The Rigging being ill-contriv'd, the ordering of it takes up a great deal of Time; wherefore the Chinese, to save Trouble, let the Sail flap to and fro during a Calm. It is easy to see that the enormous Weight of this Sail, join'd to that of the Wind, which acts upon the Mast as upon a Lever, would drive the Prow under Water, if they had not prevented this Inconvenience by their Method of stowing; for they load Vessels much more behind than before, to counter-balance the Force of the Wind: hence it happen'd, that when they were at Anchor, the Prow was all above Water, while the Stern lay very deep under it. Indeed there is this Advantage in the Largeness of their Sail, and its Situation upon the Fore-castle, that they proceed very swiftly, when steering right before the Wind; nay, can, if we believe them, keep up with our best Sailors, and even leave them behind. But then with a quarterly or Side-Wind they cannot hold it, and are driven out of their Course: not to mention the Danger they are in of being turn'd about, when they are surpriz'd with a sudden Flurry of Wind.

In fine Weather they carry'd, besides a Sprit-Sail and a Top-Sail, a Driver, (which was plac'd on the Side of the Sail that had no Braces) Bonnet-Sails, or Drabblers, and a square Sail on the Mizzen-mast; all of them made of Callicoe.

The Stern was cleft in the middle to make Room for the Rudder, to lie in a kind of The Stern Chamber, which shelter'd it from the beating of the Sea in stormy Weather. This Chamber was form'd by the two sides of the Poop, which leaving a large Opening outwards, approach'd nearer within, and form'd an acute Angle, the Point whereof was cut off, to give the Rudder sufficient Room to play.

This Rudder hung by two Cables, the two ends of which were wound about a Capstan The Rudder, plac'd on the highest part of the Stern, in order to raise or lower it, as Occasion serv'd; then two other Cables (A) passing under the Vessel, were carry'd up to the Fore-part of the Prow, where they were kept tight also by the help of a Capstan, and when slacken'd serv'd in place of the Hinges, by which ours are fasten'd to the Stern-post. To augment the Force of the Steersman, the Rudder had a Whipstaff, seven or eight Foot long, but without either a Handle or Pulley: there were also fasten'd four Tacklings, two to each Side of the Vessel, and one of each Couple was turn'd several times over the end of the Whipstaff, to enable the Steersman to keep the Rudder in its proper Position.

A Rudder made after this manner can scarcely be felt by a large Vessel; partly because the Ropes, by whose means it communicates its Motion, easily stretch, but chiefly by reason of its continual Wabbling, occasion'd by the incessant Trembling of those Ropes: from whence arises another Inconvenience, namely, that there is all the Difficulty in the World to keep the Vessel steady on the same Rumb. They have begun to make Soma, which the Portuguese call Meslissas, because they fix Rudders to them after the European manner, without varying in other Respects from the Chinese form of Building. The King of Siam had some of them made, carrying seven or eight hundred Tun each, which were much the largest that ever were seen of the sort.

The Pilot made no use of a Mariner's Compass, but steer'd his Course by a Card of a very simple make. The Rim of the Box was divided into twenty four equal parts, which mark'd the Points or Winds, and were plac'd upon a Bed of Sand; which did not serve so much for laying them soft and secure against the Agitation of the Vessel, which every Moment destroy'd the Equilibrium of the Needle, as to hold the Pastils, wherewith they perfum'd them incessantly. But this was not the only Regale these Compasses received from the superstitious Chinese, who look'd upon them as sure Guides in their Voyage; for their Blindness was so exceeding great as to offer them Victuals by way of Sacrifice.

The Pilot took great Care to furnish his Binocle well with Nails, by which it appears how unskilful this Nation is in Navigation. The Chinese are affirm'd to be the first Inventors of the Mariner's Compass, but if this be true, they have made little Advantage of it. They directed the Head of the Ship to the Rumb they design'd to steer upon, by the help of a Silken Thread, which divided the Surface of the Card in two equal parts, from North to South. This they perform'd in two different manners: for Instance, to sail North-East, they put this Rumb parallel to the Keel of the Ship, and then turn'd the Vessel about, till the Needle became parallel to the String; or else, which comes to the same thing, putting the Thread parallel to the Keel, they made the Needle point to the North-West. The Needle of the largest Compass was not above three Inches long; at one end there was a kind of Flower-de-Luce, and a Trident at the other. They were all made at Nanga saki [in Japan.]

The Bottom of the Hold was divided into five or six large Chambers, separated by strong The Hold. Wooden Partitions. Instead of a Pump they had only a Well at the Foot of the Main-mast, from whence they drew the Water with Buckets. Tho' the Sea ran very high, and the Vessel was deeply laden, yet thro' the Strength of its Planks, and Goodness of its caulking, it scarce let in any Water.

This Caulk is a kind of Composition of Lime, Oil, or rather Rosin, which distils from the Tree call'd Tong shu, [see p. 9] and Ockam of Bambú. The Lime is the principal Ingredient, and when the Stuff is dry, one would take it for Lime, and nothing else. This sort of Caulking, besides being more cleanly, is free from that loathsome Smell of Tar, which reigns on board our Ships, and is intolerable to those who are not accustom'd to it. But there is a still more considerable Advantage in this sort of Caulking, in regard their Ships are thereby secur'd against Accidents of Fire, which ours are expos'd to by the Pitch and Tar.

(A) These two Cables, I suppose, were fasten'd to the lower end of the Rudder.

Anchors.

The Anchors were of Wood, except the Sheet-Anchor, whose Flukes were cover'd with Plates of Iron.

All the Tackling, as well as the Cables, are made of Ratan Cane, or of Hards of the Cocoa-Tree, call'd by the Portuguese, Cairo.

Ship's Crew, and Officers.

The Ship's Crew consisted of forty seven Persons, including the Officers. The Pilot had nothing to do but to set the Compass, and appoint the Course; the Steersman directed the working of the Ship; and the Captain provided Necessaries for the Men without giving himself any farther Trouble: and yet every thing was done with surprizing Readiness. This Harmony proceeds from the Interest that the Crew has to preserve the Ship; every one having a Share in the loading (B). The Officers and Sailors, instead of receiving any Pay, have the Liberty of putting a certain Quantity of Merchandizes on Board the Vessel, where each has his particular Apartment; the Space between the Decks being divided into different Cabbins. In short, it may be said in general, that the Chinese are diligent, attentive, and laborious, wanting nothing but a little Experience to make them very good Sea Men.

Of the Money which, at different Times, has been current in China.

Gold a Commodity in China.

ONLY two sorts of Metals, viz. Silver and Copper, are current in China, to purchase Necessaries, and to carry on Trade. Gold is on the same Footing as precious Stones in Europe, for it is bought like other Merchandize, and the Europeans, who traffic there, make considerable Profit by dealing in it.

Silver not coin'd but cut into Bits.

Money-Scales.

As for Silver, it is not coin'd as in Europe, but is cut into bits, great or small as Occasion requires; and its Value is rated by the Weight, not the Prince's Image. They generally carry about them, in a neat japann'd Case, a pair of small Scales, not unlike the Roman Balance. It is compos'd of a little Plate, an Ivory or Ebony Beam, and a Weight. The Beam, which is divided into minute Parts on three sides, is suspended by Silken Strings at one of the ends, in three different Points, that they may more easily weigh things. This sort of Ballance is exceeding exact, for any Money from fifteen or twenty Taels down to a Sous, and less, may be weigh'd therein, with so great Nicety, that the thousandth Part of a Crown will sensibly turn the Scale.

Standard of Silver and its different Alloys.

Their Silver is not equally fine: but as we fix the greatest Degree of finest for Gold at twenty four Carats, they divide their Alloy into one hundred parts, which is the Degree of the finest Silver. However one meets with Silver, from ninety to an hundred Parts; also some of eighty Parts: but this is reckon'd the basest Alloy, and will not pass unless the Weight be augmented, till it amounts to the Value of that which is current in Trade.

Cutting their Silver very inconvenient in retail Trade.

The Ingots, which are the finest Silver, are us'd only in paying large Sums. The Chinese are very skilful in judging at Sight of the finest of Silver, and are scarcely ever mistaken. The Difficulty is to make use of the Ingots, in the Retail way: for sometimes they are forc'd to put it in the Fire, and beat it thin with a Hammer, in order to cut it more easily into little Bits, and give the Price agreed upon; whence it happens that they are always longer in making the Payment than the Purchase. They own it would be more convenient to have, as in Europe, Money of a fix'd Value, and determinate Weight: but then they say the Provinces would swarm with Clippers and Coiners, whereas that Inconvenience is not to be fear'd, while they cut the Silver, in order to pay for what they buy. As in cutting it so often, it is hard to avoid losing some small Particles, so you will see poor People very busy in gathering and washing the Dirt, that is thrown out of the Shops into the Streets, the Trifle they find being sufficient to subsist them.

Copper Money.

Copper Money is the only Sort that has any Characters stamp't thereon, and is of Use in Retail Business: these are small round pieces or Deniers, with a hole in the Middle, which they put on Strings by hundreds, to the number of a thousand. The Metal is neither pure nor hammer'd. Ten of these pieces go to a Sous, ten Sous make the tenth part of a Chinese Crown, call'd Lyang, and, by the Portuguese, Taels, which are in Value about a hundred Sous of French Money. These small pieces have been the current Money of China in all times; and the Curious preserve some that were coined in the Reigns of the most ancient Emperors, and have either pass'd from Family to Family, or have been found in the Ruins of Cities and Palaces.

(B) I am rather of Opinion this Harmony is owing to that great Law of Submission, Industry, and Good Nature, ingrafted in the Minds of the Chinese, above all other People. See p. 51, 278, and elsewhere.

Ancient Coin called Pi and Tau.

Certain Coins, concerning which the common People in progress of time entertained Superstitious notions.

The coin of different Dynasties.

What I am going to relate, is taken from an ancient Book, concerning Coins, the Author Extraft from an Author, concerning Coin. of which lived under the Dynasty of the Song: it was sent to me by P. Dentrecolles. He treats of the Matter and Form of Coins, their Inscriptions, Value, and the Dynasties in which they were current: he then speaks of uncertain Money, that is, Money, the Time of whose Currency is unknown; foreign Coin introduc'd by Trade; and lastly, the superstitious Coins, or those, concerning which, in Process of Time, the People thro' Folly have entertain'd certain superstitious Notions.

The Word Tsyen, which was formerly us'd to express what we call Money, properly Chinese Name for Money. signifies The Water of a Fountain that runs without ceasing, and figuratively, that sort of Metal which continually passes from Hand to Hand: but for a long time past, they have given it the Name of Tsyen; thus they say, Tong-tsyen, Copper Money; In-tsyen, Silver Money; for so they term at Kan-tou the Piafters and French Crowns.

The Copper us'd for this small Coin being not pure, as I said before, but always mix'd, Copper Coin not pure. the pieces of a good Alloy have four parts of Lead to six parts of Copper; which Mixture is the Cause that the red Copper loses its Colour, as well as Sound, and the Money made of it, tho' thick, may be easily broken with one's Fingers. These pieces serve for trifling Expences; but if the Sum laid out be any thing considerable, they give them Strung, in form of a Chaplet or Beads, each containing a thousand.

The Time was when Gold and Silver Coin were current in China, as well as Copper. The Gold and Silver Coin formerly. Chinese Author cites an ancient Book, which asserts that under the Reign of Yu, Founder of the first Dynasty, call'd Hya, Gold, and Silver, and Copper were in use; and that under other Dynasties there were Emperors, who permitted the Use of foreign Pieces of Gold and Silver, throughout their Dominions.

There was also Money made of Tin, Lead, Iron, and even bak'd Earth, on which Figures Money of other Metals, and of Earth. and Characters were stamp'd. It is reported, that after the Reign of the Han, a certain Prince caus'd Money to be made of seal'd Earth, compacted with a strong Glew; and taking a Fancy to put down Copper Money, he gather'd as much as he possibly could, amounting to a prodigious Quantity, and burying it very deep in the Earth, caus'd the Workmen employ'd therein to be slain, that none might know where it was hidden.

Certain little Shells, call'd Pwey in China, and Koris in the Kingdom of Bengal, have like- Koris Shells. wise serv'd for small Money, [or Change] several of them going for one of the Copper Pieces: but they did not continue long in use.

With respect to the Form of Money, it has been of different Figures, under different Present Chinese Money round. Reigns. Since the time of the preceeding Dynasty, the Copper Pieces have always been round, and with a square Hole in the Middle: which Hole is edg'd with a Border, rising a little, and was made, that they might be strung, and carry'd about, ready told by thousands; every hundred being separated by a String twisted about the last Piece. It appears from the History of the Dynasty of the Han, which is very ancient, that in those Ages the Money was pierc'd in the same manner.

According to ancient Authors, besides the round Money, there were current, in the Beginning of the first Dynasty, some call'd Tau, which signifies a Cutlasi, as having been of that Shape: Ancient Money of various Forms. Another sort resembl'd the Back of a Tortoise, and for this Reason was nam'd Quey; Lastly, others term'd Pu, were of an extraordinary Form, as represented in the Plate. The round Money was commonly an Inch or an Inch and an half Diameter, and some was twice as large. That call'd Pu and Tau, was five Inches long, and seem to have resembl'd the Cupans of Japan: But, tho' pierc'd on the Top, it was very inconvenient for Use, and on that account was put down.

At one time there were Pieces so small, that they were call'd Geese Eyes; and so thin, that Coin of the Song. they swam on the Water, and in handling were in Danger of been broken. It requir'd no less than ten thousand of them to buy a Measure of Rice, sufficient to subsist a Man for ten Days. The first appear'd under the Song, and did not continue long in Use, because People refus'd to take them in the way of Trade.

Under the first Dynasty of the Tang, the Banks of the Yellow River having tumbld down, Coin of the three first Dynasties. the Emperor was inform'd that there were found three thousand three hundred Pieces of Money with three Feet; the Characters impress'd thereon were defac'd, and the Earth had eaten into them. This so very ancient Coin was doubtless current under the first Dynasties of the Hya, Shang, and Chow: for the Emperors of those Times kept their Court not far from that great River.

But what Mark or Inscription is on this Money? That of Europe is stamp'd with the Head None stamp'd with the Emperor's Image. of the Prince; but in China it is otherwise. According to the Genius of that Nation, it would be deem'd indecent and disrespectful to the Majesty of the Prince, for his Image to be perpetually passing thro' the Hands of Dealers, and the Dreggs of the People.

The Inscriptions on their Coin are commonly the pompous Titles given by the reigning Usual Inscriptions. Princes, to the different Years of their Reign: as for Instance, The Eternally Shining; The Supremely Peaceful; The Magnanimous, &c. The Learned are not deceiv'd by these Inscriptions, so as to take every new Title for a new Emperor; as some Europeans, unacquainted with the Customs of the Empire, have done, and by that means multiply'd the Number of the Emperors. The late Kang-bi is perhaps the only Monarch, who, throughout one of the longest Reigns, never affected to assume such Titles.

Other Marks on Coins.

On other Money may be seen the Names of the reigning Family, of the Tribunal that presides over the Mint, or of the City where it was coin'd. Some are mark'd with the Value set upon them by the Prince: such, for Instance, as Pwan lyang, which signifies half a Taël. There is another sort, whose Inscription is singular enough, consisting of these four Characters: Quey yu ching ti, that is, Money has its Run, and at length returns to the Emperor. With Regard to the Characters on the ancient Money, such as the Pá and Tau, they are difficult to explain; The most skilful Chinese ingeniously confessing that they can neither understand nor read them.

Figures.

Some of the ancient Coin being cover'd with Figures, are suppos'd to have been current in the earliest Ages; and that, to avoid the Labour and Expence, they afterwards were content with more simple Devices, such as Characters are. There are three sorts of them engraven, consisting of a Mixture of Silver and Tin. One of them, which is round, and weighs eight Taëls, represents a Dragon in the midst of Clouds; on another, which is of a square Form, and weighs six Taëls, there is a Horse galloping; the third is oblong and shap'd like the Back of a Tortoise, with the Word Vang, that is, King, in every Compartment of it: this last weigh'd but four Taëls.

A certain Author attributes the Invention of this Money to Cbing-tang, Founder of the Dynasty of the Sbang; the Characters on the Reverse were defac'd. The Chinese give a mysterious Sense to these Figures: The Tortoise, say they, signifies those who are attach'd to the Earth; the Horse, such as are less wedded to it, and rise above it from Time to Time; and the flying Dragon represents those who are intirely disingag'd from earthly Things. There are other ancient Coins to be found, stamp'd with Dragons; doubtless, because the Dragon is the Symbol of the Chinese Nation, as the Eagle was of the Roman.

It is hard to assign what was the just Value of this ancient Money: tho' in my Opinion it ought to be determin'd by the Nature and Weight of the Metal. It is true that Regard has not always been had to that Rule; The Princes, who fix the Value, having often rais'd or lower'd it, as their own Occasions requir'd, or the particular Species grew scarcer.

Chinese
Weights.

But for the better understanding the Value of Money, whether ancient or modern, it must be observ'd, that the Chinese Pound, call'd Lyang, is sixteen Ounces; the Lyang nam'd by the Portuguese Taels, is divided into ten Parts, call'd by the Chinese Tsyen, and by the Portuguese Maz; the Tsyen or Maz are divided into ten Ficen, which are equivalent to ten French Sous; and the Fwen or Sous is divided into ten Li of Silver. The Beam of the Chinese Scales carries these Divisions no farther; and yet with respect to Gold or Silver of a considerable Weight, the Division is more minute, and almost extends to imperceptible Parts: for which Reason it is scarce possible to convey a just Idea of them in our Language. They divide the Li into ten Wha, the Wha into ten Se, the Se into ten Fú, the Fú into ten Chin, the Chin, which signifies a Grain of Dust, into ten Yay, the Yay into ten Myau, the Myau into ten Mo, the Mo into ten Tsyun, and the Tsyun into ten Sun.

Value of the
uncertain.

This being known, it will be yet impossible to ascertain the just Value of the ancient Coin: for tho' the Weight is mark'd thereon, some of them pass'd for much more than their intrinsic Value came to. There was a Time when the Scarcity of Species oblig'd the Emperor to raise the Value of the very small Copper Pieces so excessively, that one of them was worth ten of the same sort, current in former Times. This has often occasion'd popular Tumults, because the Merchants rais'd the Price of Commodities in Proportion.

This Scarcity of Species happen'd either thro' the sudden Irruption of Foreigners, who loaded whole Barks with this Coin, and carry'd it away; or else thro' the Cautiousness of People, who bury'd it in time of War, and dy'd without discovering where it was hid. Copper was once so scarce, that the Emperor caus'd near fourteen hundred Temples of Fa, to be demolish'd, and all the Copper Images to be melted down in order to coin them into Money: at other times the People have been strictly prohibited the Use of any Vessels or other Utensils of Copper, and oblig'd to deliver them in at the Mint.

Paper Money
Ming.

Matters were carry'd still farther in the Beginning of the Reign of Hong-wú, Founder of the twenty second Dynasty, call'd Ming, when Money was become so very scarce, that they paid the Mandarins and Soldiers partly in Silver and partly in Paper; giving them a Sheet of Paper seal'd with an Imperial Seal, which pass'd for a thousand little Copper Pieces, or a Taël of Silver. These Sheets are yet much sought after, by such as build, who hang them up as a Rarity to the chief Beam of the House; the People and even some of the Quality being so simple as to imagine, that it preserves it from all Misfortunes.

and the Fwen.

Such Money as this could not have any great Run; Shop Keepers could never consent to give their Commodities for a Scrap of Paper: So that the Quarrels, Law Suits, and other Inconveniences, which happen'd every Day, oblig'd the Emperor to put it down.

It had been introduc'd before with as little Success under the Dynasty of the Yuen: but Marco Polo is mistaken in affirming, in the eighteenth Chapter of his second Book, that the Bark of the Mulberry-Tree was employ'd to make the Paper which compos'd this Money; for such Trees are too precious to be destroy'd by the Chinese. In effect it was made of the Bark of the Ká-chú, a Tree of little Value, and full of Pith like the Elder, whereof they make a stronger Paper than that of Bambú.

Money,
where coin'd.

The Copper Money is not hammer'd as in Europe, but cast, and is coin'd no where at present but at Court. Formerly indeed Money was coin'd at twenty two several Places, but then there there was an express Order for it from the Emperor; and even at a Time when there were Princes so powerful that, not contented with the Quality of Duke, they assumed the Title of Kings, yet none of them ever durst claim the Right of coining: the Money current in their Dominions, having always born the Emperor's Mark, however weak his Authority might have been.

It is easy to judge that there would be many Debasers of Money in China; if the Silver was coin'd as well as Copper, since their small Pieces of Copper are so often counterfeited. The Chinese, who follow this Trade, stamp the false Coin with the same Characters that are upon the true, but neither the Metal nor the Weight is so good. If they happen to be detected they ought to be put to Death by the Law: and yet some Princes have been contented with ordering the Hand to be cut off, others, with banishing the Offender; nay, in the Time of extraordinary Scarcity of this small Money, some have wink'd at the counterfeit Coin, till it has been dispersed all over the Empire, and then confiscating it, have put it upon the same Foot with the Imperial Money. As the very small Pieces are no longer current, such as have any of them beat them out with a Hammer, till they are as broad as the Pieces now in Use; and being put upon a String among the rest, are not perceiv'd by the Merchants. Nay, some have gone so far as to cut Pasteboard in the same Form, and mixt them with the rest upon the String; and the Deceit is not perceiv'd till they come to lay out the Pieces separately.

Clipping and
punish'd.

Of the Coins anciently current in China, I have caus'd several to be engrav'd, of which no certain Account can be given: some belong to foreign Countries; but it is hard to determine what Countries, because the Chinese alter the Names so much that there is no Possibility of knowing them: for instance, they call Holland, Hung mau qua, The Kingdom of red-hair'd Men, because they have seen some of the Dutch with fair Hair and red Beards. Now, How is it possible to find out any Country by such a Mark? (A) certain Coins.

There is other Money whose Original is very uncertain: only it is conjectured that they belong'd either to the Tartars of Lyau-tong, who for a time were Masters of the Province of Pe-che-li; or else to some great Lords, or petty Kings, who had revolted, and taken the Title of Emperor.

In a word, there are certain Coins, with respect to which the People at present entertain superstitious Ideas, never thought of in the Ages when they were current. The Characters or Figures impress'd thereon, relate to Epochs of Time, or Historical Facts, the Remembrance of which is lost: such is, for instance, the Coin stamped with the Long-whang and Ki-lin, two fabulous Animals, whereof the Chinese relate a thousand Stories. The first is a Bird frequently mention'd by us already; and the latter is, according to them, compos'd of different Parts of several Creatures: it has the Hight and Chest of an Ox; the Body is cover'd with broad hard Scales; it has a Horn in the middle of the Forehead, with Eyes and Whiskers, like those of the Chinese Dragon. This Animal is the Symbol of the Military Mandarins of the first Order.

Superstitious
Coins.

The late Emperor Kang-hi had a Cabinet wherein he had gather'd all Sorts of Coin, both ancient and modern; plac'd according to the Order of the Dynasties, by the Care of a Mandarin call'd Tsyang, President of the Academy of the chief Doctors of the Empire. The most ancient Coins in this curious Collection, are those current in the Time of Yau. There are those also of Ching-tang, the Founder of the Second Dynasty; and a great Number belonging to the three celebrated Dynasties (mention'd in the Canonical Book Sbu-king) of Hya, Shang and Chew, especially this last.

Kang-hi's Cabinet of Coins.

If these Pieces of Money are not genuine, but were counterfeited in latter Times, they might as well have forged Money for all the Emperors of the first Dynasties; but we find the Coin belonging to these latter Ages wanting, as well as those of the most distant Times. It is true they have supply'd the Deficiency with Pasteboard Money, made according to the Idea the ancient Books give of those old Coin; which indeed are so nicely imitated, as well with regard to Proportion of Parts as the Colour of the Metal, that this counterfeit Coin seems to be real. This Series of Coins is a concurrent Testimony of the Truth of the Chinese History; for who can doubt there was such a Dynasty, and such an Emperor, since the Money coin'd in their Times has been preserv'd for so many Ages by the Chinese?

The ancient Coins not counterfeit.

Of the Chinese Trade.

THE Riches peculiar to each Province, and the Facility of conveying Merchandise, by Means of the Rivers and Canals, have render'd the domestic Trade of the Empire always very flourishing. As to its foreign Trade it is scarcely worth mentioning; for the Chinese, finding among themselves all Things necessary for the Support and Pleasures of Life, seldom go far from home. So long as China was govern'd by Emperors of its own, the Ports were always

Trade of China always flourishing.

shut

(A) The Chinese know Holland by that Name well enough, tho' we don't. So we know their Country by the Name of China: but what Chinese, as we wrongly call them, could find it out by that Name? It is the same with regard to Prester

John's Country, the Mogul's Empire, Tartary, the Island of St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, and innumerable other Places to which Europeans have given fantastic Names utterly unknown to the Natives.

that up to Foreigners; but the Tartars, since they became Masters thereof, have open'd them to all Nations: therefore, to give a full Account of the Chinese Trade, it is necessary to speak, as well of that which they carry on among themselves, and with their Neighbours, as of that carried on by the Europeans with them.

Exceeds the Trade of all Europe together.

The inland Trade of China is so great, that the Commerce of all Europe is not to be compar'd therewith; the Provinces being like so many Kingdoms, which communicate to each other their respective Productions. This tends to unite the several Inhabitants among themselves, and makes Plenty reign in all the Cities. The Provinces of Hu-quang and Kyang-si supply those with Rice that are not well provided; that of Che-kyang furnishes the finest Silk; Kyang-nan Varnish, Ink, and all Sorts of curious Works; Yun-nan, Sben-si, and Sban-si, yield Iron, Copper, and several other Metals, Horses, Mules, Furs, &c. Po-kyen produces Sugar, and the best Tea; Se-chuen, Plants, Medicinal Herbs, Rhubarb, &c. and so of the rest; for it is not possible to give a particular Account of the Commodities peculiar to each Province.

Is exceeding brisk,

All these Riches, which are readily convey'd from Place to Place along the Rivers, are sold in a very short Time; you may see, for instance, Dealers who, in three or four Days after their Arrival in a City, sell six thousand Caps proper for the Season. Trade is never interrupted except on the two first Days of the first Moon, which they spend in Diversions, and the usual Visits of the New Year: At all other Times every Thing is in Motion, as well in the Cities as in the Country. The Mandarins themselves have their Share in Business; there being some among them who put their Money into the Hands of trusty Merchants, in order to improve it in the way of Trade.

even in the lowest Branches.

In short, there is not any Family to the very poorest of all, but what with a little good Management can find Means to subsist very easily by Traffic. There are many of them, whose whole Stock does not amount to above a Crown, and yet the Father and Mother, with two or three Children, are maintain'd out of the Profits of it, procure silk Garments for Days of Ceremony and in a few Years Time, enlarge their little Commerce to something considerable. Although this may seem not very easy to comprehend, yet it is no more than what happens every Day: for instance, one of these small Merchants, who has about fifty Sous, will buy Sugar, Meal, and Rice, and make small Cakes, which he has bak'd an Hour or two before Day, to kindle, as they express it, the Heart of Travellers; which done, his Shop is hardly open before all his Ware is carried off by Country People, who come in Crowds in a Morning to every City, by the Workmen, the Porters, the Children of the Ward, and those who are in Law. This little Trade in a few Hours produces a Profit of twenty Sous, the half of which is sufficient to maintain his small Family.

Chinese addicted to over-reaching.

In a word, the most frequented Fair affords but a faint Resemblance of the incredible Crowds of People to be seen in the Generality of Cities, who are busy in buying or selling all sorts of Commodities. It were only to be wish'd the Chinese Merchants were a little more honest in their Dealings, especially when they trade with Foreigners; they always endeavour to sell as dear as they can, and often make no Scruple of adulterating their Goods. Their Maxim is, that he who buys is for getting Things as cheap as possibly he can, and would even give nothing at all did the Seller consent to it; and upon this Principle they think they have a Right on their Side to ask the greatest Price, and to take it if the Buyer is so simple or ignorant as to give it: It is not the Dealer who deceives, say they, It is the Buyer who deceives himself. The Buyer is under no Compulsion, and the Profit which the Merchant gets is the Fruit of his Industry. However, those who act according to these detestable Principles, are the first in praising Honesty and Disinterestedness in others; so that they stand self-condemned.

Their Foreign Trade inconsiderable.

Trade flourishing at such a Rate, as I have observ'd, in all the Provinces of China, it is not at all surprizing that the Inhabitants should be so negligent of foreign Trade, especially considering their Contempt for all other Nations: Thus by Sea they never pass the Streights of Sonda, their farthest Voyages that Way reaching only to Batavia, which belongs to the Dutch; in like Manner on the Side of Malacca, they do not go beyond Achen, and the Limits of their Navigation Northwards is Japan; I shall therefore, as briefly as possible, mention the Places they trade in those Seas, as well as the Sorts of Merchandizes which they import and export.

That to Japan.

I. Japan is the Kingdom which they most frequent, and commonly set Sail for it in the Month of June or July at farthest. They first go to Kamboya or Siam, where they carry Goods proper for those Countries, freighting themselves there with such as are in Request at Japan; and at their Return home, find that they have made 200 per Cent. by their Voyage. If they go directly to Japan from the Ports of China, that is, Kan-ton, A-moi, or Ning-po, then they export the following Merchandises: (1) Druggs, such as Jin-seng, Birthwort, Rhubarb, Mirabolans, and such like. (2) Areka Bark, White Sugar, Buffalo, and Cow-hides; as for Sugar they gain greatly by it, even sometimes a thousand per Cent. (3) All sorts of Silks, but chiefly Sattins, Taffeties, and Damasks of different Colours, especially black: some of these Pieces, which cost but six Taels in China, sell at Japan for fifteen. (4) Silken Strings for Instruments, Eagle and Sandal Wood; there being a great Demand for it, on account of its Perfume, among the Japanese, who are continually censuring their Images. (5) Lastly, European Cloth and Camlets, which have a quick Sale: and tho' the Chinese never export any unless they can sell them there at the same Price as the Dutch do, yet they affirm they gain fifty per Cent. thereby; which shews how considerable the Profit of the Dutch must be.

Commodities carry'd thither.

The Commodities which the Chinese Traders load with their Vessels in Return, are

(1) Fine Pearls, which cost more or less in Proportion to their Beauty and Bigness, gaining sometimes a thousand per Cent. by them. (2) Red Copper in Bars, which they buy from three Tael to four and an half, selling them in China for ten or twelve; also wrought Copper, such as Scales, Chafing-Dishes, Perfuming Pans, Balons, &c. these go off at a great Price in their own Country, the Copper being fine and agreeable to the Sight. (3) Sabre-Blades, they cost but a Piafter in Japan, and sell sometimes for ten Piasters in China, where they are much esteem'd. (4) Smooth flower'd Paper, of which the Chinese make Fans. (5) Porcelain, which is very beautiful, but not so useful as that of China, because it will not bear boiling Water; it is sold in Japan much at the same Price as China Ware is sold at Kan-ton. (6) Japann'd Works, which are not to be parallel'd in any part of the World. There is no settled Price for them: and the Chinese seldom meddle with them, for fear they should not get them off, but when they do import any, they sell them extremely dear. A Cabinet not above two Foot high, and but a little more in Breadth, has been sold in China for a hundred Piasters. Those who venture most to deal in them, are the Merchants of A-moi and Ning-po; because they carry them to Minilla and Batavia, gaining considerably by the Europeans, who are fond of these sorts of Works. (7) Gold, which is very fine, and a certain Metal call'd Tombak, by which they gain fifty or sixty per Cent. at Batavia.

Could the Europeans depend on the Honesty of the Chinese, they might easily carry on a Trade with Japan by their means: but they could not possibly do any good that way, unless they bore them Company, were Masters of the Cargo, and had a sufficient Force to prevent their Insults.

II. The Chinese also trade to Manilla: but scarce any go thither besides the Merchants of A-moi, who carry a great deal of Silk, strip'd and flower'd Sattin of different Colours, Embroidery, Carpets, Cushions, Night-Gowns, Silk Stockings, Tea, China Ware, Japann'd Works, Druggs, &c. by which they are generally Gainers fifty per Cent. and bring back nothing but Piasters.

III. The Trade which the Chinese carry on the most regularly, as finding it most easy and gainful, is that to Batavia: whither Vessels sail every Year from Kan-ton, A-moi, and Ning-po; putting to Sea towards the eleventh Moon, that is, in December. The Merchandises they are loaded with are:

(1) A kind of Green Tea, which is very fine, and of a good Smell, but Song-lo and Bohea Tea are not so much sought after by the Dutch. (2) China Ware, which is sold as cheap there as at Kan-ton. (3) Leaf-Gold and Gold Thread, which is nothing but gilt Paper; some of this is sold not by Weight, but in small Skains, and is dear, because it is cover'd with the finest Gold: But that which the Chinese bring to Batavia is sold only by Weight. It is made up in Parcels, with large Hanks of red Silk, put in on Purpose to set off the Colour of the Gold, and to make the Parcels weigh heavier: The Dutch make no use of it, but they carry it to the Country of the Malayans, where they make considerable Profit of it. (4) Tutenak [or Tuttenague] a Metal, which partakes of the Nature both of Tin and Iron, yielding a hundred and sometimes a hundred and fifty per Cent. (5) Druggs, especially Rhubarb. (6) A great Quantity of Utensils of yellow Copper, such as Balons, Chafing-Dishes, great Kettles, &c.

They import from Batavia; (1) Silver in Piasters. (2) Spices, particularly Pepper, Cloves, Nutmegs, &c. (3) Tortoise-Shells, of which the Chinese make very neat Toys, and among other Combs, Boxes, Cups, Knife-Handles, Pipes, and Snuff-Boxes, after the European Fashion, which they sell for ten Sous. (4) Sandal-Wood; also red and black Wood, proper for Cabinet-Work, with another red Wood, commonly call'd Brasil-Wood, which serves for dying. (5) Agat-Stones, ready cut, whereof the Chinese make Ornaments for their Girdles; Buttons for their Caps, and a kind of Neck-lace. (6) Yellow Amber in Lumps, which they buy very cheap. (7) Lastly, European Cloth, which they have also at a moderate Price, and sell again at Japan.

This is the greatest Trade the Chinese drive abroad. They likewise go, but very seldom, to Acben, Malacca, Ibor, Patana, Ligor, which belongs to the Kingdom of Siam, to Cochinchina, &c. The Trade they carry on at Ibor, is the most easy and profitable. They would not get even as much as would pay the Expence of their Voyage by going to Acben, if they fail'd of being there in November and December; at which time the Ships of Surat and Bengal are upon the Coast.

They seldom import any thing else from these Countries but Spices, such as Pepper, Cinnamon, &c. Birds-Nests, which are counted Delicacies at the Chinese Tables, Rice, Camphire, Ratan, (a kind of very long Canes, which they twist together like small Cords,) Torches made of the Leaves of certain Trees, that burn like Pitch, and serve for Flambeaux when they walk in the Night; also, Gold, Tin, &c.

It remains only to speak of the Trade carry'd on in China by the Europeans; who have the Liberty of scarce any Port, except that of Kan-ton, which is open to them at certain times of the Year. Not that they go up as far as the City itself, but cast Anchor at Whang-pu, a Place about four Leagues short of it, in the River; which there is so crowded with a Multitude of Vessels, that it looks like a large Wood. Formerly Cloths, Chrystals, Swords, Clocks, Striking-Watches, Repeating-Clocks, Telescopes, Looking-Glasses, Drinking-Glasses, &c. were carry'd thither. But since the English come regularly every Year, all these are as cheap as in Europe; and Coral itself can hardly be sold there any longer without Loss: so that at present there is no trading to Advantage with any thing but Silver in China, where considerable Profit may be made, by purchasing Gold, which is a Commodity there.

Gold of China profitable.

The Gold to be met with at Kan-ton, comes partly out of the Provinces of China, and partly from foreign Countries, as Acben, Cochin-china, Japan, &c. and is all melted over-again in that City, except what comes from Cochin-china; which is commonly the most fine and pure that can be, when it is bought of the King of that Country: for that sold clandestinely by the People is not so pure, and therefore they take Care to refine it at Kan-ton. The Chinese divide their Gold by Alloys as they do in Europe. That which is commonly sold, is from ninety Carats to a hundred, and is more or less dear, according to the time when it was bought. It is much cheaper in March, April, and May, than it is from July to January; because this last is the Season when there is the greatest number of Vessels in the Port or Road of Kan-ton.

Other Commodities imported by Europeans.

There are also excellent Drugs to be bought in China, several sorts of Tea, Gold-Thread, Musk, precious Stones, Pearls, Quicksilver, &c. but the Trade carry'd on there by the Europeans, consists chiefly in japann'd Works, China Ware, and Silks, with respect to which I shall treat more at large in the following Articles.

Of the Chinese Varnish.

Places most famous for varnish'd Works.

THOUGH the varnish'd Works, made at Kan-ton, are neither so beautiful nor serviceable by a great deal, as those that come from Japan, Tong-king, and Nan-king, Capital of the Province of Kyang-nan: it is not that the Workmen do not employ the same sort of Varnish and Gilding, but because they fit them up too hastily; and then if they do but please the Eye of the Europeans, they are well enough content. To Japan a Piece of Work well, it ought to be done at Leisure, a whole Summer being scarcely sufficient to bring it to Perfection; but the Chinese have rarely any by them that were made a considerable time beforehand; for they almost always wait till the Arrival of Ships, before they begin, that they may do them according as the Europeans shall direct.

This Varnish which gives so fine a Lustre to their Works, and makes them so much esteem'd in Europe, is neither a Composition, nor so great a Secret as some have imagin'd; to undeceive whom, it will be sufficient to give an Account where the Chinese get it, and afterwards how they use it.

The Varnish-Trees.

The Varnish, call'd Tsi, is a reddish Gum, distilling from certain Trees, by means of Incisions made in the Bark. These Trees are found in the Provinces of Kyang-si and Si-chwen, but those of the District of Kan-chew, one of the most Southern Cities of Kyang-si, yield that which is most esteem'd.

When in their Prime.

The Varnish ought not to be drawn till the Trees are of seven or eight Years Growth, for that which is procur'd before, is not so fit for Use. The Trunk of the youngest Tree, from whence they begin to draw it, is a Chinese Foot in Circumference, and the Chinese Foot is much larger than the King's Foot in France. It is said that the Varnish of such Trees is better than that which distills from those older, but that they yield much less: yet, whether there be any Foundation for this Report, is uncertain, because the Merchants make no Scruple to mix them both together. These Trees, whose Leaf and Bark are very like those of the Ash, are scarce ever more than fifteen Feet high; and when they are of that Growth, the Trunk is about two Foot and an half in Compass. It is affirm'd that they bear neither Flowers nor Fruit, and that they multiply in the manner following:

How propagated.

In the Spring, when the Tree begins to sprout, they choose the most promising Sprig that proceeds from the Trunk, not from the Branches; and when it is about a Foot long, they coat it with yellow Clay. This Coat begins about two Inches above the Place where it rises, and reaches four or five Inches lower: It is at least three Inches thick, is laid on very close, and cover'd with a Mat carefully ty'd about it, to secure it from Rain, and the Injuries of the Air. It is left in this manner from the Vernal to the Autumnal Equinox, and then they open the Earth a very little way, to examine the Condition of the Roots, which the Sprig usually shoots forth, and are divided into several Strings. If these Strings are of a yellowish or reddish Colour, they judge that it is time to separate the Sprig from the Tree, and then they cut it dexterously without doing it the least Damage, and afterwards plant it. But if the Strings are still white, it is a Sign they are too tender, and so they close up the Coat again, and defer cutting the Shoot till the next Spring. But whether it is planted in the Spring, or Autumn, a good deal of Ashes must be put into the Hole, prepar'd for that Purpose; otherwise the Pismires, as they affirm, would devour the tender Roots, or at least get out all the Sap, and so cause them to wither.

The Varnish when and how drawn off.

The Varnish is to be procur'd from these Trees only in the Summer Season; for in the Winter they yield none, and that which distills in the Spring or Autumn, is always mix'd with Water: besides, they yield it only in the Night-time, and never in the Day. In order to draw out the Varnish, they make several horizontal Incisions in the Bark, round the Trunk, which are either deeper or shallower, according to its Thickness. The first Row of Incisions is but seven Inches from the Ground, the second is at the same Distance above the first; and thus at the end of every seven Inches there is a Row of Incisions; not only to the Top of the Trunk, but even along such of the Branches as are of a sufficient Thickness to bear it.

They use a little Knife with a semicircular Blade to make these Incisions, which must not be done directly downward, but slanting, nor deeper than the Bark is thick. While the Operator makes them with one Hand, he thrusts the Edge of a Shell, which he has in the other, as far in as he can, that is, about half a Chinese Inch; and this is sufficient to support the Shell without any thing else. These Shells are very common in China, and much larger than our biggest Oyster-Shells. The Incisions being made in the Evening, next Morning they gather what is run into the Shells; in the Evening they fix them again in the same Incisions, and continue so doing till the end of the Summer. The Proprietors of these Trees do not usually draw off the Varnish themselves, but let them for the Season at the Rate of two pence half-penny a Foot to Merchants; who hire Labourers to attend, giving them an Ounce of Silver a Month, if they find their own Victuals, which is most common, if not, then they have but three half-pence a Day. One of these Labourers is sufficient to take care of fifty Feet of Tree.

It is necessary to use some Precautions, to secure the Labourers from the bad Effects of the Varnish; so that whether the Merchants maintain them or not, they are oblig'd to have a large Vessel of Oil, wherein has been boil'd a certain Quantity of the Flethy Filaments which are found intermix'd with the Fat of Hogs, and remain after the Fat has been melted: The Proportion is one Ounce to a Pound of Oil. When the Workmen go to place the Shells in the Trees, they carry with them a little of this Oil, wherewith they rub the Face and Hands; and in the Morning, when they have gather'd the Varnish, and return to the Merchants, they rub themselves more carefully with it. After Dinner they wash their Bodies with hot Water, prepar'd by the Merchant, wherein has been boil'd a certain Quantity of the following Drugs, viz. the outward rough Shell of Chestnuts, the Bark of the Fir-Tree, Salt-Petre in Crystals, and a Sort of Blits, an Herb eaten in China and the Indies; all which are suppos'd to be of a cold Nature. With this Water every Labourer washes himself very carefully, in a little Tin Basin; for they will not use the common Copper Basins, wherein the Chinese usually wash their Faces in the Morning, having some Objection to that Metal.

Cautions to be taken by those who draw off the Varnish.

During the time they are at work at the Trees, their Heads are cover'd with a Linen Bag, ty'd about their Necks, wherein are only two Holes for their Eyes; before them they wear a sort of Apron, made of Doe-Skin, which is hung about their Necks with Strings, and ty'd round their Middles; they have also Buskins of the same, and long Gloves on their Arms. When they gather this Varnish, they have a Vessel made of Neat's Leather, fasten'd to their Girdle; then with one Hand they take out the Shells, and scrape them with a small Iron Instrument, which they hold in the other, till they have got out all the Varnish: at the Bottom of the Tree is a Basket, wherein they leave the Shells till the Evening. To facilitate coming at the Varnish, the Proprietors take care to plant the Trees not far asunder; and when the Time of gathering it is come, they lay a great number of Poles from one to another, which fasten'd with Cords serve instead of Ladders to get up by.

The Merchant has always ready at his House, a great earthen Vessel, plac'd under a square wooden Frame, like that of a Table, supported by four Feet. On the Frame is a thin Cloth, (whose four Corners are fasten'd to Rings,) lay'd very slack, whereon they pour the Varnish; and when the fluid part has run through, they wring out the rest, all but a little that remains behind, which is sold to the Druggists, as being sometimes us'd in Physic. They are well enough satisfy'd with their Bargain, when a thousand Trees in one Night yield twenty Pound of Varnish. After the Gathering is over, the Merchant puts the Varnish in wooden Buckets, well caulk'd on the Outside, fastening on the Covers with strong Nails. A Pound of Varnish while it is fresh, is valu'd at about forty Sous; and the Merchant gains double or more, according to the Distance of the Place to which it is carry'd.

Quantity of Varnish at one gathering.

The Labourers pay very dear for gathering the Varnish, if they do not take the above-mention'd Precautions. The Disease begins with a kind of Ringworm, which in the Space of a Day covers the whole Body, Face and all, for it spreads in a few Hours, and grows very red. Soon after the Person's Face becomes bloated, and his Body, which swells to an extraordinary Degree, seems quite cover'd with a Leprosy. To heal a Man attack'd with this Disorder, they give him immediately a considerable Quantity of the aforesaid medicinal Water for washing with to prevent these Accidents, which purges him violently: they afterwards make for him a strong Fumigation with the same Water, wrapping him up very close. By this means the Swelling is remov'd, but the Skin is not so soon heal'd; for it cracks in several places, from whence proceeds a great deal of Water. To remedy this, they take of the Herb that I call'd above a kind of Blits, dry and burn it; then upon the part most affected they put the Ashes, which imbibing the sharp Humour, the chopp'd Skin dries and falls off, a new Skin succeeding in place of it.

Disease caus'd by the effluvia of the Varnish.

The Chinese Varnish, besides the Beauty it gives to the smallest Piece of Work it is apply'd to, has likewise the Property of preserving the Wood, and hindering the least Moisture from entering it: Pour whatever Liquor you please upon it, and only wipe it with a wet Cloth, and there will remain neither Mark nor Smell behind. But then there is a great Art in using it: for let it be ever so good in its Kind, yet there is still need of a dextrous and careful Hand to apply it. The Workman ought to be Master of a great deal of Patience as well as Skill, to find the just Temper that the Varnish requires; for if it be either too thick or too thin, he will make but very indifferent Work of it.

How used in Japaning.

The Varnish is apply'd in two different Manners; the one, which is most simple, is immediately upon the Wood: After it has been well polish'd, they do it over two or three times with Tong-yew, a kind of Oil; and when it is well dry'd, lay on their Varnish as often. It is so transparent that the Grain of the Wood appears clearly through it; and therefore if they would conceal the Materials they work upon, they lay on the Varnish a great number of times, and then it becomes so glossy that it resembles a Looking-Glass. When the Work is dry, they paint several sorts of Figures with Gold or Silver, such as Flowers, Men, Birds, Trees, Mountains, Palaces, &c. over which they lay Varnish once more, but lightly, both to preserve and give it a Gloss.

The other Manner, which is not so plain, requires more preparation, for it is laid upon a kind of Mastic, or Paste-board, compos'd of Paper, Flax, Lime, and some other Materials, which being well beaten together, and glu'd upon the Wood, makes a Ground very smooth and firm: on this they pass the Oil before mention'd two or three times, and then apply several Lays of Varnish, letting each dry one after another. Every Workman has his own way of doing things, which are more or less perfect according to his Skill. (A)

and Lustre.

It often happens that by spilling Tea and other hot Liquors upon these Japan'd Works, they lose their Lustre, because the Varnish grows dull, and turns yellow. "The Means, (says a Chinese Author) to give it the shining Black that it had before, is to expose it for a Night to a white Frost, or else, which is better, to hold it for some time in the Sun."

Of the Porcelain or China-Ware.

Porcelain or China-Ware,

PORCELAIN, which is the most common Furniture us'd by the Chinese, and the chief Ornament of their Houses, has been so much sought after in Europe, and still makes so great a Branch of its Trade, that it will not be amiss to acquaint the Reader with the Manner of making it. Some Authors pretend that it is compos'd of Egg-Shells, or of Shells of a certain Fish, bury'd in the Earth for twenty or thirty, or even a hundred Years. But this is mere Invention of such Writers, who have boldly palm'd their own silly Conjectures on the World, in many other Particulars also, concerning China; of which they have given the most false, and often the most ridiculous Accounts.

in Kyang-si.

China-Ware is made no where but in one Town of the Province of Kyang-si, nam'd King-te-ching, which is a League in Length, containing upwards of a Million of Souls. It is not above three Miles distant from Tew-lyang, a City of the third Rank, whereon it depends, lying in the District of Jau-chew, one of the Cities of the first Rank in the Province. As P. Dentrecolles had a Church in King-te-ching, and among his Converts there were several, who both made China-Ware, and drove a considerable Trade in it, he obtain'd from them an exact Knowledge relating to every Branch of this curious Art. Besides this, he has seen every thing himself, and consulted the Chinese Books that treat on this Subject, especially the History or Annals of Tew-lyang: for it is a Custom in China for every City to print a History of its District, comprehending its Situation, Extent, and the Nature of the Country; an Account of the Manners of the Inhabitants, and the Persons distinguish'd for Arms, Learning, or Integrity of Life; the extraordinary Events, and especially the Merchandizes and Provisions which are exported or sold there.

Curious Account of it
by P. Dentrecolles.

This Missionary has search'd in vain to find out the Inventor of China-Ware, for the Annals say nothing of him, nor whether the Discovery was owing to Chance or Experience. They only say, that it was exquisitely white, without any Defect; and that whatever was transported into other Kingdoms, had no other Name but The precious Jewels of Jau-chew. And lower it is added, The fine China-Ware, which is of a lively shining White, and a clear Sky-Blue, comes all from King-te-ching. It is made in other Places, but it is of a quite different Colour and Fineness.

Its Inventor
unknown.

In short (not to speak of the other sort of Earthen-Ware made all over China, but to which they never give the Name of Porcelain) there are some Provinces, as those of Kan-ton and Fo-kyen, where they make Porcelain, but Strangers cannot be deceiv'd therein; for that of Fo-kyen is as white as Snow, but has no Gloss, and is not painted with various Colours. The Workmen of King-te-ching formerly carry'd thither all their Materials, in hopes of being considerable Gainers, by reason of the great Trade then driven by the Europeans at A-moi; but they lost their Labour, for they could never make it there with Success.

where fruitless.

The Emperor Kang-hi, who desir'd to know every thing, caus'd some Workmen in Porcelain to be brought to Pe-king, and every thing proper for that Manufacture. They did their utmost to succeed, being under the Prince's Eye, and yet we are assur'd that their Work fail'd. It is is possible the Reasons of Interest and Policy had a Hand in the Miscarriage; but however that be, King-te-ching alone has the Honour of supplying all parts of the World with Porcelain; even the Japanese come to China for it.

Every thing that relates to China-Ware, says P. Dentrecolles (B), (for it is he who speaks in the rest of this Article) may be reduc'd to the following Heads: viz. The Materials whereof it is compos'd, and how they are prepar'd; the different Kinds of Porcelain, and the Manner of making it; the Oil which gives it the Gloss, and its Qualities; the Colours which embellish it, and the Art of laying them on; the Baking, and Measures taken to give it a proper Degree of Heat; lastly, I shall make some Reflections on the ancient and modern Porcelain, as also on certain things, which render it impracticable for the Chinese to imitate those Patterns that have been or may be sent them.

But before I begin, it may be proper to undeceive those who imagine that the Name of Porcelain comes from a Chinese Word. Indeed there are some Words, tho' but very few in number, which are both French and Chinese: Té [or Tea] for Instance, as we call it, is likewise call'd Té in the Province of Fo-kyen, tho' the Name in the Mandarin Language is Cha. Papa and Mama, are likewise Words, which in some Provinces, and particularly at King-te-ching, are in the Mouths of Children, and signify Father and Mother. But as for the Name of Porcelain, it is so far from being Chinese, that none of the Syllables whereof it is compos'd, can be either pronounc'd or written by the Chinese; the Sounds not being to be found in their Language. It is likely that the Word came from the Portuguese, notwithstanding that with them Porcellana signifies properly a Cup or Porrenger; and that Leça is the Name they generally give to the Ware, which we call Porcelain, and the Chinese commonly Tsé-ki.

I. The Materials of China-Ware, and how prepar'd.

THE Matter of Porcelain consists of two sorts of Earth, one call'd Pe-tun-tse, and the other Kau-lin: This latter is mix'd with shining Particles, the other is simply white, and very fine to the Touch. At the same time that a great number of Barks ascend the River from Jau-chew to King-te-ching, in order to load with China-Ware, nearly as many small ones descend from Ki-mwen, laden with Pe-tun-tse and Kau-lin, in form of Bricks; for King-te-ching produces no Materials fit for Porcelain.

The Pe-tun-tse, whose Grain is so very fine, is nothing else but pieces of Rock, dug out of Quarries, and made into that Form. All sorts of Stones are not proper for Pe-tun-tse, otherwise there would be no Occasion to go twenty or thirty Leagues distant in the next Province to look for it. The Chinese say the right Stones ought to have a greenish Cast.

The first Preparation is in the following manner: They break the Stone with great Iron Mallets, and putting the Pieces into Mortars, reduce them to very fine Powder, by help of certain Pestles, the Head whereof is made of Stone, and capp'd with Iron. These Pestles work without ceasing, being put in Motion, either by the Labour of Men, or else by means of Water, in the same manner as the Hammers of Paper-Mills. They afterwards cast the Powder into a great Jar full of Water, and stir it up strongly with an Iron Shovel; then having rested a few Minutes, there rises on the Surface a sort of Cream four or five Fingers thick, which they take off, and pour into another Vessel full of Water. In this manner they agitate the Water in the first Jar several times, still gathering what swims on the Top, till there remains nothing but the gross part, which they take out and pound afresh.

With respect to the second Jar, wherein that is cast which was gather'd from the first, they wait till there is form'd at the Bottom a kind of Paste, and when the Water appears clear at Top, they pour it gently off, that the Sediment may not be disturb'd, and throw the Paste into large Moulds to dry: But before it is quite hard, they divide it into small Bricks, which they sell by hundreds; and to this Shape, and its Colour, it owes the Name of Pe-tun-tse. The Moulds wherein this Paste is thrown, are a kind of large Boxes, whose Bottoms are cover'd with Bricks, plac'd upright, so as to make an even Surface, over which they lay a thick Cloth; then they pour in the Matter, which they cover soon after with another Cloth, and place thereon a second Bed of Bricks, laid close together flatwise: All this is done to get out the Water more readily, without losing any thing of the Substance, which as it grows hard, easily takes the Figure of the Bricks.

There would be nothing to add to this Article, if the Chinese were not addicted to adulterate their Goods; but People who roll small Grains of Paste in Pepper Powder, in order to mix them with the true Pepper, are not willing to sell Pe-tun-tse unmix'd with grosser Matter; for which reason they are oblig'd to purify it again at King-te-ching, before they use it.

The Kau-lin, which is another component part of Porcelain, requires somewhat less Labour in the Preparation than the Pe-tun-tse: They find Mines of it in the Heart of certain Mountains, whose Surface is cover'd with a reddish Earth. These Mines are pretty deep, and the Matter we are speaking of is found in Lumps, which they make into Bricks, in the same manner as the Pe-tun-tse. I do not at all doubt that the white Earth of Malta, call'd St. Paul's Earth, is of much the same Nature with the Kau-lin, tho' the small shining Particles have not been ob-

(B) This Account is taken from the Lettres Edifiantes, where there are two Pieces written by this Jesuit on the Subject.

Its Quality. observ'd in it. The fine Porcelain receives its Firmness from the Kau-lin, which is as it were the Sinews thereof; and thus the Mixture of a soft Earth gives Strength to the Pe-tun-tse, which is got from the hardest Rocks. A rich Merchant inform'd me that some Years ago the English or Dutch (for the Chinese Name is common to both (c) Nations) bought a Quantity of the Pe-tun-tse, and carry'd it into their Country, to make China-Ware; but that having forgot the Kau-lin, their Design miscarry'd, as they afterwards own'd: On which Occasion the Chinese Merchant said with a Laugh, that They would have a Body, whose Flesh should be supported without Bones.

A third ingredient or kind of Chalk. They have lately found out another proper Ingredient in the Composition of China-Ware, which is a Stone, or kind of Crayon, call'd Wba-she, whereof a sort of Ptifan is made by the Chinese Physicians, who reckon it detensive, opening and cooling. They take six parts of this Stone, and one of Liquorice, which they pulverise; and putting half a Spoonful of the Powder into a Cup of fresh Water, give it the Patient to drink, pretending that this Ptifan cools the Blood, and allays the internal Heat. The Persons concern'd in this Manufactory have thought fit to use this Stone in the room of Kau-lin; and perhaps those parts of Europe that yield no Kau-lin may furnish Wba-she. It is call'd Wba, because it is glutinous, and partakes something of the Nature of Sope. The China-Ware that is made with it, is scarce, and much dearer than the other. The Grain of it is exceeding fine, and as for the Painting, if compar'd with ordinary China-Ware, it as far exceeds it as Vellum does Paper; besides this China-Ware is so light, that it surprises one who is accusom'd to handle the other Sorts: It is likewise much more brittle than the common, and it is difficult to hit upon the true Degree of baking it. Some do not make use of the Wba-she for the Body of the Work; contenting themselves with making a fine Glue of it, wherein they dip the Porcelain when it is dry, that it may take one Lay before it receives the Colour and Varnish, by which means it acquires a good deal of Beauty.

How prepar'd. I shall now explain the Manner of working the Wba-she. (1) When they have taken it out of the Mine, they wash it in River or Rain-Water, to separate the remainder of yellow Earth that sticks to it. (2) They then break it, and put it into a Tub of Water to dissolve, preparing it in the same manner as the Kau-lin. It is affirm'd that Porcelain may be made with Wba-she alone, prepar'd in this manner, without any Mixture. However, one of my Converts, who had made some of this Kind, told me, that to eight parts of Wba-she he puts two parts of Pe-tun-tse; and that for the rest he proceeded in the same manner as when he made the common China-Ware, with the Pe-tun-tse and Kau-lin. In this new kind of Porcelain the Wba-she supplies the Place of the Kau-lin: but one is much dearer than the other, for a Load of Kau-lin cost but twenty Sous, whereas that of the Wba-she stands in a Crown; so that no wonder this sort of China-Ware should be dearer than the common.

Also for painting Figures. I shall add one Observation more concerning Wba-she: When it is prepar'd and made into little Bricks like the Pe-tun-tse, they dissolve a certain Quantity of them in Water; and making a very clear Paste of it, with a Pencil dipp'd therein trace several Fancies upon the Porcelain, to which, after it is dry, they give the Varnish. When it is bak'd these Designs appear, being of a different White from that of the Body of the Ware, and not unlike a thin Vapour, spread over the Surface. The White of the Wba-she is call'd White of Ivory, Syang ya pe.

Another Mineral for painting white. They paint Figures on the Porcelain, also with Sbe-kau, a kind of Stone or Mineral like Allum, which gives another kind of white Colour, and is particular in this, that before it is prepar'd it must be burnt in the Fire; afterwards they break it, and manage it like the Wba-she: they throw it into a Vessel full of Water, stir it about, and gather the Cream that swims on the Top from time to time; and when this is done they find a pure Mass, which they use in the same manner as the purify'd Wba-she.

The Sbe-kau does not enter into the Composition of Porcelain; for nothing yet has been found proper to supply the Place of the Kau-lin, and give Consistence to the Ware, but the Wba-she. If, as they tell me, more than two parts of Pe-tun-tse be put to eight of Wba-she, the Porcelain will sink down in the Oven, for want of a Body, or rather, because there is not a proper Cohesion of the Parts.

2. The Oil which gives the Gloss to the Porcelain.

The Oil of Stone or Varnish, for glazing the Porcelain. BESIDES the Barks loaded with Pe-tun-tse and Kau-lin, which lye along the Bankside at King-te-ching, there are others full of a whitish liquid Substance. I knew a great while ago, that this was an Oil which gives the Ware its Whiteness and Gloss, but was ignorant what it was made of; a thing I have since learn'd. The Chinese Name Tse, given to different Sorts of Oil, seems not so suitable to this Liquid, as the Tsi, which signifies Varnish, as I believe it would be call'd in Europe. This Oil or Varnish is procur'd from a very hard Stone; but this is no strange thing, since it is pretended that Stones are form'd of the Salts and Oils of the Earth, which mix and unite intimately together.

(c) That is, I suppose, The Red-hair'd Men. See before p. 333.

Tho' Oil may be gotten from the Stone, whereof the Pe-tun-tse are made, yet they choose this sort, because it is whiter, and the Spots are of a deeper Green. The History of Few-lyang, tho' it does not enter into particulars, says, the Stone proper for the Oil has Spots of the Colour of Cypress Leaves, Pe-shu ye pan; or red Marks on a brownish ground, much like the Plant call'd Toad-flax, Ju-chi ma tang.

After this Stone has been very well wash'd, it must be prepar'd in the same manner as the Pe-tun-tse: And when the Cream, or purest part of the Matter in the first Jar, or Vessel, has been put into the second, to about a hundred Pounds thereof, they add a Pound of She-kau, made red-hot in the fire, and beaten small. This is, as it were, the Runnet which gives it a Consistence, tho' they take care to keep it always liquid.

This Oil of Stone is never used alone, but is mixed with another, which is, as it were, the Soul of it, and compos'd as follows: They take large pieces of Quick-Lime, whereon they throw a little Water with their Hands to reduce it to a Powder; over this they spread a Lay of dry Fern, and over that again another of Lime. Having thus put on several Lays, alternately one upon another, they set Fire to the Fern; and when the whole is consum'd, divide the Ashes between five or six new Lays of dry Fern: or if there be more of them the Oil will be so much the better.

Heretofore, says the History of Few-lyang, besides Fern, they made use of the Wood of a Tree, the Fruit of which is call'd Se-tse. To judge from the roughness of the Fruit before it is ripe, and by its little Crown, it seems to be a kind of Medlar. They now make no use of it, perhaps because it is become exceeding scarce; and probably it is for want of this Wood that the China-Ware made at present is not so beautiful as it was formerly. The nature of the Lime and Fern contributes to the goodness of the Oil; and I have observ'd that what comes from some Places is much more valuable than that which is brought from others.

When they have gotten a sufficient quantity of the Ashes of Lime and Fern, they throw them into a Vessel full of Water. In a hundred Pounds of it they dissolve a Pound of She-kau, then stirring the Mixture very well, let it rest till there appears upon the Surface a Skin or Crust, which they gather and put into a second Vessel, repeating the whole several times. When there is form'd a kind of liquid Paste at the bottom of the second Jar, they prepare it, pouring off the Water very gently; and this is the second Oil, which is to be mixt with the preceding. In order to have a proper Mixture, the two kinds of Oil ought to be equally thick; for which reason they from time to time dip small Bricks of Pe-tun-tse into both, in order to discover by their Surface, when drawn out, whether the Oil be of an equal Consistence. So much for the Quality of these two sorts of Oils: As to the Quantity, the best way is to mix ten Measures of Oil of Stone, with one Measure of that made of the Ashes of Fern and Lime; those who are most sparing, never put in less than three Measures. If the Merchants who sell this Oil are inclin'd to tricking, they may easily increase the Quantity, only putting Water into it; and to conceal the Fraud, adding She-kau in proportion, which hinders the Matter from being too liquid.

There is another kind of Varnish call'd Tsi-kin yew, that is, Varnish of burn'd Gold: but I should rather call it Varnish of the Colour of Cast Brass, or Coffee, or of a dead Leaf. To make this Varnish, which is a new Invention, they take common yellow Earth, and manage it in the same manner as the Pe-tun-tse; and when this Earth is prepar'd, they use none but the finest Matter, which they cast into Water, and make a kind of Glue of, about the thickness of the common Varnish call'd Pe-yew, made of pieces of Rock-stone. These two Varnishes Tsi-kin and Pe-yew are mix'd together; and as for this purpose they ought to be of an equal Consistence, trial is made thereof by dipping a Pe-tun-tse into each sort, and if the Varnishes enter the Bricks, they are deem'd fit for incorporating. They likewise put into the Tsi-kin, Varnish, or the Oil of Lime and Fern-Ashes prepar'd as above, and of the same Consistence as the Pe-yew; mixing more or less of these two Varnishes with the Tsi-kin, according as they would have it deeper or clearer; to know which several Trials must be made: For instance, they put two Cups full of the Tsi-kin to eight of the Pe-yew, and to four Cups full of this Mixture they put one Cup of Varnish made of Lime and Fern.

A few Years ago they found the Art to paint with the Tsai, that is, with the Violet-Colour, and to gild the China-Ware. They have also try'd to make a mixture of Leaf-Gold with Varnish and Powder of Flint, which might be apply'd in the same manner as they do the red Oil: but this Attempt did not succeed, and they found that the Varnish Tsi-kin look'd more beautiful and glossy. At one time they made Cups, applying the gilt Varnish on the Outside, and the pure white within: But they have varied their Method since. Thus upon a Cup or Vessel, which they designed to varnish with the Tsi-kin, they stuck on a round or square piece of wet Paper in one or two Places; then having laid on the Tsi-kin, they took off the Papers, and painted the Places with red or blue, varnishing those Parts also when the Ware was dry. Some fill'd up these empty Spaces with a blue or black Ground, in order to gild them after the first Baking.

3. Manner of making China-Ware.

BEFORE I shew the Method of using this Oil, or rather Varnish, it will be proper to give an Account how China-Ware is made: in doing which I shall begin with the Work that goes forward in the least frequented Part of King-te-ching. There, in a Place encompass'd pass'd with Walls, they have built vast Pent-Houses, wherein appears abundance of Earthen Vessels in rows one above another. Within this inclosure an infinite number of Workmen live and work, each having his particular Task. One Piece of China-Ware, before it is fit for the Furnace, passes through the Hands of above twenty Persons without the least Confusion, they having doubtless found that by such means the Work goes on the faster.

The first Labour consists in purifying the Pe-tun-tse and Kau-lin, from the gross Parts it abounds with when it comes to them. To this end they break the Pe-tun-tse in Pieces, and throw it into a Vessel full of Water, stirring it about with a large Spatula till it is dissolv'd: then they let it settle a few Minutes; after which they gather what swims on the Surface, repeating the same in the Manner before mentioned. As for the Pieces of Kau-lin there is no occasion to break them; for being put into a very clean Basket, and so let down into a Vessel full of Water, they dissolve of themselves, commonly leaving Impurities behind that are thrown away. In a Year's time this Refuse gathers to a vast quantity, making great heaps of white spongy Sand, of which it is necessary to clear the Place where they work.

And mixed.

These two Materials being thus prepar'd, they must be mix'd in a just Proportion: For making fine China-Ware, there goes the same quantity of Kau-lin as Pe-tun-tse; for the middle Sort, they put four Parts of Kau-lin to six of Pe-tun-tse; and for the worst, they allow one Part of Kau-lin to three of Pe-tun-tse. When so far is done, they throw the Mass into a large hollow Place, well pav'd, and cemented every where: Then they tread and knead it till it grows hard. This Work is very laborious; for the Christians who were employ'd at it seldom came to Church, not being able to obtain that Liberty, without getting others to supply their Places; because when this Labour ceases to go on, all the rest of the Workmen stop of course. The Matter being thus wrought, they take Pieces of it and spread them on large Slates, where they knead and roll it every way, taking great care that there be no hollow Places in it, or any foreign Matter mixt with it: For a Hair or a Grain of Sand would spoil the Ware: and if the Mass is not well kneaded the China will crack, split, run, and warp. From these first Elements arise so many curious Works in Porcelain; which are made, some with the Wheel, others in Moulds only, and afterwards finish'd with the Chisel.

Smooth China made with the Wheel.

All the smooth Ware are made the first way: A Tea-Cup, for instance, when it comes from the Wheel is very imperfect; not unlike the Crown of a Hat before it is form'd on the Block. The Workman gives it the Wideness and Height requir'd, and parts with it almost as soon as he has taken it in hand: For he gets but three Deniers [or the value of half a Farthing] for a Board, and every Board contains twenty six Pieces. The Foot of the Cup is nothing then but a shapeless piece of Earth; which is hollowed with a Chisel, when the Cup is dry, and has receiv'd all the Ornaments intended for it. From the Wheel the Cup passes immediately to a second Workman, who places it on its Foot; and soon after to a third, who puts it in a Mould, (which is fixt on a sort of turning Wheel) and gives it the Figures: A fourth polishes the Cup with a Chisel, especially towards the Edges; and to make it of a proper Thinness to render it transparent, scrapes it several times, moistening it a very little if it be dry, lest it should break. When the Cup is taken out of the Mould, it must be roll'd gently thereon, without pressing it more on one side than the other; for else it would not be exactly round, or would warp.

It is surprizing to see with what Swiftnes these Vessels run thro' so many Hands. Some affirm that a Piece of China, by the time it is bak'd, passes the Hands of seventy Workmen; which I can easily believe after what I have seen my self.

Ware made in Moulds.

The great Pieces of Porcelain are made at twice: One half is lifted upon the Wheel by three or four Men, each of whom supports a Side of it, in order to give it the proper Shape; and the other half being almost dry is join'd to it, by means of some of the same Matter moisten'd in Water, which serves instead of Mortar or Glue. When the whole is quite dry, they polish the Place where the Pieces were join'd with a Knife, both on the Inside and the Outside, which afterwards by means of the Varnish looks as smooth as the rest. In the same manner they apply Handles, Ears, and other parts to the Vessels.

How the Moulds are used.

What has been said, chiefly regards the Porcelain made in Moulds, or by the Hands only: Such are those Pieces that are fluted, or representing several Fancies, as Animals, Grottesque Figures, Idols, Busts, bespoken by the Europeans, and the like. Mould-Works of this sort consist of three or four Pieces, which are join'd to each other, and afterwards finish'd with Instruments, proper to hollow and polish them, as well as to add several Strokes, which they do not receive from the Mould. As for Flowers and other Ornaments that are not in Relief, but as it were engrav'd, they are impress'd on the China with Seals and Moulds: They also apply Relief's ready prepar'd, much in the same manner as Gold-Lace is put on a Suit of Clothes.

What follows, relating to Moulds, I have lately been an Eye-witness of myself. When a Model is given them, which they cannot imitate by the Wheel, they take the Impression of it with a sort of Earth fit for that purpose, and then separating the Mould from the Model in several Pieces, let it dry gently.

How the Moulds are used.

When they are about to make use of this Mould, they set it near the Fire for some time: after which putting in a quantity of the Stuff, according to the Thickness the China is to be of, they press it in every where with the Hand; and then placing it for a Minute or so before the Fire, the Figure loosens from the Mould, by the drying up of the Moisture that held them together. The different Pieces thus work'd seperately, are united again with the Stuff made somewhat liquid. I have seen Figures of Animals thus made that were quite solid. They first let the Mass harden, then giving it the Figure propos'd, afterwards finish'd it with a Chisel, or added Parts that were made separately. These sorts of Works are very troublesome to make, and in great request. When the Work is finish'd, it is varnish'd and bak'd; after which they paint it, if it be desir'd, with several Colours, and gild it, baking it a second time. Pieces of Porcelain thus made are sold extremely dear. All these Works ought to be shelter'd from the Cold, for when they do not dry equally, the Parts that are moist crack: To avoid which Inconveniency, they sometimes make Fires in these Laboratories.

The Moulds, abovemention'd, are made of a yellow fat Earth, which is as it were in Lumps, and as I imagine is common enough, being gotten in a Place not far from King te ching. They knead this Earth, and when it is become very firm, and somewhat hard, they take the proper quantity for the Mould that is to be made, and beat it very much: After they have given it the Figure that is desir'd they let it dry, and in the last place finish it upon the Wheel. The Potter here is well paid for his Labour. To hasten a Work that is bespoke, a great number of Moulds are made, for employing several Companies of Workmen at the same time. If care be taken of these Moulds, they will last a long while; and a Merchant, who has them ready by him for those sorts of Works which Europeans require, can deliver his Goods much sooner and cheaper, and yet gain considerably more by them, than another who has them to make. But if they should happen to crack, or have the least Flaw in them, they are of no farther Service, unless for China of the same Fashion, but smaller Size: For in such a Case they put it upon the Wheel, and repair it, that it may serve a second time.

How and of what made.

4. Of the Colours for embellishing the China, and the Art of laying them on.

IT is now time to embellish the Porcelain, by letting it pass into the Hands of the Painters. These Wha-pei, or Painters of China, are as poor as the other Workmen; and indeed it is no wonder, for, excepting some few, a Prentice in Europe, who had serv'd at the Trade but a few Months, cou'd perform as well. What they do that way is the effect of Practice, assisted by none of the most extensive Imagination, being quite ignorant of all the excellent Rules of this Art; and yet it must be confess'd, they have a knack of painting Porcelain, as well as Fans and Lanthorns, of a very fine Gauze, with Flowers, Animals, and Landscips, which are justly admir'd.

The Painters of China-Ware no Artists.

The Painting part is divided, in the same Work-house, among a great number of Operators. It is the sole Business of one to strike the first colour'd Circle, near the Edges of the Ware; another traces the Flowers, which are painted by a third; it belongs to one to draw Rivers and Mountains, to another Birds and other Animals: As for the Figures of Men, they are commonly the worst done of all. But we have no right to rally the Chinese, for their manner of painting certain Landscips, and Plans of Cities, brought illuminated from Europe.

The China is made of all Colours, tho' one seldom meets in Europe with any sort, but that with a bright Blue upon a white Ground: However, I believe our Merchants have imported others. The Ground of some is like our Burning-Glasses; that of others is quite red, done either with Oil-red or Blown-red, and frosted with little Points, like our Paintings in Water-colours. When both sorts of Work are done to perfection, which yet is no easy matter, they are vastly priz'd, and extremely dear. In short, there is other China-Ware painted with Landscips, in almost all sorts of Colours, and set off with the Lustre of Gilding: These are very beautiful when one will go to the expence of them; but as for the ordinary China of this kind, it is not comparable to that which is painted simply with Blue.

China made of all Colours at present.

The Annals of King te ching say, that formerly People made use only of white Porcelain: Perhaps because they had not as yet found Blue in the Neighbourhood of Jau-chew, inferior to that used for the finest Ware; which last comes from far, and is sold very dear. They relate that a China-Ware Merchant, having been ship-wreck'd on a desert Coast, found by accident abundantly more Riches than he had lost; for wandering upon the Shore, while the Sailors were building a small Vessel out of the Wreck, he perceiv'd that the Stones for making the finest Azure or Blue were very common there: Wherefore he carry'd back with him a considerable quantity of them, and tis said, that so charming a Blue was never seen at King te ching. But it seems the Chinese Merchant could never afterwards light upon the Coast, which Chance had before conducted him to.

None used formerly but white.

The Azure is prepar'd after the following manner: First they bury it in the Gravel, which is about the Depth of half a Foot in the Furnace, where they calcine it for twenty four Hours; then they reduce it into an insipable Powder, in the same manner as they do other Colours, not upon Marble, but in great Porcelain-Mortars, the Bottoms of which are unglaz'd, as well as the Head of the Pestles which serve to beat it. With regard to this Affair, there are some few Remarks to be made: (1.) Before it is buried in the Gravel, of the Furnace, which is done before the Furnace is heated, it must be well wash'd from the Earth that sticks to it. (2.) It ought to be enclos'd in a Box made of Porcelain very well luted. (3.) When it is calcin'd they break it, and passing it through a Searse, put it into a glaz'd Vessel, pouring thereon boiling Water: then stirring it about, they take off the Scum which swims on the Top, and decant the the Water very gently. This way of purifying the Blue with boiling Water must be repeated twice; after which they throw the Blue, while it is yet moist, and in the condition of a very fine Paste, into a Mortar, where they grind it for a considerable time.

Where found I have been assur'd that this Azure [or Lapis Armenus] is found in Coal-Pits, or among the red Earth that lies near them: It is usual for some of it to appear on the Surface, which is an infallible Sign that if you dig a little in the same Place you will find more. It exists in the Mine in small Pieces, about the Bigness of the middle Finger, but flat and not round. The coarse Azure is common enough, but the fine is very scarce, and besides is not easily distinguish'd by the Eye; wherefore to prevent being deceiv'd, it is necessary to try it. This Proof consists in painting a China Cup, and then baking it. Could Europe furnish this fine Liau or Azure, and the beautiful Tsyu, which is a kind of Violet, as a great deal of it would go in a little room, it would be a charming Commodity for King te ching, from whence the most lovely Porcelain might be brought back in exchange. I have already (p) said that the Tsyu is sold for a Lyang and eight Tyen the Pound, that is, for nine Francs; and a Box of fine Liau, containing only ten Ounces, is sold for two Taëls, which is twenty Soûs an Ounce.

not fit for Paint.

They have attempted to paint some Vessels black, with the finest China-Ink, but without Success; for when the Ware was bak'd it became very white. Whence it may be presum'd that the parts of the Ink, not being substantial enough, were dissipated by the action of the Fire; or rather that they had not sufficient strength to penetrate the Lay of Varnish, nor to produce a Colour different from that of the Varnish.

Red Colour.

The red is made of Tsau-fan, or Copperas; and as the Chinese may have something particular in their Method of doing it, I shall give an Account thereof. They put a Pound of Copperas into a Crucible, which they lute well to another, on the Top of which last is a small Opening, cover'd in such a manner that it may be easily uncover'd when there is occasion: Then they put kindled Charcoal all about it, and to make the Reverberation the stronger, enclose it with Bricks. The Matter is not brought to perfection till the very black Smoak ceases, and a kind of a small, fine, thin Cloud succeeds. Then they take a little of this Matter, moisten it with Water, and trying it upon Fir-wood, if it produces a bright Red, they take away the Fire which surrounds, and almost covers the Crucible. When it is quite cold, they find a small Cake of Red at the Bottom of the Crucible: But the finest red adheres to the Crucible that is above. A pound of Copperas yields four Ounces of Red, wherewith they paint the China.

Tho' the Porcelain is naturally white, and becomes still more so by means of the Oil that is lay'd on it, yet there are certain Figures, that require the laying a particular sort of white on the China, which is painted with different Colours.

White, Violet, Green, and Yellow.

This White is made with a Powder of transparent Flint, calcin'd in the Furnace after the same manner as the Lapis Armenus. To half an Ounce of this Powder they add an Ounce of powder'd Ceruse, or White-lead, which also enters into the Composition of the Colours. For instance, to make a Green, to one Ounce of Ceruse, and half an Ounce of powder'd Flint, they add three Ounces of what they call Tong-wa pyen; which, according to the Information I could get, must be the finest Scales of hammer'd Copper. The Green thus prepar'd becomes the Mother of the Violet, which is made by adding a quantity of the White, and is the deeper the more there is of the preparation of Green. The Yellow is made by mixing seven Drams of prepar'd white, mention'd before, with three Drams of the Copperas Red.

The Colours
till after the
king.

The Colours apply'd to Porcelain after it has been varnish'd and bak'd do not appear green, violet, yellow, or red, till it has receiv'd the second Baking. The Chinese Book says, these several Colours are laid on with Ceruse, Salt-petre, and Copperas; but the Christian Potters mentioned nothing to me but White-lead, which is mix'd with the Colour, when it is dissolv'd in Gum-water.

Red Oil Colours.

The red Oil-colour, call'd Yew-li-bong, is made with the Powder of red Copper, and that of a Stone or Flint which has a reddish Cast. A Christian Physician told me that this Stone was a kind of Allum, used in Physic. They beat the whole in a Mortar, mixing with it young Men's Urines and the Oil of Pe-yew; but I could never discover the Quantities of these Ingredients, those who have the Secret being very careful not to divulge it. They lay this Composition on the China before it is bak'd, without employing any other Varnish; but they must take heed while it is baking that it does not run to the bottom of the Cup. They have assur'd me that the Ware whereon they lay this Red is not made of Pe-tun-tse but Kau-lin, of the yellow Earth, prepar'd in the same manner as the Pe-tun-tse. It is very likely that such kind of Earth is most proper to take this Colour.

Perhaps you will be glad to be inform'd how this Copper Powder is prepar'd. It is well known, as I have elsewhere observ'd, that they have no coin'd Money in China, but instead of it make use of Silver in Ingots, many Pieces of which are of a base Alloy: however, on certain Occasions, there is a necessity of reducing it to fine Silver; as when, for instance, the Taxes, or such like Contributions are to be paid: At which times they have recourse to Workmen, whose sole Business is to refine it, by separating from it the Copper and the Lead in Furnaces made for the purpose. And of this Copper, which probably retains some imperceptible Particles of the Silver and Lead, they make the Dust.

Before the melted Copper hardens and congeals, they dip a Brush slightly in Water, and, striking the Handle of it, sprinkle the Water on the melted Copper. This causes a Skin to rise upon the Surface, which they take up with small Iron Tongs, and plunge into cold Water: whence whence the Copper Powder is made, which increases as often as they repeat the Operation. 'Tis my Opinion, that if the Copperas was dissolv'd in Aqua-fortis, this Powder of Copper wou'd be fitter for the Red I am speaking of: But the Chinese have not the Art of making Aqua-fortis and Aqua-regia, all their Inventions being exceeding simple.

The other Kind with Che-wi-bong or Blown-red is done in the following Manner: They take a Pipe, and covering one end with a fine Gauze, apply it gently to the red Powder ready prepar'd, which the Gauze takes up; then blowing thro' the other end upon the China, it appears cover'd over with small red Specks. This sort of Ware is still dearer and scarcer than the former; because the making it is more difficult, if all the necessary Rules are observ'd.

They blow on the Blue in the same manner as the Red, but it is much easier to succeed therein. The Workmen agree, that if any wou'd be at the Expence, they could likewise blow Gold and Silver upon the China, the Ground of which should be black or blue; that is, they cou'd spread equally over the Ware a kind of Golden and Silver Shower. This sort of Porcelain being of a new Taste, would not fail to please. They sometimes blow the Varnish on. Thus, several Years ago they made some China-Ware, for the Emperor, so very fine and slender, that they were oblig'd to lay them upon Cotton for fear of breaking them by handling; and as they could not dip them in the Varnish, without taking them in their Hands, they cover'd them therewith by blowing it on.

I have observ'd that in blowing on the Blue, the Workmen, in order to lose as little as possible of the Colour, that does not stick upon the China, place the Ware upon a Pedestal, with a large Sheet of Paper underneath, which will serve for some time; and when the Azure is dry, they clear it off the Paper with a small Brush.

But for the better understanding the Method us'd by the Painters in mixing their Colours, and thence making new ones, it will be proper to set down the Proportion of the Chinese Weights. The Kin, or Chinese Pound, is sixteen Ounces, call'd Lyang, or Tael. (A) The Lyang, or Tael is, a Chinese Ounce; the Tsien, or Mas, is the tenth Part of a Lyang or Tael; the Fwen is the tenth Part of the Tsien or Mas; the Li is the tenth Part of the Fwen; the Hau is the tenth Part of the Li.

This being premis'd, I shall shew how they compound the Red which is made with Copperas, call'd Tsau-fan, and us'd upon the Porcelain that is bak'd a second time. To a Lyang or Tael of Ceruse they put two Tsien of this Red, and, passing both together through a Searce, mix them dry. Then they incorporate them with Water mix'd with common Glue, such as is sold, reduc'd to the Consistence of Fish Glue: This causes the Red to stick when apply'd to the China, and prevents its running. As the Colours, if laid on too thick, would produce Inequalities in the Ware, they from time to time dip the Pencil lightly in Water, and then in the Colour they are about to paint with.

To make a White, they add to one Lyang of Ceruse, three Tsien and three Fwen of the impalpable Powder of the most transparent Flints, calcin'd in the Gravel of a Furnace, as before mention'd; making use of Water only, without Glue, to incorporate it with the Ceruse.

They make a deep Green by adding to a Lyang of Ceruse, three Tsien and three Fwen of the Powder of Flints, with eight Fwen, or near a Tsien of Tong wa pyen. This last is nothing else but the Drofs of Copper when it is melted; and I have learnt that in using it to make the Green, it must be wash'd, and separated carefully from the Grains of Copper mix'd with it, which are not proper for a Green; nor must any part of that Metal be us'd, excepting the Scales which fly off in hammering it.

As for the yellow Colour, it is made by adding to a Lyang of Ceruse, three Tsien, and three Fwen of the Powder of Flints, and one Fwen eight Li of pure Red, that has not been mix'd with Ceruse: Another Workman has told me, that to make a fine Yellow, he put two Fwen and a half of the said Red.

A Lyang of Ceruse, three Tsien and three Fwen of the Powder of Flints, and two Li of Azure, make a deep Blue inclining to a Violet. One of the Workmen, whom I consulted, thought that there should be eight Li of the Azure — The Mixture of Green and White, for instance, one part green to two parts white, makes a very bright Sea-Green. — The Mixture of Yellow and Green, for instance, two Cups-full of a deep Green to one of a Yellow, make the Ku-lü Green, which resembles a Leaf somewhat faded.

To make a Black they moisten the Azure in Water, so as it may be a little thickish, mixing therewith common Glue macerated in Lime, and boil'd to the consistence of Mouth-Glue. When they have painted with this Black the Porcelain that is to be bak'd over again, they cover the black Places with White; and, in the baking, the White incorporates with the Black, just as common Varnish incorporates with the Blue of common China-Ware.

There is another Colour, call'd Tsju, which is a Stone or Mineral resembling Roman-Vitriol. According to the Answers made to my Questions, I am perswaded that it is gotten out of Lead-Mines; and that carrying with it the Spirits, or rather imperceptible Particles of Lead, it insinuates itself into the China without the Assistance of Ceruse, which is the Vehicle of other Colours that are laid on the double-bak'd Ware. Of this Tsju they make the deep Violet. It is found at Kan-ton, and comes also from Pe-king: But the last sort is best, being sold for a Lyang and eight Tsien a Pound, that is, for nine Livres. The Tsju will melt, and when it is melted, melted, or soften'd, the Goldsmiths use it like Enamel upon Works made of Silver: They will put, for instance, a small Circle of Tsyu within the Hoop of a Ring, or else filling the Eye of a Bodkin, enchase it like Jewel Work. This kind of Enamel will at length wear off; but they endeavour to prevent it, by putting it upon a slight Lay of either common or Fish-Glue.

The Tsyu is how prepar'd

The Tsyu, as well as the other Colours I have spoke of, is us'd only upon China bak'd a second time. As to the Preparation of Tsyu, they do not calcine it like the Lapis Armenus, but break it, and reduce it into a fine Powder, then throw into a Vessel full of Water; which having stirred about a little, they cast away when it becomes foul, preserving the Crystal that is fallen to the Bottom. The Mass thus moisten'd loses its fine Colour, and seems outwardly inclinable to an Ash, but recovers its Violet Hue again, as soon as the Porcelain is bak'd. The Tsyu will keep as long as they desire it, and when they go to paint, it is sufficient to moisten it with Water; mixing therewith, if they think proper, a little common Glue: A thing which some think unnecessary, but in this Experience must teach.

Gilding.

To gild or silver China-Ware, they add two Fuen of Ceruse, to two Tsyen of Gold or Silver Leaves carefully dissolv'd; the Silver has a great Lustre upon the Varnish Tsi-kin. But the Vessel that is Silver'd ought not to remain so long in the little Furnace [or Oven] as those that are gilt; because the Silver would disappear before the Gold would be bak'd long enough to attain a proper Lustre.

lour'd China.

