolians, promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the war began: he thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not only the half of Asia, but Chersonesus, and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himself they bestowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to go to Rome and beg Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby he made himself acquainted with the wars in Spain and Africk. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes took a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these upstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himself; yea himself unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himself against Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have been freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleeved, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assail the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all advantages; & they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages that were bestowed in the midst of the Army; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behinde: though both the getting and the saving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought untill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a fair march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

Liv. lib. 39.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an unworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus;

Liv. lib. 38. they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamity threatned by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecy threatned the Roman Captain or Army, that should passe over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Army beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before hand won, in a sort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, sowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemy to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should have any way betokened the comming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers have been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophecy. Of the Sibylline predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I think few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observation of the shamefull Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the books of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon upon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine errour; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the books of Hermes, which have born such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the undiscreet zeal of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forrein proofs. And in the same rank, I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Eusebius from no mean Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publique, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have obstained from speaking any word of an argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of Semoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruvius a Rebell, had many ages before been consecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoil that time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Eusch. Eccl hist. cap. 13.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, untill

the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, only by this accusation, known to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloyning from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great train of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himself to speak. Having audience, he told the people, That upon the same day of the year he had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punick War by a signall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-weal. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever since the seventeenth year of his life, untill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, even the Officers of the court followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their own slaves and a Cryer, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, untill for very shame, as not knowing what else to do, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himself to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to undergo so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year, in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the same year, with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribune-ship of his accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Asiatique. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching money received of Antiochus, & not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, & instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue, temperate, valiant, and of singular industry; frugall also, both of the publique, and of his own; so as in this kinde he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he unmercifull and unconscionable, in seeking to increase his own wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with envie, troubled both himself and the whole City, whilest he lived. His mean birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chief estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own rank, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lievtenant he had been at Thermopylæ, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury, That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobility) from his own first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some check, that was given unto himself, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consul's bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the vertue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue reports against his Generall; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being no: regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilest it was nourished by their enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A severe inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soon condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non-payment, his body should have been laid up in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the use of the City, when there neither appeared any sign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients, made such a Collection for him, as would have set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He took no more than such of his own goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his neareſt friends.

And thus began the civill war of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable, untill now, since the Punick War. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold upon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves overmatched by their adversaries at this kind of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs and stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, unto battail in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sons was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sons whilest they were but young, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take upon them Authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Consuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweal receive no detriment. By this decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man; whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius a famous Captain of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the City, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the civill wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himself absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtain the like soveraign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was provoked. It is true, that never any Consul had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the City stand in need of a Soveraign Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cæsar, or give him at least pretence, to right himself by arms: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he took such order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their own freedome, and became subjects unto the arbitrary government of one: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they took upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to do even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat greatnesse, nor beleeved of her self as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the sequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian VVarre.

§. III.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for war, obtains peace at Rome, by his son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

AFTER the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweal of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had been, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publique declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Soveraign power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, To beat Mony, and to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier Ressort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed four; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeal, or last resort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome, from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King or Common-weals declined, He or they were beaten, and inforced to obedience, or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their own Lawes, and Officers of their own ordaining: yet so, as neither the Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliverance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearfull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, & being most obsequious unto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of war & peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to use his own even as he listed, untill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdome bordered upon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his own high deserts) were they very loving unto Masanissa, and to his House, untill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion setled in Africk: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministery of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were usefull and obsequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himself not forgetfull of his own former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, then as want of due reverence to their estate, and a valuation of himself against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the waies for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them over the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes and the States of Thessaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his Dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: in which Province it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold have been found, in the age of our Grand-fathers, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe) fel to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemy Ceraunus thought them his own, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that crown, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heaps of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the son of Demetrius, and his successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gaules being over-past, those Countreys which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their liberty; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting up the waies, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own estate: yet forasmuch as these Towns were, in a manner, at absolute liberty, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer. That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians: who as soon as he thence withdrew his men, did seize upon the Town, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not availed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their own title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former war: and since they, by their victory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at liberty: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every controversie. Nevertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintain his right unto these Towns; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the war against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himself, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his kingdome, which he had gotten to himself out of the ruins of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruins Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deal more? By such allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at leastwise to gain time, wherein he might bethink himself what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had been their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, he took counsell of his own passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the King's men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thra-

cians by night, that they might sack the Town, and use all cruelties of war. This was done: but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors who had better notice, than could have been feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himself, and layed it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throats. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who survived, were either his own friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe, and more throughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himself of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour so lightly to give away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; He took order to have him poysoned by the way. By this we see, that the doctrine, which Machiavel taught unto Cæsar Borgia, to imploy men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischief, was not of his own invention. All ages have given us examples of this goodly policy, the latter having been apt scholars in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reign of Henry the eighth, here in England, can bear good witnesse; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himself had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, & were like to have brought upon him the war which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Embassador unto the Senate: giving him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliver his own grievances in such wise, that it ought were amisse, yet might it appear that he had been strongly urged to take such courses. The sum of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himself was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate; as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely to prevail somewhat; were it only in regard that would be born unto his person.

Whilest this business with the Macedonian hung in suspence, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himself some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had been Judges between him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and took notice of the controversies, which they found between some Estates in the Country. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Achæans. It was objected unto the Achæans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the wals of the City: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, the Prætor of the Achæans, made answer, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now took upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame upon others: the Achæans having not only called those unto judgement, that were supposed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans: and these Plaintiffes having slain them, upon private, though just hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing down the Wals of Lacedæmon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Town and liberty by their proper vertue, did inhibit unto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Usurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and governed the City by their own lawlesse Will. As for the Achæans, they communicated their own Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soon change them and take better, unto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policy. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embassadors, That he and his Countrymen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and give account of their actions, as vassals & slaves unto the people of Rome. For if they were indeed at liberty: why might not the Achæans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? for if the Romans would stand upon their greatnesse; and intimate as they begun, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achæans have recourse unto those Agreements that were confirmed by oath, and which without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state upon him; he pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, that if the Achæans would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achæans, which groned to hear the Lordly words of Appius. Yet fear prevailed above indignation: and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soon after, did make void all judgements of death or banishment, that had been laid by the Achæans, upon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedæmon should be suffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth; or, taken from them and made as it had been an Estate by it self. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, that they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Achæans, than the power which they had over them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-weals whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves, by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsel and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meer Vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policy so prevail with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and cities, into most base and fearfull servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very far from daring to stir against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the countrey would be his, whensoever he should take Armes, as shortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignity soon following. He had been lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, unskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted unto him, to read such brief notes as he had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his own sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his son, together with some insolence of his son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his his hatred unto Rome, and breed in him a jealousie of his too forward son. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome, some bringing one commandement, some another; and some requiring him to fulfill those things, which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors yong Demetrius was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the King, should not succeed unto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended not only Perseus, but Philip himself: who suspected his younger son, as more Roman than his own; and accordingly mis-construed all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousie; it will not be amisse to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profession is of all other the most unhappy; notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late been so peremptory with the Achæans; that they seemed not unlikely to take part against them, in any controversie that should be moved. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achæan Commonwealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up again the Estate of their own, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerfull in their City; who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpose, and not overstrongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seek occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to do some acts of hostility; whereby it was probable that bloud should be drawn, and either side so far exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, levied such forces as he could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achæans, especially of the Megalopolitans; were soon in a readinesse to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Messenians; whom he charged, and forced to run. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase; there arrived by chance a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again: and with the help of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopœmens horsemen to turn back. Philopœmen himself had long been sick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safety, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retrait: and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom the reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching over near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall off his horse, and being withall in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet scarce beleeved their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so far from being beleeved, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his mis-fortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant: began to manifest their good will for his delivery. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any disgrace, or injury, done to him, unrevenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him down fast bound, and with an engine laid an heavy stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopœmen took in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a chearfull countenance, drank his last draught. He was seventy years old, and weakned with long sickness, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily took away his life. The Achæans, when they missed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindfull to preserve their own lives, than to look unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were devising what to do in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Army against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Town, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himself, and made an end of his own life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds upon the ashes of Philopœmen that were carryed home in solemne pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slain at his funerall, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He would have entermedled in this businesse of Messene, had not Lycortas made short work, and left him nothing to do.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spightful enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference between the King and Flaminius, a troup of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had devised some secret sallies underground to save himself from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practice, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way to escape, nor counsell to resort unto, he took the poison into his hand, which he always preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of adverse fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear which hath so many years possest them; that fear, which makes them impotient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbred among the rest of his heroicall deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how far the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the nobleness of their forefathers, as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, & was ready to give them battell at their own doors, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poy-

son; whereas these of a latter race; have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore been one of their consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honor of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to revenge his fidelity, drank off the poyson, and dyed.

In this yeer also (as goon Authors have reported) to accompany Philopæmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African; these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the world had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home, as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the Common misery of his Country and Common-weale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envy of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weales, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of men of war, and great captaines, being no Kings. For besides the envy and jealousie of men, the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Monluc the Marshal of France confess, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, & without restriction, it were in vain for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serve. For the most of others, whose vertues have raised them above the level of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans, we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Æmilius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea long before these times, it was a Legacie that David bequeathed unto his victorious Captaine Joab. With this fare Alexander feastned Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereunto Valentinian the Emperor invited Ætius: who, after many other victories, overthrow Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battel for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, beside run-awayes, an hundred and fourscore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Ætius) murdered the Emperor; which hee never durst attempt Ætius living. And besides the the loss of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a far worse, had Belisarius; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Justinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Justine. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed, a Turkish one, That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of war, than suffer his own glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispateh Bassa Acomat; Selim, strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Visiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalvo, who drave the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrel. The Earles of Egmond and Horn had no heads left them to wear garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations have been paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of War. This I confess. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of their military vertue; though many have usurped them, by the help and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lievtenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traiterously cast down their Masters, and stepped up into their seats; were not all of them good men of war: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undeservedly were ascribed to their personal worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatness by the greatness of their warlike vertue; is farre more in seeming than indeed. Phocas was a souldier, and by the help of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other then cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himself. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid unto him again by Heraclius: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjustly gotten; and set it on his own head. Leontius laid hold upon the Emperour Justine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge he had left his own men of war. Justine, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion, Philippicus commanding the forces of Justine, murdered both the Emperour and his son. Anastasius, the vassal of this new Tyrant, surprised his Maher Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endless and a needless work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius, how many others have been repaid with their own cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captaines to make themselves Kings, have by Gods justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of unthankfulness in this kinde, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City, and a few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poor and wiseman therein, and he delivered the City by his wisdome: but none remembred this poor man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have been indebted for great benefits: which the unwiser sort of them think to savour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes cousened and abused; which proves that weakness to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountiful in giving thanks, yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines have made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the Enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it; and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most injuriously to rob them of their own, upon a false supposition: that even they whose hands are most clean from such offences, have purloyned somewhat from the common Treasury. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being so lately recited.