There is a kind of colour'd China, which is cheaper than that painted with the Colours I have been speaking of; and, perhaps, the Account I am going to give of it may be useful in Europe with respect to Earthen-Ware, though we should never attain to the Perfection of Chinese Porcelain. To make Ware of this Sort, there is no necessity that the Materials should be very fine. They take Dishes that have been already bak'd in the great Furnace, but not varnish'd, and consequently are quite white, without any Gloss, and colour them by dipping each in the Vessel wherein the Colour is prepar'd, if they would have them all of the same Colour; but if they would give them different Colours, like the Ware call'd Wbang-lu-suan, which are divided into Squares, whereof one is green, another yellow, &c. they lay on these Colours with a large Pencil. This is all they do to this sort of China, unless that after it is bak'd they put a little Vermillion in certain Places; as for instance, on the Mouths of some Animals: But this Colour is never bak'd, because it disappears in the Fire, neither is it very lasting. When they apply other Colours, they bake the China over again in the great Furnace, [or Oven,] with other Ware not baked before. But care must be taken to place them at the Bottom of the Furnace, and under the Vent-Hole where the Fire is not so fierce; because a strong Fire would discharge the Colours.

proper for it.

Colours proper for this sort of Porcelain are prepar'd in the following Manner: To make a Green they take Tong-wa-pyen, Salt-Petre, and Powder of Flints; but in what proportion I cou'd not learn. When they are reduc'd separately into an impalpable Powder, they are to be moisten'd and incorporated together with Water. — The most common Blue, mix'd with Salt-Petre and Powder of Flints, makes a Violet; — the Yellow is made by adding, for instance, three Tsyen of Copperas-Red to three Ounces of Powder of Flints, and three Ounces of White-lead. — To make the White, they put four Tsyen of the Powder of Flints to a Lyang of Ceruse; all these Ingredients are to be moisten'd with Water. This is all that I could learn concerning the Colours of this sort of China, not having among my Converts any who were employ'd in making it.

Black China-
Ware.

Black Porcelain has also its Value and Beauty, and is call'd U-myen. This Black is of a Lead kind, resembling that of our Burning-Glasses; and the Gold they add makes it yet more agreeable. The black Colour is laid on the China when it is dry, and for this purpose they mix three Ounces of Azure with seven of common Oil of Stone. By the Tryal one may know exactly the Proportion, according as the Colour is to be more or less deep; when it is dry, they bake the Ware; after which they apply the Gold, and bake it over again in a particular Furnace.

The shining Sort.

The Shining or Looking-Glass Black, call'd U-king, is given to the China by dipping it in a liquid Mixture compos'd of prepar'd Azure. It is not necessary to use the finest Azure, but it must be a little thickish, and mix'd with the Varnishes Pe-yew and Tsi-kin, adding thereto a little Oil of Lime and Fern-Ashes: For instance, to ten Ounces of powder'd Azure they put one Cup of Tsi-kin, seven of Pe-yew, and two of Oil of Ashes of Fern burnt with Lime. This Mixture carries its Varnish along with it, and does not stand in need of a new one. When this sort of Black China is bak'd, it ought to be plac'd towards the Middle of the Furnace, and not near the Arch where the Fire is most fierce.

Pierc'd China

They make another kind of Porcelain in China, which I have not yet seen; it is almost pierc'd thro' like pink'd Work. In the Middle is a Cup fit to hold Liquor, which makes but one Piece with the Part that is pink'd. I have seen other China-Ware, whereon the Chinese and Tartarian Ladies were painted to the Life; the Drapery, the Complexion, and Features being curiously express'd, and at a distance appear'd to be enamel'd.

Another sort

It is observable, that when the Oil of white Flints only is used on the Ware, it becomes a particular Sort call'd Tsui-ki, being marbled, and full of an infinite number of Veins; so that at a distance it seems as if it had been broken to Pieces, and put together again, exhibiting a sort of Mosaic Work. The Colour that this Oil gives is a White, a little upon the Ash-Colour; and if the China be Blue, on applying this Oil, it will appear marbl'd, and as if it were crack'd, when the Colour becomes dry.

I have been shewn a kind of Porcelain inclining to an Olive Colour, which is at present the Fashion, tho' I never saw it but once. It is call'd Long-tsiuen, and I have seen some of it nam'd Tsing-ko, which is the Name of a Fruit much like an Olive. They give the China this Colour by mixing seven Cups of the Tsi-kin Varnish with four Cups of the Pe-yew, two Cups or thereabouts of Oil of Lime and Fern-Ashes, and one Cup of Tsui-yew, or the Oil made of Flints. The Tsui-yew causes a number of small Veins to appear on the Porcelain, but if apply'd alone, the Ware is brittle, and if struck has no Sound; when mix'd with other Varnish, the China is full of Veins, will ring, and is no brittler than the common Ware.

They brought me another Piece of Porcelain, call'd Yau-pyen, or Transmutation: This Transmutation is made in the Furnace, [or Oven] and is owing either to the defect or excess of Heat, or else to other Causes not easily guess'd at. This Piece was not the less beautiful or less esteem'd for being merely the effect of Chance: The Workmen intended to make Vessels of Blown-Red, but a hundred Pieces were intirely lost, and this which I am speaking of came out of the Furnace like a kind of Agate. If they would run the risk and Expence of various Experiments, they might at length discover the Art of making constantly what Chance has once produc'd, in the same manner as they have learnt to make the shining black China, call'd U-king; to which they were excited by such another Caprice of the Furnace.

When they wou'd gild with Gold, they grind it small, and dissolve it in a China Cup, till they perceive it settle into a kind of a Golden Hemisphere. They let it dry, and when they want it for use, dissolve it by bits in a sufficient quantity of Gum-water. With thirty Parts of Gold they incorporate three Parts of Ceruse, and lay it on the China as they do Colours.

As the Gold thus apply'd, grows dull after a while, and loses much of its Lustre, they restore it by moistening the China-Ware with fair Water, and rubbing the Gilding afterwards with an Agate-Stone. But they must be careful to rub the Vessel always the same way, for instance, from the right to the left.

As the Edges of the China are aptest to flaw, to remedy the Inconvenience, they strengthen them with a certain Quantity of powder'd Charcoal made of Bambú, mixing it with the Varnish, which it renders of an Ash-Colour grey. Afterwards with a Pencil they lay this Mixture on the Edges of the China already dry, and going to be put on the Wheel. When it is time, they lay the Varnish on the Edges, in the same manner as they do it on the rest of the Vessel; and after baking, they appear nevertheless extraordinary white. As there is no Bambú in Europe, I believe it may be supply'd by Charcoal made of the Willow-Tree, or, what is better, that of Elder, which partakes something of the nature of Bambú. But it must be observ'd, (1.) That before the Bambú is made use of, the green Rind ought to be stripp'd off; because 'tis affirm'd that the Ashes of this Rind will make China crack in the Furnace. (2.) The Workmen must take heed not to touch the Ware with Hands smeared with Grease or Oil; for the Place so touch'd will infallibly crack in baking.

I shall add another Particular, which I have lately taken notice of, and that is, Before the Varnish is laid on the China, they smooth it carefully, taking off the smallest Inequalities. This is done by means of a Pencil made of very small Feathers, which they just moisten in Water, and so pass it all over the Vessel with a light Hand: But this Method is taken principally with the fine Porcelain.

When they would apply a Varnish which gives the Ware an uncommon Whiteness, they put thirteen Cups of Pe-yew to one Cup of Fern-Pot-Ashes, made equally fluid with the Pe-yew. This Varnish is strong, and ought not to be laid on Porcelain that is to be painted blue, because, after baking, the Colour will not appear thro' it: But the China on which this strong Varnish is laid, may be expos'd to the intensest Heat of the Furnace. They bake this intirely white, either for the sake of that Colour, or else to gild and paint it of various Colours, and then bake it again. But when they intend to paint it blue, and wou'd have the Colour appear after it is bak'd, they should put only seven Cups of Pe-yew to one Cup of Varnish, or the mixture of Lime and Fern-Ashes.

It is proper to observe once more in general, that the Porcelain done over with the Varnish, which contains much Fern-Ashes, ought to be bak'd in a temperate Part of the Furnace, [or Oven] that is, next the three first Rows, about a Foot or a Foot and a half from the Bottom; for if bak'd on the Top, the Ashes would quickly melt, and run to the Bottom of the Ware. The same happens to the Oil-red, the Blown-red, and the Long-tsiuen, because of the Copper Powder, which is an Ingredient of this Varnish; on the contrary, they ought to bake at the Top of the Furnace, the China done over with the Tsui-yew Varnish, which, as I said before, produces a multitude of Veins, making it look as if it was piec'd.

When they would have the Vessel intirely blue, they dip it into Lyau, or Azure, prepar'd and moisten'd in Water to a proper Consistence. As for the Blown-blue, call'd Tsui-tsing, they use the finest Azure prepar'd in the manner already explain'd; they blow it on the Vessel, and when it is dry give it the ordinary Varnish, either alone, or mix'd with Tsui-yew if they would have it vein'd.

There are Workmen who trace upon this Azure, whether it is blown or otherwise, certain Figures with a long Needle, which raises up so many small Points of the dry Azure as is necessary to represent the Figure. Then they varnish it, and when the China is bak'd, the Figures appear painted in Miniature. There is not so much Labour bestow'd, as one would imagine, on on China-Ware emboss'd with Flowers, Dragons, and such like Figures; for after tracing them with an Engraver on the Body of the Vessel, they only make slight Notches about them to give a Relievo, and then lay on the Varnish.

A peculiar sort of China-Ware.

There is a kind of China-Ware which is made in the manner following: They first lay on the ordinary Varnish, and bake it, then painting it with various Colours, they bake it again. The Painting is sometimes reserv'd till after the first Baking with design; at other times, recourse is had to the second Baking purely to hide Defects, by applying Colours to the faulty Places. The Load of Colours on this sort of China recommends it to a great many People, but one usually perceives certain Inequalities on it: Whether it be owing to the Unskillfulness of the Workmen, or done in order to give the Painting a Shade, or else to conceal the Faults in the Body of the Ware. When the Painting and Gilding are dry, they pile the Vessels one upon another, putting the smaller into the larger, and then place them in the Furnace.

5. Of the Furnaces, [or Ovens] for baking the China.

Furnace or Oven for baking the China-Ware.

THE Furnaces of this kind, when small, may be made of Iron, but they are generally of Earth: That which I saw was about the height of a Man, and almost as big as one of our largest Wine-casks. It consisted of several Pieces of the same Matter as the Cases of the China-Ware are made of, being a sort of large square Tiles, about half an Inch thick, a Foot and half long, and a Foot broad. They were plac'd one upon another [edgewise] and very well cemented; having been so order'd before they were bak'd, as when laid together, to suit the Roundness of the Furnace, [or Oven.] It stood about half a Foot from the Ground, upon two or three Ranges of thick but narrow Bricks, with a firm Inclosure of Brick-Work round it, which had at the Bottom three or four Vent-holes. Between this Inclosure and the Furnace was a Space left of about half a Foot, except in two or three Places, which being fill'd up were a kind of Buttresses to the Furnace. I believe they raise both at the same time, otherwise the Furnace would have no Support.

The manner of ranging the Vessels in the Oven.

They fill it with the Porcelain that are to be bak'd a second time, pil'd in the Manner just now mention'd: In doing which, Care ought to be taken to keep the Parts that are painted from touching one another, for that would certainly spoil them. But they may set one Cup standing within another, tho' it be painted, because the Edge of the Foot of the Cup that is put in has no Painting; but the Side of one Cup ought never to touch the Side of another: So that when the China cannot easily be put one within another, the Workmen dispose them in the following Manner. A Range of Vessels being plac'd at the Bottom of the Furnace, they cover it with Plates made of the same Earth the Furnace is of, or even with Pieces of the Cases belonging to the Porcelain; for in China every thing is of use; on this Covering they put another Range of Ware, and continue piling them in this manner to the Top of the Furnace, [or Oven.]

Of covering and heating it.

When all this is done, they cover the Top with Bricks properly formed, and of the same Matter with those the Sides are made of, which jamming one within another, are cemented with Mortar or tempered Earth; only a Hole is left in the Middle, that they may see when the China is bak'd. They afterwards kindle a good quantity of Charcoal under the Furnace, and likewise upon the Covering, from whence they throw it into the Space between the Inclosure and the Furnace. When the Fire is fierce they look from time to time through the Opening, which is only cover'd with a piece of a broken Pot; and when the Vessels appear with a Gloss, and the Colours bright and lively, they first withdraw the Fire, and then the China-Ware.

Hint for recovering the Art of painting on Glass.

There comes a Thought into my Head, on occasion of those Colours which are incorporated with the bak'd and Varnish'd China-Ware by means of the Ceruse, to which formerly, according to the Annals of Few-lyang, they added Salt-Petre and Copperas. If Ceruse were likewise used in the Colours painted on Glass, and the Glass afterwards bak'd a second time, might not the Art be recovered that we formerly had of painting thereon, without diminishing its Transparency? But this Experience must determine. Our Loss of this Secret among us put me in mind of another, which the Chinese also lament the Loss of; they had the Art of painting Fish, or other Animals, on the Sides of a Porcelain Vessel, which did not shew themselves till the Vessel was full of Liquor. They call this kind of China-Ware Kya-tsing, that is, Azure put in a Press, on account of the manner of placing it. I shall communicate what they have preserv'd of the Art. Who knows but the Europeans may supply that Part which the Chinese have forgot?

A curious Sort of China.

The China-Ware to be painted in this manner must be very thin. When it is dry they lay on the Colour pretty strongly, not outwardly according to Custom, but on the Inside; they generally paint Fish thereon, as most proper to appear when the Vessel is fill'd with Water. The Colour being dry, they spread on it a thin Lay of a kind of very fine Paste, made of the same Earth as the China; so that the Azure is close-press'd between these two kinds of Earthen Plates. When the Lay is dry, they oil [or varnish] the Inside of the Vessel, and some time after put it on the Mould and the Wheel. As it has receiv'd a Body on the Inside, they make it as thin as possible on the Outside without penetrating to the Colour. Then they dip the Outside in the Oil, and when it is dry, bake it in the common Furnace.

This Work is extremely nice, and requires a Dexterity which the Chinese, it seems, are no longer Masters of; and yet from time to time they make Attempts to recover this Art of Magic painting, but in vain: one of them assur'd me not long ago, that he had made a new Trial, and was very near succeeding. But however this be, it may be said that, even at present, the finest Azure revives upon the China after having disappear'd; when they lay it on the Ware it is of a palish Black, but when dry, and varnish'd, it is intirely hid, and the Ware becomes white, but the Fire discloses all the Beauty of the Colours, much in the same manner as the natural Heat brings from the Cods the finest variegated Butterflies.

After all, there is a great deal of Art, in laying the Oil [or Varnish] on Porcelain, with respect both to the just Quantity, and the equal Distribution of it: China that is thin and slender, is done over with it twice very slightly, for if the Lay should be too thick, the Ware not being able to support it, would warp immediately; these two Lays are equivalent to one, commonly given to the fine Porcelain of a stronger make, and are apply'd the first by Sprinkling, and the other by Dipping; they take the Cup by the Outside in one Hand, and holding it sloping over the Pot of Varnish with the other, throw into it as much as will sprinkle it all over; this is repeated to a great number of Cups, and as soon as the first become dry, they oil them without in the manner following: They put one Hand within the Cup, and applying a small Stick to the Middle of the Foot [with the other] to support it, dip it in a Vessel of Varnish, and take it out again immediately.

I have said before that the Foot of the Vessel is left unfashion'd, and in reality it is not put on the Wheel to be hollow'd, till after it has been varnish'd and dry'd; within the Hollow they paint a small Circle, and often a Chinese Character, and when that is dry they varnish the Hollow, which is the finishing Stroke; for immediately after it is carried from the Laboratory to the Oven in order to be bak'd.

I have been surpriz'd to see a Porter carry steadily on his Shoulders two long narrow Boards rang'd with China-Ware, and pass in that manner thro' several Streets full of People, without breaking any of his Cargo: 'Tis true he carefully avoids jostling ever so little against any thing, because he would be oblig'd to make good the Damage; but still it is very astonishing, that the Porter should himself so well order his Steps, and every motion of his Body, as to preserve such a nice Equilibrium.

The Place where the Furnaces [or Ovens] are presents another Scene: In a kind of Porch before the Furnaces, stands a Heap of Boxes and Cases, made of Earth, for enclosing the China-Ware. Every Piece how inconsiderable soever having its Case, as well those with Lids as those without: These Lids, which stick but weakly to the lower part during the Baking, are easily sever'd by a little Stroke given them: As for the smaller Pieces, such as Tea, and Chocolate-Dishes, one Case serves several. The Workman herein imitates Nature, which to ripen Fruits, and to bring them to Perfection, incloses them in a Covering, that the Heat of the Sun may only penetrate by Degrees, and that the inward Action may not be too much interrupted by the outward Air, during the Cold of the Night.

Within these Cases is a Bed of very fine Sand, spread over where the Cup stands with the Dust of Kau-lin, that the Sand may not stick to the Foot of the Cup, which does not touch the Sides of the Case. The Top of this Case has no Lid; but another Case of the same Figure, furnish'd likewise with China-Ware, is put within it so as to cover it intirely without touching the China-Ware below; thus they fill up the Oven with large Piles of Earthen Cases, or Boxes: by the Assistance of whose thick Veils the Beauty, and, if I may so express it, the Complexion of the China-Ware within them is not tann'd by the Heat of the Fire.

As for the small Ware, inclos'd in large round Cases, each Piece is set on an Earthen Saucer, two Crowns thick, and sufficiently broad; whose Base also is sprinkled with the Dust of Kau-lin. When these Cases are somewhat large, they put no China-Ware in the Middle, because it would be too far from the Sides, and so for want of Strength, might open and give way, which would endamage the whole Pile. These Cases are one third of a Foot in height, and part of them are unbak'd as well as the China-Ware; however, they quite fill those which have been baked and serve again.

I must not forget to shew how the China-Ware is put into the Cases; the Workman does not handle it, because that would either break it (for nothing is more brittle) or at least soil or dent it; but he takes it off the Board, by means of a little String, fasten'd to the two Prongs, somewhat crooked, of a wooden Fork, which he holds in one Hand, while with the other he disposes the two ends of the String cross-wise, and opened, according to the Breadth of the China-Ware; thus incircling it, he lifts it up gently, then puts it in the Case upon a little Saucer: All this incredibly quick.

I have said that the Floor of the Oven has half a Foot depth of Gravel, to hold with greater Safety the Piles of China-Ware, which, in the Middle of the Furnace, are at least seven Foot high. The two Bottom-Cases of each Pile are empty, because there the Heat is not strong enough, and besides Part of them is covered with the Gravel for the same Reason, the Top Case of the Pile is empty likewise. The Oven is fill'd in every Part, except immediately under the Vent-hole: In the Middle stand Piles of the finest China, at the Bottom the coarser Sort, and at the Mouth that which is strongly coloured. This last Sort is compos'd of a Matter wherein there is put as much Pe-tun-tse as Kau-lin, and varnish'd with the Oil of a Stone spotted red or black, because this Varnish has a better Body than ordinary. All the Piles are plac'd very near each other, and join together ther at Top, at Bottom, and in the Middle by Pieces of Earth, placed so skillfully as to admit a free Passage for the Flame on all Sides.

All Earth is not proper to make Cafes for the China-Ware; there are three Sorts used; one is yellow, and common enough, of which they make the Bottoms; another is call'd Lau-ti, and is a strong Earth; the third, which is oily, is call'd Tu-tu. These two last are got in Winter from certain deep Mines, impossible to be work'd in Summer: If they are mix'd in equal Parts, the Cafes cost somewhat more, but will last a long while; they bring such Cafes ready made from a large Village a League from King-te-ching, down the River. They are yellowish before Baking, but afterwards of an obscure Red: When for Cheapness they use most of the yellow Earth for the Cafes, they seldom last above two or three Bakings ere they break to Pieces. If a Cafe is but slightly crack'd, or even split, they bind it with an Ozier Band, which tho' it takes Fire, preserves the Cafe for this once, so that the China-Ware does not suffer.

They take Care not to fill the Oven with new Cafes; one half at least must have been bak'd before; these are plac'd at the Top and Bottom of the Piles, and the unbak'd ones in the Middle. The History of Fou-lang says, that in former times all the Cafes were bak'd in a Furnace by themselves, before they were used to bake the China; doubtless because then, there being fewer Workmen, they had less regard to the Expence than the Perfection of the Work.

the Oven.

Let us now come to the Structure of the Ovens or Furnaces; they are plac'd at the further End of a long Porch, which serves instead of Bellows, and is withal a Warehouse; it is of the same use as the Arch in Glass-Houses: The Ovens are larger now than formerly, for then, according to a Chinese Author, they were only six Foot high and six broad, but are now two Fathom high, and almost four wide: The Arch as well as Body of the Oven is sufficiently thick, so that one may walk upon it without being incommoded by the Fire: This Arch or Vault is not flat on the Inside, nor does it rise in point, but grows narrower and narrower as it approaches the great Vent-hole, at the Extremity, through which the Flame and Smoak arise.

Besides this Mouth, the Oven has five or six Openings about its Head, like so many Eyes, which are cover'd with broken Pots, so as to allay the Air and Fire of the Oven. By means of these Eyes they judge when the China is bak'd; they uncover the Eye, which is nearest the great Vent-hole, and with Iron Tongs open one of the Cafes. If the Ware is done enough they discontinue the Fire, and keep the Door of the Oven remaining shut for some time: This Oven has a deep Hearth of equal Extent with itself, and a Foot or two wide, they ascend by a Plank to enter the Range of China in the Oven: When the Fire is lighted, they immediately shut the Door, leaving only a proper Opening to throw in thick streight pieces of Wood, a Foot long. At first the Oven is heated for a Day and a Night, and then two Men relieving each other, continually throw in Wood. One Baking generally consumes a hundred and eighty Load. Nay, a Chinese Book holds this Quantity not sufficient, affirming that formerly they burn'd two hundred and forty Load, and twenty more, if the Weather was rainy, altho' the Ovens were less by one half than they are now. They kept but a small Fire during seven Days and Nights, and on the eighth Day made a very brisk one. It must be observed, that the Cafes containing the smaller Ware had been baked before by themselves.

The old Way
that Matter.

It must be own'd, the Porcelain of the ancient Chinese is more substantial than that made in latter Times; they observ'd also another Thing, now neglected, that is, they did not open the Oven-Door of the large Ware till ten Days after the Fire was out, and of the small, not till five. At present indeed they delay taking the large Vessels out of the Oven a few Days; for if they did not they would crack; but as for the small, if the Fire ceases in the Evening, they'll take them out next Morning, it should seem, that they may save Wood in the next Baking. As the China-Ware is then burning-hot, the Operator, who takes it out of the Oven, makes use of long Slings hung about his Neck.

The baking
the Ware.

They discover that the Porcelain bak'd in the small Oven is fit to be taken out, if when looking thro' the Opening above, they see that all the Ware is Fire-red to the Bottom, that they are distinguishable one from another as plac'd in the Pile, that those that are painted look smooth, and that the Colours are incorporated with the Ware, in the same manner as Varnish is with the fine Blue, by the Heat of the great Oven. As for the Ware bak'd a second time in the great Oven, this they judge sufficiently bak'd, (1) when the Flame comes forth no longer red, but whitish; (2) when looking in at one of the Openings they see thro' the Fire the Cafes red-hot. (3) When after opening one of the top Cafes, taking out a Vessel, and letting it cool, they find the Varnish and Colour to their Liking. And lastly, when they can see the Gravel shine at the Bottom of the Oven.

The Quantity of Wood.

I have been surpriz'd that, after the burning at the entrance of the Oven 180 Load of Wood in one Day, on the next no Ashes should be found on the Hearth. They should be well season'd to the Fire that feed these Ovens. 'Tis said they put Salt in their Tea, that they may drink as much as they will without being incommoded; but I can't conceive how this salt Liquor should quench their Thirst.

Difficulty of the Work.

Considering what I have related, it can be no wonder that China-Ware is so dear in Europe, especially when you know yet further, that, besides the large Gains of the European Merchants and their Factors, few Bakings succeed quite well, and, that often the whole is lost, and they find, when the Oven is opened, both the Ware and Cafes reduced to a Mass as solid as a Rock. Too fierce a Fire, or insufficient Cafes may ruin all. It is no easy matter to regulate the proper Degree of Heat: for the Alteration of the Weather has an immediate Effect, not only upon the Fire, but on the Quality of the Subject on which it acts, and of the Wood that feeds it. Thus a hundred Workmen are ruin'd for one that grows rich; a hundred ruin themselves by still trying their Fortunes, in hopes to get enough to set up a Merchant's Shop. Besides, the China sent into Europe is almost always made from new Models, often so whimsical, that it is difficult to succeed; and the Europeans refuse it for the least Defect, in which case it must stick on the Master's Hands, because it is not to the Chinese Taste; consequently that which is sold must bear a good Price.

According to the History of King-te-ching, their Gain formerly was much more considerable; but this is to be question'd, because they had not then such Demands for their China from Europe. For my part I believe the present Dearth of the Merchandise, and Poverty of the Merchants, arises from the Dearth of Provisions, and the Scarcity of Wood in the Neighbouring Mountains; add to this, the Workmen are now not so skilful as formerly, and the Mandarins, who employ a great many to make Presents for their Patrons at Court, pay them ill.

The Workmen do not undertake all the Models that come from Foreign Countries, they have some impracticable given them in China, tho' at the same time they perform such surprising Works as Strangers would think impossible. For Instance, I have seen a large Lanthorn, like that of a Ship, all of one Piece of China, thro' which one Candle sufficiently enlighten'd a whole Room. This was made seven Years ago at the command of the Hereditary Prince, who also order'd to be made divers Instruments of Music, particularly a Sort of small Organ, call'd Tseng, about a Foot high, consisting of fourteen Pipes, whose Harmony is agreeable enough; but they attempted it in vain. They succeeded better in making Flutes, Flagellets, and an Instrument nam'd Tun-lo, which is compos'd of divers small round Plates, a little concave, each of a particular Note. They hang nine in a Frame, at different Heights, which they strike like a Dulcimer, and it returns a little Tinkling, which agrees in Concert with other Instruments, and the Singers Tone. I concluded they had the Secret of incorporating a little Metal with these Pieces, to diversify the Sound; but I was mistaken, Metal being so incapable of uniting with the China, that if a Copper Farthing be put on the Top of one of the Piles in the Furnaces, it would, when it melts, pierce all the Cases and Vessels, so that all the Vessels in the Pile would have a Hole in the Middle. Nothing can give a better Idea, than this, of the Effect of the Fire on all things in the Oven, which are affirm'd to be in a State of Fluidity.

I have, notwithstanding, seen Designs of Work perform'd, which were said to be impracticable: These were Urns above three Feet high without the Lid, which rose like a Pyramid a Foot high. They consisted of three Pieces, so artfully put together that the Joining could not be perceived. But I was told, that only eight out of twenty four succeeded well, the rest being spoilt. These Urns were bespoke by the Merchants at Kan-ton for the European Trade; Wares of so high Price not taking in China.

To come to the Works of the Chinese which are more curious than ordinary; they succeed best in Grotesque Work, and representing Animals: They make Ducks and Tortoises, that will float on the Water. I have seen a Cat painted to the Life; in her Head they had plac'd a Lamp, the Flame of which made the two Eyes, and they assur'd me that the Rats were frighted with it in the Night. They also make abundance of Statues of Kuan-in, a Goddess famous in China. She is represented holding a Child in her Arms, and is invoc'd by barren Women desirous of Children. We may compare her to the antique Statues of Venus and Diana, with this Difference, that the Statues of Kuan-in are extremely modest.

There is another kind of Porcelain, difficult to make, and therefore very scarce. Its Substance is extraordinary thin, and the Surface exceeding smooth within and without, and yet you see Mouldings on it engraven, as a Round of Flowers, for instance, or such like Ornaments. The Manner they do it is thus: As soon as it is off the Wheel, they clap it on an engraved Mould, whence the Inside takes off the engraven Figures; the Outside of it they work with a Chisel, and make it as fine and thin as possible. Then they varnish and bake it in the ordinary Oven.

The European Merchants require sometimes China Slabs in one Piece, big enough to make the Top of a Table, or Seat, or Picture-frame; but this is impossible; for the largest they can make are but a Foot or thereabouts; if they exceed that, tho' ever so thick, they'll warp. The Thickness also renders these Works somewhat difficult, and therefore instead of moulding them solid, they make two hollow Outsides, which they join, leaving a Vacancy within. They put but one Piece across, making on both Sides two Holes to frame them by, as in Cabinet-Work.

The History of King-te-ching mentions several Works commanded by Emperors, which were attempted in vain. The present Emperor's Father order'd some almost in the Fashion of our Orange-Tree Tubs, therein to breed the Red, Golden, or Silver Fish. These Vessels were to be three Foot and a half over, two Foot and a half high, the Bottom half a Foot, and the Sides a third of a Foot thick. They labour'd three Years together on these Works, and made two hundred Urns, but not one succeeded. The same Emperor order'd Slabs for the Front of a Gallery, each to be three Feet high, two and a half broad, and half a Foot thick; but they could not be made, and the Mandarins of the Province address'd the Emperor to put a Stop to the Work. Yet these Mandarins, knowing the Genius of the Europeans, have sometimes requested me to send for new and elegant Designs, that they might present them as Curiosities to the Emperor. On the other hand, the Christians entreated me not to procure procure them such Models, because the Mandarins were not so easy to be put off as our Merchants, when the Workmen tell them the Thing is impracticable; but often cause them to be well bastinadoed, before such a promising Project must be given up.

The Idol that presides over Porcel-lain.

Its Original.

As every Profession has its particular Idol, and as the Divinity is as easily communicated here as the Quality of an Earl or Marquis in some Countries of Europe, it is no wonder there should be a God of China-Ware: The Pú-sa (an Idol so call'd) owes its Origin to these Models, which the Workman cannot succeed in. The Story is thus related: One of the Emperors absolutely commanded them to make him some Pieces, after a Model he gave them. They represented several times to him, that it was an impossible thing, but their Remonstrances made him only the more positive. For the Emperors are, whilst alive, the Divinities most fear'd in China; and they often believe that nothing ought to oppose their Desires. The Officers doubled their Diligence, and treated the Workmen with all sorts of Rigour, while, poor Wretches! they were at great Labour and Expence, and received nothing but Blows. At last one of them, quite in Despair, threw himself into the burning Oven, and was consum'd in an Instant. The China-Ware then baking, 'tis said, prov'd perfectly fine, and entirely to the Emperor's liking; this Desperado pass'd ever after for a Hero, and became the Idol presiding over the Porcelain Works. But I don't find his Example was follow'd.

Antient and modern Porcelain com-
par'd.

Porcelain having been in great Esteem for so many Ages, some may desire to know in what respects that of former Times differs from that of the present, and what the Chinese think on this head. They have doubtless their Virtuoso's, who are prejudic'd in favour of Antiquity: Nay, they are all generally inclin'd that way; and yet we find some who give the Preference to the modern Works. But it is not with Porcelain as it is with old Medals, which give a light into Antiquity. Old Porcelain perhaps is adorn'd with some Chinese Characters, but not such as settle any point of History: The Curious therefore can find nothing but Fancy and Colours to give it the Preference.

Error.

Porcelain
bury'd.

I was told in Europe that the best Porcelain requires to be a long Time buried in the Earth; but this is a false Notion, and is laugh'd at by the Chinese. The History of King-te-ching, speaking of the finest Porcelain of old Times, says it was so catch'd up, that the Oven was scarce open, but the Merchants were disputing for the first Lot: so far were they from burying it in the Earth. 'Tis true, that in digging on old Ruins, and on cleansing Wells long out of Use, sometimes fine Pieces are found, which have been hid in troublesome Times, when People seek to secure their choicest Effects. It is not therefore the being brought to Perfection by burying in the Earth, but its antient Beauty being preserv'd, that acquires it such Esteem; for that alone bears such Price in China, that they will give great Sums for the least Utensil of the commonest Sort, that has been used by the Emperors Yau and Shun, who reign'd many Ages before the Dynasty of the Tangs. All that the Porcelain gets by lying long in the Ground, is a Change of its Colour, or, if you will, its Complexion, which shews it to be old. The same thing happens to Ivory or Marble, but much sooner; the China-Ware being guarded by its Varnish against Effects of the Moisture. I have my self found, in old Ruins, Porcelain probably very ancient, and I could not observe any thing singular in it. If it really had acquir'd Perfection by growing old, it was not, when new-made, equal to the present Works. 'Tis my Opinion, there was then, as now, Porcelain of all Prices.

Old Porcelain counter-feited.

The Fashion
of it.

According to the Annals of King-te-ching, there were formerly Urns of the Price of 58 or 59 Taëls each, which is more than 80 Crowns. How much greater the Price in Europe! These Annals add, that for every Urn of this Value an Oven was made on purpose, and no Expence was spar'd. The Mandarin of King-te-ching, who is my Friend, made Presents to his Patrons at Court, of old Porcelain, which he had the Art to make himself, or rather to imitate that of the nearer times of Antiquity and to do it employ'd a great many Workmen. The Matter of those false Kü-tong, or Counterfeits of Antiquity, is a yellowish Earth got near King-te-ching, at a Place call'd Ma-ngan-shan. They are very thick; the Mandarin gave me a Plate of his making, and it was as heavy as ten common ones.

A Plate with
pointed on it.

There is nothing particular in the working on this Sort of China Ware, excepting the Varnish, which is made of a yellow Stone, and being mixt with a larger Quantity of common Oil dyes the Vessels a Sea Green; when bak'd they throw them into very fat Broth made of a Capon and other Meats, then bake them again, and lay them in the nastiest Puddle they can find, for the Space of a Month or more; after they are taken out they pass for 3 or 400 Years old, or at least of the preceding Dynasty of the Mings, when Porcelain of this Thickness was the Court Taste. These false Antiques so far resemble the true, that they don't ring when struck, nor yield the least Noise if held to the Ear.

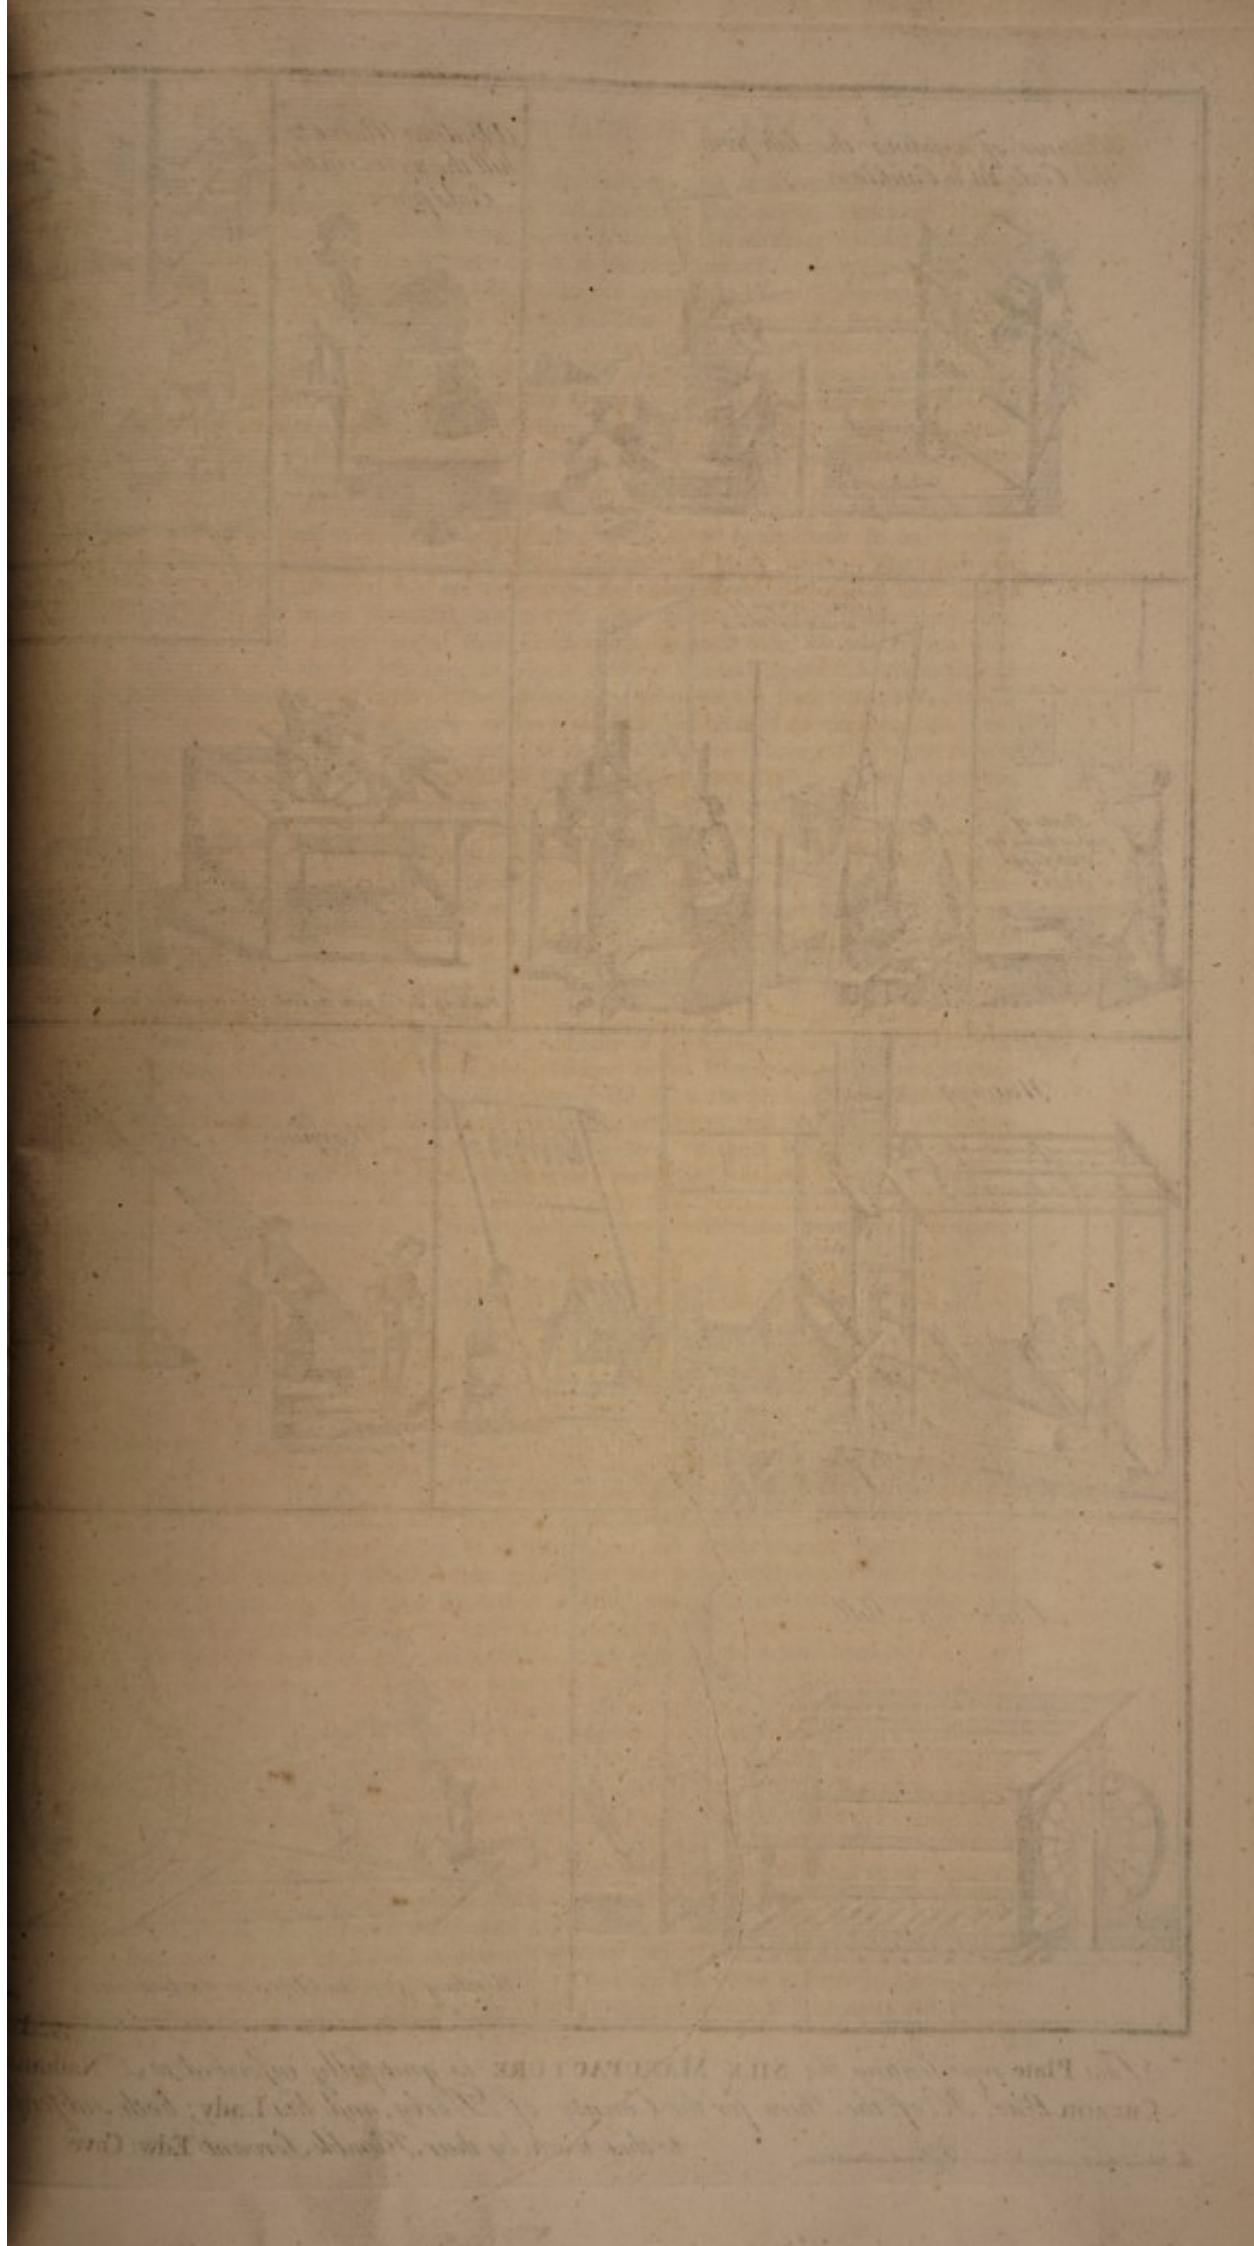

Porcelain
with Glass.

They brought me from the Rubbish of a large Shop a little Plate, which I value beyond the finest Porcelain Piece, tho' a thousand Years old. On the Bottom is painted a Crucifix between the Virgin Mary and St. John. Formerly, they exported (as 'tis said) a great deal of this Sort to Japan, but the Enemies of Religion have hinder'd any of it being made these 16 Years.

They are in China almost as curious in European Glasses and Crystals, as the Europeans are in China Ware; but yet this Curiosity has not made them cross the Sea to seek Glass in Europe. They find their own Manufacture of more Use; for their Porcelain will bear hot Liquor, and you may hold a Dish of boiling Tea without burning your Hand, if you take it after their Way; which you can't do by a Silver Dish of the same Thickness and Figure.

The Porcelain has its Lustre as well as Glass; and, tho' it be not so Transparent, it is less brittle; brittle. What happens to Glass, when just made, happens also to Porcelain; and nothing better shows the Conformity of their Nature: Good Porcelain hath a clear Sound, as well as Glass. A Diamond cuts Glass; so also they use a Diamond in reuniting broken Porcelain. They make therewith, as with a Needle, little Holes in the Substance of the Ware, in which they twist a very fine Brass Wire, and so render it fit for Service again, the Place where it was broken being scarce perceptible. This Business is a Trade in China.

I have said that there continually arrive at King-te-ching Barks laden with the Pe-tun-tse and Kau-lin, and that after these have been cleansed, they lay the Dross that remains along in great Heaps; that there were three thousand Kilns and Ovens in King-te-ching, and all full of Cases and Ware; that the Cases could serve no more than three or four Batches, and that a whole Batch is often spoil'd. It is natural, after this, to ask, into what Abyss do they cast all that 1300 Years Rubbish of Ware and Kilns?

The very Situation of King-te-ching, and the Manner in which it is built, will answer this Difficulty. This City was at first no large Place, but is now prodigiously increas'd; they build every Day, and there is not an House but is surrounded with Walls. The Bricks in these Walls are not laid flatways, nor are they cemented like Works of Masonry in Europe: The Walls in China are more beautiful, but not so solid. Long and wide Bricks incrustate, as I may say, the Wall: Every one of these has another on each Side, of which you only see the End even with the Middle one, to which they are the two Spurs. A slight Lay of Mortar round the middle one, binds all these Bricks together; and the Back of the Wall is laid in the same manner. These Walls grow narrower as they rise, till at Top they are no more than a Brick's Length or Breadth. The Spurs, or cross Bricks, no where answer those on the opposite Side, so that the Bulk of the Wall is like a sort of empty Coffin. When they have laid two or three Rows of Bricks on a shallow Foundation, they fill up the middle of the Work with Potheards, over which they throw Earth temper'd like thinnish Mortar; this binds the whole, and makes of it one Mass, which incloses the crossway Bricks on all Sides, and these lock up the middle ones, which only bear upon the Thickness of the Bricks that are under them. At a distance these Walls appear'd to me, at first, as tho' they were made of fine grey Stone, squar'd, and polish'd with the Chisel; and what is surprizing, if they take care to cover them at top with good Tiles, they will stand 100 Years. But in truth they don't bear any Timber-work, which is always sustained by massy wooden Pillars; they only serve for Enclosures to Edifices and Gardens.

We see already in part what becomes of the Rubbish of the Porcelain and the Kilns. The rest they commonly throw on the Banks of the River, below King-te-ching. Hence in time they gain upon the River; and the Rubbish being soak'd with the Rain, and trodden by the Passengers, the Ground soon becomes fit to hold a Market, or to build Streets on. Moreover in great Floods the River drags along with it large Quantities of those broken Pieces; so that its Bed is as it were pav'd with them, and affords a very agreeable Sight.

Of the Silk Manufacture.

GREECE made Italy the rich Present of Silk, which in the Time of the Roman Emperors was valu'd at its Weight in Gold. The Grecians were beholden for it to the Persians; and these, according to Authors of most Credit, as M. d'Herbelot observes, confess that they had the Knowledge of Silk-worms, and the Art of breeding them, originally from China. The most Ancient Chinese Writers ascribe their Discovery to one of the Wives of the Emperor Wang-ti, her Name Si-ling, and surnamed, for Honour's Sake, Twen-sey: But it is difficult to meet with any Memoirs of an early Date that mention the Silk-worm. Before the Time of this Queen, when the Country was but newly cleared, the People were cloth'd in Skins of Animals; which being insufficient for so multiplying a People, Necessity render'd them industrious, and they bent their Wits to make Cloth to cover themselves; but they were oblig'd to this Princess for the useful Invention of Silk.

Since her Time, several Empreses, recorded in Chinese Authors, have been agreeably employ'd in hatching and breeding of Silk-worms, in feeding them, taking the Silk, and manufacturing it; and an Orchard of the Palace was allotted for a Plantation of Mulberry-Trees. The Empreses, attended by the Queens and the Prime Ladies of the Court, went in Ceremony to this Orchard, and gather'd with her own Hands the Leaves of three Branches, which her Handmaids bended down within her Reach. The finest Pieces of Silk, made by her self, or by her Order, and under her Eye, were devoted to the Ceremony of the grand Sacrifice offer'd to Shang-ti.

There is reason to believe that the Trouble the Empreses gave themselves, was chiefly with a politic View to engage, by such great Examples, the Princesses, the Ladies of Quality, and all the People in general, to breed Silk-worms; on the same Account, the Emperors, to enoble, in some sort, Agriculture, and to excite the People to so painful a Labour, never omit, at the beginning of the Spring, the Ceremony of holding the Plow in Person; opening with it some Ridges, and sowing Grain therein. The present Emperor still observes this Custom.

Empresses of China rear
Silk-worms.

As for the Empresses, they have, for some time past, not troubled themselves about Silk: though there is yet to be seen, within the Verge of the Palace, a large Square of Houses, where stands the Church of the French Jesuits, the Avenue to which is still call'd the Way to the Nursery of Silk-worms for the Diversion of the Empresses and Queens. In the Books of the ancient Philosopher Mencius, we meet with a wise Regulation of the Magistracy, which limited the Space appointed for the Mulberry Plantation, according to the Extent of every private Man's Possessions.

We may well call China the Silk-Country, for it seems to be inexhaustible. Besides furnishing the Nations of Asia and Europe with large Quantities, the Emperor, the Princes, and their Domestic, the Mandarins, the Literati, the Women, and in short, the Generality of the Chinese wear Silk, and are cloth'd in Satin or Damask. There is scarce any excepted, but the meanest of the People and the Peasants, who wear blue Cotton.

Whence
finest Silks.

Tho' several Provinces of this Empire furnish very fine Silks, those of Che-kyang are, without Comparison, the finest and best. The Chinese judge of the Goodness of Silk by its Whiteness, Softness, and Fineness. If it feels rough, it is a bad Sign. Oftentimes, to give it a Gloss, they dress it with a Sort of Rice-Water, mix'd with Lime, which burns it, so that, when brought to Europe, it won't bear Milling: Tho' nothing takes the Mill better than sound Silk. A Chinese Workman will mill this Silk above an Hour together without stopping, that is, without breaking a Thread; and 'tis certain, nothing can look finer or neater.

Silk Mills.

Their Mills are very different from those in Europe, and far less cumbersome. Two or three wretched Blades of Bamboo with a Cog-Wheel are enough: 'Tis surprizing to see with what simple Instruments they work the finest Stuffs.

Where the
are made.

There is at Kanton another Kind of Silk, that comes from Tong-king, but not comparable to that of Che-kyang, provided this latter be not too damp; of this Silk are made the finest Stuffs in the Province of Kyang-nan, where are the greater number of good Workmen, and whence the Emperor is supply'd with Silk for his own Use, and for Presents to the Grandees and Lords of the Court. The great Trade they drive at Kanton, which is the Port for all Strangers, does not fail to draw thither a great Number of the best Workmen: They could make as rich Stuffs as any in Europe, were they sure of Vent; but they usually confine themselves to the plainest Sorts, because the Chinese chuse the Useful before the Agreeable. They make Gold-Tissue indeed, but they don't draw their Gold into Wire, to twist with the Thread, as is done in Europe, but gild a long Sheet of Paper, which they cut into very small Slips, and very artfully wrap them about the Silk.

These Stuffs look very fine, coming out of the Workman's Hand, but are not lasting, nor fit for Garments, because the Air and Moisture soon tarnish the Lustre of the Gold; they are hardly of any Use but for Church-Moveables and Ornaments; none but Mandarins and their Ladies wear them, and that but very seldom.

most in use.

The Silks most in use among the Chinese are plain and flower'd Gauzes, which are their Summer Wear; Damasks of all Sorts and Colours; striped Sattins, black Nan-king Sattins, coarse Taffeties, or small Mohairs, which are very serviceable; and several other Sorts; some like flower'd Grogan; others with open Flowers like Gauze; some striped, in a very good Taste, or masqueraded, or embroidered with Roses, &c. Crapes, Brocades, Plush, and several Sorts of Velvet. That of the crimson Dye is the dearest, but one may be easily deceiv'd in it. The Way to discover the Cheat is, to take Juice of Lemon mix'd with Lime, and sprinkle a few Drops here and there; if it changes Colour, 'tis counterfeit.

Other Sorts unknown in Europe.

In short, the Chinese make an infinite number of Stuffs that we have no Name for, but there are two Sorts most commonly worn among them. (1.) A sort of Sattin, stronger and less glossy than what is made in Europe; they call it Twan-tse. Some are plain, others varied with Flowers, Trees, Birds, Butterflies, &c. (2.) A particular Taffety, call'd Chew-tse, [Su fa] of which they make Drawers and Linings; it is close, and yet so supple, that tho' it be folded and squeezed with the Hand, it will not take the Mark of the Fold; it will wash like Linen, without losing much of its Gloss.

Of the Gloss
of Silks.

The Chinese Workmen give their Chew-tse, or Taffety, a Gloss with the Fat of a River-Porpus, which Creature they call Kyang-chu, that is to say, the Hog of the River Yang-tse-kyang; for in that great River, above 60 Leagues from the Sea, are seen Porpuses, less in Bulk indeed than those of the Ocean, but which scud along in Shoals, by Ranks, thro' the fresh Water, with the same Leaps and Evolutions as in the open Sea.

This Fat is purified by washing and boiling; then with a fine Brush they spread it over the Taffety from Top to Bottom, the same Way, and on that Side they would give a Gloss to. The Workmen burn the same in their Lamps at their Work by Night instead of Oil. The Smell of it is very useful in driving away the Flies, which otherwise would damage the Silk.

Silk.

The Province of Shang-tong yields a particular Silk, found in abundance on Trees and in Fields: It makes the Stuff call'd Kyen-chew. This Silk is produced by small Insects very like Caterpillars; they don't shape it into Cods like the Silk-worms, but in very long Threads, which stick to small Trees, or Shrubs; these Threads are gather'd, and make a coarser Silk than the House-Worms spin: But the Worms are wild, and eat the Leaves of other Trees as well as that of the Mulberry. Such as are not acquainted with this Silk, wou'd take it for a Rusty Stuff, or a Coarse Drugget.

Particular
Worms for it.

There are two sorts of Worms which spin this Silk: One larger and blacker than ours, call'd Tjwen-kyen;

Tsuen-kyen; the other, which is smaller, is call'd Tyau-kyen: The Cods of the first are of a russet grey, those of the latter more black, and the Silk has a mixture of these two Colours. This Silk is very thick, never cuts, lasts long, washes like Linnen, and when good, will not stain, even with Oil. This Silk is in great Vogue among the Chinese, and is sometimes as dear as Sattin, or their best wrought Silks. As they are very dexterous in counterfeiting, they make a false Kyen-chew of the Waste of the Che-kyang Silk; by which, without Care, one may be easily deceiv'd.

A Silk Manufactory has been set up at Kanton, within these few Years, for making Ribbands, Stockings and Buttons, which has had very good Success: The Stockings are sold for a Tael a Pair, and a dozen of the largest Buttons, for no more than Six-pence.

As the Quantity and Goodness of the Silk depend very much on the way of breeding and feeding the Worms, from the time they are hatch'd till they spin, the Method observ'd in China may become as useful as it is curious. An Author of Reputation, who lived in a Province abounding with Silk Manufactories, under the Dynaſty of the Ming, has wrote a pretty large Treatise on this Subject. Father Dentrecolles sent me an Extract of it, from which I have taken all the Directions I thought necessary for the managing, with Success, to fine a Manufacture; concluding, that the new Lights given by the Chinese on so profitable a Work, that employs so many Ships, will not be altogether useless.

Goodness of Silk.

Extract of an old Chinese Book, which teaches how to rear and feed Silk-Worms, so as to have Plenty of the best Silk.

THE Author begins immediately to direct how the Mulberry-Trees, whose Leaves the Silk-Worm feeds on, ought to be cultivated; because those Insects, says he, like other Animals, are fit for no profitable Labour, but in proportion as their Food is suitable to their Organs and Functions. He distinguishes two Sorts of Mulberry-Trees; the true one, called Sang, or Ti sang, which does not produce Fruit so large as in Europe; it being cultivated with no other View than to have Plenty of Leaves, which only are useful.

Silk-worms.
Their Food.
Two Sorts of Mulberry-
Trees.

The other Sort are small and wild, called Che, or Ye sang; these have neither the Leaf nor Fruit of the Mulberry Tree. Their Leaves are small, rough, roundish, terminating in a Point, and their Edges scollop'd; their Fruit is like Pepper, one of which grows by the Stalk of each Leaf; their Branches thorny and clustering, like a Bush. These Trees thrive best on Hills, where they form a kind of Forest.

There are some Silk Worms, no sooner hatch'd in the House, but they are laid on these Trees, where they feed themselves, and make their Cods. These Field Silk-Worms being more hardy, grow thicker and longer than the domestic ones; and tho' their Work is not so good, it is valuable and useful, as may be judg'd by what I have said of the Stuff call'd Kyen-chew. Strings for Musical Instruments are made of their Silk, because it is strong and resounding.

Field Silkworms.

'Tis not to be imagin'd that these Che, or Wild Mulberry-Trees, require no further Care than to place the Silk-Worms upon them. Several Paths must be made in these little Forests, for the Convenience of plucking up the Weeds growing under the Trees, and so far pernicious, as they harbour Insects, and especially Serpents that are greedy Devourers of these large Worms.

Wild Mulberry Trees.

The Paths are also necessary for the Keepers, who constantly traverse the Woods, in the Day, with a Pole or Gun in their Hands, and at Night beating a Copper Bason, to keep off the Birds that would prey on these Worms.

'Tis to be observ'd, that the Leaves not touch'd by the Silk-worms, in the Spring, ought to be pull'd off in the Summer. If they are left on the Trees, the Leaves of the following Spring have venomous and unwholesome Qualities. A Chinese Treatise on Plants shews the Circulation of their Sap in a very clear Light; hence they conclude, that the Sap which circulates from the old Leaves corrupts, by its Rankness, the whole Mass.

cultivated.

To render the Che Trees fitter to nourish House-worms, 'tis best to cultivate them in the same Manner, almost, as the true Mulberry-Trees, and especially to plant them but thinly, and sow the Ground with Millet, to correct the Harshness of the small Leaves, which grow too rank and too chafening. The Worms that feed on them spin the earliest and strongest Silk.

Perhaps such Silk-worms might be discover'd in Europe, as 'tis probable they were in China, if their Cods were observ'd on the Trees where they fix: They should be gather'd before they change into Moth-flies, for when they come out of their Cods they don't leave their Eggs, many of which are lost by several Accidents. To have the Male and Female Moth-flies, several of the pregnated Cods shou'd be also gather'd, and the Eggs being hatch'd the ensuing Year, should be laid on the same Trees again, where their Issue would easily nourish themselves.

One Observation has been made, which, tho' it may be of Use, the Chinese Author has not mention'd: And that is to use Oak-Leaves instead of Che-Leaves, whereon are fed the Worms that spin the Silk of which they make the Kyen-chew. The Emperor Kang-bi made the Experiment at Gebo in Tartary, where he had Silk-worms fed on Oak-Leaves; doubtless, the young and tender ones.

If any one would hazard the placing of House Silk-Worms on young Oak-Trees, some of them would probably use themselves to that sort of Rural Living, in the same manner as we see young Gentlemen of nice Education accustom'd to the Fatigues and hard Living of a private Soldier. Their Eggs would produce, without doubt, a wild Sort, such as those that spin the Silk made use of for the Kyen-chew. At least, Tryal might be made, whether the House-worms would relish young Oak-Leaves; if so, they might be used when the Mulberry-Trees are backward.

Of the true
Mulberry-
Trees.

All the Chinese Authors say of the true Mulberry-Tree, may be reduced to the following Articles, viz. to know the good and bad Sort; the manner of improving them by chusing the Trees, manuring the Soil, stripping the Leaves, grafting, and above all pruning them; and lastly, how to multiply the good Sort.

How to chuse

The Mulberry-Trees which shoot their Fruit before their Leaves, ought to be rejected, their Leaves being commonly very small and unwholesome; besides this Sort perishes in a few Years.

As to chusing young Plants, such as have the Rind shrivell'd, produce but very small Leaves, and are not to be made use of; but those that have the Bark white, few Knots, and large Buds, are always to be chosen. Their Leaves grow large and thick, and the Silk-Worms that feed on them produce firm Cods full of Silk.

The best Sort.

The best Mulberry-Trees are those that give the least Fruit, because the Sap is less divided. There is a Method to render them barren as to Fruit, but rich in Leaves, and it is, by feeding Poultry with Mulberries, either fresh pick'd off the Tree, or dried in the Sun; and then taking their Dung, and dissolving it in Water, the Mulberry Seed is steep'd therein, after which they sow it.

Of the King-sang Ma berry-Trees.

There are in general two Sorts of good Mulberry-Trees, and these are nam'd from the Provinces whence they were first brought: The one is from King, a Country in the Province of Hu-quang, and therefore named King-sang; the Leaves of it are thin, somewhat pointed, and in Shape a little like the Leaf of a Gourd. The Root is durable, and the Heart of the Trunk solid. The Worms fed on its Leaves spin a strong Silk, very fit to make the Sba and the Lo-Sba, (which is a kind of Gauze or thick Crape.) The Leaves of King are far the best for the Silk-Worms newly hatch'd; for every Age has a suitable Food most agreeable to it.

Mulberry-
Trees of Lü.

The Mulberry-Trees of Lü (the ancient Name of the Province of Shang tang) do not bear much Fruit; their Trunk is tall, their Leaves large, strong, firm, round, and full of Juice: the Branches are fund and vigorous; but the Root and Heart are neither solid nor lasting: tho' their Leaves be good for all Ages, they are more proper to feed Silk-Worms a little grown. Of these Mulberry-Trees, some shoot out their Leaves very early; this is the Sort that should be kept near home, the more conveniently to clear the noxious Grass from their Root, and to dung and water them in dry Seasons, in order to have near at Hand the first Provision for those precious Insects.

The young Trees that have been too much stripp'd of their Leaves in their first three Years, suffer for it afterwards, becoming weak and backward. The same happens to those Trees whose Leaves and Leafless Branches are not clean prun'd. They are in their prime Vigour in the third Year, but begin to decline towards the fifth, when their Roots gall. The Remedy is, in the Spring, to un-earth the Roots, and cut off the most entangled, and then cover them with a proper Mould, sprinkling it with Water.

Art of making Mulber-
young.

When the Mulberry-Trees grow old, there is an Art to recover them, by cutting off the exhausted Branches, and grafting sound Shoots in their Stead; by which means a Sap glides thro' the whole Body of the Tree, and enlivens it: This Operation should be always made in the Beginning of the second Month, which answers to our March.

To prevent these Trees from languishing, you must frequently examine, if certain Worms have not entred and lodg'd their Seed in them. These Worms are kill'd by pouring a little of the Oyl of the Tong Tree Fruit in upon them. Any other strong Oyl would certainly produce the same Effect.

The Soil proper for Mulberry-Trees.

The Soil proper for Mulberry-Trees ought not to be strong, nor too hard. Ground newly broke up is very good for this Purpose. In the Provinces of Che kyang and Kyang nan, whence the best Silk comes, Care is taken to mend the Soil with the Mud of the Canals cut thro' the Country, which are clean'd every Year. The Dung of Animals, and even of the Silk-Worms, with Ashes, is also proper Manure. Small Garden Seeds sown between these Trees, are of no Damage to them, provided the Plough does not touch the Roots. But the main and most profitable Point is to be very watchful in having the Mulberry-Trees prun'd in a right Season, and by a skilful Hand: This makes them earlier, and more abounding with Leaves: which are thereby better fill'd, and more relish'd by the Silk-Worms. The Branches about the Middle of the Tree ought particularly to be lopp'd away, that the Leaves may be pick'd the more commodiously. A Leaf-Gatherer, who places himself always in the Center of the Tree, will, with this Precaution, gather more in one Day, than another without it could in several Days, which is no small saving; besides being a readier way to supply the hungry Worms.

To gather the Leaves of the extreme Branches they use a fork'd Ladder, supported by its own Prop, that it may not hurt the Tree. Our Author asserts, that a Mulberry-Tree well prun'd is as good, and yields as much, as two others.

The

The Month of January is the Season for pruning the Mulberry-Trees, which is done in the same manner as Vines, particularly Arbour-Vines: It's sufficient that the Branches which are left have four Buds, the Over-plus ought to be thrown away. Four Sorts of Branches must be entirely cut off; 1st. Those that hang down towards the Root. 2dly. Those that shoot inwards towards the Trunk. 3dly. Of those that are forky, and shoot two and two out of the Trunks, one ought to be retrenched. 4thly. Those which grow well otherwise, but are too clustering, and too much garnish'd. None but the Branches that shoot outward from the Tree are to be spared. The following Spring they will be vigorous and flourishing, and their forward Leaves will advance the Maturity of the Worms, and the Profit of the Silk.

The Season for pruning.

Of the
pruning.

Our Author, who lays great Stress on the Art of Pruning as practised in Nan king, near Che kyang, his own Country, insists that the People of the Province of Shang tong, who prune in a different Manner, ought to try this, and not obstinately practise their old Method.

About the Close of Autumn, before the Mulberry Leaves grow yellow, they ought to be gather'd, and dry'd in the Sun, then to be pounded small, and put into large Earthen Pots stop'd with Clay, and so kept in a Place free from Smoak. In the Spring those beaten Leaves will be like Meal, and proper to be given to the Worms after Moulting.

Of the gathering of the Leaves.

In the Provinces of Che kyang and Kyang nan, where the best Silk is produced, they are very careful to hinder the Growth of the Mulberry-Trees, and lopp them to prevent their exceeding a certain Height. The Loppings are diligently heap'd together, for more than one Use; the Chinese knowing how to turn every thing to Advantage. 1st. Where Wood is scarce, they burn them to warm the Water, into which the best Silk Cods are put for the more easy Winding. 2dly. Their Ashes make a Wash for the Cods pierced by the Moth-flies, and such others as are faulty; with the help of this Wash wherein they stew, they open extraordinarily, and become fit to be spun to make Ferret-Silk, or be prepar'd for Wad us'd instead of Cotton. 3dly. Of the Bark of these Loppings they sometimes make Paper, strong enough to cover an ordinary Umbrella, especially when varnish'd and colour'd. When the Mulberry-Trees grow old, and their Leaves rank, Care should be taken to renew them: For which end, besides the Method by grafting, before explain'd, they procure new Plants, either by twisting together quick and sound Branches, in small Casks made of two Pieces of large Bamboo, and fill'd with good Mould; or by bending, at Spring, the long Branches left unprun'd, and sticking their Ends in manured Soil: In December following, when these Branches will have taken Root, they are dexterously cut from the Body of the Tree, and transplanted in the proper Season. They also sow the Mulberry Seed, which must be chosen from the best Trees, and from the Fruit that grows about the Middle of the Branches. This Seed ought to be mix'd with the Ashes of the burnt Branches: Next Day the whole is to be stir'd in Water; when the Water is settled, the uselefs Seed floats; that which sinks to the Bottom, ought to be dry'd in the Sun, and afterwards sowed, mix'd with an equal Quantity of Millet, which assists the Mulberry-Trees that then love the Shade, and defends them in growing from the scorching Heat of the Sun.

their Wood.

Manner of renewing
Mulberry-
Trees.

By the Seed.

When the Millet is ripe, they wait for windy Weather, and then set Fire to it. The ensuing Spring, the Mulberry-Trees shoot with a great deal more Strength. The Branches must be prun'd away till the Plants are grown to a proper Height, and then the Tops must be cut, to make the Branches shoot out on the Sides; at length the young Mulberry-Trees are transplanted, at the distance of eight or ten Paces, in Lines four Paces asunder; but the Trees of one Line must not be placed directly opposite to those of the next: 'Tis likely they neglect Symmetry in this, because otherwise the Trees might over-shade one another.

By Trans-planting.

'Tis not enough to have cultivated the Mulberry-Trees for the Nourishment of Silk-Worms; Apartments must also be prepar'd for those precious Insects, suitable to the different Conditions, to the Places where, and Times when they spin. Those excellent Workers, which of their own Substance contribute to the Luxury and Delicacy of our Dress and Furniture, deserve to be treated with Distinction; since the Riches they yield are in proportion to the Care taken of them, and if they suffer or languish, their Work will do the same.

Of the Apartments for Silk-Worms.

Several Chinese Writers have treated of the Apartments proper for Silk-Worms, such as in some Provinces almost every Family has, and in which only a small quantity of Silk, proportion'd to their Leisure and narrow Habitation, is gathered: But this Extract is taken from an Author, who became one of the first Ministers of the Empire, and who fully discuss'd this Matter, having wrote only with regard to large and expensive, but in the Event very profitable, Manufactories: He says, an agreeable Place ought to be chosen for the Apartment of the Silk-Worms; it must be on a dry rising Ground, and near a Rivulet; because it is necessary to wash the Eggs often, and running Water agrees best with them. Their Lodgings ought to be retir'd from all Dunghills, Sinks, Cattle, and all Noise. Disagreeable Smells, and the least Fright, make strange Impressions on so nice a Brood. Even the barking of a Dog, and the crowing of a Cock, put them into Disorder, when newly hatched.

Occasion.

The Room must be built square, and may serve for other Uses when the Silk-Worm Season is over. Its Walls should be very close for the sake of Warmth; the Door South, at least South East, but never in the North; with a Window on every Side, to receive and have a free Passage for the Air, as occasion requires. These Windows, which are almost always kept shut, are of white transparent Paper, behind which are moveable Matts placed so as to admit or shut out the Light, as occasion requires.

The Figure of the Chamber.

These Matts are also useful to keep out pernicious Winds, such as the South and South West, which should never enter the Apartments. As a refreshing Breeze is sometimes required, and in such Case, one of the Windows must be open'd, should the Air be full of Gnats and Flies, it would prove very destructive. For as they settle on the Silk-Cases, they make Blemishes, which render the Winding extremely difficult, so that it is best to hasten the Work before the Fly-Season. One ought not to be less careful to prevent the Entrance of small Lizards and Rats, which are very greedy after Silk-Worms; this is done by having active and vigilant Cats.

necessary, for the Chamber.

'Tis very material that the Eggs be hatch'd at once, and that the Worms sleep, waken, feed, and cast their Skins together; for this purpose, a constant and equal Warmth should be kept in their Apartment, by having Fire cover'd in Stoves at the four Corners of the Room, or else by carrying a Warming-Pan up and down the Room, while necessary; the Pan ought to be out of the Room, when they put in the Fire, which should be cover'd with Ashes, for a red or bluish Flame very much annoys the Worms.

The Fire proper for Silk-Worms.

Our Author would, if possible, have the Fuel, which warms the Chamber, to be of Cow-Dung; he advises to lay in a Stock of it during Winter, to moisten it, and to make it into Clods to be dry'd in the Sun: These Clods are laid upon Planks of hard Wood, which must be put into hollow Brick-work; when they set Fire to it, it produces a gentle Heat, which is very proper for the Worms, and they are pleas'd with the Smell of that Dung; but great Care must be taken to keep the Smoak out of the Chamber, for the Worms cannot bear it; this Fire keeps in a long time under the Ashes, which is no small Advantage. Lastly, to preserve the Place dry, for in case of Dampness, little Profit there can be expected, it is necessary that the Outside of the Door be cover'd with a double Matt, to keep out the chill Air.

Furniture for the Silk-Worms Nur-
tery.

He next treats of furnishing the Chamber with the necessary Utensils for keeping and maintaining the Silk-Worms: Nine or ten Rows of Shelves must be made by Stories, nine Inches more or less distant from each other; upon these they place Hurdles of Rushes, with wide Meshes, the Holes big enough to receive the little Finger, that the Warmth of the Place may the more easily penetrate them, and that the cool Air may succeed it: These several Stories must be ranged in such a manner, as to form an open Space in the midst of the Chamber, and a free Passage quite round: Upon these Hurdles they hatch the Worms, and here they feed them till they are ready to spin; but then the Scene changes.

Moreover these Hurdles being like a Cradle for these very tender Insects, they lay on a kind of Mattress, call'd the Shnois, that is to say, they spread over it a Bed of dry Straw, chopt small, upon which they put a long Sheet of Paper, softened by gentle handling; when the Sheet is fouled by their Ordure, or by the Remnants of their Meals, that is to say, by the Fibres of the Leaves, which they never touch, they cover it with a Net, having Meshes that afford a free Passage: Upon this Net they cast Mulberry Leaves, the Smell of which immediately draws up the hungry Swarm; then they take the Net off gently, and place it upon a new Hurdle, whilst they clean the old one, that it may serve another time.

You see there are many Precautions to be taken about the Habitation of the Silk-Worms: Our Author adds further, that there should be a Wall, or close Palisade round about the Chamber, and at a little distance from it, especially on the West Side, in case they should be obliged to let in the Air that Way, that the setting Sun might not strike upon the Worms.

The Gathering of the Leaves.

When he treats of stocking yourself with Mulberry Leaves, he advises you to use a wide Bag-Net, which opens and shuts much like a Purse, that the Leaves may not be stuff'd, but may dry in carrying, and not wither.

As the Worms new-hatch'd require a more nice and prepared Food, he says the Leaves must be cut into very small fine Threads; and that for this purpose a very sharp Knife must be used, that it may not squeeze the Leaves in cutting, but leave all the Delicateness of their Taste.

It is often seen that Plants degenerate, and that the Seed is not so good as its Original; it is the same with the Moth-flies, there are some weak and languishing; a good Brood must not be expected from these; and therefore you must make Choice of those that are proper: This Choice is made at two Seasons,

of distinguishing good Moth-flies from bad ones.

1st. Before they go out of their Cods, and it is then they distinguish the Male Cods from the Female. This is the way to know them; the Cods which are a little pointed, close and fine, and less than the others, contain the Male Moth-flies; the Cods rounder, bigger and thicker, and more clumsy, inclose the Females: In general, the Cods which are clear, somewhat transparent, clean and weighty are the best.

2<sup>dly</sup>. This Choice is more safely made when the Moth-flies are come out, which happens a little after the fourteenth Day of their Retirement: Those which come out a Day before the others, must by no means be used to multiply the Species; lay hold of those that come out the next Day in Crouds; the latest must be rejected. Another Mark to chuse them by is this, The Moth-flies which have bending Wings, bald Eye-brows, a dry Tail, and a reddish Belly, without Hair, must not be chosen to multiply the Breed.

Of their Mul-

When the Choice is made, they bring the Males and Females together; and lay them upon several Sheets of Paper that they may couple: This Paper must not be made of hempen Cloth, but of the Bark of the Mulberry-Tree, and must be strengthened with Silk or Cotton Thread, glu'd on the Backside, because when its Sheets are cover'd with Eggs, they must be dip'd three times in a Water which is proper for them: These Sheets of Paper must be spread on Matts well well cover'd with Straw. After the Moth-flies have been together about twelve Hours, the Males must be taken away; if they were to be any longer together, the Eggs which they would produce, being later, would not be hatch'd with the others, which Inconveniency should be avoided: The Male Moth-flies must be put in a separate Place, with those which are rejected in the beginning.

That the Females may lay their Eggs more advantageously, it is necessary to give them Room, and cover them; for Darkness hinders them from too much scattering their Eggs. When they have done laying, they must be kept covered for four or five Days; after which, all these Moth-flies, with those which were set aside, or which were taken dead out of the Cods, must be buried deep in the Earth; for it would infect any Animal to touch them. Some assert, that if they were buried in several Places of the Field, it would neither produce Brambles, nor any prickly Shrub for several Years; others throw them into Fish-Ponds, and pretend there is nothing better to fatten the Fish.

As to the valuable Seed that remains sticking upon the Sheets of Paper, some of it must still be thrown away; for Instance, those Eggs which sticking together make a sort of Clots: We must hope for Silk from the others; and of these great Care must be taken. Here my Author expresses his Surprise, that the Worms being so sensible of the least Chilness, or Moisture of the Air, their Eggs on the contrary should be found to agree very well with the Water and Snow: Would not one think (says he) that they were of two different Natures? He compares the Changes undergone by the Worms, which successively become Ants, Caterpillars, and then Moth-flies, to the Changes which in order happen to Plants, by the unfolding of their Parts, which are compact in one Situation, and dilate themselves in another; some of which wither in a Moment, and fall off at the same time, that others appear in their full Vigour.

The first Care to be taken, is to hang up the Sheets cover'd with Eggs to the Beam of the Room, which must be opened in the Front, so that the Wind may come in, without the Rays of the Sun striking upon them; that Side of the Sheet, on which the Eggs are laid, must not be turn'd outwards; the Fire which heats the Room, must neither blaze nor smoak; Care must be taken likewise, that no hempen Ropes come near either the Worms or Eggs: These Precautions are not repeated without Reason. When they have let the Sheets hang so for some Days, they take them down and roll them up loosely, so that the Eggs be within the Sheet, and then they are hang'd up again in the same Manner, during the Summer and Autumn.

The 8th of the 12th Moon, that is, the end of December, or in January, when there is an intercalary Month, they put the Eggs into cold River-Water, if it is to be got, or in Water with a little Salt dissolv'd in it, taking care that this Water does not freeze; the Sheets are left therein two Days, and lest they should swim, they keep them down to the Bottom of the Vessel, by clapping a China-Dish over them. After having taken them out of the Water, they hang them up again, and when they are dry, they roll them up a little tighter, and inclose them separately, standing on one end in an Earthen Vessel; after that, once in about ten Days, when the Sun after a Shower shines very bright, they expose the Sheet to its Rays in a shelter'd Place where there is no Dew; they leave them there about half an Hour, and then close them up in the same Manner as before.

There are some who practise a different Method: They put the Sheets into a Lye made of Ashes of the Wood of Mulberry-Trees, and after their having been there a whole Day, they take them out, and lay them some Moments in Snow-Water, or else hang them up three Nights on a Mulberry-Tree, to receive the Snow or Rain, provided it be not too violent.

These Baths, whether made of a sort of Lye and Snow-Water, or of River-Water, or Water impregnated with Salt, produce a Silk easy to wind; and contribute to render it closer, stronger, and in its Substance less porous; their chief Use is to cherish the internal Heat in the Eggs, in which their prolific Virtue consists.

When the Mulberry-Trees begin to have Leaves, it is time to think of hatching the Eggs; for they are hasten'd or hinder'd according to the different Degrees of Heat or Cold imparted to them: They forward them, if they often spread the Sheets abroad, if also, in laying them by, they roll them up very loosely; by doing the contrary, they hinder them.

Here follows the Business of the three Days preceding the hatching of the Worms. It is of great importance that they should all hatch together: When they are ready to come out, one sees the Eggs swell, and their Roundness become a little pointed: The first of the three Days, about ten or eleven o'Clock, in a clear Sky, a little Wind stirring, (as is common at that Season) these precious Rolls of Paper are taken out of the Vessel, stretch'd at length, and hung up with the Backsides towards the Sun; they keep them there till they acquire a kindly Warmth, then they are roll'd up close, and set upright in the Vessel, in a warm Place, till the next Day; then they are taken out again, and the same Operation repeated.

This Day, the Eggs are observed to change Colour, and turn of an Ash-grey: Then they clap two Sheets together, and roll them tighter, tying the Ends. The third Day towards Night, they unroll the Sheets, and stretch them on a fine Matt; the Eggs then appear blackish: If there are any Worms hatch'd, they must be cast away, because they would never be Worms of the same Community; for Experience teaches, that those Worms which are not hatched with the others, never agree with them in the time of casting their Slough, of waking, of eating, nor, which is the principal, of making Cods: These odd Worms would much increase the Care and Trouble, and occasion Loss by putting things out of course; wherefore they are seasonably banish'd: This Separation being made, they roll three Sheets together very loose, and carry them into a pretty warm Place, shelter'd from the South Wind.

The next Day, about ten or eleven o' Clock, they take out the Rolls, open them, and find them full of Worms, like little black Ants, which is what is meant by the Name they give them, He-y; the Eggs not hatch'd in about an Hour afterwards, must be thrown away: If amongst any of these new-hatch'd Worms you perceive any with a flat Head, that are shrivell'd, and as it were scorch'd, of a Sky-Blue, Yellow, or Flesh-Colour, none of these are worth keeping; the good Sort are of the Colour of a Mountain seen at a distance.

It is advisable first to weigh the Sheet containing the new-hatch'd Worms; then hold it sloping, and turn'd almost upside down, upon a long Sheet of Paper strew'd with Mulberry Leaves, and prepar'd in the Manner before mention'd: The Smell of these Leaves will attract the little hungry Worms; but the most sluggish may be help'd down with a Feather, or by gently flapping the Back of the Sheet, which being weighed by itself, will give exactly the Weight of the Worms; whence they compute, very nearly, how many Pounds of Leaves will be necessary to feed them, also the Weight of the Cods they ought to produce, barring Accidents.

Way of Management.

The Matron, or House-keeper.

We come now to treat of the right Management of these Worms, and how properly to qualify the Heat of their Nursery: For this Purpose they provide for the Worms a kind Mother, who is careful of their Wants; she is therefore call'd by our Author Tsan-má, Mother of the Worms. She takes possession of the Room, but not till she has wash'd her self, and put on proper Attire, that hath no ill Smell; she must not have eaten for some time before, nor handled Wild Succory, the Smell of which is very prejudicial to this tender Brood: She must be clothed in a single Habit, without lining, that she may judge the better, by Feeling, the degree of the Warmth of the Place, and accordingly augment or diminish the Fire; but she must carefully avoid making a Smoak, or raising a Dust, as it would be very contrary to the Delicacy of these little Insects, which must be very nicely managed before the first Moulting. Every Day, says an Author, is a Year to them, and has in it, as one may say, the four Seasons; the Morning is Spring; the middle of the Day, Summer; the Evening, Autumn; and the Night Winter.

Particular Rules concerning the Silk-Worms.

Here follow general Rules of Practice, founded on Experience, and proper to be observ'd. (1.) As long as the Eggs are kept before they are hatch'd, they require much Cold. (2.) When hatch'd, and like Ants, they want as much Heat. (3.) When become Caterpillars, and near Mewing-time, they need a moderate Heat. (4.) After the great Mewing, they must be kept cool. 5. When upon the Decline, and growing old, they ought to be warm'd by little and little. (6.) A great Heat is necessary when they are working their Cods.

Disgusts and Antipathies of Silk-Worms.

The Delicacy of these little Insects, requires great care to be taken to remove every thing that might incommode them; for they have their Distastes and Antipathies: They have a particular Aversion to Hemp, wet Leaves, or those heated by the Sun, and, when newly hatch'd, to Dust raised by sweeping; to the Moisture of the Earth, Flies and Gnats, the Smell of broil'd Fish, burnt Hair, Musk, Smoak, Breath smelling of Wine, Ginger, Lettice, Wild Succory; all great Noises, Nastiness, the Rays of the Sun, the Light of a Lamp, the quivering Flame of which must not strike upon their Eyes in the Night; the Wind that draws through Holes or Chinks, a high Wind, Cold, Heat, and especially a sudden Change from great Cold to great Heat. With respect to their Food; Leaves cover'd with Dew, those dry'd in the Sun or a high Wind, or tainted with an ill Savour, are the most common Causes of their Distempers: It is proper to gather the Leaves two or three Days before-hand, to keep them in a clean airy Place, where there is Room enough; not forgetting during the first three Days to give them the tenderest Leaves cut into little Threads.

Their Distastes.

Their Mewing.

At the end of three or four Days, when they begin to turn white, augment their Food in Quantity, but cut it not so small: Afterwards when they become blackish, they must have a greater quantity of Leaves, and as gather'd from the Tree: As they turn white again, and eat with less Appetite, lessen their Meals a little: As they grow yellow, they must have less Meat still; when they become quite yellow, and are, according to the Chinese Language, at the End of one of the three Sleeps; that is to say, when they are ready to mew, then give them nothing: Every Mewing-time they must be treated in the same Manner, in proportion to their Bigness.

The Silk-Worms eat Day and Night.

Their Meals, how often.

We now come to a more exact Account: These Worms eat equally Day and Night. After they are hatch'd, they must have 48 Meals the first Day, two every Hour, the next 30, but the Leaves not cut so small; the third Day, they must have less still: These little Insects then resemble new-born Infants, who pine, unless always at the Nipple: If their Food be not proportion'd to their Appetite, they will be over-heated, which would ruin the finest Hopes. Some advise to give them at first Leaves, which healthy Persons have kept a certain time in their Bosom, because the Perspiration of a Human Body is very agreeable to these little Worms. At the times of their Repasts, the Meals must be equally strew'd all over: Cloudy and rainy Weather takes away their Stomach: The Remedy is, immediately before their Repast to light a Wisp of very dry Straw, the Flame of which must be all alike, and held over the Worms, to free them from the Cold and Moisture that benums them, or else, to remove the Blinds from the Windows, and let in the full Day-light. These small Helps give them an Appetite, and prevent Diseases.

The Maturity of the Silk-Worms advantageous to the Breeder.

But why should they take so much Pains to make this little Swarm eat so often? It is to hasten their Growth, and to make them sooner work their Cods, the chief Profit of the Silk-Worms depending thereon. If they come to Maturity in 23, or 25 Days, a Hurdle cover'd cover'd with them, the Weight of which, directly weigh'd, amounted to a Mas, that is, a little more than a Drachm, will produce 25 Ounces of Silk; but if, for want of Care and Food, they come not to Perfection till 28 Days, they'll yield no more than 20 Ounces; and but 10, if they are a Month or forty Days in growing.

When they come to full Growth, give them an easy Food, a little at a time, and often, almost the same as when young: If they digest not their Food, at the time they begin to spin, the Cods have a saltish Moisture, that will render the Silk very difficult to wind: In a word, when they have been hatch'd 24 or 25 Days, the more their Work is deferred, and the more Leaves they consume, the less Silk they produce.

After they have cast their Slough, you must give them Leaves cut small, a few at a time, but often: This is like a second Birth, or, according to other Authors, a sort of Recovery: When the Worms are on the Point of mewing, they are like a Man sick almost to Death by the Change in his Constitution; but if he can sleep a Night, he becomes quite another Thing, and there is no more to be done but to recover his former Strength by a prudent Regimen.

There are other Diseases occasion'd either by Cold, or too much Heat: To prevent the former, a just Heat must be kept in their Room. Notwithstanding, if the Cold has seiz'd these little Labourers, either for want of the Windows being close shut, or because the Mulberry-Leaves were not well dried; it destroys their Appetite, and causes a sort of Flux, for instead of Clots they void a watery Slime; in that case you must burn Cow-Dung near them, the Smell of which will revive them to Admiration. The Disorders proceeding from Heat are occasion'd, either by letting the Worms be too long hungry, by the Quality and Quantity of their Food, by an inconvenient Situation, or by the Air without becoming all of a sudden sultry hot: In this last Case they open one or more of the Windows, but never on that Side the Wind blows; for it must not come directly into the Room, but round about, that it may be qualified: For instance, if it is a South-Wind, they open the North Window, and if the Wind be too hot, they set a Vessel full of Water before the Window: The Room may also be sprinkled with cold Water, taking great care that not a Drop fall on the Worms.

For an Excess of internal Heat, they give them the Meal made of Mulberry Leaves, gathered in the Autumn, and reduced to a very fine Powder, as I have before shewn: They moisten a little the Leaves design'd for their Repast, then strew over this Meal, which sticks to them; but they abate an Ounce of Leaves for every Ounce of the Meal. Some give the Meal of certain little green Pulse for a cooling Food, instead of the Leaf-Powder; it certainly refreshes and invigorates those Worms that eat it freely. As to an inconvenient or freight Situation, it often causes Over-heatings, and thence proceeds the most common and the most dangerous Sickness among these Worms. Tho' while shut up in the Egg they may be crowded, as soon as they are hatch'd they require a great deal of Room, especially when they are grown Caterpillars, and abound in Moisture. These Insects, tho' not cleanly themselves, suffer much by Nastiness: Their Clots, which they cast in abundance, quickly ferment, and heat them considerably, if they are not seasonably freed from them, either by sweeping them off with a Feather, or, which is better, by often removing the Worms from one Hurdle to another.

Change of Hurdles is chiefly necessary when they are grown big, and near mewing: But several Persons must be employ'd, that the Worms may all be removed at the same time: They must be touched with a light Hand, and not let fall, nor rudely set down. This would enfeeble them, and make them sluggish in their Work. Tho' changing the Hurdle is alone sufficient to cure their Disorders, for a speedy Relief, some throw upon them dry Rushes, or Straw, cut small, upon which they strew Mulberry Leaves: They crawl up to eat, and by that means come out of the Clots that over-heat them. The great Benefit of these Removals consists in the Frequency and equal Distribution of them; doing it gently, and allowing the Worms more Room every time. When they become pretty well grown, the Worms belonging to one Hurdle must be divided, and put on three new ones, like so many Colonies; afterward into six, and so on to the number of twenty, or more: For these Insects being full of Humours, must be kept at a due Distance one from another. But it is of the greatest Importance to remove them at the critical Moment, when they are of a bright Yellow, and ready to spin: An Apartment should be prepared beforehand proper for their Work.

Our Author proposes a sort of rough Piece of Timber-Work, or long Roof, very little sloping, and the Inside clear; which must be divided all round into many Partitions, each with a Shelf, where they place the Silk-Worms, and where they will afterwards range themselves, each in his District. This Machine ought to have convenient Room for a Man to go in, without displacing any thing, that he may keep a small Fire in the middle, to defend the Worms from Moisture and Cold, which are much to be feared at this time. I said a small Fire, because there must be but just enough to yield a gentle Heat, which makes the Worms more eager at Work, and the Silk more transparent. This numerous Army of Worms, being thus ranged in their Apartment, must be surrounded with Mats at a little distance, which must also cover the Top of the Machine, to keep off the outside Air; and because the Worms love to work privately, and in the dark. Nevertheless, after the third Day's Work, they take away the Mats from one o'Clock to three, and give the Sun a free entrance into the Room, but so that the Rays may not strike upon these little Labourers; after which they cover them as before. If it should thunder, they are preserv'd from the Terror of the Noise, and the Lightning, by being cover'd with the Sheets of Paper that were used when they were on the Hurdles.

In seven Days the Work of the Cods is finished, and in seven more, or thereabouts, the Worms quit their silken Apartments, and appear upon their coming out in the shape of Moth-flies. When they gather the Cods, it is usual to put them on Heaps, for it is impossible to wind off all the Silk immediately, because they are hindered by other Business. Nevertheless this hath its Inconveniences: For if out of the Heaps of Cods they defer chusing those to be left for Moth-flies to multiply the Species, the Moth-flies of those stified Cods by being squeezed and overheated will not succeed so well; the Females especially that had been hurt, would lay none but sickly Eggs: They set therefore the Cods designed for multiplication of the Species apart, and lay them upon a Hurdle big enough, and in a cool airy Place.

How to lessen the Number of Worms without hurting the Brood.

The first Way.

The second Way.

The third Way.

As to those numerous Cods, which you would not have bored, you must contrive how to kill the Moth-flies, without damaging the Work. They must not be put into the Kettle, but as they can be wound off; for if they were to soak too long, it would hurt the Silk. It would be best to wind them off all together, if a sufficient number of Hands could be employ'd. My Author affirms, that five Men can wind off thirty Pound of Cods in a Day, and supply two others with as much Silk as they can make into Skains, that is, about ten Pounds; but as that cannot always be done, he directs three Ways to preserve the Cods from being bored. The first is, to let them lie a whole Day in the Sun, the Heat of which, tho' prejudicial to the Silk, certainly kills the Moth-flies. The second Way is, to put them in Balneo Mariae: It is reckon'd of use to throw an Ounce of Salt, and half an Ounce of Rape-Oil, into the Copper; for the Exhalations, impregnated with the acid Spirits of the Salt, and the sulphureous Particles of the Oil, are supposed to make the Cods better, and the Silkeasier to wind; therefore the Machine with the Cods must go very strait into the Copper, the Top of which must be cover'd and luted, so that no Steam may get out; But if this Bath is not rightly order'd, in which many are mistaken, a great number of the Flies will bore their Cods: Upon which it is to be observ'd, (1.) That the firm and hard Cods have generally the Ball of Silk coarser, and of consequence easier to wind, which for the same Reason may be left longer in Balneo Mariae; the contrary is observ'd of the fine and slender Cods. (2.) That when the Flies are kill'd in Balneo Mariae, the Cods must be spread abroad upon Mats, and cover'd, when a little cool, with small Willow or Mulberry Branches. The third Way of killing the Moth-flies is preferable to the two former, and as follows: Put the Cods into great Earthen Vessels, and into every Vessel throw four Ounces of Salt for each ten Pound of Cods, and cover them with large dry Leaves, like those of Water-Lily; upon these Leaves lay ten Pounds more of Cods, sprinkled with four Ounces of Salt as before, filling the Vessels with several Lays; then closing the Mouth of it, so that the Air may be entirely excluded, the Flies will be stified in seven Days; but if the least Air be admitted by any Chink, they'll live long enough to pierce their Cods; for as they are of a spongy Substance, and readily imbibe the Air, the least Quantity getting in would keep them alive.

In laying the Cods in the Vessels, the choicest must be set apart; the long, white, and glittering ones yield a very fine Silk; the thick, dark, and of a Blue, like the Skin of an Onion, produce a coarse Silk.

Season proper for the Worms.

Autumn better than the Spring.

Reasons why.

So much for the Method of raising Worms in the Spring; and indeed 'tis in this Season that the Generality of the Chinese are employ'd in this Work. 'Tis true, some hatch Eggs in Summer and Autumn; and almost every Month after the first Spring-Crop: But then they must provide Workmen for the purpose, who are able to hold out, and Mulberry-Trees to supply Food enough for all the Seasons, which the Trees would hardly furnish; besides, if they are exhausted in one Year, they decay, and fail entirely the Spring following.

Therefore, according to my Author, it is best to hatch but few Worms in Summer, and only to provide Eggs for Autumn: He cites indeed an Author who advises to raise Worms in that Season, which begins towards the 15th of August; but he allots for their Food the Leaves of those Branches only, that may be spared without hurting the Tree. He prefers Autumn to the Spring, for raising Worms; (1.) Because the Spring being the Season for Rain and Winds in the Southern Parts, the Profit expected from the Labour of these Worms is more uncertain; but in Autumn, the Weather being generally serene, there is less Hazard of Success. (2.) Tho' the Worms cannot have such tender Leaves for their Food as in the Spring, yet this is fully compensated by their having nothing to fear from the poisonous and mortal Stings of Gnats and Musketoos.

The Silk-Worms bred in Summer must be kept cool, and the Windows cover'd with Gauze to keep out the Gnats: Those raised in Autumn are to be kept cool at first, but after their Mews, and when they spin, they must be kept warmer than in the Spring, because of the cold Air of the Nights. When these autumnal Worms turn Moth-flies, they might lay Eggs for the next Year; but the surest Way is to make Provision in the Spring, because those of Autumn do not always answer.

Eggs how to preserve.

If you keep the Summer Eggs to be hatch'd in Autumn, first inclose them in an earthen Pipkin, which must afterwards be set in a large Pan of cold Spring Water, as high as the included Eggs; if the Water be higher, the Eggs will perish; if lower, many of them will miscarry for want of Strength. If they are slow in Hatching, they either die, or make a very bad sort of Cods. If all these Directions are well observ'd, the Eggs will hatch in twenty one Days. Instead of cold Water, some advise to set them in the Shade of some very bushy Tree, inclosed in an earthen Pipkin never bak'd.

When

When the Silk-worms are ready to spin, they may be plac'd in such a Manner, that instead of making Cods, as they naturally do when left to themselves, they will make a Piece of Silk flat, thin, and round, like a large Wafer: This is done by laying the Worms when they spin on the Top of a Cup exactly cover'd with Paper. And several Advantages would arise from a Work thus order'd; (1.) These round and flat Pieces are as easy to wind as the Cods. (2.) They are all pure Silk, having none of that viscous Matter the Worm emits in the Shell, upon being long enclos'd in it, which the Chinese call the Urine; and which, soon as the Worm has done spinning, is taken away to prevent its damaging the Silk. (3.) You need not hurry in winding the Silk, as you must when it is in the Cods; for in this way, that Work may be deferr'd as long as you please, without Danger.

When the Silk is wound off, they immediately set upon manufacturing it. The Chinese have very simple Instruments for this Work: But 'tis hardly possible from Words to form a just Idea of Things, which the Eye is the proper Judge of. The Figures on the opposite Plate represent the various Utensils that serve in managing the Worms, with the several Tools and Instruments by which they work, to such Perfection, those fine and beautiful Pieces they send us.

Of the Chinese Language.

IN order to give a true Idea of the Chinese Language, I shall here explain the Nature of it; afterwards I shall shew how the Chinese Words must be pronounc'd, and how written in European Characters; Lastly, I shall finish with a compendious Chinese Grammar.

The Chinese has no resemblance with any dead or living Language, that we are acquainted with: All other Languages have an Alphabet of a certain Number of Letters, which by their various Combinations form Syllables and Words: This has no Alphabet, but as many Characters and different Figures as there are Words.

The only Conformity it has with the Languages of Europe is, that as our Alphabet is made up of twentyfour Letters, which are form'd of these seven Strokes,

Agrees with those of Europe
in one

㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏

viz. The A of the three first; the B of the sixth and fourth repeated; the C of the fifth alone; the D of the sixth and fourth; the E of the sixth and the third tripled; the O of the fourth and fifth join'd; the Q of the O and the seventh Stroke, &c. so all the Chinese Characters are formed, properly speaking, only of the six following Strokes,

㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏ ㇏

The Chinese have two different Languages: First the Vulgar, proper to the common People, which varies according to the different Provinces: The other is call'd the Mandarin Language, and is nearly what the Latin is to us, amongst Ecclesiasticks and the Learned.

Two Languages in China.

But the Analogy between the Chinese Language and others is so small, that this Comparison is not exact: The Mandarin Language is properly what was formerly spoken at Court, in the Province of Kyang nan, and propagated among the Polite of the neighbouring Provinces. Hence this Language is best spoken in the Provinces adjoining to Kyang nan, but by slow degrees was introduc'd into all Parts of the Empire, to the great Conveniency of the Government. It seems barren, for it has not above three hundred and thirty Words, all Monosyllables, indeclinable, and almost all end with a Vowel, or the Consonant N, or Ng.

Vulgar.
Mandarin.

These few Syllables are, notwithstanding, sufficient to discuss all manner of Subjects; because, without multiplying Words, the Sense is varied, almost to Infinity, by the Difference of Accents, Inflections, Tones, Aspirations, and other Changes of the Voice: And this Variety of Pronunciation, to those that are not well vers'd in the Tongue, is a frequent Occasion of mistaking one Word for another: For example, the Word Cbu founded drawling out the u, and raising the Voice, signifies Lord, or Master; but pronounced in an even Tone, with u long, means a Hog. When expressed quick and light, it signifies a Kitchen; but founded in a strong and masculine Tone, remitted towards the end, it intends a Column. In like manner, the Syllable Po, according to its different Accents, and ways of Pronunciation, has eleven different Meanings. It signifies, Glass, to boil, to winnow Rice, prudent, liberal, to prepare, an old Woman, to break or cleave, inclin'd, as little as may be, to water, a Slave or Captive. Whence we may conclude that this Language, which appears so barren, and confined by the small Number of Monosyllables that compose it, is nevertheless very copious and significant. Again, the same Word, variously compounded, signifies an Infinity of different Things; Mu, for Instance, by itself signifies a Tree, Wood; but when compounded has many other Significations; Mu-leau, signifies Wood prepared for Building; Mu-lan, signifies Bars or wooden Grates; Mu-hya, a Chest; Mu-syang, a Press; Mu-tsyang, a Carpenter; Mu-ewl, a Mushroom; Mu-nu, a kind of small Orange; Mu-sing, the Planet Jupiter; Mu-myen, Cotton, &c. This Word may be joyned to several others, and has as many different Significations as Combinations.

One Word of divers Significations.

Thus

Method of joyning Mo-
nosyllables.

Thus the Chinese, by differently ranging their Monosyllables, make set Discourses, and express themselves very clearly, and gracefully, almost in the same manner as we form all our Words out of the different Combinations of the twenty four Letters of our Alphabet. In short, they so naturally distinguish the different Tones of the same Monosyllable, that they comprehend its Sense, without the least reflecting on the various Accents that determine it.

We must not imagine, as some Authors have related, that they sing in speaking, and make a sort of Music; this would be shocking, and very disagreeable to the Ear: These different Tones are so nicely sounded, that Strangers find it difficult to perceive their Difference, especially in the Province of Kyang nan, where the Accent is most perfect. We may form a judgment of it from the guttural Pronunciation in the Spanish Tongue, and by the different Tones in the French and Italian: These Tones are hardly distinguishable, nevertheless they have different Meanings, which gave rise to that Proverb, The Tone is all.

The Chinese
use Figures to express their Thoughts.

The Art of joyning these Monosyllables is very difficult, especially in Writing, and requires a great deal of Study: As the Chinese have only Figures to express their Thoughts, and have no written Accents to vary the Sound, they are oblig'd to have as many different Figures or Characters, as there are Tones giving so many various Meanings to the same Word.

Besides there are Characters which signify two or three Words, and sometimes entire Sentences: For instance, to write these Words, Good morrow, Sir, instead of joyning the Characters for good, and morrow, with that of Sir, a different one must be used, which by it self expresses these three Words; and this is what so greatly multiplies the Chinese Characters: It is not therein as in our European Languages, in which the Context, or the different Placing, or Accenting, shew the various Significations of the same Word.

Difference between Words us'd in Speech and Writing.

This Method of joyning the Monosyllables is indeed sufficient to write so as to be understood, but it is mean, and used only by the Vulgar. In Composition, the polite and masterly Style is quite different from what is spoken, tho' the Words are the same; and a Man of Letters would make himself ridiculous, if he was to express himself in writing, in the same manner that he usually talks. In writing you must chuse purer Words, more lofty Expressions, and certain Metaphors, not commonly used, but adapted to the Subject treated of, and the Books you compose. The Characters of Cochinchina, Tong king, and Japan, are the same as the Chinese, and signify the same Things, tho' these Nations in speaking do not always express themselves alike; so that notwithstanding the Languages are very different, yet they very well understand each other's Writing, tho' not their Speech, and their Books are in common. Their Characters are in this respect like the Numeral Figures, which are used by several Nations under different Names, but their Meaning is every where the same.

The Learned therefore must not only be acquainted with the Characters used in the common Affairs of Life, but they must also know their various Combinations, and the various Dispositions, which of several simple Strokes make the compound Characters; and as the Number of Characters amounts to 80,000, he who knows the greatest Number, is also the most Learned, and can read and understand the greatest Number of Books. By this one may judge how many Years must be taken-up to learn such a vast Number of Characters, to distinguish them when they are compounded, and to remember their Shape and Meaning. It must nevertheless be acknowledged, that provided a Person knows 10,000 Characters, he may express himself in this Language, and read a great Number of Books. The generality of the Learned understand but 15,000, or 20,000; and few Doctors above 40,000.

Their Vocabulary.

This prodigious number of Characters is collected in their Vocabulary, called Hay-pyen; and as in Hebrew there are radical Letters which shew the Origin of Words, and serve to find those derived from them, when look'd for in their Dictionary, according to the Order of these radical Letters; so likewise the Chinese have their radical Characters: For instance, the Characters of Mountains, Trees, Man, the Earth, a Horse, &c. under which may be sought all that belongs to Mountains, Trees, Man, the Earth, and a Horse. And farther, you must learn to distinguish, in every Word, those Strokes or Figures which are above, beneath, on the Sides, or in the Body of the radical Figure.

Besides this great Vocabulary, there is a shorter, containing only 8,000 or 10,000 Characters, which is used to read, write, understand or compose Books: If they want any Words, not in this smaller, they have recourse to their great Dictionary. Our Missionaries, in like manner, have collected all the Terms, that may serve to instruct the People in the Mysteries of the Faith, and that are used in Conversation, and in common as well as difficult Books.

the ancient
ting.

Clement of Alexandria attributes three Sorts of Characters to the Egyptians; the first Epistolary, or fit for writing Letters, like those of our Alphabet; the second Sacerdotal, proper only for the Sacred Writings, in the same manner as the Notes for Music; and the third Hieroglyphical, used only for public Inscriptions on their Monuments: This was done two Ways; one by proper Images, or something that came near the Things they would represent; as when they expressed the Moon by a Crescent; the other by Aenigmatical Figures and Symbols; as a Serpent bent round with the Tail in its Mouth, to signify the Year, or Eternity. The Chinese have always had a like variety of Characters. In the beginning of their Monarchy, they communicated their Ideas by drawing on Paper the natural Images of the Things they would express; for instance, a Bird, Mountains, Trees, wavy Lines, to express Birds, Mountains, a Forest, and Water.

This

This Method of explaining their Thoughts was very imperfect, and required Volumes to express a few Things. Besides, an infinite number of Objects could not be represented by Drawing; such as the Soul, the Thoughts, the Passions, Beauty, Virtues, Vices, the Actions of Men and Animals, and many others which have neither Body nor Shape; for this Reason, they changed by degrees their old Manner of Writing; they compos'd more simple Figures, and invented many others to express those things that do not come within the Verge of the Senses.

Nevertheless these more modern Characters are truly Hieroglyphical; first, because they consist of simple Letters, which retain the Signification of the primitive Characters: Formerly, for instance, they represented the Sun by a Circle  $\odot$ , and called it Ge; now they represent it by this Figure,  $\square$  which is also named Ge. Secondly, because Human Institution has affix'd to these Figures the same Ideas, that the first Symbols naturally represented; and every Chinese Letter has its proper Signification, which it always preserves, tho' join'd with others. Tjay, for instance, which signifies Misfortune, Calamity, is compos'd of the Letter Myen, a House, and the Letter Ho, Fire; because it is the greatest Misfortune to see one's House on Fire: By this single Example it may be perceiv'd, that the Chinese Characters are not simple Letters like ours, which signify nothing by themselves; but so many Hieroglyphicks, which form Images, and express the Thoughts.

The Style of the Chinese in their Compositions is abstruse, concise, allegorical, and sometimes obscure to those who are not well vers'd in the Characters. It requires Skill to make no Mistakes in reading an Author; they say many Things in a few Words; their Expressions are lively, animated, and intermix'd with bold Comparisons, and noble Metaphors. To express, for instance, "Let none dare think of destroying the Christian Religion, which the Emperor has approv'd by an Edict", they would write, "The Ink that wrote the Edict of the Emperor in favour of the Christian Religion, is not yet dry, and you go about to destroy it." They affect, especially, to insert in their Writings, Sentences and Passages taken from the five Canonical Books; and as they compare their Compositions to a Picture, they also compare those Sentences to the five principal Colours us'd in Painting; in this their Eloquence chiefly consists: Lastly, they value themselves extremely in writing neatly, and drawing their Characters truly; and there is great regard had to this, in examining the Compositions of Candidates for Degrees.

They even prefer a beautiful Character to the most finish'd Picture; and it is common to see a Page of old Characters, if well drawn, sold very dear. They honour their Characters in the most common Books, and if by chance they find any printed Leaves, they gather them up with Respect; they think it would favour of ill breeding to make a prophane Use of them, to trample them under their Feet, or even to throw them away in a careless manner. Joyners and Masons, for the generality, will not venture to tear a printed Sheet that they find pasted against the Wall, or Wainscot, for fear of committing a Fault.

We may distinguish then three Sorts of Languages in China; that of the common People; that of the polite People; and that of Books: Altho' the first, indeed, is not so elegant as the two others; yet we should not imagine it altogether inferior to our European Languages, since it has certainly none of those Defects, that are sometimes ascrib'd to it in Europe. The Europeans who come to China, and who are not yet Masters of the Language, find equivocal Meanings, where there is not the least shadow of them: For want of taking sufficient Pains, at first, to pronounce the Chinese Words with their Aspirations and Accents, they are able to understand but imperfectly what the Chinese say, and find it difficult to make themselves understood: But the Fault is apparently in themselves, and not in the Language. We are told in some Relations, that the Learned in conversing often trace Characters with the Finger, or their Fan, upon their Knees, or in the Air; if they do, this must be out of Vanity or Custom, rather than Necessity; or because the Word they would express, may be seldom used, like our Terms in Navigation, Music, and Surgery.

Next above this vulgar and rude Language, which is pronounc'd a hundred Ways, and used in Compositions of the lowest Class, there is a more polish'd and refin'd Dialect, in which they have an infinite number of Histories and Novels, written with the utmost Elegance: Here they have Wit, Manners, lively Descriptions, Characters, and Contrasts. These little Works may be easily read and understood; and thro' them all is observ'd a Purity and Politeness, equal to the best Writings of Europe.

After these two manners of Expression, the first for the common People, who are less careful in ranging their Words; and the second, which should be the Language of the Mandarins and the Learned; comes a third Language, that of Books which are not written in a familiar Style; and in this there are many Degrees of Superiority, before they can arrive to the Majestick and Sublime Brevity of the Books called King. This Language is no longer used in common Discourse, but is only written; it could not be easily understood without the Help of the Letters, but it is read with Pleasure, and runs in a neat and flowing Style: Each Thought is generally expressed in four, or in six Characters: One finds nothing to shock the nicest Ear; and the variety of the Accents, artfully managed, affords a Sound altogether soft and harmonious.

The Difference between these Books and those call'd King, consists in the Matter they treat of; which is neither so solemn nor so elevated; and in the Style, which is neither so concise nor so grand. In sublime Subjects no Pointing is used: The Learned, for whom only these Compositions are design'd, are left to judge where the Sense concludes; and the Skillful among them are never mistaken in this Particular.

The Copiousness of the Chinese Language.

Vossius was in the right to say, that the Copiousness of the Chinese Tongue proceeds from the multitude of Characters: We may add, that it proceeds also from the various Meanings that are given them; and from the Ligatures that are made by joining them together, most commonly two and two, frequently three and three, and sometimes four and four. There was a Dictionary made by Order of the late Emperor, that at the first Compiling contained ninety five Volumes, most of them very thick, and in a small Character: Yet this Work did not comprehend all the Language, since it was found necessary to add a Supplement to it in twenty four Volumes. There is no other Language in the World, that would not be exhausted in many fewer Volumes: There is therefore no Language more abundant than the Chinese, or that can boast of having reigned three or four hundred Years in the same State in which it continues at present.

A Parallel between the Chinese and European Languages.

Doubtless, all that we have said upon this Subject will appear strange to Europeans, accustomed to the twenty four Letters of our Alphabet; but perhaps the Surprise will be lessened on Reflection, that our Language, and all others, have an infinite number of Marks, which stand for Words, that may be written with the twenty four Letters; every Art and Profession having its own proper Characters. And besides our twenty four Letters, which we diversify, many Ways, into Capitals, differing from the common Letters; into Roman, Italic, &c. we have also Variations for Writing, as Round-Hand, Secretary, Court, Text, and Italian; we have the Cyphers, or Figures of Arithmetick; we have several sorts of Punctuations, as the Period, the Comma, the Apostrophe, the Accents, the Parenthesis, the Points of Interrogation and Admiration, with many others, which are so many Characters we use to mark the Pauses of the Discourse, the Pronunciation, the Continuation, &c. Our Astronomers have Characters for the twelve Signs; for the various Aspects of the Moon and Stars: Geometricians have their Figures; Musicians their Minims, Crotchets, Quavers, and Semi-quavers, &c. In a word, there are few Arts or Sciences which have not some Characteristical Figures proper to them, that serve to express certain Ideas.

The Chinese have moreover an ancient Sort of Language and Character, which is used at present only for Titles, Inscriptions, Seals, and Devices; and in which there are some Books, that the Learned must understand: They have also a common Running-Hand which they use for Deeds, Contracts, Obligations, and Acts of Justice, as we have a particular Character for Law-Business. Lastly, they have a Letter which requires a particular Study, on account of the Variety of Strokes, and Abbreviations, or Interweavings, which render it difficult. The chief Use of this Character, is to write any Thing for Dispatch.

What relates to the Manner of pronouncing the Chinese Words, and writing them justly in European Characters, will farther illustrate what has been said concerning the Genius of this Language; [Of which in another Place.]

The Invention of Paper.

How to preserve it from Worms.

Extract of a Chinese Book on the Subject of Paper.

IN the most remote Ages of their Empire, the Chinese had no Paper, but wrote upon Boards, and broad pieces of Bambú. Instead of a Pen or Pencil, they made use of a Style, or Bodkin of Iron: They wrote also on Metal; and the Curious of that Nation still preserve some Plates, on which there are Characters very neatly traced: It is a great while however since the Use of Paper was found out. Their Paper is so fine, that many Europeans have thought it was made of Silk; not considering that Silk cannot be beaten into such a Paste, as is necessary to make Paper.

The Chinese make their Paper of the Bark of the Bambú, and other Trees. The Bambú is a Tree pretty much like a long Reed, being hollow, and divided by Knots into Joints: But very different in other respects; it being much larger, smoother, harder, and stronger. They only use the second Skin of the Bark, which is soft and white; this they beat in clear Water: The Frames they make use of to take up this Matter, are long and broad; so that they have Sheets ten or twelve Foot long, and sometimes more; they dip every Sheet into Allum-Water, which serves instead of Size; and hence they call it Fan-Paper, because Fan in China signifies Allum; this Allum hinders the Paper from soaking in the Ink, and gives it such a Lustre, that one would think it was silvered over, or varnished. This Paper is white, soft, and compact, without having the least Roughness that can stop the Pencil, or separate the Hairs. As it is made of the Bark of a Tree, it cracks more easily than that of Europe: It is apt to take Moisture, the Dust sticks to it, and the Worms insensibly get into it, if proper care be not taken to preserve it: To prevent these Inconveniences, they are obliged to beat their Books often, and as often expose them to the Sun.

Besides the Paper made of the Bark of Trees, they have some made of Cotton; and this is the whitest, finest, and most used. It is not subject to the Inconveniences just now mentioned; for it keeps as well, and is as durable as the European Paper.

The little I have said of the Chinese Paper in general, will be confirm'd by the exact Account I am entering upon; in which I shall insert nothing but what is extracted from a Chinese Work, that that appeared under the present Dynasty: It is a curious Collection, and esteemed amongst the Learned: It treats of the Invention of the Cbi, that is, of Paper; of what Materials it is made; of its Qualities; of its Form; and of the different Sorts of it.

This Chinese Author takes notice first, that the Invention is very ancient; but confesses, that it is not known, precisely, in what Century they should place its Original. The Characters Kyen, and Tse, which they made use of in former Ages instead of Cbi, to signify the Matter on which they wrote, confirm, by their Figure, what this Author advances; namely, that in ancient Times, after having, as it were, polished the little pieces of Bambú, and rendered them more limber, by the help of the Fire, but without taking the Rind off; they then delineated Letters thereon with a fine Graver; and of these little Plates, threaded one after another, they made a Volume: These Books were lasting, and capable, by their Solidity, of withstanding the Injuries of the Weather; but were cumbersome however, and unfit for Use.

They had afterwards recourse to another Method: It is certain that ever since the Dynasty of the Tsin, before Christ, and by consequence under the following Dynasty of the Han, they wrote upon pieces of Silk or Linen. For this Reason it is that the Letter Cbi is composed sometimes of the Character Se, which signifies Silk, and sometimes of the Character Kin, which signifies Linen. They used to cut the Piece of Silk or Linen bigger or less, according to the Form they had a mind to give their Volume.

At length, in the Year 95 of the Christian Æra, under the Tong han, that is, under the Han, who had removed their Court into a more Easterly Province than the Han their Predecessors, in the Reign of Ho-ti, a great Mandarin in the Palace, whose Name was Tsay-lun, invented a better Sort of Paper, which was called Tsay-bew-chi, Paper of the Lord Tsay. This Mandarin by boiling the Bark of different Trees, and of worn-out Pieces of Silk, and old Hempen Cloth, made a liquid Consistence, and reduced it to a sort of thin Paste, of which he made different sorts of Paper. He made some also of the Knots of Silk, which they called Flaxen Paper: Soon after, the industrious Chinese brought these Discoveries to Perfection, and found out the Secret of polishing their Paper, and giving it a Lustre.

Another Book, intitled, Sú y kyen chi pú, which treats of the same Subject, says, that in the Province of Se-chuen the Paper is made of Hemp; that Kau-tsong, the third Emperor of the great Dynasty of the Tang, caused an excellent Paper to be made of Hemp, on which all his secret Orders were written: That in the Province of Fo kyen, it is made of soft Bambú: That in the Northern Provinces they make it of the Bark of the Mulberry-Trees: That in the Province of Che kyang, it is made of Wheat or Rice-Straw: That in the Province of Kyang nan, they make a Parchment of the Skin that is found in the Cods the Silk-Worms spin; which they call Lo wen chi; and which is fine, smooth, and fit for Inscriptions, and Cartridges: In fine, that in the Province of Hú-quang, the Tree Cbu, or Ko-chu, furnishes the principal Material for Paper.

Speaking of the different Sorts of Paper, our Author mentions one Kind, of which the Sheets are three, and sometimes five Chinese † Chang in Length; he mentions those who have found the Secret of dying it of different Colours; and particularly he treats of the Manner of silvering it, without using any Silver; an Invention the Honour of which is given to the Emperor Kau-ti, of the Dynasty of Tsi, and which I will treat of presently. He has not omitted the Paper of Korea, which he says is made of the Cods the Silk-Worms spin; and he reports that the Koreans paid their Tribute to the Emperor in their Paper, even from the seventh Century, under the Government of the Tang.

What I have mentioned here, sufficiently proves that the Invention of Paper is of great Antiquity in China. Che-we-uen, a Chinese Author, who writ in the Time of the Han, assures us, that in the earliest Ages they had a Secret of uniting the Knots of Silk and Cotton, which they could not wind off, nor spin, and making a Consistence of it, on which they writ with Ease. This Secret was partly lost during the Revolutions of the State, and seems not to have been recovered till under the Dynasty of the Tsin.

It is certain that the Chinese Paper has one Advantage over that of Europe, in that the Sheets are made of an extraordinary Length, and being moreover full as white, is much softer and smoother. The Pencils, which the Chinese write with, would not bear the least Roughness of the Paper, because that would render it very difficult to make some of their fine Strokes.

When we say of the Chinese Paper, that it is not lasting, and that it is apt to crack; the Meaning is, that the Paper made of Bambú has these Defects. This is certainly true in one Sense; for it is apt to crack when it is ting'd with Allum, as it always is to make it fit for our Use; because without this Preparation, it would not bear our Ink: But when that is omitted, be it ever so thin, it may be handled and folded all manner of Ways, without any danger of cracking it.

The Consumption of Paper in China is so great, that it is not surprizing they make it of all sorts of Materials: For besides the prodigious Quantity that is used by the Learned, and Students, who are almost innumerable, and to furnish the Shops of Tradesmen, it is inconceivable how much is consumed in private Houses. One side of their Room is nothing but Sashes, cover'd with Paper; on the rest of the Walls, which are plaister'd over, they paste white Paper, by which means they preserve them white and smooth. The Ceiling is made of Frames cover'd with Paper, on which they draw divers Ornaments. It has indeed been justly said, that the Chinese Apartments glitter with that beautiful Varnish which we admire in Europe, but then it is also true, that in the greatest part of the Houses there is nothing to be seen but Paper. The Workmen of this Country have the Art of pasting it very neatly, and the Chinese take care to renew it every Year.

Preparation of the Matter to make Paper.

It is only the inward Bark of different Trees that is used to make Paper: But the Bambú has this Particularity, as well as the Shrub that bears Cotton, that not the Bark only, but the whole Substance of the Plant is used, by help of the following Preparations.

Woods employ'd for this Purpose.

Out of a Wood of the largest Bambús, they select Shoots of a Year's Growth, which are about the Bigness of the Calf of a large Man's Leg: They strip them of their first green Rind, and split them into strait Pieces of 6 or 7 Foot long: It is remarkable, that the Trunk of the Bambú being compos'd of long and strait Fibres, it is very easy to cleave it length-ways, but very difficult to cut it across: They bury the Pieces thus cleft in a Pond of muddy Water, that they may grow as it were rotten, and be soften'd by this Maceration. In about a Fortnight, they take these pieces of Bambú out of the Mud; and then wash them in clean Water, spread them in a large dry Ditch, and cover them with a great quantity of Lime. In a few Days they take them out again, and having wash'd them a second time, they reduce them to a sort of Threads, which they expose in the Sun to dry and whiten; then they throw them into large Coppers, where they are thoroughly boil'd: And lastly, they are reduced by Pestles to a fluid Paste.

Of the Hau-teng, or Ko-teng.

The Chinese Author adds, that upon Mountains, and in uncultivated Places, they find a Plant that shoots in long and slender Tendrils like a Vine, the Rind of which is very smooth, and slippery to the Touch. This is expressed in the Name of it, Hau-teng. It is also call'd Ko-teng; because it produces little sourish Pears, of a whitish Green, that are good to eat. Its Branches, which are about as big as the Shoots of a Vine, run upon the Ground, or twine about Trees: According to our Author, they make use of this Plant in the following Manner.

Its Preparation.

They take several Shoots of it, which they soak four or five Days in Water, when there comes out of it an unctuous fizy Juice, resembling a sort of Glue or Gum. They mix this gummy Water with the Paste of which the Paper is made, somewhat in the same manner as Painters temper their Colours; Care being taken not to put in too much, nor too little of it: The just Medium in this Case is taught by Experience. Perhaps for want of Ko-teng, the Berries of Mistleto might be used, which are naturally viscons; or the inner Bark of Holly, which being rotted, and pounded in a Mortar, is reduced to Bird-Lime.

Its Use.

When they have mixed the Juice of Ko-teng with the cleft Bambú; beaten in such a manner, that it is like a thick clammy Water; they pour this Liquor into large deep Reservoirs, which must be made with four Walls breast-high, and the Sides and Bottom so well cemented, that the Liquor cannot run out, nor soak in. Then the Workmen being placed at the sides of the Reservoir, take up with their Moulds the Surface of the Liquor, which almost instantly becomes Paper. Doubtless, the mucilaginous and glewy Juice of the Ko-teng binds the Parts, and very much contributes to make this Paper so compact, soft, and glossy; which Qualities the European has not, when first made.

The Mould different
of Europe.

The Mould used to take up the Sheets of Paper, the Frame of which is easily taken to Pieces, or rais'd, or lower'd, is not made with Wire, as those of Europe, but with Threads of Bambú. They are little thin Slips, which they draw several times through Holes made in a Plate of Steel, whereby they render them as fine as Wire: Then they boil them in Oil till they are thoroughly soaked, that the Moulds may enter lightly into the Water, and not sink deeper than is requisite to take up the Sheets of Paper.

How to make Sheets of an extraordinary Length.

When they would make Sheets of an extraordinary Size, they take care that the Reservoir and Mould be large in Proportion. They fix up a Pulley, and run through it several Strings, the Motion of which should be extremely free: These Strings sustain the Frame, and at the Moment that they pull it up, the Workmen plac'd on the Side of the Reservoir assist to take the Sheet off, working together in a regular Manner.

drying the Sheets.

The Chinese Author gives us a Way of drying the Sheets just taken off. There must, says he, be a hollow Wall built, the Sides of which should be well whiten'd. At one End of this Wall they contrive an Opening, and, by means of a Pipe convey thither the Heat of a neighbouring Furnace: At the opposite End, there must be a small Vent to let out the Smoke. By help of this Sort of Stove, they dry the Sheets of Paper almost as fast as they take them off.

Of the different Sorts of Paper.

The Paper which is made of Bambú is neither the only, nor the best, nor the most common Sort made of Trees in China; they use in this Art many other Trees, especially those which have the most Sap; as Mulberry-Trees, Elms, the Body of the Shrub which produces Cotton, Hemp, and divers other Plants, the Names of which are unknown in Europe. First of all they scrape off lightly the thin outside Bark of the Tree, which is greenish; then they take off the inner Rind in very long thin Slips, which they blanch in Water, and in the Sun, and afterwards prepare them in the same Manner as the Bambú.

Of the Paper
most in Use.

But the Paper most in Use, is that made of the inner Rind of the Tree called Cu-kú, otherwise Kú-chu; which Paper is therefore called Kú-chi. When its Branches are broken, the Bark peels off in long Slips, like Ribbands. To judge of this Tree by its Leaves, one would take it for a wild Mulberry-Tree, but its Fruit is more like that of the Fig-Tree.

This

This Fruit grows to the Branches without any Stalk; if it is pluck'd before it is perfectly ripe, it yields a sort of milky Juice from the Place where it grew to the Branches, just like the Fig: There are, indeed, so many Particulars, in which it agrees with the Fig and the Mulberry-Tree, that it might be thought a sort of Sycamore; nevertheless, it is more like a kind of Strawberry-Tree, called Adrachne, which is of a moderate Height, and the Bark of which is smooth, white, and glittering; apt to crack in the Summer, for want of Moisture. The Tree Chu kú, as well as the Strawberry-Tree, grows upon Mountains, and in stony Places.

The Chinese Herbal teaches the Manner of raising the Tree Chu kú, that it may afford a great quantity of this useful Bark, and in the Perfection requisite for making Paper. At the Vernal Equinox, says it, you must take the Kernel of this Tree, and having wash'd it, mix it with the Seed of Sesamum, which the Portuguese call Gergelin, and scatter them together at random about the Ground. The Gergelin will sprout out with the first Shoots of the Chu kú; but you must take care not to cut it in the Autumn nor in the Winter; you must stay till the next Spring, and then set Fire to the Field; that very Year you will see the Plants of Chu kú increase considerably, and at the end of three Years it will be fit to cut, and make Paper of.

To harden the Paper, and make it bear Ink, the Chinese dip it in Allum-Water: To express this Operation, the Europeans have invented the Word Panning, because the Chinese Word Fan signifies Allum. Their Method of doing it is this: They take six Ounces of Fish-Glue, very white and clean, this they cut very small, and throw it into twelve Porringers of clean Water, which they afterwards boil. It must be stir'd all the while, that there may be no Lumps: When the whole is reduced to a liquid Substance, they throw into it three quarters of a Pound of Allum, white and calcin'd, which they melt and incorporate with it. This Mixture is poured into a great wide Basin, across which they lay a small Stick smooth and round; then they shut the Edge of every Sheet in another Stick, which is cleft from one End to the other, and the Parts made to stick well together. In this Manner they dip the Sheet, gently, drawing it out as soon as it is wetted, by sliding it over the round Stick. When the whole Sheet has pass'd swiftly through this Liquor, which makes it white and more compact, the long Stick that holds the Sheet by the Edge, is stuck in a Hole in the Wall, where the Sheet hangs to dry. This is all the Art which the Chinese have to give their Paper its Body, Whiteness, and even Lustre: A Chinese Author pretends, that this Secret came from Japan.

This is a proper Place to mention another Secret, which the Chinese have, of silvering Paper, with a very little Charge, and without using Leaf-Silver: Take seven Fuen, or two Scruples, of Glue, made of Neats Leather, three Fuen of white Allum, and half a Pint of clean Water; simmer these over a slow Fire, till the Water is consumed, that is, till there arises no more Steam; Care being taken to keep this Mixture very clean. Then they spread, upon a very smooth Table, some Sheets of the Paper made of the Cotton-Tree, which is called Se lyen chi, daubing over it with a Pencil, in an equal Manner, two or three Lays of the Glue. It is easy to perceive when this Glue is apply'd in a proper Consistence, and does not run; if it does not lie even, do it over again: Then take Powder of Talc, prepared in the manner I shall immediately explain, which sift through a fine Sieve, or a piece of threaded Gauze, spreading it uniformly upon the Sheets prepar'd as above. After this they hang the Sheets in the Shade to dry; which effected, they lay them again upon the Table, and rub them gently with clean Cotton, to take off the superfluous Talc, which serves again for the same purpose. With this Powder diluted in Water mixt with Glue and Allum, you may draw any Figures at Fancy upon the Paper. Though I have mention'd only that Paper which is made of the Cotton-Tree, it must not be understood as if the others were excluded: All Sorts of Paper may be silver'd, if they are smooth, and if Talc is made Use of, prepar'd in the following Manner.

Take fine Talc that is transparent, and as white as Snow. Talc comes from the Province of Se-chuen, but that which is brought by the Muscovites is the best. The Chinese call this Mineral Tun moa che, which signifies the Stone pregnant with Clouds, because every Flake which they break off, is a kind of transparent Cloud. When you have made choice of the best Talc, it must be boil'd in Water about four Hours; after it is taken off the Fire, you must leave it in the Water a Day or two; then take it out, wash it well, put it into a Linen-Bag, and break it to Pieces with a Mallet: To ten Pound of Talc, thus broken, add three Pound of white Allum. All this must be ground in a little Hand-Mill, then sifted through a Silk Sieve, and the Powder put into Water just boiled up. When the Powder is sunk to the Bottom, and the Water become clear again, you must pour off all that you can. The Matter which remains at the Bottom, being expos'd to the Sun, makes a hard Consistence, which must be pounded in a Mortar, till reduced to an impalpable Powder. This Powder must be sifted again, and then used as before explained.

In finishing this Article, I must not omit a pretty remarkable Manufacture, which is carried on in the Out-parts of one of the Suburbs of Peking, where they renew old Paper, to answer the great Demand for that Commodity. These Workmen get together all the old Paper they can find, which they have the Art of restoring to its original Beauty and Usefulness. It matters not whether the Paper has been wrote upon, or whether it has been pasted upon Frames, or against the Walls, or has serv'd for other Purposes; all answers their End; and they purchase it out of the Provinces at a very moderate Rate. These Workmen occupy a pretty long Village, the Backside of their Houses being built against the Burying-Places, and every House having an Inclosure of Walls that are well whitened. Here in each House may be seen great Heaps of old Paper; and if there happens to be a pretty deal of fine Paper amongst these Heaps, they sort it. They put these Pieces of old Paper into great Baskets that are made flat and close; and in these carry them near a Well, upon a little paved Place, which has a small Descent. Here they wash the old Paper with all their Strength, rubbing it with their Hands, and stamping on it with their Feet, to get the Filth out of it, and so reduce it to a shapeless Mass: Then they boil this Consistence, and after having beaten it till it is fit to make Paper, they pour it into a Reservoir. The Sheets of this Paper are but of a middling Size. When they have taken up a pretty large Pile, they carry it into the neighbouring Inclosure, where, separating each Sheet with the point of a Needle, they stick them up wet against the Wall, which is very smooth and white. As soon as the Heat of the Sun has dry'd all the Sheets, which it does in a very little time, they take them off, and collect them together.

Of the Chinese Ink.

Of its Composition.

Figures which they print in their Ink.

How to make the best Ink.

The Invention of Paper had been of little Service to the Chinese, if they had not at the same time invented a sort of Ink, wherewith to draw their Characters upon it. The Ink they use is made of Lampblack, which they get by burning several sorts of Matter, but chiefly Pine-wood or Oil. They mix Perfumes with it, to correct the strong and disagreeable Smell of the Oil. They incorporate together these Ingredients, till they come to the Consistence of a Paste, which they put into divers wooden Moulds. These Moulds are well and variously wrought, in order to print upon the Paste what Figures they please. The usual Impressions are of Men, Dragons, Birds, Trees, Flowers, and the like. The Form of the Lump is commonly that of a Truncheon, or of their Writing-Tables; and one of the Sides is almost always covered with Chinese Characters. The best Ink is made at Whey chow, a Town in the Province of Kyang nan: There are many things to be observ'd in the making of it, and it has several Degrees of Goodness; according to which it is dearer or cheaper. The Europeans have endeavour'd to counterfeit this Ink, but without Success. Painters, and those who delight in Drawing, know how useful it is for tracing their Sketches, because they can give it what Degree of Shade they please. They make use of a red Ink also in China; but this is of little Request, except for the Titles and Inscriptions of Books. As to other Particulars, every thing which relates to Writing, is so reputable among the Chinese, that even the Workmen employ'd in making the Ink, are not look'd upon as following a servile and mechanical Employment.

Era of the Invention of Ink in China.

Its first Age.

The same Author, whom I have just now quoted in the Article of Chinese Paper, and who furnishes me with what I am further to say concerning their Ink, affirms, that this latter has been invented Time out of Mind, but that it was many Years before it attained its present Perfection.

At first they used to write with a sort of a black Earth; and indeed the Character Me, which signifies Ink, has in its Composition, at the Bottom, the Character Ti, which signifies Earth, and at the Top, that of He, which signifies Black. According to some, they drew a black Juice out of this Earth, or Stone: Others say, that after having wetted it, they rubb'd it upon Marble, and they got from it a black Liquor: Others again, that it was calcin'd, and after being reduc'd to a very fine Powder, was made into Ink. In fine, according to our Author, the Use of this Ink is so ancient, that the famous Emperor Vu vang, who is well known to have flourished 1120 Years before the Christian Era, took from hence this Moral Reflection. "As the Stone Me, which they make use of to blacken the engraved Letters, can never become white; so a Heart defiled with Iniquity, will always retain its Blackness.

Pieces of Ink sent in Tribute.

Era of modern Ink.

Of the Imperial Ink.

Under the first Emperors of the Dynasty of the Tong, that is about the Year 620 of the Christian Era, the King of Korea, sending his annual Tribute to the Emperor of China, presented him with some pieces of Ink, which were made of Lampblack, gathered by burning old Pine-Trees, and incorporated with Size made of Hartshorn, to give it a Consistence. This Ink had such a Lustre, that it look'd as if it had been varnish'd over; which tended to raise the Emulation of the Chinese. They endeavour'd to imitate the Art of the Koreans, and succeeded after several Essays: But they did not attain the Perfection desired, till near the end of the same Dynasty, about the Year of Christ 900, for it was not till about that Time they first made the excellent Ink, which is used at present.

In the Year 1070 of the Christian Era, under the Reign of Shin tsong, they made an Ink with further Improvement, which was called Imperial, Yu me, because it was used in the Palace. The Lampblack in this Ink was more expensive, and much finer than before: It was not made by burning Pine-Trees only, as formerly; but by burning Oil in Lamps with many Funnel, the Smoke whereof was gathered by a brazen Concave, which condensing it, made the Lampblack desired. In making it up, they added a little Musk, to give it a pleasant Odour. Our Author does not say what Oil was used, nor how they contriv'd to get the most Lampblack, and of the best Qualities, from the Oil; for all which there are certain Rules to be observ'd: Perhaps they made use of the Oil of Gergelin. Olive-Oil, or the Oil of Walnuts, which are not us'd in China, would certainly do better.

The first Receipt.

Another Chinese Book, intitled The Method of making Ink, gives a Receipt to make a good Sort, in which there are some Ingredients that cannot easily be known in Europe. 1st. says he, Take ten Ounces of Lampblack made from Pines. 2d. Of the Plants Ho byang, and Kan fung. 3. Add Juice of Ginger. 4. Of the Pods or Shells called Chu bya tsau ko. Boil these four Ingredients in Water: When the Virtues of the Vegetables are thus extracted, the Liquor must be strain'd off: This Liquor, already thickened, being settled and clarified, must be set again on the Fire to give it the Consistence of a Paste; and in every ten Ounces of this Mixture, Mixture, there must be dissolved four Ounces of the Glue, call'd O kyau, in which there have been incorporated three Leaves of Gold, and two of Silver: When all these Ingredients are thus prepared, they then mix with them the ten Ounces of Lampblack, to give a Body to the whole. This Composition must be beat a long while with a Spatula: And then, lastly, they put it into Moulds, to make it into Cakes; soon after which they bury the Ink in cold Ashes, where it remains five Days, if in the Spring; three, if Summer; seven, if Autumn; and ten, if Winter: And this is the last Operation it goes through.

These Intelligences are very imperfect, because it is difficult to find out, by the Chinese Names, what the Plants are. One of our Missionaries has sent me his Conjectures concerning them, which may help to discover them, if there were any such in Europe; or at least, to substitute others in their Room, capable of giving the Ink a Body, a good Scent, and a Lustre.

1. According to the Chinese Dictionaries, Ho byang is an aromatic medicinal Plant. It has the intrinsic Qualities of the Sá bo, another Plant from which they extract a Sort of Oil, <sup>Of the Ho byang.</sup> that is sold at Peking; and which the Dealers often mix with the Balsam of Peru, to augment its Quantity. This Oil, extracted from the Sá bo, seems to be the liquid Storax, which is a viscous Matter, of a greyish Colour, of a strong aromatick Odour, and which has the Consistence of a thick Balsam.

2. The Kan sung is a Plant which enters in divers Compositions of Perfumes. It is of a temperate Nature, and sweet to the Taste; for so the Name Kan denotes. Its Leaves are very <sup>Of the Kan sung.</sup> fine, and of a close Contexture. They add, that this Plant is an excellent Remedy for the Cholick, and other Distempers in the Bowels.

3. Tsu ya receiv'd its Name because the Fruit of this Shrub very much resembles a Boar's Tusk, in Shape, Length, and Thickness. To this they add the two Characters, Tsau ho, <sup>Of the Tsu ya.</sup> which signify a sort of black Horn, and would induce one to take it for the Fruit of the Carob, or Locust-Tree, the Shape of which resembles a Horn, and is of a dark red Colour. We may observe, however, that the Chinese Fruit is not so long as that of the Carob-Tree, and that, instead of being flat, it is almost round, full of little Cells, containing a marrowy Substance, of a sharp and unpleasant Taste.

4. Instead of the Glue of O kyau, which is made of the Skin of a black Ass, and a particular Water found only in one Place of the Province of Sban tong, another sort of strong Glue might be used, as for instance that which we call Taurina.

5. The Bed of cold Ashes, in which they bury their Ink newly made, serves to extract from it all that the Glue might leave in it too hard or binding.

I add to this first Receipt another, both easier and shorter, taken from the Chinese, and which perhaps may suffice to make the Ink of a good Black, which is looked upon as an essential Property. Burn, say they, Lampblack in a Crucible, and hold it over the Fire till it has done smoaking: In the same Manner burn some * Horse-Chestnuts, till there does not arise the least vapour of Smoak: Dissolve some Gum Tragacanth; and when the Water in which the Gum is dissolv'd becomes of a proper Consistence, add to it the Lampblack and Horse-Chestnuts, and stir all together with a Spatula: Then put this Paste into Moulds; and take care not to put too much of the Horse-Chestnut, which would give it a violet Black. <sup>Second Receipt.</sup>

A third Receipt, much more simple, and easier to be put in Practice, has been communicated to me by P. Contamin, who had it from a Chinese, as skilful in this Matter as any one can be expected to be; for we ought not to suppose that the ingenious Workmen discover their Secret; on the contrary, they take the greatest care to conceal it, and make a Mystery of it, even to those of their own Nation. <sup>Third Receipt.</sup>

They put five or six lighted Wicks into a Vessel full of Oil, and lay upon this Vessel an Iron Cover, made in the shape of a Funnel, which must be set at a certain Distance, so as to receive all the Smoak. When it has received enough, they take it off, and with a Goose's Feather gently brush the Bottom, letting the Soot fall upon a dry Sheet of strong Paper: It is this that makes their fine and shining Ink. The best Oil also gives a Lustre to the Black, and by consequence makes the Ink more esteemed and dearer. The Lampblack which is not fetch'd off with the Feather, and which sticks very fast to the Cover, is coarser, and they use it to make an ordinary sort of Ink, after they have scraped it off into a Dish. <sup>What makes it fine and shining.</sup>

When they have, in this Manner, taken off the Lampblack, they beat it in a Mortar, mixing with it Musk, or some odoriferous Water, with a thin Size to unite the Particles. The Chinese commonly make use of a Size, which they call Nyew kyau, Size of Neats Leather. When this Lampblack is come to the Consistence of a sort of Paste, they put it into Moulds, which are made in the shape they design the Sticks of Ink to be. They stamp upon the Ink, with a Seal made for that Purpose, the Characters or Figures they desire, in blue, red, or gold Colour, drying them in the Sun, or in the Wind.

We are assured, that in the City of Wey chow, where the Ink is made which is most esteemed, the Merchants have great Numbers of little Rooms, where they keep lighted Lamps all Day; and that every Room is distinguished by the Oil which is burnt in it, and consequently by the Ink which is made therein. Nevertheless many of the Chinese believed, that the Lampblack, which is gathered from the Lamps in which they burn Oil of Gergelin, is only used in making <sup>Where the best Ink is to be had.</sup> a particular Sort of Ink, which bears a great Price; but considering the surprising Quantities vended at a cheap Rate, they must use combustible Materials that are more common, and cheaper.

Lampblack.

They say that Lampblack is extracted immediately from old Pines, and that in the District of Whey chew, where the best Ink is made, they have Furnaces of a particular Structure to burn these Pines, and to convey the Smoak thro' long Funnel into little Cells shut up close, the Insides of which are hung with Paper: The Smoak being conveyed into these Cells, sticks to every Part of the Wall and Cieling, and there condenses itself. After a certain Time they open the Door, and take off a great quantity of Lampblack. At the same time that the Smoak of these Pines spreads itself in the Cells, the Rosin which comes out of them runs through other Pipes, which are laid even with the Floor.

It is certain that the good Ink, for which there is a great Demand at Nan king, comes from the District of Whey chew, and that none, made elsewhere, is to be compared with it: Perhaps the Inhabitants of this District are Masters of a Secret, which it is hard to get out of them. Perhaps also the Soil and Mountains of Whey chew furnish Materials more proper for making good Lampblack, than any other Place: There is a great number of Pine-Trees; and in some parts of China, these Trees afford a Rosin much more pure, and in greater Plenty, than our Pines in Europe. At Pe-king may be seen some pieces of Pine-wood which came from Tartary, and which have been used for above these sixty Years: Nevertheless, in hot Weather, they shed a great quantity of big Drops of Rosin, resembling yellow Amber. The Nature of the Wood which is burnt, contributes very much to the Goodness of the Ink. The Lampblack which is got from the Furnaces of Glass-Houses, and which the Painters use, may perhaps be the properest for imitating Chinese Ink.

As the Smell of the Lampblack would be very disagreeable, if they were to save the Expence of Musk, which they most commonly mix with it; so by burning such Druggs, they perfume the little Cells, and the Odours mixing with the Soot, which hangs on the Walls like Moss, and in little Flakes, the Ink they make thereof has no ill Scent.

Ink.

We have several Observations from the same Chinese Author, whom I have quoted, that should not be omitted. 1. To distinguish the different Degrees of goodness of Ink newly made, take a Vessel varnish'd with the finest Varnish, called Twan quang tsi: Having wetted the ends of the several pieces of Ink, rub them upon the varnish'd Vessel: The Proofs being dry, hold the Vessel to the Sun; and if you see that the Colour of the Ink is entirely like that of the Varnish, that Ink is of the finest Sort. It is much inferior if the Black be of a bluish Hue; but if it be Ash-colour'd, it is the least valuable of all.

How to preserve Chinese
Ink.

2. The Way to preserve the Ink from any Damage, is to shut it up in a close Box, in which must be put some perfectly ripe Mugwort: But, above all, it must never be exposed to the Rays of the Sun, which would make it crack and fall in Pieces.

Ink kept for Ornament in the Closets of the Curious.

3. They sometimes keep in Cabinets, for a Curiosity, Sticks of Ink finely adorned and gilded; and if any one of these Sticks happens to break, the manner of joining the two Pieces together, so that there shall be no Marks of its having been broke, is, by making use of the same Ink, first reducing it into a Paste upon the Marble, and then rubbing the broken Pieces with it, and squeezing them together. When you have done, leave the Stick of Ink a whole Day without touching it, and you will find it as whole and firm as ever.

How to use their Ink.

4. When they design to write, and would finish delicately the Strokes of the Pencil, before they temper the Ink upon the Marble, Care must be taken that the Marble be well wash'd, so that nothing of the Ink used the Day before may remain upon it; for if ever so little of it be left, it fouls the Marble they make Use of, and spoils the fresh Ink: Further, the Marble must not be washed either with hot Water, or Water raw out of the Well, but with Water that has been boil'd, and is grown cold again: The best and most proper Stones for preparing the Ink are called Twan she.

Chinese Ink
in Physick.

5. When the Ink has been preserved a long Time, it is then never used for Writing, but becomes, according to the Chinese, an excellent and refreshing Remedy, good in the Bloody Flux, and in the Convulsions of Children. They pretend, that by its Alkali, which naturally absorbs acid Humours, it sweetens the Acrimony of the Blood. The Dose, for grown Persons, is two Drachms, in a Draught of Water or Wine.

The Chinese
use no Pens in Writing, but a Pencil.

The Chinese, in Writing, make no Use of Pens, like the Europeans, nor of Canes or Reeds, like the Arabians, nor of Crayons, like the Siamese; but of a Pencil made with the Hair of some Animal, and particularly of the Rabbet, which is the softest. When they would write, they have upon the Table a little polish'd Marble, with a Hollow at one End to contain Water; they dip their Stick of Ink in it, and then rub it upon that Part of the Marble which is smooth; and according as they lean, more or less, upon the Ink when they rub it, it becomes more or less black. When they write, they do not hold the Pencil obliquely, as Painters do; but perpendicularly, as if they would prick the Paper. They write from the Right to the Left. In like Manner they end their Books where we begin ours, and our last Page is with them the first.

People of Learning and Study delight in keeping their Marble, Pencils, and Ink very neat, and placed in good Order; just as our Warriors pique themselves in preserving their Arms well polished and ranged. The Pencil, Paper, Ink, and the little Marble, the Chinese call Sse pau, which signifies, The four precious Things.

There

There are in China a prodigious Number of Books, because they have had the Art of Printing from Time immemorial, tho' in Europe that Art is still almost in its Infancy. But the Chinese Printing is very different from that of Europe. As our Alphabet consists of a very small Number of Letters which, by their different Combinations, can form the largest Volumes, we have no need of a great Number of Characters, since those used for the first, may be taken afunder, and used for the second Sheet: On the contrary, the Number of Chinese Characters being almost infinite, it is impossible to cast in Metal such a prodigious Multitude; and if they were cast, the greatest part would be but seldom used.

Here follows an Account of their manner of Printing. They get their Work transcrib'd by some excellent Writer, upon a fine, thin, and transparent Paper. The Engraver pastes every Leaf upon a Plate or Block of the Apple or Pear-Tree, or of any other Wood that is but hard and smooth, and with a Graver follows the Traces, and carves out the Characters by cutting down the rest of the Wood. Thus he makes as many different Blocks as there are Pages to print, working off as many Copies as are required, the Blocks being always in a readiness to work off more, without the Trouble of composing. There is not much Time lost in correcting the Proofs, since as the Graver works on the Strokes of the Copy itself, or the Original of the Author, he cannot possibly make any Error, if the Writing be exact.

This manner of Printing is convenient, because they print the Sheets only as they sell them, and do not run the Risque, as in Europe, of selling but half the Copies, and ruining themselves by useless Expences. Moreover, after having taken 30,000 or 40,000 Copies, they can easily retouch the Plates, and make them serve for many more Impressions.

They can print Books in all sorts of Languages, as well as in Chinese. The Beauty of the Character depends upon the Hand of the Copyist; the Skill of the Engraver being so great, that it is not easy to distinguish that which is printed from the written Copy; so that the Impression is good or bad, according to the Ability of the Writer employ'd. This must be understood principally of our European Characters, which are engraved and printed by the Chinese; for as to the Chinese Characters which are engraved, the Skill of the Engraver often corrects the Defects of the Writer.

The Chinese nevertheless are not ignorant of the manner of Printing in Europe; they have moveable Characters as well as we, with only this Difference, that whereas ours is of Metal, theirs are only of Wood: By the Help of these they correct The present State of China, which is printed at Pe king every three Months. It is reported, that at Nan king, and Siu chea, they print in this manner some little Books, and that as neatly and correctly as those which are engraved by the best Hands. There is no Difficulty in believing this, because it only requires a little extraordinary Labour and Care.

In Affairs that require Dispatch, as when an Order comes from Court, which contains many Articles, and which must be printed in one Night, they have another Method of Engraving. They cover the Block with yellow Wax, and trace out the Characters with a surprizing Quickness.

They use no Press as in Europe; their wooden Plates, and unallum'd Paper would not bear it. But when once the Blocks are engraved, the Paper cut, and the Ink in readiness, a single Man, with his Brush, and without fatiguing himself, may print every Day near ten thousand Sheets.

The Block which is in Use, must be set level and firm. They have two Brushes; one harder than the other, which is to be held in the Hand, and may be used at both ends. They dip this Brush in the Ink, and rub the Plate with it, but so that it may not be too much, nor too little moisten'd: If it be too much, the Letters will be obscured; if too little, the Characters will not print: When the Plate is once in order, they can print three or four Sheets successively, without dipping the Brush in the Ink. The second Brush must pass gently over the Paper, pressing it down a little, that it may take up the Ink: This is easily done, because not being dipt in Allum-Water, it imbibes it instantly. You must only press more or less, and pass the Brush over the Sheet oftner, or fewer times, according as there is more or less Ink upon the Plate: This Brush must be oblong and soft.

The Ink which they use for Printing is a Liquid, and therefore much more convenient than that which is sold in Sticks: To make it, you must take Lampblack, pound it well, expose it to the Sun, and then sift it through a Sieve: The finer it is, the better. It must be tempered with Aqua-vitæ till it comes to the consistence of Size, or of a thick Paste, Care being taken that the Lampblack may not clot. After this it must be mixt with a proper Quantity of Water, so that it may be neither too thick, nor too thin. Lastly, to hinder it from sticking to the Fingers, they add a little Neats-Leather Glue, probably of that Sort which the Joiners use. This they dissolve over the Fire, and then pour on every ten Ounces of Ink almost an Ounce of Glue, which they mix well with the Lampblack and Aqua-vitæ, before the Water is added to them.

They print but on one Side, because their Paper is thin and transparent, and cannot bear a double Impression without confounding the Characters with one another. Hence it is that every Leaf of the Book is folded, the Fold being at the edge of the Book, and the Opening at the Back, where they are sown together; so that their Books are cut at the Back, whereas ours are cut at the Edges. And to put the Sheets together, there is a black Line drawn upon the Folds of the Sheets, which teaches to place them right; as the Holes made by the Points in our printed Sheets direct the Binder how to fold them truly, that the Pages may answer each other.

They cover their Books with a neat sort of Pasteboard of a grey Colour, or else with fine Sattin, or flower'd Silk, which does not cost much. There are some Books which the Binders cover with red Brocade, interspersed with Gold and Silver Flowers. Tho' this Manner of Binding is inferior to ours, it is nevertheless neat and convenient.

Of the Manner in which the young Chinese pursue their Studies; of the several Degrees they take; and the various Examinations they undergo before they attain the Doctor's Degree.

Of the Education of the Chinese.

FROM about five or six Years of Age, according to the Capacities of the Children, and the Care that Parents take of their Education, the young Chinese begin to study the Letters; but as the Number of the Letters is so very great, and without any such Order as they have in Europe, this Study would be very ungrateful, if they had not found out Means to make it a sort of Sport and Amusement.

Of teaching the Elements of their Language.

They have chosen for this purpose about 100 Characters, which express the most common things, and which present themselves most frequently to the Senses; as the Sky, the Sun, the Moon, Man, certain Plants and Animals, a House, and the most common Utensils; they get all these Things engraved in a coarse Manner, and put the Chinese Characters for them underneath: And these Figures, tho' very awkwardly represented, do yet quicken the Capacities of Children, fix their Imagination, and help their Memories. This Collection may be called, The Alphabet of the Chinese.

Which may be call'd their Alphabet.

One Inconvenience, however, occurs in the Method, which is, That Children imbibe an infinite number of chimerical Notions in their tender Years; for to represent the Sun, they make a Cock within a Circle; the Moon they signify by a Rabbet pounding Rice in a Mortar: A sort of Demon with fiery Bolts in his Hand, somewhat like the ancient Representation of Jupiter, stands for Thunder. The Brutes, and their Myau, or Pagods, have their Place amongst these Figures; so that the poor Children, in a manner, suck in with their Milk all these extravagant Whimsies: I have lately been informed, however, that this Method is now grown out of Use.

The Book which they put next into the Hands of Children, is called San tsé king; 'tis a concise Work, containing what is necessary for a Child to learn, and the Method of teaching it. It consists of several short Sentences, of three Characters, ranged in Rhymes, to help the Memories of Children. There is also another Book, the Sentences of which are of four Characters: As likewise a Catechism made for the Christian Children, the Phrases of which are but of four Letters, and which for this reason is called Sse tsé king ven.

Characters of the Alphabet very numerous in China.

In a word, the Children must learn all these Characters by degrees, as the European Children do our Alphabet; with this Difference: That as we have but four and twenty Letters, they have many thousands. They oblige a young Chinese to learn at first four, five, or six of them in a Day, which he must repeat to himself from Morning till Night, in order to rehearse them regularly to the Master twice a Day. If he is often deficient in his Lesson, he is chastised. The Punishment is usually in this Manner: They make him get upon a little narrow Bench, on which he lies down flat on his Belly, and there he receives eight or ten Blows upon his Drawers, with a flat Stick somewhat like a Lath. During the time of their Studies, they oblige them to such a close Assiduity, that they have very seldom any Holidays, except a Month at the beginning of the Year, and five or six Days about the middle of it.

Of the Correction of Children.

When once they can read the Sse chu, * they are not suffered to read any other Books till they have got these by heart, without missing a Letter; and, what is most difficult and ungrateful, they must learn these Books without understanding scarce any thing of them; it being the Custom not to explain to them the Sense of the Characters, till they know them perfectly.

How they teach them to form their Letters.

At the same time that they learn these Letters, they are taught how to form them with a Pencil. At first they give them great Sheets, written, or printed in large red Characters; and the Children do nothing with their Pencils, but cover the red Strokes with Black, which accustoms them to trace the Strokes. When they have learnt to make them in this manner, they give them others, which are black, and not so large; and laying upon these Sheets another Sheet which is blank and transparent, they draw the Letters upon this Paper, in the Form of those underneath: But they oftener use a Board covered with White, varnished, and divided into little Squares, which make different Lines, whereon they write their Characters, and efface them with Water when they have done, to save Paper.

* These are the four Books that contain the Doctrine of Kong fú tse, or Confucius, and Ming tse, or Mencius.

In fine, they take great Care to improve their Hands; for it is a great Advantage to the Learned to make their Characters well: They pay much regard to this Qualification, and in the Examination, which is made every three Years for the Degrees, they commonly reject those who write ill, especially if their Writing be not exact; unless they give great Proofs of their Ability in other Respects, either in the Language, or in composing good Discourses.

Care of the Chinese in forming their Letters.

It is reported that a certain Candidate for the Degrees, having used, contrary to order, an Abbreviation in writing the Character Ma, which signifies a Horse, had the Mortification of seeing his Work, tho' excellent, rejected; and was obliged to bear this Piece of Railery from the Mandarin, That a Horse could not walk well without four Legs.

When they know Characters enough for composing, they must learn the Rules of the Ven chang. This is a Composition resembling that sort of Theses which the European Scholars make before they enter upon Rhetorick; with this difference, that the Ven chang must be more difficult, because its Sense is more confin'd, and its Style peculiar. They give for a Subject but one Sentence, taken out of the Classic Authors, which they call Ti mu, The Thesis; and this Thesis is sometimes but one single Character.

To find out whether the Children improve, the following Method is practised in many Places: Twenty or thirty Families, who are all of the same Name, and who consequently have one common Hall of their Ancestors, unite together, and agree to send their Children, twice a Month, into this Hall to compose: Every Head of a Family, by Turns, gives the Thesis, and provides, at his own Expence, the Dinner for that Day, which he takes care to have brought into the Hall: He likewise judges of the Compositions, and determines who has succeeded the best. If on the Day of Composing any one of this little Society absent himself without a sufficient Cause, his Parents are obliged to pay about twenty Pence; which is a sure means to prevent any one's being absent.

Domestic Compositions

Besides this Diligence, which is private and voluntary, all the young Scholars are obliged to compose together, before the inferior Mandarin of Letters, called Hyo-kwan. This is done at least twice a Year, once in the Spring, and once in the Winter, throughout the whole Empire: Twice, I say, at least; for besides these two general Examinations, the Mandarins of Letters examine them pretty frequently, to find what Progress they have made in their Studies, and to keep them in Exercise. There are some Governors of Cities who take the like trouble on themselves, with regard to Men of Learning that live near them, whom they summon every Month to their Tribunal, and there make them compose, giving Rewards to those who succeed the best, and bearing the Expence of their Entertainment for that Day.

Public Compositions.

It is not surprizing, that in a State where they have professed Learning for so many Ages, and where they prefer it to all natural Advantages, they should take so much pains to educate their Youth. There is not a City, Town, nor almost any little Village, in which there are not School-Masters to instruct Youth in the Sciences; People of Fortune have Tutors for their Children, who teach them Letters, accompany them, and form their Manners; who instruct them in the Ceremonies, the manner of Saluting, the Compliments and common Civilities, the manner of Visiting, and, when of a proper Age, the History and Laws of their Country: Infinite is the Number of these Preceptors, because amongst those who put up for the Degrees, there are very few that obtain them.

Of the Persons who preside over the Education of Children.

In the Houses of Persons of Quality, those that are entrusted with this Province are generally Doctors, or at least Licentiates. In Families of a lower Rank, they are Bachelors, who continue the course of their Studies, and go to the Examinations in order to arrive at the Doctor's Degree. The Employment of a School-Master is accounted honourable, the Children's Parents maintain them, make them Presents, treat them with a great deal of Respect, and every where give them the upper hand. Syew feng, Our Master, Our Doctor, is the Name they give them; and their Pupils have the highest Respect for them as long as they live.

Tho' there are no Universities in China, as in Europe, there is no City of the first Order, which has not a great Palace set apart for the Examinations of the Graduates: And in the Capitals, this Palace is yet bigger. A Missionary gives this Description of the Edifice, in the City in which he was; and, as far as the Place will permit, they are all built after the same Manner: It is inclosed, says he, with high Walls, the Entrance is magnificent, and before it is a large Square, 150 Paces broad, and planted with Trees, having Benches and Seats for the Captains and Soldiers, who keep Centry in the Times of Examination. One enters at first into a great Court, where the Mandarins place themselves with a Corps de Garde, at the end of which there is another Wall, with Folding-Gates. As soon as you enter, there is a Ditch full of Water, which you must pass over upon a Stone-Bridge, to come at a third Gate, at which Guards are planted, who let no body enter without an express Order from the Officers. When you have passed this Gate, you discover a great Square, the Entrance to which is by a very narrow Passage. On both Sides of this Square, are a vast number of little Chambers, close together, four Foot and an half long, and about three and an half broad, to lodge the Students; in these Chambers are sometimes to the Number of six thousand.

Their Walls of Universities, how supply'd.

Before they enter the Palace to compose, they are stopped at the Gate, and searched with the greatest Exactness, that they may not carry in any Books, or Writings; nothing being allow'd there but Pencils and Ink. If any Fraud were to be discovered, the Offenders would not only be turn'd back, but very severely punished, and excluded from the Degrees of Literature. When every body is entred, they shut up the Gates, and the publick Seal is set upon them.

There

There are Officers of the Tribunal to over-look every thing that passes, and to prevent them from going out of their Chambers, or speaking to one another.

At the end of the narrow Passage which I mentioned, a Tower is erected upon four Arches, and flank'd with four Turrets, or a Sort of round Domes; from which, if any Disturbance be perceived, the Drum is immediately beat to give notice, that the Disorder may be remedied. Near this Tower there are divers Apartments, and a great Hall well furnished, in which those assemble who preside at the first Examination. At the going out of this Hall you enter another Court, in which there is another Hall resembling the first, but more magnificently furnished; with divers Apartments for the President, and principal Officers. There are also Galleries, a Garden, and many little Apartments for the Mandarins, Secretaries, and inferior Officers; and lastly, every thing which is requisite for lodging commodiously the whole Retinue of the Examiners.

Examinations of the Students.

When they think the young Students are fit to appear at the Examination of the inferior Mandarins, they send them thither on the appointed Day. For the better understanding of what follows, we must recollect what has been said already; namely, that China contains fifteen great Provinces, every Province including many great Cities, which have the Title of Fû; and that these Cities have many others of the second and third Order, that depend on them, some of which are called Cbew, and others Hyen: There are no Cities of the first Order, that have not in their District a Hyen, and sometimes two, for the Word Hyen signifies much the same as what we call a Bailiwick. It is by the Hyen that they gather the Taxes, and even distinguish the Learned; for Example, they say, Bachelor of such a Hyen. Nevertheless, it must not be thought that Learning flourishes alike in all the Provinces, there being many more Students in some than in others. The Mandarin, who is at the Head of a whole Province, is called Fû ywen. He that governs a Fû, is called Cbi fû: They likewise call him Fû tsun; that is, the illustrious Person of the Fû, or City of the first Order. He who has only the Government of a Hyen, has the Title of Cbi byen, or Hyen tsun. Agreeable to this Subordination, there are in Kyen chang fû, one Cbi fû, and two Cbi byen, and in the Capital Fû, there is a Fû ywen, that is a Viceroy. So that the Monarchical Government is established not only over the whole Empire, but in every Province, in every Fû, and in every little Hyen.

Examinations of the Candidates for Degrees.

To return to the Examinations: As soon as the young Students are thought capable of passing those of the Mandarins, they must begin with that of the Cbi byen, in whose Jurisdiction they were born; for Example, in the District of Nan ching byen, which is in the Jurisdiction of Kyen chang fû, there are more than eight Hundred, who go to compose before the Cbi byen of this City. It is this Mandarin that gives the Thesis, and examines these Compositions himself, or orders them to be examined in his Tribunal, and who determines which is the best: Of the eight hundred Students, there are about six hundred named; they say then, that they have Hyen ming, that is, that they are inscrib'd to the Hyen: There are some Hyen in which the Number of Students amounts to six thousand.

These six hundred must afterwards appear at the Examination of the Cbi fû of Kyen chang, who makes a new Choice; and of these six hundred, there are not above four hundred who have Fû ming, that is, who are named for the second Examination. Hitherto they have no Degree in Literature, and therefore are called Tong feng.

In every Province there is a Mandarin who comes from Pe king, who is but three Years in his Office; he is called Hyo tau, or in the finest Provinces, Hyo ywen; and is generally a Person who hath Intelligence with the great Tribunals of the Empire: Formerly, he gave Presents underhand, and those very considerable, to be chosen; but the present Emperor has remedied this Abuse by very severe Orders. He must make two Examinations during his three Years: The first Examination is called Swo kau, the second Ko kau; for this purpose he is obliged to make a Circuit thro' all the Fû of the Province.

Honours which they render to Confucius.

As soon as the Hyo tau arrives in a Fû, he goes to pay his respects to Confucius, whom all the Learned look upon as the Doctor of the Empire: Then he himself explains some Passages in the Classick Authors, and the succeeding Days examines. When the four hundred Tong feng of Nan ching byen,* who have Fû ming, go to compose in the Tribunal of the Hyo tau with the other Students, that come from all the Hyen which are subordinate to that Fû, if the Number of them is very great, they are divided into two Companies.

The greatest Precautions are now used, to prevent the Mandarin's knowing the Authors of the Compositions; but these Precautions are sometimes rendered vain by the Intrigues of the Parties. The Hyo tau nominates but fifteen Persons, out of the four hundred, for example, that are in a Hyen; those who are thus nominated, take the first Degree, and are therefore said to enter into Study Tsin leau byo, and are called Syew tsay: They then wear the Formalities, which consist of a blue Gown, with a black Border all round it, and a Silver, or Pewter Bird, upon the Top of their Caps: They are no more liable to be bastonadoed by the Order of the common Mandarins, but have a particular Governour, who punishes them if they do amiss. Of the fifteen who are nominated, most of them are deservedly chosen. Sometimes indeed, there is Favour shewn; but they who are thus elected, what Protection soever they may have, must not be without some Merit: For if it should ever appear that Favour was the Motive of their Choice, the Envoy of the Court would be ruined both in his Reputation and Fortune.

One

* What I say of this Hyen must be understood proportionably of all the others.

One may say much the same Things concerning the Tong feng of War: The same Mandarins who examine for Learning, examine for the Army: Those who are Candidates here, must shew their Ability in shooting with the Bow, and Riding; and if they have before applied themselves to bodily Exercises, which require a great deal of Strength and Vigour, they must sometimes give Proofs of it; for example, by lifting a large Stone, or some heavy Burden. But tho' this may be serviceable to them, yet it is not altogether essential; and to those who have made any progress in Learning, they give certain Problems to be solved, respecting Incampments, and Stratagems of War; which contribute to their Preferment. It is proper to know, that the Warriours as well as the Learned, have their Classic Authors, which they also call by the Name of Keng, They were composed purposely for their use, and treat of the Military Discipline.

The Hyo tau is obliged by his Office to make the Tour of his Province, and to assemble in every City of the first Order, all the Siew tsay who are dependant upon it; when, after being informed of their Conduct, he examines their Compositions; recompenses those who have made great Proficiency in their Studies, and punishes those whom he convicts of Negligence and Carelessness. Sometimes he enters into a Detail, and divides them into six Classes: The first contains a very few, of those who have remarkably distinguished themselves; to whom he gives, as a Reward, a Tael, and a Silk Scarf: Those of the second Class receive also a Silk Scarf, and a small matter of Money: The third Class hath neither Reward nor Punishment: Those of the fourth receive the Bastonado, by command of the Mandarins: The fifth lose the Bird with which the Cap is adorned, and become but half Siew tsay: Those that have the Misfortune, to be in the sixth, are entirely degraded; but there are few to whom this happens: In this Examination, one shall sometimes see a Man of fifty or sixty Years of Age bastonado'd, whilst his Son, who composes with him, receives Applause and Rewards: But as to the Siew tsay, or Batchelors, they do not receive the Bastonado for their Compositions alone, unless there be also some Complaint made of their Morals and Behaviour.

Every Graduate who does not come to this Triennial Examination, runs the Risk of being deprived of his Title, and ranked with the common People. There are but two Cases, in which he may lawfully be absent; either Sickness, or Mourning for the Death of a Parent. The old Graduates, who upon their last Examination appeared to be superannuated, are forever after excused from attending these Examinations; preserving nevertheless, the Habit, Cap, and all the Prerogatives and Honours of their Degree.

To attain the second Degree, that of Kyu gin, they must pass a new Examination called Chu kau, which is but once in three Years, in the Capital of every Province of the Empire. All the Siew tsay are obliged to attend at it. Two Mandarins come Express from the Court, to preside at this Examination, which is made by the great Officers of the Province, and by some other Mandarins, as their Assistants. The first of the two Mandarins sent from the Court, is call'd Ching chu kau, and must be Han lin, that is, of the College of the chief Doctors of the Empire: The other is called Fu chu. In the Province of Kyang si, for instance, there are at least ten thousand Siew tsay, who are obliged to be at this Examination, and who fail not to attend. Amongst these ten thousand, the Number of those who are nominated, that is, who obtain the Degree of Kyu gin, is no more than sixty: Their Gown is of a brownish Colour, with a blue Border four Fingers broad: The Bird upon the Cap is of Gold, or Copper gilt; and the Chief of them has the Title of Kay yuen. It is not easy to obtain this Degree by corrupting the Judges; and if any Intrigues are carried on for that Design, they must be managed with great Secrecy, and have their beginning at Pe king.

When they arrive at this Degree, they have but one Step more to take, to be Doctors: They must go the next Year to Pe king, to be examined for the Degree of Doctor; and the Emperor is at the Charge of this first Journey: Those who after having passed this Examination once, are contented with being Kyu gin, either because they are too far advanced in Years, or because they have a moderate Fortune, are excused from coming any more to this Examination, which is made at Pe king every three Years. Every Kyu gin is qualified to bear any Office: Sometimes they obtain Employments merely by Seniority in this Degree; and some of them have become Viceroy of Provinces: And as all Offices are bestow'd in consideration of the Person's Merit, a Student, who is the Son of a Peasant, has as much Hope of arriving to the Dignity of Viceroy, and even of Minister of State, as the Children of Persons of the first Quality.

Finally these Kyu gin, as soon as they have obtained any publick Employment, renounce the Degree of Doctor. But all the Kyu gin, that is, Licentiates, who are not in any Office, go every three Years to Pe king, as I have said before, to be present at the Examination there; which is called the Imperial Examination: For the Emperor himself gives the subject of the Compositions, and by the Attention he gives, and the exact Account that is rendered him, is supposed to be himself the Judge of them. The Number of Licentiates who come to this Examination, amounts very often to five or six thousand; and of this Number about three hundred, whose Compositions are judged the best, are advanced to the Degree of Doctor. Sometimes this Degree hath been given but to 150. The three principal ones are called Tyen tse men feng, that is, The Disciples of the Son of Heaven: The Chief of these is called Chwang yuen, the next Pang yuen, and the last Tan wa. From the other Doctors, the Emperor chuses a certain Number, to whom they give the Title of Han lin, that is, Doctors of the first Order: The others are called Tsin se.

Who ever can obtain this glorious Title of Jin fē, either in Literature, or the Army, may look upon himself as a Man firmly settled, and needs not fear Want: For, besides that he receives an infinite Number of Presents from his Relations and Friends, he is in a fair Way to be employed in the most important Posts of the Empire, and every body courts his Protection: His Friends and Relations never fail to erect, in their City, magnificent triumphal Arches to his Honour, on which they inscribe his Name, the Place where, and the Time when he received his Degree.

The Number and Goodness of Books under the Emperor Kang hi.

He remedies this Negligence.

The late Emperor Kang bi, towards the latter end of his Reign, observed that there were not so many new Books printed as usual; and those which were published, had not that degree of Perfection he could have wish'd, for the Glory of his Reign, and which might make them worthy to be transmitted to Posterity: He perceived that these chief Doctors of the Empire, enjoying quietly the Rank to which they were raised, and the Reputation for Learning which they had obtained, neglected their Studies, in expectation of gainful Employments. To remedy this Negligence, as soon as the Examination for Doctors was ended, he took upon himself, contrary to custom, to examine these chief Doctors, who so piqued themselves upon being Judges and Examiners of others. This Examination gave great Alarm, and was followed by a Judgment still more surprising: For several of these chief Doctors were shamefully degraded, and sent back to their own Provinces. The Dread of such another Examination, keeps those Chief of the Learned, close to their Studies. The Emperor prided himself upon this extraordinary Examination, because one of the most learned Men of the Court, who was employed in looking over the Compositions, agreed exactly with him in his Judgment, condemning all the same that his Majesty had rejected, excepting one Piece, which the Mandarin judged of a doubtful Merit.

Comparison of the Degrees taken by the Learned in China, with those taken by the Learned in Europe.

It appears from what I have mentioned, that the Comparison that has been made between these three Degrees, which distinguish the Learned in China, and the Bachelors, Licentiates, and Doctors of Europe, is not altogether just. 1st. Because these Names in Europe, are known scarcely any where but in Universities and Colleges; and the Licentiates have no greater Access than others to People of Fashion; whereas here, these three Degrees comprehend all the Nobility and polite People of China; and furnish almost all the Mandarins, except some few Tartars. 2d. Because in Europe, a considerable Progress in the speculative Sciences, and an exact Knowledge of Philosophy and Theology, is requisite in order to be made a Doctor; whereas in China, nothing more is required than Eloquence, and the Knowledge of their History and Laws.

Father Dentrecolles's Researches on this Subject.

To give a yet more perfect Idea, of the great Care taken by the Chinese to form their Youth, and to make the Sciences flourish in their Empire, I shall insert here several Extracts of Chinese Books, which treat of their Establishment of the publick Schools. It was Father Dentrecolles who made this curious Enquiry, and communicated it to me. There can be no better Means of informing Ourselves concerning China, than by China itself: For we are sure to come at a true Knowledge of the Genius and Customs of that Nation, if we pursue this Method.

Extract of a Chinese Book, entitled, The Art of making a People Happy, by establishing public Schools.

I H T O,

Seminaries of Education in China.

ATTENTLY. in China a Place called Sbu, was allotted for a certain Number of Families; and another called Tsyang, for a larger District. These two Places were Seminaries for educating the Youth of the Empire, and forming them to the Sciences. The Literati of the most conspicuous Merit, were compleated in the Academy of Tsyang. The Country Schools produced those Geniuses that are qualified for Perfection in the Sciences. And to this Day, they whose Knowledge has gain'd them Admittance into the Hall of Confucius, have begun by the lowest Exercises of the young Students.

By whom and when instituted.

The Emperor Hong wū Founder of the preceding Dynasty of Ming, being persuaded of how much Importance to his State it was, to aid and encourage Youth to Literature; in the second Year of his Reign ordained, that publick Schools should be built in all the Cities of the 1st. 2d. and 3d. Rank. And six Years after, that he might make the Benefit more general, he founded Schools for the Country. His Order address'd to the Mandarins of the respective Provinces was in these Terms:

"At present we see at Court, and thro' all the Cities, Schools erected for teaching the Sciences. Our Intention is, that the People in the Country should likewise share in these great Advantages, and in that wonderful Change which Study, no doubt, will produce among our Subjects. For this effect, you the Mandarins are to cause Schools to be built in the Country, and to take care to furnish them with able Masters. These Masters being cloathed with Authority, and Men of Merit, every one in the Empire will be willing that Literature should become the first and chiefest Employment of our Youth, and that they endeavour to excel in it."

Thus

Thus after the Reign of the Oriental Tartars, Learning began to revive under the last Dynasty. I shall first speak of the Schools in the Country. If 25 Families require one of them, we shall find that the District of a City of the third Order, will require a hundred, yet the Royal Appointments for the Professors, are sufficient only for those of two Villages. How shall we remedy this? My Thoughts are as follows.

Our Schools at present, I mean the Country Schools, are a good deal different from what those named Sbu or Tsyang were formerly. Our Ancestors had the Subjects of their Studies regulated, and the manner of teaching in all Schools was uniform. Children began to study at eight Years of Age, at which time they read the [*] Kin tse to instruct them in Chronology. And the Book of the five Parts of the Empire, for Geography.

They then were taught Arithmetic, and to instruct them in their private Deportment, made to read, the Manner in which they ought to behave to a Father, a Mother, their Relations and Domestics; and in their Public; their Behaviour to Magistrates, to Seniors, and to their Equals. Such were the Books that were put into the Hands of the Youth, in the lower Form or the Syau byo. Method of studying in them.

At the Age of 15, they pass thro' the higher Sciences, or Ta byo; they learned all the Passages, by which the Books of our ancient Sages are become so valuable; the Rites and Ceremonies of the Empire, with what ever relates to Princes and Magistrates; whatever forms a Man of Honour, and a Politician; in short, what ever relates to good Government in general.