Eccl. 9. 14. & 15

In my late Soveraignes time, although for the wars, which for her own safety, she was constrained to undertake, her Majesty had no less cause to use the service of Martial men both by Sea and Land, then any of her Predecessors for many yeers had: yet according to the destiny of that profession, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest, and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any service by them performed. And that her Majesty had many advised, valiant, and faithful men, the prosperity of her affaires did well witness, who in all her dayes never received dishonor, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her self chosen and imployed.

For as all her old Captaines by Land died poor men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewry, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Constable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, & others:

so

ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the moſt famous, and who have done as great honor to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did; thoſe (I ſay) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (beſides the reputation which they purchaſed with many travels and wounds) nor title nor eſtate to their poſterity. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty, L. Willoughby of Ersby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Majeſty in the advancement of her Men of war did ſooner believe other men than her ſelf, a diſeaſe unto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelf, have been ſubject; I ſay that that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeem altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakneſs. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the proſperous actions are ſo exceedingly prized, the Actors are ſo unproſperous and ſo generally neglected. The cauſe, I ſay, which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that thoſe which are neereſt the perſon of Princes (which Martial men ſeldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at leaſt magnifie a profeſſion far more noble than their own, ſeeing therein they ſhould onely mind their Maſters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving leſs honor and reward to men of far greater deſerving, and of far greater uſe than themſelves.

But his Majeſty hath already paid the greateſt part of that debt. For beſides the relieving by Penſions all the poorer ſort, he hath honored more Martial men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred yeers.

He hath given a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable ſervice, as well in the yeer 1588. as at Calix, the Ilands, and in our own Sea; having firſt commanded as a Captain, twice admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in chief. His Majeſty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes; and created Sidney Vicount, Knelles, Ruſſel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons, for their governments and ſervices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland. and elſwhere.

§. III.

Philip, making proviſion for war againſt the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own ſubjects. His negotiation with the Baſtarnæ. His cruelty. He ſuſpecteth his ſon Demetrius. Demetrius accuſed by his brother Perſeus; and ſhortly after ſlain by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his ſons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perſeus, he dieth.

QUintius Martius the Roman Embaſſador, who travelled up and down, ſeeking what work might be found about Greece, had received inſtruction from the Senate, to uſe the utmoſt of his diligence in looking into the Eſtate of Macedon, At his return home, that he might not ſeem to have diſcovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatſoever they enjoyned him; yet ſo, as it might appear, that ſuch his obedience would laſt no longer, than meer neceſſity ſhould enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and ſayings of that King did wholly tend unto rebellion, about which he was deviſing. Now it was ſo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obſequiouſneſs to the Romans, and foreſaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their own hands; with ſafety of their honour, if they could finde convenient means; or otherwiſe (as to him ſeemed apparent) by what means ſoever. He was in an ill caſe: as having been already vanquiſhed by them; having loſt exceedingly both in ſtrength and reputation, having ſubjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could deviſe, againſt the neceſſity which he daily feared. Such of his own people as dwelt in the maritime Towns, and gave him cauſe to ſuſpect that they would do but bad ſervice againſt the Romans, he compelled to forſake their dwellings, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence theſe were tranſplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whoſe faith he thought a great deal more aſſured

againſt thoſe enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he deviſed upon alluring the Baſtarnæ, a ſtrong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their ſeat, and come to him with all their multitude: who beſides other great rewards, would help them to root out the Dardanians, and take poſſeſſion of their Country. Theſe were like to do him notable ſervice againſt the Romans; being not onely ſtout fighting men, but ſuch, as being planted in thoſe quarters by him, would bear reſpect unto him alone. The leaſt benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, muſt be the utter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwayes troubleſome to the Kingdom of Macedon, whenſoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perſwade thoſe Baſtarnæ, by hope of ſpoyle, and other incitements, unto a more deſperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italy it ſelf. It was not known who ſhould withſtand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordiſci, and peradventure ſome others, through whoſe Country they were to paſs, would accompany them againſt the Romans, were it only in hope of ſpoyle. Now to facilitate the remove of theſe Baſtarnæ from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchaſe the good will of ſome Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paſs. And thus he ſought means to ſtrengthen himſelf, with help of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; ſince he was not like to finde aſſiſtance from any civil Nation, about the whole compaſs of the Mediterranean Seas. But theſe devices were long ere they took effect: ſo as the Baſtarnæ came not before ſuch time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpoſe. In the mean time he neglected not the trayning of his men to war, and the exerciſe of them in ſome ſmall Expeditions againſt thoſe wilde people that bordered upon him, and ſtood worſt affected toward him.

But theſe his counſels and proceedings were miſerably diſturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his own houſe. The Families and whole Townſhips, which he had cauſed much againſt their wils to forſake their ancient dwellings, and betake themſelves to ſuch new habitations, as he in his diſcretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at firſt contained it ſelf within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwiſe than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which alſo he did unwillingly, being himſelf over-ruled by neceſſity, that ſeemed apparent. This evil therefore would ſoon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindicative nature made it worſe. He could not pardon words proceeding from juſt ſorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly ſought revenge where it was needleſs. In his rage he cauſed many to die: among whom were ſome eminent men; and few or none of them deſervedly. This increaſed the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curſes. Which grew the more general, when the King in a barbarous and baſe fury, miſtruſting all alike whom hee had injured, thought himſelf unlike to be ſafe, untill he ſhould have maſſacred all the children of thoſe parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleaſure, ſome accidents, more tragical than perhaps he could have deſired, gave men cauſe to think (as they could not in reaſon think otherwiſe) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heaven, he felt the like miſery in his own children. It is hard to ſay what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they ſhewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger ſon. It may well be (though it may be alſo ſuſpected) that they had no purpoſe to make and nouriſh diſſention between the brethren, but only to cheriſh the vertue and towardlineſs of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Hiſtories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual reſpect of them, bred extream jealouſie in the fathers head. If any cuſtome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the faſhion of their apparel, or the unſightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jeſted at in ordinary diſcourſe and table-take; Demetrius was ſure to be preſently on fire, defending and praiſing them, even in ſuch points as rather needed excuſe. This, and his daily converſation with their Embaſſadours as often as they came, gave his father cauſe.

cause to think, that he was no fit partaker of any counsell held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder son Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step between him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty years old, of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practises, than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspicions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder son, a slight occasion made the fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Muster and ceremonious lustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twain a bitch, and threw the head and forepart, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Army was to passe. This done the armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two sons: after him came his own band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Army was divided into two parts: which under the Kings two sons, charged each other in manner of a true fight, using poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over-earnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater tryall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, untill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad presage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort: who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carryed him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his own companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himself so indiscreetly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his brother, and see what cheer he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his train behinde, but forced them all to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made known to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doors, as if he stood in fear to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himself excluded, and fared very angerly with his brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murdrous purpose was detected, sent him away with an entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger unto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, & in effect the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the main point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and born out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his father, and was sorry to see him spoyled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from Titus Quintius to the King himself: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further do well to send him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honourable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that

ſhould wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become ſervants to this young traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anſwer, by rehearſing all paſſages of the day and night foregoing, in ſuch manner as he remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perſeus, that convered matters of paſtime, and what was done or ſpoken in wine, to ſuch an accuſation, whereby he ſought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bear him, he ſaid that it it grew, if not by his own vertue, at leaſtwiſe from their opinion thereof: ſo as by any impious practice, he were more like to loſe it wholly, than to increaſe it. In this wretched pleading there wanted no ſuch paſſions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren, beſides thoſe that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a father, though a jealous father, That he would conclude nothing upon the exceſſe or errour, whatſoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better obſervation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themſelves both in word and deed. And herein he may ſeem to have dealt both juſtly and compaſſionately. But from this time forward he gave himſelf over wholly to Perſeus: uſing ſo little conference with his yonger ſon, that when he had matters of weight in hand, ſuch eſpecially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him preſent, nor near unto him. Above all, he had eſpeciall care, to learn out what had paſſed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, Philocles & Apelles; men whom he thought no way intereſſed in the quarrels between the brethren, though indeed they altogether depeuded on the elder, whom they ſaw the more in grace. Theſe brought home with them a letter, ſaid to be written by Titus (whoſe ſeal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious deſires had cauſed him to enter into practices unjuſtifiable, againſt his elder brother, which yet ſhould never take effect: for that Titus himſelf would not be author, or abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuſe did forcibly perſwade the king to think his ſon a dangerous Traytor. To ſtrengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in cuſtody, made ſhew as if he had pitied the eſtate of the unhappy Prince, and ſo wrung out of him his ſecret intentions, which he ſhortly diſcovered unto Philip. It was the purpoſe of Demetrius to flye ſecretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in ſafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering ſuch claim as he had in reverſion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatſoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falſhood of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the eſcape, and in the mean while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip reſolved to put his ſon to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behovefull to make him away privily, for fear leſt the Romans ſhould take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proof ſufficient, at leaſt, of the Kings deſpight againſt them, if not of his meaning to renew the war. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accurſed Miniſter of his Kings unadviſed ſentence, firſt gave poyſon to Demetrius: which wrought neither ſo haſtily, nor ſo ſecretly, as was deſired. Hereupon he ſent a couple of Ruffians, to finiſh the tragedy: who villainouſly accompliſhed their work, by ſmothering that Prince, in whoſe life conſiſted the greateſt hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own bloud. The houſes of Lyſimachus and Caſſander fell either with themſelves, or even upon their heels; by inteſtine diſcord and jealouſies, grounded on deſire of ſoveraign rule, or fear of loſing it. By the like unnaturall hatred, had almoſt bin cut off the lines of Ptolemy and of Seleucus: which, though narrowly they eſcaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievouſly diſtempered. Contrariwiſe, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upſtart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raiſed it ſelf to marvellous greatneſſe, in very ſhort ſpace, from the condition of meer ſlavery: whereof a principall cauſe was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with ſingular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of theſe examples; but is ſaid to have propounded the laſt of them to his own children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reaſon ſo to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himself of an unmercifull nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perswader unto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his own; did now procure vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his own poyson. After the death of his son, he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole processe. His only remaining son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he took in being freed from all danger of competition, as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to be feared than at other times; when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his usuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times, by those that well understood the difference betwen a rising and a setting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like whereof he had never been slow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that he grew thereby hatefull to Perseus: and thus becomming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Counsellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it self, and give ease to the King, untill the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquiry after the truth. In this doing, he found one Xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xychus for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had been employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No marvell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnaturall practice of one son, he had so wretchedly cast away another, far more vertuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himself, and withall against the Authors of the mischief. Upon the first newes of this discovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy; Philocles was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not deny it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himself guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now grown stronger, than that he should need to flye the country: yet not so stout as to adventure himself into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome towards Thrace, whilest his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power, this his ungracious son, took a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it upon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive grief of minde, so disabled him in the travell thereto belonging, that ere he could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yeeld to nature. He had reigned about two and forty years: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himself with continuall wars; of which that with the Romans was most unhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evill that befell him, he might thank his own perverse condition: since his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as might it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was justly punished by feeling the difference between the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whileſt yet it was only drawing near, was fore-ſignified unto Perſeus, by Caligenes the Phyſician, who alſo concealed it a while from thoſe that were about the Court. So Perſeus came thither on the ſudden, and took poſſeſſion of the Kingdome: which in fine he no leſſe improvidently loſt, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Baſtarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perſeus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they ſuffered Maſaniſſa cruelly to oppreſſe the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perſeus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treaſon of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perſeus. He ſeeks friendſhip of the Achæans, and is withſtood by Callicrates. The Romans diſcover their intent of warring upon him.

IMmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Baſtarnæ into Thrace; where order had been taken, long before, both for the free paſſage, and for the indemnity of the Country. This compact was friendly obſerved, as long as no other was known than that Philip did live to recompence all that ſhould be done, or ſuſtained, for his ſervice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon, and not heard withall, that he took any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daſht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford ſo good markets unto theſe ſtrangers, as formerly they had done. On the other ſide, the Baſtarnæ would not be contented with reaſon, but became their own carvers. Thus each part having loſt the rich hopes repoſed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the preſent; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Baſtarnæ had the upper hand, ſo as they chaſed the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the victors made little uſe of their good fortune. For whether by reaſon of ſome overthrow, received by them in aſſaulting a place of ſtrength; or whether becauſe of extreme bad weather, which is ſaid to have afflicted them as it were miraculouſly: all of them returned home, ſave thirty thouſand, which pierced on into Dardania. How theſe thirty thouſand ſped in their voyage, I do not finde. It ſeems that by the careleſſe uſing of ſome victories, they drew loſſe upon themſelves: and finally took that occaſion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perſeus, he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his reign, to embroile himſelf in a war ſo dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his minde to the ſetling of his Eſtate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himſelf, as the condition of his affairs ſhould require, either for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Antigonus. To win love of his people, he ſate perſonally to hear their cauſes in judgement, (though herein he was ſo over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of juſtice to be no better than fained) as alſo he gratified them with many delightfull ſpectacles, magnificently by him ſet forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all neceſſity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his firſt work, to ſend Embaſſadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate ſaluted King, and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in ſeeking to purchaſe good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein ſo exceſſively bountifull, that it may ſeem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruine, he became ſo griping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the maſtring paſſion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into ſo many ſhapes, as made it hard to diſcern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requiſite no more, than the relation of his actions paſt and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, buſie in wars againſt the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquiſhed, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They alſo conquered Iſtria; ſubdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had ſome quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever ſince the victory) a heavy hand: and ſuffered Maſaniſſa to take from them what he liſted.

listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vassals to Rome, were affraid, though in defence of their own, to take armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masanissa therefore had great advantage over them, and was not ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and so did he use them again and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masanissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for love of his wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his father-in law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whose judgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Estate, to use all manner of submissive obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masanissa came upon them againe, and took from them above seventy Towns and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make war out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masanissa, invading their Countrey, howsoever he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was Confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to bear defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that they might have fairer justice; or be suffered to defend their own by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly give place to favor, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how far forth Masanissa should be allowed to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment as they themselves in honour should think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to live in fear, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithal the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping; in hope to move compassion.

Here may we behold the fruits of their envy to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irresolution in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole estate in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they servants, even to the servants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slain, taken & sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all cities of Africk & Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often and so earnestly desired. Only they want peace with Masanissa, once their mercenary; and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruel hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperity as might have been their owne. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who lost the battel at Cannæ; than Hannibal that wan it was used by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Commonwealth, and employed their labours for the publike, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extream want, to set out an Army into Spaine, at what time the enemy lay under their own wals. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their tears may seem to have been mistrusted, as proceeding no less from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masanissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained not such leave as they sought, of defending their own right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained, they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the son of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his father. He answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that business. Onely it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Councel divers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapius: whereupon he himself was dispatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would do, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their justice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those Lands, which by the covenants of the League, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should do well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian war was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little help. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better usage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africk round about him, and Carthage therewithal, should be his own.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindely at first, until (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, until the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no less ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any, they called it, making war upon their friends: Where he did good, if they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have presumed far, unless either they had been extreamly provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soon allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angerly this presumption of the King: even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his own rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his neck, they could themselves have done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were such as made it unlawful, both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take arms without their licence first obtained.

To the same pass they would also faine have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents, even such as had entred into league with them upon equal termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frown, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Arms, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their own carvers, and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chastised the Messenian by war; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any business of importance, by their own power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheless upon submission, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the practice of Arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard lesson, they were such untoward schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Achæans, refused not only to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League between them; but further, with a careless insolencie, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplyed from Italy, with victuals or arms. Herewith not content, the Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians would revolt from the Achæans; they themselves would think it a business no way concerning them. Pol. Leg. 51. & 53.

This was presently after the death of Philopæmen; at what time it was believed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distress; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had utterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no town rebelled from the Achæans, but many entered into their corporation; then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had straightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have served their own turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume unto themselves a Soveraigne power, in directing all matters of war, which dissemblingly they would have seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make war; whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meer stangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and people of Rome: unless peradventure, sometimes they winked at such violence, as did help towards the accomplishment of their own secret malice. Now these Roman Arts, howsoever many (for gainful or timerous respects) would seem to understand them; yet were generally displeasing unto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, having neither subjects of their own that might rebel, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, untill the war of Mithridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes that with over-nice diligence, strove to preserve their Liberties and Lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to have affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to break.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neer neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his subjects, could not want good information of all that might concern him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopæmen had long since foretold, of the miserable subjection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not onely perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themſelves grieved with the preſent ſubjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans, yet all of them had the care to chooſe among themſelves none other Magiſtrates, than ſuch as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other ſervile reſpect, be flatterers of the greatneſs which kept all in fear. Thus it ſeemed likely, that all domeſtical conſpiracies would ſoon be at an end; when honeſtie, and love of the Common-weale, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this careful proviſion for the ſafety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly advertiſed: either becauſe things were diligently concealed from their Embaſſadors, whom all men knew to be little better then ſpies; or becauſe little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by ſuch Traitors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their own people, and therefore more like to ſpeak maliciouſly than truly; or prehaps becauſe the Embaſſadours themſelves, being all Senators, and capable of the greateſt Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own deſires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from thoſe that are feated or flattered by many. The Achæans being to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, that ſhould both excuſe them, as touching ſome point wherein they refuſed to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the ſame buſineſs; choſe one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embaſſage. By their making choice of ſuch a man, one may perceive the advantage, which miſchievous wretches, who commonly are forward in purſuing their vile deſires, have againſt the plaine ſort of honeſt men, that leaſt earneſtly thruſt themſelves into the troubleſome buſineſs of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in ſuch wiſe tranſported with ambition, that he choſe much rather to betray his Countrie, than to let any other be of more authority than himſelf therein. Wherefore in ſtead of well diſcharging his credence, and alledging what was meeteſt in juſtification of his people, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and ſtrongly encouraged the Romans, to oppreſs both the Achæans, and all the reſt of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the ſettling of their authoritie, among his froward Countrimen, if they meant not wholly to forgo it. For now there was taken up a cuſtome, to ſtand upon points of confederacie, and laws: as if theſe were principally to be had in regard, any injunction from Rome notwithſtanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans, both now, and at other times, did what beſt pleaſed themſelves, and anſwered the Romans with excuſes: as if it were enough to ſay, That by ſome condition of League, or by force of ſome Law, they were diſcharged or hindred from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be ſo, if hee, and ſome other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceaſed not to affirme, That no Columnes, or Monuments erected, nor no ſolemn oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obſervance of Confederacie or ſtatute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themſelves, that the multitude refuſed to give ear unto ſuch perſwaſions. For howſoever in popular Eſtates, the ſound of libertie uſed to be more plauſible, than any diſcourſe tending againſt it; yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, ſeeming never ſo bad, were ſure by their ſo doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increaſe apace, and they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore ſtrange how the Fathers could ſo neglect the advancement of thoſe, that ſought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman majeſty. More wiſely, though with ſeditious and rebellious purpoſe, did the Greeks; who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwiſe of little account or deſert; only for having uttered ſome brave words againſt the Romans. The Fathers hearing theſe and the like reaſons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly thoſe that were obſtinate, and by cheriſhing their friends, to make their party ſtrong; reſolved to follow this good counſel, in every point; yea to depreſs all thoſe that held with the right, and to ſet up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the preſent unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to ſee that their mandate (which was concerning the reſtitution of thoſe that were baniſhed out of Lacedæmon) ſhould be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callicrates, they adviſed all men to be ſuch, and ſo affected, as he was, in their ſeveral common-weales. With this diſpatch, Callicrates returned home a joyful man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himſelf into the way of preferment. Nevertheleſs he forbore to vaunt himſelf of his eloquence uſed in the Senate. Onely he ſo reported his Embaſſage, that all men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatened thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romans. By ſuch Arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magiſtracy, as in all his courſes following, he omitted nothing, that might ſerve to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſneſs unto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan many flatterers, and loſt as many true friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promiſes, to aſſure unto himſelf thoſe that ill could brook his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeſter than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece diſtracted with factions: ſome holding with the Romans, ſome with the Macedonian, and ſome few, reſpecting onely the good of the Eſtates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not ſufferable, That a King, no better than their vaſſal, ſhould dare to become head of a faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of his treſpaſſes: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall afford them juſt occaſion to make war upon him. Perſeus having finiſhed his buſineſs among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed thereby. With thoſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelf; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatſoever, done by his father, might be buried with his father; ſince his own meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleaſed better, if he had behaved himſelf after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of hoſtility in his paſſage. Yet as if he ought not to have taken ſuch a journy, without their licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heap of his faults. He labored greatly to recover the love of the Achæans: which his father had ſo loſt, that by a ſolemn decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealouſie perhaps, no leſs then hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a decree. For howſoever Philip had by many vile acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Arati, given them cauſe to abhor him; yet in the publike adminiſtration of their eſtate, he had, for the more part, been to them ſo beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general conſent, they reſolve to forſake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preſervation of concord among them, to uſe all circumſpection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country towards him ſo doubtfully affected: eſpecially when by hearkening to his meſſages, they might make themſelves ſuſpected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of War, and when all danger of innovation was paſt, was uncivil, if not inhumane; as nourithing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like ſort, forbidden the kingdome of Macedon: yet underſtanding what would be due to them, if they ſhould adventure thither, none of them durſt ſet foot therein. Hence it came to paſs, that their bondmen, knowing a ſafe harbour, out of which their maſters could not fetch them, ran daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loſs of ſuch, as made of their ſlaves very profitable uſe. But Perſeus took hold upon this occaſion: as fitly ſerving to pacifie thoſe, whoſe enmity faine he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all theſe fugitives, to ſend them home againe: and wrote unto the Achæans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken paines to reſtore back their ſervants, ſo ſhould they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily underſtood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearſed by the Prætor, before the Councel. But Callicrates took the matter very angerly; and bade them be adviſed what they did: for that this was none other, than a plain device, to make them depart from the friendſhip of the Romans. Herewithal he took upon him, ſomewhat liberally, to make the Achæans beforehand acquainted with the War, that was comming up on Perſeus from Rome. Hee told told them how Philip had made preparations for the same war; how Demetrius had been made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly, He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarna, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behavior, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he advised them to expect the event of things, and not over-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himself too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perseus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had lovingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so; why might not the Achæans, as wel as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheless Callicrates was grown a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not over-stiffely gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and answer made the whilst, That since the King had only sent a letter without an Embassador, they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to do as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience: which was proof sufficient (to one that could understand) of the condition wherein they lived. For harkening to this advice of Callicrates; they were soon after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of War was given.