At first they applied themselves to the easiest Studies, and when they were Masters of the Rudiments, they advanced, by insensible Degrees, to higher Attainments; till at the end of a certain Number of Years, they became very able Men. It was in the Schools of the respective Districts, that they were thus form'd by little and little. At last the Students of different Places or Sbu, were transplanted into the Tsyang or common School of the District; and they there completed themselves by Conferences, by the Lectures of the first Masters, and by a mutual Emulation.

These excellent Methods new modell'd the Wit, the Understanding, and in short, the whole of the Man. Virtue, thus as it were becoming a Science, renders Multitudes happy; and hence it was, before they were aware, that the so much desired Change was of a sudden wrought among all the Members of the State, so as to render the whole Empire perfect. Virtue, a Science.

At present, the Children of Men of Fortune and Quality, have the means of Studying, without using them; and the Poor are destitute of them who most wish for them. When the Parents are Great and Rich, and design to bestow a liberal Education upon their Children, they take a Tutor into their Houses, where they assign him an Apartment; nor will their Pride suffer them to allow the Children of their poor Neighbours, to reap any Benefit by his Lessons. And from hence it is, that the wise Regulations for public Schools, either for City or Country, are much neglected. Its great Effects. Disadvantages and Abuses in Study.

The Mandarins know well enough, how much the Manners of the Age require to be reformed; but one would think, that they did not look upon this as a very pressing Affair. The true Obstacle is, that they want the necessary Assistances, to build and endow these Schools in the Country. Thus, that proper and useful Design is laid aside; and hence the Doctrines of our Classic Books are not practised; so that the good Customs of our Ancestors daily decay, and in time will be entirely ruined. Let us prevent this Misfortune.

What I am going now to propose, appears to me of Consequence, for the effectual Re-establishment of these Schools. Let the Literati of Fortunes, and the rich People who are in Posts, make it their Pleasure to unite; and each in his own Country promote this noble Undertaking. Let the Mandarin of the Place, put himself at their Head; after which, where will be the Difficulty of erecting public Buildings for Learning? It ought likewise to be considered, that these Schools are principally opened for the Children of poor People, who, without such Helps, can make no Progress in Letters. Means of removing them.

By these Methods young People, however poor, if their Genius leads them to Learning, may give themselves up intirely to it. Misery commonly prevails most in the Country. Cities consist chiefly of Merchants, Tradesmen, Graduates, and People who either have been in Employments, or live nobly. In the Country, most of the Inhabitants either labour or cultivate the Ground, keep Flocks, or are employed in rustick Labours.

A Computation must be made how many poor People there are in the District of a City, for instance, of the third Order, and how many rich; upon this Computation the Plan of a School must be formed. When it is known how many large Burroughs, and Places frequented either by the Commerce, or by the Fairs held in them, are without the City, and how many Habitations and Houses are joining to each other; one may judge from thence how many Schools there ought to be. As for single Houses dispersed up and down, if the Inhabitants of them have a mind that their Children should study, they must even draw nearer the School, and provide their Children Places in it. Method of making a Provision for a School.

The Form and Order in which I would have such a School built, is as follows; The Building should have first a spacious Entry; and over the Gate should be written in large Characters this Inscription, I HYO, that is, The College of Piety. Lastly, the whole Ground necessary, must be surrounded with a good Wall; that the Students, may not have the Liberty of going out, or other People of coming in. Plan of it.

After the Gate and first Court, there must be a Hall for the Teng, Assemblies or Lessons, adorned with three Ranges of Pillars; and at a just Distance a second Hall, where shall be placed the Picture of our most Wise and Ancient Master, that the Student may come every Morning and Evening and honour him in that Quality. Two Lodgings are to be built at the Side of this Hall. The Professor is to live in the one, and the other is to serve for receiving Visitors; besides a Wardrobe is to be built where the Moveables of the House are to be kept. The Kitchen may be on the East, and an open Space may be reserved in form of a Garden. The Building being once finished, it may be furnished with Stools, Tables, Arm-chairs, Porcelain and Hangings; in short, with every thing that is necessary. All this will require a good deal of Expence, but the People of Quality are to supply it by voluntary Contributions. He who is the principal Superintendant of the School, is to chuse for the Stewart of the House, an aged, wise, and virtuous Man.

Qualifications of Masters.

As for the Professor, the choice must fall upon a Man of an unblemish'd Reputation, full of Probity, and with Talents both to instruct and improve Youth; provided he is posselt of such Qualities, no matter for his Riches. He must be presented to the Mandarin of the Place, who is to examine him and to judge of his Abilities. The School is then to be opened with Solemnity, and the Youth must have Notice to be present, and be exhorted to be submissive to him.

Duties,

The Scholars are to acknowledge their Master by the Reverence due to his Quality, and they may make a Present to him, tho' he cannot exact one from them: However that is an ancient Custom. Wen beng, famous in the Province of Se Chwen, when he assembled the Youth of the Country every Day to be instructed, introduced the Custom of offering something to the Master.

It appears to me that this Practice ought to be kept up: And that none should grudge a small Expence, especially when it is well placed. It helps a poor Professor, such as most of these Masters are, to pass his life easily, and to assist his Family, from which he is sometimes at a good Distance.

Indeed, he ought rather to have a regular Appointment to trust to; for which reason in founding a School, a certain Extent of Land should be purchased, whose Revenue should be apply'd to the Payment of the Master and Officers of the House.

and Exercises of the Students.

He is regularly to give out the common Exercises of their Studies. In the Morning he is to make them recite by heart the Passage of the Book which had been prescribed as a Lesson the Night before; he is then to give out a new one, and to proportion it to the Capacity of the Scholar. It is of Importance that he pronounces the Letters in a distinct clear Voice, giving each its full Emphasis. Besides, in Reading he is to mark the different Pauses, where the Sense of the Period is more or less compleat.

After the Scholars have breakfasted they are to apply to Writing. The Master in setting their Copies ought to form every Letter according to the Number of Strokes, and the Model in the last amended Chyang Yun. He is to guide the Pencil, so that the Letter may have its exact Figure and Beauty; and by these Copies the Scholar is to write.

Moreover, tho' the Business here is to know how to manage the Pencil, it must not be imagin'd that this Art is learn'd in Haste, or at Random, or that it is an easy Matter to form a well proportion'd Letter. It is necessary in the Beginning to accustom the Scholar to be exact, and to labour to attain to Perfection on that Head.

When the Copy is finish'd, every Scholar ought to bring his Writing to the Master, who is to run it over, and to mark the fairest Letters with a little Circle, and to mark with a Dash those that are faulty, that they may learn to correct them another Time.

When Books are to be explain'd, the Master is to begin by briefly summing up the Subject of the Chapter to be explain'd. Then taking it by Parts he is to give; 1. The proper Signification of each Character. 2. The Sense of the whole Period. Above all Things it is necessary that the Masters convey clear and precise Ideas, and such as may continue distinctly upon the Memories of the Children.

When the Explication is over, he is to call each of the Students, and to make them pass by his Table in Silence, that the Awe of him may be better imprinted on their Minds. Next Day, before he proceeds to a new Explication, he must take an Account of the foregoing. The paraphrases of the learned Chang ko laü, is the Work that can best instruct the Scholar in the true sense of classic Books, which are there explained very clearly even to the least Letter.

The Scholars
Exercises in the Afternoon.

When the Hour of Explication is over it is commonly Mid-day, and then they go to Dinner; after Dinner, as in the Morning, the Exercises begin by a recital of the prescribed Lesson, after which a new one is given out. Then they are to fall to the Exercise of Tso twi (十) the subject of Twi se is proposed, which ought to be more or less lengthened, according to the Progress the Scholar has made.

But before this Work they receive a Book to read, which contains many Models of these Sort of Compositions, and instructing them to know in what Sense the Words and Characters must to be taken, and how they ought to be placed according to the different Accents, that they may receive the necessary Cadence. By exercising themselves in these Works, their Style may may be formed to Petitions, Ordinances, Letters and other Compositions, where the familiar Style cannot have Place.

Every Morning and Evening, when the Scholars enter and leave the School, they ought to present themselves before the Picture of the Ancient Master (†) Syen tse, and to do him Reverence. When they come home, they ought to make the same Reverence to their Parents and to the Aged. (*) These are the Duties of Civility to which young Persons ought to be formed, in order, that both at home and abroad, they may acquire that Air of Politeness so suitable to the Literati.

the Students.

The Lessons they have got by heart in five Days, they ought to repeat upon the sixth; on which Day they are to be prescribed no new Task, but are to consider all these Lessons and reduce them to writing, without the help of a Book. Such as do it faultily, ought to be punished. These Days of Repetition are the same thing to the Students, as the great Examinations are to the Literati.

But the principal Study of Youth ought to be the Esteem, Love and Practice of Virtue; to know, to combat, and to vanquish their own Failings; to reform, and to work a thorough Change upon their Natures: These are the grand Studies. And, that none may be deceived in the Meaning of these general Terms, it is as follows. A young Man, at home, must be perfectly submissive, and abroad, perfectly compos'd. Does he meet one of greater Age or Quality? Let him shew a great deal of Respect: Is he among his Companions and Equals? Let him win them by his Modesty, and a genteel Complaisance; let no haughty Air, or any Negligence of Manners be seen in his Deportment, and no Expressions of Ill-nature be heard in his Talk. Let Anger never make any alteration in his Countenance; and Sincerity, Honesty, and Uprightness always prevail, in his dealings among Men, and in his Commerce in the World. This is actually to reform and to perfect one's self.

Virtue, a necessary Study for Youth.

Our ‡ I King informs us, that to endeavour to correct those who know not the Ways of Justice, and have gone astray, is the business of a wise Man. This Text acquaints us that as Youth is a Time of Ignorance; so the great Science in which Youth should be educated, is the Science of an upright Heart and a disinterested Mind, which are directly opposite to and distant from false Sects and dangerous Maxims. What excellent Subjects would not such an Education form! and how worthy of our Sages, would such an Exercise be! What then can one think of a Master, who neglecting to reform his Pupils from the Errors and Corruptions of the Age, applies all his cares to burthen their Memory with a Load of useless Lessons? Unaccountable Abuse!

as is the Uprightness of Heart and Mind.

This Disorder might be reform'd, if the Mandarins, who are the || Pastors as well as the Governors of the People committed to their Charge, would rightly consider it. As for instance, when Business calls them, as it frequently does, into the Country, where they are oblig'd to visit several different Places of their District, if they would take the Trouble to visit the Schools, to observe the Progress of the Scholars and the Method of the Teachers; and bestow some Mark of Distinction upon the finest Capacities among the former, and of Liberality upon the most painful and diligent among the latter; What good Consequences would not attend this? The Fathers, the Mothers, and the elder Brothers, when they knew of a Mandarin's coming, would spur their Children or younger Brothers up to study. And the Master, after such an Honour, would have a great deal more Zeal and Authority to make himself heard and obey'd; and thereby form Pupils distinguish'd both by Learning and Virtue.

REMARKS on the same SUBJECT.

THE I hyo, or Schools founded and endowed by the Liberality of the Prince, Mandarins, or other wealthy People zealous for the public Good, as far as I can learn, are pretty rare in China; but the common Hyo or Schools are so frequent, that there is scarce a Village without at least one. And a young Man who has not studied, is a living Monument of the extremest Poverty of his Parents.

Public Schools rare in China.

It is a Proverb in China; There are more Masters than Scholars, and more Physicians than Patients.

Teaching is the Employment of all the numerous Crowds of poor Literati; for as the greatest Honours and the highest Mandarinship is attainable by Letters, there is not a Family that does not make one of the Children study, in hopes that he may succeed as well as others; but as they are frequently disappointed, they at last find themselves reduc'd to the Necessity of Teaching.

Teaching, the business of Poor Literati.

Schoolmasters often to enlarge their Income, make up a small Collection of Nostrums, and thus act in the double Capacity of Schoolmaster and Physician. Or else, they betake themselves to the latter, when Age has incapacitated them for the former; so that all of a sudden they become old Physicians.

The Literati who teach, if they have Genius, learn at the same time; that they may attain a higher Degree. For, as soon as in the Examinations they become Syew tlay or Doctors, however poor they were before, they instantly emerge from their Misery. All their Kindred contributes to their Subsistence; they have a Right to demand Favours from the Mandarins; and are in hopes to become one themselves within a certain Number of Years. If they repair to Court, and there get to be Preceptor to some Mandarin's or great Man's Son, their Advancement is yet more quick and more sure: This is a Course that many of them take.

Respect of the Chinese for their Preceptors.

The Quality of Master, or Syen seng, is never effaced with respect to the Scholar. He, (says the Proverb) who has been once look'd upon as Master, ought all the rest of his Life to be look'd upon as Father. It undoubtedly was upon this Maxim that the famous Minister of State, Paul Syu, the great Protector of our Holy Religion, put himself his and whole Family into deep Mourning, as if it had been for his own Father, when he heard of the Death of the Missionary who had instructed and baptised him.

Upon these Principles too, whenever the Scholars become Mandarins, their Master, or, in his room, his Sons, have a Right to visit them, and to demand a mark of Acknowledgment, which is never denied. Even a Viceroy, in Presence of the great Mandarins of his Province, will yield, without any Scruple, the first Place to the Syen seng, who had given him his earliest Instructions; tho' perhaps he lives poor, and in some Village, while his Pupil mounts to the highest Distinction. This is the Foundation of the great Honours that even Emperors pay to Confucius, who is the first Syen seng of the Empire.

The Chinese Authors very much extoll the Office of a Schoolmaster to Youth. It is, (says one of their Sages) the most compleat and the most important Employment; for the good or bad Fortune of a Family depends upon the Education of the Children, and the Faults of the Scholars affect the Character of the Master.

The following Passage is contained in a pretty Modern Author, approved of by two of the first Doctors about Court. "To apply to the Education of Youth is a very high Point of the Virtue Te kyi ta: Will the Creator of the Universe fail one Day to reward it? T'au we ngan te pu me yew?" The same Author has several Observations which I shall take notice of, viz.

First OBSERVATION.

IT is wrong to shew Contempt, as People sometimes do, for those who have taught us the first Elements. The Pains they take are very great, and incomparably more discouraging, than those required in directing the Studies of such as are more advanced.

Difficulties incident to School-masters.

REMARK.] In reality, we see a great many Schoolmasters who become asthmatic and consumptive, by being obliged both to study and to teach; tho' their Entertainment is better than they can have at their own Houses; the Parents of their Scholars providing them with all Necessaries. Besides, the continual Bawling either of the Master or the Scholars is uneasy; for the Chinese learn their Books by reciting them aloud, and are surpris'd to see us study without opening our Lips, or using any Motion; they accompanying always the Sound of their Voice with a slight Motion of the Body, or at least of the Head.

Second OBSERVATION.

Bad Choice of Masters to what owing.

A few People dwell together, that they may be near the Master who teaches their Children; and because they are not in a Condition to be at Expences, any of the Literati serves their turn; thus the Generality of Masters are very ignorant.

REMARK.] They are, however, good for somewhat; for they have a Method of teaching certain Books. Besides, they shew the Scholars how, and when to make a handsome Reverence; to give and take a Dish of Tea genteely; to contract a certain Air in his walking, the Manner of his Bonnet, and the handling of his Fan, which distinguishes the Chinese Students.

Third OBSERVATION.

Particular
Duty of a Master.

He commends the Practice of a certain Professor, who always enquired of the Parents of his Scholars, whether they designed to compleat the Education of their Children as Scholars, or if they intended them only for Merchants or Tradefmen, such as themselves, that he might adapt his Lessons to their several Views, and his Scholars neither lose their Time nor he his Pains.

Method of Educating Poor Children.

REMARK.] The Children of poor People are commonly assisted in quickly procuring a small Stock of Characters, for writing their Accounts, by means of a Book, where the most ordinary Occurrences of Life are coarsely drawn, and below each Figure is the Character or Name of the Thing represented.

The Chinese
curious in founding the Inclinations.

The Chinese, for their Diversion, commonly found the Inclinations of their Children. Whenever they can use their Hands, they lay before them a Book, a Ballance, and Arms; and according to the Choice of the Child, they judge (A) him born with a Genius for Learning, Trade, or War.

Fourth OBSERVATION.

The Capacity of the Scholar is to be consulted, and it is not to be over-loaded with Study. Tho'

(A) This Custom has very little Foundation in Reason. The Choice of the Children probably will fix upon what most attracts their Eyes. Perhaps it may only prevail among the lower Rank of People, who we find by Du Hall's Accounts in other Places of this Work are as much addicted to Superstitions as any in the World.

Tho' they could learn 200 Characters in a Day, teach them but 100; otherwise you will discourage them. Do not push them on to too hard Tasks, for that is to make them do amiss.

Capacities of Children to be consulted.

REMARK.] As to the Memory of the Chinese, says Father Detricolles, I have been more than once surprized, to hear the little Christians about seven or eight Years of Age, repeat pretty long Books from one End to the other. Science in China, consists principally in the Exercise of the Memory; and in committing to it many Books. A Mandarin, one Day seeing my small European Library, whispered to another Mandarin, Do you think that he can repeat some of these Books to us? These Gentlemen frequently enquired of us, by what Secrets they might attain a happy Memory. I believe a great many ruin theirs by their Excess at first setting out upon their Studies.

Prodigious Memory of the Chinese.

Fifth OBSERVATION.

Above all things young People must be prohibited from reading Romances, Comedies, Verses, or obscene Songs; these sort of Books soften and corrupt the Heart insensibly, and contribute to the Loss of good Manners. It is a shameful Thing ever to have read them with Pleasure; a bad Discourse, if it enters into the Ear of a young Scholar, remains, all his Life after, in his Heart.

Books prohibited to Young Children.

REMARK.] The Emperor Kang hi prohibited the Sale of Books that are contrary to good Manners, such as certain Romances capable to corrupt Youth. The Mandarins inspect the Shops of the Booksellers, who, for all that, do not stick to sell them privately.

Extract of a Treatise upon the same Subject, made by Chu hi, one of the most celebrated Doctors in China, who lived under the Nineteenth Dynasty called Seng.

CHU HI begins with pointing out the true End of Study, which is Virtue: To this it is, says he, that a Scholar ought to apply all his Forces; in the same Manner as he who draws a Bow, aims straight at the Mark, and fears nothing so much as to shoot wide. To learn Children Characters, to make them repeat whole Books, and to give them an outward Air of Politeness, without ever troubling them with any Endeavours to reform their Manners, is generally what is called Affection for Children; but at the bottom it is hating them: Parents may perhaps be very well satisfied with such a Master, but do not superior Beings, without our perceiving it, keep an Account of so criminal a Negligence, to punish it in due Time?

Consequence of the Education of Youth.

The famous Hyu, when he was a little Scholar, asked one Day of his Master, What was the End of his Studies? The latter answer'd, That he might rise to the honourable Degree of Syew tsay, or Doctor. What, reply'd the young Hyu, is there nothing more proposed? The Master immediately perceived the elevated Views of the Child, and went to his Parents: Your Son, said he, has a Soul greater than ordinary; so promising a Scholar requires a more able Master than I am; take care to provide one for him.

The End of Study.

At present, when we say that a Man can, if he will, become as virtuous as our first Emperors Tau and Shun, it is look'd upon as a Paradox; the Difficulty discourages to succeed. But does any renounce the Goods of Fortune, because of the Pain that attends the acquiring of them? If young Men are commonly entertain'd with the Example of our antient Sages, and if they are accustomed frequently to think of them, they will become what they were. It is in virtue of such an Education that a Master is called a second Father; but a Master ought to remember, that as a Workman is employ'd because of his Skill, so when he is charged with the Education of a Youth, it requires all his Cares and Application.

Another of Government.

The Advice given by an Emperor upon his Death-bed to his Successor, should be inculcated among Youth: "Never say this or that Fault is a slight one, therefore I will indulge my self in it; or, this Act of Virtue is inconsiderable, therefore let me omit it."

Youth is averse to Constraint; they therefore ought to be instructed in such a Manner as not to discourage them. If the Bundle of Thorns which is wrapp'd round the young Tree, to defend it from Cattle, is too thick, and binds it too hard, it crushes it. Instructions and Reprimands should come like the vernal Winds and Rains, whose Influence promotes the gentle Growth of the Plants.

A Maxim in Education illustrated.

Lessons and Precepts formerly were in Verse, and in Form of Songs, that they might enter more easily into the Minds of Children, and serve for Diversions adapted to their Age, thereby making them insensible of the Toil of Studying. Our antient Kings had introduced that Method of Teaching: We think that there is little in it; but it is of very great Importance. This Method is alter'd; do Things go better?

Account of Antient Lessons and Precepts.

Chu hi descends into several other little Details: "When Children, says he, repeat their Lessons, cause them to do it in such a Manner, that they may have printed on their Minds

"Minds

"Minds, what they pronounce with their Lips: say nothing to them that can be construed to favour (*) false Sects: Take Care to give them an Antidote against that Poison." He then advises to give them Rewards, which ought to be done the first and fifteenth of every Month: These Rewards should consist of Pencils and Paper for Writing.

And of the Chinese Holidays for Schools.

Chu bi speaks next of the long Vacation which begins at the twentieth of the last Month of the Chinese Year, and continues to the twentieth or thereabouts of the (†) first Month. This long Vacation is preceded by a general Examination of the Scholars; now excepting this there are but few in the Course of the Year; the few that are fall on the Feasts, and other Chinese Holidays in different Months. The Birth-Day of the Syen feng, or the Professor, is another Feast for the Scholars, who that Day make him their Presents of Congratulation. The Evening Class ends every Day by a short History. This Practice is very commendable. At last, before the Scholars are dismiss'd, a small varnish'd Board is expos'd, which contains an useful Instruction in the Commerce of Life in four Verses; these every one transcribes, and reads three Times with a loud Voice: Then the School breaks up for that Day.

Faults to be shunn'd.

Chu bi has an entire Chapter upon the Care with which young Students ought to shun, 1. Too many Engagements, 2. Play, 3. Wine, 4. Gallantry, 5. A soft and effeminate Life. He then passes to many Ko sh, that is to say, Things to be lamented, with respect to the Neglect of Studying: viz.

and to be lamented.

1. History informs us, that formerly the Passion for Study was so great, that a poor Man reduced to dig the Earth for his Livelihood, carried his Book to the Field with him, that he might snatch a leisure Moment for Study, amidst his hard Toils. What matter of Shame is this to those who live at their ease, and have all the Conveniences of Studying, yet feel no Ardour for it?

2. Our Ancestors went cheerfully a great Way to search out a Master: Now-a-days we have Masters at hand, and yet neglect to profit by them.

3. Formerly, Men were oblig'd to be at the prodigious Pains of transcribing whole Books; yet they willingly underwent the Labour; but at present, tho' by means of the fine Art of Printing, the Bookfellers Shops and Libraries are overstock'd with Books, Persons neglect to use them.

4. For want of Explanation, People were formerly oblig'd to spend three Years upon the Study of one Book; and were thirty Years in understanding the Canonical Books. At Present, the Labours of the Learned have rendered all these Studies attainable in the Flower of a Man's Age; yet we see Persons spending the Bloom of their Life in Idleness and Indolence.

5. How many unhappy Persons are born deaf and blind? We bewail their Misfortune, and justly. Yet, when young Men in the free Exercise of their Senses, and with a lively, penetrating Understanding, abuse these precious Gifts; what worse could befall them, tho' they were depriv'd of both Eyes and Ears?

6. What Age or Condition of Life is exempted from Pain? Yet a young Fellow free from all Trouble or Hardship, shuns a slight Pain, such as that of reading, while his Father, perhaps, is earning a Livelihood for him with the Sweat of his Brows.

7. How many People born to humble and mean Employments are so unhappy as to be ignorant even of the Names of our Canonical Books, Shi and Li? Ye also, Young Gentlemen, Sons of the Literati, and of the Doctors, ye place not the Glory of a Man of Learning, as your Fathers did, in the Knowledge of Books, but in clothing yourselves in Silk, and in assuming great Airs; without minding that by your Ignorance you will sink your Family into Obscurity.

8. Those who lived in the first times wanted Places, where they might, apart from Hurry and Noise, read and compose; but now there are Edifices built on purpose, in Cities, in the Country, where Masters invite and wait upon Scholars; yet these Advantages are slighted, Men are amus'd with Trifles, and are as vain as Women in their Ornaments and Dresses, both for the Body and Head; and yet they affect the Name of Literati, and without blushing allow People to give them the Title of Doctor.

9. All the Duties of civil Life are circumstantially set down in Books; yet young Men neglect to learn them; having no Taste, and shewing no Ardour for any thing, but vain Amusements: And thus the fine Lessons of Morality perish and are useless. In short, an ignorant Man, insensible of his own, is not a Degree above the most stupid Beasts.

REMARK.] We have seen above, that Children, when they first begin to Study, have a Story proper to encourage them to read, to open their Genius, and to animate them to Virtue, explained to them every Day; I shall give some of the little Histories, which will let the reader into a Taste of the Chinese Learning, and their Industry in the Education of Youth. These different Passages of History are collected into one Volume. Some of them reach as far back as the first times of the Empire: Most of them are of the antient Dynasties: And only three of them are of the latter Ages. At the Top of every Page of the Book is a kind of Print, wherein the Story is represented, doubtless, to fix it in the Imaginations of the Children and to assist their Memories. They take care to write the Name and Surname of the Person mention'd, the Place of his Birth, and under what Reign he lived.

(*) Chu bi, under the Reign of the Song, was a profess'd Enemy to the modern idolatrous Sects, who oppos'd the primitive Literary Sects.

† The Beginning of the Chinese Year is the Time of their great Rejoicings, which continue till some Days after the Feast of Lanterns; this always happens upon the fifteenth of the first Moon.

Extract of a Chinese Book, containing a Collection of Stories that they read to Children.

REMOTE as the Chinese Antiquities are, the Author cannot go much farther back than he does in the beginning of this Work, where he speaks of the Piety of Shun. This Shun recommended himself by an absolute Submission to very rigorous Parents. The Emperor Tau, informed of his Piety, excluded his own Children from the Throne, because he thought they wanted Virtues to deserve it, in favour of Shun who was a poor Labourer. Examples of Stories read to Children.

2. A good Old Man, under the Dynasty of the Chew, had a Son about 70 Years of Age, who, that he might divert his Father, and banish from him the Ideas of his Infirmities, counterfeited the Part of a young Child before him, by putting on a Dress of different Colours, and imitating Children in their Plays and Cries, jumping about him, stumbling designedly, and rolling about on the Ground; being satisfied if he could make the old Man laugh, for whom he likewise provided all the Necessaries of Life. Example 2.

3. Under the second Reign of the Han, a young Child called Whang byang, having lost his Mother when he was but 9 Years of Age, had almost died of Grief. He however redoubled his Affection for his Father. In the Summer time he, a long time every Day, fann'd the Bolster and Mattress upon which his Father was to lie: And during the Winter he always lay down in the Bed before his Father, that he might warm the Place of the Bed in which his Father was to sleep. The Mandarin of the Country hearing of the tender Concern of the young Child, was so charm'd with it, that he caused a public and a lasting Monument of this filial Piety to be erected, to excite Youth to excel therein. Example 3.

4. In the Times of the Emperors Tsin, another Child about 8 Years of Age, whose Name was U mwen, gave a yet greater Proof of filial Tendernefs. His Parents were so poor, that they could not even command a Coverlet to defend them in the Summer from the Flies, which at that time are so troublesome in Houses. The young U mwen stript himself naked to the Waist, and stood by the Side of the Bed, exposing his delicate Skin to the Flies without driving them away: When they are fill'd with my Blood, said he, they will let my Parents be at rest. To such a Degree did his Affection reach. Example 4.

5. Min sun lost his Mother when he was very young. His Father took another Wife, by whom he had 2 Children; Min sun was every Moment very severely treated by this Step-Mother, but never complained. He one Day fell in a Swoon at the Feet of his Father, who then knew the Cause of it, and was going to dismiss the unnatural Step-Mother, but Min sun hindered him. My Father, said he, there are 3 Children of us in the House, I am the only one who suffers, but if you send your Wife away, we must all three suffer. The Father was touch'd with these Words; and the Step-Mother being inform'd of them, became an affectionate Parent to Min sun. Example 5.

6. We have another Passage, by which (to speak in the Chinese Phrase) we see that Virtue forces the most savage Hearts to admire and to love it. It has some Resemblance to the Story of Pylades and Orestes. Example 6.

Two Brothers, of which one was called Chang hyau, and the other Chang li, omitted nothing that could contribute to their Mother's Subsistence. A Famine of Bread happened to afflict the Land. The elder Hyau returning one Day from the Fields, where he had been gathering some Roots, unhappily fell into the Hands of certain famish'd Robbers, who were so inhuman as to kill and eat all they met with. As they were just about to give the fatal Blow to Hyau, Gentlemen, said he, weeping, I have left a very aged Mother at home, who is dying of Hunger; allow me to carry to her these Roots I have gathered, and I swear to you that I will instantly return to you, for then I shall feel no Unwillingness to part with Life. The Barbarians were touched, and permitted him to go upon the Terms he propos'd. When Hyau came home he told what had befallen him. His Brother immediately went secretly and delivered himself up to the Robbers. He whom you allowed, said he, to go to his Mother's Assistance is my Brother, and is far above me in Merit, tho', as you see, I am plumper than him; therefore kill me instead of him. The elder Hyau finding his Brother gone, immediately suspected his Design, and ran to the Place of Rendezvous: 'Twas I who past my Promise, said he, and I am come now to fulfil it: Pay no Regard I beg of you to what my Brother says. These Men, tho' thirsting for Blood, yet struck with the filial Piety and fraternal Affection of the two young Men, sent them back without doing any Harm to either the one or the other.

7. The Matron Ly, understanding that her Son, sitting upon his Tribunal, had been so far transported with Passion, as to cause a Soldier to be beaten to Death, and that a Mutiny was spreading among the Troops for so violent an Action: She immediately left her inner Apartment, and repaired to the Place of Audience, where the Sentence had been pronounced and executed. The Mandarin instantly rising in Respect, she advanced and placed herself in his Seat, commanding him to throw himself upon his Knees, and reproaching him for his Cruelty in these Terms: What, my Son, said she, has the Emperor entrusted you with Authority Example 7.

only to abuse it, as you do? Then turning towards the Executioners of Justice, Let my Son be stript, and let his Shoulders be beaten; in right of a Mother I command this Punishment to be inflicted. The Subaltern Officers immediately threw themselves at her Feet, and begged for his Pardon. Thus the Authority of a Mother appeased the Mutiny of an Army, corrected the haughty and passionate Temper of her Son, and preserved in her Family the distinguished Post, which he was upon the point of forfeiting by his Imprudence.

Example 8. 8. The Mother of one Wey pe yu was not satisfied with barely threatening. For when her Son was grown up to a Man, if he committed any Fault, she applied the Rod with her own Hand to his Shoulders, which the obedient Son always exposed to her humbly, and without repining received the Chastisement. One Day, as she was whipping him, he wept, and roared out. Ha, my Son, says the Mother, do you begin to complain, and impatiently to suffer my Correction? No, my Mother, answered he, it is not on that Account I cry: But because, the last time you gave me the Chastisement I deserved, your Blows made me smart; but now I scarce feel them, and thereby see that your Strength is diminished, and that makes me cry out. This submissive Answer being made public, did a great deal of Honour to Wey pe yu.

REMARK.] It is not the Hopes of succeeding to a great Estate, that renders the Chinese so submissive to their Parents, especially to their Mothers who can make no Testament. Besides, we have a good Proof that this filial Respect is rooted in the Heart: Because in China it subsists even after the Death of their Parents; but in Europe they are soon forgot.

Example 9. 9. Under the Reign of the Song, One called Kew bay kang, whose Father had been a great Mandarin, in his Youth loved Pleasures and Diversion: He spent a great deal of his Time in taking the Air on Horseback, or in hunting with his Hawks and Falcons. His Mother frequently reproved him upon this Score. One Day losing all Patience, she threw at him the first Thing that came into her Hands, and thereby happened to wound him in the Foot: He immediately understood how displeasing his Conduct had been to his Mother, and altered his Course of Life, applying himself to Learning, which afterwards raised him to great Employments. After the Death of his Mother, he never either saw or touched the Scar of his wound but he was melted, and broke out into Sighs and Sobs, regretting so good a Mother, who had the Reformation of his Life, and the Amendment of his Manners, so much at Heart.

Example 10. 10. The Reply of Sye chang, who was but 8 Years of Age, was much applauded in a Company of learned Men. His Father led him by the Hand into an Assembly of the Literati, where himself assisted. The young Child had a grave, serious, modest Air, far beyond what is common at these Years. One Day in a Circle of learned Men where he was, one thought fit to say to his Father, Indeed your Son will be another Yen wuey. This Yen wuey was one of the Disciples of Confucius, and so much esteemed for his Virtue, that he was look'd upon to be a Disciple worthy of such a Master. Sye chang immediately replied; We do not now-a-days see another Confucius, and how can we hope to find another Yen wuey?

Example 11. 11. The famous Yang syew was of a very mean Extraction: He is represented in the Prints of the Books we are talking off, as being so poor, that having no Money to pay for Schooling, nor for either Pencils or Paper, by which he could learn to write, his Mother traced the Characters upon the Sand with a Rod, and thereby made him read and copy them.

Example 12. 12. Fan Shun Gin pass'd whole Nights in Studying, and became by his Application great Mandarin. His Widow, in order to animate her Children to Study, used to show them the Tester of the Bed, on which their Father lay before he became Doctor: Observe the Roof of this Bed said she, how it is all black with the Smoak of the Lamp; your Father even abridg'd himself of Sleep that he might study; and thereby raised himself to be Minister of State.

REMARK.] It frequently happens that the Children or the Grand Children of the Mandarins, fall into the primitive Obscurity and Meanness of their Fathers, while others by an obstinate Application make great Fortunes.

Example 13. 13. Se ma yung, so famous in Learning, applied so closely to his Studies, that when he was 7 Years of Age, he would forget either to eat or drink, and seem'd to be insensible of Cold and Heat. At fifteen Years of Age he was Master of most Books. That he might hinder himself from sleeping, he made use of a wooden Cylinder for a Pillow: Whenever he was overpower'd with Sleep, the Book dropt out of his Hand, and his Head repos'd upon the Pillow, which being hard and smooth was apt to slip, and thereby awak'd him with the least Motion it made.

Example 14. 14. Another named Sun kin, who was called the Doctor of the Shut Door, or Pi ku, because he rarely went out, that he might not be surpris'd by Sleep on his Studies, hung from the top of the Ceiling a Cord, to which he tied his Hair; and thus he resisted the Attacks of Sleep. Another, who was very poor, in the midst of Winter used to read by Moon-light. Another, called Che yng, wrapt some Glow-Worms up in a piece of very thin Gauze, and applying the Gauze to the Lines of his Book, he studied part of the Night.

REMARK.] In short, it is not by spending a few Years in Books, that a poor Scholar can better his Fortune: His Application must be indefatigable. This is well enough express'd by the following Story.

Example 15. 15. Li pe, who, under the Reign of the Han, became one of the first Doctors of the Court, addicted himself to his Studies from a Child: He came one Year to a general Examination of the Province, in which meeting with bad Success, he despair'd of ever obtaining the Degree of Syew tsay. He

He therefore resolv'd to give up Learning, and to turn his Views to another Object. While he ruminated on this, he met with an old Woman, who was rubbing an Iron Pestle to and fro upon a Whetstone. What do you pretend to do with that Pestle? said he to her. I want, answered she, to grind it down till it becomes so sharp as to be fit for embroidering. Li pe began then to reflect, and to conceive this Mystery: And instead of holding on his Way to his House, he returned to his ancient Place of Study; to which applying himself with new Ardour, he at last arrived to great Employments.

REMARK.] The Author, from whom the above Examples of filial Piety and Application to Study are extracted, ends this Book by relating Passages of History upon the different Virtues proper to a Man of Honour. Some are as follow:

16. Under the Reign of the Song, a Philosopher called Fan chun shwen said to his Disciples: Example 16.
All my Science is comprehended in understanding and practising these two Words, Uprightness, Sweetness; and yet I see that a great deal still remains for me to learn and practise. There are few, added he, however dull they naturally are, who don't shew abundance of Wit whenever they blame others. In the same manner, the most understanding, when they would excuse their own Faults, betray a great deal of Ignorance. We must, in order to act well, reproach ourselves for our Faults with the same Dispositions of Heart we show when we reproach others, and to pardon the Failings of others in the same manner as we pardon our own. By constantly observing this Conduct, we shall arrive at a high Degree of Wisdom and Virtue.

17. In the Times of the Song, there was another Sage Mandarin whose Name was Fan, Example 17.
but his Surname Chung yen. He had no Attachment to Riches: His Pleasure was to share them with the Poor, especially those of his own Kindred, which was very numerous. That he might render his Favours to them more lasting, he purchased large Estates, whose Revenues were to be for ever employed in the Subsistence of the Poor, but those of his own Family preferably to others. Besides, he would not allow his Steward to enquire whether the Relations were remotely or nearly allied to him. All we Fan, said he, who are in the Provinces of Kyang nan and Kyang si, are descended from the first Fan who settled in these Parts; we are all one Family. For an hundred Years past I am the only one who have made a Fortune, that is to say, our Fathers for an hundred Years past have heap'd up nothing but Virtues. The Fruits of the Virtues of so many particular Persons begin to discover themselves in one, and I have been rais'd to Employments. If I and my Children shall pretend to ingross my Riches, without sharing them with our poor Relations, with what Face after my Death can I appear before my Ancestors? And at present should I not blush to enter into the Tse tang of my Family? that is, the Hall or the Place where the Pictures of Ancestors are preserved.

18. Under the Dynasty of the Tang, who reign'd about the Commencement of the Christian Era, Kung y was famous in one Respect; he saw his Descendants even to the ninth Generation, composing as it were but one Family, all in perfect Harmony and Union. The Emperor Kau tsong wanted to see this Miracle, and as he was going to Tay chang honoured the House of Kung y with his Presence. He called for the good old Man, and asked him by what means he preserv'd Peace and Union among so many Children and Grand-Children. Cung y ordered Paper, Pencil and Ink to be brought him, and he wrote down above a hundred times the Letter Giu, which signifies, Patience. He then presented his Paper to the Emperor; thereby signifying that the Divisions of Families proceeded from the Uneasiness entertained, when one saw another better provided for, better cloath'd, treated, carels'd, attended, honoured, or more happy and easy than himself. But Patience, if you know how to inspire and to use it, prevents these Disorders, and establishes Peace and Harmony.

19. The same Thing was seen in the Family of Li wen ching, under the Song. This Family had more than 300 Persons, Sons, Grandsons, and Great-Grandsons, living at once in the same House, and eating at the same Table, and subsisting in common upon the Estate and Fortune of the Family. Those of it that were Mandarins, sent all the Superfluity of their Estates to be deposited in the common Stock, which supplied the Necessities of the whole Family. Example 19.

20. Whang wen, when he was old, was advanced to the highest Employments. Every time that he receiv'd his Salary he threw his Eyes to the Ground with a Sigh; then turning to his Domestic, This Money, said he, that I receive, is the Substance and Blood of poor People, and I regret that I am to live on it. Example 20.

21. Chang chi pe, after he was a great Mandarin, alter'd nothing, neither in his Table nor his Dress, nor the Furniture of his Palace; and kept his Domestic to a very modest Behaviour. You are mistaken, would his Friends say to him, if, by shunning Expences, you think to acquire the Reputation of an honest Minister; for your Frugality will pass for sordid Meanness. Believe me, my Friends, reply'd he, Fortune is inconstant; I am in Poss to-day; to-morrow I may be turn'd out of it. The Transition from Want to Plenty is easy; but if a Man in this Condition accustoms himself to Luxury and Merry-making; how shocking must it be for him to return to his primitive Obscurity! Our Life is but as it were one Day; let us do our best to make it uniform and regular. Example 21.

22. Syu mwey and Yang yu lived in great Friendship together, even before they were rais'd to Employments. Syu owed the Beginning of his Fortune to Yang, who lost his own Post: He was was reduced a Degree lower, and appointed to go a great way off to a Mandarinate of an inferior Order, which was a wretched Post; it was found, that he was but ill look'd on at Court; so that he saw himself abandon'd by all his Friends, and every one dreaded to have any Conversation with him. Syu mwey never abated his Friendship for him. When Tang departed, no Body appear'd to bid him Farewel but Syu mwey, who attended him without the City to the first Resting-Place, which was about a League from the Walls; there they parted with great Demonstrations of Friendship. This faithful and intrepid Friendship, which, one would think, might have been Syu mwey's Ruin, came to the Ears of the Minister, who soon after gave him a considerable Promotion, without the other's knowing to what he owed his sudden Rise. When he thank'd the Minister, Sir, said he, I never had the Honour to appear in your Presence, and yet you load me with Favours. The Minister answer'd in a few Words: I have given you a Post, being perswaded that one who so well answers the Services and Friendship of Tang, will never fail to answer the Favours of his Prince.

Example 23. 23. Ly wen pe, by his Merit and Learning, rais'd himself to the first Dignities of the Court, to which he introduc'd his Mother. One Day returning from the Palace to his own House, he enter'd the Apartment of his Mother, in his Habit of Ceremony, to enquire about her Health; and finding her placed upon a Stool spinning, as she is represented in the Prints of the Book; Ha! what, Madam, said he, do you spin now that you are become Mistress of the Family of a Grandee in the Court? At these Words sending forth a deep Sigh, she said, Is the Empire then upon its Decline? I see that the Government is intrusted to Mandarins, that talk like young and unexperienc'd People, who would inspire a soft and an idle Life. Stay a Moment and hear me: While the Body labours, the Mind is employ'd and collected; and the Understanding being intent upon its Duty, the Heart is form'd to Virtue: But without Virtue, it gives itself up to the greatest Irregularities. Do we not see that the Inhabitants of a rich Country are never industrious; but those who live in a barren poor Country are active, dexterous, and laborious? Did you forget, when you talk'd to me in so inadvertent a Manner, that our ancient Empresses wrought with their own Hands upon Diadems and upon Sashes for the Use of the Princes and Emperors, and that it was the Custom to set the Wives of the Mandarins a Task to be wrought by their own Hands? I thought you would have been the first to put me in mind of these ancient Examples, and yet you say to me, Why do you work? Rather quietly enjoy the Pleasures of Life, since I am now a Grandee of the Court. My Son, this Language makes me tremble for our Family, and dread lest the Memory of your Father be extinguish'd in you. Think of this.

Example 24. 24. It is told, by way of Jest on Casters of Nativities, that Hong shi, who from a mean Extraction was rais'd to the Throne, caus'd his Empire to be carefully search'd for a Man born in the precise Moment, and under the very same Aspect of the Stars, with himself; both these Circumstances met in a poor Country-man, who was brought to Court. The Emperor surpriz'd to see him so very poor, understood that this honest Man subsisted by means of 15 Bee-hives he had. After all, said the Emperor, there is some Resemblance betwixt his Fate and mine: I am Emperor of the 15 Provinces, and have just as many Kings depending upon me as he has upon him; for every Bee-hive has its King, and that King furnishes this Man, his Emperor, with an annual Tribute, upon which he subsists. The Conclusion however is, That all Casters of Nativities are Impostors.

Casting of Nativities
banter'd.

REMARK.] The moderate Literati, by such Raillery as the foregoing, turn the false Sects to Ridicule: The common Literati treat them with Contempt, and even with Abuse. Let us return to the Author from whom I have extract'd what relates to the Method of Study among the Chinese.

Extract of a Chapter upon the particular Examination of the young Students, who are Syew tlay, or Candidates for that Degree.

THE Governor of the City shall from time to time assemble the Literati in his Jurisdiction, in order to pass an Examination, in which he himself shall prescribe the Subjects of their Compositions. These Assemblies and Examinations answer two Ends: The first is the promoting of Learning by the Regard shewn to it; the second is, the conducting the Literati in that Point of Rectitude and Perfection, which ought to be the principal Fruit of their Studies. For in fine, by means of these repeated Examinations, they take a Pleasure in their Duty, especially when they perceive the Mandarins of the Place, whom they look upon as their Fathers, are pleas'd with their Compositions, at the same time honouring those with their Friendship who excel in Genius, and yet more in their good Manners.

As for the Literati only in Name, who for a fordid and frequently unjust Gain, spend whole Days in running over the Audiences, instead of Studying; such will have reason to be ashamed at the little Progress they have made, and this Shame will make them quit these unworthy Avocations.

cations. These are the Advantages of Monthly Examinations. But at present this antient Practice is almost lost among the Learned. It is of Consequence to revive it vigorously.

For this Effect, the Governor of the City must order the Mandarins of the Literati, to name a Day in every Month, when these Assemblies shall be held in the Hall of Lessons, or the Min lun tang (an Apartment in the Building of Confucius) where the Subjects of the Composition are to be prescribed, and the Examinants are to labour all that Day under the Eye of the Mandarin; if the College of the City is in possession of a Land Estate, a Collation to be bestowed upon the Literati on the Day of Examination, must be furnished out of the Revenues. At every Table there must be two Dishes of Meat and two of Pulse. Four are to eat at one Table. At the Collation in the Evening, they are to be allowed two little Pots of Wine for every Table. I reflect that the Students at one of these City Examinations, cannot be fewer than some dozens: Thus the Expence of an Assembly will mount to very near two Taels, and as in the 6th Month, by reason of the great Heat, and in the 12th, by reason of the great Cold, there is no Academy, all the Expences of a Year for these Entertainments, cannot be less than twenty Taels. This Sum is not so considerable, but that the Governor of a City may save it out of his Expences. It belongs to him to make public Intimation beforehand, of the Day of the Assembly and Examination, and to give Advice of it to the Mandarin of the Literati; and at the same time invite him to be present. All young Students, capable to compose a piece of Eloquence, are to be admitted to this Examination.

The Composition being ended, and the Pieces read and examined, the different Degrees of their Merit must be fixed: Those who are judged perfect are to be placed out of the common Rank; and to keep up the Emulation, the finest first-rate Pieces are to be pick'd out and engraved upon a Plate and printed, to the end that this commendable Exercise even but of one Day, may not remain without Advantages and Rewards.

Moreover, the Mandarin must not fail to bestow particular Praises upon such as join to a fine Genius, a polite and regular Life. If these are already rich, he is to give them some honourable Testimony under his own Hand. If they are poor, he shall join to his Praises a pecuniary Gratuity, whereby they may entertain themselves. This Conduct will cause those who are most negligent to reproach themselves, and be ashamed of their Backwardness. They will animate themselves, and by endeavouring to attain the Perfection of others, they may come to make a great Figure in Learning. I see no way more effectual than this, for promoting Literature; of which the Governors of the Cities will have the Glory; for thus they can plan out and smoothe a Way, to conduct, as it were by the Hand, the Students of their District.

REMARK upon the Preceding CHAPTER.

THESE Examinations are call'd particular, to distinguish them from the general ones, which a Mandarin of a City of the second or third Order, holds once a Year; and are succeeded by another, held by a Mandarin of the first Order, upon whom these Cities depend. This double annual Examination is held in one District, that the young Students may be chosen who are admitted to compose that Year before the Mandarin of Letters, who is sent expressly from Court, with power to confer the degree of Syew tlay, or Bachelor, upon a certain Number in every City according to the Extent of its District, or rather the Number of its Students.

The Tau of the City Zhou is Governor, or rather Intendant of two other Cities of the first Order; and all his Office, being to judge in important Affairs, when he is most at Leisure he also regularly holds these particular Examinations; and by this he piques himself in imitating the Wisdom of past Ages. Besides, these Tau, or Superintendents of three Cities, as populous as a large Province in France, commonly have no Opportunity of amassing Riches: And if they are not powerfully supported at Court, they have no Chance to better their Fortune but by a strict Virtue. This is a vast motive for a Chinese to make a Shew of Virtue and Public Spirit.

A Complaint is made in the former Chapter, and with good reason too, that the Syew tlay are only employed in attending Audiences and soliciting Causes at the Tribunals. This is all the way of living that most of them have, unless when they receive Favours from the Mandarin, to whose Person they have free Access by reason of their Degree. They afterwards drive a kind of Trade with these Favours among the meaner kind of People. Many of them do not value the Degree of Literati, any farther than it enables them to carry on this Commerce. Mandarins, either of very great Authority, or very great Integrity, are above these Solicitations, and refuse the Visits and Requests of the Graduates. The other Mandarins, either from Weakness or Fear, keep in with them, lest they should discover their secret Injustices to their Superior Mandarins. Thus both their Pens and Tongues are dreaded.

The present Emperor, well aware of the bad Consequences of this Irregularity, applied the most effectual Remedy to binder these Graduates from intermeddling in any Affair, or from appearing before the Tribunals but in very important Causes. 1st. They were obliged to have four Persons to appear to their Character and their Conduct. 2d. They could not present any Request even relating to their own Affairs, to the Governor of a Place, unless it was revised and approved of by the Mandarin of the Literati, who, if he conniv'd with them, was sure to lose his Employment.

Translation of the Chapter Kyang hyo, wherein the Author gives a Model, of such a Discourse as may be made in the Hyo, or Hall of the Assembly of the Literati.

Foundation of Government; and

PERFECT Government is founded upon the wholesome Customs introduced in a State. To attain this end, we must endeavour to correct the Heart of Man. But by what means? By giving him a true notion of the Doctrines of the Sages. It is not to be imagined, that he is to go very far in search of this Knowledge, or that it is impossible, or even difficult, to acquire it. No out of the Way or extraordinary Paths are proposed, or such, as a Man has Difficulty to enter into, or to tread. All this Doctrine is reduced to the Duties of Prince and Subject; Father and Child; elder and younger Brother; Husband and Wife, and the reciprocal Tyes betwixt Friend and Friend. Let these Obligations be perfectly fulfilled there shall be neither Defect nor Excess. What more is required? But without Study, one cannot conceive the Reason by which these Maxims are regulated, and if the Rules are not understood, the Virtues can never be practised. Besides, what is understood by the Word Reason, is properly the Attribute of Tyen [or Heaven]; who as it were shares and communicates this Light to Man. In Tyen this is called Reason; in Man Virtue or Talents; and the Practice of it is what we call Justice.

The Lights of this Reason in a great many are obscured by their Wills, and the Corruption of their Hearts. Reason when once 'tis clouded by Self-love, immediately confounds the Virtue of a Man's Heart, which thenceforth loses its Purity: And the inward Virtue being thus tainted must infallibly affect the Practice of all Duties. Thus do we wander from Justice; and on that Account the I King, one of our canonical Books, says very well, "The Study of a wise Man is to grow in Wisdom, and to add Acquirements to Acquirements, he must pant for Instruction, and apply himself to examine whatever he learns: He loves to impart his Lights to another: But he keeps himself as it were within an Apartment from which he never stirs: His Science is not barren, and Piety regulates his Conduct."

ons.

In effect, the want of Instruction, prevents our growth in Virtue: And if we are not pious we never can be perfect. There is therefore reason in what the Text says; That we must begin with learning, and go to the Bottom of our Lessons, and thence proceed, as from their Source, the Actions of a Life regulated by Piety. The Order necessary to be held is, first, to excel, and to be perfectly accurate in the Theory of Wisdom; then to enter into the Bottom of the Heart, and to take care that all the Virtues there are pure and unmixed: In fine, to regulate all our Behaviour, so as no Action nor any Function of our Senses may be out of order. But in short, it is impossible for a Man, tho' possessor of the Inclinations of the Sages, to attain to that state of Perfection and that Wisdom, I speak of, without a vast Application and Labour.

ims.

The same I King mentions. "Fidelity in the ordinary Virtues, Accuracy in our common Discourse; and a perfect Integrity free from Vanity and Corruption." What do we understand by ordinary Virtues: if they are not those which regard Sovereign and Subject; Parents and Children; elder and younger Brothers; Husbands and Wives; and lastly Friend and Friend? What common Discourse does our I King speak of, but what regards the same Relations? Set aside these Obligations and this Doctrine and there is an end of civil Life, the Practice of Virtue, and the Name of Science. As for the Words of the Text Vanity and Corruption, the true Sense is as follows: Would you have that Reason or Tyen li, which is imparted from Tyen [or Heaven] always to enlighten you with its purest Beams? Take Care that no Self-love obscures it. In the same manner to persevere in perfect Integrity, is the same thing as to have pure Virtue: But in order to have it such, it must be preserved from all Adulteration, with which our Wills, when mastered by our Passions, would insensibly dash it. This and no other is the true Sense of this passage of the Text.

Let us survey the Maxims and Doctrine of our great Men, such as Yau, Shun, Yu, Tang, Ven vang, Cheu kong, Kong tse, [or Confucius], and we shall see that they are all of my opinion in this Point.

The Emp.
Yau's Charge
to his Son.

Yau, devolving the Empire upon Shun, Above all things, said he, keep in the just Mean: This just Mean consists in running into no Excess of any kind. Shun, when he left the Government to Yu, gave him this excellent Lesson: The ground of Man's Heart is subject to a thousand Dangers and Errors. The center of Truth is a point almost imperceptible; apply in good earnest to the Practice of this Maxim; preserve a just Mean in all things. By the Heart of Man is understood his Inclination and Affection for sensible Objects; and by the center of Truth, the Integrity of Mind. The attention that Shun requires is a rigorous Examination of the most secret Thoughts. When we make ourselves Masters of this Point, we attain to Integrity; and when once we possess that, we never allow it to be affected with any interested Views, which regard the sensible Objects that awake the Passions.

On this Account the Text says, "the Center of Reason, which ought to guide us by its Rays, is delicate and subtle." If a Man has once learned to surmount the Dangers of his Heart and Self-love, he is then in a condition to keep a just Mean in his Actions; without leaning either to the one Hand or the other: And thus he will be Faultless and Perfect: Shun in reporting this great Lesson which he had received from Tau; Keep a Mean; teaches likewise how this high point of Perfection may be attained.

REMARK.] The Author then explains the Maxims of other great Men: He shows especially that in the main they are all the same, and reduceable to what he had advanced in the beginning of his Discourse, which is too long to give entire: What is already Translated, may afford the Reader an Idea of the Relation betwixt the Philosophy of the Chinese, and that of the Greeks and Romans. That we may more clearly comprehend this, it were to be wish'd that we could do Justice in our Language to the Beauties of the Chinese Style, which is lively, concise, and sublime in all its Compositions. All we have Translated here is contained in 23 Lines, each Line consisting only of 22 Characters, which, taken severally, presents to a Chinese Eye, a Metaphor very animated, but too bold for our Expression.

Surprising Conciseness of the Chinese Language.

A Translation of a Chapter containing a Plan and Regulations for an Academy, or a Society of learned Men.

WHAT is proposed in the Design of an Academy is to instruct Men in the Knowledge of their own Nature, and thus to become the followers of our antient Sages. To attain to this, a Man must apply entirely, methodically, and constantly, to come to a settled and a thorough Knowledge of things, and not take up with empty Appearances, or be satisfied with the Reputation and the Honours of a learned Man. I have thoroughly examin'd antient Regulations of Academies of this kind; and observe there are three that have been eminent; to which, we may add one of a modern Date. I shall here collect all the Regulations that appear to me of greatest Consequence. This Labour of mine will save the trouble of turning over a great many Books, through which these Regulations are dispersed. The Mandarins, my Colleagues, profiting by my Collection, may have the Glory of establishing in their several Districts these admirable Regulations, and of engaging wise and knowing Persons in so excellent a Project. These Academies may one Day furnish Persons of the greatest Merit, and notwithstanding my own Insufficiency, I flatter myself that I have not a little contributed to this already; and I reflect with Pleasure, that the Professors, educated in these Societies, may insensibly introduce a Reformation of Manners into all degrees of Men. How ravishing is this Thought to me! And it is with the most profound Veneration that I here communicate these different Regulations, I have extracted from the Writings of our wise Masters; every one may pick out of the Collection which I here give, what he judges most agreeable to the Plan I propose. I shall reduce these Regulations to the Number of twelve.

and Plan of an Academy, with the

1. The Qualifications necessary to an Admission unto this Academy, are an Esteem and Zeal for the true Doctrine*. In order to attain to Knowledge and Virtue, a Man must have a high Idea of the Doctrine of our Sages, and apply all his Studies to tread in their Footsteps, their Works tending all to influence a right Practice. The Virtue of the Academics ought to ennoble the Place where they meet. Thus the Heads of the Academy must admit none into their Body, but such as have a Zeal and Ardor to be accomplished Literati, and to become the faithful Transcripts of the Masters who have gone before, and shining Examples to the Students who shall follow after them. Whoever shall be convicted of speaking favourably of the Sects of Fo or Lau, or shall be so rash as to advance that their Doctrine is at the Bottom, the same with the Zhu kyau or the Literary Sect; tho' such may make a public Profession of the Doctrine of the Empire, they are always to be looked upon as secret Abettors of these Heresies, and consequently as infected Members, which are to be excluded from this Body.

1st Rule and Qualifications of the Members.

REMARK.] The two Sects of Fo and Lau, advance that all things have begun by and are resolved into Nothing, or a Vacuum. The Idolatry they likewise practise towards Fo and Lau, leads the Person, who searches to the Bottom of their Mysteries, to Atheism. Those in China who assert, that the Literary Sect, and those of Fo and Lau are the same, San kyau y kyau, make an Idol of Confucius, whom they rank with those of Fo and Lau; but these Persons are very rare and in great Detestation with the Literati; whenever the Mandarin has notice of any such, he is sure to punish them.

The Principles of the Sects Fo and Lau.

2. The second Qualification required in the Members, is a fair Character, and a sincere Application to all their Duties. The Men of Learning, who in their private Life are perfectly obedient to their Parents, respectful to their elder Brothers, reserved in their Speech, sincere in their Manners, uniform and regular in their Conduct, scrupulously attached to the ancient Doctrine, and in short, generally praised by their Relations, Friends and Neighbours, are worthy Candidates for Admission into this Body.

Second Qualification.

* In Opposition to the Heresies I rovan; especially the idolatrous Sects of the Bonzei, and the Tau sui, which for a long Time have over-run China.

Titled Qualification of the Candidates.

3. These Literati must be retired and disinterested: All bustling, intriguing and tumultuous Spirits, such as disregard the Character of a Man of Honour, such as are always running before the Tribunals, dipping themselves in a hundred things which are frequently unjust; employing or suggesting a thousand Falshoods, without knowing how to speak a word of Truth; great Speakers, Blabs, and those whose conduct so much hurt the Literary Sect, such as want to enter into the Academy only to gain themselves a Name, and being puffed up with a vain Eloquence, think to domineer over every body else: All these sort of People shall be excluded from taking Places in the Academy.

The Examination they are to undergo.

4. Those, who are admitted, ought to undergo a strict Examination. When one is a Candidate for that Society, he must be presented by one of the Seniors, who shall make him known to the Syndic; and this last is to mention him to the President of the Academy, who shall make the necessary Enquiries about the Truth of the Informations given by the Introducer: If he finds them well supported and favourable, he shall consent to his Inrollment. The new Member is then to give in his Name and Surname to the President, who is to appoint the Day of his coming to take Place in the Assembly.

How rotten Members are to be cut off.

5. It may happen that the Virtue of some may be but short-liv'd, and that they may dishonour themselves by failing in the most essential Duties, and by their Behaviour taint the Body of which they are Members: Whoever then in the Assemblies shall set the Statutes at nought; whoever, without Doors are Vain, Proud, Dissolute, Railers, Cheats, in one word, all who make the false Maxims of the Age the Rules of their Conduct: The Members of the Academy are to hold a Council upon such Brethren, to expunge their Names, and for ever to exclude them from their Body. Besides, such of the Academy as were their Introducers and their Sureties must be examined; that the Members may by these means see what Weight their Testimonies ought to have in time to come.

Of the Building for the Academy.

6. The Mandarin is to chuse a large spot of Ground of a wholesome and agreeable Situation, on which the House of the Academy is to stand. Then the Materials for the Building are to be got together, and according to the Funds they have, the Plan of the Building to be more or less magnificent. The Picture of Confucius shall be placed in the Cheong Tang, or Middle Hall, which is next to that of the Assemblies: After which shall follow a Court, and the Hew tang, or third Hall, which shall serve as a refreshing Place, and the common Eating-Room of the Members. As to the Expences of their Entertainment, it shall either be generously defray'd by the Rich and the distinguished Members, or every one shall defray them in his turn; or rather they shall all join together to raise a small stock of Money, wherewith they may purchase some Lands adjoining to the Academy: By this means, nothing will be wanting to the Establishment, and it may subsist for a long time.

Of its Government.

7. As to the Government of the Academy, what occurs to me as most proper to give it a Lustre is this: When all the Members of the Assembly are met together for the first time, the Mandarin of the City shall repair in Person, and in State, to the Place appointed for their Meeting, with a Billet of Visit, and his Presents of Silks. When he is upon the Threshold, he must invite the Members to enter in a very civil manner; then the Person most distinguished by his Merit shall be elected, and established Whey tsun, that is, President or Head of this Learned Society: The Whey chang, or Syndic, who ought to be an elderly and a polite Man, shall be next in Authority to the President. This last shall have under him, as Assessors in his Employment, two Persons equally active and able, but not so old as the Syndic: These shall be called Whey ching. The Syndic shall likewise have two Assistants who must be healthy middle aged Men; and above all things their Capacities must be proportioned to their Employments: Their Title shall be Whey tsan; and their Office, to receive with Civility, such Strangers as shall come to the Academy. The Assessors of the President and the Syndic ought to act in Concert, as to what relates to the Affairs of the Society: Lastly, two young, intelligent, active, wise, and industrious Persons shall be chosen: Their Title shall be * Whey tang; and their Office, to carry Messages and Orders, and to execute abroad the several Commissions of the Assembly.

Days of Assembly.

8. Two Assemblies must be held every Month, and the Day of Meeting appointed beforehand. The Members are all to meet at the ordinary Place, where they are to hear a Discourse delivered. This Exercise is to begin about ten o'Clock in the Forenoon, and to last till four in the Afternoon, when they shall break up.

Ranks of the Members determined by Seniority.

9. The Members who assist at the Assemblies, are to take their Places in the Hall according to their Seniority. But the first Seats must be assigned to the Strangers, who honour the Academy with their Presence. As to the Members themselves, their Seniority must determine their Ranks, and no Regard is to be paid either to their Nobility, Riches, or their other Prerogatives as Members. A considerable Advantage will accrue from this Regulation, which is, that it will prevent any from being presented as Candidates, who are haughty, proud, intoxicated with their own Merit, full of themselves, and consequently, far from being willing to apply themselves earnestly and with a docile Heart to the Search of Truth.

10. The Subject to be treated of in the following, must be settled in every preceding Assembly. The President is to propose three several Subjects upon which they are to compose. The first, is to concern the Classic Books: The second, upon the Nature and Heart of Man and upon History: The last Subject shall be upon Ceremonies, Eloquence, and good Government. These Subjects being fixed by the President, he shall confer with the Syndic and other Officers, in order to establish the Fundamental Point of Doctrine upon every Subject. Five Days immediately before before the Day of general Meeting of the Assembly, he shall communicate the Result of their Conferences to all their Members. This Precaution will put them in a condition to go to the bottom of the Subject, and to handle it knowingly and distinctly: When they arrive at the Hall they shall confer together, and propose their Difficulties to one another; and this is the Way to advance and profit in Science.

11. Great openness of Heart must be used in carefully remarking, and faithfully communicating their different Views. Wisdom must be sought for only in the Heart of Man, it is there she resides, discovering and proving herself by her Actions. It would be right for the Members candidly to communicate to each other, what they have been employed in during every Day betwixt one Assembly and another, and even their Vices, and most secret Sentiments. For this end, they must set every thing down on Paper; and these Memorandums may be called the Journal of what they have learned or done during such and such Days. As to their Actions, they are faithfully to write down the Bad, or Whey qua, in their Journal, as well as the Good, or Whe sheu. Afterwards, on the Day of Assembly, when the exercise is over, every one is to pull out his Memoirs and impart them to another, that by this means they may furnish matter for an useful Dissertation. This Examination being continued for some time, their Abilities and Inclinations for good, will encrease, and the Defects both of the Head and Heart will dwindle to almost nothing. This is a Point of the utmost consequence to you, the other Literati, both with respect to your Perfection in the Sciences, or your Acquisition of Virtue, which demands all our Cares and Application. But if ye use any Sophistry to exaggerate the Good, or even to conceal the Bad of your Lives, what will these Exercises avail you? One can only learn from such a Practice to become an habitual Rogue. Such People will never improve, and we may conclude from their proceeding, that they will for ever remain in their Ignorance and Imperfections.

12. The different rules for the Morals of the Members are as follows. 1. As to what relates to those who are of a lower Class, either by their Station or by their Merit; they ought, because of their Meanness, to apply themselves in rooting up all the Pride of their Heart. 2. That they esteem the true (*) Apathy: And that thus they endeavour to disengage and cleanse their Heart from all bad Affections. 3. It is perseverance in Virtue that gives it its true Merit. Let us then banish from our Hearts all Indolence. 4. Free-will is peculiar to Man; consequently, let us banish all Transports, all Impetuosity, and over Eagerness. 5. Peace and Tranquillity of Mind is a great Jewel; let us not then suffer our Minds to waver and to rove. 6. Uprightness is the Soul of Conversation, and Commerce: That we may attain to this, we must be upon our Guard against Trick and Artifice. 7. The Soul must be elevated and consequently impartial. 8. The desires of the Heart must be moderated; then let us combat our Concupiscence. 9. Our Expences ought to be regulated, therefore we should use no Ostentation. 10. As a peaceable Temper is the Beauty of our natural Dispositions: The opposite Vice, which we ought to cut off, is Anger. 11. Man is chiefly made for Society: He therefore ought totally to exclude all Envy. 12. It is the Property of Science always to endeavour after Improvement; therefore let us look upon a Heart, which is easily bounded and limited, as an Evil.

These are the twelve moral Rules which include Perfection. I add, that when the Subjects, of which they are to treat in the Assembly, are proposed five Days before; they ought to be exhibited upon a varnished Tablet, hung up in the Hall of Conferences. In the mean time, Advice must be given to the Literati, and to the Graduates without Doors, even tho' they are at some Distance: In order that being instructed in the Subjects, they may prepare themselves, if they design to assist at the Assembly; and thereby be ripper to judge of what is said, and readier to propose their own Opinions upon the Subjects in question.

Of the Chinese Literature.

AS Letters are more esteemed all over the Empire than Arms, and as the first Dignities in the Body Politic are only bestowed upon learned Persons; Science has been always cultivated in China, but we dare not affirm, with Success; at least, if we may judge by their Books, and the Qualifications of their learned Men; which may proceed from the small regard had to reward such as excel in abstracted Sciences, and perhaps from the length of Time requir'd, to attain to a competent Knowledge of the Language, whose Figures and Characters are almost infinite; they being as different, as the Terms and Names of the Things to be express'd.

Their Sciences may be reduced to six principal ones, namely, the Knowledge of their Language which we have already taken notice of; Moral and natural Philosophy; the Mathematics; especially Astronomy; Medicine; History; and Poetry.

The profound and almost uninterrupted Peace which they have enjoyed, and the little commerce which they have with other Nations, from whom they are precluded by express Prohibitions from going out of the Empire, and from admitting any Stranger into it, have attached them so much to these Studies and Arts, that contribute to the Conveniencies of Life.

The Sciences
most valued in China.

The Sciences most sought after among the Chinese, are, the perfect Knowledge of their Language, Laws, History, and moral Philosophy, because these are the means of attaining to the highest Posts: None can be received as a Doctor without understanding the Language; and being able to form their Characters perfectly well, and to compose an elegant Discourse upon the principal Maxims of their Morality and Government, which are always extracted from the Books they call Canonical.

The Mathematics their most ancient Study.

These Books have given occasion to an infinite Number of Commentaries, which employ them for many Years, in order to improve them in the knowledge of Politics and Morality: This last is indeed the Science most proper for Man, as it directly regards his Conduct, and the means of rendering him perfect, according to his State and Condition in Life.

It appears that, since the foundation of their Empire, the Chinese have applied to the Study of Mathematics, and particularly of Astronomy; and that skilful Persons have at all times been maintained by their Emperors, for making Observations and calculating Eclipses, and have always been punished and rewarded according to their different Success. In after times, Superstition increased their Application to this Study; most of them being persuaded that Events depended upon the Aspect of the heavenly Bodies, and that there are happy and unhappy Times, and that it is of Importance to every one to observe the Variation and the Difference of these Times, to determine the Junctures proper for undertaking Voyages, Treaties, Negotiations and Marriages, for waiting upon Governors and Emperors, in order to obtain Favours; and for many other Things. Every Year a Calendar is published at the Emperor's Expence, in which, the subaltern Officers of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, that they may raise its Price, never fail to insert the lucky and unlucky Days distinguished according to the Principles of their judicial Astrology.

Medicine among them

Necessity having introduced Medicine into China as into other Nations, they have a great Number of Treatises upon that Subject; but what they are most remarkable for, is, their Knowledge of the Pulse, by which they can distinguish Diseases and their proper Cures.

of History.

As to what concerns their History and Poetry, the one serving only for Curiosity, and the other for Diversion; few Persons apply themselves to either of these, because it is not by them that a Man can rise, and make his fortune. However, their History and their Annals are almost as ancient as the Times immediately succeeding the Deluge, and they have been continued to the present Time, by different, but mostly contemporary, Authors.

and Poetry.

With respect to their Poetry, besides their ancient Books, some of which are in Verse, the Poems of Kiu i wen are extremely delicate and sweet. Under the Dynasty of the Tang, Li t'au pe and Tu te mwey, did not yield to Anacreon and Horace: In short, in China, as formerly in Europe, the Philosophers are Poets, and among all their celebrated Writers, T'feng nan fong is the only one who has not written in Verse; for which reason he is compared to the Flower Hay tang, which would be perfect, were it not insipid.

The Chinese
Love for Learning.

As the Chinese have a Spirit and Turn for the Sciences, and as moral Philosophy is that by which a Man can most readily raise himself, they apply more to it than to any other. There are a great Number of Licentiates and Bachelors all over the Empire, sometimes upwards of 10,000 in one Province. And the Number of Candidates for Degrees at a moderate Computation, amounts to two Millions: In the Southern Provinces there is scarce a Chinese but can read and write.

Characters of their Authors.

Besides this, they have a good many Books that treat of natural Philosophy, where there are very refin'd Reasonings upon the Nature, Properties and Effects of different Things. The Errors which are found in these Works, proceed rather from the small Commerce they have with other Nations, than from any Defect of Penetration in the Authors. This want of Commerce has rendered them very ignorant in Cosmography, for they scarce know of any Country besides their own. Thence proceeded the extravagant Notions that obtained amongst them, before the Europeans had instructed them in the State of the World. It is true that, in their Maps, they exhibited the fifteen Provinces in their due Extent. But as for other Kingdoms, they place them at random round their Empire in very small Spaces without distinguishing them either by Longitude or by Latitude.

Their Au-
rous.

In short, if we except the Europeans, I don't believe there is any People that have published so many Books, as the Chinese, upon all sorts of Subjects, upon Agriculture and Botany, upon the liberal, military and mechanical Arts, particular Histories, Philosophy and Astronomy, &c. They have likewise Romances, Comedies, Tragedies, Books of Knight-errantry, eloquent Discourses, and a great many other Treatises upon miscellaneous Subjects. Their learned Men having a great deal of Facility and Inclination for composing Books; we see vast Numbers published by them. The Bonzas have likewise their Treatises upon the Worship of their false Divinities, which they take care to spread as they see occasion, in order to abuse the Credulity of the People, and to increase their own Revenues.

The five Books sacred

But nothing is more respected by the Chinese than the five Books which they call U king, or so much revered by them both for their Antiquity, and the Excellence of the Doctrine which, they say, they contain: These are to them, their sacred Writings, for which they entertain the most profound Veneration. The other Books, which are of the greatest Authority in the Empire, are only Interpretations.

Esteem they have for Confucius.

Amongst the Authors who have wrote best upon these ancient Originals, Confucius is the most Celebrated: And the Chinese accordingly regard him as the first of their Sages; as their Doctor; as their Legislature; as their Oracle; and as the Teacher of Emperors and Kings. They give give a constant Application to the Principles and Maxims that this Philosopher has delivered, The Damage it sustains: and are collected into four Books upon Ancient Laws, which they look upon as the Rules and Source of perfect Government.

As we must give a slight Idea of these Books, I shall begin with the five Ancient Books, which the Chinese by way of excellence call the five Volumes. I shall afterwards give an Abridgement of the Work of Confucius and his Disciple Mencius. How repaired? The present State of their Canonical Books,

Of the Books King, or the Chinese Canonical Books of the first Order.

THE Letter King signifies a Doctrine, sublime solid, and invariable, because founded upon immovable Principles. The Books containing this Doctrine are of a superior Order, and have been admired by the Chinese of all Ages, Sects, and Opinions. As these Books are of the first Class, and of the greatest Authority; they are the Source of all Science and Morality among the Chinese. The Canonical Books of the first Order.

But these precious Monuments of their Antiquities were almost all destroyed at one Blow, by order of an Emperor named Tsin shi wong; about 200 Years after the Death of Confucius, and 200 before the Birth of Christ. This Prince, much celebrated by his Valour, and more by the vast Wall which he built in order to guard his Dominions from the Irruption of the Tartars, formed a Resolution of extinguishing Science, and of permitting no Books in his Empire, except what he judged absolutely necessary, such as those upon Agriculture, Medicine, &c. He ordered all the rest to be burnt on pain of Death, and carried his Cruelty so far, as to punish several Doctors capitally. almost all destroy'd.

Some pretend, that this Prince, notwithstanding this Order, was no Enemy to the Sciences, or even to the Books he ordered to be destroyed. They found their Opinion upon his having for his Preceptor Lyu pu wey, of whom they have an excellent Work remaining, who loved Antiquity too well to inspire his Pupil with a Contempt of it. And besides that, Ly sie his Minister of State, an understanding and polite Person, would have been far from giving him any Advice that tended to ruin the Government, and to introduce Ignorance and Barbarity into the Empire.

They think that this Prince was induced to issue out this barbarous Decree, from the political View of securing to himself the peaceful Possession of his Throne. The Students of these Days impatient under a Prince, who had a design to render himself arbitrary, abused the Facts, delivered in the Shu king, and were always crying up a Ching tang who expell'd the infamous Kye, and a Vu wang who dethron'd the Tyrant Chew. Thus they blew up the Fire of a Revolt on all Sides. The new Monarch resolving to chastise their Insolence, and judging that nothing was more valuable in an Empire than Peace, deprived these Literati of Books, which in such Hands as theirs, create only Disturbance in a State. The I king as it was less intelligible was judged more harmless, and therefore escaped the common Fate. upon what Pretences. The I king excepted.

Science had then been absolutely extinct in China, had not many Literati, at the hazard of their own Lives, preserved these dear Monuments from the general Conflagration. Some digged Holes, in the Walls of their Houses where they buried them, until the Storm should blow over. Others concealed them in the Tombs, thinking them more safe there. Zeal of the Chinese Literati for the Preservation of Literature, Immediately after the Death of this Prince, Literature revived among the Chinese, who sought to repair the great Loss it had sustained. The Books hid in Tombs and in the holes of Walls were brought to Light, tho' much damaged by the Damps and Worms. But the old Literati having Learned them by Heart in their Youth they found means of supplying what was difficult in one Copy by what was legible in another; and applied with the greatest Care to restore them to their genuine State. preserves it in China.

The Success in some measure was answerable; but they could never entirely make up all the Gaps. Thus there were always some Deficiencies which they endeavoured to supply, by inserting Pieces foreign to the Subjects of the Originals. The Literati are agreed as to some of these Chasms, but divided as to others; their Criticism consisting, in thoroughly examining the Doctrine of the Antients, and comparing it with what they believed to be Interpolations.

The I king; the first Canonical Book of the first Order.

THE Work here treated of is purely Symbolical, being a series of Images of this visible World, expressive of the Properties of Creatures, and the Matter of which all Beings are formed. Fo bi, who was the Inventor of this, is looked upon as the Founder of their Monarchy, but the time in which he began to reign is very unsettled among the Chinese. He formed to himself a particular Method of Hieroglyphicks, which have no relation to Words, but The I king a Symbolical Work. By whom invented.

but are immediate Images of Things and Thoughts, or at least Symbols arbitrary, and of Human Institution, substituted for these Images; and this was the beginning and original Institution of the Chinese Characters. In short, his Design was to point out by sensible Signs, the Principles of all Beings, in the same Manner as the Lines and Notes of Music do the Tone and alteration of the Voice.

This Work is a mere Riddle, it consisting only of some Lines; that according to the variety of their Situations and Dispositions, form Figures which, by their different Combinations, signifies different Things. Fo hi seems to have intended to teach his Descendents whatever relates to Heaven, to Earth, and to Man. From a Consideration of the Affinity and admirable Connection among these three Beings, he has described them by eight Figures, each composed of three Lines, part intire, and part broken, but in all, producing eight different Combinations. This Number multiplied by it self produces 64 different Figures, which are disposed into different Methods, in order to express in a rude Manner, by these different Combinations, the Nature and Properties of every Being, their Motion, their Rest, their reciprocal Opposition, and even the Order and Union which reigns among them. This will be better comprehended by the Delineation which I here give of this symbolical System.

thor of the Figures.

Such is the Table of Figures invented by Fo-hi. It is a Labyrinth which exercised the ablest Men in China till the times of Confucius, who decyphered it. The 64 Figures are composed each of six Lines; the Sum of these Lines answers to the Days of the Chinese intercalary Year, which are 384. The Emperor Ven wang, who attempted this Riddle, lived not till 1800 Years after Fo-hi; by the different Changes, which he wrought among these Lines, he pretended to give an Account of the reciprocal Transmutations of the eight first Principles. His Son Che-w kong went upon the same Design, and extended his Scheme much beyond his Father's. He considered these Lines with respect to the Connection and Relation which the first have with the Middle ones and the last. And, according as they were more or less perfect, he drew Consequences, and found out Allusions; but they give no greater Light into the Subject. Thus, both the one and the other only more perplexed this Ænigma by new Ænigmas equally obscure. Confucius appeared four hundred Years after, and unriddled not only the mysterious Lines of Fo-hi, but the equally dark Interpretations of these two Princes; he referred all their Doctrine, partly to the Nature of Beings, especially of the Elements, and their Properties; and partly to Morals, and to the Manner of right Governing Mankind; he therefore applied these Figures not only to Natural but to Moral Philosophy; being persuaded, that these symbolical Lines contained Mysteries of great Importance to the Government of States. As soon as the Heaven and the Earth were produced, said Confucius, all other material Beings existed; after other Beings existed, Male and Female were produced; when Male and Female came into the World, Man and Wife followed; then Father and Son. The Relation of Father and Son produced that of Prince and Subject; and these, "Subordination and reciprocal Duties. Heaven is the Emblem of the Person and Virtues of a King: And the Earth is the Symbol and Image of Subjects." It may suffice to give here an Explication of one of the sixty four Figures, to shew in what manner the Chinese Interpreters have extracted the Principles of Morality from them.

The more elevated, say they, one is above others, the more he ought to be upon his Guard against Haughtiness, Arrogance and Pride; and the more he ought to study Moderation and Modesty. This is taught us in the fifteenth Figure, which is as follows:

It contains two Figures, the lower is composed of one uninterrupted Line, and two interrupted Lines, which denote and signify the Mountains. A Mountain is a Symbol of Elevation, but its Root is in the Earth, that is to say, Humility. In the same manner the Earth designed by the three upper Lines which are broken, is the Image and Symbol of a high Virtue joined with Humility, which includes within it immense Riches, and only manifests its Power, by admirable Fruits and Effects, both salutary and useful to the Welfare of Mankind.

Thus we see, Fo-hi was Author of the Figures; Ven wang, and his Son Che-w kong, were Authors of the Texts; and Confucius, of the Commentaries upon them: These Commentaries are called Twen and Syang, and are the only ones which Critics and able Interpreters attribute to Confucius. The Disciples of that Philosopher affirm, that when their Master had finished these Commentaries, he was but indifferently satisfied with them: And that when he came to be old, he wished to live some Years longer, that he might put the last Hand to, and new model his Work.

Tho' this Monument be the most ancient of all the Canonical Books, if we consider only its Source and Original, I mean the Figures of Fo-hi, yet the Explications of it were made a long time after, and the Interpreters rather deserv'd the Name of Authors, than of Interpreters; for this Book is full of Obscurities, and contains a great many Things hard to be understood.

In process of Time, this Obscurity occasioned a Multitude of Errors and Superstitions, and the more unintelligible the I king was, the more Mysteries it was thought to contain. Hence the true Doctrine of the Text, which includes excellent Principles of Morality and Politics, was altered, falsified, and interpolated, with absurd, contradictory, and impious Interpretations: These Monuments of Chinese Antiquity falling into the Hands of blind Doctors, whose Understandings were clouded with the Infidelity and Idolatry at that time reigning in the Empire, they wrested the Sense to vain Prognostics, Divinations, and Magic: And this is the Reason why they have been called The Book of Lots.

These Alterations are attributed to a Doctor called King fang, and another of the celebrated Literati, called Chin wen. We may add to them another Doctor of an equally distinguished Merit, whose Name is Tsyau shin, who, as an excellent Critic observes, taught his Disciples a Doctrine which he imposed upon them as one extracted from the I king. The School of Confucius always detested these empty Explications, by which the Texts are abused, in order to form frivolous Predictions, and to establish Magic and Divinations.

One Thing is certain, that all the Chinese, and especially the Literati, have the utmost Respect and Esteem for this Book. And many ancient and very able Authors, in their Writings, express their Regret for having lost the substantial and real Meaning of it, while they retain, to speak properly, but a superficial one. — The Man, say they, who knows the I king, knows every thing.

Before the Empire was founded by Fo hi, according to what is related in their great Chronicle, there were no Characters, of which that Prince could compose an I king; as Ven vang, Chew kong and Confucius did, a long time after: Thus when one would study the I king of Fo hi, it is sufficient to meditate upon his Tables alone, abstracted from, and strip of all Sorts of Characters, and all physical and moral Glosses, contenting himself with mathematical Axioms, naturally resulting from the regular Combinations of the Author's Lines: If one would know the Doctrine of the Classical Book composed by Ven vang, Chew kong and Confucius, he must then have less regard to the natural Doctrine of the Tables, than to the enigmatical Allusions, that each of them have annexed to each of these Symbols; and so judge of the Doctrine of these four Philosophers, by what each has himself put down, and not by what others have inserted in After-ages.

As then, before Fo hi, Characters were not known, little Cords with sliding Knots, each of which had a particular Idea and Signification, were used in Commerce and Business. These are represented in two Tables, by the Chinese call'd Ho tu and Lo shu. The Invention of Characters was owing first to Fo hi, and afterwards to the Emperors Schin nong and Whang ti: When they had invented, one after another, a good Number, they then attempted to make Books.

The first Colonies who inhabited Se chuen, had no other Literature besides some arithmetical Sets of Counters made with little knotted Cords, in imitation of a String of round Beads, with which they calculated and made up all their Accounts in Commerce: These they carried about with them, and sometimes used them as Belts for girding in their Cloaths. In short, having no other Characters, they neither knew how to read or write. As for what pass'd, therefore, in that Time, we have no Accounts of it, either from Annals or any written Tradition.

King Fo hi then was the first, according to this Opinion, who by means of his Lines occasioned the Invention and the Idea of that kind of hieroglyphical Characters, peculiar to the Chinese. The two ancient Tables of Ho tu and Lo shu taught him the Art of Combinations, the first Essay of which was the drawing up his linear Tables, limiting himself to the Rules prescribed by the Art of arithmetical Combinations, and letting the Tables remain straight, and according to their natural Order. Ven vang first put them out of this Order, that he might enigmatically express the terrible Disorders of the World, turn'd upside down under the Tyrant Chew.

It is an ancient, constant, and universally received Tradition, that Fo hi by this Work rendered himself the Father of Science and good Government in China; and that it was from the Idea of the Ho tu and the Lo shu that he drew up his linear Table. I here give a Description of them, that I may, if possible, render so ancient and obscure a Monument easy to be understood.

Tradition informs us, that these ancient Figures called Ho tu and Lo shu, from whence we are assured that the I king took its rise, are the Words of the Spirit of Heaven addressed to Kings; that the first Kings received them from Heaven, and spread them all over the Universe, that thereby the Mandarins might learn to govern the People well, and the People to reflect upon their Duties. The white Notes signify the odd Number, which, among the Chinese, is the Symbol of what is perfect, as well as this Line ———. The black Notes signify the even Number, which is the Symbol of what is imperfect, as is the Line broken and interrupted in this Manner — —. The Ho tu ends at ten, and the Lo shu at nine. The Chinese attribute that which is perfect to Day, Heat, the Sun, Fire, the Heaven, &c. What is imperfect, they attribute to Night, Cold, the Moon, Water, Earth, &c.

Altho'

Original of the celebrated Chinese Dragon.

Tho' it is a constant Tradition in China, that Fo bi drew up these linear Tables from the Idea of the Ho tá and the Lo shu; yet to give the greater credit to his Figures, he affirmed, that he saw them upon the Back of a Dragon which arose from a Lake. This is the so much celebrated Dragon that is since become the Device of China, and the Ornament for the Habits of the Emperor and the principal Chinese, with this Difference, that there is none besides the Emperor who can wear it with five Claws, excepting such as are judged to have a right from the Emperor to wear it; as for instance, when he makes any one a Prefect of a Piece of Imperial Silk. If others wear a Dragon with five Claws, they are guilty of acting contrary to the Laws of the Empire, and will certainly be punished.

Reasons why
the I king
is in so great Veneration with the Chinese.

But what chiefly contributes to the great Authority of the I king is, in the first Place, the universally received Opinion, that this Monument escaped the general Conflagration of ancient Books under the Emperor Tsin chi wang, whose only View was to extinguish the Memory of the three first Imperial Families, because their great Actions condemned his Conduct. This Remark is made by Kong in ta in his Prolegomena to the I king; is reported by Li shi in his Lives of illustrious Persons; observed by the Commentators upon ancient History, and supported by constant Tradition.

In the second Place, what gives the Chinese a vast Veneration for this Book, is, the great Encomiums that have been made upon it in all Ages, by the ablest and best Writers of the Empire; who praise it as the most Ancient of their Books, because invented by Fo bi, to whom, however, they attribute only the Figures.

The I king
the Source of the other Kings.

Others pretend, that it is filled with most excellent Precepts and the wisest Maxims of Government, as may be understood by the Explications which Ven wang and Cheu kong have given upon every Figure; but because Fo bi, by the Combination of his Lines, was the first who taught the method of composing Chinese Characters, they say, that his Book is as it were the Root from whence these Characters sprung, and that it is the Principle and Source of all the Sciences: And as his Figures, according to their first Institution, denote the Heaven, Earth, Water, Mountains, &c. they affirm that the I king contains the Heaven and the Earth: And that it is not only the Source of the other King, but that it gives a Knowledge of all Things both visible and invisible: In short, that to apply to the Study of other Books and neglect that of the King, is to seek after the Stream and neglect the Fountain.

Of the Shu king, or the second Canonical Book of the first Order.

Meaning of the Word
Shang shu.

THIS Monument is likewise called Shang shu, that is to say, The Book speaking of ancient Times. It is divided into six Parts, whereof the two first contain the most memorable Events of the Reigns of Yau, Shun, and Yu. These first Princes are looked upon as the Legislators of the Chinese Nation. Yau, who reigned near a hundred Years, is celebrated for his great Piety, Justice, Clemency, Wisdom, and the great Care he took to establish a right Form of Government in his State.

The Contents of its two first Parts.

The Character of Shun.

As in his time, say the Chinese, more Regard was had to Virtue than to any other Quality; this Prince not finding in his Son the Talents necessary for good Government, declared upon his Death-bed Shun, one of his Subjects, his Successor, giving him his second Daughter in Marriage.

Shun is praised for his Patience, Submission, filial Piety, and the Affection he entertained for his Brother, who was a very vicious Person. He imitated Yau in his Choice of a Successor. When he was dying, not judging his Son qualified for wisely governing the People, he cast his Eyes upon his Minister Yu, who had done him very important Services during the Course of his Reign, and had been very assisting to him by his Councils in the Government of his State.

The Institutions of these two Princes.

These two Princes appointed the Ceremonies to be observ'd in Sacrifices; and divided the Empire into Provinces, whose Bounds were determined with regard to the celestial Constellations: They regulated the Tribute to be paid by the People to the Prince; and made a great number of other Ordinances, very useful for the Instruction of the Grandees, for the Relief of the People, the Reformation of Manners, and the Tranquillity of the Public.

It was this Yu who, in the time of his Predecessor, had the care of recovering some Lands of the Empire, which had been overflowed by the Waters of the Sea. In short, these three Princes are the Heroes of the Chinese Nation. The Doctrines taught and practised by them raised them to the Throne: And the Examples and Precepts left by them, are so many Oracles: which the Chinese hear with Respect, and regard as indispensable Laws.

Remarkable
Justice of the People.

The Family of Yu extin-guish'd by the Tyrant
Kye.

This Emperor, willing to imitate the Examples of his Predecessors, designed to leave his Crown to one of his Subjects called Ye, who had assisted him to support the Weight of Government; but the People opposed this, as being an Injury done to his Son, who was worthy of Empire. His Son accordingly succeeded him, and the Crown continued in his Family till the Reign of the Emperor Kye. This Prince's Vices and Cruelties rendering him detested by his Subjects, he was the last Emperor of this first Family, which gave to China seventeen Monarchs, who reign'd successively for 458 Years.

The third Part of the Shu king contains the Transactions under the second Imperial Family, of of which Ching tang is the Head. This Prince took possession of the Empire 1776 Years before the Birth of Christ. The Emperor Kyè being extremely odious both to the People and to the Grandees, by his Vices and Cruelty, and the Empire being threatened with approaching Ruin, the Princes and Ministers intreated Ching tang to deliver them from his tyrannical Yoke. Ching tang much against his Inclination, yielded to the continual Remonstrances and Prayers of the People. He declared War against the Tyrant Kyè, to whom he gave a total Defeat, and obliged him to go into voluntary Exile to Nan shau, where he died three Years after his Defeat.

This new Emperor distinguished himself by his Piety, and his Love for his Subjects. It was he who after seven successive Years of general Barrenness, which dried up even Rivers and Fountains, and was followed by a Pestilence and Famine, offered himself as a Sacrifice for his People, and begged of Heaven to remove its Anger, and put a stop to the public Calamity.

After having fasted for three Days, and shaved his Beard as a mark of his Grief, he went into a Chaise drawn by white Horses, which in China is the colour of Mourning: And being followed by all his Court, he repaired to a little Hill called Sang lin. There divesting himself of his royal Robes, and putting on a Lamb's Skin, with his Feet and his Head bare, he looked upon himself as the only Cause of his People's Calamities, and making a humble Confession of his Faults, he extended his Hands to Heaven, conjuring it to accept of him as a Victim, and willingly offering himself to Death for the deliverance of his People. He had scarce ended his Prayer when the Skies were over-cast with Clouds, and all the Fields of the Empire were watered by a general Shower, which was followed by a plentiful Crop. In memory of this Action a kind of Music was instituted called Ta we, which signifies a signal Mercy obtained from Heaven.

When the Idolaters shew any difficulty to believe the Mysteries of the Incarnation and Passion of our Saviour, we desire them to look into this Passage of their History. "You admire, (we say to them) and you propose as a Model to all Princes, the Example of one of your Emperors, who divesting himself of his Dignity, became the public Victim, and offered himself a Sacrifice for his Subjects; but how much more ought you to admire the Wisdom and infinite Love of J. C. who being clothed with our Flesh, made himself a real Propitiation to satisfy the Divine Justice, and to obtain the Salvation of all Mankind by shedding his own Blood." This Argument drawn from their own History, is more convincing to them than the most solid Reasonings.

This third part of the Shu king contains the wise Ordinances of this Emperor, the fine Instructions which the Ko lau Tsong wuey gave to him and to his Son Tay kya, and the other wholesome Regulations of a Ko lau named Fu yue, whom the Emperor Kau tsong, having seen his Figure in a Dream, caused to be searched for every where, and who was at last found among a company of Masons. This Prince made him his prime Minister, and appointed great progress in Virtue by following the wise Counsels of so singular a Person, whom he regarded as a Present sent from Heaven.

The Empire continued in the Family of Ching tang for 600 Years, till the Reign of Chew, who revived all the Tyranny and barbarous Cruelty of the infamous Kyè. So that it is now become proverbial for the Chinese to call a bad Man, a Kyè, or a Chew, in the same manner as we in Europe, when we speak of an infamous and tyrannical Prince, call him a Nero, or a Dioclesian.

The three last Parts contain the History of the Transactions under the third Race, whose Founder was Vu vang; together with the wise Maxims and glorious Actions of the first five Princes of that Family, which sat upon the Throne during 873 Years, and the Reigns of thirty five Emperors, in as flourishing a Condition as any other Family ever did.

Vu vang its Founder, was King of a part of the Province of Shen si; he took up Arms against the Tyrant Chew, conquered him, and was proclaimed Emperor by the unanimous Voices of both the Grandees and the People. His first Care was to pay his Homage to the supream Being, to re-establish Peace and Tranquillity in the Empire, and to procure Plenty to his Subjects, who had so long groaned under the Tyranny of his Predecessor: He opened the Prisons, and set at liberty all the Prisoners; he carefully enquired after Men of Merit, who had renounced their Employments and Dignities in the late Troubles, to gain repose in Obscurity and a private Station. These he loaded with Honours, and intrusted with his Confidence.

His Royal Liberality extended chiefly to those who had always been distinguished by their Wisdom, their Honour and their Probity, and under him these happy Times revived, when Virtue was the step to Dignity and Riches; he took the Virtuous into his Councils and made them his Ministers. He re-established the Weights and Measures, and brought the Laws and Constitutions of the Empire to Perfection: He restored the Lustre of the noble Families who descended of Whang ti, one of the Founders of the Chinese Monarchy, and of Shun, and Tau, and Yu, the first Legislators of the Empire; all these Families Chew endeavoured to extinguish by keeping them in Obscurity.

These illustrious Persons saw themselves, all of a sudden, under the Protection of this new Emperor, re-invested in their former Dignities, and adorned with additional Titles of Honour. In short, he was very careful to increase filial Piety, and to perpetuate the Memory of deceased Parents, by enjoining their Children to pay to them after Death the same Honours and Duties which they paid them when alive.

Next follow the wise Precepts of Chew kong the Brother of the Emperor Vu vang, whom Honour, Wisdom and other Virtues have rendered for ever famous. The Emperor, when he died, intrusted him with the Tutelage of his eldest Son, and the Government of the Empire during during his Minority. The Invention of the Needle, or the Mariner's Compass, is attributed to him. The Ambassadors of Tong king and Kochinchina, when they came to pay their Tribute to the new Emperor, had suffered a great many Fatigues in their Passage, by their not being acquainted with the Course they ought to have held, upon which Cheu kong gave them a Mariner's Compass, which guided them on their Return, and procured them a happy Voyage.

In short, in the Shu king, which among the Chinese is of very great Authority, we find Vice punished, and Virtue rewarded, together with a great many fine Instructions for the good Government of a State, and wise Regulations for the public Weal: Also the Principles, the Rules and the Models of the Morals of the first Heroes, who have governed their Empire, and for whose Memory that Nation has always preserved an extraordinary Regard. We shall give some Extracts of this Book, which P. Premare, an ancient Missionary in Cbina, has collected, who assures us, that they are translated with all the Exactness and Faithfulness imaginable.

Some Extracts from the Shu king, in a Dialogue upon the Maxims of the antient Kings.

Maxims of Government and Obedience.

WHEN a King, says Yu, knows how difficult it is to be a good King, and when a Subject knows how much it costs to fulfil all his Duties faithfully; the Government is perfect, and the People make a swift Progress in the ways of Virtue.

That is certain, replied the Emperor, and I love to be discoursed with in this manner. Truths, so well grounded, ought never to be concealed. Let all wise Men be distinguished, and not one of them suffered to remain in Oblivion; then all the Kingdoms of the World will enjoy a profound Peace. But to rest entirely upon the Sentiments of wise Men, to prefer them to his own; to treat Orphans with Kindness; and never to reject the Suit of the Poor, are Perfections only to be found in a very wise King. (*)

In effect, says Pei, the Virtues of a wise King are of a boundless Extent, and of an indefatigable Activity; he acts, he concert, he penetrates all; in Peace he adorns, and in War subdues, all: The august Heaven tenderly loves him, and makes him the Executor of its Decrees; it gives him all that is contain'd within the four Seas, and confirms him Master of this lower World.

You may add, says Yu, that those who obey him are happy; and that it is a great Unhappiness to displease him: For as the Shadow follows the Body, and the Echo, the Voice, so Rewards attend Virtue, and Punishments the Crimes.

You reason well, replied Pei, he must then watch incessantly, and dread Vices that are more secret and refined; he must carefully avoid sensual Pleasures, and be cautious in using even those that are less criminal. He must constantly advance the truly wise, and directly expel the worthless; doing nothing without Caution, and forming no Design but what he can avow to the World; never abandoning Justice in Complaisance to the People, nor the People, to follow his own Views; in one Word, he must carefully examine his most minute Inclinations, and maturely weigh his slightest Actions. This is the way to attract the Love and Homage of all the People in the Universe.

Ah Prince! answer'd Yu, addressing himself to the Emperor, ah Prince! all this well deserves our Consideration. Perfect Government springs like a Tree from its Root, and its first Principle consists in furnishing the People plentifully with the Means of Subsistence, viz. Water, Fire, Metals, Wood, Land and Grain. These we may call the six Magazines from which Plenty proceeds. To regulate the Desires of the Heart, to promote Commerce, to put a great Value upon every thing that contributes to Life; these are the three Points necessary to the Union of the People, and to keep them at Ease. The Sum of these Nine very important Articles have an admirable Connection among themselves: Order them to be put in Verse, that the People may sing nothing else. Reform your Subjects, by rewarding Virtue: But prevent them by punishing Crimes from relapsing to Vice: Excite them by fine Songs upon these nine principal Articles, and nothing shall be able to shake the foundations of your Empire.

Draw near, Yu, said the Emperor, you are the Man whom I want, and I design to appoint you my Successor in the Empire.

Alas! replied Yu, the little Virtue which I have, will bend and sink beneath that burden: And the People who know me well, will never approve of your Choice. But you have Kau yau: He is truly wise, and possess'd of all necessary Qualifications. He has inspired the Love of Wisdom into all the People, who feeling its effects, carry him in their inmost Heart. Reflect a little; think how much he deserves, and how little, I, raise him, since he appears so worthy, and drop me as a useless Person: Virtue alone ought to be your Guide in an Affair of so much Consequence.

I know, says the Emperor, that Kau yau is very proper to maintain my Laws, I make him the Trustee of my Justice. Learn then, perfectly the five kinds of Punishments, in order worthily to maintain the chief Articles of my Laws. Begin always by Instruction that you may not be obliged obliged to punish; propose, as your chief Aim, strongly to engage my People to tread in that true Mean where Virtue resides, and by so doing you will fulfil all my Views.

Then, says Kau yau, I must be as perfect as you are, I must never run into Excess of any kind; I must be civil to the Grandees, and kind to the People: I must not always treat my Children with Favours, and never with Punishments. I must excuse Faults committed thro' Inadvertence, however great they are; but severely punish the Faults proceeding from Malice, however trifling. I must chastise slightly Crimes that are not well proved; and reward Services of doubtful Importance, rather above, than below, their Value. I must hazard the not executing the Law in all its Rigour, rather than to put one innocent Person to Death. These, great Emperor, are part of the Virtues we admire in you; all your Cares tend only to preserve the Lives of your Subjects: And in this you perfectly answer their Vows: This is sufficient, there is no occasion for a criminal Judge, in order to execute the Laws of so good a King.

Make me, replies the Emperor, like the Person you speak of; learn me to follow your Lessons so well, that my Example may be as an impetuous, yet kindly, Wind, which carries along with it all Hearts; so that real Happiness may be diffused through all the Parts of my Empire.

When a King is solidly Virtuous, says Kau yau; he thus enters into all the good Counsels that are given him, and always acts in Concert with the wise Ministers he has chosen.

Nothing is so true, says the Emperor; but explain yourself a little more circumstantially.

A good King, replies Kau yau, has no Passion so predominant as to advance more and more in the Study and Practice of Wisdom, so that he puts no Bounds to so useful an Exercise. By this fine Example, he first instructs all his royal Family; this is afterwards communicated to all his Subjects, and in the End, spreads among the most distant People. Of so great Importance it is for a King to be Virtuous!

Tu applauds, and respectfully receives, these Words, which are so full of Wisdom.

All may be reduced to two Points, says Kau yau, To know the Characters of Men, and to render the People happy.

Is that all? (interrupts Tu) Our good King, how perfect soever he is, will find a great deal of Difficulty in this. To know the Characters of People thoroughly, is never to err in the Choice of those we employ. To render a People happy is to load them with Favours, and entirely to gain their Love. When a Prince has so great Qualities as these, what Dread needs he have of such a Wretch as When tew? What difficulty will he find to subdue such a Rebel as Myau? And what harm can a Sycophant and a Hypocrite like Kong kong do him?

Nevertheless, says Kau yau, you may add, that there are Nine Virtues which a Prince ought well to know, in order to make them familiar to him: It is not enough that he has a general Notion, that such a Man has such and such a Virtue: He must moreover know what Proofs that Man has given of his really possessing it. You ask what these Nine Virtues are?

* I require, continued Kau yau, a Greatness of Soul, neither haughty nor insensible; an able Indifference, but without Inactivity; a charming Goodness, but without Indolence or Coarseness; a Genius delicate, but industrious and laborious; a Humanity and Politeness attended with Resolution and Courage; an Uprightness of Mind, which knows how to temper Severity with Mercy; a Understanding that comprehends the greatest, yet neglects not the smallest Matters; a Mind firm, but neither stubborn nor fierce. In short, a Magnanimity and which yields only to Justice: These are the Nine Virtues upon which a Prince ought to regulate himself, that he may distinguish the different Characters of Men: For this is the greatest good Fortune a King can wish for, that he may reward the Virtuous.

Three at least of these Virtues are required in a Grandee of the Court, to enable him to govern his Family rightly; and a Tributary King must have six, in order to render the State, entrusted to him, happy. But an Emperor ought to possess all the Nine, that he may adapt the Employment of every Man under him to his Capacity and Merit; that the Great and Small may meddle only in their own Affairs, and no Workmen be unreasonably employed. If he is intent upon the five most necessary Things; it will be easy for him to succeed.

A King ought well to understand how to teach his Subjects to imitate him in his Pleasures: Therefore, he is obliged to keep a Watch over himself, lest he should fail in any Point of those numerous Affairs that daily occur to him. The subaltern Officers ought likewise to watch without any Relaxation, reflecting that Heaven devolves its Power upon the King, and that the King intrusts his with them, and that consequently they are in its Place, that whatever they do may be considered as the Work of Heaven.

It is Heaven that puts the immutable Laws of Society in order. Draw me up the five Laws and let them be inviolably regarded. It is Heaven who determined the different Duties that are to be observed by Men. Regulate the Five Duties, and let every one conform himself to them, according to his Rank and State: But let them always add a sincere and a cordial Respect, by equally

(†) What regards the raising Tu to the Throne is omitted here. But it is agreed, that the Sin king has suffered many Alterations; that the half of it is lost; and that what escaped the Flames and the Worms has been patch'd up in the best manner they could. It was therefore thought most natural to place the Advancement of Tu, after he himself had told how he drain'd off the Waters.

(*) It is in such Passages as these, where we see the sublime Brevity of Style in these ancient Books. Eighteen Letters convey a clear Idea of these nine Virtues, with the Quality each Virtue ought to have to prevent its degenerating into Vice; and all this in a Manner so lively and so fine, that it must suffer by a Translation into any European Language.

(†) The ancient Commentaries, Ching i, say upon this Place: The Laws, Rites, Rewards and Punishments come all from Heaven. Its Will is to reward the Good, and to chastise the Bad; for nothing but Good or Ill is rewarded or punish'd by Heaven. When it chastises or rewards, neither Great nor Small can escape its Justice.

equally shunning Hypocrisy and Pride. It is Heaven which advances the Virtuous; so there are different Posts in the five different Districts of the Empire. Heaven rewards the Guilty; so there are five Punishments for five different Degrees of Guilt. Oh, how numberless are the Cares that good Government requires! Heaven hears and sees all, but it is by the Voice of the People that it judges of Kings. Heaven is always terrible, but an oppressed People rouses it to Vengeance. It chastises great and small without Distinction, but Kings have a thousand times more to dread than other Men. What I have told you, Sir, is the purest Truth, but the main Point is to reduce it to Practice.

The Emperor declar'd with a loud Voice, that he could not wish for any thing more true or more just than all he had heard. For which reason Kau yau resumed the Discourse, and said with great Modesty: I know well that my Understanding is very limited, but I am conscious that I have no other View or Desire but to employ it all in assisting you rightly to govern your Subjects.

The Emperor then turning to Yu; Draw near, said he, and in your turn give me some wise Counsels.

The good Offices done by Yu to China.

What can I say, replies Yu, or what can I add to the Discourse of Kau yau? For my Share, I have only one thing at Heart, which is, to employ myself constantly without a moment of Relaxation. How can that be, asks Kau yau? The Waters, replies Yu, if I may so speak, rose to the Heavens, and overflowed the highest Mountains, so that the People miserably perished. In the midst of this frightful Deluge mounted upon four different Vehicles (*) I began, with cutting down the Woods, following the Chain of Mountains: After which, Pei and I taught Men to eat Flesh. I likewise made the great Rivers to run into the four Seas, and the Brooks to discharge themselves into the Rivers. Hew tsu and I next taught Men the use of Corn, and the Art of tilling the Ground: I afterwards let them into the Advantages of Commerce; by means of which, all the People had whereon to subsist, and the Universe enjoyed Peace.

You have great Reason, interrupts Kau yau, to say that you give yourself no Respite; but proceed to discourse upon this fine Subject.

The Happiness of Man consists in Virtue.

All depends, continued Yu, upon the Care with which a Sovereign watches over his own Person. I allow it, says the Emperor. Then, answers Yu, place your Happiness in Virtue alone. Beware of the least thing that can discompose this valuable Happiness; and above all, suffer no Ministers about you, but such as are of consummate Integrity and unshaken Sincerity. Thus when you command, you will be instantly and joyfully obeyed; because you will command nothing, but what the People will ardently wish for. Thus, you will find yourself loaded with the most illustrious Blessings of (†) Shang ti, and you will have the Glory to execute his Will in the new Order which he shall establish.

Behold, says the Emperor, a Minister who loves me; and I, in return, love a Minister who is so worthy of Esteem. Draw near then, Yu, and hear me attentively. (‡) of Yu.

Your Labours to remove the Deluge have touched me. You are faithful, and your Merits are great; you are wise in my Eyes, and indefatigable in whatever concerns the public Good; in your private Character, you are modest; and notwithstanding what you have done, you entertain a very humble Opinion of yourself: I say it again, you are wise, and do not boast of your Talents; no Person can dispute your Abilities, yet you don't vaunt of your fine Actions; and all must yield to you the first Rank: I seek only after Virtue, and I praise only good Works. I entrust into your Hands the Government of the World: Ascend my Throne and Reign. Remember there is nothing to fear but one (§) Passion, and (||) right Reason is of infinite Delicacy. It must be pure, it must be simple, and always preserve a just Mean. Do not amuse yourself with groundless Stories, and never undertake a Design without thoroughly weighing it.

the Prince and Subjects.

What is more amiable than a good King? What has he to fear except the People? Whom will the People honour if not their King? But how can he maintain himself without the Assistance of the People? Apply yourself then with all your Ability, watch Night and Day in the Duties of your Charge: Surpass, if it be possible, the Desires and Expectations of your Subjects: Take particular Care of the Poor and the Miserable, and by that means your Reign will be eternal. The Order which I have laid before you will give peace to the World: And through you, I will subdue all mine Enemies. Obey it then, and you need ordain no other.

(*) The Chinese endeavoured to guess what these Vehicles were. The Text says Tsi tsay; it is true, the Letter Tsi signifies fear; but it is very difficult to explain what the other Letter presents to the Eyes, it is Kin, a Chariot, Tsay, of Afflictions, and Sufferings. The Reader is left to judge how such a Machine could assist Yu in carrying off the Waters.

(†) It is not, says the ancient Commentary Ching i, the People alone that reward this Good King, for Shang ti loads him likewise with Favours to reward his Virtue.

(‡) This is the Passage omitted, of which we have taken notice, and which is supplied in this Place. This Discourse of the Emperor is in blank and miscellaneous Verses: most of them being without Rhymes, and some of them of unequal Measure. If all the Shu king is not in Verse, a great many Passages, like the present, are imbrodered with it.

(§) The Text says, Yin sin, that is to say, the Heart of Man. This is not properly Passion, but it is the Inclination by which we are biased; and is as it were the inward part of the Mind.

(||) The Text says, Tan sin that is to say, the Heart of Reason, tho' it is not properly Reason; but the Superior part of the Soul, which inclines to the purest and rightest Reason.

*The Speech which Chong whey is said to have made to the Emperor Ching tang. (*)*

O Prince! what do you say? It is the (†) Tyen which gives life to Men: As they are (‡) subject to a thousand different Passions; if they had not a Master to keep them in their Duty, they could not live in Peace: But Heaven sends them a very wise King, and by means of him, renders them good and happy.

The infamous Kye, extinguished all the lights of Reason; and the poor People fell as it were into a flood of Fire. But Heaven has given you all the Prudence and necessary Force to deliver the Universe from its Evils. Finish what the great Yu so well began; follow his Footsteps, and respectfully obey the Orders of Heaven. The King of Hyu is blameable, because he employed the Name of the most High to authorize his unjust Commands. Heaven has chastised him and committed the Empire to you, that you may restore the World to its primitive Happiness.

You know that the cruel Kye had likewise some wise Men about his Person, but most of his Counsellors were as worthless as himself. In that fatal time, we found ourselves mingled with all these wicked Wretches, like a little good Grain sow'd in a Field full of Tares. How could we shun the dangers that encompassed us? there was no Man but trembled for himself, and Innocence was a good handle to be suspected. How much then have you, Sir, to dread, who are adorned with so many Virtues? Fame proclaims them aloud every where: You are look'd upon as a very wise Prince, and far remov'd from all base Pleasures, as being entirely disinterested, bestowing Posts only upon the most Virtuous; and always proportioning the Reward to the Merit. It is well known, that you, with pleasure, prefer the Opinion of another to your own; and that you attribute to others, all the good you yourself do: That you never excuse, but are always ready to correct, yourself. In short, there is seen in you a greatness of Soul, worthy of the Empire of the World, join'd to a paternal goodness and tenderness for your People. So many Virtues have gain'd you the Hearts of all. For this Reason, the petty King Ko having rejected brutally your Presents, you was oblig'd to march against him; and, by that means, begin your just Conquests. Was you in the East? The People of the West impatiently expected you. Was you settling peace in the North? The Barbarians of the South sigh'd for you; and every one cry'd out in a mournful Voice, Why did he not first come to our Assistance. Nothing was heard but People saying one to another, Let us wait for our good King; whenever he shall appear we shall receive new Life. Thus, Sir, you see how great the People's Affection was for you.

One must have no scruple to be a King, but he must labour to render himself a good King. With this View distinguish the Wife, and assist the Worthy: Load those, whose fidelity is approved, with Glory; and assist those who have only upright Intentions; Set Tutors over such of the petty Kings as are weak: Abridge those of Power who make a bad Use of it: Deprive such as break into good order, of their Crown; and those, whose Crimes render them unworthy to reign, of their Lives. Thus you will curb the Bad, and guard the Good. And all these Kings doing their Duty, you will cause Virtue and Peace to reign all over the World.

As soon as a Sovereign endeavours to make a daily Progress in Virtue, all the People will have Hearts only to love him: But if he imagines that he has done enough, he is despis'd and abandon'd even by his nearest Relations. Apply yourself with all your Heart to the exercises of the greatest Virtues, that your Subjects may find in you a finished Model. Let Justice regulate all your Actions, and the purest Reason serve as a curb upon your Appetites. A good (||) King leaves Riches enough to his Children, when he leaves them the example of his Virtues: I have always heard it said that it is the part of a King, to look upon others, as being able to teach him somewhat; for he who loves to be taught, enriches himself. On the contrary, a sure Method for a Prince to destroy himself, is to believe that others can do him no Service: For it is a narrow way of thinking, for a Man to believe himself self-sufficient. Endeavour to end as happily as you have begun: Remember that Heaven is just; that it elevates the Good, and chastises the Bad. Follow the Laws exactly, that you may be sure of eternal Happiness.

(†) Heaven.

(‡) The ancient Commentary Ching i speaks thus. The Tyen produced Man, and gave him a Body and a Soul. Every Man then has a visible and material Body: and a spiritual intelligent Soul. Man being formed in this Manner, Tyen assists him. I don't mean simply, that Tyen after it had given him a Body and a Soul, gave him several Laws: but that it likewise assists him in a more particular manner. For Man speaks, thinks, acts, distinguishes the Good from the Bad, and the Bad from the Good: He stands in need of Food and Raiment: Sometimes he is in Picay, sometimes in Want, and by Turns in Motion and in Rest. But to keep himself strictly just amidst all these, he must have the Assistance of Tyen: For there is within a straight Road, which if he follows he is happy; if he forsakes it unhappy. For which Reason Heaven unites itself to Man, and constantly assists him to tread in this Path that conducts him to Immortality.

(||) This Thought is not formally in the Text; but it is the Sense of all this Harangue, and the Interpreters make use of it to connect what goes before with what follows.

Government

Advantages of good Con-

Prince.

*Instructions which (*) I yun gave to the young Tay kya.*

Encomium
of Virtue.

H EIR of Ching tang ! Do not presume too much upon the present Protection of Heaven, for the continuance of its Favours depends, in some measure, upon yourself. You ought not to reckon that Happiness is to continue for ever. The constant Practice of Virtue can alone secure your Crown: But if you abandon Wisdom, you will infallibly forfeit whatever Heaven has bestowed upon you.

You have an illustrious Example of this in the King Ky: He deviated from the Path of Virtue to Impiety and Cruelty. The supreme Tyen rejected him, and afterwards look'd all over the Earth in search of some one, who was worthy to reign instead of this unhappy Prince: As soon as such a one was found, it determin'd to enlighten and conduct him. But that which Tyen loves and looks for, is a pure and constant Virtue. This is what it requires in a new King, whom it designs to give to the World.

Ching tang and I only were of that Character. As we were both equally devoted to Virtue, Heaven lov'd us, and carried us in its Heart. For this reason, it gave us the Government of the whole World. Having, thus, both Heaven and the People on our Side, we easily overthrew the Empire of the Hya; not that Heaven entertain'd an irregular Affection for us, but such as it entertains for pure and solid Virtue. It was not because we caballed for the suffrages of the People, but because the People could not resist so much Virtue. When one is entirely devoted to Wisdom, he is always successful, always satisfied, and always happy: But when one is Virtuous by halves and by starts, he instantly proves the Reverse of this. Happiness or misery then depends upon Man himself; because the rewards or punishments of Heaven depend upon his good or bad Actions.

Heir of Ching tang ! The Empire you possess is but new; let your Virtue be new likewise. Endeavour by incessantly reforming yourself, that there may be no difference between the first and the last Day of your Reign. Raise none to Posts, but such as have Wisdom and Talents. But as for your first Minister, he ought to be a Person accomplished in all Respects; because, it is he who is to render you solidly Virtuous, and he is to be the Channel through which your Virtues are to be communicated to all your People. It is hard to find a Man so perfect; you therefore are to use the utmost Pains to enquire after him; to the end that the Minister and the King, having the same Desires and the same Zeal, they may form, by a strict and intimate union, (†) one undivided whole.

True Virtue never pins itself down to the Opinions of a strange Master; she hears no Dictates but those of solid Good, which does not always enjoin the same thing; in following its Lessons, you directly act according to the different Circumstances; but still with a strict attachment to Uniformity, without which, there can be nothing good. Then all the People shall cry; "How pure and how perfectly uniform is his Heart? He is worthy of the Empire he has received; and will render his Subjects eternally happy."

The History and Conversation of the Emperor Kau tlong and his Minister Fu ywe.

T HE Emperor answers the Grandees by a short Note under his own Hand, in which he tells them. "Ever since I succeeded to the Empire of the World, I have still feared that I had not all the Virtues requisite for right Government; for which reason, hitherto I have never ventured to give any Order. But my Thoughts being employed during the silence of the Night, only upon the Means of worthily discharging my Duties; It seem'd to me the Lord delivered to me, from his own Hand, a faithful Minister: This is the extraordinary Man that is to speak to you in my Stead."

History of a Minister given by Heaven.

The Emperor then causes the Picture of the promised Minister to be drawn, according as he appeared to him, and omitted nothing to make a Discovery of him, tho' conceal'd in the most remote Corner of the Empire. A Man employed in building a little Grotto at the foot of the Mountain Ten, was found by the Messengers, who thought he perfectly resembled the Picture which they had in their Hands. As soon as the Emperor saw him he immediately knew

(*) It is pretended that I yun assisted Ching tang to dethrone Ky. Tay kya is supposed to be the Son of Ching tang, and it is said that I yun shut him up in his Father's Tomb for three Years. But it is certain that in the Body of the Text no mention is made of Tay kya, but of Tse wang, which only signifies, a young Prince in his Minority. Nor can we answer for the bold Action imputed to I yun. The Text perhaps only intimates, that I yun sent the young Prince to be instructed at the Burying Place, and upon the Tomb of Ching tang. Whatever Truth is in all this, it is added that this Piece contains the last Councils which I yun gave him, when he retired from the Court, to lead a private Life in repose and solitude.

(†) This Idea of a good King and a perfect Minister forming one undivided Whole, was strongly imprinted upon the Heart of him or them who wrote these Books. They allude as Instances of it, Yau and Shan, Shan and Yu, Pá wang and Chien lang. But this does not extend farther.

knew him, and in presence of all his Court, made him his first Minister; speaking to him in these Terms.

Fail not to advise me every Day, and very frequently to reprove me, that thus, you may help me to acquire true Wisdom. Consider me as a piece of unhammered Iron, and that you are to shape and to polish me. Consider that I am to pass a broad and a dangerous Torrent; and that you are to serve me both for Bark and Oars. Consider me as a dry parcht piece of Ground; and that you are to be the kindly Shower that is to refresh, and render it fertile. Open therefore your Heart, and pour into mine all the Riches your's contains. But be sure not to spare me: For if the Medicine is too weak, the Disease can never be removed. Unite all ye who approach my Person, and unanimously endeavour to correct me. So that as the worthy Heir of the Virtues of Ching tang, and the Imitator of our ancient Kings, I may be able to make my Subjects happy. Acquit then yourself faithfully of the Task I impose upon you, and never relax in your Endeavours, till I am such a Prince as I ought to be.

The Emperor Koa Tang's great Desire to be reprov'd for his Faults.

Fu yue answers the Emperor thus: As a Piece of Wood becomes straight by following the Line, so Kings become Virtuous by following the wise Councils that are given them. When a king is Virtuous, his first Minister is, of himself, induced to do his Duty: But if, besides this, a Prince earnestly desires to be advised, who will venture to disobey his glorious Commands?

His Minister's Answer.

A good King is in place of Heaven, and treads the Path that is mark'd out to him. In obedience to its Supreme Will he divides the Empire into different Kingdoms. He establishes their Kings in whom he can confide; placing about them able Persons to assist them in the Government of their States: Far from minding his own Pleasures, he thinks himself born only to make the World happy: We can say of Heaven alone, that it (+) sees and hears all Things by itself, and of good Kings alone, that they endeavour as much as they can in this to imitate Heaven. For which reason, their great Officers are always full of Submission and Respect: And the People securely taste the Sweets of Peace.

Shame can only come to Kings by their issuing forth unjust Orders: And the Rebellions of the People only proceed from their Princes making War upon too slight Grounds: Bestow no Reward but upon Merit. Cloaths had better be locked up in a Chest, than given away without any reason: Before you punish any one, examine yourself well. A King who perfectly fulfils these four Points, is truly enlightened; and every thing conspires to render him happy: The Repose or the Distractions of your Empire, depends upon those whom you place in Posts. Give not therefore the smallest Employments away in Complaisance to a Subject, whom you know is incapable to bear it: And never trust any thing of Importance to a bad Man, however great his Qualifications may be. Examine seriously before you act, whether or not the Action you go about, is good in itself; and tho' it is good in itself, examine if it be proper at such and such a time, and in such and such Circumstances. The Man who imagines that he has Virtue, possesses but a very small Degree of it; and he who boasts of his Ability, loses all his Merit.

A great Foresight is requisite in all things, as being the means of averting Misfortunes. Favours lavishly disposed beget Contempt, and the Man who does not blush to be told of his small Faults, can never be guilty of great ones. All consists in the due Regulation of your Heart, for if that is right your Government will be perfect. As to what concerns the Ceremonies, you are not to neglect outward Pomp, but you must not entirely take up with that, because all exterior Appearances must proceed from the bottom of the Heart. In this case, too much Meanness occasions Contempt, and too much Show, Perplexity: So that both these Excesses are to be equally avoided.

I am charmed, cries the Emperor, with all that I have heard, and henceforth my only care shall be to conform my Life to it. If I had not you to give me wholesome Advice, I should not know how to demean myself so as to require Virtue.

Instance of Docility in an Emperor.

Fu yue respectfully knocked the Earth with his Forehead, and resum'd the Discourse. The Difficulty, says he, does not lye in knowing, but in practising good. Love Virtue, Sir, you will find nothing more sweet, and then you will resemble the ancient Kings your Ancestors. If I don't continue to speak to you as I have already done, I will be culpable, and unworthy of the Rank to which you have raised me.

and of Honesty in a Minister.

It is only you, says the Emperor, that can furnish me with such Literati as I would wish to have. You know that when Wine (+) is to be made, they throw Druggs into it, in order to ferment and give give

(+) There are two Commentaries upon this Passage, and their Words are remarkable. The first is called Ye li, and explains it thus.

Heaven never speaks, yet it commands our Belief: The foreign Spirit is always unconcerned, and yet it is to be dreaded. As being supremely true it inspires us with Belief, and as being without Passion, it strikes us with Dread. Heaven, because of its Incomprehensibility, is called Spirit, and the Spirit, because of its Immutability and eternal Duration, is called Heaven. When we say, that it enforces our Belief because it is perfectly true, the meaning is, that it possesses most necessary and infallible Reason. And when it is said that Heaven makes itself to be dreaded, because it is impartial; the Meaning is, that it is Justice itself and none can insult it, unpunished. In short, it is here said to know every thing, because it is Eternal, Immutible, and Incomprehensible.

The second Commentary is called Ye liang, and is that of the late Emperor Kung si, who explains it in this Manner.

Heaven is above all, and nothing is more beautiful, nothing more just. It is most spiritual and most intelligent, and hears all things, tho' it has no Ears: Not only the public Acts of Government, but whatsoever is transacted in the most retired and the remote Corners of the World lies open to its Eye. It sees thro' all, it penetrates all, it examines all. This is the Model which a good King should propose; neither his love nor his hatred is influenced by Caprice. In his Rewards he only has regard to right Reason. And thus it may, in some sense be said of him, that, like Heaven, he hears and sees every thing.

(+) The Chinese Wine or rather Beer, is made of a particular Kind of Rice. When it is almost boild, they must put certain Druggs into it to make it ferment.

give it Strength; your Councils have the like Effect upon me, they raise me, they give me a Courage, which I should not have, were it not for you. When a Soup (+) is prepar'd, you know they take care to put Ingredients into it, to hinder it from becoming insipid. Your Lessons have the same effect upon me, they season my Virtue. Labour then with me in teaching me to know myself, and be assured, that I have nothing in the World more at Heart, than to do whatever you desire me.

To be willing to be instructed, replies Fü yue, is a very good Symptom, and shews that you have a real desire to do Good; tho' you never can attain to what you so earnestly wish for, but by following the Maxims of our ancient Kings. If a Prince can immortalise himself by any other way, it is a way to which I am yet a Stranger.

Study of
sists.

The Study of Wisdom consists, in a Man's being humble, (+) as if he were incapable of any thing, but at the same time as (A) active, as if he had done nothing, and yet could do every thing. By these means, one will shun the two great Failings of Indolence and Pride. When a Man is free from these, his advancement in the Ways of true Wisdom is easy and quick. Believe me, Sir, if you put this in Practice you will soon prove its Effects. When a Man instructs the Ignorant, he at the same time improves himself; and when he is constantly employed in both the one and the other, that is, both as Master and Scholar, he at the same time grows in Wisdom, almost imperceptibly. But that you, Sir, may not be mislead in this, you must always take the ancient Kings for your Model.

The Shi king; or, Third Canonical Book of the first Order.

THE Character Shi, signifies Verse, because in effect, all this Book contains only Odes, Songs, and Verses, compos'd under the reign of the third Race, where we see the Manners, the Customs, and the Maxims of the petty Kings, who were subordinate to the Emperor, described. Some have only three Strophes, or Stanzas, which present the same Thought, in three Lights very little different, except, that each Stanza seems to improve upon the preceding: The others appear to be in a more noble and sublime Style. The number of Stanzas is not confin'd, but every Stanza consists commonly of ten Lines.

The Chinese Interpreters are not very happy in decyphering these Verses; for they have made a System of them which is contradictory to itself, and besides, does not a great deal of Honour to these precious Remains of so remote Antiquity: Great Praises are there bestowed upon Virtue, and many wise Maxims are found amongst them; so that Confucius gives them great Encomiums, and assures us, that their Doctrine is very pure and very holy: From whence some Interpreters suspect, that this Work has suffered by being interpolated with many bad Pieces; for there are some of them extravagant and impious, and looked upon as Apocryphal; however, these Verses are of great Authority in the Empire. Their Style is very obscure; this doubtless proceeds from the Laconism, the Metaphors, and the great Numbers of ancient Proverbs, with which the Work is stuffed. But this very Obscurity procures them the Esteem and Veneration of their wise Men.

this Work.

These Pieces of Poetry may be divided into five different kinds.

The first contains the Encomiums of Men, illustrious by their Capacities and Virtues; with many Instructions which were used to be sung in the Solemnities, Sacrifices, Obsequies, and Ceremonies, instituted in honour of Ancestors.

The second contains the Customs established in the Empire, and are, as it were, Romances, compos'd by private Persons, not sung, but recited, before the Emperor and his Ministers. We find there a natural Picture of their Customs, and the Defects, both of the People and the Princes their Governors, are censured.

The third is called Comparison, because all its Meaning is explained by Similes and Comparisons.

The Manner of the fourth rises to the Sublime, because the Odes commonly begin with certain bold Strokes of the Marvellous, which prepare the Mind of the Reader to be attentive to what follows.

The fifth contains the Verses that are suspected, and were reckoned by Confucius to be Apocryphal. That I may give the Reader some Idea of this Work, I present him with some Odes which P. Premare has faithfully translated.

(+) The Text says Yen meoy, Yen signifies Salt, and Muey a Sort of Fruit which gives it a relish.

(†) This is not the only passage wherein Humility is recommended, for this fundamental Virtue is extolled in many Places of these ancient Books; and it is ordinary enough to meet with Lessons of Humility among the Chinese Philosophers, but pretty rare among those of Greece and Rome.

(A) The Character of Cesar is drawn by Lucan almost in the same Words:

I Know that a Man ought always to watch over himself; and that Heaven has an Intelligence which nothing can escape, and whose Decrees are irreversible: Let us not therefore say, "He is so far above and so distant from us, that he never minds what passes below." I know that he considers all, that he pervades all, and that he is ever present with all. But alas! I am yet too young, too ignorant, and too careless of my Duties. However, I apply myself with all my Strength, and I endeavour not to lose time; desiring nothing more ardently than to arrive at Perfection. I hope that you will assist me to carry so heavy a Burden, and that your Councils will help to render me solidly Virtuous, which is all I desire.

*(*) In Praise of Ven vang.*

HEAVEN made this high Mountain, and Tay wang rendered it a Desert: This Loss intirely proceeds from his Fault; but Ven vang has restored it to its first Lustre. The Path which the former trod was full of Dangers: But the way of Ven vang is straight and easy. Ye, the Race of so wise a King, carefully preserve the Happiness which he hath procur'd for you.

O D E III.

In Praise of the same.

HE who is sole Monarch, and supream Lord, descends so far from his Majesty, as to take care of things here below; always attentive to the real Happiness of the World, he casts his Eyes about the face of the Earth. He sees two Nations who have abandoned his Laws, yet the most High does not abandon them, he tries them, he waits for them; he searches every where for a Man according to his own Heart; and he himself would extend his Empire. With this View he affectionately fixes his Eyes upon the West. It is there he ought to dwell, and to reign with this new King.

He begins then, by rooting up all noxious (+) Herbs, and carefully nourishing the good: He lops off the luxuriant Branches of the Trees, and ranges them in a just order: He plucks the Roses, and he cultivates the Mulberry-Trees. The Lord is about to restore to Men their primitive Virtue: All their Enemies will flee before them: Heaven would give itself an (†) Equal; never was Will more absolute.

The Lord looks upon this holy Mountain: It is the Habitation of Peace, and here grows none of the Wood of which Weapons are made: His Reign is eternal; therefore no Trees we see here, whose Leaves fall to the Ground. It is the Work of the most High, who has exalted the younger Brother in place of the elder.

Ven vang alone has a Heart, which knows how to love his Brethren; he forms all their Happiness and all their Glory: The Lord fills him with all his good things, and has given him the Universe as a Reward.

The Lord penetrates into the Heart of (||) Ven vang, and there he finds a secret and an inexplicable Virtue which diffuses its Fragrance all round. It is a wonderful Assemblage of his most precious Gifts; the Intelligence for regulating all, the Wisdom for enlightning all, Science for teaching, Council for guiding, Piety and Sweetness for endearing, Strength and Majesty for awing, and in fine, Grace and Charms for winning, all Hearts; Virtues invariably the same. This is, as it were, an Inheritance which he has received from the most High, and a Happiness which he has communicated to his Posterity.

The Lord has said to Ven vang: When the Heart is not upright its Desires are disorderly, and it is not proper for saving the Universe: You are perfectly incapable of these failings. Ascend then, first, the Mountain, that you may draw all the World after you. There are Rebels

(*) Feng wang, according to Interpreters and Historians was Father to Vu wang, who was the founder of the 3d Race.

(†) All this here must be understood Allegorically, according to the Style of the ancient Poetry. The Shi king, is full of such Passages.

(||) The Letter Peng signifies Companion, Equal, it is sometimes taken for Man and Wife. Some Interpreters have thought that the Spouse, which Heaven appointed for Ven wang, is spoken of here; the Shi king, else where calls her Tsun Peng, that is to say, the Sister of Heaven.

(‡) The Text says Pang ti, but the best Interpreters agree, it is a wrong Reading, and that it should be Ven wang, because all that is said in this Passage can be applied to none but him.

that disobey their Sovereign: believing themselves above Men; they tyrannize over them: Arm yourself with my Vengeance, display your Standards, put your Troops in Array, re-establish Peace over all, fix the Happiness of your Empire, and answer what the World expects of you.

Immediately, Ven vang, without quitting his Court, ascends to the Top of the Mountain. Re-enter into your Caverns ye rebellious Spirits! this is the Mountain of the Lord; ye can have no admittance here. These living Springs are of pure Water, where the Subjects of Ven vang quench their Thirst; these Pleasures are not for you. Ven vang has chosen this Mountain; he has opened to himself these pure Fountains: Thither the loyal Subjects ought to come: Thither Kings should repair.

The Lord has said to (*) Ven vang; I love Virtue pure and simple such as yours: It makes no great Noise, nor any pompous Appearances: It is not forward; it is not haughty; it may be said, that you have Spirit and Understanding, that you may conform yourself to my Orders: You know your Enemy; make head against him with all your Forces, prepare your warlike Machines, make ready your Chariots, march to the Destruction of the Tyrant; chase him from the Throne which he usurps. Ye armed Chariots, hasten not: Ye lofty Walls tremble not: Ven vang is not precipitant in his March: He breathes nothing in his Anger but Peace: He takes Heaven to Witness for the Goodness of his Heart: He is willing that they should submit without fighting, and is ready to pardon the most criminal. Far from incurring any contempt by this Lenity, He never appear'd more amiable; but if they will not submit to so many Charms, his Chariots will arrive with a mighty Noise: In vain does the Tyrant trust to the Height and Strength of his Walls: Ven vang attacks, fights, and subdues him: He destroys his cruel Empire; and this Justice is so far from rendering the Conqueror odious, that the Universe was never more disposed to obey his Laws.

Councils given to a King.

A Grave and a majestic Outside, is, as it were, the Palace where Virtue resides. But it is a true Saying: "At present, the most Ignorant have Knowledge enough to discern the Faults of others; and the most Clear-sighted are blind to their own."

He who exacts nothing of any Man which is above his Strength, is fit to teach the Universe; and the truly Wise does what he pleases with the Heart of Man. Form no Design where Interest has the least share: Issue Orders so just that you need never to change them: And to answer these two Points, Preserve even the appearance of Probity and Virtue, that you may serve as a Pattern to all your People?

But alas! these wise Lessons are of no farther Use: All is overturned; and, as it were, buried in a shameful Debauch; and because this Debauch pleases, Regularity and the Maxims of our ancient Kings are no longer studied, in order to revive their wise Laws.

Auspicious Heaven, you say, does no longer protect you: But Heaven only loves those who are on the Side of Virtue: You are in the Middle of the Stream, and ought to dread, least it carry you along. Be incessantly upon your Guard in the smallest Matters, exactly observe the Hour of rising from, and going to, Bed. Take care that your House be always well regulated: You will render your People diligent by your Example; if you keep your Chariots, your Horses, your Soldiers, and your Arms, in good Condition; you will escape War, and keep the Barbarians at a Distance.

Perfect your People, and be the first to observe the Laws which you yourself prescribe: By this means, you will save yourself a great deal of Uneasiness. Above all things, maturely weigh your Orders; and take great care of your outward Appearance: Then all will be peaceful, and all will be well. A Blemish may be taken out of a Diamond by strongly polishing it: But if your Words have the least Blemish, there is no way to efface that.

Never speak therefore but with great Caution; and do not say, "It is only a single Word." Remember that no other Person has the keeping of your Tongue; and unless you keep it yourself, you will commit a thousand Faults. Words full of Wisdom are like Virtue, which never passes unrewarded: By her, you assist your Friends; and your Subjects, who are your Children, will become Virtuous by following your Maxims from Age to Age.

While you are among wise Friends, compose yourself in such a Manner, as that nothing may be seen about your Person but what is sweet and amiable: When you are in your own Family, let nothing that is irregular escape you; in short, when you are alone in the most retired Corner of your House, indulge your self in nothing that is shameful: nor say, Nobody sees me: (†) For there is an intelligent Spirit that sees all: He comes when least expected, and it is he who ought to keep us continually watchful over ourselves.

(*) The following are the excellent words of a Disciple of and a Commentator upon Chu hi.

This admirable Person, says he, is complaisant and gentle: humble and pliable: To hear him, one would say, that he neither knows nor is capable of any thing. When a Heart is thus disposed, with what Riches may it not be fill'd! For which reason the most conspicuous and the highest Virtue is founded upon the solid and unmoveable Foundation of Humility: The understanding of no Man, is greater than his who really thinks his own talents very confid'd.

(†) Chu hi speaks in the following Terms: A Man must be well persuaded, says he, that the Lord of Spirits, and of all Invisible Beings, is intimately diffused thro' all. When he comes, none can perceive that he is present; however attentive a Man is, he ought always to fear: what then ought not they to dread, who never have a thought of him! The meaning of all this is: That it is not enough to regulate the Outside, but we ought likewise to watch upon what passes within our Breast.

Your Virtue then ought not to be common, it ought to rise to the highest Degree of Perfection. Regulate all your Motions so well, that you may never leave the straight Path: Do not pass the Bounds prescribed you by Virtue, and shun whatever can offend her. Propose yourself to the World, as a Pattern, which it may imitate without Fear. The Proverb says, "A Pear is given for a Peach. You will not reap what you have sowed." They, who tell you the contrary, deceive you; it is as the Saying goes, "Look for Horns in the Head of a Lamb newly brought forth."

A Branch of a Tree, which is easy and pliant, takes whatever bent is given it: A wise Man possesses Humility, the solid Foundation of all the Virtues. Inform him of the fine Maxims of Antiquity; he immediately complies, and endeavours to put them in Practice. On the contrary, he who is stupid, thinks you impose upon him, and will believe nothing. Thus every one follows his own Propensity.

O my Son! you say, you are ignorant of good and evil: It is not by forceably dragging you along, that I would conduct you to true Virtue, but, by giving you sensible Proofs of all I say: It is not by barely hearing my Lessons that you become wise, but, by putting them in Practice with all your Heart. To acknowledge, as you do, your Incapacity, is an excellent Disposition to be soon qualified to instruct others: For, from the Moment that a Man is no longer full of himself, nor puffed up with an empty Pride, whatever good he learns in the Morning, he practises before the Evening.

Supreme T'ien (*) clearly distinguishes Good and Evil: He hates the Proud and cherishes the Humble: There is not a Period of my Life in which I am not liable to offend T'ien: Then how can we have a moment of Joy in so miserable a Life? It passes away as a Dream, and Death comes upon us before we are aware. This it is that gives me Grief. I forget nothing that may serve to instruct you, yet you hear me with Reluctance. Far from approving my Lessons, they appear to you, perhaps, very rude. You say that you have not yet attained the Period of Life when Wisdom is acquired; but if at present, you neglect to embrace Virtue, how can you arrive at her in a feeble old Age?

O my Son! I dictate to you only the great Maxims of our ancient Kings. If you hear my Councils, you will never have Reason to repent. Heaven is in Wrath; dread lest it discharges itself upon you and your Subjects. You have remarkable Examples of its Conduct in past Ages. The Lord never deviates from his own Ways. Rest assured, that your not entering immediately into the Paths of Virtue which I have laid open to you, is the means of drawing down upon yourself and your Empire the greatest Miseries.

O D E V.

Upon the Ruin [or Fall] of Mankind.

I Lift my Eyes to Heaven, which appears as if it were Brass. Our Miseries have endured for a long time: The World is lost: Wickedness spreads itself like a fatal Poison: The Snares of Sin are extended on all Sides, and there is no appearance of Remedy.

We once had blissful Fields; but Woman has deprived us of them: We once were Lords of all; but Woman has made us Slaves. The thing she hates is Innocence; the thing she loves is Impiety.

The wise Husband rears the Walls; but the Wife, who grasps at all Knowledge, demolishes them. O how enlightened is she! She is a Bird whose Note is fatal; and the Excess of her Tongue is the Ladder, by which all our Miseries descend. Our Ruin does not proceed from Heaven, but from Woman. All, who will not hear the Instruction of Wisdom, are like to that unhappy One. She has ruined Mankind. This was first an Error, afterwards, a Crime, which she is so far from acknowledging that she cries, What have I done. (†) A wise Man ought not to expose himself to the Dangers of Commerce, or a Woman to meddle with any thing but sewing and spinning.

Why does Heaven afflict you? Why do the heavenly Spirits withdraw their Assistance from you? Because you have abandoned yourself to what you ought to have shunned, and left me, whom alone you ought to have loved; you are oppress'd with all Kinds of Calamities: There is not the least footstep of Modesty and Decency. Man is lost, and the Universe is upon the Point of its ruin.

Heaven has thrown out its Nets; they are spread over all: Man is lost, O how this afflicts me. Heaven spreads its Nets, they are not far off: It is done; Man is lost: This occasions all my Sadness.

This deep Brook has a Source from whence it proceeds: My Grief resembles it: It is deep, and it comes from afar. Man no longer has what he possess'd before his Fall, and has involved his Children in his Misery. (‡) O Heaven! You only can apply the Remedy: Wipe away the Stains of the Father, and save his Posterity.

(*) Or Heaven.

(†) All Interpreters own that the Text in this Passage is almost unintelligible so that we cannot answer for the Translation. Perhaps the Text is corrupted, perhaps it conceals some Meaning, which we cannot come at.

(‡) Tho' Heaven (says Chu hi) is so far above us, that it would seem as if this World were unworthy of its Cares, yet its Ways and Designs are impenetrable, it can strengthen Weakness it self, and re-establish Order, when all seems to be ruin'd. If T'ien ever would have chang'd, and have become a new Man, Heaven would have suspended its Decree; and the Posterity of that unhappy Man would not have entirely been lost.

O D E VI.

The Poet laments the Miseries of Mankind.

(K) PRODIGIOUS! That Hail should fall so much at this Season! Grief wounds my Soul, when I see the Disorders of Sinners. Can they go any further? Behold the miserable Condition to which I am reduced; my Sorrows increase every Moment. Have some regard to the Perplexity which I bring on my self. My Sorrows consume me, and yet I am obliged to conceal them.

I have received Life from my Parents: For what end have I received it, but to be overwhelmed with so many Ills? I can neither advance, nor retire. Men employ their Tongues either in flattering or destroying themselves: And, when I appear afflicted, I am the Object of their Ridicule.

My Heart is full of Bitterness, when I see so much Misery: The most Innocent are the most to be bewailed: From whence can they expect relief? Who will stop these Ravens? Or who are to be their Prey?

Behold, this vast Forest full of Wood! only proper to be thrown into the Fire. The People overwhelmed with so many Misfortunes, look up to Heaven, (+) and seem to doubt of Providence. But when the Hour to execute its Decrees is come, no one dares oppose it. It is the supreme Being; it is the sole Sovereign: When he punishes, he is just; and none dares accuse him of being influenced by Hatred.

But the Wicked look upon what is high, as if it were low, and upon what is low, as if it were high. When will their Extravagancies be at an end? They call upon the old wife Men, and scoffingly say to them; Explain to us your Dreams. They are covered with Sin, and they believe themselves to be blameless: Among Ravens, how can we distinguish the Male from the Female?

When I reflect upon the Master of the Universe, upon his Majesty, and his Justice; I humble myself before him and tremble, lest he should reprimand me: Yet all my Words come from the bottom of my Heart, and are conformable to Reason. The wicked have the Tongues of Serpents, and revile the Righteous, who are peaceful.

Behold that vast Field: It is full of noxious Grass which springs from its Bosom. Heaven seems to play with me, as if I were a Thing of nought; and requires an exact Account, as if I had yet any thing exposed to the rage of my Enemies. Am I able to deliver myself?

My Heart is plunged in Sadness; it is sorely pressed with Grief. Whence proceed all these Disorders that are now produced? The Flame is always increasing, and it is impossible to extinguish it. (†) Ah Pau tse! unhappy Woman! Thou hast lighted up the Fire which consumes us.

Think incessantly upon your last Hour. The Path you tread is dark, it is slippery, it is dangerous. You drive a Chariot richly adorned: What are you doing? Alas! You crush the Sides of this Chariot, you let all your Riches perish, and when all is lost, you cry for Help.

Crush not the Sides of the Chariot: Take great Care of its Wheels: Watch over your Attendants: Do not suffer so precious a Treasure to perish: Venture not into dangerous Places. But alas! my Words are in vain, no Regard is paid to them.

The Wicked think they are well concealed: But they are like Fish, kept within a Pond; they may dive under the Water; but he, who stands upon the Brink, can easily discern them: My grief to see their misery, is very great.

They pass their Days in Joy: They are served with exquisite Wines and delicate Meats: Their Feasts are endless: They assemble the Companions of their Debauches: They speak of nothing but Nuptials and Pleasures. Reflect, that I am left alone, and that I must conceal even my Tears.

(*) There are a thousand Passages in antient Poetry that resemble the Introduction of this Ode; and the beginning of the fourth and the seven Stanzas, in which places the Style is more Sublime and Poetical. All the Shu king was written in this Style which continues even to this Day.

(†) Chu fang ching, one of the Descendants of Chu bi, speaks in a very clear Manner, upon this Passage.

To render the Good happy, says he, and to punish the Wicked, is the constant Rule, which Heaven observes. If in this world we don't see the Good rewarded, and the Wicked punished, it is, because the Hour that is to decide their Fate is not yet come. Before this decisive Hour, a Man can, if we may use such an Expression, baffle Heaven. But when the Sentence is past, Heaven certainly gets the better of all. A Man who to day is chastis'd, to morrow may be rewarded; and he who meets with Rewards to day, may to morrow meet with Punishment. When Heaven Chastises, we say it is Angry, but Chastisement proceeds from Justice, and Justice never can be wrought up to Anger, or Hatred: If it does not punish Crimes, as soon as they are committed, it is not from a weak Compassion to the Criminal; but because the last Sentence has not yet pass'd. And Heaven keeps us in Ignorance of the Moment, when that Sentence is to be executed, that we may always be upon our Guard.

(‡) The Chinese, who have long regarded these Books as so many Monuments of what pass'd at the Commencement of their Monarchy, are of opinion that this unhappy Pau tse, was the Wife of Yew wang, which signifies, the King plung'd in darkness. The Words of Chu fang ching are these: It was not, says he, Ching tang, who destroy'd the Tyrant Kie, it was the Tyrant's unworthy Wife, who was the real Cause of his Ruin. It was not Fu wang, who destroy'd the cruel Chow: It was his Wife Ta ho. It was not the petty King of Shin, nor the Barbarians of the West, who were the Cause of the Destruction of the Blind Fou wang: It was Pau tse, who precipitated him into his great Misery, but alas! Altho' he had a Pau tse to ruin him, he had not a Shing tang, nor a Fu wang to succeed him. These few Words contain the Substance of all that we know of these three illustrious Families.

The smallest Worms have their Holes; the vilest Insects find their Food; yet at present, the People die of Famine and Misery. O Heaven! Thou who justly hast sent all these Misfortunes upon us, behold, how the Wicked live in Plenty, and take Compassion upon the Just who are in the utmost Necessity.

O D E VII.

An Exhortation on the same Subject.

THE most High seems to have changed his Clemency into Fury. The People is reduc'd to the Brink of Misery. Truth is no longer observed in Words. That which never fades is no longer thought of. Even those who are least criminal, because their Views are more confined, are wanting in Sincerity and Uprightness: This draws down the wrath of the Lord, and obliges me to warn you.

Heaven appears deaf to our Prayers; we must then be seized with Fear and Grief. Heaven is in Wrath, we must then examine ourselves, and amend without delay. Let your Words be sweet to gain the Hearts of the People: But let them be animated with Strength to stop the Progress of these Woes.

Tho' my Employment is different from yours, I am, however, a Man like yourselves, and I aim at nothing but to satisfy your justest Desires. Hear me then attentively and without contempt, because all I speak is valuable. You know the ancient Proverb, which imports, That the vilest Herbs should be gathered with care, and the Wood, which seems fit only for burning, should be piled up.

Heaven is in Anger: It would be the height of Folly to disregard its Wrath. I speak to you in all the Sincerity of my Heart, and yet you mock me. You say that I am a too timorous old Man; and you remain calm in the midst of Perils: But in the end, the Evil will admit of no Remedy.

Heaven is enraged, yet your Palace is full of Flatterers. There is no longer any Decency in Manners, and good Men are obliged to be silent. The People are inclined to the basest Actions, and we dare not discover the cause of so many Evils. Alas, all is lost! and wise Men are not heard.

Heaven penetrates into the Bottom of Hearts, as Light into a dark Chamber. We must endeavour to conform to its Lights; like two Instruments of Music tuned to the same Pitch. We must join ourselves with it; like two Tablets which appear but one. We must receive its Gifts the very Moment that its Hand is open to bestow. Do not say that I speak to you in vain: Nothing is easier to Heaven than to enlighten us: But our irregular Passions block up the entrance of our Souls.

The Sages of the first Order are like the Trenches that surround us; those of the second Order, are like the Walls that defend us. Your Neighbours are like a Guard before your Door; your Friends like a Prop that supports you; and your Relations like a Fortress that secures you. But, if you would preserve all these Advantages, your Heart must entertain Virtue without reprove: for, if you neglect Wisdom, all these foreign Supports will abandon you and leave you defenceless. Can one be in more terrible Circumstances?

Be seiz'd then with Dread, when you see the anger of Heaven ready to burst over your Head. Do not suffer yourself to be vanquished by Luxury and Pleasure: Tremble lest Heaven should abandon you, and call you to a strict Account. It is a true saying, that Heaven is intelligent: Whether you go out or in, it considers all your Steps. Its Sight is compared to the brightness of the Morning: Because it observes your least Motions.

O D E VIII.

Advice to a Sovereign.

O Mighty and supream Lord, thou art the sovereign Master of the World: But how severe is your Majesty, and how rigorous are your Commands? Heaven, it is true, gives Life and Being to all the Inhabitants of the World: But we must not depend too much upon its Liberality and Clemency. I know that it always begins as a Father, but I do not know if it will not end as a Judge.

Yen wang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! Ye are cruel, but your Ministers are Tygers and Wolves. Ye are covetous, but your Ministers are Blood-suckers; yet ye suffer such People to be about your Persons; ye raise them to the highest Posts: And because you have constrained Heaven to send a spirit of Giddiness upon you; you place these Wretches at the head of your Subjects.

Yen wang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! As soon as ever you desire to have a wife Man near your Persons, immediately the Wicked vow his Destruction, and spread a thousand false Surmises that they may cover their Hatred with specious Pretexts. Ye hear them, ye love them; and thus harbour within your Palace a Troop of Robbers: For this Reason, the Imprecations of the People are boundless.

Yen wang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! Ye are with respect to your poor People like fierce and hungry Beasts: And all your skill is employ'd in finding out Counsellors more wicked than yourselves: By not giving the least application to Virtue, you are destitute of the most solid Support: And your Life being but a Dream, all your Counsellors favour the Illusion.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! The murmurs of your People are to you like the Cries of Grasshoppers; but Anger boils in their Hearts. You are upon the Brink of Ruin, and yet you are not reclaimed. The Plague is in the Bosom of the Empire, and spreads even to the most distant Barbarians.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! It is not the Lord ye ought to accuse for so many Calamities: Impute them all to your selves. Ye would not hear the wise old Men; you have set them at a distance from you: But tho' you have these venerable Persons no longer, the Laws still remain with you: Follow them, that you may avert the Scourges that are ready to chastise you.

Ven vang cries out; Alas, ye Kings of this World! It is a too true Saying, "That fair Tree was not destroyed, because its Branches were broken, or its Leaves beaten down, but because its Root was spoil'd and corrupted." As you ought to see yourselves in the Kings your Predecessors, whom you represent, so you shall, one Day, serve as Examples to those who succeed you. The older the World grows, there are more illustrious Examples for Instruction; yet it never grows better.

I am now come to an end of what I had to say with respect to the first three classical Books, and have enlarged more upon them than I shall upon the two others; because these last are not near so much respected, tho' they are look'd upon as very valuable Monuments.

The Chun tsyu, the fourth Canonical Book of the first Order.

Opinions about the Author of this Book.

THE Chun tsyu was not admitted into the Rank of the King, till the times of the Dynasty of the Han. The Book itself was written in the Days of Confucius; and consequently, much inferior to the other three, which have always, and unanimously, been acknowledged the true King: But there have been great Disputes about the Chun tsyu. One Party, which is the most numerous, attribute this Work to Confucius, but others maintain that this Philosopher was not its Author. Many are of opinion that it contains the History of the Kingdom of Lü, which was the Native Country of Confucius, and is at present the Province of Shan tong. Others maintain that it is an Abridgment of what passed in the different Kingdoms, into which China was divided, before they were all united into one Monarchy by Tsin shi wang: For which reason, Vang ngan she, a learned Man, and able Politician and a Minister of State, would degrade the Chun tsyu, by reducing it to the King of the second Class. Nevertheless, the Chinese have a particular Fondness and an extraordinary Value for this Work.

The Actions of many Princes are there described; and their Vices and Virtues, together with the respective Rewards and Punishments attending them, are there exhibited, as in a Mirror. It commences at the 49th Year of the Emperor Ping wang, who was the thirteenth of the Race of the Chew, and comprehends all that passed during 241 Years under ten Kings. This Piece of History begins with In kong, who possessed the Kingdom of Lü; and ends with Ngay kang the twelfth King.

This Book is entitled the Spring and the Autumn: thereby giving us to understand, that an Empire revives and becomes flourishing, when governed by a wise and virtuous Prince; in the same manner as in the Spring, Nature is in some measure regenerated, and reanimated by the agreeable Verdure, with which the Ground and the Trees begin to be clothed. On the other hand, under a vicious and a cruel Prince, the Empire languishes and appears upon its Decline; in the same manner as in Autumn, the Trees divest themselves of their Ornaments, the Leaves and the Flowers fade away, and Nature seems to be dying. A Disciple of Confucius, whose Name was Ko shi, has composed a learned Commentary upon this Work, intitled Que yu, that is to say, The Maxims of Government.

The Ko shi Author of a Commentary upon it.

The Li ki, or the fifth Canonical Book of the first Order.

THE fifth Book entitled the Li ki, which is, as who should say, a Memorial of the Laws, Duties, and Ceremonies of a civil Life, contains twelve Books which Confucius had composed from the different Works of the Ancients. It is believed that its principal Author was the Brother of the Emperor Vu wang, whose Name was Chew kang, a Prince whom Virtue, Prudence, and Capacity equally recommended.

This Book likewise comprehends the Works of several of the Disciples of Confucius as well as of other Authors more modern and less to be depended on. The Customs and Ceremonies, both sacred and profane, are there treated of, together with the Usages of all Kinds which were practised tified, especially in the Times of the three principal Dynasties of the Hya, Chang, and Shew. It treats likewise of the Duties of Children to their Fathers, and of Wives to their Husbands; of the Rules of true Friendship, of Civilities in Feasts, of Hospitality, Funeral Honours, War, Music, and many other Things proper to cement and to keep up Society.

But as 300 Years after this Compilation was made by Confucius, all the Copies were burnt by that barbarous Order of Tsin shi wahang; and as no more of this Book could be recovered than a few Leaves, saved from the general Conflagration, and what the old Men had been able to retain by Heart; there is no doubt, and it is the Opinion of the Interpreters and Commentators, that it is not only imperfect on account of the unfaithfulness of the Memory of old People, and the bad Designs of some, by whose means there have crept in a great deal of foreign and apocriphal Things, but that there are found in it many Usages which are now a days laid aside: Besides it is a Book which the Chinese themselves own, ought to be read with a great deal of Caution.

Of the Classics, or Canonical Books of the second Order called Tse shu; with the Life of Confucius.

THE five Books just now described, are of the remotest Antiquity, and all others composed since by the wisest Men in China, are no other than Copies of, or Comments upon them. Among the numerous Authors, who have bestowed their labour upon these ancient Monuments, none has been more illustrious than Confucius: For during so many Ages, he has been looked upon throughout the Empire, by way of Excellence, as the great Master and Ornament of his Nation, as well as a compleat Model for all wise Men.

Tho' he never acquired the Title of King, yet by his excellent Maxims and great Examples, he governed a part of China during his Life; and since his Death, the Doctrine which he collected in his Books, drawn from the ancient Laws, has been, and still is, look'd upon, as a perfect Rule of Government. As he never had any other View in his Undertakings, Travels, or Discourses, than to revive the Morality of the first Ages, to procure the Happiness of Subjects, by instructing their Princes, and thereby to promote the Love of Wisdom, Justice and Virtue throughout the Empire; So his Memory is in the highest Veneration, and hath transmitted such a Lustre to Posterity, that it still shines, notwithstanding the distance of Time that has intervened. There is, properly speaking, no Family in China whose Nobility is hereditary, except that of Confucius, which still subsists; and is there in the highest Esteem. Many Authors having written the Life of this Philosopher, I shall deliver what is most generally said on that Subject.

The Life of Kong fu tse, or Confucius.

CONFUCIUS was born in a Town of the Kingdom of Lü, now the Province of Shan tong, in the 21st Year of the Reign of Ling wang, the 23<sup>d</sup> Emperor of the Race of the Chew, 551 Years before Christ, and two before the Death of Thales, one of the seven Sages of Greece. He was contemporary with the famous Pythagoras; and somewhat earlier than Socrates.(*) But Confucius has had this advantage above the other three, that his Glory has increased with the succession of Years, and has arrived at the highest pitch that human Wisdom can pretend to. This exalted Reputation he still Maintains in the midst of the greatest Empire in the World, which thinks itself indebted to this Philosopher for its Duration and Splendor.

Had Thales and Pythagoras, like Confucius, been contented with giving Precepts of Morality; had neither the first dived into Questions purely Physical, concerning the Origin of the World; nor the second dogmatized on the nature of the Rewards annexed to Virtue, and the Punishments appointed for Vice, after this Life; these two Sages of Antiquity might have enjoyed a Reputation for Learning, less liable to Censure.

Confucius, without being solicitous to search into the impenetrable Secrets of Nature, or to refine too much on Points of common Belief, a Rock dangerous to Curiosity, solely confined himself to speak concerning the Principle of all Beings; to inspire a Reverence, Fear and Gratitude for him; to inculcate, that nothing, not even the most secret Thought, escapes his Notice; that he never leaves Virtue without Reward, nor Vice without Punishment, whatever the present Condition of both may be. These are the Maxims scattered throughout his Works; upon these Principles he governed himself, and endeavoured a Reformation of Manners.

The Doctrines inculcated in his Works.

Confucius was but three Years old when he lost his Father Sho lyang be, who died about the Age of 73. This old Man enjoyed the highest Offices of the Kingdom of Song, yet left no other Inheritance to his Son, but the honour of descending from Ti ye, the 27th Emperor of the 2<sup>d</sup> Race of the Shang: His Mother, whose Name was Shing, and who drew her Pedigree from the illustrious Family of the Yen, lived 21 Years after the Death of her Husband.

Account of his Parents.

* The Author might have added, that he was Contemporary with Sohs, the Celebrated Philosopher, and Legislator of Athen.

His Studies in his Youth, In his most tender Age he was observed to have the Wisdom of a discreet Man; Play and childish Amusements were not at all to his liking. A grave, modest and serious Air gained him the Respect of those who knew him, and was a Prefage of what he would one Day become. He had scarce attained his 15th Year, when he applied himself seriously to the Study of the ancient Books, and furnished his Mind with Maxims the most proper to regulate the Heart, and inspire the People with the Love of Virtue. At the Age of nineteen he married, and had but one Wife, and by her a Son called Pe yu, who died at the Age of fifty; this latter left one Heir, called Tsu tsü, who treading in the Steps of Confucius his Grand-Father, devoted himself to the study of Wisdom, and by his Merit obtained the chief Employments in the Empire.

His Marriage. When Confucius was more advanced in Years, and thought he had made considerable Progress in the Knowledge of Antiquity, he proposed to re-establish the form of a wise Government in the several little Kingdoms, of which the Empire was composed, and to procure by this means the Reformation of Manners. For then, each Province of the Empire was a distant Kingdom, had its particular Laws, and was governed by its own Prince.

He proposes a general Reformation of Manners. To say the Truth, all the little Kingdoms were dependant on the Emperor; but it often happened that the imperial Authority was too weak to keep them within the bounds of their Duty. These Kings were Sovereigns in their respective Dominions; they levied Taxes, imposed Tribute, conferred Dignities and Employments; declared War, when they thought proper, against their Neighbours, and sometimes became formidable to the Emperor himself. As Interest, Avarice, Ambition, Dissimulation, false Policy, with the love of Pleasure and Luxury, prevailed in all these little Courts, Confucius undertook to banish these Vices, and to introduce the opposite Virtues in their Stead, he preached up every where, as well by his own Example, as by his Instructions, Modesty, Disinterestedness, Sincerity, Equity, and Temperance, together with the contempt of Riches and Pleasures.

Accepts of Offices into the Magistracy with a View. His Integrity, extensive Knowledge, and the Splendor of his Virtues, soon causing him to be known, several Places in the Magistracy were offered him; which he accepted solely with a View of propagating his Doctrine, and reforming Mankind. Tho' his Success was not answerable to his Pains, yet being less influenced with the Honours that were paid him, than the Love of the public Welfare, he presently threw up all his Employments, how considerable soever, to go in quest elsewhere of a People more tractable, as well as more capable of profiting by his Precepts.

Reformation wrought in the Kingdom of Lu. Of this he gave several Proofs on various Occasions, but especially in the 55th Year of his Age, when he was promoted to one of the chief Posts in the Kingdom of Lu, his native Country. In less than three Months the Face of the Kingdom was changed; the Prince who placed his whole Confidence in him, the Grandees of the Kingdom, and the People, were quite different from what they were before. This Change was so sudden and prosperous, that it infused Jealousy in the neighbouring Princes. They judged that, as nothing was more capable of making a Kingdom flourish than good Order and the exact Observation of the Laws, the King of Lu would infallibly become too powerful, if he continued to follow the Councils of so wise and knowing a Man.

Defeated by a Stratagem. Of these Princes the King of Tsi, being most alarmed, held several Councils with his principal Ministers; and after frequent Deliberations it was concluded, that under the pretence of an Embassy, a Present should be made, to the King of Lu and to the great Lords of his Court, of a great Number of beautiful young Girls, who had been instructed from their Infancy in Singing and Dancing, and had all the Charms, requisite to please and captivate the Heart.

This Stratagem succeeded: For the King of Lu and all his Grandees, received this Present with a great deal of Gratitude and Joy; and not being able to resist the Charms of these Strangers, thought of nothing else but making Feasts to divert them. The Prince wholly taken up with his Pleasures, abandoned the Business of the State, and became inaccessible to his most zealous Ministers.

Confucius endeavoured by Remonstrances, to bring him back to his Reason and Duty; but when he saw that the Prince was deaf to all his Councils, he resolved to divest himself of an Office which could be of no use to the People, under so voluptuous a Prince. Whereupon, laying down his Employment, he left the Court; and became an Exile from his native Country, in order to seek in other Kingdoms for Minds, more fit to relish and follow his Maxims.

He returns to a private Life, and falls into great Indigence. He passed through the Kingdoms of Tsi, Gbey, and Tsu, to no Effect. The Austerity of his Morals, made his Politics dreaded; nor were the Ministers of the Princes willing to countenance a skilful Rival, who was able quickly to ruin their Credit and Authority. Thus wandering from Province to Province, he came into the Kingdom of Shing, where he was reduced to the greatest Indigence, without laying aside his Greatness of Soul and usual Constancy.

It was a Sort of Novelty to behold a Philosopher, after he had gained the public Admiration in the most honourable Employments of the State, returning of his own accord to the private Functions of a Sage, entirely devoted to the Instruction of the People, and on this Account, undertaking continual and painful Journeys. His Zeal extended to Persons of all Ranks, to the Learned and Ignorant, to Courtiers and Princes; in short, his Lessons were adapted to all Conditions in general, and proper for each in particular.

Number of his Disciples. He had so often in his Mouth, the Maxims and Examples of the Heroes of Antiquity, Yau, Shun, Yu, Ching tang, and Ven vang, that those great Men seemed to be revived in him. For this Reason it is not at all surprizing that he had such a great Number of Disciples, who were inviolably attached to his Person: For they reckon 3000, amongst whom there were 500, who who possessed, with Honour, the highest Trusts in various Kingdoms; and amongst these were 72, still more distinguished than the rest by the Practice of Virtue. His Zeal inspired him even with a Desire of crossing the Sea, in order to propagate his Doctrine in the most distant Climates.

He divided his Disciples in four different Classes: The first was of those who were to cultivate their Minds by Meditation, and to purify their Hearts by the care of acquiring Virtues. The most famous of this Class were Men tsü kien, Jen pe myew, Shung kong, and Yen ywen: This last was snatched away by an untimely Death, at the Age of 31; and as he was greatly beloved by his Master, he was a long time the subject of his Grief and Tears. The second Class consisted of those whose Business was to reason justly, and to compose persuasive and elegant Discourses: The most admired amongst these were Tsay ngo, and Tsü kong. The Employment of the third Class was to study the Rules of good Government; to give the Mandarins an Idea of it, and to teach them how to acquit themselves worthily in the public Offices. The most eminent in their respect were Ien yen, and Ki li. In short, to write in a concise and elegant Style, the Principles of Morality, was the Business of the Disciples of the last Class; among whom Tsü yen, and Tsü bya, deserved very great Commendations. These ten choice Disciples were the Flower and Chief of Confucius's School.

The whole Doctrine of this Philosopher, tended to restore human Nature to its primitive Lustre and Beauty, received from Heaven; which had been obscured by the Darkness of Ignorance, and the Contagion of Vice. The means he proposed to attain it, was to obey, honour and fear the Lord of Heaven; to love our Neighbours as ourselves; to conquer irregular Inclinations; never to take our Passions for the Rule of our Conduct; but to submit to Reason, and listen to it in all Things; so as neither to act, speak, or think in any wise contrary to it.

As his Actions never contradicted his Maxims; and as by his Gravity, Modesty, Mildness, and Frugality, his Contempt of Earthly Enjoyments, and a continual watchfulness over his Conduct, he was himself an Example of the Precepts he taught in his Writings, and Discourses, each of the Kings strove to draw him into his Dominions: The good Effects wrought by him in one Country, being a Motive for another earnestly to wish for his Presence.

But a Zeal continually successful, and without Opposition, would have wanted something of its full Lustre. Confucius appeared always equal to himself in the greatest Disgraces and Troubles; which yet were the more likely to ruffle him, as they were excited by the Jealousy of ill designing Persons, and in a Place where he had been generally applauded. This Philosopher, after the Death of the Prince of Chew his Admirer, became of a sudden, through the Envy of his Courtiers, the common Talk of the senseless Populace, and the Subject of their Songs and Satyrs; in the midst of which unworthy Treatment, he lost nothing of his usual Tranquility.

But what was most to be admired, was the Constancy and Steadiness he discovered, when his Life was in imminent Danger, through the Brutality of a great Officer of the Army, named Whan ti; who hated this Philosopher, tho' he had never given him any Offence. But bad Men have always a natural Antipathy to those, whose regular Life is a secret Reproach to their disorderly Conduct. Confucius beheld the Sword lifted up, ready to give him a mortal Blow; yet tho' the Danger was so near, he did not discover the least Concern or Emotion: But his Disciples were terrified and dispersed.

As some of those who had most Affection for him, pressed him to make Haste away, to avoid the Mandarins Fury: If Tjen, replied he, protects us, of which he has just given a very sensible Proof, what Harm can the Rage of Whan ti do us, notwithstanding he is President of the Tribunal of the Army?

Confucius seemed on this Occasion to support the Character of a Sage, more worthily than the Stoic did, when his Master gave him the Blow which lamed him. His natural Insensibility, founded on a notion, that the Pains of the Body do not affect the Soul which resides there, has nothing in it equal to the Sentiment of Confucius, who relies on the Protection that Heaven extends to those who serve it. This is not to place Happiness in a Man's own Virtue, that being an insupportable Pride, but is founded on a long Habit of referring every thing to Tjen; inasmuch that it occurred to his Mind, on the very first motion of Surprise and Dread.

The Virtues of this Chinese Philosopher, were still more heightened by his charming Modesty, and Aversion to Praise. He was never heard to praise himself, and could hardly bear the Encomiums others bestowed on him: To which he answered only by reproaching himself, for taking so little care in watching over his own Actions, and neglecting to practise Virtue. When any one admired his Doctrine, and the sublime Principles of Morality which he taught, far from assuming the Honour to himself, he ingenuously confessed that it was not invented by him, but was much more ancient, being derived from those wise Legislators, Tau and Shun, who lived 1500 Years before him.

According to a Tradition universally received amongst the Chinese, he was frequently heard to repeat these Words; Si fang yew shing jin, importing, that, in the West, the true Saint was to be found. It is not known who the Person was concerning whom he spoke: But it is certain, that 65 Years after the Birth of Christ, Ming ti, the 15th Emperor of the Family of the Han, equally affected with the Words of this Philosopher, and the Image of a Man who appeared to him in a Dream as coming from the West, sent Tsay tsing and Tsin king, two Grandees of the Empire, into those Parts, with Orders not to return till they had found the holy Person, whom Heaven had revealed to him, and had learned the Law which he taught. But the Messengers terrified with the Dangers and Fatigues of the Journey, stopped somewhere in the Indies, for the Place is uncertain, where they found the Image of a Man named Fo, who had infected those Parts with his monstrous Doctrine, about 500 Years before the Birth of Confucius; and having informed themselves in the Superstitions of this Country, on their return to China, they propagated that Idolatry.

His Death. Confucius having finished his philosophical Labours, and in particular the historical Work of Cbun tsyú, died in the Kingdom of Lú, his native Country, aged 73, in the 41st Year of the Reign of King vang, the 25th Emperor of the Race of the Cheu.

and last Sayings. A few Days before his last Sickness, he told his Disciples, with Tears in his Eyes, that he was pierced with Grief, to see the Disorders which reigned in the Empire; adding, "The Mountain is fallen, the high Machine is destroyed, and the Sages are no more to be seen." His Meaning was, that the Edifice of Perfection, which he had endeavoured to raise, was almost overthrown. He began from that time to languish, and the seventh Day before his Death, turning himself towards his Disciples; "The Kings, said he, refuse to follow my Maxims; and since I am no longer useful on the Earth, it is necessary that I should leave it."

Lamented by the King of Lú. Having spoken these Words he fell into a Lethargy, which continued seven Days, at the end whereof he expired, in the Arms of his Disciples. When Ngay kong, who then reigned in the Kingdom of Lú, first heard of the Death of the Philosopher, he could not refrain from Tears. Heaven is not satisfied with me, cried he, since it has taken Confucius from me. In effect, the Sages are precious Gifts which Heaven bestows on the Earth, and their Worth is most known by the loss of them.

His Sepulchre. They built his Sepulchre near the City Kyo seu, on the Side of the River Su, in the same Spot where he used to assemble his disciples. It has since then been enclosed with Walls, and at present looks like a small City. He was lamented by the whole Empire, but especially by his Disciples, who went into Mourning, and bewailed him as if he had been their Father. These Sentiments, full of Veneration which they had for him, encreasing with time, he is at present considered as the great Master and chief Doctor of the Empire.

His Person. He was tall and well proportioned. His Breast and Shoulders were broad, his Air grave and majestic, his Complexion olive, his Eyes large, his Beard long and black, his Nose a little flat, and his Voice strong and piercing. On the Middle of his Forehead there was a Swelling, or Kind of Wen, which disfigured him a little, and caused his Father to call him Kyew, that is, little Hill: A Name he sometimes gave himself out of Modesty and Humility.

His Works. But it is by his Works that he is chiefly known; whereof four are in greatest Esteem, because they contain all that he had collected relating to the ancient Laws, which are looked on as a perfect Rule of Government: Altho' the last of them is more properly the Work of his Disciple Mengius. The first of these Books is called Ta hyo, which signifies the grand Science, or the School of Adults. The second is named the Cbong yong, or the immutable Medium, being that just Middle which is found between two Extreams, and wherein Virtue consists. The third is called Lun yu, that is, moral and pitby Discourses. And the fourth is intitled Meng tsé, or the Book of Mengius: In which the Author gives an Idea of a perfect Government.

To these four Books, are added two others, which are almost in equal Reputation. The first named Hiau king, that is, of filial Respect, contains the Answers which Confucius made to his Disciple Tseng, concerning the Reverence due to Parents. The second is called Syau hyo, that is, the Science or School of Children; and is a Collection of Sentences and Examples, taken from ancient and modern Authors. In order to give the Reader a slight Notion of the Chinese Science, I shall make a short Extract of each of these Books, from the Latin Translation of P. Noël (one of the most ancient Missionaries of China) printed at Prague in 1711. To which I refer those who would be more thoroughly acquainted with them.

The Ta hyo, or, School of Adults. The first Classical or Canonical Book of the second Order.

Abstract of the Ta hyo.

CONFUCIUS is the Author of this Work, and his Disciple Tseng tsé the Commentator. This is what Beginners ought to study first, because it is as it were the first entrance into the Temple of Wisdom and Virtue. It treats first of the Care we ought to take in governing ourselves, that we may be able afterwards to govern others; and of Perseverance in the Sovereign good, which according to him, is nothing else but the Conformity of our Actions with right Reason. The Author calls his Book Ta hyo, or, The grand Science, because it was chiefly designed for Princes and great Men, who ought to learn to govern their People well.

The great Science consists in restoring our corrupted Nature.

All the Science requisite for the Princes and Grandees of a Kingdom, says Confucius, consists in cultivating and improving the reasonable Nature they have received from Tyen; and in restoring to it that primitive Light and Discernment, which has been either weakened or obscured by various Passions, that they may be in a condition afterwards to forward the Perfection of others. To succeed then herein it is necessary to begin with ourselves; and for that end it is requisite to examine well into the nature of Things, and to endeavour to acquire a true Knowledge of

Good

Good and Evil; to fix the Will towards the love of this Good, and the hatred of this Evil; to preserve Integrity of Heart, and regulate his Manners. When a Man has thus renewed himself, he will have no Difficulty to renew others: And by this means Concord and Union is quickly seen to reign in Families; the Kingdoms are governed according to the Laws; and the whole Empire enjoy perfect Peace and Tanquillity.

The Doctor Tseng, to give his Masters Doctrine its full Extent, explains it in ten Chapters. In Chap. 1. the first he shews from the Text of the canonical Books, and the Examples of some ancient Emperors, wherein renewing ourselves consists; and what must be done to restore reasonable Nature, to that primitive Light which it received from Heaven. Wherein renewing consists.

In the second he teaches, in what manner the Minds and Hearts of People are to be renewed. Chap. 2.

In the third he shews, what course must be taken to attain Perfection. He proposes as a Patern Chap. 3. the Application of a skilful Workman, who desires to do his Work in Perfection; and quotes Instances of several Princes, who were continually attentive to the Regulation of their Actions and Conduct. How to attain Perfection.

In the fourth he demonstrates, that before all things, a Man ought to Study his own Perfection, and that then it will be easy to render others perfect. Chap. 4.