Liv. lib. 42.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honors him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians with the causes thereof. The unusual stoutness of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poyson some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree war against him, and send him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this war.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had been troubled about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his neighbours. He had taken the right course, in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise, That they, by their authority, would end the business to his content. But in conclusion, by the help of the Kings, Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the war himself; and brought his Enemies to seek and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to give them. After this, being at good leisure; he began to consider how the affaires of Macedon stood under Perseus. His hatred to Perseus, wis very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy was as great, and withal notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditary quarrel with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honors (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax every where stale: whilst Perseus, either by his currying favour or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, open War. But smal pleasure found he in these poor and indirect courses of revenge.

Pol. Leg. 56. & 59.

The Lycians could not be saved by his Patronage from severe and cruel chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This tendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostility, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued

falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achæans, as too unmeasured, misbeseeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not been too vainely ambitious) befel him; especially for his being over-serviceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdom; which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redress hereof, he thought it vaine to strive any longer with bounty, against such an Adversary, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished. Liv. lib. 42.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where though he had little to say, which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange novelty, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the ballance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania, that of Perseus himself against the Dolopians, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in businesses of his neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spie. He said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, of his own, money in a readiness to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeers, armes to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeers, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoyle, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus, the son and successour of Antiochus the Great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envy to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to hear of amity with Philip, were now grown marvellously well affected to his son. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his kingdom, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie unto the most: saying, that he thought it his duty to forewarne them: since it would be to himself a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making war upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans stood in fear of Perseus, lest he should set upon them in Italie. Nevertheless, forasmuch as they loved not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embassadors, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own kingdome, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtaine their own right and security? Toward this justification of the war, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well known; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speak; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, or of some about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the weariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisdome to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe conveighed by sea unto Perseus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office, as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes, Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their own protection any people or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meer vassals, but as dependants and associates. For proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masanissa, the Aetolians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to finde themselves agrieved, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might easily be made their fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that al men knew the present meaning of the Senate: which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the ears. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more neerly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

Vel. Leg. 60. & 61.

Liv. lib. 41.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might savour of hostility; but that, if his travel in this kinde proved vaine, then would he be ready to defend himself by armes, and stand to the chance of war, which often fals out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himself might, at this time, think to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman servitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakness of spirit, unanswerable to a work of such importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune; which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat; it appeares by his daring to adventure soon after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make war upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there do sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his own hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout ruffians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud-wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work, such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such hast, that they killed one of their own companions, who could not hold pace with them; because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Ile of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonica the daughter of king Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may wel be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly love, That when the king turned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his duty, as in former times, received none other check than, that he should forbear to marry with the Queen until he were wel assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never speak of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, unto the same brother, both his wife and kingdom. Alikewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the king his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in special favour, when Eumenes fel into their hatred) were in good readiness, to have transferred the kingdom from his brother to him. By such concord of brethren was the kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld; as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likly that Perseus was very glad, when he understood that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saved all from discovery. But as he was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived, so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the less material. For he had written to one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this business: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Embassadour, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece one Rammius, a Citizen of Brundusium; who comming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himself. Brundusium was the ordinary Port for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secret. The summe of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality; sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for fear lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed upon himself. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings denial ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himself; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withal professing; That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the rightfulness of making war upon him; but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proof (which might have been easie) than any that we finde by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very suitable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make war upon Eumenes their confederate, that is, if he might not send men to waste the kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, then by violence of the sword, was it lawful for him to do it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed war against him; and sent Embassadours dours to denounce it unto him, unleſs he would yeeld to make ſuch amends as they ſhould require. He ſeemed at this time to have been ſo confident in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he deſired not war, yet he did not fear it: or at leaſt he thought by ſhew of courage, to make his enemies more calm. He cauſed the Embaſſadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them do their errand. They made a tedious rehearſal of all matters, which they had long bin collecting againſt him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and ſecret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embaſſadours ſent to him out of Aſia, about ſome ill purpoſe. In regard of all which they peremptorily required ſatisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have ſtood upon the evidence, brought againſt him by Rammius and Praxo. For if thoſe accuſations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwiſe they were deſtitute; it being no fault in a King, to be ſtrong, wel-beloved, and wel-friended. Perſeus anſwered, for the preſent, in a rage; calling the Romans, greedy, proud, inſolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embaſſadors, that were no better than meer ſpies. Finally, he promiſed to give them in writing their full anſwer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer ſtand to the league made between them and his father; and renewed by himſelf indeed only for fear; but wiſhed them to deſcend to more equal conditions; whereupon he, for his part, would adviſe, as they might alſo do for theirs.

Polyb. Legat. 9. Liv. lib. 33. In the form of the league between Philip and the Romans, as is ſet down by Polybius, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future; excepting thoſe which he immediately performed. But Livie inſerts a clauſe, whereby he was expreſly forbidden to make any war abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is moſt likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring ſhortly into league with Rome, did ſo bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make war abroad, then if he had been reſtrained by plain covenant. And thus might that ſeem an article of the peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by conſequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and ſay, that the Macedonian might not bear defenſive arms, without their permiſſion; then had Perſeus very juſt reaſon to find himſelf aggrieved. For ſince they had allowed his father, without controle, to make war in Thrace, (whileſt they themſelves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elſewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why ſhould they now interpret the bargaine after another faſhion? Was it now become lawful for him to chaſtiſe his own Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By ſuch allegations he maintained the right of his cauſe, in very milde ſort; when it was too late. At the preſent, by diſclaiming the league as unjuſt, he miniſtred occaſion unto the Embaſſadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worſt of their meſſage, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three dayes. But either he ſhould have been leſs vehement, or more conſtant in his reſolution. For if his heart could ſerve him to undertake the war, he ſhould couragiouſly have managed it, and have faln to work immediately, whileſt the Enemie was unprepared; not have loſt opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worſe peace than the former.

§. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greeks, to joyn with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timorousness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this war. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his victorie, sues for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. The vex the Greeks their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the war: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strength was such as would prevaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their unreadiness a smal help, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greeks or other Eastern people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissention between their several Estates; howsoever the generality of them were inclined the same way. Nevertheless Embassadours were sent to deal with them all; and to crave their help against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no less ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in wars pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now grown well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and understood that not only such as made refusal, but even they who might seem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their help to the Romans: the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duty. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have seen the ruine. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Historians was one: who though He * judged the victory of Perseus, like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greeks might recover perfect liberty: for his endevours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their fear, may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanor of Perseus himself. He had undertaken a war, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdome, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought over-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somwhat against him, than he began to speak the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every smal thing would serve to terrifie him: and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had assisted him: little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his army; taking by force or composition some few Towns, and soliciting all to joyn with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadours. Q. Martius, the chief of those Embassadours, and a man of more fineness in cunning than was usual among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King entreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him, yet the Embassadours, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied: and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readiness, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could have been in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee suffered a most convenient season, of winning upon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copy of the disputation beetween him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not only to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poor helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than meer vanity, his own safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seem excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine unto the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly their own: had it not been his office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the war, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him, and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians also, who had entered of late into a strict society with the Macedonian, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yeelded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission under a general form; but caused their several Towns to make covenant apart, each for it self; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Bœotians from Thebes their head, was more than Agesilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more availeable to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few brave Citizens, than was the society with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilest the King sate still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should think expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perseus had sent; audience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreaty, would serve their turn: the Senate being resolved before hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the wals, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome enter the City) and had only the short warning of eleven daies, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courtesie serve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Consul was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to have rouzed Perseus, and have made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himself tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsell prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly and wisely followed. He now began, as if the war had not begun untill now, to do what should have been done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendevous at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His army he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, whereof about twelve thousand foot, and a thousand horse were strangers, of sundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his own Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolency of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to help him with money and victuals, according to their severall abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his own Kingdome he issued forth into Thessaly: knowing that the Romans were to pass through that Countrey, in their journey towards him. Some Towns of Thessaly opened their gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he won by force. Of these last was Nyle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a sally; which the Townsmen rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terrour of the obstinate. So Velatia and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the straights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sicurium, a towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessaly, with four thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his son Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this war; perhaps because Eumenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemy (though Ptolemy was then young, and under Tutors) had businesse of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised help to the Romans which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, ſerved him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty ſhips, riding in the haven of Dyrrachium, uncertain to what purpoſe: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kinde ſort; making ſhew to beleeve, That for none other end than to ſerve the Romans, their good friend Gentius had ſent thither this fleet. But whatſoever Gentius thought in the beginning; he fooliſhly loſt both his Kingdome and himſelf, in the end of this war; by offering, rather than giving, his help to Perſeus.

With none other company than what he brought over the ſea, Licinius came into Theſſaly: ſo tyred with a painfull journey, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which ſtood in his way from Epirus; that if Perſeus had been ready, attending his deſcent into the Plains, the Romans muſt needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreſhed himſelf and his wearied army, by the River Penens; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as faſt as they could. It was not any ſlender help, that could enable him to deal with Perſeus. Therefore he reſolved, to abide where he then was, and keep his trenches, untill his numbers were ſufficiently increaſed: contenting himſelf in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Theſſaly, in which theſe two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece beſides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of ſuch a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midſt of it, but ſomewhat more to the Eaſt, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, ſo exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often uſed at large, to ſignifie the moſt pleaſant and goodly places. This valley of it ſelf was not great; but adding to it thoſe huge mountains Oſſa and Olympus (famous in Poeſie) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all ſides encloſed; it occupied the better part of Theſſaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unleſs they would make an hungry journey, through the countrey of the Daſſaretians, as in the former war with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perſeus therefore had no ſmall advantage, by being maſter of the ſtraights leading into Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by miſ-ſpending of time he had not loſt it. For if in defending the ragged paſſages of theſe mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worſe; yea to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in ſtrength and reputation: queſtionleſs he might have done far greater things, had he ſeized upon the ſtraights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the Country behinde the mountains of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficulty, muſt the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or elſe have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needfull, unto the mercy of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have fought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courſes they once deviſed, notwithſtanding any trouble which they found in this preſent war. It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Greeks, and others whom the King muſt have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Theſſalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his father in the former war. The Ætolians, upon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into ſuſpicion with the Romans (as we ſhall finde anon) even as ſoon as they met with Perſeus. The Bœotians, how politickly ſoever Martius had wrought with them, adventured themſelves deſperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they have done, if he at firſt had done his beſt? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himſelf, after a while began to waver, when they ſaw things go better with Perſeus, than they had expected. So that if in ſtead of diſcouraging his friends, by ſuing baſely for peace; he had raiſed their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increaſed the number of his wel-willers, yea and bought down with money (as he might have done) ſome of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to forſake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the liberty, by them given, entire; which (otherwiſe was but imaginary. Such benefit of this war, ſince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reaſon have bin expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearfull company running from their enemies, till some river stay their flight; are there compelled by meer desperation to do such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would have won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that war, whereof he should have sought the honour; he left his friends that would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their own safety: yet being overtaken by necessity, he chose rather to set his back to the mountains of Tempe, and defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driven into such misery, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessaly, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the sum.