In the fifth he explains, what it is to penetrate the Nature of Things to the bottom, in order to come to a perfect Knowledge of Good and Evil. Chap. 5.

In the sixth he teaches, that we ought not to deceive ourselves, but apply with a sincere Heart to the Study and Practice of Virtue; to fix the Will in the love of Good and the hatred of Evil; and to put ourselves with regard to both, in the same Disposition as we are with regard to Beauty, which we are prone to love, and Ugliness which we are naturally inclin'd to hate. That our Endeavours be sincere.

In the seventh he shews, that in order to regulate our Manners, we must know how to govern the Heart; and above all, to master the four principal Passions, capable of introducing Trouble and Confusion, viz. Joy, Sadness, Anger and Fear. That in reality these Passions are inseparable from human Nature, but can never hurt the Person who knows how to bridle them; and that the Heart is like a polished Mirror, which is not sullied by the Objects it reflects. How to govern the Passions.

In the eighth he shews, that to establish Union and Peace in a Family, the Father must know how to govern his Affections, that he may not be sway'd by a blind Love, but in all things, follow the Light of sound Reason: For otherwise he will never be able to see either the Faults of those he loves, or the good Qualities of those to whom he has taken an Aversion. Of paternal Affection.

In the ninth he proves, that the wise and prudent Manner, by which Families are regulated, is the Basis of good Government in a Kingdom; that it is the same Principle which actuates and gives motion to both of them; that if we reverence and obey our Parents, we will also reverence and obey the King; that if in the Orders which are given, his Children and Domestic-tics, are treated with Mildness, the same Lenity will be extended towards his Subjects; that this was the wise Council which the Emperor Vu wang gave to the King his Brother, saying, Love your People as a tender Mother loves her young Child; that this Love is infused by Nature, and requires no Study; that a Maid before her marriage, was never known to study how to manage in suckling her Child; that a wise Prince receives the same Inclination from Nature; that his Example is the Rule by which his Family is governed, and the government of his Family, the Model for the government of his Dominions. Chap. 9. The Regulation of Families is the Basis of Government.

In the tenth Book he shews, that to govern a State well, a Prince ought to judge of others by himself; that he ought to avoid imposing on his Subjects any Commands, which he would not be pleased to find in the Orders of one who had a right to command him; that he ought to gain the Hearts of his Subjects by his Virtue, and inspire them with the Love of it by his Example; that the Happiness of a State does not consist in Gold and Silver, but in its abounding with virtuous Men; that a wise Prince ought, above all things, to be very careful in chusing his Ministers; that he should cast his Eye upon none but just, wise, honest and disinterested Persons; that the Hearts of his Subjects is an inexhaustible Treasure to him; that he will lose his Riches if he seeks to heap them up, and that if he distributes them liberally among his People, he will never fail to be Rich; that in short, he will never taste Happiness, but in proportion as he renders his People happy, and prefers the public Good to his own private Interest. Chap. 10. How Princes should act.

Chong yong, or, The immutable Medium. The second Classical, or Canonical Book of the second Order.

THIS Work, of which Confucius is the Author, was published by his Grandson Tse tse: Abstract of the Chong yong. And treats of the Medium which ought to be observed in all Things. Chong signifies Middle or Mean, and by Yong is understood that which is constant, eternal and immutable. He undertakes to prove that every wise Man, and especially those who are entrusted with the Government of Nations, ought to follow this Middle, in which Virtue consists. He begins with a Definition of human Nature and its Passions: Then he introduces divers Examples of Virtues, The Doctrine of the Medium.

Virtues, and among the rest, of Piety, Fortitude, Prudence, and filial Respect; as so many Patterns of the Medium that ought to be observed. He shews afterwards that this Medium, and the Practice of it, is the right and true Path for a wise Man to take, in order to arrive at the highest Pitch of Virtue.

The first Article. Reason the Rule of human Actions.

This Book is divided into 33 Articles. In the first he says, that the Law of Heaven is engraven even in the Nature of Man; that the Conduct of this Nature, or rather the secret Light that directs his Reason, is the right Path which he ought to follow in his Actions, and becomes the Rule of a wise and virtuous Life; that he must never stray from this Path, for which Cause a wise Man ought incessantly to watch over the Motions of his Heart and his Passions; that these Passions keep the Middle, and incline neither to the right nor left when they are calm; that if we know how to curb and moderate them when they rise, they are then agreeable to right Reason; and, by this Conformity, Man keeps in that right Way, that Medium, which is the Source and Principle of virtuous Actions.

The 2d. 3d. &c. The Medium of several Virtues.

In the second Article, and so to the twelfth, he deplores the unhappy State of the Generality of Mankind, whereof so very few follow this Middle wherein Virtue consists. He enters next into a Detail of certain Virtues, and explains what is the Middle of Prudence, Piety and Fortitude; confirming his Doctrine by Examples of the ancient Emperors, and some Disciples of Confucius.

The 12th & 13th. The Science easy as to Practice.

In the twelfth and thirteenth Articles, he makes it appear, that this Science of the Medium is sublime, difficult and subtle in Speculation, but in Practice easy and common; that it extends to the most ordinary Actions of Life, as the Respect a Child owes to its Parent, the Deference due from a younger Brother to an Elder, and the Sincerity usual between Friends.

The 14th. Effects of keeping the Medium.

In the fourteenth he shews, that in keeping the Medium, a wise Man confines himself to the Duties of his Employment, and does not meddle with other Affairs; that whatever Circumstances, State or Place he is in, he is always the same, always Master of himself, being equally steady amidst the hurry of Business, and in the repose of a private Life; that as he is never proud nor haughty in great Prosperity, so he discovers nothing mean or grovelling in a low and abject Condition.

The 15th &c. Examples of Princes.

From the fifteenth Article to the twenty first, he brings Examples of Princes, who both possessed and practised the Science of the Medium; amongst the rest he cites the Emperor Shun, Ven vang and Vu vang; affirming that Heaven rewarded the Reverence they payed their Parents, by advancing them to the Empire, and loading them with Riches and Honours. Afterwards he gives an Account of the Ceremonies, which these Princes instituted as well to honour the Lord of Heaven, as to give public Marks of their Mindfulness of, and Respect for the Memory of their deceased Parents.

The 20th. Virtues requisite for regulating the Manners.

In the twentieth he shews, that to govern others well, we must know how to govern ourselves; that the Regulation of Manners consists principally in three Virtues, viz. Prudence, Integrity of Heart, and Fortitude; that Prudence is necessary for discovering the just Medium in question; Integrity of Heart for pursuing it, and Fortitude for persevering therein. Next he enumerates nine Virtues which an Emperor ought to be possessed of, in order to govern wisely. (1.) He must regulate his whole Life and Conduct. (2.) He must honour wise Men in a particular Manner. (3.) He must love his Parents tenderly. (4.) He must treat the prime Ministers of the Empire with Distinction. (5.) He must treat the Mandarins, and those who aspire to Offices, as he is treated himself. (6.) He must take Care of his Subjects as his own Children. (7.) He must draw into his Dominions such as excell in any useful Art or Profession. (8.) He must give a kind Reception to Strangers, and the Ambassadors of other Princes. (9.) He must keep all the Kings of the Empire, and the tributary Princes within the Bounds of their Duty — After this he explains the Advantages which will accrue to a Prince, by the Practice of these nine Virtues. If his Life be well regulated, it will serve as a Pattern to his Subjects, who will form their Manners by his Example. If he honours wise Men, their Advice and Instructions will be of great service to him, in governing himself and others prudently. If he loves his Parents and Relations, they will not look on his Grandeur and Advancement with an evil Eye; but will join in their Endeavours to maintain his Dignity and Power. If he treats the prime Ministers of the Empire with Honour, they will assist him both with their Councils and Interest in any difficult and perplexing Affair; and he will know what Resolutions he had best to take. If he has the same regard for the other Mandarins as himself, their Gratitude to so good a Prince, will make them more zealous and punctual in the Execution of their Trusts. If he takes care of his Subjects as if they were his Children, they will love him as if he was their Father. If he draws all sorts of skilful Artists into his Empire, they will bring with them Riches and Plenty. If he receives Strangers kindly, the four Quarters of the World will resound with his Fame, and the number of his Subjects will be encreased, by the People who will come from all Countries to taste the Sweets of so wise a Government. Lastly, if he keeps the tributary Princes within their Duty, his Authority will be respected, and Peace will reign in the Empire.

and their Effects.

The 21st &c. Truth the Essence of Virtue.

In the twelve following Articles, he makes it appear that these Virtues do not deserve that Name, if they be not real and free from all Disguise; that Truth is the essence of all Virtue; that the prudent Man who would follow the Medium in which Virtue consists, ought to apply himself to the Study of Truth; that it resides in the Heart by the Affection, and appears outwardly by the Practice; that when a Man has once acquired it, he extends his Views and Attention to every thing, foreseeing what is to come, as if it was present; that in short, if he

he who has attained to the Perfection of true Virtue, be possessed of the Sovereign power, he can establish no Laws but what are wise, and for the good of the People.

Lastly, in the 33d Article, he proves, that to acquire this Perfection in which the Medium of Virtue consists, it is not necessary to perform difficult, painful and extraordinary Things; it suffices to apply himself particularly to this Virtue, which tho' hidden within us and not visible to the Eyes of Men, will yet shew itself outwardly, become known and admired: Just as a Fish, which hides itself at the bottom of clear Water, always appears above. He supports this Doctrine by some instances of the ancient Emperors Ven vang and Vu vang, who are spoken of in the canonical Books, intitled I king, Sbu king and Sbi king.

Lun yu, or, The Book of Sentences. The third Classifical, or Canonical Book of the second Order.

THIS Book is a Collection of Sentences and moral Discourses, and divided into twenty Articles; which consist only of Questions, Answers and Sayings, either of Confucius or his Disciples, on the Virtues, good Works, and the art of governing well: Excepting the ten Articles, wherein the Disciples of Confucius give a particular account of the outward Behaviour of their Master. We find in this Collection, as five Maxims and Sentences of Morality, as any ascribed to the seven wise Men of Greece, so much cry'd up. As it is not possible to give the Substance of so many scattered Maxims, I shall only offer a brief Account of the principal Matters treated of in each Article.

In the first he gives the Character of a wise Man, and shews what are his Virtues and Duties in every condition of Life, whether he be in a private Station, or at the Helm of Affairs. He says, among other things, that it is impossible a Flatterer should be Virtuous: to which the Disciple of Confucius adds, that he examined himself every Day, with respect to three Things. (1.) If when he undertakes to do any one a Piece of Service, he applies himself wholly to it, and without Reserve; (2.) If in conversing with his Friends, he behaves with Candour and Frankness; (3.) If after he has heard his Master's Doctrine, he takes care to benefit by it and put it in Practice. He says likewise, that he who studies Wisdom, does not grieve for being little known to Men, but because they are not sufficiently known to him.

In the second he speaks of the Duties of a Prince, who would govern his Subjects well; and of the Reverence due from Children to their Parents. He informs us by what Signs to distinguish a wise Man; with what Care we ought to avoid the evil Sects &c. Would you know, says he, whether a Man be wise or not? Examine well his Actions: If they are bad, he is but too well known: If they are good, try to find out the Motive that influenced him. Carry your Curiosity yet farther: Examine what his Inclinations are, and what he takes most Delight in; After this it will be in vain for him to counterfeit, since you have discovered what he really is at the Bottom. He who approves of the evil Sects, says he again, such as those of the Ho shang and Tau tsé Bonzas, does great Hurt to himself, and Injury to the Empire. There is no true Doctrine but that which we have received from the ancient Sages; which teaches us to follow right Reason, to preserve Integrity of Heart, to retain a decent Behaviour, to correct our Faults and reform our Manners.

In the third he gives a particular Account of the Ceremonies prescribed for honouring deceased Parents; and rebukes those who neglect or transgress them. He speaks of the Worship due to Spirits; of the imperial Laws, Music, and the Method of shooting with the Bow (&c.).

In the fourth he speaks of the Duties of Children towards their Parents. He shews the Difference between an honest Man and a Knave, a wise Man and a Fool. These following are some of his Maxims; we may judge even by Men's Faults, whether they are virtuous or not. A virtuous Man scarce ever offends, but thro' excess of Affection and Gratitude; a malicious Man commonly sins thro' excess of Hatred and Ingratitude. The wise Man has nothing in View, but the Beauty of Virtue; and the Fool thinks of nothing but the Conveniences and Pleasures of Life. The wise Man does not grieve for want of being advanced to great Employments, but because he wants the necessary Qualifications for rendering him worthy of them. In beholding the Virtues of wise Men we are wise if we imitate them: In beholding the Vices of wicked Men, we are virtuous if we shun ourselves, and examine if we be not subject to the same Vices.

In the fifth, Confucius gives his judgment with respect to the Qualifications, Dispositions, Virtues and Failings of some of his Disciples. He praises for instance, one named Tsu ven, who having been advanced thrice to the Office of prime Minister, in the Kingdom of Lü (now the Province of Hü quang) discovered no sign of Joy; and having been as often deprived of his Dignity, shewed no sign of Concern. To which he adds: I judge from thence that he is an excellent Minister, but dare not affirm he was Virtuous; for to be sure of that, I should have been able to dive into his Thoughts, and know if he possessed Integrity of Heart. He teaches afterwards, that we should not judge of a Man's Virtue by some outward Actions, which often have only the appearance of Virtue; for that true Virtue dwells in the Heart, and in its natural Rectitude.

6. Their Characters Continued.

In the sixth Confucius makes known some of his Disciples, whom he judges fit for Government; and praises their extraordinary Zeal to learn and improve. Then he treats of the Manner to be observed in giving and receiving [Presents.] Next he explains the Qualities of true Virtue. My Disciple Yen whey, says he, was reduced to extremest Poverty, having nothing to subsist on but Rice and Water; yet in this State of Indigence he never lost his usual Tranquility and Joy: Such a Man I call a true Sage — I call him a virtuous Man, who first bears with Constancy all the Difficulties that occur in acquiring Virtue; and afterwards thinks of tasting the Sweetness which are found in the Possession of it. — A virtuous Man may suffer himself to be deceived so far as to believe Falshoods, but never so far as to do what is evil.

7. Kong fū speaks, humble thoughts of himself.

In the seventh, he relates the mean Opinion Confucius had of himself, and the Encomiums bestowed on him by his Disciples. It was not I said the Philosopher, who invented the Doctrine which I teach you: I take it from the Ancients, from whom I learned it. — He said another time, that he was continually uneasy on four Accounts. First, because he had made too little Progress in Virtue; Secondly, because he was not eager enough in pursuit of his Studies; Thirdly, because he did not give himself up to the Duties which Justice prescribes; Fourthly, because he was not sufficiently watchful over himself, and the Reformation of his Manners. — He said also, I see myself in extremest Indigence, a little Rice and Water being all I have to live upon; yet therewith I am chearful and content, because I consider the Dignities and Riches which are acquired by unjust Means, as Clouds driven about in the Sky by the Winds. — How happy am I! said he another time, for if I commit a Fault, it is immediately known to every body. — Being informed one Day that they gave him the Name of King, that is, most Wise: That Encomium does not suit me, said he, nor can I suffer it. All the good that can be said of me, is that I endeavour to acquire Wisdom and Virtue; and am not discouraged by the trouble there is in teaching them to others. — His Disciples say of him, that he joined three Things together, which seemed almost incompatible: viz. All the Charms of Politeness with a great deal of Gravity; a severe Look with abundance of good Nature and Mildness; and an extraordinary greatness of with a great deal of Modesty.

8. Encomium of the ancient Emperors.

In the eighth, he makes the Encomium of the ancient Emperors Vu wang, Tu, Shun and Yau. He recites some Maxims of the Doctor Tjeng, and shews what are the Duties of a wife Man. Where is there to be found, says Confucius, a greatness of Soul equal to that of the Emperors Shun and Yu? They were taken out of a very abject Condition to be raised to the Empire; and on the Throne they were so free from Ambition and vain Glory, that they possessed the Empire as if they possessed it not. — When shall we find a Man of Abilities, who patiently listens to the Instructions given him by an ignorant Person? Where shall we find that Man, who being treated with Contempt and Outrage, does not think of Revenge? For my Part, I never knew any one of this Character, except my fellow Disciple Yen wien. — A wise Man should for ever be learning as if he knew nothing, and should always be afraid of forgetting what he has learned.

9. Encomiums on Kong fū tse.

In the ninth, we meet with several Encomiums on Confucius, his Doctrine and his Modesty when he spoke of himself; with divers Precepts for acquiring Wisdom. We should not only respect old Men, said Confucius, but should even respect young People: For how do I know, but this young Man may one Day become more wise and virtuous than myself? — I never yet met with any body so fond of Virtue, as I have found others fond of Pleasure.

10. His Deportment.

In the tenth, the Disciples of Confucius describe the Air and outward Behaviour of their Master; his Manner of Deportment either at home or abroad, with Persons of all Ages and Conditions; his Way of living, speaking, walking, dressing, drinking, eating, sleeping, &c.

11. His Conversation.

In the eleventh, Confucius converses with his Disciples: He praises some and reproves others. One of them desiring that he would teach him how to die well: You have not yet learned how to live well, said Confucius, and yet you will know how to die well.

12. Rules for Government and living well.

In the twelfth, Confucius teaches how to make our Actions conformable to right Reason: Then he prescribes Rules for governing the People well; gathering the Tribute and acquiring Virtue. Somebody asking him what he ought to do in order to live well: When you appear abroad, said he, be as grave and modest, as if you were visiting some great Lord: Treat others in the same Manner you would be treated yourself: Neither do, nor say any thing that may give Provocation or Uneasiness. — He said to another of his Disciples: Life and Death depend on the Law of Tyen, which we cannot alter: Poverty and Riches come from the free Dispensation of Tyen, which cannot be compelled: The wise Man reveres this Law and Dispensation of Tyen; and therein is the Source of the Peace and Tranquility he enjoys.

13. Qualities of a wise Man.

In the thirteenth, he points out the Qualifications and Virtues, which constitute a wise and prudent Man. I believe a Man to be wise, says he, when I find that he gains the Love of all good Men, and is hated by none but bad Men. — I think that a Man would be virtuous, when I see that he is modest in his own House, active in Business, and candid in his Conversation with others.

14. And of a Minister of State.

In the fourteenth, he speaks of the Duty of a wise Man; the Care which Heaven takes of Kingdoms; the Qualifications belonging to a Minister of State, and the Zeal he ought to have for good Government. He who is very ready at making Promises, says Confucius, finds it difficult to keep them. — The Ancients, says he again, studied Wisdom for its own sake, that is, to know the Truth and acquire Virtue: The Moderns apply themselves to study Virtue, for sake of others, that is, to get a Name and acquire Honour and Riches. — Does not the Father who loves his Son, take care to correct him when he commits a Fault? In like Manner should not a faithful Minister, acquaint his Prince, when he is wanting in any of his Duties?

The fifteenth contains divers Maxims, touching the Virtues of a wise Man, and the great Art of reigning. These are some of them: When a Man is hated by every body, before you hate him, examine what it is that is hateful in him. When a Man is generally beloved, before you love him, examine what it is that renders him amiable. Not to mend our Faults, is to commit new ones. — Be severe to yourself and gentle to others, and you will never have Enemies. — The wise Man loves to be by himself; the Fool seeks Company.

In the sixteenth, he exclaims against a prime Minister, who did not dissuade his Prince from making an unjust War, and shews the ill Consequences of bad Government. He speaks afterwards of such Persons and Things as we ought to love; of what a wise Man ought to shun, and in what Manner Confucius instructed his Son. The following are some of his Maxims. If a Leopard or Tyger breaks out of the royal Park, who is to answer for it? If Troubles and Dissension overturn a State, who is to be blamed for it? — I have seen a great Prince afflict himself, not because his Subjects were few in Number, but because they were ambitious: Not on account of the Poverty of his Kingdom, but for the Discord that reigned in it. In effect, if Ambition be banished from a State, it will quickly grow rich: If Tranquility and Subordination prevail, it will quickly swarm with People. — Three Sorts of Friends are useful: Those which are virtuous; those which are frank and sincere; and those who are learned. — A young Man, when in presence of a Person venerable either for Age or Dignity, may commit three Faults: The first, if he speaks without being spoken to, he will pass for a forward Rattle. Secondly, if when he is spoken to he makes no Answer, he will be taken for a tricking deceitful Man. The third, if he speaks without considering well what he says, he will be looked on as a Fool.

The seventeenth contains the Opinion of Confucius, with respect to the Mandarins who desert their Princes Interest; the Virtues requisite in a Prince; those whom a wise Man ought to hate, and the Obligation of mourning three Years for the Death of a Father or Mother. I would have a Prince, says Confucius, to be Grave and Good, a Speaker of Truth, diligent in Affairs, and Liberal. If he has Gravity, he will be respected by his Subjects; if he has Goodness, he will gain all their Hearts; if he loves Truth, he will obtain their Confidence, and give no occasion of Jealousy; if he is diligent, his People will labour to improve themselves; if he is liberal, they will obey him with pleasure. — There are four sorts of Persons, says Confucius again, who ought to be odious to a wise Man. (1.) Those malignant Spirits, who love to publish the Faults of others. (2.) Those vile Wretches, who speak ill of their Princes. (3.) Those Men in power, who have no Sentiments of Humanity. (4.) Those bold and rash Men, who act without the least Reflection. Tsi kung, one of his Disciples taking up the Discourse. There are three others I sayed he, whom I cannot endure. (1.) Those gross and ignorant People, who would fain appear Judicious and Knowing. (2.) Those haughty and presumptuous Mortals, who affect Courage and Valour. (3.) Those satirical carping Spirits, who would be thought Just and Sincere. — There is one thing which appears to me very difficult, says Confucius again, that is, to govern Women and Servants: If you treat them with Gentleness and Familiarity, they lose all respect: If you make use of rigour, there will be continual Disturbances and Complaints.

In the eighteenth he speaks in Praise of some ancient Princes, or Emperors and their Ministers: He shews how hurtful the love of Women in a Prince is to good Government: He relates the Actions of certain Sages, who led a reclusive and obscure Life: He speaks afterwards of divers Musicians, which were formerly employed at Entertainments: Lastly, he sets down the Rules of good Government, in reciting the Instructions given by a Prince to his Son.

In the nineteenth, he shews what are the Duties of one who would acquire Wisdom; and after setting forth the Method of teaching his Disciples, he vindicates his Master Confucius from certain ill-grounded Reflections, and makes his Encomium. The following are some of his Maxims. He who is negligent in the Study of Wisdom, and of a light and wavering Temper, will never, during his Life, increase the Number of Sages, or diminish it when he dies. — When we are going to converse with a true Sage, we find him in three different Situations: When we perceive him at a Distance, his Countenance is grave and severe; when we draw near and discourse him, his Air and Behaviour is full of Sweetness and Affability; when we hear him speak, we are charmed with his Steadiness and Integrity. — A wise Minister ought in the first place to persuade the People that he loves them, and has their Interest at Heart; when he has gained this Point, he may without fear exact the Tribute of the People, who will not think themselves aggrieved: Next he should convince the Prince thoroughly of his fidelity and attachment to his Person, without which all his Counsels will be looked upon as Injuries. — Tho' the Emperor Chew was not so wicked as he is represented; yet as he has left a bad Character behind him, we commonly attribute all sorts of Crimes to him: For this reason, a wise Man avoids the very appearance of Vice, for fear he should be charged with many Vices, which in reality he was not guilty of.

The twentieth contains the Beginnings and Success of the wise Government of the Emperors Yau, Shun, Yu, Ching tang and Pü wang; with the Properties of a good Government, and the Defects of a bad one. All that they recommended to their Ministers and Subjects, was to follow that just Medium or Mean, in which Right reason and Virtue consists.

Meng tse,

Meng tse, or the Book of Mencius; being the fourth Classical, or Canonical Book of the second Order.

Abstract of the Book of Meng-tse.

MENG is the Name of the Author, and Tse denotes his Quality, as Doctor: Which implies that this Book was composed by the Doctor Meng. He was related to the Kings or Princes of the Kingdom of Lü, now the Province of Shan-tong, and the Disciple of Tse tse the Grand-son of Confucius. Su ma Author of the Annals of the Empire, who has collected the Precepts and Actions of the great Men, from the Emperor Tau, to the reign of the Dynasty of the Han, makes great Encomiums upon the Work of Mencius. None of the Disciples of Confucius, says he, has expressed that Philosopher's Sense and Energy so well; And whoever would be instructed in his Doctrine aright, ought to begin his Studies with the Work of Mencius.

His Book is divided into two Parts; the first containing six Chapters, and the second eight. He treats of good Government, almost throughout this Work: And as at that time, the whole Empire was filled with Commotions and civil Wars, above all things, he recommends Uprightness of Heart and Equity. For this reason, he proves, that the Re-establishment of Peace and Tranquility in the Empire, was not to be attain'd by the force of Arms, but by the Examples of Virtue. These Discourses are connected in form of Dialogues or Conversations, which he had either with his Disciples or with Princes. And the better to illustrate what he advances, he frequently makes use of Similitudes, and familiar Comparisons agreeable to the ancient Custom.

His design in this Work is reducible to four Heads. First, he much esteems and praises the Manner in which the Empire was governed, under the three first imperial Families, namely those of Hya, Shang and Chew. Secondly, he despises and disapproves of the Conduct of some Sovereigns, who imagined that they were able to re-establish Peace, by means of their Arms. Thirdly, he shews in what, the Goodness and Rectitude of human Nature consists. Fourthly, he refutes the dangerous Errors of some Sectaries.

Having premised this general Idea, I shall now enter into the Detail, and give an Abridgment of each Chapter.

PART I. CHAPTER I.

Dialogue between Meng tse and Prince of Gbey.

THE first Chapter contains a Dialogue, betwixt Mencius and the Prince of the Kingdom of Gbey, who after his Death was called Wbey wang. Wbey signifies beneficent, and Vang Prince; for which reason he is called likewise Lyang Wbey wang, that is to say, the beneficent King of Lyang or Gbey, which is now the Province of Ho nan, and its Capital Ta hyang is now called Kay song.

Princes should have no view but Piety and Equity.

The Prince of Lyang having invited the Philosophers into his Kingdom, Mencius repaired thither. The first Instruction he gives the Prince, is to have no other view in Government, but Piety and Equity. A Prince, he tells him, is a Pattern to his Subjects: If he seeks only to advance his particular Interests, his Ministers, the Mandarins, the Literati, and even the People, will regard nothing but theirs; and by this means the common Wealth must be neglected, and the Kingdom reduced to the Brink of ruin.

In the second Visit which Mencius made the Prince, he found him walking in his Park, and diverting himself with seeing the Swans swimming in the Pond, and the Deer running through the Forrest. Can a King, said that Prince, who is only intent upon the Government of his People, stoop to these Sorts of Amusements?

May recreate
well as other People.

Princes, answers Mencius, may take reasonable Diversions like other Men: We read in the Sbi king, that the wise Emperor Ven wang having drawn up the Plan of a Tower for astronomical Observations, a Park, and a Pond, the People ran with so much zeal to assist the Building, and were so eager in their Services to promote these Works, that they were finished in a very few Days.

That good Prince amused himself from time to time, with walking in his Avenues, in seeing his tame Deer running about, in observing his Fishes swimming, and his Storks flying. Whence proceeded the Zeal of that People, for contributing to the Pleasures of their Prince? Because he governed them with Piety and Justice, and because that wise Emperor took great care that his Subjects should be destitute of none of the Necessaries of Life.

On the contrary, the Emperor Kye, who used to say, that he was in the Empire, the same that the Sun is in the Firmament, and that he would perish only with that Luminary, felt no Joy amidst his Pleasures, and lived in continual Disquiet; because his People looked on him as an execrable and detestable Object.

Essential Duties of a good Government.

He then shews the Prince, that Inhabitants are never wanting in a Kingdom well governed: That it is an essential Part of good Government, to take Care that the Kingdom may abound with the Necessaries of Life; to see that the Lands are cultivated, that there be Plenty of Fish, and that Trees may be planted and pruned at proper Seasons; to be attentive in settling the the Divisions of Grounds, and in bringing up domestic Animals, and Silk-Worms, to be moderate in afflicting Punishments, or imposing Taxes, and to take care that the Morals of Youth be rightly formed: By these Means, a Prince gains the Affection of his People, and when he is Master of that, he will find no Difficulty in establishing Laws, in giving useful Instructions, and in erecting Schools.

But a Prince ought chiefly to assist his People in a Time of Famine. Very blameable and unworthy of a Throne, is that Prince, who, in such a Time, for his own Pleasure, maintains a Parcel of useless Beasts, that devour the Provisions necessary for the Subsistence of Mankind, while his Subjects are starving. Will you say, adds Mencius, that the Famine, and not you, is the Cause, why these People die. You may as well tell me, when you have run a Man through with a Sword; It was not I, but the Sword, which killed that Man; Where is the difference to a Person, whether he dies by the edge of the Sword, or under the Tyranny of his Prince? We naturally hate those wild Beasts, which kill and devour one another; but these are only Emblems of the Prince, who prefers the Lives of Brutes, to the Lives of his People, whom he ought to look upon as his Children.

Mencius seeing that no great advantage was reaped from his Instructions, in the Kingdom of Ghey, directed his course to the Kingdom of Tsi, at that time governed by Suen wang. This Prince being greedy of Glory won by Valour, said to the Philosopher, We have five Princes, whose heroick Atchievements make a great noise in the Empire: Two who have render'd their Names illustrious by their Conquests, are more particularly talk'd of. Inform me of their glorious Actions.

Confucius and his Disciples, answered Mencius, would have blushed to have praised these five Princes; or to have transmitted their warlike Virtues to Posterity; they, and I who am their Disciple, apply only to the Study of Virtue, and the Rules of good Government, as we have them in the Writings and Examples of our antient Emperors. Ha! what are these Rules? said the Prince. Equity and Piety, answered Mencius. If you possess the two Virtues, you will establish Peace and Tranquillity in your State: And you will love your People as your own Children.

But is that a Thing in my Power, replied the Prince. Do you doubt of that? said Mencius. Hu be your first Minister told me, that one Day as you were walking out of your Palace, you saw an Ox, whom they had bound, and were leading out of the Walls to be slaughtered; and that being melted with the Sight, you ordered the Ox to be carried back to his Stall. If the Death of a worthless Animal, could excite your Compassion, can your Heart be insensible, when you see the Miseries of your People? But you love the clashing of Arms, you delight in raising Troops, and are pleas'd to see your Subjects face Death and Danger.

By no means, says the Prince, that is none of my Pleasures: It is a violent Remedy which I use against my own Inclination, in order to gain what I want. Ha! replies Mencius, what can you want? Is not your Table furnished with exquisite Meats? Can your Habits be more Magnificent? or is there any thing wanting to sooth your Senses? Have you not a vast Croud of Domesticities, that watch your slightest Motions to serve you, and to execute your Orders? What can you wish for more?

These are Trifles, answered the Prince, my Views are more exalted. To what do you then aspire? replied Mencius. To extend your Kingdom? To subdue the neighbouring Nations? To invade the Empire? That is as idle as if you should mount to the Top of that Tree, expecting there to find Fishes.

Nay, replies the Prince, you now carry you Reflections too far. By no means, said Mencius, I have not said enough: For he who climbs to the Top of that Tree to find Fishes; it is true, gives himself a very needless Trouble, but then no Body suffers besides Himself: His Undertaking, vain as it is, never harms the Common-wealth, and is never attended with any publick Calamity. But by the Wars which you carry on, you torment your self with a thousand Troubles and Disquiets, you drain your Kingdom and plunge it into the most frightful Misery. Believe me, Sir; Direct all your Views only to the Government of your State: Endeavour all you can to render your People happy; take Care they are reasonably provided with all Necessaries: See that the Grounds are cultivated, and that Plenty reigns; Watch over the Reformation of Manners, and the Education of Youth: Where Tyranny obtains, the People will abandon that Land, and crowd to taste the Sweets of your Government; and in short, they will count it a Happiness, that their Days should gently glide on, and their Lives terminate under the peaceable Sway of so moderate and so virtuous a Prince.

CHAPTER II.

KING Suen wang owned to Mencius, that he was much delighted with Music: The Philosopher, far from condemning this Taste, told him, That it might be very useful to good Government, because of the Relation betwixt the Harmony of Sounds and that of Hearts; and because Harmony, or the well regulated Concert of many Sounds, is a sensible Image of the Union, which ought to subsist betwixt the Head and Members of the Body Politic. But, that this Harmony and good Understanding cannot subsist, if the Prince studies only his own Diversions; and is so far from sharing them with the People, that he suffers them to be plunged into Sadness and Misery. This is the Source of Disaffection and Murmurings.

The Prince shifted the Subject. I have heard, said he, that Ven wang's Park was seventy Chinese Furlongs in Circumference, and yet that the People thought it too little. Mine is but forty, and my Subjects think it too large. How can we account for these different Judgments of the People?

I will inform you, answered Mencius: Every body was allowed to enter the Park of Ven wang, to carry off what Wood or Pulse he had a mind; and to hunt the Pheasants and Hares. The Entry of the Park was shut to none, for which reason, the People thought it too little. When I came into your Territories, I informed my self of the Usages in your Kingdom, that I might observe them, and likewise of the Restrictions and Prohibitions, that I might not infringe them. I was told that you had a Park forty Furlongs in Circumference: That all your Subjects were debarred from it; and that if any one was so bold as to venture to kill or to wound any of your Deer in it, he was punished as severely as if he had killed or wounded a Man: Are you astonished after this, that your People should think your Park too large?

The Prince, who by no means relish'd this Advice, ask'd another Question; Teach me, said he, What I shall do to preserve Peace in my State, and to gain the Friendship of the Princes my Neighbours? Two Things, replies the Philosopher: 1. Be obliging, friendly, and always ready to serve those who are weaker; 2. Be respectful and submissive to those who are stronger than yourself. He then exhorts him not to abandon himself to the Transports of a fiery and impetuous Temper; shewing him, That real Strength consists in curbing his Anger and subduing his Passions, and that true Wisdom has no Aim but pure Equity.

The Prince, having at another time admitted Mencius into his Pleasure-house, Has so delicious a Mansion, said he, nothing inconsistent with the Wisdom that a King ought to profess? No, answered Mencius, if that King shares in the Joy, and sympathises in the Grief of his Subjects: If he tastes the Pleasures, and feels the Pains of his People; they, in Return, will partake of his Grievs, and share in his Joys: It is by these means, that a Kingdom is rightly governed.

The ancient Emperors, added Mencius, paid every twelfth Year a Visit to their tributary Kings and Kingdoms: And this Visit was called Inspection. Every sixth Year these Kings repaired to the Court of the Emperor, there to give an Account of their Conduct, and after what Method they govern'd their States.

In the same Manner, the Emperors within their Territories, and the Kings in their Kingdoms, made two yearly Progresses: The first in the Spring, to examine if the Lands had been carefully sowed and tilled: And if in any Place Seed was wanting, wherewith to sow them; they furnish'd it out of the public Granaries. The second Progress was in Autumn, at the time when the Crop is gathered in: And if it was not sufficient to subsist the People, they opened the public Granaries for their Relief.

Very different from this, is the Conduct of modern Princes. It is true, they visit their Kingdoms. But in what Manner? They march attended with near three Thousand Soldiers, who devour the greatest Part of the Provisions necessary to subsist the poor People, who are faint and languishing with Hunger. Shall we wonder, in the Bitterness of Soul and the Oppression under which they groan, if they seek some Relief from their Murmurings, and the perpetual Invectives with which they tear in Pieces the Reputations of their Princes. Thus, I have laid before you the Conduct of our ancient and modern Princes, and leave it to yourself; which of them you will chuse to imitate.

He afterwards proposes the Emperor Ven wang as a Pattern. This Prince exacted no other Tax from Husbandmen than the ninth Part of their Crop: He assigned Pensions to the Sons and the Grand-sons of the deceased Mandarins. No Custom-houses were known in his Dominions. Merchandizes were there exported and imported without being taxed: None were then debarred from fishing in Lakes and public Rivers: If a Criminal was to be punished, as he transgressed in Person, so he was chastised in Person; nor did his Punishment reach, as at present, to his Wife and Children. In short, this Prince, tho' he distinguished every Moment of his Reign by Goodness and Clemency, yet he extended their Effects principally to four Sorts of Persons: To old Men who had no Wives: To Widows: To old Men who were childless; and to young Orphans who were fatherless. These four Species of Unhappiness, appear'd to him most worthy of Compassion; because being destitute of all human Aid, they had no other Recourse but to the Goodness of their Prince; who, tho' he is the Father of all his Subjects, is more particularly so of those, who are most helpless.

What would you say, Sir, continued Mencius; if he, who is at the Head of the supreme Tribunal of Justice, did not watch over the Conduct of his inferior Officers, and was at no Pains to be informed of the Manner in which the Magistrates administer Justice, if he suffer'd the Innocent to be punish'd, and the Guilty to escape? I would displace him, answer'd the Prince. But, adds the Philosopher, if a King neglects the Care of his Kingdom, and if he never minds the Instruction of his People, nor compassionates their Miseries; if he protects not the unhappy and the forlorn, what is your Opinion of him? At these Words, the Prince blush'd, and appeared disconcerted: He threw his Eyes from the one Side to the other, as if he had been distracted, and dismiss'd the Philosopher without any Answer.

Mencius in another Conference, instructs the Prince in the right Choice of his Ministers. He advises him not to give too much Credit to the Recommendations of private Men, who might surprize him; nor even to the Voice of the People, upon whom it was easy to impose: But to have a personal Knowledge of their Probity, their Disinterestedness, their Zeal and their Understandig:

derstanding: He then recommends to his Choice, such as have incessantly applied to the Study of Wisdom from their Childhood, and, by their Labour and Application, have acquired at their riper Age the Qualifications necessary for right Government.

CHAPTER III.

THIS Chapter contains a Dialogue betwixt Mencius and his Disciple Kung sung chew, upon the Art of Governing. He proves from a View of the Troubles which then harassed the Empire, and the Miseries which afflicted the People in several Kingdoms; that it was easy for a Prince who reigned with Justice and Moderation, to gain the Affection of all, and to make himself universal Monarch. But where, continued he, can we find a Prince with these Qualifications? Those happy Days, when Kingdoms were governed by wise Princes, are no more, and scarce the Memory of them remains.

There is farther required in a Governor a stable and an unshaken Soul, both when he determines in a puzzling Case, and when he is exposed to Danger. He then cites many Examples of those great Men whom nothing could shake; and who might be deprived of their Lives, but not of their Intrepidity and Courage.

He distinguishes Resolution into two Kinds, one, peculiar to narrow Minds, the other, to great Souls. The former is directed by the first Torrent of an impetuous Ardour; the last by the Dictates of right Reason. I remember, says Mencius, that our Master Confucius formerly gave me two Rules, in which I can easily discern true Fortitude, and a genuine Greatness of Soul. If an Opportunity shall offer to fight, said he, and if, after mature Deliberation, I perceive that it would be unjust in me to attack mine Enemy, even tho' he is a great deal weaker than me, and unable to make Head against me, or to keep the Victory one Moment in Suspence, yet I would forbear to attack him. You may easily perceive from this, that it is not Cowardise that damps me. But if after due Reflection, I am convinced that it is just in me to make the Onset, tho' I had Millions to encounter, nothing should be able to stop me from plunging undaunted amongst the thickest Battalions.

Mencius next proceeds to the Manner of right Government. There is a great deal of difference, said he, betwixt the Conduct of our ancient Emperors, and our modern Princes: The first loved Peace, and the latter, War: The first by their Piety and exemplary Virtue, commanded not only the Hands, but the Hearts of Men; the latter command the Hands but not the Hearts.

Where is the Prince, whose ruling Passion is not for Glory? Or who has an Aversion to whatever can sully his Reputation? Glory is only won by Virtue, and Disgrace can be occasioned only by Vice. Whence then can it proceed, that Princes who so much dread Infamy among Men, should abandon themselves to their Passions and Vices? In this, they are like Men who cannot bear with Dampness, yet want to lodge in a low and moist Apartment. If they are so jealous of their Reputation, why do they not take the only method both for establishing and preserving it? This Method is to subdue their corrupt Inclinations, to esteem Virtue, to wage no War but with Vices, to honour the Learned, to raise the Wise and Virtuous to the first Dignities, and to take advantage of the public Tranquillity for establishing wise and useful Laws; a Prince of this Character renders himself always formidable to his Enemies, and attracts the Esteem and Veneration of his Equals.

But what is the present Practice? While the Empire is peaceable, and the People begin to taste the Sweets of Tranquillity, the Princes study only to abandon themselves to Pleasure, and to effeminate themselves more and more by Luxury and Idleness. Is it to be wondered at, if under a Prince of this Character, a Kingdom appears to totter, if the People murmur, and if they are upon the Point of being attacked by new Enemies?

There is none, continued Mencius, but receives from Nature a certain Tendernefs of Heart, which gives them a sensibility of their Neighbours misery. A Prince whose Passions have not stifled this natural Propensity, and who pities the Afflictions of his People, has no more difficulty in governing his Kingdom, than if he could hold it in his Hand.

But how can this secret Propensity of Nature, this Sensibility with which we are born be discerned? An Example will instruct you. You see a Child all of a sudden ready to fall into a Well; your Heart is immediately touched, and you fly to save it. You are not then determined by Reflection, nor influenced by the thoughts of deserving the Acknowledgments of the Father and the Mother, or of procuring to yourself an empty Honour; you act by an Impulse purely natural. In unforeseen Events, and when there is no Time either for Reflection or Deliberation, it is genuine Nature that acts. It is not so at other Junctures, which admit of Deliberation before Action; for there Disguise and Dissimulation may enter.

What I have said of Compassion, adds Mencius, I apply to the other Virtues: To Piety, to Equity, to Humanity, and to Prudence: We have the Seeds and Principles of them all in our Heart, and if we took care to follow the Hints they give us, we should be in a continual Guard against the Passions that are alone able to destroy them, and every Day perfect ourselves more and more.

One of the Disciples of Confucius, whose Name was Tse lu, had so great a desire for Perfection, that it gave him an exquisite Pleasure when he was told of any Fault. The Emperor Tu immediately bestowed marks of his Respect and Acknowledgment upon the Man who gave gave him good Advice. The great Szun, regarding Virtue not as the property of a particular Person, but as a common Good belonging to all Mankind; he made an Advantage of, and studied to acquire, all the Perfections and Virtues which he saw in others. This he put in Practice, through all the Degrees of his Life, not only while he was Husbandman in the Plains of Lye shan, a Potter in the City of Ho pin, or a Fisherman upon the Lake Lú i tse, but even when he was Emperor.

When a Man endeavours thus to appropriate to himself the Virtues which he remarks in others, he renders Virtue common to all. For in profiting by another's Example, he sets the same Example to others, that they may profit in their Turn.

C A A P T E R IV.

MENCIUS continues the Conversation, which he had begun in the preceeding Chapter, with his Disciple. He treats first of three Things which are necessary to Success in War; namely, the Choice of Time, the Advantage of Ground, and the Concord and Union of such as either attack or defend a Place. But he judges the last Circumstance more absolutely, and more especially, necessary.

I shall suppose, says he, that a City is in the best State of Defence, both by the height of its Walls, the deepness of its Ditches, the number and bravery of its Garrison; and in short by the plenty of its Provisions. With all these Advantages, if there is Discord among Troops, or if a Misunderstanding divides the Officers and the Soldiers, the City will be carried soon, and without much Resistance.

One of the Disciples of Mengius, a little after, puts a Question to him which he thought would puzzle him: I perceive, said he to his Master, in the different Kingdoms where you have resided, you sometimes accepted, and sometimes refused the Presents proffered you by their Kings. You have refused 2400 Taels of fine Silver from the King of Tsi, yet made no scruple to accept of 1680 from the King of Song, and of 1200 from the King of Sye. I find no uniformity in this Conduct: The same Reason that made you refuse the Presents of the one, ought to have induced you to have refused those of the others.

You are mistaken, answered Mengius: I did nothing but what was agreeable to the Lights of Reason and Equity. While I was in the Kingdom of Song, and ready to make a long Voyage, it was both polite and equitable in the Prince, to supply me with Money for defraying my necessary Expences, consequently, I had a good Reason for accepting his Present. The Kingdom of Sye, while I was there, re-founded with the noise of Arms, and was threatened by an immediate Irruption of the Enemy: Amidst these Tumults I run the risque of being starved, and it was but reasonable that the Prince, who had invited me into his Dominions, should provide for my Subsistence. But as to what concerns the King of Tsi, as he had no Reason to give me a Present, so I had none to accept of it, which if I had done, it had been a shameful Avarice in me, and unworthy of a Man, who had spent his Life in the Study of Wisdom.

Mengius having gone to the City of Ping lo, which was in the Kingdom of Tsi, he found the Country lying waste through a general Barrenness: One half of the numerous Inhabitants perished of Hunger, and the other half left the ungrateful Soil to seek for Food in more distant Kingdoms. Mengius addressing himself to Kiw sin, who was Governor of the City; If any of your Soldiers, said he, while upon Duty, should five times successively desert his Rank, would you not punish him? I would not wait for his doing it three times, replies the Governor, for I would punish him the first time. You are in the right, replies Mengius; but you condemn yourself for neglecting what is more important in your Charge. During these melancholy Years of Barrenness; the People perish of Hunger and Misery: I see many stooping under the weight of Years, who fall with meer Weakness into the Ditches, and there finish their unhappy Lives; I see others, and these are the greater Number, who being young, and full of Vigour, rove from one End of the Empire to the other, to seek whereupon to live. Alas! replies Kiw sin, sin, I lament these Calamities, and I wish I were able to apply a Remedy. But I have no Authority to cause the Granaries to be opened, or to exempt the People from their Tributes. If a rich Man, replies Mengius, should commit to you the Care of his Flocks, and would not assign them proper Pasturage, what would you do? You are the Pastor of this great People: And you ought to address yourself to the King, to relieve their Miseries and to supply their Necessities: If the King will not hear you, can you calmly see them die of Hunger, and will not you rather throw up your Government?

Mengius finding that the wise Councils which he gave to the King of Tsi and his Ministers were all lost, resolved to retire to his native Country. One of his Disciples called Tu who attended him in his Voyage, observing a certain Cloud of Sadness and Melancholy hanging on his Countenance, said to him; I have often heard you say, that a wise Man is never uneasy, if Heaven no longer favours his Undertakings; and that he never complains when Men refuse to conform themselves to his Maxims; yet you have a melancholy Air which is far from being natural to you, and doubtless is a mark of some secret Discontent.

No, replies Mengius, I complain neither of Heaven nor of Men: I am only gay or sad, according to my different Situation. When I led a private and a solitary Life, I was employed only in the Study of Wisdom. But at present, while I teach my Doctrine to Princes and People, and while I have the public Good in View, I am melancholy.

CHAPTER V.

THIS Chapter contains a Dialogue betwixt Mençius and Prince Ven kung, Heir of the Principality of Teng. The Philosopher shews him, that every Man is capable of practising Virtue, and imitating the Sages; because the Goodness of Nature which we receive from Tyen [Heaven,] is the same in all Men, and this Goodness is no other than a natural Inclination to Justice and Piety.

When Passions grow up with Years, said he, if Reason moderates them, Nature then perfects herself, and the Man becomes virtuous. He next proposes the Emperors Tau and Shun for Patterns. Think not, continues the Philosopher, that the Virtues of these Heroes can't be attained. They were Men like you, and according to the Endeavours you use, and the Application which you give, you may become wise like them. All I fear is, lest you should be discouraged with the Difficulties you must encounter in your Endeavours to subdue your Passions, to practise Virtue, and to learn the right Art of Government. The Sbu king informs us, that the Medicine, which does not work the Patient, is ineffectual: In the same manner, a Prince reaps no Advantage from the Instructions of wise Men, if he does not struggle to vanquish himself. Prince Ven kung's Father dying at this Juncture, he consulted Mençius in what manner he should pay the last Duties to him, the better to shew his Affection. You must, answer'd Mençius, observe the Rules prescribed by the Rites to those who are really respectful to their Fathers. The Mourning should continue for three Years; and during that time, they ought to lay down all public Posts, to be employed only in their just Grievs, to cloath themselves in coarse Stuffs, and to subsist only upon the most ordinary Rice.

I have learned from Confucius, added he, that formerly, when the Emperor dyed, his Son who succeeded him, caused a mean Hut to be built without the second Gate of the Palace, where he passed three Years in mourning for his Father, in prostrating himself both Morning and Evening before his * Coffin, and living on the coarsest Rice. During that time, the Prime Minister governed the Empire. The Mandarins and the Grandeess, after the Example of their Princes, strove who should give the greatest Marks of their Grief, and the Mourning became general throughout all the Empire.

Prince Ven kung resolv'd to follow this Advice: But as the Rites in the Province of Teng prescribe only five Months of Mourning for a King, he past that Time in bewailing his Father. When the Day for carrying the Corps to the Burying-Place was fixt, Curiosity drew from all Parts of the Empire a prodigious multitude of Spectators, who beheld the Prince following the funeral Pomp with a pale emaciated Countenance, sending up Sighs, which came from the Bottom of his Heart, and melted them into Tears.

These Strangers, returning home after the funeral Solemnity was over, were so many Tongues which proclaimed every where the Piety of Ven kung, and revived the Practice of the ancient Ceremonies instituted in Honour of the Dead, which till that Time had been much neglected.

Ven kung intending himself to govern his Kingdom, desired Mençius to give him some Rules which might direct him to govern wisely. The first Object, says the Philosopher, a King ought to regard, is his People; what principally touches the People, is their Subsistence: The means of their Subsistence are the Lands, when diligently cultivated, and abundantly producing the Necessaries of Life. Agriculture then ought to be looked into, and the greatest Care taken that the Lands do not lie idle: The People will then have whereupon to live, and being under no Apprehensions of Want, they will endeavour to reform their Manners, and to acquire Virtue.

On the contrary, if they find themselves in Want, all their Passions will soon break loose; for there is no Crime but what Necessity and Indigence will drive them to commit: When their Wants are excessive, the Rigour of their Laws, and the Severity of Punishments will be Curbs too weak to restrain them. For this reason, wise Princes formerly lived with a great deal of Modesty and Frugality; the former Virtue inducing them to treat their People with Moderation, and the latter preventing their imposing too severe Taxes: This made an able Mandarin say, "That a Prince who aimed at Riches, could never arrive at Virtue; and the Prince who desired to be virtuous, could never be rich."

Mençius next exhorts Ven kung to establish public Schools, for teaching the Practice of Virtue. He then points out the Manner in which the Partition and Division of Lands ought to be made, so that neither the Husbandman, nor the Officers of the King might wrong one another. In short, said he, if you practise exactly all I have told you, I dare not say that you will one Day attain to Imperial Dignity; but I can boldly pronounce, that Emperors will form themselves upon you, and take you for their Pattern.

The Prince profited by the Instructions of the Philosopher; and by the wise Distribution which he made of the Lands, and his Care to have them well cultivated, he soon saw Plenty flourish in his Dominions. The Reputation he gained, engaged a great many Strangers to settle in his Kingdom, and to petition for Lands which they might cultivate.

Among these Strangers there were some Sectaries, who propagated a very dangerous Opinion, and very contrary to good Government. They pretended, that a wise Prince ought to live upon his own Labour, in the same manner as the People; that he ought to till the Land, and to eat nothing carried to the Burying Place.

Chinese Levellers in the Time of Mençius.

nothing but what was the Fruit of the Ground cultivated by his Royal Hands. Mengius refuted these Sectaries in the following Manner: Addressing himself to Shin syang, who was become their Disciple, Why, says he, do those of your Sect confine themselves to labouring the Land? Why don't they make their own Cloaths? Why don't they forge their own Spades, and their other Instruments of Agriculture, together with the Kettles wherein they boil their Rice, and in short, every Thing else they make use of in their way of Life? Would not this be better than to run about to Merchants and Tradesmen's Shops to buy these different Utensils?

This, replied Shin syang, is impossible; Agriculture employs a Man entirely. If Husbandmen shall attempt to make all the Instruments you have named, they must neglect the Care of the Lands, which will then become barren.

Wisely spoken, replied Mengius, Is it then a small Affair to govern a Kingdom? Is not that Employment enough for all the Moments of a Prince? He, doubtless, will have a great deal of Leisure to work with his Subjects in cultivating the Ground.

This Comparison stopped the Mouth of Shin syang. Mengius then shews him, that it was necessary there should be different Employments and Professions in a Kingdom; that one Man could not have Time to look after every thing; that the Emperor Yau divided the Toils of Government with his Ministers, for the greater Ease and Instruction of his People; and that this, in a Prince, is called universal Piety, and extends indifferently to all his Subjects.

He then opposes the same Sectaries, who wanted to establish an Equality in the Prices of all Goods, so that a coarse Stuff should be sold as dear as the finest.

In short, he concludes this Chapter by refuting the Doctrine of another Sect, which pretended that all Men ought to be loved alike, without making any Difference betwixt Relations and Strangers. He points out the ridiculous Absurdity of this Opinion, and then shews that the Custom established in all Ages, of bestowing a more honourable Burial upon Parents than on others, arose from the greater Degree of Love with which Nature inspires Children.

CHAPTER VI.

MENCIUS in this Chapter instructs Shin tay his Disciple, and shews him the Manner in which a wise Man, who professes to teach the Art of living and of reigning well, ought to behave. Amongst other things, he tells him, that such a Man should beware not to introduce himself in an undecent Manner into the Palaces of Princes, and that he ought to take care to be invited, and even prest before he goes thither: That as the meanest Artist would blush to deviate from the Rules of his Art, so a wise Man ought to discover in all his Conduct the Uprightness of his Heart, the Decency of his Manners, and the Equity of his Actions: That if he seeks to raise himself to Dignities, in order more successfully to propagate his Doctrine, he ought to use no Methods but those which Justice prescribes: If he remains in a private Condition, he ought to be easy, since, even then, he deserves equally to be honoured on account of the Excellence of his Doctrine.

The first Minister of the Kingdom of Song having made a visit to Mengius, communicated to him a Design he had to abolish the disagreeable Custom that had been introduced, of burthening the People with Imposts; declaring that he wish'd to revive the ancient Laws, which exact only the Tithe of the Crop to be paid in Tribute, and prohibit the taxing any foreign Merchandize imported into the Kingdom: But, adds he, as these wise Laws have been long disused, and seem now to be entirely forgotten, I think they ought not to be re-establish'd all at once: In my Opinion, it will be better to gain that End by slow and imperceptible Degrees: What is your Opinion? I shall answer your Question, said Mengius, only by a familiar Comparison. A certain Person had gotten into a Habit of stealing some Hens every Day from his Neighbours; One of his Friends, who discovered him, had the Courage to tell him, that it was a shameful Action, and unworthy of a Man either of Honour or Honesty. I own it, answered the Doctor: But as it is a Vice now too deeply rooted in my Nature for me to correct it all of a sudden, I will take this Course: I'll steal only one Fowl in a Month, and in time I may come entirely to give over this Habit. What is your Opinion? replies Mengius, Don't you think that this Man, who acknowledged and detested his Vice, should immediately have corrected it?

About that Time, two Sects infected the Empire with their wicked Doctrines; Yang was the Author of the one, and Me of the other. Mengius being a zealous Defender of the ancient Doctrine, was continually refuting their Errors. This, at first, made him pass for a factious ill-natured Man, and one who loved to be disputing. One of his Disciples, zealous for his Master's Glory, told him that the Strangers, whose Opinion he opposed, run him down on all sides, and made him pass for an eternal Caviller.

I wish, replies Mengius, that I could condemn myself to Silence all the rest of my Days: But that is not allowed me; my Duty obliges me to put a Violence upon my Inclination, and to oppose this Torrent of dangerous Opinions, with which they would overthrow the Empire. Ever since the wise Reigns of the Emperors Yau and Shun, under the Shadow of whose Authority the People lived easy, we have seen a continual Vicissitude of good and bad Government. The Emperors who succeeded these wise Princes, applied only to their Pleasures, and abusing their Power, oppressed the poor People by their Exactions and Violence: Some of them beat down the Houses of vast Numbers of their Subjects, there to make Ponds, Lakes and Reservoirs: Others drove the People out of their Villages and Fields, which they turned into Parks, Gardens, and Places of Pleasure: Whole Districts were soon changed into Forests, which served as the Retreat of Tygers, wild Boars, and Leopards. Such were the Amusements of these Princes, who reduced their People to the most terrible Want. Cheu, who succeeded them in the Throne, by his Cruelties, compleated their Tyranny. At last, the Cries and Groans of the People touched the Heart of Vu vang, who declared War against, and dethroned, the Tyrant.

This Prince, when Master of the Empire, applied himself to restore its primitive Lustre, and to procure the Happiness of his Subjects: He demolished those Gardens, Parks, Forests, and Houses of Pleasure, and restored to the People the Lands that were their Property. The Face of the Empire was soon changed, and after so many Miseries and Calamities the People began to take Breath. But these happy Times were of no long Continuance: The Princes who succeeded him, insensibly lost a Disposition to Virtue: The Laws were weakened, and the wise Maxims that taught the Art of Reigning were no longer inculcated; the Empire saw itself plunged again into its former Barbarity: So that the Virtues peculiar to a reasonable Soul, I mean, Love for a Parent, and Respect for a Prince, were almost quite annihilated.

Then appeared Confucius, who, touched at this general Blindness, endeavoured to prevent the Ruin of the Empire, by reforming the Manners, by reviving the ancient Laws, and by setting before the Eyes, both of the Princes and People, those great Actions of the Emperors and Kings, who reigned gloriously for about 200 Years. This is the Subject of his Book intitled Spring and Autumn. His Instructions and Maxims were attended to, and applauded; nay there was no resisting him, so that every one endeavour'd to conform himself to his Morals. But is there now any Footstep of the Reformation he wrought? Where are the Emperors whose Virtue and Wisdom rendered them respected by the People? In what are Kings now employed? Do not we see them tread upon the Laws of Justice, that they may destroy and tear one another to Pieces by the most cruel Wars? How many ignorant and impious Professors take the Advantage of these Disorders to propagate their pernicious Maxims, and to establish their dangerous Sects? Such is that of Yang shu, who, without regarding the public Good, teaches that every one ought to mind only Himself and his own Interest, and is a professed Enemy of all Governors! Such is that of Me tyé, who, ignorant of the strict Ties of Blood, and laying it down as a Principle, That all Men ought to be loved alike, destroys the filial Affections, and makes no difference betwixt a Father and a Stranger.

These Sectaries have already gained Profelites among the Literati, who reject the ancient Doctrine as handed down to them by our Sages, that they may follow the pernicious Maxims of these blind Professors. What shall become of good Order, Peace, and the public Tranquility, if these Sectaries are not soon checked? We have Instances in all Ages of great Men, who have supported the Empire when she was upon the very Brink of her Ruin. The celebrated Tu stopp'd the Inundation of Waters, and restored Plenty. Prince Cheu-kong subdued and put to flight the Barbarous Nations that poured in from the South and North, and re-established Tranquillity. Confucius revived the Vigour of the ancient Laws, and opposed the pernicious Designs of some Rebels. At present, when a general Infection gains ground on all Sides, by corrupting the Understanding, and destroying the good Morals of Mankind; ought not I, after the Example of these great Men, to do my best to stop its Progress, and thereby to preserve the Empire.

Mengius ends this Discourse by laying down the Rules of true Temperance, and by shewing how ridiculous those Encomiums are, which are bestowed upon a Man who affects a vain Appearance of Sobriety.

PART II. CHAPTER I.

FROM a View of the Conduct of some Princes, who in the Government of their States follow only their own Caprices, and neglect the ancient Laws, Mengius makes the following Reflections:

A Workman however skilful he is, can never succeed in what he works, if he does not make use of Compasses and a Rule. He who precedes in a Concert, will make a wretched Discord of the finest Music, if he does not employ twelve Flutes, some short, some long, that there may be a Harmony betwixt the Voices and the Instruments. It is the same with a Prince; his State will be in Disorder and Confusion, if he does not regulate his Conduct by the Laws of good Government which the Ancients have left us.

The Ancients invented the different Utensils; Compasses, the Rule, the Manner of Leveling, Weights, Measures, and all the other Instruments which we at this Day use with so much Success, in finishing Buildings, and the other Works that are useful to the public Weal. They likewise, by a constant Application, endeavoured to transmit to their Posterity the Art of good Government among them, by establishing the wisest Laws, from which we have learned those of Equity, Civility and Politeness: These have taught us how to divide the Ground, to plant Trees, to breed Animals which are useful to the Support of Life, and to establish Schools for instructing the People in good Morals. A Prince, who is at no Pains to observe these Laws, can never wisely govern his Kingdom.

The Ministry of a Prince, continued Mengius, who does not reign according to the Rules of Equity, can be composed only of grovelling Souls, who will flatter his Inclinations, and take no care to enforce the Observation of the Laws. Under him, the Crowd of Mandarins, who commonly follow the Air of a Court, will seek only after the Honours and Profits of their Posts, and neglect their Duties. The People, seeing this general Disregard both of Law and Justice, will no longer have any Thing to restrain them. They will no longer fear to infringe the Laws of the Empire, they will live without any Curb, and give a loose to all their Passions. I ask, if a Kingdom can long subsist in such a Condition?

A Prince then must be a Lover of Wisdom and Equity: A Minister ought to be faithful to his Prince, and ready to execute his Orders. But how can he be faithful, if he studies only to please him, and to sooth his Passions; if he does not set before his Eyes the heroick Virtues of our ancient Emperors, these noblest Patterns to every wise Prince.

Mencius then shews that nothing contributes more to the Destruction of a Kingdom, than the unjust Exercise of the Royal Prerogative.

There is an Art, continued he, in maintaining Authority; which is, by keeping the People within the Bounds of the Fidelity they owe to their Prince. The Means of rendering them faithful are, by gaining their Hearts; and their Hearts are easily gain'd, when Authority is directed by the Love of Justice, and a hearty Zeal for the public Weal. An Otter, who is constantly spreading Snares for Fish, obliges them to conceal themselves in the Bottom of the Water; and a Kite, who is always soaring in the Air over the little Birds, makes them to tremble, and forces them to retire into the Hollows of the Trees; in the same manner, these barbarous Princes Kye and Cheu, by scattering Fear and Terror among the People, forced them to seek an Asylum under the wise Princes Ching tang and Vu vang, whose Clemency, Justice, and Moderation are universally celebrated.

The Effects of Cheu's Tyranny over his People are well known. The Prince Pei on the one Side, and the wise Tay kong on the other, escaped his Cruelties by privately retiring to the Seashores. The Fame of Prince Ven vang's great Virtues, his Piety, his Clemency, his Justice, the Goodness of his tender and compassionate Heart, together with the Care he took of the Aged, the Minors, Widows, and Orphans resounded on all Sides. What are we doing here? said these two Sages. Let us repair to that wise King, and for ever devote ourselves to his Service. Accordingly they did so; but with what an Impression were the People struck, when they saw the Conduct of these two Men, so illustrious by their Birth and Employments, and so venerable by their Age and Virtues, and who were looked upon as the Fathers of their Country? Their Examples brought over the whole Empire; Cheu was abandoned by his Subjects, and forced to descend from his Throne, which he resigned to Ven vang.

Some Princes, adds Mencius, affect to appear gentle, affable, sober and moderate. But these are only the dissembled Virtues of an Outside; they are Virtues which are Strangers to their Hearts, and belied by their Actions. Are they in reality affable, while they have a Contempt for their Subjects? Are they sober and temperate, while their Avarice is insatiable, and their oppressive Exactions upon their People are endless? True Clemency consists in the right Affections of the Heart, and not in exterior Grimace, an affected Tone, an obliging Smile, or the tinsel Appearance of an unnatural Gentleness.

The Eyes of a Man are frequently the Interpreters of his Heart. The candid, upright, generous Soul, is often read by a Brightness, which gently beams in the Look. On the contrary, Vice, Falshood, and Dissimulation, are discovered by a certain Gloom that overcasts it. In short, the good or bad Affections of the Heart are displayed to public View, by a corresponding Series of virtuous or vicious Actions.

A Disciple of Mencius asked him, Whence it happened that so many wise Persons, who tenderly loved their Children, intrusted their Education into other Hands? That, answered our Philosopher, is the Effect of their Wisdom. Is it not true, that when a Son does not improve by the Instructions of a Father, and if he hears his Precepts with an Air of Discontent, the Father won't fail to be dissatisfied with the intractable Boy? What is then the Consequence? The natural Temper of the Son is fower'd; he proceeds even to reproach his Father in the following Terms: "You lay down for me a Plan of Life, which is contrary to your own Practice. Your Maxims and your Actions appear to me contradictory." The Minds of both will thenceforward be disunited; the Love of the Father will cool, and the Submission and Tendernefs of the Son insensibly decay: Discord will ensue in the Family, than which nothing can be more destructive to good Order.

Faults that sometimes insinuate into Filial Duties.

Advice to Children to endeavour to reclaim vicious Parents.

He concludes this Chapter with observing three Faults, which frequently steal into filial Respect. The first is, When a Son perceives some Weaknesses in his Father, and yet, without losing any of the Respect he owes him, has not recourse to an ingenious Artifice, which may reclaim him to Virtue, after the Example of Prince Shun, who having a very vicious Father, redoubled every Day his Application and Endearments, still contriving Ways to divert him; that he might insinuate himself so far into his Affections, as to win him over to the Love and the Practice of Virtue. The second Fault is, When a Son has poor Parents, yet takes no care to relieve them, or to provide for their Subsistence. The third and last is, When a Son neglects to marry, and to perpetuate the filial Duties in his Posterity, by practising, several times every Year, the Ceremonies prescribed in Honour of deceased Parents.

CHAPTER II.

MENCIOUS shews in this Chapter, that the wise Emperors, who have reigned successively, have always observed the same Conduct in Government, and the same manner of Living, and that their Favours were not confined to particular Persons, but more universal, and extended in in general to all their Subjects. Upon this the Philosopher related a generous Action of Tse Shan, the first Minister of the Kingdom of Schin, which was universally applauded. Being to pass a River where it was fordable, he perceived a poor Man who was on foot, and durst not venture to take the Ford. The Minister, touched with Compassion, took him into his Chariot and carried him to the other Side.

That Mandarin, replied Mengcius, undeniably had a beneficent Inclination: Yet I can never allow that he had Abilities for governing a State. Wise Princes have always taken care to cause Bridges to be built for the public Convenience; and it was never heard of, that during their Reign the Commerce of the People was ever interrupted by the difficulty of passing a River.

Mengcius then lays down a good many Rules of Prudence. He tells us, that we ought to be very reserved with respect to our Neighbours Failings, lest we indiscreetly publish them to the World. He tells us, that all Extreams are Vice, and even Virtue itself, when carried to excess, is no longer Virtue: That every thing about Confucius was natural, and that in his Discourse and Actions, he always discovered a modest Character, removed from all Vanity or Ostentation: That the Loss would not be great, if Calumny only hurted herself: But that the great Misfortune is, the Loss which the Public sustains from her Malignity, by keeping back from Dignities and Posts Men of Virtue who were most capable to fill them.

Syn, one of his Disciples, asked him why Confucius stopt so often at the Bank of a Rivulet: It is true, said he, that Philosopher made every thing tend to the Instruction of the People: But I cannot see what he could find in the gliding of the Water, and the softness of its Murmur, that could be of use to the Reformation of Manners.

Then I must tell you, answered Mengcius. By attentively considering that Rivulet, which issued Night and Day from its Source, and which calmly continued its Course to the Sea, without being stopped by the Inequality of the Ground, or the Gulfs it met with in its Channel, he found an inexhaustible Fund of Reflection. Behold, said he, a natural Image of the Man who draws the Rules of his Conduct from Truth, as from a Fountain-head, and whom no Obstacle can hinder from arriving at Perfection in Virtue.

After this, he passes to the Use that a Man ought to make of Reason, which is the only Thing that distinguishes Men from Beasts; and he proposes some of the ancient Emperors, who followed right Reason in every thing, as Patterns. Prince Szun, said he, fell into so agreeable a Habit of acting according to the Light of Reason, that even, tho' he did not reflect, he never deviated from her Paths.

Prince Yu was continually upon his Guard, not to do any thing contrary to the Rules of right Reason. His Cup-bearer one Day serving him with an excellent Wine at Table, he perceived that he was too much pleased with its Flavour; I am afraid, said he, that the Princes my Successors will suffer their Hearts to be effeminated by so delicious a Liquor; and immediately dismissed his Cup-bearer, and renounced the use of Wine.

Prince Cbing tang continually watched over himself, that he might not fall into either of the two Extreams so inconsistent with Virtue. In his Choice of Ministers he regarded nothing but Virtue. He preferred the Clown to the Courtier, and the Stranger to his own Relations, when he found in them a superior Merit.

Ever since the Emperor Ping wang transported the Imperial Seat to the West, there has been seen a perceptible Decay of Vigour in all the Parts of the State: The wise Maxims, and the glorious Actions of the ancient Emperors, have insensibly fallen into Oblivion. This induced Confucius to write the Annals of the illustrious Princes of his native Country, Lii. He found Materials in the Annals of the Mandarins, who were preferred to write the History of their Nation: But he put them in a quite new Light, by the Reflections which he interspersed, and by the Ornaments of a chaste, polite Style: And as this Philosopher always spoke and thought modestly of himself, he used to say, that whatever was good in this Book was borrowed from others, and that all his Merit was his having ranged that Series of Facts into better Order, and put them in a better Style.

Mengcius then lays down the Rules of Temperance, Liberality, and Fortitude, as he said they had been taught him by the Disciples of Confucius. He principally inculcates, that in the Exercise of these Virtues a Man ought not to be engaged by the first View that offers, but that he ought maturely to reflect, before he determines to execute any Action that comes under the Head of these Virtues. He then treats of the Means of attracting the Friendship and Esteem of Men, which is by practising of Piety and Humanity; and this, says he, consists in having a sincere, obliging and civil Manner of acting.

If, continues he, in fulfilling the two Duties, I meet Contempt or Invectives from one of a blundering heavy Understanding, I will begin by sounding my own Breast, and examining if I have done any thing contrary to these Virtues: I then redouble the Testimonies of Friendship, Politeness and Complaisance, and thereby endeavour to soften him; but if I see that these Advances meet with nothing but rude shocking Answers; I then say to my self; There is the Character of a very intractable Fellow, I see not one Sentiment of Humanity in him, nor seems there to be any Difference betwixt his Character and that of the wildest Beasts. Let me leave him as he is; I should torment myself uselessly did I pretend to tame him. By this way of reasoning it is, that nothing can disquiet the wise Man, and the most shocking Injuries are not capable to ruffle his Tranquillity.

Before he ends this Chapter he shews, 1st. That tho' wise Men act differently according to the different Situations they are in, yet their Actions are determined by the same Understanding, the same Equity, and the same Uprightness of Heart. 2. He inveighs against such as make use of the most unworthy Meannesses, and the most servile Flatteries, that they may arrive at Dignities and Posts; but become intoxicated by Fortune, and insolent with Power, after their Promotion.

CHAPTER III.

MENCIUS shews to what a Degree Prince Shun carried his Love and Respect for, and Submission to, his Father and Mother. The Emperor Tau finding himself stooping beneath a Weight of Years and Infirmities, the ordinary Attendants of old Age, committed to him the Government of the Empire. While he was in the Height of Grandeur, and surrounded with Honours, Riches, Plenty, and the Applauses of a mighty People, he could take no Pleasure, because he saw his Parents abandon themselves to shameful Passions: And all his Application was directed to find out the Means of reclaiming them to the Ways of Virtue. This made him often send up Sighs to Heaven: And tho' he was fifty Years of Age, and Master of the Empire, he persevered, even to his Death, in the Practice of all the Duties which are prescribed by filial Piety.

He then shews the extraordinary Regard the same Emperor had for his Brother Syang, an unnatural Prince, who had several times attempted the Life of the Emperor his Brother, but he was so far from punishing him, when it was in his Power, that he loaded him with Honours, Favours and Riches.

When the Emperor Tau was dying, he left his Empire to his Minister Shun, preferring him to his own Son, in whom he did not find the Qualifications necessary for governing aright. Upon which, one of his Disciples asks him, If it be in an Emperor's Power, thus to deprive his Son of his Birth-right. No! answered the Philosopher, It is not. Crowns are at the Disposal of Heaven, and Heaven gave the Empire to Prince Shun. The Emperor Tau only proposed him to Heaven, and Heaven agreed: The People, struck with the Lustre of his Virtues, voluntarily submitted to the Decree of Heaven, and flocked to recognize their new Emperor. This Concurrence of Suffrages, this unanimous Motion of all the Parts of the Empire, is entirely supernatural, and can only be the Effect of a Will that controuls and directs Events. It is certain, adds he, that Events, whose Causes are unknown, can be attributed only to Heaven, which never dispossesses Children of their Father's Throne, except they are unworthy to fill it: As were the Emperors Kye and Cheu, whose Tyranny rendered them Objects of Horror.

He then praises the Modesty and Disinterestedness of a Sage whose Name was I in: He was a common Husbandman, but his Reputation for Wisdom and Virtue was very great in the Empire. The Emperor Ching tang, who had heard him frequently mention'd with great Encomiums, was willing to profit by the Counsels of so understanding a Person, and engage him to come to his Court. Upon which he sent Ambassadors to him with magnificent Presents, and invited him to fix his Abode in his Palace. I in appeared to be no ways touched, either with the Magnificence of the Embassy, or with the Richness of his Presents, which he refused. There is, said he, something in your Offers, and in the Proposals you make me, that might flatter a Man who has ambitious Views; but as for me, who desire nothing in this World, can I renounce my dear Solitude, and the Pleasure of singing the Verses of our ancient Sages, of reading their Books, and of forming myself upon their Examples, to engage in the Hurry of a Court, and to expose myself to those Troubles and Disquiets, that are inseparable to the Management of public Affairs?

The Prince was very much surprized when he was told of the Husbandman's Answer. Such a Contempt of Honours and Riches made him still more desirous of having a Man of that Character about his Person; so he sent three Times other Ambassadors, who renewed his Invitations. The wise I in then perceived that a Prince who sought him so earnestly, must have Views that were very just, and conducive to the Good of his People. Doubtless, said he, Heaven has bestowed more Understanding upon me than upon the generality of Mankind, that I may propagate my Doctrine, that I may assist the Prince by my Counsels, in causing the almost extinguished Virtues of our ancient Emperors to be revived by the Justice of his Conduct.

This Motive made greater Impression upon him than the Honours and Presents, which he disdain'd; so he repaired to the Court of Ching tang; and it was by his Advice, that this Prince declared War against the Tyrant Kye, and thereby delivered the People from the cruel Oppressions under which they had long groaned.

Mencius then makes the following Reflection: Wise Men, says he, tread in different Paths: Some insinuate themselves into, and others keep at a Distance from Courts: Some don't scruple to accept of, others refuse and despise, Honours and Dignities. But amidst all this Difference of Conduct, they all propose the same End, which is to practise Virtue, and to lead a blameless Life.

He ends this Chapter by undeceiving one of his Disciples, who believing the popular Reports about some Sages, who debased themselves so far as to accept of the most mean and despicable Employments, in order to make themselves known, and to pave the way to Dignities: He shews his Scholar, that these are so many Fables, invented by such as sought Examples to justify their Abjection and Meanness, by which they courted the Protection of the Great.

CHAPTER IV.

HE begins this Chapter with observing, that tho' the ancient Sages had no other View in their Conduct but Equity and Politeness, yet each of them had a different Manner of Acting, Thinking, and Living. The wise Pei, for instance, would not turn his Eyes upon any Object that was in the least indecent; nor hear any unbecoming Word: If a Prince had the least Failure in point of Virtue, he refused to serve him: If the People were indocile, he left them: When a State was in Peace and Tranquillity he willingly discharged the Functions to which he was raised; but where there was the least Agitation or Trouble, he immediately threw up his Employment.

The Sage Iin was of another Opinion: Where is there a Prince so vicious, said he, whom we may not serve? Is there any People so indocile that they cannot be governed? We ought not to refuse Posts in the Magistracy, neither when a State is calm, nor when it is toss'd with Storms. A wise Man, adds he, in the Time of Peace, has Leisure to teach Virtue; and during the Troubles of a State, he endeavours to appease them.

After having said that a Minister ought to form himself upon the ancient Sages, who have given us Examples of Integrity, Generosity, Courage, and Prudence; he gives a Detail of the Posts and Dignities, which were in the Empire and in every Principality, and of the Revenues appropriated to these Dignities.

He then teaches his Disciples the Manner in which they ought to behave to their Friends: Whatever Superiority you may have over them, says he, either in point of Age, Birth, Dignities, or Alliances, never treat them in a haughty, imperious Manner, but always, as if they were your Equals. Upon this he cites Examples of great Mandarins, Kings, and Emperors themselves, who courted the Friendship of wise Men, and who descending from the high Rank to which they were raised, treated them with Honour and Distinction: As for instance, the King of Tsin, who paying a Visit to the Doctor Hay tang, did not presume to enter into his House, nor to sit down to eat, before he obtain'd his Permission. The Emperor Yau, likewise, lived so familiarly with his Minister Shun, that he frequently caused him to eat at Table with himself.

The same Disciple asked our Philosopher, what ought to be the View of a wise Man that aspired to Dignities? To assist, answer'd Mencius, in the good Government of a State: If he is poor, and wants only to supply his own Necessities, he ought to be contented with the less important Employments, without aspiring to more exalted Dignities: He has whereon to live, and that ought to be sufficient. Upon this Head, he cites the Example of Confucius, who being in extream Want, did not blush to accept of the Post of Overseer of the Royal Park. The meaner and more contemptible my Employment is, said he, it will be the more easy for me to discharge it. Provided the Flocks of the King be in good Condition, I fulfil all my Duty, and no more can be required of me.

He lays it down as a Principle, that a wise Man, who has no Employment at Court, ought not to go thither, even tho' the King himself should send to desire him. Upon which a Disciple objects to him, that if a King should order one of his Subjects to go to War, the Subject would be obliged to obey him: And that for the same Reason, a wise Man, whom his Prince wanted to discourse with, ought to repair to him whenever his Majesty did him the Honour to call him.

That is a different Case, answered Mencius, for on what Account, think you, does the King wish to see and discourse with a wise Man? Is it not to profit by his Understanding, to consult him in perplexing Cases, to hear and follow his Advice? He looks upon the wise Man then as the Master, and himself as the Scholar, and will the Laws of Civility and good Breeding suffer the Scholar to send for his Master? And for the same Reason, will not the Master offend against these Laws, if he obeys such an Order? A Prince does not disparage himself when he visits a Master of Wisdom, because he observes the Ceremonies prescribed, which appoint the Scholar to behave in such a Manner to the Master. If a Prince, who would profit by the Discourses of a wise Man, shall fail of observing this Law of Politeness and Respect, he acts, as if he invited him to enter into his House, and yet shut the Door against him.

But, replies the Disciple, I have read, that Confucius being sent for by the King of Lu, flew immediately to his Court without waiting till the Chariot was got ready. Did that Pattern of wise Men commit hereby an indecent Action?

At that time, replies our Philosopher, Confucius was the first Minister of the Kingdom: The King had a right to cause his Minister to come to him, and it was the Minister's Duty to obey him as readily as he could; but a wise Man, who is clothed with no Dignity, is not subject to any such Law.

Mencius ends this Chapter, by saying, that when a Prince falls into any Errors, either with regard to the bad Choice he makes of Mandarins, or the Orders he gives in the Government of his State, his Minister ought to tell him of it with all the Address that is suitable to his Dignity: But if his first Advice is unsuccessful, he ought to repeat it again and again; and if the Prince obstinately persists to disregard it, he ought then to throw up his Employments, and retire from Court.

CHAPTER V.

MENCIOUS having advanced, that Nature of herself was upright, and inclinable to Virtue, his Disciple Kau tse proposes to him some Difficulties. I have always been of opinion, says he, that Nature is not vicious; but it appears to me, that she is indifferently and equally inclined to Good or Ill. I compare her, adds he, to Water which falls from the Heaven into a large Ditch; if it finds no Passage by which it can run off, it stagnates and has no Motion; but if it finds such a Passage, whether it is to the East or West, its Course is directed by it. In like manner, the Nature of Man appears to me, neither good nor bad, but in a State of Indifference, and is determined to Good or Ill by virtuous or vicious Morals.

I shall grant, answers Mencius, that the Water has an equal Tendency towards the East or West; but it does not follow that it has an equal Tendency to mount into the Air, as to sink to the Ground. Will not its specific Weight press it downwards? The Nature of Man has an equal Tendency to Virtue. But as we see that Water no longer follows its natural Course when obstructed by a Mound, but flows back to its Source; in like manner, when a Person knows not how to controul the Passions which arise in, and continually agitate, the Heart of Man, they entirely pervert that Tendency which is in his Nature towards Good.

He then refutes the Opinion of his Disciple, who makes the Nature of Man to consist in Life, and the Faculties of knowing, feeling, and moving. If it were so, said he, in what would the Nature of Man differ from that of a Beast? He then shews that his Nature consists in Reason: That Reason is the Principle of Piety and Equity; and that these two Virtues are as it were two Properties inseparable from human Nature. He proves this by the Respect due to aged Persons; this is a kind of Equity, not at all consisting in their great Age, which has a Right to be respected; for this Right is extrinsic of the Person who pays Respect: But it consists in the Knowledge which he has of this Right, and in the Affection of the Heart, both which are intrinsic to human Nature.

I own, continued he, that it is not easy to know the Nature of Man in itself; but in order to judge what is good and right, we need only to examine what is its innate Propensity and Inclination. Every Man naturally has a Compassion for the Unhappy, a Modesty that restrains him from shameful Actions, Respect for his Superiors, with an Understanding that can distinguish Truth from Falshood, and Honour from Infamy. This Sentiment of Compassion is named Piety: The Sentiment of Modesty is named Equity: The Sentiment of Respect goes by the Name of Civility; and in short, the natural Understanding is what we call Prudence. Whence proceed these four Sentiments in Man? Not from exterior Causes. They then are intimately united to his Nature. But the Misfortune is, that most Men neglect, and even don't attend to that natural Uprightness which they received from Tyen; for which reason, they insensibly lose it, and are afterwards plunged into all kind of Vices.

On the contrary, they, who improve it, daily advance in Perfection, till they become celebrated by their Virtue and Wisdom. You sow the same Grain in the same Soil, and at the same Season; yet in the time of Harvest there is a difference in the Crop, tho' the Nature of the Grain be the same; but the Reason of this is, because the Culture bestowed by the Husbandman was unequal. We see in every Member of Man the same natural Inclination for its Object. The Eyes in every Man, for instance, are equally affected with Beauty, the Ears with Harmony, and the Palate with an exquisite Taste. Hence we may conclude, that, as there is a perfect Conformity in the Sensations of the Body, it is impossible that there should be found any Man whose Heart should be the only Part about him that is differently formed.

But whence can this Resemblance in the Heart of all Men proceed? From right Reason, which is the same in all. But if we neglect to improve these Lights of right Reason, if we cease to cultivate that natural Propensity to Virtue, they will become as a young Plant, which withers and dies when we neglect to water it.

When I lived in the Kingdom of Tsin, I went sometimes to see King Suen yang, and I was not surprized at his extream Blindness: For he was not at the least Pains in perfecting the natural Uprightness of his Heart. You plant a Tree: If, after a warm Day, which makes it bud, there come ten Days of Frost, it is impossible that it should grow, or bear Fruit: My Counsels and Instructions were, with respect to that Prince, as a warm Day is to a young Tree. But my Foot was scarce out of his Palace but he was invironed with a crowd of Flatterers, who made the same Impression upon his Mind, as ten Days of Frost make upon such a Tree: So that when I perceived how useless my Cares were, and how little the Prince profited by my Instructions, I left him to himself.

Thus it is, that most Men invert the Order of Nature, and blind themselves, by extinguishing the Lights of their Reason, and abandoning themselves to their Pleasures. Thus too, they neglect their natural Uprightness, which nevertheless has something in it more precious than Life; since a reasonable Man would prefer Death to the committing an unjust and unreasonable Action.

Is it not strange, adds Mencius, that Man being composed of two Parts, namely a Soul and a Body, the first being very noble, and the last very despicable, he should apply all his Cares to the vile, while he neglects the noble Part of himself, which ought to employ him entirely, because it distinguishes him from Beutes? What would we think of a Gardener who should leave the admirable and useful Trees Hya and Kya without Culture, and bend all his Cares to worthless, useless Shrubs?

CHAPTER VI.

MENCIUS in this Chapter establishes this Principle; That some Usages are common to, and ought to be observed by all Men; but may be dispensed with in some particular Cases: And that there are general Laws, but that these Laws have likewise their Exceptions. It was objected to our Philosopher; I can't get so much as will preserve my Life, if I observe the Laws of Honesty and Civility, which are established in the Commerce among Men: May I not violate these Laws to save myself from dying of Hunger?

Doubtless you may, answered Mencius: The end of our seeking Food, is, that we may preserve Life and prevent Death: And the Point of least Importance, in the Rules of Civility and Politeness, is, to do nothing contrary to these Rules, when it concerns the procuring to ourselves necessary Subsistence. Now, the Necessity of preserving Life, takes place of all the Points of less Importance in the Duties of Civility. It is a particular Case, and does not at all destroy the ordinary Usage: It is an Exception of a Law, but serves to confirm that very Law's Universality and Extent.

Kyau, younger Brother of the King of (*) Tiau, one Day visited Mencius, and spoke to him in these Terms, I can't comprehend what I every Day hear; that there is no Man but may make himself like these famous Emperors Tau and Sbun, whose Wisdom and Virtue have always appeared to me inimitable: What is your Opinion on this Head.

I think, answers Mencius, that it depends upon yourself alone, to resemble these Heroes: You may want the Will, but can never be destitute of the Power to imitate them: For if you are really willing, you must always succeed. I stand in need of your Lessons for that effect, replied Kyau, so I design to fix my Residence here for some Time, that I may be near your Person, and hear the Instructions of so great a Master.

Mencius saw there was little Sincerity in this flattering Discourse: The Way of Virtue, said he, is like the high Road; none are Ignorant of it, and no Person has any Difficulty in keeping in it, but such as are Slaves to their Passions, and pleased with their Fetters. As you don't want Understanding, you may return Home, and your own Reflections will soon guide you to the Practice of Virtue.

Mencius relates the Conversation he had with the Doctor Sung keng. This last having said that a War being just about to break out betwixt the Kings of (†) Tsin and (‡) Tsu; he was thinking on the Means of pacifying these two Powers: That he would first repair to the King of Tsu, and endeavour to appease the Storm from that Quarter, and to inspire him with Sentiments of Peace: That if he could gain nothing upon his Inclinations, he would then direct his Course to the King of Tsin: and that he was hopeful to win the Favour of either the one or the other, so far as to make them enter into Terms of Agreement.

But, answered Mencius, what Argument will you make use of to persuade them, and to bring them over to your Sentiments? I will shew them replied the other, that their entering upon a War can be of no use, but, on the contrary, may prove very destructive to their States.

I am afraid, said Mencius, that you must lose your Pains, if you have no other Argument to use but their own Interests; and that you will never succeed in what you propose, which is, the quieting both Kingdoms. Suppose that this Motive should induce the Princes to dismiss their Troops and to lay down their Arms. What can be inferred from that? Candour will no longer prevail: Generals and Magistrates in their Obedience, will have nothing but their private Interest in View; and Self will be the Soul of Subordination, which is so necessary to good Government: Piety, Humanity, and Equity, will then be Virtues unknown; and the least Appearance of Gain will give rise to Quarrels and Disputes: Thence, Divisions, Hatred, Fury, Murders and Assassinations will proceed: Private Interest is the Bane of Society: And the Kingdom, into which it steals, cannot long subsist.

Would you maintain Peace in these two Kingdoms, you must charm their Princes with the Beauty of all the Virtues, but especially of Piety and Justice: If they take these two Virtues for the Rule of their Conduct, they will soon lay aside all their Inclinations to War. Their Mandarins and People will act by the same Rules, and will consult only Piety and Virtue in the Respect and Obedience which they owe, either, to their Prince, or their Parents. Then Sincerity, Candour, Peace, Friendship, Truth, Loyalty, and Obedience will flourish. These are the Virtues which root up Divisions, and either establish, or maintain Peace in a State.

He then gives an Account, how careful the ancient Emperors were to visit the different Kingdoms of the Empire, and of the Penalties they imposed upon the Kings, within whose Kingdoms they found, Agriculture neglected, Wise Men despised, old Age left without any Relief in its Miseries, or impious tyrannical Persons raised to Posts and Dignities.

He then mentions the Ordinances relating to these feudatory Princes. If they failed to repair to the Imperial Court at the time appointed, for their giving an Account of their Administration, they were reduced to a lower Degree of Nobility for the first Fault. If they failed a second Time, their Revenues were diminished, and the Bounds of their Jurisdiction contracted. For the third Fault, the Emperor sent an Army to punish the Rebel Prince, and to depose him.

him from his Dignity. He even frequently gave this Commission to the neighbouring Kings who invaded his Kingdom all at once, and executed the Emperor's Orders.

He then recounts the wise Regulations made upon a like Occasion, by the Prince Ven tung, who held an Assembly of the States, at which were present all the Feudatory Princes: Then mounting a kind of a Tribunal, he read the following Ordinance containing twelve principal Articles which they were to observe. The first made it Capital for Children not to pay all the Respect to their Parents, which was their Due. The second prohibited the Substitution of a Concubine, in Place of a lawful Wife; and in like Manner, the preferring the Son of a Concubine to that of a lawful Wife, in order to make him Heir of the Kingdom. The third ordained, that Men who were distinguished by their Honour and Wisdom should be honoured, and that handsome Pensions should be assigned them for their Subsistence. The fourth enjoins, that old Age should be respected. The fifth, that Children should be well educated. The sixth, that Strangers should not be despised, but treated with Honour. The seventh, that those who have rendered any Service to the State, should be rewarded with an hereditary Pension. The eighth, that many Posts or Dignities should never be conferred upon one Man. The ninth enjoins, that none should be raised to Posts in the Government but they who have deserved them, and have given Proofs of their Capacity. The tenth, that if a first Minister shall be found guilty of a Crime worthy of Death, he shall not be put to Death, without laying the Affair before the Emperor. The eleventh, that no Dikes or Causeways shall be made in time of Drought, so that the Waters may be kept upon the Ground, and not suffered to run into neighbouring Kingdoms. The twelfth, prohibits the Prince from disposing upon his Kingdom either wholly or in Part, without the express Consent of the Emperor.

How admirable, continued Mencius, is the Conduct of Heaven towards the Wise and the Brave. Sbun, that illustrious Emperor, was taken from the Plough, to be advanced to the Throne. Kau tsong, after a diligent search found Fu yue among Masons, and made him quit his Trowel and his Mortar to raise him to the first Dignity of his Court. Ky au, an Inn-keeper was placed at the Head of the Councils of Ven vang. Ven kong brought another out of Prison to make him his first Minister. Pe li bi was only a little Merchant, yet the King of Tsin raised him to the first Rank in his Court, and profited so well by his Councils, that no Prince ever acquired an Authority and Reputation in the Empire equal to his.

Thus, when Heaven designs a Man for the highest Employments which require an extraordinary Virtue, it never fails to prepare him for his exalted Station by a train of Adversities, Affronts, Hunger, Poverty, Fatigues, and many other mortifying Accidents. Virtue uses to recollect herself in Misfortune, to reunite all her Forces, and to struggle against Adversity. A wise Man does not know the Extent of his Resolution and Constancy, if he is not put to all kinds of Tryals.

We see the same thing happen in the Government of Kingdoms. A Prince who has not Ministers sufficiently wise and able to maintain the Vigour of the Laws, and who is not able to reform himself when he deviates from the Laws, soon falls into Snares spread by his Courtiers, and that Swarm of Flatterers that commonly infest Courts. He abandons the Care of his State, that he may give himself up to vain Amusements, to Idleness, to Ease, to Effeminacy, and the most criminal Pleasures. This gives Rise to Complaints, Murmurings, popular Commotions, Rebellions, and in the End, to the Ruin both of the King and Kingdom. Whence we may conclude, that Pains, Troubles, and Affronts, frequently contribute to a happy Life; and that Prosperity, Softness, and Pleasure, contribute yet more frequently, to an unhappy End.

CHAPTER VII.

MENCIOUS observes in this Chapter, that in order to serve Heaven aright a Man must 1st. Guard his Heart, and not allow it to have too great an Inclination for Affairs foreign to itself, or to dissipate itself in vain, trifling, Matters.

2<sup>dly</sup>. Follow right Reason in all his Conduct; love nothing but what is really amiable to her, and do nothing but what she enjoins. He informs us, that a wise Man never troubles himself whether his Days are to be many or few; that he knows their Number are fixed by Tyen, and that all his Care is, the due Regulation of his Morals: That Riches and Honours are sought after at the Expence of great Disquiets, and that these Disquiets are almost always useless, because the Object of our Desires and Ambition is commonly without ourselves: That the Case is otherwise with respect to virtuous Actions, the Principle which produces them being within ourselves, and that we attain it, as soon as we set about seeking it with a sincere and an upright Heart.

He next gives some Instructions to one of his Scholars, who followed the Profession of teaching Wisdom. You are ambitious, said he, to insinuate yourself into the Palaces of Princes, there to propagate your Doctrine: But if you would behave like a Man truly wise, you must not suffer the good or bad Success of the Pains you are at, to affect the inward Peace of your Mind: Whether Men receive your Instructions with Pleasure, or reject them with Disdain, your Conduct must be always equal and uniform.

Among these vast Numbers who seek to settle in the Courts of Princes, I distinguish four Sorts: Some who obtain their Ends by Intrigues of all kinds, and who have nothing in View but to please the Prince, and to render themselves agreeable by an insinuating Behaviour, and an abject Flattery. Others propose only to preserve Peace in the Kingdom, and to remove every Cause Cause of Division. Some we may call the Men sent from Heaven, because they are solely employed in following the Laws of Heaven. If they have Grounds to believe that their Lessons upon the Rules of Morals and Government, will be of any service to Kings or People, they willingly accept of Posts and Dignities. If, on the contrary, they have reason to believe that their Doctrine will be neglected; they then retire from the Palaces of Princes to a Life of Obscurity and Retirement. Lastly, some may be looked upon as Heroes. Such as those, whose Lives are so well regulated, that they engage Princes by their Examples, and in some Measure force them to imitate their Virtues.

Every thing, adds Mengius, gives Joy to the truly wise Man. 1st. The good Health of his Father and Mother, and the Union of his own Family. 2<sup>dly</sup>. When he lifts up his Eyes to Heaven, if he finds nothing within him that is blameable. And when he humbles them to look on Man, if he finds nothing in his Conduct for which he needs to blush. 3<sup>dly</sup>. That he can, by his Discourses and Example, inspire the People with the Desire of perfecting themselves in Virtue. He does not make his Happiness to consist, as you see, in the Possession of Honours and Riches. Tho' he were able to establish a flourishing Kingdom in the very Heart of the Empire, and to subject all the People who are within the four Seas, yet he will not place his Happiness in that. Every thing that is without himself, Honours or Disgrace, Riches or Poverty, are incapable to affect him either with Joy or Grief. All his Pleasure is to cultivate and to bring to Perfection, the Virtues he has received from Nature; namely, Piety, Equity, Humanity, and Prudence. These Virtues, when once they are deeply rooted in the Heart, manifest themselves in the serene Look, the modest Countenance, the Deportment, and Air of him who possesses them. Every Part of his Person is stamp'd by the Virtue of his Heart.

The Memory of Prince Ven vang, continues he, will be for ever revered; and his Piety, Clemency, with his Cares of young Wards, Widows, Orphans, and old Men, is constantly celebrated. Is it only meant by this, that he took care to send every Day the necessary Subsistence to each Family? No; that was not enough for him to do.

The Method then which he took to relieve the Poverty of his People, and especially of those, whom either Poverty or old Age disabled from supplying their own Necessities, was this. He assigned five little Arpents of Ground to every Master of a Family, whereon he might build a House, and lay out Gardens. He ordained likewise, that Mulberry-Trees should be planted, with whose Leaves the Women might nourish the Silk-Worms: By these means, the old Men had Stuffs wherewith they might cloath themselves and keep out Cold. He likewise ordered every Family to bring up Poultry and Piggs. In short, he gave a certain Number of Arpents of Ground, which the Children, who were strong and robust, were to labour. By this sage Regulation, every good old Wan had wherewith to subsist both himself and his Family. While the Prince thus provided for the Necessities of his People, he found them more docile to hear his Precepts, and more inclinable to observe them.

How little is true Virtue understood, cried he again? The horror for Contempt and Poverty, and the desire of Honours and Riches, blind most Men. Let a Man be almost famished, he has a Relish for the most insipid Food; it would seem that his Pallat could no longer judge of Tastes. The hunger, and thirst of Riches produce the same Effects upon the Heart.

You have heard the celebrated Liew hya weby, who was a Pattern of Gentleness and Affability, spoken off. Neither the most frightful Poverty with which he was threatned, nor the first Rank of the Empire, with which he was flattered, could in the least sway him to Vice, or divert him from Virtue. The study of Virtue is a great Work, no Man ought to enter into it, but he who has Constancy enough to persevere in it till it is finished. He who applies to this Study is like a Man who digs for a Well. After he had diged to the Depth of nine Perches, if he grows weary, and leaves off his Work, he will never discover the Spring he seeks for, and all he has done must go for nothing: It is the same in our Pursuit of Virtue; if our Courage fails us in the Middle of our Work, and if we shall suspend our Labours, before we have attained to Perfection, we shall not only never succeed, but all the Pains we have been at, will be vain and fruitless.

When that famous Minister of the Empire, I in, saw the Emperor Tay kya degenerate from the Virtues of his Grand-father Ching tang, he caused him to descend from his Throne, of which he had rendered himself unworthy, and shut him up in a remote Palace, wherein the Tomb of his Grand-father stood. The Action procured him an universal Applause. The Prince when he viewed the Ashes of that Heroe from whom he was descended, came to himself, bewailed the Irregularity of his Life, detested his Vices, and applied himself seriously to the Study of Wisdom. As soon as the Minister was sensible of the Change wrought upon him, he brought him out of the Palace and replaced him upon the Throne. This was new matter of Joy for the People, who equally applauded the Wisdom of the Minister, and the Docility of the young Emperor.

But, said one of his Disciples, is this an Example to be imitated? If a wise Minister serves a disorderly Prince, will he be allowed to suspend him from the Exercise of Royalty? Without doubt he may, answered the Philosopher, if he has an Authority as ample, and Intentions as pure, as the Minister I in. Without these Qualifications, he will be looked upon as a Robber and a Rebel, and no Law will be too severe for punishing him.

I have read, replied the same Disciple, in the Book Sbi king, that he who does not work, ought not to eat. In consequence of this, we see no Person but has some Employment or other

Perseverance in the Pursuit of Virtue necessary.

other, Princes, Magistrates, Husbandmen, Tradesmen, Merchants, in short, every body is employed: But what is the wife Man, who does not enter into affairs of Government, employed in? His Life seems to me to be useless, and yet he receives the Pension of his Prince, which serves only to maintain his Idleness.

Do you reckon, answered our Philosopher, his Instructions and Examples for nothing? If a King profits by these, all the Kingdom soon feels their good Effects; Tranquillity, Opulence, and filial Piety are promoted. Can a Man, who is the means of procuring so much Happiness to a State, be called useless.

At last, the same Disciple, who thought the Morality of Mencius too austere, spoke to him in the following Terms: The Path of Virtue, as you lay it out, is beautiful, but too sublime, and accessible only to few. Why don't you render it more easy to come at? You would then have a great many more Disciples. There is no Artist, replies Mencius, who teaches a Trade, but follows a certain Method and some invariable Rules. And would you have a Master of Wisdom, who teaches the Road that guides to Perfection, have a variable Doctrine, which he can accommodate to the Taste and Caprice of his Hearers. Such a one, if he were able, would betray his Profession, and cease to be a Master of Wisdom.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mencius with his Disciple
Kung sun shew.

MENCIUS, discoursing with his Disciple Kung sun shew, about the King of Ghey, whose Name was Wbey wang, said, that this Prince had no true Piety; that he was compassionate to Brutes, and cruel to Men. And would you have a Proof of this? added he. That Prince intoxicated with a Desire to aggrandise his State, and to enrich himself with the Spoils of his Neighbours, waged bloody Wars, and his People became the Victims of his Ambition. While he saw the Ground drenched in Blood, and covered with the dead Bodies of his Soldiers; the frightful Scene never touched him. Nay more, when he saw most of his Army cut in Pieces, far from saving the Remnant, he rallied them, and led them on to Battle anew, placing his Son, his Relations and his Favourites in the Front. Thus, we may see that he preferred his Conquests to the Lives of them who were dearest to him. Can you call that true Piety? Don't tell me that Confucius in his Work, entitled the Spring and Autumn, writes a History of the Wars among Princes. That Philosopher approved of no Wars but those that were just, such as that which the Emperor entered into, to punish a Rebel Prince. But he condemned and disapproved of unjust Wars, such as those which the Princes carried on against one another without the Emperor's Permission.

If any one, adds Mencius, shall go to a Prince and say to him; I am skilled in warlike Matters: I know how to draw up an Army in Battle array: And, by this Discourse, engage the Prince to take up Arms, and to carry War into his Neighbour's Territories: Would he not be look'd upon as a Blood-thirsty Man, and a real Disturber of the public Tranquillity? The Prince who is truly virtuous, has no Occasion to use Arms for Conquest. His Virtue and Moderation are more effectual for subduing Kingdoms, than the most dazzling Victories.

We need no other Example than that of Prince Chin tang: While he was overrunning the Southern Provinces, the People of the Northern complained of his Slowness: Have we not long enough, said they, groaned under the tyrannical Oppression of a merciless Master? Why does our Deliverer delay to come to our Relief? All the People of the Empire stretched out their Hands to him, and expected his Presence, only to submit to his Laws.

Encomium
of Shan.

What I call Virtue in a Prince, appeared in that wise Heroe, Prince Shan. In the first Year of his private Life, tho' he was so poor that he could scarce get a little Rice and Pot-herbs to live on, yet was contented with his Lot. When he was Emperor, that supreme Dignity did not in the least swell his Heart. Neither his People, nor all the Delicacies of a Court, with all the Enchantments of a Throne, were able to seduce him. He possessed all these as if he had not possessed them: And it was by that Wisdom and Integrity of Life, which was always uniform, that he absolutely gained all Hearts.

But perhaps you will say, these Times were different from what ours are. The Corruption of Mankind is now almost become general; how shall we resist its Torrent? Vain Pretenses! Can a severe Famine cause a rich Man to die of Hunger? For the same Reason, a corrupted Age can never change the Heart of a Man who is solidly virtuous.

Afterwards, treating of the Piety which ought to guide a Prince in the Government of his People, he establishes the Order to be observed in gathering the Tributes. The Tribute of Silk, says he, ought only to be raised in the Summer. That of Millet and Rice, in the Autumn, and the public Taxes ought to be exacted only in the Winter. If a Prince shall break into this Order, and demand two kinds of Tributes in the same Season, he will reduce his Subjects to Misery and Famine: The People will then disperse themselves, to seek for a Livelihood in other Provinces; and the dispeopled Kingdom will be ruined by the Avarice of its Prince.

There are three things, added he, which ought to be more dear and precious to a Prince, than Gold and Jewels. 1st. The Kingdom which he has received from his Ancestors. 2<sup>dly</sup>. The People intrusted to his Care. 3<sup>dly</sup>. The Science of rightly governing them. He will acquire the Science of governing others, when he is once learned to govern himself, and to watch over the Motions of his Heart, so as to render himself its Master, which he will soon be, when he knows how to contract its Desires.

He

He then proceeds to the Choice which Confucius made of his Disciples. That Philosopher, said he, required that they should have elevated Sentiments, a great Courage, and a Constancy in the good Resolutions they had formed: He abhorred these Sophists who were only skilled in the Arts of Falshood and Dissimulation, and who, by a simple Outside and the vain Appearances of Virtue, only studied to attract the Encomiums and Approbation of their Fellow Citizens, without putting themselves to the Trouble to deserve them by Actions that were really virtuous.

Lastly, he ends this Chapter and his Book, by shewing that this great Art of governing and living well could not have subsisted long, if there had not been, at certain periods of Time, great Men who took care to transmit them to Posterity. The Emperors Yau and Shun were the first Masters, and the first Models of them, together with their Ministers Yü and Kau yau. The Emperor Ching tang appeared 500 Years after, and with the Assistance of his Ministers I in and Ly shu, revived these great Maxims which were then almost forgotten. Ven wang about 500 Years after, again restored them to their Vigour; and about the same Distance of time after him, Confucius, as it were, raised from the Dead the ancient Doctrine, which he put in a new Light by the Wisdom of his Reflections and Maxims.

Hyau king, or, of Filial Respect. The fifth Classical Book.

THIS little Book contains only the Answers of Confucius to his Disciple Tseng, concerning the Duty of Children towards their Parents. He pretends to prove, that this Filial Respect is the Foundation of the wise Government of the Empire: And for this effect, he enters into a Detail of what is owing to Parents from Sons of every Rank, either of Emperors, or Kings, first Ministers, Literati, or even of those who are in the lowest Stations of Life. This Book is very short, and consists only of eighteen brief Articles.

General Sketch of this Work.

In the first Article, he tells his Disciple, That the sublime Virtue of the ancient Emperors, who in their Reigns promoted Peace, Harmony, and Subordination throughout all the Empire, was derived from their filial Respect, which is the Foundation of all Virtues.

Particular Contents of the first.

In the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Articles, he shews, That whatever Station a Man is in, and to whatever Dignity he is raised, he is obliged to observe this filial Respect: That Emperors and great Men who give the People an Example of Love and Veneration towards their Parents, find none who dare either despise or hate them: By these means Subordination is preserved in the Kingdom; and that the necessary Effects of this Subordination are Peace and Tranquillity.

and the five following Articles.

In the seventh, he says, That Filial Respect is of vast Extent, that it is a Virtue that reaches even the Heaven, whose regular Motions it imitates: That it comprehends the whole Earth, whose Fruitfulness it resembles. That she finds an Object in the most common Actions of Men, since it is in the most common Incidents of Life that she exerts herself: That when she is well established in a Kingdom, no Troubles, no Law-suits, no Quarrels are seen there; and that when Peace prevails in every Family, all the Subjects of the Prince are gentle, equitable, and Foes to all Disputes and Injustice.

Seventh.

In the eighth he shews, That when the Emperor gives an Example of Filial Piety, it is always imitated by the wise and great Men of the Empire: That the Mandarins form themselves by the Court, and that the People in like Manner imitate the Mandarins: and that the Conduct of the Emperor thus influencing all the Members of the State, all are submissive, the Laws are observed, and the Morals regulated.

In the ninth, Tseng asks of Confucius, If any other Virtue is greater than that of filial Respect, Confucius answers; That as Heaven produced no work more noble than Man, so the most excellent of all human Actions was that by which he honoured and respected his Parents. That the Father is with respect to his Son, what the Creator is to the Creature; and the Son has the same Relation to the Father, as the Subject has to the Prince: That he who does not love his Parents sins against Reason; and he who does not honour them, against Civility. That a King who requires Submission and Obedience in his Subjects, ought to do nothing contrary either to Reason or Civility; because his Actions serve for the Rule and the Pattern of his Subjects, who will be submissive and obedient to him only in proportion as they are so to their Parents.

Ninth.

In the tenth, he sums up five Duties of this filial Piety; The Man, says he, who honours his Parents ought, First, to honour them within Doors. Secondly, to take a pleasure to procure any thing that is necessary for their Subsistence. Thirdly, to let the Grief of his Heart appear in the Air of his Face when they are sick. Fourthly, to put himself in Mourning at their Death, and to observe all the Ceremonies prescribed during the time of Mourning. Fifthly, to discharge, with the most scrupulous Exactness, all their funeral Duties.

Tenth.

In the eleventh, he mentions five Sorts of Punishments for the different Crimes: And he pretends that there is no Crime so enormous, as the Disobedience of a Son towards a Parent. To attack a Prince; adds he, shews a Willingness to have no Superior: To remove the wise Men is to be willing to have no Instructors: And to despise filial Obedience, is to be willing to have no Parents. This is the Height of Iniquity, and the Source of all Disorders.

Eleventh.

In the twelfth he shews, that a King by loving his Parents, can fall upon no better Method to teach his People the Love which they owe to him. That a King who respects his eldest Brother, thereby sets the best Example to his Subjects of the respect which they owe to Magistrates:

Twelfth.

That a King, who exactly observes the Ceremonies that are prescribed, that is to say, who behaves towards every Person according to the Rules contained in the Book of Rites, can fall upon no better Method to promote the Usages, and to maintain the Peace and Tranquillity of the Empire.

Thirteenth. In the thirteenth, he says, that a Prince has attained to the Perfection of Virtue, when, by his own Example, he has established throughout all his Empire this filial Respect and Love: And he cites the Verses of the Sbi king to the following Purpose. "That a Prince ought not to be called the Father of his People, unless he knows how to win their Affections by regulating their Morals."

Fourteenth. In the fourteenth he shews, that there is no way so short or so sure, for attaining to a high Reputation, as being exact in all the Duties of filial Piety.

Fifteenth. In the fifteenth, Tseng puts this Question to Confucius. I am sensible of the Necessity and Advantages of filial Respect, but does it tie us down to a blind Obedience to all the Orders of a Father? Confucius answers; That if a Father or a Prince shall command any thing that is contrary to Justice or Civility; Or if both the one and the other shall fall into any considerable Error, the Son is neither bound to obey his Father, nor the Minister his Prince: But both the Son and the Minister will fail in their principal Duty, if they do not give their respectful Advice with regard to the Fault which the Father or the Prince is about to commit. He afterwards tells us, that in former Times, the Emperor had, at his Court, seven Ministers whose Office it was to make Remonstrances to him, and to tell him of his Faults: That a King had five; a first Minister three: One of the Literati had a Friend, and a Father had a Son, who performed this Duty to one another.

Sixteenth. In the sixteenth he says; That tho' the Emperor is raised to the supreme Dignity, and all the People are submitted to his Authority, yet, he has, above him, his Parents whom he ought to love and revere: For this Reason it is, that he appears twice every Year in the Hall of his Ancestors in so respectful a Posture, that he may make known to all the World how much he honours them.

Seventeenth. In the seventeenth he shews, that the Prince and the Minister ought to cultivate a reciprocal good Understanding.

Eighteenth. In the eighteenth and last Article, he teaches what a good Son is to observe when he pays the funeral Duties to his Parents. His Air, his Discourse, his Cloaths, his Food, and in short, all his Person ought to express the Grief of his Soul. However, the Laws established by the Ancients, put some Bounds to this. They require that a Son ought not to be more than three Days without eating: And not to continue his Mourning above three Years: That a Coffin should be made and adorned according to the Usages: That the dead Body should be shut up in it and served with Victuals after it is in the Coffin: That the Son must there weep and groan, and afterwards build a decent Burying-Place which is to be inclosed with Walls: That the Coffin should be deposited there with the usual Ceremonies: That a Building should be reared in which his Descendants are to assemble every Year in the Spring and the Autumn, there to renew the Memory of the deceased, and to pay him the same Duties as they paid him when alive.

Syau hyo, or, The School of Infants. The sixth Classical Book.

Of the Author and Contents of this Book.

THIS Book was composed by the Doctor Chu bi, who lived under the Reign of the Family of the Song, about the Year of our Lord, 1150. It is a Compilation of Maxims and Examples, both ancient and modern. As this Work contains nothing but the Citations of the different Maxims and Examples, no other order is observed in it, than that of a Division into Chapters and Paragraphs. It treats, more particularly, of public Schools; of the Honours due to Parents, Kings, Magistrates, and aged Persons; of the Duties of Man and Wife; of the Manner of regulating the Heart; the Gestures of the Body; Food and Raiment. The Design of the Author in it, is to instruct Youth, and to form them to Morals.

This Work is divided into two Parts; The first is called Intrinsic or Essential; the other Extrinsic or Accidental: As most of its Maxims are contained in the Books of which I have already treated, I shall only mention some additional ones which the Author has thrown into it, and I shall follow the same order of Chapters and Paragraphs.

P A R T I.

CHAPTER I. Of the Education of Youth.

Of the Education of Boys.

HE cites the Book of Rites, which prescribes the following Rules with respect to Education. A Mother, in the Choice of a Wet-Nurse for her Child, ought only to pitch upon a modest, meek, virtuous, affable, respectful, exact, prudent Woman, and one who is discreet in her Discourse.

At six Years of Age.

As soon as a Child can raise his Hand to his Mouth, he ought to be weaned, and taught to use his right Hand. When he is six Years of Age, he ought to be taught the most common common Numbers, and the Names of the principal Places in the World. At the Age of seven, <sup>Seven.</sup> he ought to be separated from his Sisters; and not suffered either to sit or to eat with them. At the Age of eight, <sup>Eight.</sup> he should be formed to the Rules of Civility and Politeness, which he is afterwards to observe, either when he enters, or goes out of, the House, or when he is in Company with aged Persons. At the Age of nine, <sup>Nine.</sup> he is to be taught the Calendar. At ten, <sup>Ten.</sup> to be sent to the publick School, and he is to have no Cloaths lined with Cotton, because they are too warm for one of his Age. His Master is then to make him acquainted with Books, and to teach him Writing and Arithmetic. At thirteen, <sup>Thirteen.</sup> he is to study Music, that he may know how to sing the Verses, that the wise Maxims contained in them may be the better imprinted in his Memory. At fifteen Years of Age, <sup>Fifteen.</sup> he is to learn to manage a Bow, and to ride. At twenty, <sup>Twenty.</sup> he is to receive his first Cap with the usual Ceremonies; he may then wear Cloths of Silk and of Furrs, and then he is to give himself up entirely to study till he is (*) thirty: At which Age he may be married, <sup>Thirty.</sup> and after that, he is to apply to the Management of his House, and to continue to perfect himself in Letters. At forty, <sup>Forty.</sup> he may be raised to Posts and Dignities, but he cannot be made first Minister till the fiftieth Year of his Age; and at seventy, <sup>Fifty.</sup> he must resign his Employment. <sup>Seventy.</sup>

As to what concerns the Girls; after they are ten Years of Age, they are not to be allowed to go out of the House. They must be taught to have an affable Air; to spin, to divide the Silk, either into Skeins or into Clues; to sew, to make Tissues either of Silk or of Worsted; in short, they must be kept to all the other Employments that are proper for their Sex; and at twenty, they may be married.

The first President of the supreme Tribunal of Rites, ought to establish in every District, Officers, who are to take care that three Things shall be principally inculcated upon the People. 1st. The six Virtues, namely, Prudence, Piety, Wisdom, Equity, Fidelity, and Concord. 2<sup>dly</sup>. The six commendable Actions, which are, Obedience to Parents, Love to Brethren, Concord among Relations, Affection for our Neighbours, Sincerity amongst Friends, and Pity towards the Poor and the Unhappy. 3<sup>dly</sup>. The six Kinds of Knowledge in which a Man ought to be instructed, consisting in understanding the Rites, Music, Archery, riding on Horseback, Writing, and Arithmetic.

The Doctrine of the Master, says another Book, is the Rule of the Scholar. When I see a young Man who is attentive to this, and endeavours to put it in Practice; who hears the Lessons of his Master in the Morning, and repeats them in the Evening; who forms himself upon the Conduct of the Sages, and strives to imitate them; who never expresses any sign of Haughtiness, and whose outward Appearance is perfectly composed; who watches over his Looks, and never casts his Eyes upon any Object that is ever so little indecent: Who among those of his own Age, keeps Company only with such of them as are wise and virtuous; who never speaks but to the purpose, and always in a respectful Manner; I immediately conclude that he has made great progress in Wisdom and Virtue.

CHAPTER II. Of the five Duties.

PARAGRAPH I. Of the Duties of Father and Son.

THE Author cites the Book of Rites, which gives the most exact Account of all that a Son ought to do, to express his Submission and Love with regard to his Father and Mother. He ought to rise early in the Morning, to wash his Hands and Face, to dress himself genteelly, that when he appears before his Father he may have a decent Appearance; to enter into his Chamber with great Modesty; to enquire about his Health, to present him with Water for washing his Hands, and a Napkin for drying them; in short, to do him all the little pieces of Service that may best express his Care and Affection.

When an elder Son has risen by his Merit to some considerable Dignity, and pays a Visit to the Head of his Family, whose Circumstances perhaps are but mean, he is not to enter the House with the Pomp and Magnificence that is suitable to his Station; but to leave his Horses and Equipage at the outer Gate, and to put on a very modest Air, that the Family may not have the least Grounds, from his Behaviour, to think he is come to insult them, by an Ostentation of Honours and Riches.

Tseng, a Disciple of Confucius, speaks thus; "If your Father and Mother love you, rejoice; and be mindful of them: If they hate you, fear, and take Care not to exasperate them: If they commit a Fault, inform them of it, but don't contradict them."

We read in the Book of Rites: If your Father or your Mother commit any Fault, inform them of it in the most gentle and respectful Terms. If they reject your Advice, don't forbear to respect them as much as ever. Endeavour to find some favourable Moment for admonishing them anew; for it is better that you should be importunate, than that they should become the Talk of the Town. But if this Advice shall exasperate them so far as to strike you, you are not to take it ill, but to pay them the same Respect and Obedience as before.

A Son, let his Necessities be what they will, ought never to sell the Vessels he made use of at his Father's Burial; and tho' he were starving for Cold, he ought not to use the Habits he wore at that Ceremony, nor to cut the Trees planted upon the Hillock where his Father's Burying-place is.

P A R A G.

(*) This Custom is changed at present. They are married when it is convenient. much younger; sometimes in the fifteenth Year of their Age.

PARAGRAPH II. Of the Duties of a King and a Minister.

The Manner of Confucius's entering the Imperial Palace.

A King ought to lay his Commands upon a Minister with Gentleness and Goodness; and a Minister ought to execute them with Readiness and Fidelity.

The Disciples of Confucius relate; That when their Master entered the Palace he stoop'd to the Ground; nor would he ever halt at the Threshold of the Gate: That when he pass'd by the King's Throne, the Respect and Veneration with which he was struck, was read in his Air and Look: That he walk'd so fast, he scarce seem'd to lift his Feet: And that when he went to an Audience of the Prince, as soon as he enter'd the inner Apartment, he modestly gather'd up his Robe, bow'd profoundly, and held in his Breath, so that one would have said, he had lost the Faculty of Respiration. That when he left the Prince's Presence, he walk'd very fast, that so he might be the sooner out of his Presence: That he afterwards resum'd his grave Air, and walk'd modestly to take his Place among the Grandees.

If a Prince makes a Present of a Horse to his Minister, this last ought immediately to mount him: If of a Habit, he ought to put it on that instant, and then repair to the Palace to return thanks for the Honour his Majesty had done him.

A first Minister betrays his Master if he connives at his Vices, and is so weak as not to tell him of the Hurt he does to his Character. He who aspires to the first Posts of a Court, and aims only at his own private Interest, is of no Use to the Prince. He is in a continual Agitation till such time as he has attained these Posts; and after he succeeds, he fears every Moment to lose them. There is no Villany of which a Man of that Character is not capable, in order to maintain himself in his Station.

As a modest Woman never marries two Husbands, so a faithful Minister ought to take care not to serve two Kings.

PARAGRAPH III. Of the Duties of Man and Wife.

Of the Choice of a Wife.

THE Book of Rites says; "That a Man ought not to seek a Wife in a Family of his own Name. He must act with Sincerity in the Presents he then gives, and take care that the reciprocal Promises that pass, are conceived in honourable Terms; that the future Spouse may be inform'd both of the Sincerity with which she ought to obey her Husband, and of that Modesty which should be the Soul of all her Conduct. When she is tied to a Husband, the Union should last as long as her Life; and she ought never to marry another. The Bridegroom is to go to her Father's House to receive the Bride, and to bring her from that to his own: He is to present her with a tame Bird, either to express his Affection for her, or, to instruct her by that Emblem, with what Docility she must suffer herself to be ruled.

There ought to be two Apartments in the House; an outward one for the Husband, and an inner one for the Wife. These Apartments must be separated by a Wall or a good Partition of Boards; and the Doors carefully guarded: The Husband must never go into the Wife's Apartment; and the Wife ought never to leave her own without a good Reason. A Wife is not her own Mistress; nor has she any thing at her own Disposal; and her Orders and Authority extend no farther than the Walls of her own Apartment.

Women that ought not to marry.

There are five Sorts of Girls whom a Man ought never to think of marrying. First, When she is of a House that has been negligent of the filial Duties. 2. When her Family is irregular, and the Morals of those who compose it are suspected. 3. When some Blemish or Brand of Infamy is annex'd to it. 4. When there is in it any hereditary or infectious Disease. 5. When she is an elder Daughter who has lost her Father.

divorcing a Wife.

A Man may repudiate his Wife in seven Cases: 1. If she has fail'd in her Obedience to her natural Parents. 2. If she is barren. 3. If she is unfaithful to his Bed. 4. If she is jealous. 5. If she is infected with any contagious Disease. 6. If she can't command her prattling, and stuns him by continual Clack. 7. If she is apt to steal, and capable, by that, to ruin him. There are, nevertheless, Cases in which a Man cannot obtain a Divorce. As for instance; if, when the Marriage was contracted, she had Parents, and during the time of her Marriage, by losing them, has no Resource left: Or, if in Conjunction with her Spouse, she has wore Mourning three Years for his Father or Mother.

PARAGRAPH IV. Of the Duties of young Persons towards aged Persons.

Precepts of Civility.

THE Book of Rites ordains as follows: When you go to visit a Relation of your Fathers, neither enter nor leave his House, but with his Permission; and never speak but when you answer his Questions.

When you are in company with a Man twenty Years older than yourself, respect him as if he were your Father, and if he is ten Years older than you, as your elder Brother.

When a Scholar walks the Street with his Master, he must not leave him to speak to any other Person whom he meets. Nor must he walk up with him, but keep a little behind. If his Master shall lean his Hand upon his Shoulder to whisper somewhat in his Ear, the Scholar must put his Hand before his Mouth, lest he be uneasy to him by his Breath.

If

If you sit by your Master, and if he puts any Question to you, never interrupt him with your Answer; and take care not to speak till he has done. If he examines you about the Progress you have made in your Studies, you are immediately to rise and to stand, during all the time you answer him.

When you are at your Master's, or an aged Person's Table, and if he presents you with a Glass of Wine, you are to stand while you drink it, and to refuse nothing that is offered you: But if you are ordered to sit, obey. When you sit by a Person of Note, if you perceive that he is in any Uneasiness; for instance, if he is restless on his Seat, if he makes a Stir with his Feet, or if he examines the Shadow of the Sun to know what it is a-Clock; you are immediately to take your Leave of him, and to ask his Permission to retire. Whenever he puts any Question to you, always answer him standing.

If you discourse with any Person who is your Superior, either by his Dignity, or his Alliances, never ask of him how old he is: If you meet him in the Street, don't ask him where he is a-going. If you sit by him, be modest, and don't look to either the one Side or the other; use no unbecoming Gestures, nor make any Motion with your Fan.

The Disciples of Confucius report, that when their Master assisted at any great Entertainment, he never left the Table till all those, who were older than himself, were gone.

PARAGRAPH V. Of the Duties of Friends.

A Man, who is serious in his pursuit of Wisdom, never chuses any for Friends, but those, whose Discourses and Examples can improve him in Virtue, and Literature.

The Duty of two Friends consists, in reciprocally giving one another good Advice, and in animating one another to the Practice of Virtue.

There are three Sorts of Friends with whom an Engagement and Intimacy cannot fail to be pernicious. The vicious, the dissembling, and the indiscreet Flacks.

When you receive a Person at your House, don't fail to press him at every Door to walk in. But when you come to the Door of the innermost Hall, ask his Permission to enter first, that you may put the Chairs in order; then, return to him, and conduct him respectfully to his Seat, which must be always on your Left. The Guest is not to speak first; for the Laws of Politeness require, that the Master of the House should open the Conversation.

CHAPTER V. Of the Vigilance required over One's self.

PARAGRAPH I. Rules for the Government of the Heart.

AS soon as Reason assumes the Mastery over our Passions, every thing goes well; but when the Passions get the better of Reason, all is wrong.

A Prince who would be happy, and wants to make his People so too, ought to observe the following Particulars: To take Care that the high Station to which he is raised, does not inspire him with haughty arrogant Airs: To oppose every irregular Passion: Never to be intoxicated by any Opinion, with which he had suffer'd himself to be prepossessed: To indulge himself only in lawful Pleasures: He must study to be popular and serious, for this will procure him the Affections of his People: If he loves any one, he must not be blind to his Faults: If he hates any one, he must not shut his Eyes to his good Qualifications: If he heaps up Riches, let it only be to diffuse them: In short, he must never decide with any Diffidence; and in giving his Advice, he must not assume a positive Tone.

When you come out of your own House, let your Air be modest, and such as you must have when you pay a Visit to a great Lord. When you deliver your Orders to any Body, have as much Gravity about you, as if you assisted at some great Solemnity. Judge of others by yourself, and never do that to another, which you would not have done to yourself.

Even when you are alone, you must retain your Modesty: When you are about any Business, apply your whole Attention to it: In the ordinary Commerce of civil Life, you are to express a great deal of Candour. These are Virtues which you ought never to neglect, even tho' you were banished to the most barbarous Nations. A Man may be said to deserve the Reputation of being wise, when he does not love to fill his Belly with Victuals: When he does not seek his own Ease: And when, he manages his Business with Dexterity, and his Words with Discretion, and seeks to keep Company with none but wise and virtuous Persons.

PARAGRAPH II.

THE Book of Rites speaks thus: That which distinguishes the wise Man from all others, is Civility and Justice. These two Virtues have their Principle in the perfect Regulation of all the Motions of the Body; the Gentleness and Serenity of the Look, and good Breeding in Discourse.

When one speaks to you, don't advance your Ear that you may the better hear him: Nor answer him by bawling, as if you were crying upon one: Don't look a-squint upon any body, nor suffer your Eyes to wander, so as to let him perceive you are thinking of something else. When you walk, let it not be with a strutting Pace, or with a fierce Look: When you are standing, don't raise your Foot in the Air: And when you sit, never let your Legs be crossed: When you work, let it never be with your Arms naked: When you are warm, never open your Habit that you may cool yourself: And in what Company soever you are, let your Head be always covered: When you are a-Bed, keep yourself in a decent Posture: When you discourse with any one, take great care not to put on a disdainful or a rallying Air. Never speak with Precipitation, nor let the Faults of others be the Subject of your Discourse: Advance nothing upon slight Conjectures, and never be stubborn in your Opinion.

The Disciples of Confucius say, that when their Master was at Home, he spoke very little: So that to see him, one would have thought he could not speak: But on the contrary, when he was at Court, he was admired for his Eloquence. That no Body knew so well as he did, how to adapt himself to the Genius and Quality of those he discoursed with. That, when he talked with the inferior Mandarins he struck them with Respect, by a certain Dignity of Expression which run through all his Discourse: That he insinuated himself agreeably into the Spirits of his superior Mandarins, by a gentle unaffected Eloquence. In short, that he never spoke but to the Purpose, and when it was necessary: That while he was at his Meals, or when he was going to Bed, he always observed a profound Silence.

PARAGRAPH III. Rules about Dress.

Ceremonies
when the first Cap is given to young Men.

THE Book I li, speaking of the Ceremonies practised when the Cap is first given to young Men, has these Words. The Master of the Ceremonies, in putting the Cap on his Head must speak thus. Remember that you now take the Habit of the Adults, and that you are now out of the State of Childhood: You must therefore no longer have any of its Sentiments or Inclinations: Assume grave and serious Airs: Apply yourself in good earnest to the Study of Wisdom and Virtue, and thereby merit a long and a happy Life.

According to what is prescribed in the Book of Rites; a Son is not allowed, while his Father and Mother are alive, to be dressed in (+) White. In like Manner, it is forbidden to the Head of a Family, whose Parents are dead, to wear Habits of different Colours, even when the triennial Mourning is expired.

Children must not have silken Cloaths, or Cloaths lin'd with Furrs.

He, says Confucius, who labours to reform his Manners, yet blushes to be plainly drest, and to feed on the coarsest Food, shews, that he has made but little Progress in the Path of Virtue.

PARAGRAPH IV. Rules to be observed at Table.

WHEN you entertain any one, or when you sit at any one's Table, be very observant of all the Punctilios of good breeding: Take Care that you do not eat too greedily, or take too long Draughts in drinking; or make a noise with your Mouth; don't gnaw the Bones, or throw them to the Dogs; don't sipple up the Soup that is left, or shew any desire for any particular Meat or Wine, or pick your Teeth, or blow upon the Rice when it is too hot, or make up new Sauces for the Meats that is presented you. Take very small Mouthfuls: Chew your Victuals well between your Teeth: Let your Mouth never be too full.

Tho' the Table of Confucius was far from being delicate; and tho' he never was very curious about exquisite Meats, he always desired to have the Rice, that was served up to him, very well boiled, and he scarce ever eat any Fish, or any Victuals but what were minced. If the Rice was fermented, either with Heat or Moisture, or if the Victuals began to be in the least spoiled, he immediately perceived it, and never would touch them. Besides, he was very moderate in the use of Wine.

The ancient Emperors have had it in View, to prevent the excessive drinking of this Liquor; when they ordered the Guests at an Entertainment, to make so many Bows to one another at every Glass they drank.

These merry Companions, says Mencius, are in the utmost Contempt, because, they have no other Care but to satisfy their sensual Appetites, and to regale the most worthless Half of their Being, thereby doing an infinite Prejudice to their nobler Part, which deserves all their Care.

CHAPTER IV. Examples drawn from Antiquity with respect to these Maxims.

PARAGRAPH I. Examples of good Education among the Ancients.

THE Mother of Mencius liv'd in a House adjoining to a Field, where there stood a great Number of Burying-places: The young Mencius took a Pleasure in considering the Ceremonies which were practised there; and in his childish Amusements he diverted himself by imitating them: His Mother, who observed him, judged that was not a proper Place for her Son's Education: So she immediately changed her Dwelling, and lived near a public Market.

The (+) White is the Colour of Mourning in China.

The little Mencius, upon seeing the Merchants, the Shops, and all the different Motions of that vast Crowd of People which resorted thither, made it his ordinary Diversion to imitate the same Motions, and the different Postures he had remarked in them. This is still the wrong Place for my Son to receive a proper Education in, said his Mother: So she immediately left that Dwelling, and took a House near a public School. The young Mencius examining what passed there, saw a great Number of young Gentlemen who practised Civility and Politeness; who made mutual Presents, yielding the Place to, and treating, one another, with Honour; going thro' the Ceremonies prescribed, when one receives a Visit; and then, the greatest Diversion the little Mencius had was in imitating them. Now, said his Mother, I have at last hit upon the Means of having my Son rightly educated.

Mencius, when a Child, seeing a Neighbour kill a Pig, asked his Mother, Why he killed that Animal. For you, answered she laughing; he designs to treat you with it: But afterwards, reflecting, that her Son began to have the Use of his Reason; and fearing lest, that, if he should be sensible, that she had a mind to deceive him, he might get into a habit of lying, and of tricking others, she bought some Pounds of the Pig, and had it dressed for his Dinner.

PARAGRAPH II. Examples of the Antients upon the five Duties.

THE Prince of Ki, who has the Title of Tju, that is to say, of Marquis or Baron, seeing that his Nephew, the Emperor Cheu, abandoned himself entirely to Luxury, Effeminacy, and the most infamous Debauches, gave him a serious Advice with respect to his Conduct: But the Emperor was so far from following it, that he shut him up in Prison. While he was a Prisoner, he was advised to make his Escape, and the Means of making it were offered him. That I will not do, answered he, for where ever I go, my Presence will remind the People of the Vices and Cruelty of my Nephew. The Course he followed was, to counterfeit Madness, and to do Idiot Actions: He was afterwards treated only as a vile Slave, and thereby had Liberty to retire from public Notice.

The Prince Pi kang, who was likewise Uncle to the Emperor, seeing that the wise Councils of Prince Ki had no effect: What would become of the People, said he, if the Emperor continues in his Disorders? I cannot be silent: Tho' I should lose my Life, I must represent to him the Wrong he does to his own Reputation, and the Danger into which he puts the Empire: So he addressed himself to the Emperor, who heard him with an Air of Indignation mixt with Fury. It is pretended, says he, that the Hearts of wise Men are different from those of other Men: I want to be certain of this. So he instantly commanded his Uncle to be cut asunder in the Middle, and ordered his Heart to be thoroughly examined if it was formed different from that of other Men.

This cruel Execution coming to the Ears of the Prince of Wey, the Emperor's Brother; When a Son, said he, admonishes his Father three Times without Success, he does not stop there, but endeavours to melt his Heart with Cries, Tears and Groans. When a Minister has three times given a wholesome Advice to his Prince, without any Effect, he is thought to have fulfilled all his Duties, and is at Liberty to retire. This is the Course which I will follow. In effect, he banished himself from his Country, carrying along with him the Vessels which served at the funeral Duties; that there might be, at least, one of the Royal Family remaining, to pay the funeral Rites to their Ancestors twice a Year. Confucius boasted much of these three Princes, and spoke of them as true Heroes who had signalized their Zeal for their Country.

The young Princess Kung kyang, had been promised in Marriage to Prince Kong pi: But this last died before he espoused her. The Princess resolved to preserve the Fidelity she had promised, and never to take another Husband, to which, tho' her Parents much pressed her, she never would consent: She composed an Ode, where she made a Vow to prefer Death to Marriage.

Two Princes of two neighbouring Kingdoms, had some Disputes about a Piece of Ground; of which each pretended to be lawful Lord. They both agreed to chuse Ven vang for the Arbitrator. He is a virtuous and a just Prince, said they, and will soon decide this Difference: Accordingly, they both set out for his Kingdom, into which they had scarce enter'd, when they saw certain Labourers, who yielded to one another a Piece of Ground which was disputable; and Travellers who gave one another the Middle of the Way out of Complaisance. When they entered into Cities, they there saw young Men who relieved the Old of their Burthens, by taking them on their own Shoulders. But when they came to the Capital, and saw the civil and respectful Manners of the Inhabitants, with the reciprocal Testimonies of Honour and Complaisance that passed among them; How insensible are we? said they. We don't deserve to tread upon the Territories of so wise a Prince; and immediately they yielded up the Ground in Question to one another. But as each refused to accept of it, that Piece of Land remains still independent of, and exempted from, all Rights of Lordship.

I shall say nothing upon the third Paragraph, which relates to the Regulation of Manners; Nor of the fourth Paragraph, which is upon Civility and Modesty; because the Examples they contain are taken from the preceding Books, of which I have already given an Account.

P A R T II.

CHAPTER I. Maxims of Modern Authors.

PARAGRAPH I. Containing Maxims upon the Education of Youth.

Advice of an Emperor to his Son.

THE Emperor Shaw Iye, of the Family of the Han, being on his Death Bed, gave this Advice to his Son and Successor. If you have an Opportunity of doing a good or a bad Action, don't say, It is but a small Matter; for we ought not even to neglect the smallest Affairs: There is no Circumstance of good, however slight, but what we ought to practise; nor of evil, however small, but what we ought to shun.

The Instruction which the first Minister Lyew pye gave to his Children, was as follows: If a Man does not take care of his Reputation, said he, he dishonours his Ancestors, and precipitates himself into five Sorts of Vices; against which, one cannot be too much upon his Guard. I will recount them to you, in order to inspire you with the Horror which they deserve.

The first is, the Vice of those who are employed only in Pleasure and Merry-making: Who have nothing in View, but their own Conveniency and Interest: Who study to stifle, in their Hearts, every Sentiment of Compassion which Nature inspires for the Unhappy.

The second Vice is, that of such as have no Taste for the Doctrine of the ancient Sages: Who never blush with Shame and Confusion, when they compare their own Conduct with the great Examples, which, the Heroes of past Ages have left us.

The third is, of such as disdain their Inferiors: Who love only Flatterers: Who are only pleased with Buffoonries, and trifling Discourses: Who look upon the Virtues of others with a jealous Eye, and pry into their Failings, only to publish them: Who make all their Merit to consist in Pride and Vanity.

The fourth is, of those who love only Plays and Entertainments, and neglect their most important Duties.

The fifth is, of such as endeavour to raise themselves to Posts and Dignities; and in order to attain them, have Recourse to the most abject Meanness, and make themselves the Slaves of every Man who has Interest enough to serve them.

Don't forget, my dear Child, added he, that the most illustrious Families have been slowly established by the filial Piety, by the Fidelity, by the Temperance, and Application of their Heads: And that they have been destroy'd with a surprizing Rapidity, by the Luxury, the Pride, the Ignorance, the Whims, and the Prodigality of the Children, who have degenerated from the Virtue of their Ancestors.

Fan she, the first Minister and Confident of an Emperor, had a Nephew who was continually soliciting him to employ his Interest for raising him. As he was young and unexperienced; Fan she sent him the following Instruction:

Instructions of an Uncle to a Nephew.

My dear Nephew, If you would deserve my Protection, begin to practise the Councils which I give you.

1. Distinguish yourself by filial Piety, and your great Modesty: Be submissive to your Parents, and to those who have any Degree of Authority over you: And in all your Conduct, never betray the least Symptom of Haughtiness or Pride.

2. Imprint it well upon your Thoughts, that an extraordinary Application and a vast Compass of Knowledge is required, to fill great Posts. So, lose no Time, and store your Mind with the Maxims which the antient Sages have left us.

3. Entertain a mean Opinion of yourself, but do Justice to the Merit of others, and take a Pleasure to bestow that Share of Honour, on every one, which is his Due.

4. Take Care not to suffer your Mind to be diverted from your serious Occupations, or to be distracted by Amusements unbecoming a wise Man.

5. Be upon your Guard against the love of Wine, for it is the Poison of Virtue. The Man of the finest natural Parts, who abandons himself to so mean a Passion, soon becomes fierce and intractable.

6. Be discreet in your Words; all your great Talkers make themselves contemptible, and often involve themselves in troublesome Affairs.

7. Nothing is more comfortable, than for a Man to make himself Friends; but, be not too anxious about preserving them: And do not be amongst the Number of those People, whom the least Word that is dropt, if it happens to displease them, puts it into a Rage and Anger.

8. We see few that don't listen to flattering Discourses, and who, having tasted Praise that has been artfully gilded, don't conceive a high Idea of themselves: Never fall into this Fault; and instead of suffering yourself to be bubbled by the pleasing Inchantments of Flatterers, look upon them as Seducers, who want to betray you.

9. It is peculiar to the ignorant Vulgar to admire these vain Men, who make a Show of a pompous Equipage, and a long Train of Domestics, of magnificent Habits, and of all the Luxury invented to gain that Preeminence, which is seldom supported by Merit: But wise Men look upon such with an Eye of Pity, esteeming nothing but Virtue.

10. You see me at the Height of Prosperity and Grandeur; bewail me, my Nephew, and envy not my Fortune. I look upon myself as a Man whose Legs totter upon the very Brink of of a Precipice, and who walks upon brittle Ice. Believe me, it is not high Posts which make a Man happy; it is no easy matter for him to preserve them and his Virtue at the same time. Follow then a Council, which is the Fruit of my long Experience; shut yourself up in your House, and there live retired; study Wisdom, fear to shew yourself too frequently abroad, and deserve Honours, by avoiding them. The Man who walks too fast, is prone either to stumble or to fall. Providence is the Dispenser of Wealth and Grandeur; and her Time must be waited for.

PARAGRAPH II. Maxims upon the five Duties.

THE Author enters into a Detail of the Duties of Domesticity: Of the Ceremonies appointed, when the first Cap is put on the Head of young Persons: Of the funeral Honours which ought to be paid to deceased Parents: Of the triennial Mourning: Of the Care with which we ought to shun the Ceremonies introduced by the Sectaries: Of the Duties of Magistrates: Of the Precautions that ought to be observed in Marriages: Of the Love that ought to be among Brethren, and of the Rules of Friendship. As most of these Reflections are to be found in the foregoing Books, I shall only mention some, of which, I have not yet treated.

Maxims of Civility.

Formerly, it would have been a Scandal and a punishable Fault to have eat Meat, or drunk Wine, during the time of Mourning for deceased Parents: How are the Times changed? At present, we see even Mandarins, at a Juncture like that, which is consecrated to Grief and Melancholy, visit and regale one another: They even have no scruple to make up Marriages. Among the Vulgar, the Relations, the Friends, and the Neighbours, are invited to an Entertainment which lasts the whole Day, where they frequently get themselves fuddled. O Morals! What are ye become?

The Rites of the Empire ordain every one to abstain from Meat and Wine, during the time of Mourning, except sick Persons, and those that are fifty Years of Age; these are permitted to take Soups and to eat salt Meat: But they are absolutely prohibited from feeding upon delicate Meats; or to assist at Entertainments. There are still stronger Reasons, for debarring them from all Pleasures and Diversions. But this I don't speak of, for there are Laws established in the Empire to curb such as are guilty of this Excess.

The Superstitious, who believe the Impositions of the Sect of Fo, think that they have discharged the essential Duty with Regard to their deceased Parents, when they load the Idol with Presents, and offer Meat to their Ministers. If you believe such Impostors, these Offerings efface the Sins of the Diseas'd, and facilitate their Entry into Heaven. Hear the Instruction which the celebrated Yengave to his Children. Our Family, said he to them, has always refuted the Artifices of this Sect by learned Writings: Take Care, my Children, never to be caught by these vain and monstrous Inventions.

When you design to marry your Son or your Daughter, seek only in your future Son, or Daughter, in Law, the good natural Temper, the Virtue, and the wise Education they have received from their Parents: Prefer these Advantages to all Honours and Riches. A wise and virtuous Husband, tho' poor and in a mean Station, may one Day make a Figure by his Riches and Dignities. On the other Hand, it is very probable that a vicious Husband, however rich or dignified he is, will fall into Contempt and Poverty.

Qualifications requisite in Marriage.

The Grandeur or Ruin of Families frequently proceed from the Wives. If your Wife has brought you a large Fortune, she will not fail to despise you; and her Pride will soon create Trouble in your Family. I shall grant, that this rich Match has raised and enriched you; but if you have the least Spark of a Soul, will you not blush to be beholden to a Woman for these Honours and Riches?

The Doctor Han used to say; When you marry your Daughter, let it be into a Family more illustrious than your own: For then, she will behave with the Obedience and Respect which becomes her; and the Family will be blest with Peace. For the same Reason, marry your Son into a Family more obscure than your own: For then, you can be sure that he will be easy in his House, and that his Wife will never transgress the Bounds of Respect which she owes him.

Sentiments of the Doctor Han upon Marriage.

The Doctor Shing was in the right, when he said, that to make Friendship more durable, it was necessary that Friends should respect one another, and inform one another of their Failings. If you chuse none for Friends, but such as will flatter you, and divert you with their witty Sayings, their Pleasantry, and their Jest, you will soon see an end of a Friendship so trifling.

And of Shing upon Friendship.

PARAGRAPH III. Maxims of modern Authors, upon the Care with which a Man ought to watch over himself.

AN antient Proverb says, that he who aims at being virtuous, is like a Man who climbs up a steep Mountain; and that he who abandons himself to Vice, is like a Man who descends a very rough Precipice.

The Doctor Fu chung swen, gave this Instruction to his Children and Brethren. Are we to instruct our Neighbours? The greatest Dunces, among us, are clear sighted. Are we to criticize our own Conduct? The most clear sighted become Dunces: Employ your Subtlety in criticizing your Neighbour, upon yourself, and apply the Indulgence with which you treat yourself, to him.

Instructions of the Doctor Fu chung swen to his Children.

The Heart of Man is like an excellent Soil. The Seeds with which it is sowed are the Virtues, Gentleness, Justice, Fidelity, Clemency, &c. The Books of the Sages, and the Examples of illustrious Men, are the Instruments by which the Soil is cultivated. The perplexity of worldly Affairs, and our Passions, are the noxious Herbs, the Thorns which grow in the Soil, and the Worms that gnaw and eat up the Seed: Care, Vigilance, Attention to our Duty, and examining our own Conduct, are the Pains bestowed upon watering and weeding this Ground. In short, when a Man is so happy as to arrive at Perfection; that is the time of the Harvest and enjoying the Crop.

Sentiments of the Doctor
Hü weng ting upon true Wisdom.

The Doctor Hü weng ting explains himself in this Manner: A Man who aspires to Wisdom, ought to neglect the Delights of the Age, and not to suffer himself to be dazzled by the Tinsel Glitter of Honours and Riches. Princes, who are intoxicated with their Grandeur, distinguish themselves only by their Vanity and Pride. They have large Halls sumptuously adorn'd; Tables served with all the Delicacy and Magnificence imaginable; a great number of Lords and Domestics who surround them and court them; Sure, if I were in their Place, I would take Care not to imitate them. He who would be truly wise, ought to detest Luxury; and without debasing his Mind by employing it upon these Trifles, to aspire to more sublime Attainments: He ought frequently to remember the Examples of the celebrated Cheu ko kung ming, who flourished about the end of the Government of the Family of the Han. He lived peaceably in the Town of Nau yang, without Desires and without Ambition; being employed only in cultivating his Lands, and acquiring Wisdom. Liew pi, General of the imperial Troops, by his Intreaties, having engaged him to follow the Profession of Arms, he acquired so great an Authority in the Army, that having made a Partition of the Fields and the Provinces, he divided all the Empire into three Parts. When he was at this high Pitch of Credit and Authority, what Riches might he not have heaped up? However, Attend to the Discourse he had with the Heir of the Empire. I have, said he, upon my Family Estate, 800 Mulberry-Trees for nourishing Silk-Worms: I have 1500 Arpents of Land, which are carefully cultivated; so that my Children and Grand-children may have a plentiful Subsistence. This being sufficient for them, I will take Care not to heap up Riches; I have no other View but to procure the Happiness of the Empire, and to prove to your Majesty the Truth and Sincerity of my Words, I promise, that at my Death, there shall be found neither Rice in my Granaries, nor Money in my Coffers. And in Effect, the Thing happened as he had promised.

PARAGRAPH I. Examples of Education.

A Society for perfecting the Morals.

ONE of the Literati, whose Name was Lyu, born in the City of Lyen tang, formed with his Fellow-Citizens a Kind of a Society, for endeavouring in Concert with one another, to attain to Perfection. They agreed inviolably to observe the following Laws. 1. All the Members of this Society were frequently to assemble, in order to engage, and to animate one another in the Practice of Virtue. 2. They were bound to inform each other of their Faults. 3. They were to unite at the Feasts and Assemblies, and to pass them together. 4. They were to assist one another in their Necessities, and mutually to relieve one another in Troubles and Afflictions. 5. If any one of their Society performed an Action worthy of an Encomium, it was entered in a Register, that the Memory of it might be preserved. 6. If any of them fell into a considerable Fault, it was written immediately in the same Register. 7. Every Member of the Society who was three times admonished of his Faults, and relapsed into them, was for ever excluded from the Society, and his Name struck out of the Register.

Complaint of
rin Hü yuen against vain Eloquence.

The Mandarin Hü yuen, frequently complained that young People, who applied to the Sciences, and aspired to the Magistracy, followed only a vain Eloquence, without being at Pains to fathom the Doctrine of the ancient Sages, or to form themselves upon their Examples. For which Reason, he explained to his Disciples, only what was most important in the ancient Books, with respect to the Regulation of Manners, and the Virtues required in good Government: In his Discourses, he sought only to unfold the Sense of the ancient Books; and despising the Flowers of Eloquence, he advanced nothing but what was supported by solid Reasonings. His Reputation soon spread on all Sides: And in a very little Time, upwards of a thousand Scholars, made a vast Progress under so able a Master.

While he was Literary Mandarin in the City Hü cheu, he erected two Schools. In the one, none were admitted but those who had a very eminent Genius, and had, for a long Time before, applied to the Study of the Doctrine of the Ancients, and to comprehend all that was most Sublime in them. They who had distinguished themselves by their Prudence, were admitted into the other, where they were taught Arithmetic, the Exercises of their Arms, the Rules of Government, &c. This great Number of Disciples, dispersed themselves all over the Empire. And as they were distinguished from the Vulgar by their Wisdom, their Modesty, and Integrity, it was enough to see them, for one to know that they were Disciples of the Mandarin Hü yuen.

PARAG. II.

PARAGRAPH II. Examples upon the five Duties.

THE young Sye pau minding nothing, but to render himself expert, and to acquire Virtue: His Father, who had married a second Time, took such an Aversion to him, that he drove him from his House. The young Man, who could not endure to part with his Father, wept Night and Day, and still hung about the House. The Father proceeded to Threatnings, and from Threatnings to Blows: The Son was then obliged to retire: But built a little Hut near his Father's House; where he went every Morning to rub and cleanse the Halls, as he had done before. This put the Father into a still greater Passion; he caused the Hut to be demolished, and banished his Son absolutely from his Presence. Sye pau never gave over for all this: He sought out a Lodging in the Neighbourhood, and went every Morning and Evening to present himself before his Father to offer him his Service. A year past thus, and yet the severe Manner in which he was treated, could not diminish his Tenderneſs and Piety. At last, his Father began to make Reflections upon the Injustice of his Hatred; and after having compared the Harſhneſs of his own Conduct, with the tender Love which his Son bore him, he yielded to the Sentiments of Nature, and recalled his Son about his own Person. Sometime after, Sye pau lost his Parents: After having performed a Mourning of three Years, his younger Brothers proposed to divide the Effects, to which he consented: But what was his Conduct afterward? Behold, said he, a Number of Domestics in a decrepid Age, and incapable to serve any longer: I have known them for a long Time, and they are formed according to my Humour: As for you, ye will have some Trouble in managing them: So, they may live with me. Behold some Houses half ruined, and Lands that are barren: I have helped to cultivate them from my tenderest Youth, and I will reserve them for my self. There is nothing now to divide but the Moveables: I will take these half broken Vessels, and that old Furniture which is falling into Pieces; I have always made use of them, and they shall be my Portion. Thus, tho' he was the elder Brother of the Family, he took for his Share all the Refuse of his Father's Household: And his Brothers, having soon squandered all their Fortunes, he divided with them what remained of his.

When yu, who made himself so famous throughout the Empire, relates, that it was to the wife Councils of his Mother, he owed all the Lustre of his Family. One Day, says he, she took me apart and spoke to me thus: "Having gone to visit a prime Minister, who was one of my Relations; after all the Compliments were past, You have a Son, said he to me, if ever he comes to any Dignity, and if you hear that he is poor, and scarce has whereupon to live; you may thence draw a good Omen for all the future Part of his Life. If, on the contrary, it is told you, that he is vastly rich; that his Stable is filled with the finest Horses, and that his Cloaths are fine: Look upon this Luxury and these Riches, as a certain Presage of his approaching Ruin. I have always, continued she, remembered this Reflection, in which there is so much good Sense. From whence can it proceed that Persons, who are raised to dignities, can every Year send such large Sums and rich Presents to their Relations? If it proceeds from their Frugality, and from abridging their Expences, I shall be far from blaming them: But if it is the Fruit of their Extortions, what Difference is there betwixt these Mandarins and common Robbers? And if they have Dexterity enough to screen them from the severity of the Laws, how can they endure themselves, and not blush with Confusion?"

When the Dynasty of the Han reigned; a young Girl, whose Name was Shin, at sixteen Years of Age married a Man, who, soon after his Marriage, was obliged to go to the War. When he was just departing, I know not, said he to his Wife, if ever I shall return from this Expedition: I leave a very aged Mother, and I have no Brethren who can take Care of her: Can I rely upon you, that if I die, you will charge yourself with this Duty? The young Lady agreed to this with all her Heart, and her Husband went to the Campaign without any Uneasiness. A little time after, News came of his Death, and the young Widow performed her Promise, by taking a particular Care of her Mother in Law: She spun, and wrought at Stuffs every Day, that she might earn whereupon to subsist her. When her three Years of Mourning were expired, her Relations designed to give her another Husband: But she absolutely rejected that Proposal; and informing them of the Promise she had made to her Husband, she told them that she would rather embrace Death than a second Marriage. So resolute an Answer stopped the Mouths of her Relations: And being thus become Mistress of her own Fortune, she lived eight and twenty Years with her Mother in Law, and gave her all the Assistance she could have expected from the best of Sons: The Mother in Law dying when she was upwards of eighty Years of Age, the Daughter sold all her Houses, Lands, and Possessions, that she might give her a magnificent Funeral, and purchase for her an honourable Burying-Place. This generous Action, had such an Impression upon the Governor of the Cities of Whay ngan and Yang chew, that he gave an Account of it to the Emperor in a Memorial which he presented upon that Head: And his Majesty to reward the Piety of the generous Lady, caused 4240 Ounces of Silver to be given her, and exempted her from all Taxes during the rest of her Life.

Under the Reign of the Dynasty of the Tang, the Sister of the first Minister of the Empire, whose Name was Ky sye, was dangerously sick: While her Brother was warming a Drink for her, his Beard took Fire: His Sister, touch'd with this Accident, Ha! Brother, said she, have we not a great Number of Servants? why will you put yourself to that Trouble? I know that, answer'd he, but both you and I are old, and perhaps I shall never have Occasion again to perform to you these little Pieces of Service.

Pau byau so being Governor of the City King sau, which is now called Syen ngan, a Man of the lowest Rank, came to him. I formerly had, said he to the Governor, a Friend who sent me a hundred Ounces of Silver: He is now dead, and I want to pay back that Sum to his Son, but he absolutely refuses to receive it: I beg you would cause him to repair hither, and order him to take what is his Due: In the mean time, the Debtor deposited the Money in the Hands of the Governor. The supposed Creditor appeared by the Orders of the Governor, and protested that his Father never had sent a hundred Ounces of Silver to any one. The Mandarin, not being able to clear up the Truth, inclined sometimes to give the Money to the one, sometimes to the other, but neither of them would receive it; both refusing it, as not being their Right. Upon which, the Doctor Liew yang cried out, Who will now say, that there are no longer any Men of Probity? Or who will now pretend that it is impossible to imitate the Emperors Tau and Shun? If any one advances such a Paradox, I will go no farther than this Instance to confute him.

Su quang, who had been Preceptor to the apparent Heir of the Crown, presented a Petition to the Emperor Swen ti, in which, having laid before him, that he was in a very advanced Age, he begg'd Leave to retire to his House: The Emperor granted his Request, and presented him with a large Sum of Money: The Prince his Pupil, made him a considerable Present likewise; and the good old Man returning to his Country, ordered, that his Table should be always well served, that he might entertain his Neighbours and ancient Friends, asking from Time to Time of his Steward, how much Money he had yet left; and ordering him to purchase every Thing that was best in its Kind.

This Expence alarmed his Children, who went to their Father's Friends, that they might engage them to make Representations to him upon that Head. We hoped, said they to the Friends, that when our Father had arrived at Honours and Riches, he would have endeavoured to establish his Family upon a solid Foundation, and to have left us a large Estate. Yet you see what expence he is at in Entertainments and Feasts; Would he not employ his Money much better in purchasing Lands and Houses? The Friends promised to talk with the old Man; and having found a favourable Opportunity, let fall some Insinuations to him, with regard to the Reasons of his Children's Complaint.

I am surprized at my Children, answered he: I believe they think that I am a Dollard, or that I have forgot what I owe to my Posterity. Let them know, that I will leave them in Lands and Houses, what will be more than sufficient for their Maintenance, if they know how to manage it? But do not let them flatter themselves, that by increasing their Fortune, I will contribute to feed their Indolence. I have always heard it said, that to bestow Riches on a wife Man, is the means of enervating and weakening his Virtue: and that to bestow them upon a Fool, is the way to encrease his Vices. In one Word, the Money which I expend, was bestowed upon me by the Emperor, for the Comfort and Recreation of my old Age; Is it not therefore just, that I should use it according to his Intention; and that I should divert myself with my Relations and Friends, that I may the more gayly spend the short Remainder of my Life?

Remarkable
love of Chastity in two young Women.

Tang seu had two Daughters, the one nineteen, and the other sixteen Years of Age; both of them possessed of great Beauty, but of greater Virtue; tho' neither of them had any other, than a common Country Education. A Troop of Robbers, who at that time infested the Empire, broke all of a sudden into the Village where the two Girls lived: Upon which, they concealed themselves in the Cavities of the Mountains, that they might escape their Insults and Cruelties. They were soon discovered by the Robbers, who were dragging them along as Victims appointed to satisfy their brutal Passions. Having walked with them for some time, they came to the Brink of a Precipice. It is much better, said the elder Sister to the younger, to lose our Life than our Honour; and immediately jumping down the Precipice she expired upon the Spot. The younger Sister, almost at the same instant, followed her, but did not die by the Fall; having only both her Legs broken. The Robbers frightned by this Sight, held on their Way, without enquiring any farther. The Governor of the next City informed the Emperor of what had happened, and his Majesty, to eternise the Memory of so noble an Action, bestowed a magnificent Encomium upon the Virtue of the two young Women, and exempted their Family, and the Village in which they lived, from all Taxes, for ever.

An Instance
in Brethren.

Leau yung lost his Parents when he was a Child: But he had three Brothers, with whom he was very intimate; they all lived together in the same House, and their Fortune was common to them all. It happened, that all the four Brothers married; and their Wives soon broke the Harmony: They could not bear with one another, and they were every Moment disputing and quarrelling; at last, they demanded a Division of the Fortune, and a Separation of the Families. Leau yung was sensibly afflicted at this Demand: And the better to prove how much his Heart was touched: He assembled his Brethren, and their Wives in his Apartment: He then shut the Door, and taking a Staff, he struck himself severely upon the Head: Ah! Unhappy Leau yung, cried he, what does it now avail thee to have watched continually over your Actions, to have applied thy self to the study of Virtue, and to have meditated incessantly upon the Doctrine of the ancient Sages? You flattered yourself, that you might one Day by your Example, reform the Manners of the Empire, and yet you are not able to establish Peace in your own Family.

The

This Sight made a lively Impression upon his Brethren and their Wives: They threw themselves at his Feet, and dissolving into Tears, promised to reform their Conduct. In effect, there was no more Noise heard: A good Understanding was re-established in the Family, and a cordial Union amongst them all succeeded.

PARAGRAPH III. Examples of the Care with which we ought to watch over Ourselves

THE Mandarin Ti-ti-lun was one Day asked, If, since he had first endeavoured to attain to Virtue, he had ever succeeded so far, as to divest himself of Affections for particular Persons? I perceive, answered he, that I have not, and my Reasons for thinking so are as follow: Sometime ago, a Person offered me a Horse that was so swift and so sprightly, that he would travel a thousand Furlongs in a Day: Tho' I refused this Present from one, who perhaps had some selfish Views in offering it, yet, when ever any body was proposed for filling up a vacant Post, that Person's Name came always in my Mind. Likewise, when my Son has any slight Indisposition, tho' I know that his Life is no way endangered, yet I cannot help passing whole Nights without Sleep, in an unaccountable Uneasiness; which instructs me, that my Heart is not yet free of all Affections that are not perfectly regular.

The Mandarin Lyeu quon was so much Master of himself, that the most extraordinary, and the most unforeseen Events, never affected the Peace and Tranquillity of his Soul. His Wife, one Time, undertook to put him in a Passion, and gave her Maid Orders for that effect, which was punctually executed as follows. One Day, when he was preparing to go to Court, and had dressed himself in his most magnificent Habits, the same Maid threw down a Kettle which entirely spoiled his Mandarin's Robes, and hindered him from appearing before the King that Day. The Mandarin, without altering his Countenance, was satisfied with saying to the Girl, in his ordinary calm Manner, Have you scalded your Hand, Child? and then he retired to his Apartment.

The Mandarin Yang shin, made such Encomiums upon one of the Literati, whose Name was Vang mye, that the Emperor intrusted him with the Government of the City of Shang. One Day, as Yang shin was passing by that City, the same Governor immediately came to pay him his Compliments; and offered him at the same Time a hundred and sixty Ounces of Silver. Yang shin giving him a severe Look, When I formerly knew you, said he, I took you for a wife Man, and, accordingly I recommended you to the Emperor: How happens it that you don't know me? Let me persuade you, answers the Governor, to accept of this small Mark of my Acknowledgment: It is now dark, and no body can know any thing of the Matter. How! replies the Mandarin, no body know any thing of the Matter! Does not Tyen know it? Do not heavenly Intelligences know it? Do not I know it? Do not you yourself know it? How then can you say that no body knows any thing of the Matter? These Words covered the Governor with Shame, and he retired in Confusion.

Cbung in, was three Times General of the Troops of the Empire. In this high Station, he never valued himself upon having fine Horses, and being bedaubed with Perfumes. All his leisure Moments, were employed in Reading: He laid no Stress on the vain Prefaces that are sometimes spread abroad, and was very cautious how he informed the Emperor of them. He detested all Sectaries, especially those of Fo and Tau. When his Soldiers fell into any Fault, he was rigid: When he was relieving the Poor and the Orphans, liberal. His Granaries were always full of Rice, in order to supply the Wants of the People in a time of Famine: He carefully kept up public Inns; and was magnificent in his Entertainments. In short, when he understood that there were, in the Place where he was at the Time, any Girls of an honourable Family, but poor, and without Relations, he took it upon himself to provide for them: He then found out Husbands for them of an equal Quality with themselves, and furnished them handsomely with Marriage Cloaths.

In the Visits which the Doctor Lyeu paid to his Friends, he sometimes spent more than an Hour in discoursing with them, without in the least bowing his Body, and all this while keeping his Breast and Shoulders immovable, nor was he seen to move either his Hands or his Feet: And such was his Modesty, that he appeared to be a speaking Statue.

Li ven tsing (A) caus'd a House to be built for himself near the Gate of the imperial Palace: One of his Friends told him, that the Vestible was not large enough, and that a Man on Horseback could scarcely turn himself in it: This House, answered he with a smile, will one Day belong to my Children, and the Vestible is large enough for the Ceremonies that will be performed at my Funeral.

Together with several other Pieces, collected by the Emperor Kang hi.

A D V E R T I S E M E N T.

THE admirable Polity, and fine Order observed in the Chinese Empire, are owing to the Maxims contained in those ancient and valuable Books, of which I have given the Reader a Summary.

If it is demanded, whether this State, in so long a Tract of Time, under so many different Monarchs, and amidst such a Variety of Revolutions, is not impaired in its Vigour, and degenerated from the Wisdom and Strictness of these Institutions? The best Answer to this will be gathered from the Chinese themselves, by perusing the History of their different Dynasties, in the Collection made by the Orders, and under the Inspection of the late Emperor Kang hi, of which I give a faithful Translation done by P. Hervieu, an ancient Missionary in that Empire.

This Collection contains, 1. The Edicts, Ordinances, Declarations, and Instructions, of several Emperors, sent to Kings, or Tributary Princes; either upon the Subject of good or bad Government, or the Care they ought to take in their Choice of Ministers; or to recommend to the People the filial Duties, and an Application to Agriculture; and to Magistrates, Disinterestedness, and the Love of the People; or to stop the Progress of Luxury, and other Abuses in their Government. 2. The Discourses of the most able Ministers, sometimes upon the public Calamities, and the means of relieving the People; sometimes upon the Arts and Difficulties of Governing, upon the Management of War, the Advancement of Learning, and the Qualifications of a Minister: Or else, against the Corruptions introduced into the ancient Doctrine by different Sects, and especially that of the Idol Fo, upon the Falseness of Auguries, and against those who propagate them, &c. At the End of almost every one of these, you meet with short Reflections made by the late Emperor Kang hi, and written with the red Pencil, that is, with his own Hand.

I shall add to these, Extracts from a Collection drawn up under the Dynasty of the Ming, which immediately preceded the present one; treating of the Duties of Sovereigns, Ministers of State, and Generals of Armies, and the Choice to be made of them; of Politics, of Hereditary Princes, of Remonstrances made to the Emperors by their Ministers; of good Government; of the Daughters of Emperors; of such as abuse their Princes Favour; with Discourses by the most able Ministers, upon different Heads relating to the State.

I shall subjoin another Extract from a Chinese Book, intitled, The illustrious Women, by which it may be seen, that under all the different Reigns, the Ladies of this Empire have formed their own Conduct, and regulated that of their Families, upon these very Maxims.

This kind of Tradition incontestably proves, that the fundamental Principles of the Chinese Constitution have been always observed; and hence we may conclude, that it is by no means surprizing, if so large an Empire has subsisted so long, and still continues in its full Lustre.

Edicts, Declarations, Ordinances, and Instructions of the Emperors, &c.

Some Time after Tsin shi whang, King of Tsin, was made Emperor, there was a Design to remove all who were not Natives of Tsin from their Employments. Li tse, who was a Native of the Kingdom of Tsin, and who had been very instrumental in promoting Tsin shi whang to the Imperial Throne, made the following Remonstrance to the Emperor in favour of Strangers.

GREAT Prince! As there is a Report that an Order is entered the supreme Tribunals, by which all Strangers are removed from their Posts: Permit me to make a most humble Remonstrance upon this Head. One of your Ancestors followed a different Conduct. Zealous to search for Merit where ever it was; he had no regard to the Distinctions of Climate. That Part of the West, called (*) Yong, furnished him with (†) Yew yu; he had Pe li ki

(*) The Name of a Country.

(†) A Man's Name.

from Wan in the East, and finding the means of drawing to his Court, Tsu shu, Pi bu and Kong jun chi, all Foreigners, he gave them Employments; and their Services were of such use to him, that having subdued twenty petty States, he finished his glorious Reign by the Conquest of Si yang.

Hyau kong, during his Reign, saw a prodigious Change in the Kingdom of Tsin. The Manners of his People were reformed, his Kingdom grew more populous, Himself more powerful, and his Subjects more happy and contented. The Princes his Neighbours loved and respected him; and the Troops of Tsu and Wbey, who durst attack him, were defeated, while he enlarged the Bounds of his Kingdom above a hundred Leagues. To whom did this Prince owe his Successes? Was it not to the Councils of Sbang yang his first Minister? And was not this Minister a Stranger?

Wbey yang with equal success, made use of the Abilities of Chang i, a Stranger too, to annex to his Crown those Conquests which you well know, and of which your Majesty at this Day reaps the Advantages.

Could Chau yang, if unaided by the Councils of Tan bi, have destroyed Yang bew, expelled Hu yang, confirmed his Family in Possession of the Throne, rooted up Faction, and reduced the Princes his Neighbours to depend upon him for the common Supports of Life? In short, could he have raised Tsin to the Reputation of an Empire, in all Respects excepting the Name? It was the Councils of Strangers, that influenced all the Actions of these four Princes of your August House.

Permit me now to ask your Majesty, What Harm has your State ever suffered from the Strangers you have employed? On the contrary, Is it not certain, that had the Princes I mention excluded Strangers from their Councils, as your Majesty is now advised to do; their State would never have been so powerful; nor had the Name of Tsin been so celebrated. Besides, when I consider the several Things in Use about your Majesty's Person, I see Mount Qyen furnish you with precious Stones, Sui and Ho with Jewels, and Lung with Diamonds. The Arms you wear, the Horse you ride, even your Ensigns and your Drums, are either composed of foreign Materials, or embellished with foreign Ornaments. Why then do you make use of them?

If not to be a Native of Tsin, is sufficient to shut a Man out of all Employments, however great his Merit and Fidelity may be, to act consistent with this Maxim, you ought to throw out of your Palace, your Diamonds, your Moveables of Ivory, and your other Jewels. You would then banish from your Court, the Beauties of Chin and Wey. If it is an established Rule, that nothing foreign ought to find a Place in the Court; why do they present you every Day with those Ornaments of Pearls and the like, which adorn the Heads of your Queens? Why don't the Gentlemen, who are so violent Enemies to whatever is foreign, begin their Reformation, by banishing from your Court its greatest Ornaments, and oblige your Majesty to send back to Chau, even the Queen your Consort. In short, the Chinese Music consists only in two or three Instruments, one of Earthen-Ware, and one of Bone, which, both together, make but a very sorry Harmony; and would it be reasonable to desire your Majesty, to prefer their doleful Sounds to the sprightly Music of Chin and Wey? No, sure! Since then, Sir, in Affairs of Pleasure, you are presented with, and freely use the best of every Kind, let it come from what Country it will; must you be debarred of that Liberty in your Choice of Men? Must you reject without Enquiry, and without Distinction, every Man who was not born in this Country? Such a Conduct would shew that you prefer your Diversions to the Happiness of your Subjects.

It is not by these Means, that Tsin sees her self Mistress of so many other Countries: The large Rivers and Seas receive, without Distinction, all the Brooks that fall into them. Hence it is, that their Deepness is unfathomable: A Prince who is seriously resolved to accomplish himself in good Qualities and Virtues, ought to act thus. Such formerly were our (*) five Ti, and our three Yang. They regarded only a Man's Wisdom and Virtue, without enquiring into his Country. And it was by this, and the Assistance of (†) Quey shin, that they at last had no Enemy to struggle with. At present, to dismiss by a Decree, so considerable a Number of your Officers distinguished by their Merits, of which your Neighbours will make their Advantage, and to exclude for ever from all Employments, every one, who is not a Native of (‡) Tsin, is, as the Proverb says, to furnish Arms to a Robber, is to give Advantages to your Enemies, in Prejudice of your own Subjects; to weaken yourself at Home, and to raise up Enemies against your self abroad; to imagine, that the Sentence which is entered, is either necessary or useful, is, in my Opinion, to impose upon your own Understanding.

[The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] In former Times, whoever had Wisdom and Abilities was esteemed. Princes courted these Sort of Men with Presents and Employments, if they would accept of them, into their Service; so far were they from rejecting or banishing them, only because they were Foreigners. To make the best use of good Qualities wherever they are found, is a wise Maxim. Li tsé, Author of this Piece, was at the Bottom a bad Man: But there is no Reason for that, to despise the Good he advises.

On Occasion of an Eclipse in the Days of the Han, the Emperor Ven ti ordered the following Declaration to be Published.

I Have heard it said, that (||) Tyen always gives to the People he creates, Princes to nourish and govern them. If these Princes are worthless Men, and bad Governors, Tyen, to bring them to their Duty, either punishes or threatens them with Calamities.

(*) Ti, Emperor, Lord, Master, Sovereign. Yang King. These three Yang, as they are commonly stil'd, have been in the Number of their Emperors. As for the five Ti, it is not agreed who the Persons are, to whom this expression relates.

(†) The Quey shin. Nothing in the Text marks a Plurality.

(‡) Eeg is said to have advised Tsin shi cabang, to cause the Books of China to be Burned.

(||) Heaven, or the Lord of Heaven.

In this 11th Moon, (*) there has been an Eclipse of the Sun; what a Warning is this for me? On the one Hand, I reflect that upon my weak Person is devolved the Care of supporting my Family; of keeping the People, the Officers, the Princes, and the Kings that are under me in their Duty; and in short, of making my Empire happy. On the other Hand, when I consider, that, tho' charged with such a Burthen, I have but two or three Persons, at most, who help me to support it; I am sensible of my own Insufficiency: Above, the Stars lose their Light; below, my Subjects are pressed with Want; in all these I read my own Defect of Virtue.

As soon as this Declaration is published, let it be the Business of my People with the utmost Attention, to examine into my Conduct, and inform me of my Faults; and let this last Employment be entrusted with Persons of Understanding, of Integrity, and Resolution, sought out for that Purpose, and who shall be presented to me. For my Part, I recommend to all in Offices under me, to apply themselves, more than ever, to a conscientious Discharge of their Duty, especially by retrenching all unnecessary Expences to the People. I will set them an Example, by recalling from my Frontiers all my Forces, except such as are absolutely necessary for their Defence.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] In the (†) Shi king we read, All invisible as he is, he still is at Hand, so that there is no time in which it is permitted us to relax in our Duty to Shang ti; but when an Eclipse of the Sun happens, which is as it were a Warning from (‡) Tyen, we ought then to redouble our Diligence and Cares to appease him.

One of the Glosses speaks thus;] This is the first time that any of our Emperors, on occasion of public Calamities, or extraordinary Phenomena have desired to be told of their Faults. But since the Days of Ven ti, there are many other Instances.

Another Declaration of the same Emperor Ven ti repealing a Law against Criticising the Form of Government.

IN the Days of our ancient Emperors, there was exposed on the one Side of the Court a Sheet, upon which any one might write, and propose any Amendments for the good of the State; and on the other Side of the same Court, there was a Board fixed, upon which might be marked what ever was conceived to be blameable in the Administration.

This was in order to facilitate Remonstrances, and procure good Advice to the Prince. At present, I find among our Laws, one which makes it criminal to speak ill of the Government: This Law is the Means not only of depriving us of the Advantages we might receive from the Correspondence of wise Men, who are at a Distance from us; but even of stopping the Mouths of the Officers about our own Court. How shall a Prince ever after this, be made sensible of his Faults. This Law is subject to another Inconveniency, which is this: Under pretence that the People have already made public and solemn Protestations of their Fidelity, Submission, and Respect, to the Prince, if any one amongst them seems in the least to depart from these Protestations, they are liable to be prosecuted as Rebels: It puts it in the Power of Magistrates arbitrarily, to construe the most indifferent Discourses into Sedition against the Government. Thus, simple ignorant People may be accused of Treason without any Thoughts of committing it, and convicted of a Capital Crime. No! I can never suffer the Continuance of such a Law, so let it be abrogated.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Tsin shi wang made a great many Laws, such as this; Kautsu, Founder of the Dynasty of the Han, had abrogated a great Number of the same. The Law spoken of here, was only abrogated under (*) Ven ti, which was too late.

Another Declaration of the same Emperor Ven ti, importing an Order to deliberate upon the Repeal of another Law, by which, the Relations of a Criminal were involved in his Punishment.