The Consul having no desire to fight, untill such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the River of Penens, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by wasting the land of the Pheræans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victory his own. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertain skirmish. The Captain, and some other of these were slain: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battel. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battail: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the grief of those who being so far come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell upon them by their enduring these bravadoes. The Town of Sycurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up four hours of the morning; but he was fain to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging, seven miles nearer to the enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sun rising. His comming at such an unusuall hour, filled the Camp with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him only his horse and light armature, that were unfit to assail the trenches, yet the Consull thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to try their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with little losse of his own. But he discovered his weakneſse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to counsail given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear lest he should assault their camp; and to that purpose, upon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unsent for: he nevertheleſse took it for sound advice, which indeed was timorous and base, To work warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater, and had he won the Roman Camp, his friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, even when he had the victory; what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yeelding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. He had slain of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty horse and forty foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and fear: it being much doubted that the enemy would set upon it. Eumenes gave counsell to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud termes, to draw upon himself a greater calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Aetolians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a traiterous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especiall mark, had been observed to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learn, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shun indignation, or incur favour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, he not untill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either prested his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have routed them whilest they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, The Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoils among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour sound. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily perswaded to use the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yeeld unto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse here again to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilest Embassadors might go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; save that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answer so peremptory he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace which he so much desired, could not be purchased with mony, the King withdrew himself back to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the son of Masanissa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance between the King and them, caused the Romans to wax the more bold in making their harvest: about which businesse they ranged over all the fields. Their careless demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilest he strove to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great battell, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall back into Macedon; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appear hereafter. He left all behinde him, save only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight unto Connus; hoping to have taken it, it, and ſo to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back unto the Perræbians and others; from whom he won ſome towns, and among the reſt, Lariſſa. There were ſundry towns thereabout, bearing the ſame name of Lariſſa: ſo that this which the Conſull took, may ſeem not to have belonged unto the Theſſalians; unleſſe, perhaps, after his victory, Perſeus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got ſome part of Theſſaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a preciſe account; for that the hiſtories of them are greatly defective. One may think it ſtrange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embaſſadour could terrifie, and bring altogether to his own will, ſhould not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navie on their coaſt. But more ſtrange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Act of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty towns, which by that ſame diſtraction of the Bœotians, became within themſelves more abſolute, than formerly they had been. The cauſes hereof were to have been ſought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now loſt. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly puniſhed by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got ſo much by ſpoyling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like ſort, if by extreme oppreſſion he could have driven them ſo far. Neither was Licinius the Conſul undiligent in the ſame kinde. What his doings were, after ſuch time as he was at leiſure from Perſeus, I finde nowhere mentioned. Only this is ſaid in generall; That in the war which he made, he cruelly and covetouſly demeaned himſelf. Liv. lib. 44.

After the ſame faſhion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hoſtilius the Conſul, and Hortenſius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hoſtilius ſhewed more of his induſtry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in proſecuting the war againſt the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war upon his Kingdome, after that the Conſul had fought paſſage in vain over certain mountains, Perſeus ſeemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that ſide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conſull ſent thither with an Army of four thouſand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Vſcana, a border town of Illyria, by treaſon, came thither in ſuch careleſſe order, that the inhabitants which had made ſhew of treaſon, with purpoſe only to train him into danger; ſallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chaſed him ſo far, that hardly he eſcaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this town of Vſcana, ſhortly after became Roman: which howſoever it happened, Perſeus very ſoon recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys a Thracian King, ſecuring him on the one ſide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirot, revolted from the Romans, on the other, Perſeus likewiſe made a painfull journey into Ætolia; where he was promiſed to be admitted into Stratus, that was the ſtrongeſt City in that Region. Of this hope though he were diſappointed by thoſe of the Romans faction, yet in his return home, he took in Aperantia; and ſhortly heard good newes, that Ap. Claudius was again throughly beaten by Clevas, one of his Lievtenants. Such ſucceſſe had the Macedonian war under Hoſtilius. The ſame Conſul offended much the Greeks, by the ſtrict inquiſition which his Embaſſadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For theſe Embaſſadours travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponneſus, gave out ſpeeches tending to ſhew, That they liked no better of thoſe who ſought not by might and main to advance their buſineſſe, than of thoſe which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accuſed by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the ſteps of Philopœmen, and together with him, his ſon Polybius, who ſoon after was Generall of the Achæan horſe, but more notable by that excellent hiſtory which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably diſcharged. The ſum of the accuſation ſhould have been; That theſe were not hearty friends unto the Romans, but ſuch as abſtained from raiſing troubles, more for lack of opportunity than for any love to the common quiet. But ſince no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to ſuch a tale; it was thought better, for the preſent, to let it alone, & give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hoſtages; and found ſome in the Councell that approved the motion: as alſo among Polyb. Leg. 74.

the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garrisons bestowed in their towns. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions took effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriots; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thanks of their base flattery; rating them openly, in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accusations, and excuses: among which the Embassadours carryed themselves, as men that could beleeve none ill; though it were well enough known what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present war, unlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meet. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that standing on priviledge hereof, refused to fulfill every commandement, were numbred among the Patriots; which in the end of this war proved little better, if not worse, than to have been Traytors. The Senate was driven to set down this order, by reason of many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their subjects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redresse of injuries, or to offer their services: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a town of the lesser Asia, there was presented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flattery. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets, and a crown of gold, to bestow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the town Rome, and appointed anniversary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and the like vain men, that would be thought gods; or at the shamefull flattery of such as bestowed upon men, and not the most vertuous of men, divine honours; when he sees a town of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddesse; and receiving (without scorn of the givers, or shame of the Present) the title of Deity, at the gift of such a rascall City as Alabanda?

Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extreme difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The town of Dium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affairs in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassadour to Martius from the Achaans. Polybius his honest wisedome beneficiall to the Achaans. King Eumenes growes averse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman war. He sends Embassadours to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perseus loseth a mighty succour of the Bastarna, by his wretched parsimony.

AFter two years of the Macedonian war, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the war began; which had been thought likely to reform all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might prove, and thereupon to become wise for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius, & Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the

the other spent their time in vain, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admirals had so demeaned themselves, that many towns even of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman side; and the Army much lessened, not only by casualties of war, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himself (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licensing the souldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Consul, who succeeded unto Hostilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheless was more than he knew how to do; though he brought with him a strong supply of men. He began hotly to set the war on foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way: not seeking to force the straights that were surely guarded, but taking pains to climb the mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage over them, without help or need of any custody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, distributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit assent. But the Consul proceeded in his jorney: with hope, either not to be discovered by the Enemy, or to break through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as convenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him four thousand of his most expedit foot, to discover the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had sight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe piece of ground; and sent back word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountain, which gave scarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilest he, with the rest, fetcht a compasse about, and sought out wayes that never had been troden. Herein he found extreme difficulty: which notwithstanding he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make paths where none were, yea, where Nature might seem to have intended, that none should be. So steep he found the descent of the mountains, in this way which he took: that of seven miles, which they travelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves down; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rocks, that stood one over another, so upright, and cumbersome to get down; that their Elephants were affraid of that giddy prospect, and casting their governours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous journey; there was nothing more desired by the souldiers, than that they might be suffered to creep back again, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other sustained by two long posts, fastened in the ground below. Upon these two posts, or poles, (which indeed, not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turfe; that they might seem continent with the ground; so to make the beasts adventurous to go upon them. If there were a plain of any good extent from the foot of a rock, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of these; the posts upholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sink down unto the next bridge; whence he was conveyed in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the very bottome. Thus went they down sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appears, how throughly provided the

Romans used to be in their journeys, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable pains they took in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves and all their carriages down the mountains. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps never, should have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set upon him from aloft. The third and fourth dayes journeys were like unto the first: save that custome, and the nearnesse to their wayes end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men upon the passage, three dayes together; he lying so nigh, that he might welnear have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with fear; that he neither stirred to help his own men, or to hinder the Consull, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsell, sate hearkening after the event. Four only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it: the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seek any other way, must be fain to take such pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, save through the valley it self, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the foot of the huge mountain Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the River Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one half; the rest being such as might easily have been fortified. Besides all these, there was in the midst of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keep: where the spurs of the mountains, reaching far into the valley; drew near to the very banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep river which ran through it. Wherefore nothing had been more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could have seen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travell: but must needs have either perished for want of victuals, or been inforced to return the same way that he came, if the King had made good the straight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get down, it seems a matter of impossibility: especially considering how the enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that Kingdome had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to win. But the cowardize of Perseus did commend the counsell by them followed, as wise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe; than he fared like one out of his wits; saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all without battail. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haste; and straightwaies abandoned the Town. In the same vehemency of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire, and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drown the treasure, performed it as hastily as well as he could: though soon after, his master grew sorry for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the dammage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service, was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction; caused them both to be slain. Also those poor men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payed their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witnesse of the Kings base folly. Such end must they fear, who are privy to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would have gone surely to work, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally have behaved himself, that no man might beleeve him to be the author of any unworthy act or counsail. But his vertue was of no such capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had stopped the Consull on the top of the mountain) and Asclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed unto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to rejoyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes journey, and gotten one town that yeelded, he was compelled by meer lack of food for his men, to return back towards Thessaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessity, well appointed to have holpen him in the war: but having left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carryed the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lievtenants had been carefull to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those wayes only might corn be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corn, which was most desirously expected, he forsook Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountains: for otherwise it had been madnesse to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemy, he should be fain to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of war; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behooved him to have prosecuted the action.

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himself, understood his own error; sought to hide it by such poor means as have been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dis-mantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely used, would have been enough, not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace, but to have given him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war upon fair conditions, and not to begin again in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the town of Heraclea, standing on the River of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Dium, as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chief care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to make attempt upon the Sea-towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vain. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Town, were still put to the worse. As for the Town it self; there was danger in comming near it, either by land or Sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached unto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting sail from thence, ran along by Ænia, and Antigonea, (landing near to each of them; and both doing and receiving hurt) untill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty ships of War: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to try his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the town: which while the Romans were filling up, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence thence, for that it lay not upon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town-wall filled up with that earth, & covered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the town, by sapping the wals. To this work he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarm to the other side of the town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for joy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Captains within the town perceived what was done, and sallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they slew about sixe hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the town which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the mean while entring the town by sea) caused the siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his comming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admirall had laid siege to it, but to keep the land about it from spoil; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Meliboea; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lievtenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly over their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Camp on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Consull (whether dastardly, or carelesly) most unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harm befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining History of this war. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agesipolis their Embassador, who came to him at Heraclea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should do well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seek to finish the War. Now, although Polybius do most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet since he made shew of fear, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his fear seem not counterfeit. And so were the Rhodians moved to think of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honour of some victory, wherein he had lately slain great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated; though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his Army. For they found the Consul wanting meat, the Admiral wanting men, and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seem, that some blow had been taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had been driven from some of the Towns which they besieged.

Polyb. Legat. 80.

Polyb. Leg. 87.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaved himself like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdome, he dealt as a craftsmaster, with a restlesse working diligence. This indeed neither proved his sufficiency, nor commended his honesty: since thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit; and nevertheless out of envie, vain-glory, or such delight as weak and busie headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Country. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hostilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessaly; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriots among the Achæans, judged it expedient for their Nation to help the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree, which passed: That the Achæans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Army was levied: and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors unto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consull busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein soever it should be commanded. Martius took this very kindely; but said, That he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himself behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achæans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might do notable service, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plain reason. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achæans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius, musing, and unable to resolve, whether it were for love to the Achæans, that the Consul was so earnest in this business; or rather for envie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himself could do nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Councell touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own self, and those of his party. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to help Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessity of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, unlesse by speciall order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achæans were savers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himself ran into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years imprisonment. Polyb. Legat. 78.

Whether it were by the like policy of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in fear lest the fire, which he himself had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to oversway all other passions: it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as give any help to Martius: but comming to have joyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behinde him certain horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true, and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perseus his desire of accord, for meer desire of gain. And it might well be, that covetousnesse drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoever it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to solicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his advertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love between a King and a free city: that the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the help of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the help of Attalus; Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, assailed with help of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia; wich lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his war with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their war upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer; he began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised for his own part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remain a Neuter therein: and that for some greater qnantity of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would fain have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost; but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stir. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his fear urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by such accesse of strength to their party. Presently upon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take upon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the war to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gave an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vain glory of the Rhodians was throughly chastised; and more throughly should have been, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus, without laying out one ounce of silver. Now fain he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the War: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Gentius exhorted him daily to begin the War by land and sea, whilest the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed up with the seal of the Illyrians; but carryed by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands upon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessity to make war with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Clondicus a petty King, ten thousand horse and ten thousand foot of the Gaules, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them, desiring their Captains to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give their souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy Master, that the Gauls will not stir one foot further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon took counsell: if to utter his own opinion before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsell. He made an invective against the incivility and avarice of the Bastarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Five thousand horse of them he said would be as many as he should need to use; and not so many, that he should need to fear them. It had been well done, if any of his Counsellors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, since without any danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perræbia, into Thessaly: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselves with spoil, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they won any victory or not. This, and a great deal more, might have been alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had been with them before, was sent again, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmur of those many thousands that had been drawn so far to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now again, Whether he had brought the money along with him to pay those five thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifting excuses, the Bastarnæ returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this crafty messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his mony for the Romans, without diminishing the sum. But of this painfull Office he was very soon discharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteen dayes after his setting forth from Italy, brought the kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a king so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmylius Paulus the Consul. His journey. He forceth Perseus to discamp. He will not hazard battell with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Æmylius his superstition. The battell of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdome: which hastily yeelds to Æmylius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yeelds himself to the Roman Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Æmylius.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanyed with any danger, yet the indignity so moved them, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow Consull; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it upon him, than that so worthy a man was advanced to the dignity of a second Consulship. He refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; untill by Embassadours, thither sent to view the estate of the War, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly known to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not only to the Consull, but unto the Navie, and likewise to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which Ap. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much gravity and authority. He requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this war, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearsay, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the Battell of Canna, might well be living in some of their memories; which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the City being dispatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey, with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the war: though that he should finish it so soon & happily, was more than could have bin hoped or imagined. Ht came to Brundusium: whence, when the winde came fair, he set sail at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where having done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fifteen dayes remaining, in which he finished the war.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; having spared no labour of men & of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was foordable in dry weather: so as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of fresh water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea shore and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmylius found present remedy for this, by digging Wels on the shore; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shore that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking up his lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Towe of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessary to search another way: which by enquiry was soon found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perrhæbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a fair journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of work as had been their march over Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and ability to command. He had reformed, even at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the souldiers among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this enterprise; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own sons by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a son of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretians; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, upon the mountain, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance they might do notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darknesse took away their aim, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deal with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet; where victuals were provided for their journy: it being noised, that they were to run along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the country. All the way that they were passing the mountains (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fal of waters from the mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay wel-near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Æmylius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature mature had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vain. Yet Æmylius persisted as he had begun; & recontinued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonians, that some greater work was in hand: since otherwise a good Captain, as Æmylius was known to be, would not have troubled himself with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked only unto that which was before his eyes: untill his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the camp, that the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himself no lesse (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Camp was broken up, and a speedy retrait made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custody of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept untill the Romans came somwhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their arrowes and slings could do little service, were beaten at handy-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Martius in the year foregoing; but was closed up again, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunity.

Perseus was in an extreme doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Towns, and so to linger out the War: having been taught by the last years example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But far worse counsell prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearfull deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazzard of battell: fearing belike to put himself into any one Town, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even that same that Æmylius, or any invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen near unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemy; who stayed not long behinde him. As soon as the Romans had sight of the Kings Army; which with greater fear than discretion, had hasted away from them, forsaking the Camp that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to give battell immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Æmylius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Camp wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare ground whereon they trod. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himself unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battell, gave charge to have the Camp measured out and entrenched behinde the Army; whereinto, at good leisure, be fel back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himself by the backwardnesse of the enemy, who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Prætor, foretold unto the Consul, and with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipse of the Moon, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be known long before it was seen. It was the manner of the Romans, in such eclipses to beat Pans of Brasse, and Basons, as we do in following swarm of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moon great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpitius converted their superstition into admiration of his deep skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise

trariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses do signifie, or cause any alteration in civill affairs, and matters that have small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large More worthy of observation it is, how superstition captivates the wisdome of the wisest, where the help of true religion is wanting. Æmylius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this Moon, and congratulating with sacrifice her delivery, as soon as she shone out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion, yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for war, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrails of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victory to Æmylius: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their City, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deity; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrary to the rules of war.

Now concerning the Battel; Æmylius was throughly perswaded, that the king meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed at Pydna, when as, a little before, his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, & Æmilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the river, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank; whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countrimen seeing this, hasted to revenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slain him over the river. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battell, accordingly as the manner of his country, & the arms wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat levell, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully affoord. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the lesse marvell, that he durst adventure battell, since he had bethought himself of such a stratageme, whereby to save his own person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose unseasonable devotion could be no better than hypocrisie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battel, he found it no better than lost: and he, in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could do no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much astonished; that the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-borne; many of them slain, and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out averse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding is said to have rent his coat-armour for grief. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the battell, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty or almost the impossibility of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consull what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little use, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction given by Æmylius, when he saw the front of the enemies great battell become unequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequall resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailable against many small squadrons, as it had been formerly in the battell of Cynoscephalæ: yea this form of embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would break of it self; though here were little such inconvenience of ground, as had been at Cynoscephalæ. Chap. 4 §. 14.

Perseus, when he saw his battell begin to rout, turned his bridle presently, and ran amain towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poor foot, they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew above twenty thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost in that battell, only some fourscore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himself: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he fell to devising upon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella, he found his Pages and houshold servants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battell, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unseasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in fear, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief, he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians, more for love of his money than of him. To these he gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fifty talents, though shortly he cousened them of some part thereof; making shew as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the money. The third day after the battell he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Towne-men to fidelity, with tears: and his own speech being hindered by tears, appointed Evander to speak what himself would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chief care to look well to themselves. Upon the first fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their town of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainfull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bade Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himself and the treasure which he had there, in certain vessels that he found in the river Strymon, passed over the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live safe, by priviledge of the religious Sanctuary therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fell into the power of Æmylius, within so few daies after his victory. Pydna, which was neerest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About six thousand of the souldiers, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battell into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius, who had kept the passage over Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had been sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselves, and the Town of Beræa, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereaving the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna, stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Country: but opened their gates upon such termes, that the sack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Æmylius sent abroad into the Country, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: he himself marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he shall have more.

It was soon understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samothrace: his own letters to the Consull confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such mean condition, that his case was pityed, for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire favour: which though he begged in terms ill beseeming a King, yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that some might be sent to confer with him about matters of his present estate. Nevertheless, in this conference, he was marvellous earnest, that he might be allowed still to retain the name of King. And to this end it was, perhaps, that he had so carefully preserved his Treasure, unto the very last: flattering himself with such vain hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his desire to live at ease, and to be called King. Yea, it seems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the War, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for * such a paltry Iland; and for that he offered to lay up the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he findes it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessity, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is so far against his minde, that the conference breaks off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assayes, as well by terrible threats, as by fair language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for fear of imprisonment; he had now already imprisoned himself. When all would not serve, a question was moved to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, that Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof unlesse he can clear himself in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence borne to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himself is charged with the same crime. But what will this avail, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willeth Evander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans

mans hand; who are like to be presidents and overseers of this judgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander seems to like well: and either kils himself, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyson wherewith to end his life, is kiled by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had stuck to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, that the King hath lost the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm so much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from captivity; he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, unto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship, who easily was perswaded to waft the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carryed aboord by night; and the King himself, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip his elder son, who was only by adoption his son, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and over a mud wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilest Perseus was searching all along the shoar: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himself in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ran up and down making inquiry; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had given the custody of his children, delivered them up to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendered himself and made the Roman victory compleat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this war to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdome by arms, and himself by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have bin wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Æmylius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Æmylius used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a minde, made war upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearfull silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consull termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the people at Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectively entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Ælius.

* Plut. in vit. Æmil. Liv. lib. 45. Liv. lib. 42.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then known, was now translated unto Rome.

ABout the same time, and with like celerity, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anicius arested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drave him into * Scodra. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seem unpossible to be won, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Army before the wals, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were it seems, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired truce for three daies, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hands on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such meditation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison, where they were still alive. Having obtained three daies respite, he passed up a River, within half a mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caravantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scodra. He sent messengers craving accesse unto the Prætor before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yeelded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently given up. So this war ended in thirty daies: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, untill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon after their victory over Perseus.

NOw began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look tyrannically upon those that had been unmannerly toward them before, whilest the war with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their errand again. This they performed with a bad grace; saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this war was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Romans did congratulate with the Senate and people of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the City, beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion; and not to prosecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for fear, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a milde sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing war against Rhodes they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equall friends.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmylius himself made progresse through the Country; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias were slain at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redresse was such as requited not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he feasted like a King, with excessive chear; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to give order for setling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such cases; and some, to visit the affairs of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Æmylius and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by half. As for the rest, the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captive into Italy, with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Lawes of the Country were abrogated; and new given by Æmylius. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not subjects to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no better name than meer tyranny, yea, and shamelesse perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subjects; yet wanted there not colour, for using them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since only two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyranny. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deal more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong; (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspitiously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their service to the Romans; but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for fear of Rome, the season served fitly to rank the Achæans with the rest.

And

And hereto Callicrates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his fellowes should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. He said, that some of the chief among them, had with money and other means befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned; whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After sentence given (cryed out the whole assembly) what justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, we will soon condemn them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not untill he had cited above a thousand; willing them to appear and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the captivity of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause, than their love unto their Countrey; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure that vertue, and regard of the publick liberty, should dwel together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honesty had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that these men should return into Achaia. Neither could any solicitation of the Achæans, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; untill after seventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were inlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, that the whole Country of Epirus should be put to sack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischievous subtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to use the liberty bestowed upon them by the people of Rome; hee sent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of every City. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and sent along with them, into every of their Towns, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gave secret instructions to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed, they should fall to sack, every one the Town wherein to he was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and ten Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fifty thousand of that Nation made slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But since they among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already sent into Italy, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not only at the present in good obedience, but had even in this war done good service to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeve it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the lesse marvellous that God was pleased to make Æmylius childeless, even in the glory of his triumph, how great soever otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad, it will apear by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speak, we must say somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himself, and of his affairs about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The war of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

Antiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reign and life. He died the six and and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolemy Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Justine) of Jupiter. He left behind him three sons, Seleucus, Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Ptolemy Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sons; reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Josephus give him but seven. A Prince, who as he was slothfull by nature, so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his birth, Daniel gave this judgement, Et stabit in loco ejus vilissimus & indignus decore regio. Dan. 11. 21. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start up a vile person, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. 2 Mac. 3. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successour Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the books of the Maccabees take beginning. Which books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his story; nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother & successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaus (who died in the hundred threescore & seventeenth year of the Greeks in Syria) that first book treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Procœme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jason the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. 1 Mac. 12. It is also held by Jansenius, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Josephus addes, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws. Supra Eccl. 5.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers son.

Ptolemy Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven years King of Egypt.

Ptolemy Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt four and twenty year, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whileſt he was a childe. But they found ſuch other buſineſſe ere long with the Romans, as made them give over their unjuſt purpoſe; eſpecially Antiochus, who gave with his daughter in marriage, unto this Ptolemy, the Provinces of Cœloſyria, Phenice, and Judæa, which he had won by his victory over Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in thoſe parts. Nevertheleſſe, Ptolemy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater ſecurity. He left behinde him two ſons; this Ptolemy Philometor, and Ptolemy Phyſcon, with a daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom ſhe was caſt off, and her daughter taken in her ſtead. Such were the marriages of theſe Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemy Philometor, ſo called (that is, the lover of his mother) by a bitter nick-name, becauſe he ſlew her, fell into hatred with his ſubjects, and was like to be chaſed out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being ſet up againſt him. Phyſcon having a ſtrong party, got poſſeſſion of Alexandria; and Philometor held himſelf in Memphis, craving ſuccour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, ſought by all means poſſible to poſſeſſe himſelf of that Kingdome. He ſent Apollonius the ſon of Mneſthens Embaſſadour into Egypt, and under colour to aſſiſt the Kings Coronation, he gave him inſtructions to perſwade the governors of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew, with the principall places of that Kingdome, into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and deſire of his Nephews ſafety and well doing. And the better to anſwer all arguments to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he alongſt the coaſt of Syria to Joppe, and from thence on the ſudden he turned himſelf to-
2 Mac. 4. wards Jeruſalem; where, by Jaſon the Prieſt, (a Chaplain fit for ſuch a Patron) he was with all pomp and ſolemnity received into the City. For though lately, in the time of
2 Mac. 3. Seleucus, the brother and predeceſſour of Epiphanes, that impious Traytor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the treaſures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, was diſappointed of his wicked purpoſe by miracle from heaven; the ſaid Apollonius being ſtrucken by the Angell of God, and recovering again at the prayer of Onias: yet ſufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like ungodly practices. Preſently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jaſon, the brother of Onias, ſeeking to ſupplant his brother, and to obtain the Prieſthood for himſelf, offered unto the King three hundred and threeſcore talents of ſilver, 2 Mac. 4. with other rents and ſums of money. So he got his deſire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jaſon, and his being over-reached by another in the ſame kinde, cals to mind a by-word taken up among the Achæans, when as that miſchievous Callicrates, who had been too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his own condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burns more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more ſore,
One Hawk than other Hawks more ſwift does fly.
So one moſt miſchievous of men before,
Callicrates, falſe knave as knave might be,
Met with Menalcidas more falſe than he.

And even thus fell it out with Jaſon: who within three years after was betrayed, and overbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Prieſthood for himſelf: Jaſon thereupon being forced to flye from Jeruſalem, and to hide himſelf among the Ammonites.

From Jeruſalem Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of war, and to prepare a fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a 1 Mac. 1. 17. mighty army of land-forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horſemen, and with a great Navie, and moved war againſt Ptolemæus
V. 18, 19, 20, &c. King of Egypt; but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, & many were wounded to death. He wan many ſtrong Cities, and took away the ſpoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecy of Daniel. He ſhall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he ſhall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers fathers. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria ſo great a victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them ſo great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captains of Ptolomy, between Peluſium and the Hill Caſſius, after which he entred and ſackt the greateſt and richeſt of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In concluſion, after that Antiochus had ſmitten Egypt, he turned again, and went up towards Iſrael and Jeruſalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the golden Altar, and the Candleſtick for the light, and all the inſtruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the pouring Veſſels, and the Bolls, and the golden Baſons, and the Vail, and the Crowns, and the golden Apparrell. He took alſo the Silver, and the gold, and the precious Jewels, and the ſecret Treaſures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men. Dan.11.24. Hier.in Dan. Mac.1.1.c.1.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian war that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian buſineſſe. At what time he firſt laid claime to Cœloſyria, juſtifying his title by * the ſame allegations which his father had made; and ſtiffely averring, that this Province had not been conſigned over to the Egyptian, or given in dowrie with Cleopatra. Eaſie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, &c. preſſed him, by ſeverall Embaſſages, to ſome good concluſion. But his anſwer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolomies, then ſhould the war be preſently at an end; otherwiſe not. Yet when he ſaw, that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers conſume themſelves with inteſtine war than by the terrour of his arms, threatning deſtruction unto both of them, to put into them any deſire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the preſent; leaving the Ptolomies in very weak eſtate, the younger almoſt ruinated by his invaſion; the elder hated and forſaken by his people. Lib.6. * Cap.5.ſect.2. Polyb.Leg.81. 82.

But how weak ſoever theſe Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be ſo ſtrong that Antiochus might leave them to the proſecution thereof; and follow, at good leiſure, his other buſineſſe at Jeruſalem, or elſwhere. So after the ſack of Jeruſalem, he reſted him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to ſuppreſſe the Rebellion of the Thracians and others in thoſe parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his abſence he left one Andronichus, a man of great authority about him. In the mean while, Menelaus the brother of Simon, the ſame who had thruſt Jaſon out of the Prieſthood, and promiſed the King three hundred talents for an In-come, committing the charge of the Prieſthood to his brother Lyſimachus, ſtole certain Veſſels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he preſented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lievtenant, and ſold the reſt at Tyre, and other Cities adjoyning. This he did, as it ſeemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promiſed; the ſame being now by Soſtratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prieſt (formerly diſpoſſeſſed by Jaſon) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeal, and deteſting the ſacriledge of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himſelf into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a ſuburb to Antioch. In compaſſe it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, ſweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abuſed to luſt and other ſuch voluptuouſneſſe. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit himſelf to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim priviledge from the holineſſe of a ground conſecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not ſtand to diſcourſe. Onely I ſay for mine own opinion, that the inconvenience is far leſſe, to hold this book as Apocryphall, than to judge this fearfull ſhift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the book ſeems to do. As for this refuge, it could not ſave the life of the poor old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to ſlay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counſelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perſwaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; ſo he ſlew him incontinently without any regard of righteouſneſſe. Hereof Mac.2.4.

when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away
2 *Mac.*4.38. Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City; and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Onias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life time done Justice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolomy, a Traitor to Ptolomy Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death, who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outragious will, and not by any regard of justice: since he revenged the death of Onias, he slew
Verse 47. those that were in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should have been heard as innocent. By reason of such his unsteadiness, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble, or Illustrious.

2 *Mac.*5.1. After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seen throughout all the City of Jerusalem, forty dayes long, horsmen running in the aire with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troups of Horsmen set in array, encountring and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of God, all Histories have delivered us, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespatian, a Star in the form of a sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the city, after which there followed a slaughter like unto this of Epi-
*Plin.l.2.c.*57. phanes, though far greater. In the Cymbrian wars, Pliny tells us, that Armies were seen fighting in the aire from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountain poured out blood in stead of water, in or neer the City of Genoa; soon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, Mercur. Vipera de Prodig. lib.8 Vipera de prisco & sacro instituto. with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, took end; whereof this notable signe gave warning.

Sutton Galba. When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her arms a white Hen, holding a Laurell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Laurell branch to be planted: of the Hen came a fair increase of white Poultrie; and from the little branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Laurell: so that afterwards, in all triumphs, the Conquerours did use to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the triumphs ended, to set it again in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they hapned to wither, to fore-shew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeer of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken down with lightning. That the Jews did not think such strange signes to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling upon God, and praying, that these tokens might turn to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning; so was this second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomy being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Uncle; thought it the best way to seek entrance into that royall City, rather by perswasion than by arms. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former siége: the Alexandrines, though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worse to live in scarcity of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Country; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor, in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the fear wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a strong Garrison in Pelusium: retaining that City, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne own use. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the news of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre upon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his land Army into Cœlosyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolemy. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Army. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition; than that Ptolemy should surrender into his hands, together with the City of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For answer unto these demands, he set down a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemy in Arabia, as in Egypt it self; for Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to resist him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria, passed on thitherwards by easie journies.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long ago. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a civil warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gave signification, that it would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, or would not do; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in need of helpe against their Uncle, who prepared and made open war against them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had been sustained with food from Egypt, in the war of Hannibal; when Italie lying waste, had neither corn nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnes, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like helpe had Rhodes been defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turns, which that bountiful house of the Ptolemyes had done for sundry people abroad; ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requital: but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeer since: but their Embassadours lay still in Rome. Of the Achæans they desired in particular, that Lycortas the brave warriour might be sent unto them, as General of all the Auxiliaries, and his son Polybius, General of the Horse. Hereunto the Achæans readily condescended: and would immediately have made performance, if Callicrates had not interposed his mischievous art. He whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnes to the Romans; or much rather envying those noble Captaines whose service the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such smal numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding unto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (he said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such business, as might make them the less able to yeeld unto the Romans what help soever should be required in the Macedonian war. And in this sentence, he, with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with big words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius

the late Consul had signified unto him, that the Romans were past all need of help: adding further, that a thousand foot and two hundred horse, might well be spared to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to perform any service to the Romans; for as much as the Achæans could without trouble, raise thirty or forty thousand Souldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theater where the Assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius: whereby the Achæans were desired to conform themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadors to set Egypt in peace. This was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace; but as in a time of greater business elswhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the Achæans should do any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends durst not gaine-say the Roman Councel; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distress; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadour, sent from the Roman Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto those Embassadours of Physcon and Cleopatra: which having stayed more than a whole yeer in the City, brought nothing of their business to effect until now. The Embassadors delivered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no less than his brother and sister.

In this ambassage of Ptolemie, now requesting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune,, from such as it had been before three or four yeers last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian War; either he, or Eulæus, or Lenæus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to set upon Antiochus for Cœlosyria, but would have interposed himself between the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to live under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subjects, he might have seemed to stand in no need of such protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to save both his kingdom & life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister shewed it self, even in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. Thus they entered into the Senate, and there fell, groveling and prostrate, upon the floor, Their garments were not so mean and mournful, nor their looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pittiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly & faithful to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favored this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-dray his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or used any delay; then should Ptolemy and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repaire to Rome, with shamful dishonour to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extream dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

Polib. leg. 72.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours to determine and end the war between those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolemy, and then Antiochus, and

to

to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased, and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, took their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Army over Lustne, some forty miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper, willing him to read those Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after he had stayed and pawsed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatsoever the Senate shall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition, even in such manner as * Daniel had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Jerusalem after his return; like as if these things had rather been historified than foretold by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed a while, and setled the kingdome of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus, which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian ships.

Dan. 11. 29, 30, &c.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bin well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his natural condition, & to give good language to the Achæans and Ætolians, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse used any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory over Perseus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers kingdome for himself; for it should surely be given him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithfull counsell of Stratius a Physitian; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had bin sent, recounting his own services done to the Romans in the late war, * where withall he forgat not to make of his brother as good mention mention as he could: and finally, requested, That the Towns of Ænus and Maronea

*Polyb. Leg. 93. might be bestowed upon himself. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they used singular magnificence.
Polyb. ibid. Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilest he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Ænus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Enmenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had laid open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his own doors. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertain him as a friend, was more then their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had been at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For, entring into the Senate, he lay down, and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and saviours; as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of slaves newly manumised, professing himself an enfranchised bondman of the people of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himself safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had been charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made to have some Towns added to his kingdom: whereto, because the grant would have bin unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leisure to devise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanissa himself was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his sons, to congratulate the victory over Perseus; and offered to come thither himself, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his son rewarded; and he entreated to stay at home.

Cetys the Thracian sent Embassadors to excuse himself touching the aide by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to intreat, That his son, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at liberty, for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since he had voluntarily obliged himself to Perseus, by giving hostages without necessity: Yet was his sonne given back to him ransome-free; with admonition, to carry himself better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay between Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in fair terms.

As for those unhappy Kings Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Æmylius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suit to Æmylius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but he still received one scornfull answer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himself. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercy than he found, he would rather have sought his death in Macedon, than to have bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemency, whereof Æmylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his fellow King, had been led in chains through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do sacrifice, he should command the captives to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and misery of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Perseus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either famished himself, or (for it is diversly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custody; and so dyed for want of sleep. Of his sons, two died; it is uncertain how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such poverty ended the Royall house of Macedon: and it ended on the sudden; though some eight-score years after the death of that Monarch, unto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had known it before, that his own son should one day be compelled to earn his living by handi-work, in a painfull Occupation; it it like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soveraignty have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most undertroden wretches, are all subject unto the One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsel, Do as ye would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertain that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly:

——v v——Et qui nolunt occidere quenquam Juven. sat. 10.
Posse volunt.——

Even they that have no murdrous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most have a vain desire of ability to do evill without controll: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their own hurt. For who sees not that a Prince, by racking his Soveraign authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own person) some one of his own sons or nephews to root up all his progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearnesse in bloud, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole house, yet reigning over all? the untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expectiug till they offend, are too good proofs hereof. Hereunto may be added, that the heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second, was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heir apparent to the Crown of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such examples of the instability whereto all mortall affairs are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitory gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evill that may fall on their own posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That * God is the surest and sharpest Schoolemaster that can be devised, for such Kings, as think this world ordained for them, without controlement to turn it upside-down at their pleasure.

* The true Law of free Monarchies.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus, it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own person, that was led along therein, as part of his own spoyls; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carryed by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth, untill the civill wars which followed upon the death of Julius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have been hindered by the souldiers; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one dyed five dayes before the Triumph; the other three dayes after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity; since the joy of his victory was requited with his own private calamity, in stead of the publique.

Chap. 3. §. 4.

About the same time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their severall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall City, or offering to visit her, and do their duties in person; were enow to say unto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take upon thee the Majesty that thy deserts have purchased.

BY this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted up, or cut down all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which have been preserved, and yet remain among us; and withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men have complained against infidelity, Time, Destiny, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instability of Fortune. To these undertakings, these great Lords of the world have been stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so is it to the dead of no use at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stolen out of the world without noyse, than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and cruelty: by giving in spoyle the innocent and labouring soul to the idle and insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath been no State fearfull in the East, but that of the Turk: for in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpred his wings far over his neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themſelves Maſters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treaſures of both Indies, & by the many kingdoms which they poſſeſs in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerful. But as the Turke is now counterpoiſed by the Perſian, ſo in ſtead of ſo many Millions as have been ſpent by the the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a defenſive war, and in diverſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand pound continued but for two yeers, or three at the moſt, they may not only be perſwaded to live in peace, but all their ſwelling and overflowing ſtreams may be brought back into their natural channels and old banks. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent, and to be regarded; the one ſeeking to root out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the truth and ſincere profeſſion thereof; the one to joyn all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spaine.

For the reſt, if we ſeek a reaſon of the ſucceſſion and continuance of this boundleſs ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already ſaid; That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them the actions, but not the ends of thoſe great Ones which preceeded them. They are always tranſported with the glory of the one, but they never minde the miſery of the other, till they finde the experience in themſelves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counſel of Death, upon his firſt approach. It is he that puts into man all the wiſdom of the world, without ſpeaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promiſes, or threats, doth infuſe. Death, which hateth and deſtroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is alwayes deferred. I have conſidered (ſaith Salomon) all the works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of ſpirit: but who believes it till Death tels it us? It was Death, which opening the conſcience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyn his ſon Philip to reſtore Navarre; and King Francis the firſt of France, to command that juſtice ſhould be done upon the Murderers of the Proteſtants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can ſuddenly make man to know himſelf. He tels the proud and inſolent, that they are but Abjects, and humbles them at the inſtant; makes them cry, complaine, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepaſſed happineſs. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggers a naked begger, which hath intereſt in nothing, but in the gravel that fils his mouth. He holds a Glaſs before the eyes of the moſt beautiful, and makes them ſee therein their deformity and rottenneſs; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, juſt, and mighty Death! whom none could adviſe, thou haſt perſwaded what none have dared, thou haſt done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only haſt caſt out of the world and deſpiſed: thou haſt drawn together all the far ſtretched greatneſs, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with theſe two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Laſtly, whereas this Book, by the title it hath, cals it ſelf, The firſt part of the General Hiſtory of the World, implying a ſecond and third Volume; which I alſo intended, and have hewn out; beſides many other diſcouragements, perſwading my ſilence; it hath pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whoſe unſpeakable and never enough lamented loſs hath taught me to ſay with Job, Verſa eſt in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To The Reader.

The use of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annalls, yeerly set down all occurrences not cohærent. This here following, may serve as an Index to the present part of this work, pointing unto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far dis-joyned in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be. For howsoever the yeers of the first Patriarchs may seem to have been well-neer compleat, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we finde many fractions, and the last yeer, or yeers, of one King reckoned also as the foremost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other, though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the yeer, which were in use among sundry Nations, causing the * Sommer moneths, in processe of some ages, to fall into the winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to choose out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alledged, in excuse of such errour, as a more intentive and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serve to free the book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errours of the Presse, in the numbring of yeers, but for some hastie mis-reckonings of mine own, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [Rome / Nabonassar] there do the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. yeer from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jehosaphat began his reign in the 3774. of the Julian Æra, in the 3092. of the world, and in the 99. yeer of the Temple. This needs not more illustration, nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kinde. To avoid prolixity, I have forborn to insert those yeers, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings reign; some change of Government; some battell fought, or the like. So of the 13. yeers wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note onely the first, that is, omitting all between the 4. of Jehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram first reigned with Jehosaphat his father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a page with 12. lines of idle ciphers, numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and the 17. of Jehosaphat. In setting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in rank of those that reigned in his countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeer of his reign; at the end or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of yeers in which he reigned, in the spaces following underneath, are those yeers of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeer of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be understood, that the same yeer belonged not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more of his foregoers: as the first yeer of Jehoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So where two or three names are found in one space, as in the 3077. yeer of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, it is meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same yeer, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the reigns of the Egyptian Kings, are set down the yeers of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise otherwhiles, the day, the moneth, upon which Nabonassar's yeer began, which, how it varied from other yeers, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concer-

To the Reader.

Concerning the Æra, or account of yeers, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the book it self: so as it remaineth onely to note, that under the title of Olympiads, is set down, first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeer of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reign in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeer thereof.

Now, for that the yeers of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsommer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painfull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columns, opposing part of the one yeer to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more troublesom than usefull, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to observe, that howsoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. yeers elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reign of some King may have begun at such a time of the yeer as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficulty. One familiar example will explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17. of November, in the yeer of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw down Images, and reformed many things in religion, all in her first yeer, yet not all in that yeer 1558. but the greater part in the yeer following, whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table, but so, as the difference is never of a whole yeer.

The Julian Period, which I have placed as the greater number, over the yeers of the World, was delivered by that honourable, and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian yeers, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980. yeers, which result from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the yeers of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present yeer, or if no fraction remain, it shews the last yeer of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battell of Cannæ, the Prime or golden number was 14. the Cycle of the Sun, 18. and consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the present accompt, alwaies exceeds the yeers of the world by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeer, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position. More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in works of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