LAWS being the Rules of Government, ought, if possible, to be faultless. Their Ends are, not only to punish Vice, but to protect Innocence. Yet I find among our Laws one still in force, by which, when a Man is criminal, his Father, his Mother, his Wife, and Children, are involved in his Punishment, and the least Punishment they have to dread, is Slavery. This Law is by no means to my Liking. It is a common and a true Saying, that Laws when perfectly just, are the surest Means of keeping the People in their Duty. When Punishment falls only upon the guilty Head, all the World approves of the Judge. The first Duty of a Magistrate is to guide the People, like a good Shepherd, and to prevent their going astray. If our Magistrates have not succeeded in this, and have still Laws to judge by, not entirely consistent with the strictest Equity, these Laws, tho' originally designed for the Good of the People, turn to their Prejudice, and favour of Cruelty. Such seems to me the Law I have mentioned; of which I cannot see the good Tendency. Let it be maturely deliberated, whether it is not necessary to repeal it.

The Emperors Kang hi's Remark.] These wise Princes, the ancient Emperors, often descended from the Majesty of their Throne, to bewail and to weep over the Guilty. How unreasonable was it to include, in the Punishment of a Malefactor, his Father, his Mother, his Wife, and Children. Ven ti wanted to have this Law abolished; whence we may conclude that he was a good Prince.

Another Declaration of the same Emperor, importing, a Remission of the half of his Revenue in Grain, for the Encouragement of Agriculture.

THEY who have the Government of People in their Hands, ought to inspire them with all possible Concern for what ever is necessary to the Good of the State: Such, without Doubt, is Agriculture.

For this Reason, I have been inculcating this important Point, these ten Years. Yet I cannot observe that they have enough laboured the new Grounds, or that there is greater Abundance of Grain. On the contrary, with Grief, I see Famine painted upon the Faces of the poorer People. Surely, either the subordinate Officers and Magistrates have not had a just Regard to my Ordinances on this Head, or, they are improper to fill the Rank they possess. Alas! If the Magistrates, who are immediate Witnesses of the People's Misery, are regardless of it, what effectual Remedy can I apply for their Relief? This must be thought of. In the mean Time, I remit Half of my Revenue in Grain for the current Year.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Nothing is more just in itself than this Declaration; and it is admirably well expressed: Even to this Day, it is affecting, and what must it have been when it was first published?

There are in the same Book, a great many other Declarations of the Emperor Ven ti, of the same Nature with this last, which proves him (says Kang hi) to have been a Prince of vast OEconomy.

Another Declaration of the Emperor Ven ti, importing, an Order to deliberate upon changing Mutilations into other Punishments.

I HAVE heard it said, that in the Times of (*) Shun, the Execution of an Effigies, was sufficient to keep the People within their Duty. Happy Government! At this Time, for Crimes not Capital, we have three Sorts of (†) Mutilations very real and very severe. And yet there are every Day terrible Crimes committed. To what is this owing? Is it to my being destitute of the Virtues and Qualifications required to instruct my People aright? Yes, sure it is! The Faults my Subjects commit, and the Necessity there is of punishing them accordingly, are to me the greatest Subjects of Confusion. The Sbi king, animating a Prince to the right Government of his Subjects, says, that he ought to be to them as a Father and a Mother; yet, if any of my Subjects commits a Fault, even thro' Ignorance, he is immediately punished; and the Punishment is such, as disables him ever to repair it by a better Conduct. This pierces my Heart. What a Torture must it be to the poor Sufferers, when they commit a Fault, if they are so mutilated as to be, for ever after, incurable? But how severe does such a Law shew the Prince to be? Is this being a Father and a Mother to his People? Then let the Abrogation of this Law, come immediately under Deliberation: I ordain, that these Mutilations be changed into other Punishments; And it is likewise my Pleasure, that those who have been chastised more or less, according to the Nature of their Faults, be, after a certain Time, readmitted to the same Privileges with the rest of my Subjects.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] It may be said, that the abrogating these Laws, will give greater Encouragement to Offenders, to act unpunish'd; and by this means increase their Numbers; but at the same Time, it should be considered that those Mutilations, and the Disgraces that attend them, deprive the Sufferers of almost all the Means of repairing their past Conduct. (§) To change these Punishments for others, such as whipping with Rods, will save a great many poor Wretches.

Another Declaration of the same Emperor Ven ti, on account of the Prayers and Supplications offer'd in his behalf by many Officers who were negligent of their Duty.

I AM now arrived at the 14th Year of my Reign; the longer it continues, the more I am sensible of, and confounded at, my own Want of Abilities; tho' I have not hitherto failed to discharge, every Year, the prescribed Ceremonies both to Shang ti and my Ancestors. I am sensible, that in these Ceremonies, none of our antient and wise Kings had any Eye to their private Interest, or petitioned for what is term'd Happiness. So far were they from this, that they set all Considerations either of Blood or Interest aside, in order to raise an able worthy Man, tho' no ways related to them; and preferred the wise Advice of another to their own natural Inclinations. Nothing is more beautiful and wise, than so disinterested a Conduct in great Princes!

At present, I understand, that many Officers outdo one another, in their Prayers for good Fortune, the good Fortune of what? not of my People, but of my Person: This is what I cannot relish. If I approved that Officers, indolent in their Duty, and unattentive to the Well-fare of my People, should be entirely employed in the personal good Fortune of a Prince, who has so little Virtue as I have, it would be a considerable Addition to my Failings. I therefore ordain, that my Officers, instead of these pompous Petitions for me, should give all possible Application to a conscientious Discharge of their Duties.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] It is the Virtue of an Offering, not the Contents, that renders it agreeable. When, in good Earnest, we seek for Virtue, the Gifts of (*) Tyen come of Course. How ridiculous was it for the Officers of the Empire to imagine, that, by only repeating some Forms of Prayer, they could procure Happiness to their Prince? Ven ti was certainly in the right to condemn such an Abuse.

Tsing te yew, one of the famous Literati under the Dynastie of the Song, remarks of this Declaration: That if there were any Defects in the State, Ven ti attributes them all to himself; and with regard to Happiness, he disdained all that was not in common with his Subjects. In this, he was a true Imitator, and a worthy Successor, of our ancient Princes.

Another Declaration of the same Emperor Ven ti, importing, that Men of approved Virtue and Merit might be sought for, and presented to him.

THE great Yu was at extraordinary Pains, to procure virtuous and able Persons to assist him in governing wisely. The Orders he published for this Effect, were not only published within the Bounds of the Empire, but were known a great Way beyond them; and we may say, they were unknown only to Countries, inaccessible to Ships, to Chariots, and to Men. Every one, both far and near, esteemed it both a Pleasure and a Duty to communicate to him their Knowledge; by these Means, this great Prince was never seen to take one wrong Step, and became the Founder of a long and a flourishing Dynastie.

Kau ti, in later Times, has taken the same Precautions in founding our Dynastie. After he had delivered the Empire from its Calamities, his first Care was, as much as he could, to furnish himself with Men of Merit. All such he put in Posts, and recommended nothing so strongly to them, as to help him to govern aright. Aided by the powerful Protection of Tyen, and the Fortune of his Family, and peaceably possessing his large Kingdom, he extended the Effects of his Goodness even to neighbouring People. (†) From him, you know it, the Empire devolves on me. You know likewise (for I have often told you so myself,) that I have neither Virtue nor Qualifications sufficient for the Weight of Government.

This engages me to publish the present Declaration; to enjoin all who are in Posts in my Empire, from the Prince, to the simple Magistrate, to enquire carefully after Persons of Merit for my Service. Such, for instance, as know the World perfectly well; others who have a thorough Understanding of all Affairs relating to the State; but above all, such as have Resolution and Honesty enough, to inform me freely of what they think amiss in my Conduct. I require a good Number of all these to supply my Defects. In the mean Time, such of you as are in the Rank of (§) Ta fu, must aid me in this, as far as you can. All that is essential to be examined, are the following Points. 1. My daily and my personal Faults. 2. The Defects of the present Administration. 3. The Injustice of Magistrates. 4. The Necessities of the People. Explain yourself upon these Heads, in a Memorial drawn up on purpose. I will read it, and, in so doing, perceive whether your Zeal for my Service extends so far as it ought; and I will not think it real, if, from the Beginning to the End of that Memorial, you do not speak with Freedom, and without sparing even my Person. Take Care, Ta fu; it is no Trifle ye are about, but an Affair of the greatest Consequence; and endeavour worthily to acquit your selves of what I give you in Charge.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This is the first Declaration an Emperor ever published, in order to procure able Counsellors. The Shortness and Aptness of the Style in this Piece, are in the ancient Taste.

Another Declaration of the same Emperor Ven ti, upon the Peace concluded with Tan yu a Tartar Prince, towards the North of China.

FOR many Years past, my Subjects have suffered a good deal, and my Neighbours and Allies, yet more. The Irruptions of the Hyong nu have been frequent. I am sensible they have cost many Lives on both Sides, and have Reason to believe that much of the Mischief has been concealed from my Knowledge. I cannot see my People suffer so long without being sensibly affected, and the more so, because I have always looked upon myself as the Author of it; for, if I had more Wisdom and Virtue, these Misfortunes would have been prevented. In this continual Distress, I have been Day and Night, meditating on the means to procure a lasting Peace, both at Home and abroad. To this alone, tend the frequent Motions of my Ambassadors. I have omitted nothing to make (||) Tan yu sensible of my real Intentions, which are equally calculated for the good of his Subjects and mine. Tan yu at last comprehends them, and acknowledging their Justice, desires to contribute to the common Good of both. We therefore have agreed, mutually to forget what is past, and to live in Friendship for the Good of the World. In this Year I can say, I have acquitted myself of the first Duty a Prince owes, which is to establish Peace in his Family.

(*) Heaven.

(§) An important Post, in the Empire.

(||) Tan yu was a Relation of Yen lu's.

Declaration of King ti, Successor of Ven ti, enjoining Compassion in judicial Proceedings against Criminals.

LAWS and Punishments are necessary, in order to prevent or stop Mischiefs; but at the same Time, it ought to be remembered, that they who are once put to Death, can never be brought again to Life. Now it often happens, that corrupt Judges sacrifice an innocent Person, to, either, their own, or another Man's Passion; and thus, barter away the Lives of Men. It even happens, that some, tho' disinterested in Appearances, yet seek at the Bottom, to acquire a Character, at the Expences of another, by giving the specious Names of Vigilance and Justice to the vilest Subterfuges, and the most unwarrantable Severities; thus, destroying many of their fellow Subjects, and even some Officers of Distinction. This occasions to me great Uneasiness, Grief, and Compassion: But, on the other Hand, as Punishments are necessary, and Laws must ordain them, what I think myself obliged to ordain, that these Abuses may be as much prevented as possible, is this. When, in the strict Sense of the Law, a Man is capitally convicted, if there are any Circumstances by which the Public favours the Criminal, let this be regarded, and a Mitigation of the Sentence take Place.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Edict is well expressed; the Emperor King ti was a clear sighted, and an intelligent Prince, which appears still more by his Tenderness and Clemency.

Another Declaration of the Emperor King ti, recommending to the People Agriculture, and to Magistrates Vigilance and Uprightness.

TO what end serve so many Sculptures, and such a Profusion of empty Ornaments? They are not only unnecessary, but mischievous, by taking up a great Number of Hands, who might be employed in Agriculture. Why too, so many Embroideries and Bawbles, which now amuse our Women, formerly more usefully employed in the Manufactures of wearable Stuffs and Cloths? By the Men's pursuing other Arts than Agriculture, the Lands are become desert; and by the Women's leaving for Trifles, our profitable Manufactures, whole Families are destitute of Cloathing. It seldom happens, but that People, who want Food and Rayment, run into all manner of Evil. I, every Year, cultivate the Earth with my own Hands, and the Empress my Consort, rears Silk-Worms. It is with the Labours of our own Hands, that we furnish out Part of the Ceremonies paid to our Ancestors. We think it our Duty to act thus, that thereby, we may give a good Example, and animate our Subjects to Agriculture, and procure Plenty in the Empire. With the same View, I refuse Presents, I suppress unnecessary Offices, and retrench every thing else as much as possible, that the Taxes may be proportionably diminished. There is Nothing, Nothing! I have so much at Heart, as the Improvement of Agriculture. If it once flourished, Plenty would follow of Course, and Reserves might be laid up against the Times of Scarcity. Then should we no longer dread those Days, when Famine prompted the Strong to spoil the Weak, and Troops of Robbers deprived poor Families of the Necessaries of Life. If Agriculture flourished, we should no more behold the Young cut off by misery, and violent Deaths, in the Bloom of Life; and every one would have enough to make his Life glide gently on to the Brink of old Age. Instead of this, we now feel a Year of pinching Want; what occasions this Calamity? Do I suffer myself to be imposed upon by Hypocrisy and Fraud in the Distribution of Offices? Are the Magistrates remiss in administering Justice? Have the Officers of the Tribunals, under Pretext of collecting my Revenue, oppressed my Subjects? In fine, are there any, who trampling upon the most essential Laws, and whose Business it is to suppress Robbers, yet secretly share in their Rapines? We strictly charge all the principal Officers of our Provinces, that they will, more than ever, watch over the Conduct of their inferior Officers, and inform our Ministers of the Culpable. And for this Effect, we ordain, That this our present Declaration be published throughout all our Dominions, that every one may be instructed in our Intentions.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Declaration comes directly to the Point, and there is not a Word in it but what has this Tendency. What this Prince remarks of inferior Officers, shews, he was acquainted with the most private Hardships of his People.

Declarations of the Emperor Ven ti, recommending to his Subjects, that they would give him Advice in his Administration, that they would instruct him in certain Points, and speak to him with Freedom.

BEING raised as I am, by a singular (*) good Fortune to the Throne of my Ancestors, that I may transmit it to my Posterity; and charged with the Government of a great Empire, that I may encrease its Splendor, I am no less full of Gratitude for the Honours done me, than sensible of the Weight of Power. Day and Night since my Accession, have I incessantly applied myself, yet, I have Grounds to fear that many Things have escaped my Vigilance; and that I have committed many Faults. For which Reason, I have recommended to all the (†) Chu hien, and to all others in the Empire, to find out Persons capable to instruct and assist me in the great Art of Governing.

(*) This alludes to his being preferred to the Succession by his Father, before his elder Brother.

(†) Tributary Princes.

You then (†) Ta fū (a Rank which I see you with Pleasure worthily possess) you I say, who are at the Head of those hitherto presented to me, read this with Attention. The Point upon which I demand your Advice is this. I hear that under our 5 Ti and our 3 Vang, the Empire enjoyed a charming Tranquillity; and yet, that in Order to preserve it, they made Use only of some very simple Regulations, and a few pieces of Music. Since the Death of these Princes, the Form of their Bells, their Drums, and other Instruments, have been transmitted to us. But their Government has met with a different Fate: It has fallen by little and little to Ruin. Under (*) Kye, Cheu, and others like them, there did not remain almost a Vestige of it.

What surprises me most is, that in the Space of 500 Years betwixt the time of Ven vang, to the last Reigns of the Dynasty of Cheu, there have been several good Princes and worthy Ministers, who have opposed the Corruption of the Age, and full of Esteem for the ancient Government, have endeavoured to re-establish it, but in vain. Things went from bad to worse. Is this to be attributed to the fault of Men alone? Ought we not rather to say, that Things happened thus by the supreme Decree of (†) Tyen? From whence proceeded the Prosperity, of our three first Dynasties? And what was the first Cause of their Decay and Ruin?

I have heard many, both of the naturally Wise and Virtuous, of those who are born dull, and those who are viciously enclined, make a Distinction of long Life and untimely Death. Both the one and the other, say they, is to be attributed to Nature and Fate. This I have a Thousand Times heard, but am far from being satisfied on that Head. While I expect some Satisfaction from you in this Point, I shall inform you of what I have chiefly at Heart: I require, that every one voluntarily, and without Constraint, should do his Duty, and that the Vicious may be restrained and reclaimed, by the most gentle Laws, and the mildest Punishments. In short, that my Subjects being united may live in Contentment, and that the Government may be faultless. I want to have again the seasonable Returns of Dews and Rains, that render the Fields fertile, and the Trees abounding in Fruits. That no terrible Phenomena may be seen in the Stars, and that the Seasons may again be regular. In fine, I want, aided with the powerful Assurances of Tyen, and the constant Protection of Quey shin, to make my Empire every Day more flourishing, my People more happy, my Neighbours, and, if possible, all the World, to share in that Happiness.

You see Ta fū, what I wish for. From you I expect great Assistance in these Points: From you who are so thoroughly acquainted with the most remote Antiquity, with the Government of our wisest Princes, and with the Springs upon which the good or bad Fortune of Empires depend. But what I chiefly recommend to you is, that you proceed regularly, and not upon too many Articles at once, discussing first one Subject, then another; thus advancing by Degrees, till you are perfectly well informed, of all that is most essential and of greatest Use in every Point. Whatever Faults you discover in the Officers of my Empire, whether they lie in the want of Virtue, Disinterestedness, Zeal, or Application, let me be informed of them, without omitting any Thing. As for what relates to my own Person, speak it out boldly; for that End use no Artifice, or Disguise, and dread no troublesome Consequences. Apply yourselves incessantly to draw up a Memorial on these Heads; which, when done, I shall read.

In Pursuance of the above Declaration, Chwen ti hong shu drew up a Memorial for the Emperor, (an Extract of which I shall give below) with which, Ven ti was so well pleased, that in order to procure another, made the following Declaration.

It is said of (†) Sbun, that when walking peaceably about, with his Arms folded, he was giving the Enjoyment of perfect Peace to the Empire. It is said, on the contrary, of (||) Ven vang, that in order to keep every Thing in Order, he put himself to prodigious Pains; the Care of his People employed him so much, that many Times, the Sun was set, before he had broken his Fast. Whence did this proceed? Why did the one Prince toil so much, and the other so little? Was it on Account of their different Maxims? I know not, if I am mistaken, but I think I have discovered the Reason of so remarkable a Difference. In the Times of Sbun, all the native Simplicity of the first Ages still prevailed. In the Time of Veng vang, Pomp and Luxury had got footing. In Effect, we find by our ancient Books, that about the Beginning of the Dynasty of the Cheu, were introduced large Chariots, richly adorned and painted, glittering Arms which were sometimes adorned with precious Stones. Then were introduced Consorts of Music, and magnificent Balls; but no such Things were known in the Reign of Sbun: The Maxims of his Days, were, that if any one had a fine Stone without any Blemish, to engrave a Figure upon it, was not to embellish, but to spoil it: Under the Cheu, a contrary Maxim prevailed, which was, that Virtue must be aided, and supported with a little Embellishment.

In Times more distant from one another, the Difference was still as great; severe Laws were then instituted to keep Men in their Duty, and Mutilations were frequent. These Laws were abolished under the Cheu; and under Kang vang Criminals were so few, that the Prisons remained empty, during the Space of forty Years. Punishments came again in Use under the Tsin; then a horrible Massacre ensued, but it never diminished the Number of Offences. An infinite Number then perished. One cannot reflect on it without Horror and Compassion: But alas!

(†) A Degree of Honour, to which he had elevated Chwen ti hong shu, the most esteem'd of the wise Men that were presented to him.

(*) Names of very bad Princes. (†) Heaven.

(†) A famous Prince.

(||) Another famous Prince among the first of the Dynasty of the Cheu.

Alas! It is by calling it continually to Mind, and by comparing what passed under the Emperors my Predecessors, that I endeavour to improve, so as to support the Dignity of my Crown, and to procure the Happiness of my People.

I aim chiefly at promoting Agriculture, and filling Offices only with worthy Men. To set my Subjects a good Example, (§) I labour the Ground with my own Hands. I honour those who distinguish themselves in this Labour, and frequently send Emisaries into the Country to find them out. I inform myself with great Care of the Poor, the Orphans, and the Helpless; In short, I am incessantly contriving to render my Reign glorious, by making my People virtuous and content. Notwithstanding of all this, I cannot say, that I have been successful. The Seasons are irregular, the Air is tainted, Diseases abound, Numbers of People die, and my Subjects suffer a great deal. I know not to what I should attribute all these Misfortunes, unless to this, that in spite of all my good Intentions, some Corruption reigns among those I have put in Offices. It is in order to examine this so intricate and necessary Point, that I have brought to my Court many knowing Men, whom I have searched for in all Parts.

To you then, my Lords, to all and every one of you, this Declaration is addressed. We strictly charge you, carefully to examine into the Defects of the Government. In those Points that differ perhaps from wise Antiquity, examine, if the Difference is grounded on Reason, or Negligence. Lay open to us your Thoughts: Disclose the Ways and Means you think proper to procure Redress of the growing Evils, and do it in an exact Memorial; in the drawing up of which, we expressly charge you to take Care of two Things. 1. That you shall not confine yourselves to talk to me in fine Language; but restrict yourself to what is practicable. 2. That neither Respect nor Fear shall hinder you from speaking with Freedom; for such is our Will.

In the Book, from which these Pieces were taken, are several other Declarations of the Emperor Vu ti upon the same Subject, with the two foregoing. Kang hi says of one of them, This Piece alone, shews that a polite fine Diction obtained in the Time of Vu ti. I shall not be positive that these are the Emperor's Words. One thing is certain, that an Author, named Ching te hew, is cited immediately after, who says: "That the Declarations of Vu ti are too laboured. They have, continues he, Taste and Style, but are at the same Time vague and empty: I love those of (||) Vu ti much better; the Language is more simple, but not less beautiful; and at the Bottom, they come more directly to the Point in whatever is real and solid." I find in the same Book, other Declarations and Ordinances of the same Emperor Vu ti, either containing, Acquittances of what were his Dues, or Orders to supply the Old and the Poor out of his Treasury. Upon which, the Emperor Kang hi says; Vu ti in all these imitated his Father King ti, and his Grand-father Ven ti, but not in their OEconomy. He exhausted his Treasures by a thousand Expences; and towards the end of his Reign found himself in very bad Circumstances.

Chau ti, youngest Son to Vu ti, succeeded him: In this Book I only find two Pieces of his, whereof the first is very short. The occasion of its being written is as follows. Han fu and four others, were presented to him as Persons of distinguished Merit, exemplary Virtue, and great Capacity; but at the same time, he was given to understand that they wanted to live retired, and not to concern themselves with Affairs; from which they hoped his Majesty would excuse them. Upon this Chau ti published the following Order.

I HAVE an equal Love and Esteem for Han fu and his Friends. Qualified as they are for great Employments, I am willing to spare them the Fatigues. I therefore consent that, being free of all Cares, they be only employed in advancing, by their Discourses and Examples, every one in his own Country, the Practice of all the Virtues, especially filial Piety. As a Testimony of my Esteem for them, I ordain my Officers, who are upon the Spot at the beginning of every Year, to make a Present to each of them, at my Expences. (*) If any Misfortunes happen to them, I order a (+) Coverlet to be furnished to them, and suitable Habits at my Cost likewise; and that the funeral Honours paid them, be such as are due to a Person of the second Rank.

Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] For a Prince thus to deprive himself of a good Minister, is, in Effect, to gain him. Their Discourses and their Examples form a great many able and virtuous Men.

Tang wang, King of Yen, tho' of the Blood Royal, entered into a Party against the Emperor Chau ti, who thereupon sent him the following Letter sealed with his own Seal.

KAU TI, from whom we have both of us the Honour to descend, when he came to the Crown, gave to all the Princes of his Blood Appanages, in order to strengthen his Family. Since his Days, the (†) Lyu having endeavoured to undermine us; all the Lye ti remained firmly united against them as common Enemies. They had Prince Kyang and others on their Side. The Lyu were extirpated, and our Family, in the Person of Ven ti, kept Possession of the Throne.

(†) A Family, that by means of an Emper's Consort aspired to the Crown.

The Families of Fan, the Ki, the Tsau, the Yuan, to which Kau ti was so much indebted for their Fidelity and Services, after being considerably encreased, found themselves in a short time as it were, blended with others of all Ranks and Conditions. Numbers of them contentedly laboured the Ground, and suffered a great deal without repining; and a few, from Regard to the Figure they once made, were raised, but none above the Rank of Hew. This you know, and, at the same Time, are not ignorant, that our Family met with a different Treatment. Without once appearing in the Field, or doing the least Service, they were admitted into, as it were, a Partnership of the Empire: They had a Territory assigned them, they were honoured with the Title of Vang, or King, and were furnished with considerable Sums. Such was the Conduct of Kau ti to those of his own Blood; and these Favours have been perpetuated so ever since his Time, that the Succession has continued from Father to Son; and where the elder Son was dead, it devolved upon the younger; so that it is to your Blood that you owe all you are. And it is against that very Blood, which now ennoble you, that instead of the Affection you owe to me as the Chief of your Family, you are caballing against me, with People who don't in the least value you. You are forming, or at least supporting, a rebellious Party. If it is granted to the dead to be conscious of what passes here below, with what Face dare you appear at the Myau of your Ancestors, when you perform the usual Honours to their Memories?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Grave, the Solid, and the Tender are so intermixed in this Letter, that they support and illustrate one another. Besides, the Style is well connected, and has a great deal of the Pathetic.

A Gloss.] Tan, when he received this Letter, opened it, read it, and strangled himself upon the Spot.

Declaration of the Emperor Suen ti, importing an Order, that Persons might be presented to him, who were distinguished for filial Piety.

CONSCIOUS as I am, of my own Inabilities and Insufficiency, I endeavour to supply my other Defects by a constant Attention to the Necessities of my Government, in which I employ myself Day and Night. The just Fear I have of disgracing my Ancestors, makes me call in to my Assistance, Persons distinguished for their Character and Merit. Notwithstanding of all this, and other Methods I take, I have yet failed of Success in the Reformation of Manners. Reflecting to Day on what Tradition informs us of; That filial Piety is the Basis of all other Virtues; I ordain, that from every Government, one distinguished for this Virtue be presented me: I want to honour and promote all such according to their Capacities.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Han succeeding immediately to the Tsin, that is to say, to Times of Trouble and Corruption, nothing was more needful than the Suppression of Immorality and the promoting of Virtue; thus we see that since Ven ti's Days, You ti and others have made this their main Study.

Another Edict of the Emperor Suen ti, importing an Exemption from all Attendance on public Services, to those who had lost their Father or Mother.

ONE good Method to retain Subjects in a quiet Submission is, to inspire them with a Love of the filial Duties. But it happens now adays, that without Regard to such as have lost their Father or Mother, they are employed as other People in public Services; so that a disconsolate Son cannot peaceably pay his last Duties to his Parents. If he has the least Spark of Piety, this Violence must pierce his Heart. I am touched with Compassion at such a Case, and ordain, that henceforth, he who loses his Father or Mother, his Grand-father or Grand-mother, such a one shall be exempted from Attendance on public Services, to the intent that he may provide a decent Funeral for them, and freely acquit himself of all the Duties of a good Son.

The same Emperor (Suen ti) published a Declaration, by which he for the future dispensed with a Son's accusing a Parent, or a Wife her Husband, but made it Capital for a Father or a Husband, to conceal certain Crimes of his Son or of his Wife. Upon which the Emperor Kang hi remarks, that this Distinction is founded upon good Reasons.

Yu, younger Brother of Yuen ti (both Sons of Suen ti, tho' by a different Mother) was, when young, made Vang, or King of Tong ping. When he grew up, he committed some Extravagancies which disoblged his Mother, who on her Part exasperated him worse. Yuen ti gave his Brother some Advice, and then wrote to his Mother in the following Terms.

I The Emperor, charge all my Eunuchs upon Duty, that they forward this Letter to the Queen, Mother of the Vang, or King, of Tong ping.

Some Things, Madam, have come to my Ears, which makes me beg Leave to suggest to you, that the Happiness of Families united within themselves by the strictest Ties of Blood, consists in Unanimity; and their Destruction is occasioned by nothing so much, as Discord. It is said, that the King of Tong ping, under the Pretext of the high Rank he holds, grows grows in Insolence in proportion as he advances in Years. That he neglects his Studies, and abuses his Officers; and, even seems, a little to forget the Respect he owes to you. These are Faults, but after all, they are Faults that many wise Princes have not been entirely free from at his Age. An ancient Maxim says, that it becomes Parents to conceal the Failings of their Children. Reflect a little, Madam, upon this Maxim; and on the Relation, in which you and your Son stand to one another. Tho' you live and breathe separated from each other, yet the same Blood and the same Spirits are diffused thro' both your Bodies. Can any Ties be more strict, and should any Trifle have power to break them? In former Times, Cheu kang in advising Pe kyū, recommended to him, among other Things, never to break with a Friend, but for very weighty Reasons. If bare Friendship requires a mutual Forgiveness of many Injuries, judge by this, Madam, I intreat you, of your present Case. Besides, I have sent a Messenger to the (*) Vang your Son, and I have given him some Advice about his Conduct. He does not excuse, but acknowledges, his Faults, and repents of them. You, Madam, on your Part, take care by a Behaviour full of Indulgence, Tenderness, and if there is occasion for it, of Patience, again to cultivate Harmony with him.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Advice is very well conceived, and ought to have had its Effects. The Historian Pau kū says of Yuen ti, that all the Orders which he gave in Writing, were full of a Sweetness and Openness entirely in the ancient Manner. He is certainly in the right, and this Piece proves very well what he advances.

Declaration of the Emperor Ching ti, Successor to Yuen ti, recommending to the (†) Hew and other great Men, to take Care to avoid all unnecessary Expences; and that none be allowed to wear Cloths, or have Equipages, &c. above his Rank.

OUR ancient Princes, in establishing the Titles of Honour with so much Wisdom, had an Eye principally to distinguish the Ranks in the State; but at the same Time took Care, that the Chief should be filled with Persons of the greatest Virtue. To do the greater Honour to them, these Distinctions in Chariots and Habits were regulated, that were so scrupulously observed by Antiquity. According to the Maxims of these great Men, Riches gave none a Right to dispense with the Observance of the Laws. This Usage was a continual Lesson inculcated thro' the whole Empire, and taught that Virtue was preferable to Riches. People then saw many as noble Examples of this, as they saw Persons in a Station superior to their own.

How vastly is the Scene now changed? We now behold only Luxury and ridiculous Expences: This Evil encreases every Day. The Kong, the King, the Hew, and those who either as my Friends, Relations, or Officers, approach nearest to my Person, instead of entering with me into Sentiments of Zeal and Compassion upon these Extravagancies, authorise them by their own Examples. Instead of continually watching over their own Conduct as they ought to do, and by duly observing the (‡) Rites, setting a just Pattern for the People, they are employed in nothing, but their own Vanity and Pleasures. They build large Houses, lay out vast Gardens and Ponds, and harbour about their Persons a Pack of idle Slaves. They refine every Day upon their Dresses, and strive who shall have the greatest number of Bells, Drums, and singing Women. To conclude, in their Chariots, their Dresses, their Marriages, their Funerals, and every other Article, their Expences are extravagant. Those of the Magistrates and People who are rich, follow their Examples; and these Excesses pass into a Custom.

While these Disorders last, how can Modesty, Temperance, and wise OEconomy flourish in the Empire? How, if these Virtues are wanting, shall we escape suffering bad times? Is it possible that every one shall always be above Necessity? O! How good Reason had the (§) Sbi king to say: "Ye, whose Rank and Employments raise you above the Level of the common People, watch carefully over your own Conduct: Your Inferiors, who always have you in their View, will be sure to follow your good or bad Examples."

By these Presents, we enjoin our Ministers and Magistrates to labour for a Reformation of these Abuses. Black and Green, are the only Colours which all the Commonality should be allowed to wear; and let them not be permitted to use any other. We recommend to all the Hew, and others who have Access to our Person, that they examine this Point, and that they be the first to bring about, by their own Example, so necessary a Reformation.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Declaration, exactly answers the End of establishing these Distinctions: Those who are above others, by possessing their Ranks agreeably to the Law, set to all the Nation a Pattern, of what is called, genteel Frugality: Which, without doubt, is a great Step to the Reformation of a State: For by it, Luxury, that fruitful Source of Calamities, falls to the Ground. And as those who have great Employments, Dignities, and Estates, are the most apt to forget themselves on this Head, Ching ti went directly to the Point, by addressing himself to them.

Declaration of the Emperor Ngay ti, for reforming Music.

At present, three great Abuses prevail among us; Profuseness in Entertainments, and Apparel; an Itch after Numbers of vain Ornaments, and a Passion for the tender effeminating Music of (||) Chin and Wey. Prodigality ruins Families in the third Generation: and by it the whole Empire becomes poorer. The Itch for vain Ornaments, occasions Multitudes of People to attend only very useless Arts, and to neglect Agriculture; and effeminating tender Music inspires Licentiousness. To pretend, while these subsist, to introduce Plenty and Innocence into a State, is to seek a pure limpid Stream from a muddy Fountain. Confucius had a great deal of Reason to say, that the Music of Chin should be avoided, because it inspired a Looseness of Manners.

By these Presents, we discharge our Band of Music, and all the Officers attending on it. As for the ordinary Music in the Ceremonies of Tyau, and the musical warlike Instruments, we do not pretend to alter them; these are approv'd of in our (*) King, but no Officers are appointed for these Purposes. We will that it be enquired into, to which of the other Officers it will be proper to commit the Management of these Matters.

The Emperor Kang hi, who pign'd himself upon being a lover of Music, makes the following Remark upon this Declaration.] Music has the Virtue to calm the Heart, and for that the wise Man loves it. Besides, in diverting himself with it, he may exercise himself in governing well, by an easy and just Application of the Government in Music. But with Regard to wanton Music, that admits of no Comparison. Ngay was in the right, to retrench such a number of needless Expences.

A Gloss.] The Emperor saved, by this Reformation, the Pensions and Entertainment of above 440 Persons.

Discourse of Kya 'han, upon good or bad Government. Address'd to the Emperor Ven ti, formerly called Hyau wen.

SIR, I have heard it said, that a good Minister is he, who having the Honour to serve a Prince, employs in his Service all his Abilities; and above all things, testifies his Zeal by sincere Remonstrances, without disguising any thing, tho' it should cost him his Head. Possess'd of such Dispositions, I now proceed to discourse to you upon Government. I shall not go far out of my Road to seek for an Example, to illustrate the Difference betwixt the Good and the Bad. The History of the Tsin who immediately preceded the Han, will furnish me with such an Instance, and I beg your Majesty to run it over with me, and to give some Attention.

In the first Ages, Literati of small Fortunes, and poorly habited, were frequently seen to advance themselves to the highest Honours, by their Virtue and Wisdom, and to immortalise their Names by their important Services to the State. It was not thus in the Days of the Tsin. Shi wang, a Prince of that Family, by becoming Master of the Empire, thereby became Master of its ordinary Revenues; but not satisfied with these, he loaded the People with new Taxes and Vassalages, till his Severity reduced them to such a State of Misery, that knowing they had nothing worse to fear, the Mountains were infested with Robbers, and the Roads filled with Criminals, whom the Officers of Justice were always dragging to Prisons, and to Punishments. At last, he alienated the Affections of his People so much, that they eagerly watched the least Breath of Sedition; and waited only for the Signal, for they were ready to follow any one who should give it, to shake off their heavy Yoke.

Chin shin gave that Signal: This, great Sir, you know, and you likewise know the Consequences. Besides, if Shi wang ruined the People by Taxes, he likewise ruined himself by his Expences. In a Journey he made from Kyen yeng to Yong, he changed his Palaces 300 times, and found every one of them furnished, without carrying any of his Moveables from the one to the other; nay, not so much as the Drums or Bells (†). Many of the Palaces he dwelt in were so prodigiously large, that they appeared rather Mountains than Houses. They were sometimes built to the Height of several scores of (‡) lin. From North to South they extended a 1000 Paces, and from East to West, half a League. The Number and Richness of his Equipages were answerable to the Magnificence of his Buildings. Where did all this Profusion end? Why! in his Descendants, being deprived even of a thatch'd House.

Shi wang caused large Roads to be laid out for his Couriers, even to the breadth of fifty Paces, lined with earthen Walls, and planted with Pine-Trees and other Evergreens, which formed one of the most agreeable Sights in the World. Where did all this end? His Children of the second Generation, had not a Bush into which they could creep for Safety.

Shi wang choose for his Burying-Place the Mountain Li; some hundred thousands of Men were employed upon it for ten Years: They dug a prodigious Ditch of (§) a vast Depth; within, there was heaped up precious Stones, and Metals of all Sorts; and the Ornaments on the Outside, consisted of the most beautiful Varnishes, in the most vivid Colours, with even the finest Pearls

(||) These are the Names of a Country, formerly two petty Kingdoms.

(*) Old Books that regulate these Affairs.

(†) Tsing te shew says, that under the Han Dynasty, Ky shan was the first who gave Advice to the Emperor in Writing; he was encouraged to this by the good Dispositions of Hyau wen who created him a Hou.

(‡) Tang king chuan says upon this Passage, Kya shan had Energy, but his Style was not correct. This may be owing to his living near troublesome Times.

(§) A Measure of eighty Feet.

(§) The Chinse says, that it penetrated even to three Sources, an Exaggeration alluding to some Fable like that of the ancient Poets about Hell. In other Places they mention nine Sources.

Pearls and other Jewels. Round one of the upper Stories ran large Galleries, and behind all, there was raised a Mount for Pleasure, planted with the most agreeable Woods. This was a great Expence for the Burying-place of one Man? I say of one Man; for his Descendants were obliged to beg a few Feet of Earth for that Purpose, and could not procure a small Roof of Reeds to cover it.

At last, Shi wahang, like a wild Beast, having cruelly torn in Pieces all the Chu bew, swallowed down, if we may so speak, the whole Empire, and trampled upon all the Laws of Humanity and Justice. But the Vengeance of (*) Tyen soon overtook both him and his Family. These are the Matters I have presumed to suggest to you, and I beg you would attend to them, and make a good Use of them.

It is true, the Subject who is zealous and faithful, is little regarded by his Prince when he speaks without Disguise; and it has often happen'd that he has ruined himself, without having it in his Power to serve his Prince. But at the same Time it is as true, that it is, almost always, very difficult for a Sovereign to govern well without such a Monitor, and as the most understanding Princes have always had a true Zeal for hearing sincere Advice, the most loyal Subjects have not fear'd to expose even their Lives, that they might give, to the Prince they served, this Testimony of their Duty.

But it is with Princes in this Respect as with Soils. The best Grain when sown upon a stony Ground, far from multiplying, does not so much as grow. On the other Hand, a rich well watered Soil, encreases even the worst Seed committed to it. For Instance, under (†) Kye and Chew, the Advices of Yuan long, Kit se and Pi kan three great Men of consummate Wisdom, had no other Effect upon them but to hasten them to their Ruin. Under Ven wang it was otherwise, he not only had Men of Sense about his Person, who cheerfully and successfully communicated their Lights to him; but there was not the least Scullion about his Palace, who durst not speak his Mind freely; and if his Advice was good, it was even followed: The Consequences were answerable, (‡) Kye and (§) Chew perished with their Families, while that of Ven wang flourished.

A good Prince then ought to do the same by those who are capable to assist him, that a good Soil does by the Seeds committed to it; it nourishes them, and multiplies them as much as possible. Such is the force of Lightning, that there is nothing but what it penetrates: Should a Weight of 1000 (||) Kyun fall from a Height, it would infallibly crush whatever was beneath it. And yet these Comparisons are weak to shew what the Authority of a Sovereign is, with Regard to a Subject. Even, when he opens a Way to Remonstrances, when he desires they shall be made, when he takes them in good Part, and amends by them; yet still there remains some Dread in the Subject, who seldom goes so far in this Point as he can. What would be the Consequences, if a Prince, self-opiniated, cruel, headstrong, and blinded by his Passions, should fall with all the Weight of his Authority upon those who advised him? Tho' they had all the Wisdom of Yau, and all the Firmness of Mong pwen, they could not fail of being crushed. But then, a Prince of this Character would be soon left to himself, and then he would commit still greater Faults, yet no Body would dare to advise him; till, by an infallible Consequence, the State would be in very great Danger.

In the first Ages, our wise Princes were seldom without a Man attending them, whose Duty and Office it was, to remark their Faults, and to keep an exact List of them. They had besides, two Officers, one of which was employed to read in Prose to the Prince, whatever Acts of Government were transacting in the whole Empire; and the other, in collecting all the Verses and Songs which were in Vogue. Not only Ministers of State and Persons in Offices, freely gave necessary and important Advices in all Affairs as they occurred, but even People in high Ways and in Streets, without any Dread, discoursed of what they disliked in the State. Thus the Prince was perfectly well instructed both in his Duties and in his Defects. Can any Thing be more conducive than this, to the Ends of good Government? Not that our Ancestors were ignorant of the Difference between Subjects and Sovereigns, or of what was owing to the Rank they held: But they were not less exact in respecting old Age, in furnishing themselves with good Ministers, in raising Men of Merit, and, as far as they could, in procuring sincere Advice. In the Deference they shewed to (‡) old Men, which went so far as even to serve them with their own Hands, their View was to promote filial Piety in Families. They, as it were, associated in the Government, able Men; because they well knew how apt a Person is to be intoxicated with Power, and blinded with Passion, when elevated above the Level of Mankind. In short, they opened a large Field for Remonstrances, because there was nothing they so much dreaded, as by being ignorant of their Faults, not to have in their Power to correct them.

(‡) He of the Dynasty.

(§) Note that the Name of the Dynasty, Chew, whatever Resemblance is otherwise, is when written and pronounced in the European Manner very different, both in the Chinese Writing and Pronunciation, from the Name of that bad Prince.

(||) Kyun was thirty Pounds.

(‡) There was a Ceremony established for this.

Did Sbi wbang want great Qualifications? By no Means. After having subdued the Empire, and destroyed the six Kingdoms into which it was divided, he divided it anew, into Kyun (*) and Hyen (†), which he governed by very worthy Officers. On the Side where he had most to fear, he fortified himself with a long and a vast Wall. He himself entered in as minute a Detail of the Affairs of his Empire, as any Man can do into those of a private Family. Notwithstanding of all this, his Troops were defeated by (‡) Ghin; and the Empire passed to the Lyew; because Sbi wbang, who was full of himself, listened to nothing but his Avarice and his Pride.

Under the Dynasty Cheu, the Emperors erected 1800 petty States, every one of which had its Prince, and every Prince his Rights. Yet the Land was subject only to the Tax of a simple Tithe, and the Persons of the People only to three Days Average in a Year. The Subjects easy and contented, by their Songs celebrated the Mildness of the Government, and the Virtue of their Princes, who on their Parts, were furnished with a decent Plenty. Sbi wbang Master of these 1800 States, squandered his Revenue and ruined the People, and still not having enough for satisfying his Ambition and maintaining his Vanity, he redoubled his Cruelties and Exactions. There was not a Family, nay, not a single Man in the Empire, who did not inwardly look upon him as their most cruel Enemy, and secretly load him with a thousand Curses.

At last, Sbi wbang, tho' in the most imminent Danger of losing all, was the only one who was easy; having met with some precious Stones in a Voyage, he was so full of self-conceit, that he caused his Exploits to be engraven upon them, and without any Scruple, raised himself far above Yau and Shun. The Posterity of our most fortunate Princes, has never been able to maintain themselves upon the Throne, beyond the twentieth or thirtieth Generation. Sbi wbang promised to himself, a Succession of 10000 Generations in his Family. He laughed at the ancient Custom, of having Titles of Distinction determined after Death; he was resolved to fix (§) those of himself and his Descendants before-hand. He called himself Sbi wbang ti, as being the first Emperor of his Family. He ordered that his Successor should have the Appellation of Eul shi wbang ti, to denote his being the second of the Family, and so on for 10000 Generations, or rather, for Eternity. In the mean time Sbi wbang died. There succeeded an universal Insurrection of the Empire against his Son, who was as worthless as himself, and in a short time, lost at once his Empire and Life. In him ended the Dynasty of Tsin.

But let us enquire once more, why Sbi wbang ti did not perceive the melancholy dangerous Situation, to which he had reduced his Affairs? It was because no Person about him durst talk to him; because, intoxicated with Pride, he rigorously punished the least Murmur; because any one who pretended to give him a sincere Advice, was sure to forfeit his Head: and because he gave to his Ministers neither Authority nor Credit. He proved by his Misfortune, the Truth of what is advanced by our Shi king: "Will a Prince hear? Then he is spoken to. Do's he hate Advice? He receives none; but there is nothing more dangerous for him than such a Silence." Ven wang understood the Truth of this Maxim, and acted in a different Manner. So the same Shi king says to his Praise: "Appear Men of Merit, and boldly disclose yourselves; you are in Safety under such a Prince, whose greatest delight is to see your Numbers encrease."

And indeed, to reap all the Advantage that can be expected from the Councils of Men of Merit, you must both love and honour them. Such was the Conduct of our ancient and wise Princes towards their Ministers. They not only rendered them powerful and rich, by bestowing upon them large Pensions; but they distinguished them yet more, by singular Marks of their Favour and Regard. Was a Minister sick? the Prince visited him, without minding how often he did so. Did a Minister die? The Prince went into second Mourning, and in Person performed the (§) Tyau, seeing him dressed according to Custom, and put into his Coffin. Till these Ceremonies were over, the Prince abstained from Meat and Wine; denying himself Music, till after the Funeral; and he was so very strict in this, that he did not even use it in the Ceremonies performed in Honour of his Ancestors, if they interfered with those of his Minister's Burial.

If our ancient Princes so much distinguished a Minister when dead, they likewise entertained a vast Regard for him when living. Did they pay him a Visit? it was always according to the Rites, in their Habits of Ceremonies, and with Decency and Gravity. The Minister on his Part, exerted himself in every Instance, in the exact Performance of his Duties, and dreaded Death less than the not answering the Favours of his Prince. Thus, every thing prospered, and many after Ages felt the happy Influences of that Reign. At present, your Majesty seated on the Throne of your Ancestors, calling to mind their Actions and their Virtues, shows the greatest Dispositions to imitate them; and by a Reign still happier than theirs, to give a new Glory to your Family, and a new Lustre to the Crown which you hold of them. It is no doubt, with this View that you seek out and honour Men of Merit and Virtue. Your whole Empire applauds your Conduct, and it is every where said, that the ancient Government revives. There is not a Man of Letters in the Empire, who does not aspire to render himself capable to contribute to this. At present, you have at your Court a good Number of such Men, of whom you can have great Assistance in so glorious an Undertaking.

(*) These are what are now called Fu, or Cities of the first Order, which have several others depending on them.

(†) Cities of the third Order, of which several were required to make one of the first Order.

(‡) An obscure Fellow, who rebelled against Sbi wbang.

But for my own Share, I can not dissemble: When I see those whom you have most distinguished enter into all your Pleasures, to which you are but too much addicted; I am apprehensive that you (*) reap but too few Advantages, from so many Men of Capacity and Merit. Do you on your Part never turn a little indolent? I am afraid you do. But if you do this, tho' in the smallest Degree, the (||) Cbu bew will follow your Example, and the Ministers and Magistrates will do the same. Then, what will become of all your good Designs? How have you laboured, since your Accession to the Throne, for the Happiness of your People? You have abridged your self in your Table, your Music, your Equipages, and your Troops. You have more than once remitted your own Revenues, and the annual Tributes. You have converted into arable Grounds, all your Parks and Gardens. There has been seen dispensed from your Magazines, 100000 Pieces of Stuff for the Relief of the Poor. You have regulated the Exemptions of Children, in Favour of aged Parents. You preserve the Dignities of Nan, Tze, and the like; every one may advance to them by Degrees; their Appointments are considerable, and well paid; and all this, without reckoning the extraordinary Gratifications you bestow upon your Officers of the first Rank, and their Families. In short, your Favours extend even to Criminals: You have softened their Miseries, allowed them the Comfort of seeing their Relations, and in their Favours mitigated the Rigours of the Laws; by these Steps, you have not only gained the Hearts of your Subjects, but have procured benign Rains, that have been followed by a plentiful Crop. Fewer Robberies are now seen, less Misery is felt; and (†) Tyen, to second your good Intentions, has diminished the Number of Criminals, in Proportion as you have softened the Severity of Punishments.

I understand, that in the Provinces, when the Magistrates cause your Declarations to be published, there is not an old Man so decrepid with Age, if he can support himself upon a Staff, who does not crowd to hear them, and in hearing, says to himself: "Why can't I live a little time longer, that I may see the Perfection of that happy Change, which the Virtues of such a Prince must produce?" Things being upon this Footing, your Reputation so well established thro' the whole Empire, and your Court furnished with so many Men of the most distinguished Merit; instead of profiting by them, happily to finish what you have so successfully begun, and supporting the Hopes conceived of your Reign, in what does your Majesty employ so many great Men? In meer Amusements. No! Sir, this is what I cannot reflect upon without extreme Anguish of Heart, which my Zeal will not allow me to conceal: Alas! How truly is it said by our Sbi king; "To begin well, is common, but to end well, is rare."

However, don't imagine, that I propose any thing to you that is difficult. All I beg is, that you would apply yourself less to hunting, that you would revive at certain Times the Ceremonies of (§) Ming tang, and cause (‡) the Tay hye to be reestablished and promoted. You will hence soon see with Pleasure, excellent Effects; but as for the Literati of Merit, with whom you have so well furnished your Court, and whom you have put into the greatest Employments, Amusements are not for them; so far from engaging them in Diversions, you should not suffer them to follow you in yours. To treat them as you do, is against the wisest Maxims, and the most constant Practice of sage Antiquity. More serious Affairs ought then to take up all their Time. They ought incessantly to be improving in Knowledge, and confirming themselves in Disinterestedness, Uprightness, and other Virtues. Without this, they will soften by Degrees, till at last, their Character will be quite effaced. What a Shame, and what a Loss is it, that Men of so many good Qualities, should not only be useless to you, but even have their Morals corrupted at your Court! This gives me a mortal Uneasiness. Divert yourself in the Morning, but let it be with some Officers of a lower Rank; and then return to the others, and treat with them about the Affairs of your Empire. Thus, without renouncing reasonable Diversions, you may maintain in full Vigour the two essential Points of Government, the Councils and the Rites.

[The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Composition of this Discourse is far from being correct, but it is solid at the Bottom. This and other Pieces of that Age, retain a little of the Disorders that so long prevailed in the Empire before the Han; but, one can perceive by them, that those Men, who saw the State extricated out of their Inconveniencies, did their best to hinder it from relapsing into them. The western Han owed a good deal to the two Kya and Tong chong shu; they properly were the good Leaven of their Dynasty.

(*) Ching te hseu says: All this Discourse of Kya shan tends to reclaim Fen ti, who was too much addicted to hunting, and took his Counsellors and Ministers of State along with him to that Diversion. It would seem at first, that it was neither necessary or prudent to cite the History of the Yin, but at its Bottom it was not amiss; for tho' Fen ti was a good Prince, he began to be a little careless of his Conduct: Instead of holding frequent Councils with his Ministers, he was for ever engaging them in hunting Matches; one Passion brings on another: It is easy to imitate what is ill, and Fen ti might have ruined himself like Yin, which was what Kya shan feared, and wanted to prevent. In this he was to be praised, but in my Opinion he ends ill; for one of our most essential Maxims is, always to be perfecting ourselves in Virtue, to be stopping up every Avenue of Vice; but Kya shan when he ends his Discourse, opens a Road of Remissness for his Prince. He is inconsistent with himself in this Point, and does not follow the Doctrine of the I rev or Literati.

These are the Words of the Tsing te hseu; and this Doctor is in the Right, for the true I rev, which some Europeans are pleased to call Sect of the Literati, is really the Doctrine common to the whole Empire, and what is contained in the Book, which have been constantly acknowledged as King. Now according to these Books, every body, but the Prince more especially, ought incessantly to watch over his Actions and Thoughts, that he may not give the least entrance to Vice. In this Case, and with the Assistance of Tyen, these Books tell us, that both Prince and People are happy.

He afterwards served in the same Station under the Whang of Leang way, but that Prince dying young, Kya i was so sensibly grieved, that he fell sick and died a little after his Pupil, in the 33<sup>d</sup>. Discourse or Memorial presented to the Emperor Ven ti, by Kya i.

GREAT Emperor, When I attentively consider the present State of your Empire, I see a Thing capable to make me give great Cries: Two other Things fill my Eyes with Tears; and six others, make me utter heavy Sighs; without counting a Thousand other less considerable Faults, which, tho' they are contrary to Reason, and hurtful to good Government, yet it would be impossible for me to enumerate. In all the Writings presented to your Majesty, every one has the following Words: The Empire has nothing more to fear, Peace is established, and every Thing is in Order: As for me, I am far from being of this Opinion: When People talk to you at that Rate, it is either from Flattery, or for Want of Understanding. For, let us suppose a Pile of Wood and a Man sleeping on its Top, while it is set on Fire below: Has this Man, tho' the Flame has not reached him, nothing to fear? And is not this a natural Image of the State of your Affairs; Every Thing that is important is neglected, and all the Cares of Government are applied to Matters of little Consequence. There is in the Administration, a Conduct that is very irregular, ill supported, and without any constant Rule; how then can it be said that every thing is in Order? This is what I cannot agree to, tho' I wish more than any Man, that it were so.

I have seriously considered the Means of restoring this good Order in the Empire, and thereby of assuring its Tranquility. And for that Reason, I presume in this Discourse to lay them before your Majesty, begging that you would read it with some Attention, and extract from it what you find to be good.

I propose nothing to you that can too much fatigue either your Body or Mind. I do not even require that you should deprive yourself of Music, with which you are so much charmed. But what is most important, and no ways inconsistent with that, is, to keep all the tributary Princes in their Duty, to prevent the raising and the marching of your Troops, to cultivate Peace with the (§) Hjong ná, to make yourself obeyed by all your Subjects, to extend your Care to those who are most distant from your Court, to endeavour, above all things, to render them good, and to diminish, as much as you can, Lawsuits and Villanies.

These are the essential and capital Points; if you succeed in them, which I believe is very easy for you to do, you will render your Empire happy, and deserve eternal Praises. Posterity, when they shall admire the Exploits of the Father, will be charmed with the Virtue of the Son; you will be always looked upon as the Joint Founder of the Dynasty, and that Myau which you have before-hand built, and to which you have given the Inscription of (||) Kū ching, shall afterwards obtain with Justice, the glorious Title of (‡) Tay tsong; latest Posterity will always join you with your Father in the Honours paid to him, and the Empire will celebrate that filial Piety, by which you support so well the Honour of your Family. In the mean Time, your Goodness will be praised, with which you so well provide for the Wants of your Subjects: But above all, your Wisdom will be admired, that has given a Form to the Government, by which, every succeeding Prince, however weak, and however young, may reign peaceably.

This is what I propose. If your Majesty thinks that I aspire to too high a Perfection in Government; I am persuaded, that from the Understanding and Qualifications you possess, and with a little Assistance from able Men, you may with Ease, attain to all I propose. As I frankly lay my Sentiments before you, it is the utmost of my Wishes that you may agree to them, and put them in Practice; for I have advanced nothing, but what is founded upon a serious Examination of the History of past Ages; and upon attentively comparing them to all I could extract from the present Times; upon this I have been meditating Day and Night: Thus I may be bold to say, that were Shun and Yu to rise again and give you Advice, it would infallibly be the same which I now suggest.

(*) A Title of Honour.

(†) The Names of two Families.

(‡) Governour.

(§) The Chinese call certain Tartars of China by this Name.

(||) Kū, signifies Antiquity. ching, to perfect.

Ven ti, says a Gloss, caused his Myau to be built in his own Lifetime; and placed the Inscription Kū ching upon it, thereby denot-ing that he apply'd to perfect what his Father had established.

(‡) Tay signifies very great. tsong signifies the Head of a Family: But the two Words joined here together are a Title of Honour, given more than once to Princes who are looked upon as Joint Founders of a Dynasty: As Tay tsū is given as the Title of many Founders of Dynasties. Tsū tsong when joined, signifies Ancestors in general.

In the Infancy of a Dynasty, if a Prince would establish it firmly, it is natural for him to be distrustful, and then, he sometimes takes false Alarms, and may be deceived in his Suspicions. Hence it happens, that sometimes the Innocent suffer; but there is no avoiding this: And in such Circumstances, in the Beginning of the Dynasty, the safety of the Sovereign, and the good of the State, is inconsistent with the Impunity of subordinate Powers, when overgrown. Take Care that your younger Brother does not possess too powerful a State. He may be tempted, if he has not already formed the Design, to make himself Emperor of the East, and to rival you. On the West your deceased elder Brother's Son, certainly has Designs upon Tong yang; and some even pretend, that they are upon the Point of Execution. As for the Vang of U, you know what his Forces are, and that he is the most powerful of all the Chu bew; this Vang, I say, acts in all Respects within his own State, by his own Authority, and in contempt of your Laws. This too, I am certainly informed of. You may judge by this, what a Prince who behaves thus, and has yet only tasted of your Indulgence, will not attempt.

Such is your present Situation, a Situation little different from that of those Emperors, whose melancholy History is wrote in the (*) Chun tsew. 'Tis true, that there are no actual Com-motions; but why? Most of the Vang are yet young, and under the Tuition of Governors and Ministers, who manage their Affairs. And these Governors and Ministers are Men of your own appointing; or at least, sincerely devoted to your Family. But in a few Years, when these Vang are grown up, they will have more Spirit, and be less tractable. Then their ancient Officers will each pretend Infirmities, or some other Reason for retiring from Court. Then shall these Prin-ces, being as it were emancipated, either give a Loose to their Inclinations, or follow the Advice of those who have interested Views. When this Change happens, and the Time is not far off, if your Brother or Nephew should start their Claims, and break openly from their Allegiance, what Remedy must be applied? For my own Share, I see none; and I believe that (†) Tau and Shun themselves would be puzzled to find out one. A Man who wants to dry himself, does not wait for Night, but makes the best of the Noon-Day Sun that he can. Why have you that Knife in your Hand if you make no Use of it? Two Proverbs are attributed to (‡) Whang ti; their Appli-cation is very plain. Profit Prince, Profit, by the Power and Time you have. You will then find every thing easy; but, if you delay, all will be difficult. The smallest Inconvenience that can attend such a Delay, is, that you will be reduced to the irksome Necessity of shedding the Blood that comes from the same Source with your own. But who can answer for other Conse-quences? And then will not the Times of Tsin revive? Rouse your self, Sir, strike a masterly Blow, you have Authority, you are Emperor, the Juncture is favourable, but at the same time pressing; Supported by (§) Tyen, fear only what is really formidable; Give your Empire Peace and Quiet, by preventing the Danger and dissipating the Storm that threatens it.

That you may the better comprehend the Importance of this Advice, let us call to Mind some Points of History, and make some Suppositions. No Doubt, you remember what History tells us of one of the Vang of Tsi, called Wen. He grew so powerful, that nothing less would serve him, but that the other Chu bew should come in a Body and pay him Homage. They respected him a good deal more than they did the Emperor. Had you been then Emperor, if you had allowed him quietly to arrive at that degree of Power, what would you then have done? Durst you have attempted to reduce him? I own I know little; but I know, and dare boldly pronounce, that if you had, your Attempt had been fruitless.

But we need not go so far back for Instances: In later Times, Shang reigned in Tsi, Kin pi in Wbey nan, Pung ywe in Leang, Hun sin in Han, Chang ngau in Chau, having for his Minis-ters, Qyan kan. Lü quan reigned in Ten, and Chin bi, tho' no Vang, possessed Tay. Now sup-posing that these six or seven Princes were still alive; and that each of them was so well estab-lished at Home, that his State was in a flourishing Condition; and that they had nothing to fear from one another; suppose all this, would not you who are Emperor be a good deal alarm'd? Sure you would.

After the Deaths of Sbi whang and his Son Eul shi, the Empire being in Distress and with-out a Master, your Father Kau ti taking Arms, all those I have named did the same. Every one had his own Views and his own Party. But none among them at first had any particular At-tachment to your Father; yet, by Degrees, they all came over to his Side. It was a great Piece of good Fortune for him, that they were all of them Princes very moderate in their Ambition. But the great Motive of their Resolution was, that they found a Superiority of Merit in Kau ti above Envy, so that they were not ashamed to yield to him. Thus your Father was indebted for his Crown to his own Bravery and Merit. He was no sooner Master of the Empire than he shar'd his Conquests with these Princes, giving to each 20 or 30, and to some, 100 (||) Hyen. Notwith-standing all his Merit and Liberalities, within ten Years, there were frequent Rebellions in several Quarters, and he scarce reign'd a Year in Peace. Yet all these Princes were sensible of his Abi-lities and Courage, by Experience, and they personally held their Dominions of him. If these six or seven Princes reigning over as many different States, some larger, others less, but every one of them considerable, had enjoyed them quietly, would you, had you been then Emperor, have liv'd undisturbed? Could you have kept their Turbulence within the Bounds of Duty and Submission? I dare again affirm, you could not, had they belonged as much to you, as, for the most Part, they did to the then Emperor.

But I must repeat it again; If you do not speedily take some Course to prevent it, Affairs will come to this Issue. All the Vang, who are now your Subjects in Name, will in Effect be no longer so. Each of them proud of his Power which is really too great, will be a petty Emperor within himself, and dispose of every Thing independantly of you, and arrogate to himself the Right to dispose of this or that Dignity as he pleases; of forgiving Crimes, and of pardoning Malefactors tho' worthy of Death; and perhaps some of these Vang more bold, or powerful than the rest, will go so far as to use a Chariot covered with Yellow, to the great contempt of the Laws of the Empire, and your Sovereign Authority. Should any one forget himself, to this Degree, what must be done? Will you send him your Orders and Reprimands? He will despise them. Will you summon him to appear at your Court? He won't come? Or granting he comes; will you dare to punish him according to the Rigour of the Law? But thus to punish near Relations, would infallibly set all the rest against you, and produce a Rebellion from most of them. I own, indeed, that there are some (*) Feng kya, but, besides that they are rare, to what End will their Boldness serve? No sooner shall they dare to open their Mouth, but some mercenary Cut throat will, by planting a Dagger in their Hearts, render them for ever dumb: Unless then, you immediately pursue other Measures, Things will come to this Pass, that you neither can stop the Rebellion of your Relations, nor protect from their Resentment, those who shall have the Courage to declare for you against them.

No sooner was your Dynasty of Han establish'd on the Throne, than the (+) Lyu, abusing their too great Power acquired by an Alliance, endeavour'd to destroy it. But I have pointed out the Spring of these former Commotions, which was the Power of the Lyu, and have you not the same Reason to be afraid, lest the very same Thing should be attempted against you, which formerly the Lyu have against all your Family, and that the Empire should fall into almost the same Troubles as formerly? In such a Case, who could answer for the Event? Notwithstanding your vast Capacity, you would be then in no small Perplexity. But how much more fatal would it be, should it not happen till the Reign of some of your Children endowed with fewer Abilities than you? The Butcher (†) Tan in one Morning dissected twelve Oxen, without his Knife being in the least hacked, how came this? Because he only used it to cut the Flesh, and artfully to separate the Joints. When he came to the Bones, or any Part that was too hard, he immediately used the Ax: What the Knife was to this Butcher; Clemency, Liberality, and the like Virtues are to the Sovereign: The Laws and his Power are the Ax; and at present, the Chu bew seem to be so many Bones and hard Cartilages: At least two of them doubtless are so. Certain Experience shews that most Troubles in the State begin by the too great Power of tributary Princes.

This is plain from History, particularly from one of the Passages I have pointed out. The Revolt began by Wby yu, when he was the Vang of Tsu a powerful State. He was followed by Han sin. Why? Because the latter was supported by the Hu. The Abilities of Quan kau, Minister of (‡) Chau, had rendered that State rich and powerful, so that he was the third who rebelled. Ching bi, who rebelled immediately after, had no large Dominions, but excellent Troops. The others rebelled sooner or later, as they were more or less strong. Li, Vang of Chang sha was the only one who never swerv'd from the Respect and Obedience he owed to his Sovereign. But his Dominions contained no more than 25000 Families. It is justly said of him, that tho' he did less than any of the others for the reigning Family, yet it was more obliged to him than any other, because he had never done any Thing against it. And indeed, tho' he might have been emboldned to throw off his Obedience to his Prince, by his being at such a Distance from the imperial Court, yet he continued always faithful and obedient. But was his Fidelity owing purely to his Virtue, or to his having better natural Dispositions than the others? May not one safely conclude, that it was in some Measure owing to his own Weakness; but let us come to Facts.

There were formerly given to Fan, Ki, Quan and Kyang, some dozens of Towns, as it were in Pledge, with the Title of Vang. These petty Principalities were afterwards abolish'd, and it is right not to re-establish them. The Descendants of Han sin and Tu obtained the Title and Rank of Chu bew, which they still possess. There is no great Inconvenience in allowing them to keep this Distinction, if it is not made a Precedent for others; for if you would keep all the Vang in Obedience, and destroy the Intrigues of the great Men of the Orders inferior to Vang, nothing is more expedient, than to reduce the first Order to the same footing with the Vang of Chang cha; and to treat the second as formerly Fan, Ki, Kyan and Quan, were served. At the same Time would you establish your own Authority, and assure a lasting Peace to the Empire, weaken the Power of every one of these Princes, by making several petty Principalities out of every one of their Territories. The Smallness of their Power will deprive them of the Temptation to rebel. Thus, it will be easy, by treating them gently, to keep them attached to you, and make them as ready to comply with your Will, so far as the Laws of the Empire oblige, as the Fingers are to obey obey the Motions of the Hand. Put things in this Situation, and I will answer for it, that every one will cry out; "What a masterly Stroke of Wisdom is here! The Peace of the Empire is now assured for a long time." Begin then by breaking the three Kingdoms of Tsi, Chau, and Tsu, into the several Principalities, which the Extent of their Dominions comprehends, rendering each almost equal to that of Chang sha; ordain that the three Vang, who at present possess these three Kingdoms, leave each to his eldest or youngest Son, according to the order of his Birth, one of these Principalities, till every one of them has its own Prince: Do the same with Leang yen, and the other Kingdoms. If it shall happen, that the Sons or Grand-sons of the reigning Vang are not so numerous, as that each of these Principalities, so divided, can have its own Prince, then order it so, that the Principalities that remain, may go to the other immediate Descendants of the Family.

As to certain Principalities lock'd up within some of these Kingdoms, and possess'd by Families who have the Title of Chu bew; you must distinctly mark out their Extent, and make them separate States as the others, with the Rights of Succession, and render it impossible that they should ever be annexed to your Empire, but for the Crime of Treason. By this, you will endear a great Number to your Person, since you will shew that you seek no private Advantage; and by this, the whole Empire, will both applaud your Wisdom and praise your Generosity. Every Branch of the Estates that are divided, will do their utmost to preserve themselves in the Rank of Vang. Their Weakness and their Interest will naturally induce them to continue in their Obedience; and this will spare you the Unpopularity of inflicting any rigorous Punishments. No more tragical Events will be seen, and your Clemency and Goodness will be no less praised than your Wisdom and Disinterestedness. The Laws will then be in Vigour, and your Commands meet with Obedience. No Prince, tho' possess'd of a Li ki or a Quan kau for a Minister, will dare to undertake any thing. The factitious Designs of Chay ki and Kay chong (*) will be crushed. When the Princes and great Men are subjected, their Inferiors easily fall in with what is right; and the whole Empire, charmed as I have said, by your Wisdom, Disinterestedness, and Clemency, will enter yet more unto its Duty by so equitable a Firmness. In effect, when things are upon this Footing, not the least Convulsion in the Empire, can follow even upon the Reign of a minor Prince, tho' an Infant and posthumous.

In short, you will thereby assure the Glory and Tranquility of your Kingdom, and make your Name adored by future Ages. All these Advantages may be produced by a single Stroke, of which I am persuaded you see the Expediency, and I dare answer for the Consequences. Then what withholds your Arm? Perhaps you think the Evil is yet Light. But allow me to ask you, Sir, if a Man can be in good Health when his (†) Leg is swelled as large as his Body, and his Finger (‡) as big as his Arm. Sure you will own, he cannot; and that you look upon such a Swelling as dangerous. Believe me, Sir, it is a certain Truth, that even a Wound in the little Finger, when neglected and ill managed, too often baffles the ablest Physicians, becomes incurable, and kills the Patient. Such a Swelling is still more to be dreaded, when accompanied with acute Pains in the (§) Feet. This is certainly the Evil that is capable to make one send up great Cries.

But what is more monstrous is, that tho' the Emperor, whoever he is, is without Doubt the Head of the Empire, because he is above the Rest of the Nation; and the Barbarians on our Borders are the inferior Extremities, and in this Respect, the Feet of the Empire: Yet at present, the Hyong nu commit a thousand Insults upon us, and in order to prevent more, the reigning Family furnishes them every Year with large Sums, either in Money or other Commodities. To exact this kind of Tribute, is the Part of Masters, to pay it, of Subjects. Thus the Feet is above, and the Head below: Unnatural Reverse! While this is suffered, can it be said that there are in the Empire Officers truly zealous? And yet this is her shameful Situation, without one Effort to relieve her. She is likewise afflicted with violent Pains in one of her Sides; that which I speak of is the N. W. Notwithstanding the great Expences in keeping on Foot such a vast Number of Troops; and notwithstanding the large Pay of their Officers, the People are in continual Alarms. These who have ever so little Strength, are incessantly upon the Watch, and Day and Night employed in making Signals by Fires or other Methods. The Troops on the other Hand, are obliged to sleep with their Armour on their Backs, and their Helmets on their Heads: These are the real Calamities that afflict your Empire. A Physician offers you an infallible Remedy for them, and he is not heard. Is not this capable enough to draw Tears from the Eyes? As you possess the glorious Title of Emperor, is it not shameful to render yourself in Effect, Tributary? If you continue to put up with the greatest of all Ignominies, and to suffer the present Wounds to fester, in what must such a Conduct end? Among all who have the Honour to advise your Majesty, there is not one who does not agree with me, in the Reality of the Evils I have touch'd upon. But when there is any talk of remedying them, they see not, they say, in what Manner it can be done: For my Share I am of a different Opinion. The whole Nation of Hyong nu has not so many Inhabitants as one of the great Hyen of your Empire. And what shame must it reflect on those at the Helm of Government, that they have not, with the Forces of so vast a State, been able to resist the Insolence of one so small. The Inconveniences we suffer from the Hyong nu are so easily prevented, that let the Forces of one Prince your Tributary act but ever so little according to my Directions, these Barbarians shall soon be reduced. Make but a Trial, and you shall soon be absolute Master of the fate of (*) Tan yu, and pronounce the Doom of the Traytor (†) Twe, who is at the Head of his Counsels. Allow me, Sir, to tell you that the Insolence of the Hyong nu is owing to your Manner of treating them. Instead of hunting down these troublesome Savages, you are chasing Wild Boars; and instead of pursuing these revolted Scoundrels, you are following Hares; Thus, for a vain Amusement, you neglect the most dangerous Evil. It is not thus, that the Quiet and Repose of a People is attained. It must be owing to yourself, if you are sincere in the Matter, that your Authority is formidable, and your Virtues dear to the most distant People, even beyond the Limits of your Empire; while, at present, you are not sure of being obeyed even within thirty or forty Leagues of Empire. This is the second Thing I mentioned, which must draw Tears from the Man who is zealous in your Service. (§) Luxury is now arrived at such a Height, that mean People embroider the Cloaths, and even the Shoes, of the Boys and Girls whom they are obliged to sell. One can see none exposed in the Slave-market, but such as are glittering with a Profusion of Ornaments. At present, People of ordinary Rank, dress their Wives and Slaves in these very Things, which formerly adorn'd our Empress, and which she carried only to the Temple. These Axes and other Figures in Embroidery, formerly solely reserved for the imperial Habits of Ceremony, serve now to adorn the Parlour or the Dining-room of a Merchant who has scraped together a little Money: Who, in seeing these Disorders, would not say that the Forces of the Empire are drained? No, they are not in Effect, but they are very near being so.

When I see Persons of no Quality furnish their Houses in this Manner, while your Majesty's Habit is only of the coarsest Stuffs, and the most ordinary Colours: When I see the Shoes of a vile Concubine more richly embroidered than the Collar of our Empress; this Disorder chiefly sets me a crying: But I likewise see, that it is of such a Nature, that it must be soon followed by Misery. In effect, the employing so many Men in making Cloaths for one Person, is the Cause why many can get no Cloaths at all. There are ten who eat the Product, for one who tends the Culture, of the Earth; How then is it possible but many should want Food? Besides, to pretend to maintain Order among a People pressed by Hunger and Nakedness, is to pretend to an Impossibility. Behold, what drains and ruins the Empire: Behold, what produces the Robberies and Rebellions that are ready to break out.

Nevertheless you are frequently told: Every Thing goes well, let us leave them as they are: And they who talk to you in this Manner, are your clear-headed Gentlemen. Yet there cannot be a greater Medley of Customs imagined: All Ranks are confounded, and there is no longer any Distinction betwixt the Grandees and the People. Even the Respect due to your sacred Majesty is encroach'd upon, yet they never cease to cry out; Do not let us stir, every thing goes well. Is there any thing more capable to make a Man send up deep Sighs? (||) Tong yang, without troubling himself about Virtue, was wholly employed in suggesting to his Prince the Means of gaining and amassing Money. Thus in the two Years that he was in Office, there was a terrible Corruption of Morals. The Son of a poor Man then only thought upon the means of leaving his Father, that he might become the Son in Law of one who was in better Circumstances. While a Father and Mother was digging the Ground or handling the Rake, the Son, pampered with the Fruits of their Toils, was acting the Man of Importance, and putting on Airs of Haughtiness even with regard to them. The young Wife, when giving suck to her Child, used then insolently to dispute with her Husband: The Step-mother and the Step-daughter were Spies upon one another, and every Moment looked upon one another with the most malignant Eyes. Nothing then remained to Men, but Indulgence for their Children, and a Passion for Riches: When this is all the Distinction, how small is the Difference between Man and Brute?

Notwithstanding of this, Sbi whang, pursuing his Project, and taking Advantage of favourable Junctures, invaded six Kingdoms, and made himself Emperor; he had then nothing more to do, but to take such Measures as might establish his Family upon the Throne. The true Measures for this were Temperance, Modesty, Gentleness, Uprightness, Honour, and the Maintenance of the established Laws. These were all unknown to Sbi whang: He blindly followed the Road which Sbang yang had pointed out; and only studied to be rapacious, that he might be profuse. His Subjects followed his Example; every one made his Passion, and the Extent of his own Power, the Rules of his Conduct. Wit and Parts were then only used to make Dupes of the simple and weak; Bravery and Courage to take advantage of the weak and fearful; and a superiority of Strength was looked upon as a Right to commit an Insult. In short, the Disorder was at last too great to be longer born.

At this Juncture (‡) a Man of a superior Merit appeared; every thing yielded to his Courage, and all submitted to his Virtue: And as before that our Fore-fathers said; The Dynasty of Tsin, so they after that said; The Dynasty of Han. But tho' the Days of the Tsin are over, yet almost all their Vices still remain. Luxury prevails: The Rites are more and more disregarded, and with them (§) Here begins a Detail of the Things that are capable to make one send up great Sighs. According to our Author, there ought to be six. But Ting king says that three of them are only touched upon in this Discourse, as we have it in the authentick History. They are found, says he, more at large in Collections made since, but these deserve little Credit. The Gaps therefore are left unsupplied, and remain as in the Body of the History.

them Modesty and Virtue vanish. This Change from bad to worse increases sensibly every Month, but more so every Year. The Crimes of murdering a Father or a Brother, however shocking, are not without their Examples in our Age. As to Thefts and Robberies, they are become so barefac'd, that the innermost Rooms of the Palace, in your Father's and Brother's Time, were forced open, and rifled of their Furniture. In short, Licentiousness has come to such a Height, that in the Capital of your Empire your (*) Officers are robbed, and have their Throats cut in the Face of the Sun.

While these Outrages are committing on the one Hand, one sees, on the other, a wealthy Villain under the Appearance of Honesty, furnishing to the public Stores some hundred thousand Measures of Grain, or vast sums of Money, and thereby procuring the highest Employments of State. A Disorder greater than all I have mentioned: Yet it is a very common one, tho' they take care to conceal it from you. While they are busied in aggravating some particular Abuses, the Age is corrupted, the greatest Vices obtain, and an unbounded Licentiousness is rooting itself in your Empire; and all this is beheld without Concern or Uneasiness. One would be apt to conclude by the Insensibility of your great Men, with regard to these Disorders, that they either think all things are going right, or that it is none of their Business to reform them if they are wrong. But upon whom then must we rely? Upon the ordinary Magistrates and their Underlings? Alas! These are so taken up with their Writings and their Registers, that they carry their Views no farther. And granting that they had Understanding and Virtue enough to see, and be touched with, these Evils; to reform so many Abuses, to remedy so many Disorders, and to inspire your Subjects anew with the Love of their Duty and Virtue, is an Undertaking far beyond their Capacity.

Our Dependence then is, That your Majesty would take a personal Concern in reforming all this Degeneracy. But I don't see that you are in the least touched with, or alarmed at it. This gives me greater Uneasiness still. For, to maintain the sovereign Authority, to mark out the proper Distinctions of different Ranks, and to regulate Families, are the Duties that (†) Tyen has devolved upon Emperors, and in which he does not immediately concern himself. In these sort of Matters we may safely say, that not to advance is to retire, and not to put Things on a good footing, is absolutely to let them fall to the Ground. (‡) Yuan tse says, that the exact Observation of the Rites, Justice, Uprightness, and Modesty, are the four Pillars of Government, and that if they fall, the Empire is soon ruined.

Perhaps it will be objected, that Yuan tse is a poor Author: I shall suppose he is. But it is at the same time the more shameful for others to be more ignorant than he. The Passage I cite is a certain Truth. Tsin suffered these four Pillars to fall, and immediately after he fell himself. Within thirteen Years after, his fine Court became a desert Hillock. Can we now pretend, that these four Pillars are in a firm State? No, that would be to flatter ourselves too grossly. We see those who are hatching the most pernicious Projects, already hugging and applauding themselves. Whispers and Surmises are buzzing about on all Hands. And why are not Things immediately regulated as they ought to be? Why is not the necessary Distinction of Power betwixt Sovereign and subordinate Authority adjusted, the Distinctions in Ranks settled, and the Order in Families regulated? Were this done, all those who form destructive Schemes, would lose the Hopes of succeeding. Suspicion and Jealousy would cease, and you would thereby give Posterity an easy Plan for their Conduct in Life: In short, by this, the Peace and Happiness of all your Empire would be secured for a long Time. To neglect Affairs of this Consequence, is the same Thing as if one should set adrift a Bark in a large and rapid River, without either Oars or Tackling. It must go down with the Stream, and the least Breath of Wind that moves the Billows makes it a Wreck. Are we not in the same Condition? And is not this a sufficient Reason to make any one send up deep Sighs?

The three first Dynasties subsisted for many Generations; that of Tsin, which succeeded to them, but for two short ones. Surely, if we regard his Qualities and Nature, there is nothing differs so much, as Man does from Man. Whence proceeded it, that the three Families Hya, Shang, Chew, had so many long and glorious Reigns, and the Dynasty of Tsin, which was always in Trouble, ended almost as soon as begun? One, and perhaps the chief Cause was this. Of old, if our Emperor had an hereditary Prince, they invested him as such with Solemnity. A Man of Distinction was nam'd, who conducted him to the (§) Kyau in Noon-day, that he might be presented to Tyen. All the great Officers of the Court followed them thither in their Habits of Ceremony, and respectfully presented themselves before the young Prince, to acknowledge him Heir of the Crown.

Tho' he was thus declared Successor to the Throne, if he passed by the Palace of his Father, he immediately alighted from his Horse, or out of his Chariot. Did he meet with a Palace of any of his Ancestors in his Journey? he instantly quickned his Pace. By all these Ceremonies, he was taught what Obedience and Duty he owed to his Parents; and thus they lost no Time in instructing him aright from his Infancy. (*) A Gloss says, Fen ti was a good Prince. Posterity has much commended him: Kya i himself knew well that Things did not go so ill: But he wanted they should be better than they were, so he exaggerated them, that he might thereby the more affect and influence his Prince.

of Tay kong in quality of Tay tse. Every one of these three Lords had one under him, who never left the Prince. The first had the Charge of his Person, the second was his Governor, and the third his Preceptor. The Men then chosen to form a young Prince, were recommended by their Virtues, and were equally capable to give their Pupil proper Instructions. The Lessons they gave him were indeed frequent; but their principal Care was, that he should speak to none but those of unblemished Morals, and see nothing but what was decent and regular. In short, all the Officers of his Train were eminent for Virtue, Gravity and Knowledge, but at the same Time they were ingenious at improving every Opportunity for instructing him aright. A Man born and educated in the Country of either Tsi or Tsu, will infallibly have its Accent; and can a Prince, educated in the Manner I have described, fail of taking a virtuous Bent? Confucius rightly observes that Education is, as it were, a second Nature; and we naturally do that to which we are habituated.

When the hereditary Prince was become marriageable, he was made to pass successively thro' six Sorts of Apartments, which were so many Schools. In the first, which was to the East, he was instructed in the Rites, one by one; and above all, in the Duties he owed to his Relations, either by Blood or Alliance. He was there taught to prefer the nearest of Kin, to those more remote, when all other Circumstances were equal; to treat every one with Goodness, and to keep them united, every one in his proper Sphere. He then passed to the School of the South, where he was taught to make the proper Distinctions of Ages, and to inspire the younger with Respect for the elder; to establish Principles of Honour and Honesty among all, and thus, to root out the Seeds of Dissensions and Law-Suits. Then he went to the School of the West; where he was instructed in the Choice a Sovereign ought to make of the Officers, whom he puts in Posts: And the constant Maxims inculcated here, were to prefer Wisdom to all other Qualifications, to pay more particular Honour to such as had distinguish'd themselves by their Virtue; and to put none into great Posts, but Men of great Abilities and uncommon Merit, Men capable both to see and to promote whatever was for the Good of the Empire. From the School of the West, he passed to that of the North, where he learned the Distinctions of Stations, and the Regard a Sovereign ought to have, for such as are, by their great Employments and eminent Dignities, raised above the Level of Mankind, in order to preserve thereby the necessary Subordination of Ranks in a State, and to oblige every one to keep his own. Having passed through these four Schools, the Prince arrived at a fifth which was of a higher Order. There, under the most able Masters he had Instructions of greater Depth and Extent. After every Lesson, he retired with his Tay fu [or Governor] who caused him to give him an Account of it. If he had mistaken Things, the Tay fu put him right, and sometimes even chastised him. But his chief Care was, to inculcate in his Mind, and give him a clear Notion of, the most important Points. Thus, his Head and his Heart were improved at once; he became both able and virtuous, and he was qualified for Empire.

Did he begin to form himself? In place of the Officers I have named, he had others of less Authority, but no less Vigilance, who examined all his Actions. He had an Historian who was placed near him, on Purpose to take Notes of his Actions for the Day; another Person observed him during Meals, and told him immediately when ever any Indecency escaped him. In short, he had a Flag set up in public, whereon any one might fix what he judged proper to be proposed; on the other Side there was a blank Table, where he might write what he had a mind to propose should be corrected. But if any one had an urgent Remonstrance to make, he had no more ado but to beat a Drum, and he was instantly heard. All this was advantageous to the Public, without being disagreeable to the Prince; who, as he was educated from his Infancy in the Schools of Wisdom and Virtue, had nothing in him to reprehend, that could occasion to him either Grief or Shame. As he was, without Ceremony, instructed in the most wholesome and the most safe Maxims, he naturally took every thing in good Part.

Besides, the Ceremonies instituted on particular Seasons and Days; and which were never dispensed with by the Emperors under the three famous Dynasties, were of great Use both to the Prince and his Subjects. Some of them both taught and inspired Respect to the Sovereign, others, Obedience and Piety to Parents, and others, the Rules of Gravity and Decency. The most minute Observance had its allegorical Meaning; for Instance, it was usual for the Prince not to see an Animal dead which he had been accustomed to see when living, nor to taste of any Creature whose Groans he had heard when under the Knife of the Butcher; for this Reason, he never went near the Kitchens. The End of all this was, to encourage in the Prince and all about him, Sentiments of Goodness, Humanity and Compassion. If it is asked, why every one of our three famous Dynasties continued so long? I answer, from observing all these Measures, but more especially the right Education of the Heir to the Throne.

The Reverse happen'd under the Tsin, Politeness and Modesty were Virtues scarce known. The Man most respected, was he who yielded to no-body, who was most liberal of his injurious Language, and most grossly affronted the first who came in his Way. Thus, neither the Rites nor Virtue, but the fear of Punishment was the Prop of Government: So that Cbau kau, Governor to (*) Hu bay, entertained him with nothing but this Maxim. To Day, Heads were cut off, to Morrow, whole Families were massacred. What was the Event? Hu bay, to Day, mounted the Throne, and to Morrow, killed one of his Subjects with his own Hand. The most respectful and just Complaints passed for seditious Murmurs, the most important Advices were treated as trifling, trifling, and the Prince saw the Head of a Man struck off with the same Indifference as that of a Poppy. Must all this be attributed only to the Nature of the Prince? By no Means, the greatest Part of it was owing to his bad Education. Of two common Proverbs, one says, "If you have no Experience in an Affair yourself, follow those that have succeeded in it:" The other: "When the first Cart overturns, he who drives the second is upon his Guard."

(*) This was the Name of the Son, whom Shi wahang appointed for his Successor; being the same who was afterwards called Eul shi.

Our three famous Dynasties flourished long; we know by what Means, we have nothing to do but to imitate these Means. The Dynasty of the Tsin was soon cut off; we know the crooked Paths they kept, and the Traces of their Steps are mark'd out to us, so let us shun them. To march in the Steps of the Tsin, is to perish like them. I have said, and say it again, that upon the Education of the hereditary Prince, depends the Fate of his Empire. But upon what does the Success of this Education depend? Upon two essential Points; First, that he be early instructed. Secondly, that it be by Men equal to the Office. When a Prince is instructed in Time, before he receives any Prejudices, good Impressions have all their Force upon his Heart. There remains nothing more then but to put Men about him, who can conduct themselves wisely and dexterously. On the other Hand, if this is delay'd, and if his Heart has got a wrong Bias, you may place worthy Men about him; who may follow him, attend him, and see his Faults, but rarely can they succeed so far as to correct them. The People of U and Tse are born with the same Inclinations, and in their Infancy resemble one another even in their Accents; but when they grow up, the Antipathy betwixt them is so great, that they can't endure one another. Whence proceeds this but from Education and Custom? I then had Reason to say, that in order to educate a Prince aright, he must be early put into good Hands; when this is done, the Success in a manner is certain, and consequently, the Empire is happy. For, as the Schu king says, the Happiness of all the People depends upon one Man. This is what ought to be thought of, and is what most immediately presses. (*)

The most clear-sighted Mortals see what is past, much more distinctly than what is to come. But what is the end of our Rites? They are to prevent Disorders, as Chastisements are to punish them. Hence, every one must be sensible of the Importance, the Necessity, and the Effects of Punishments. To encourage the Practice of Virtue by Rewards, and to deter from the Pursuit of Vice by Punishments, are the two great Springs of Government. Our ancient Sages have made Use of them with a matchless Firmness, Constancy and Equity. I am far from rejecting either; but if I here tye myself down to the Rites, it is, because they tend to root out the Seeds of Vice before they spring up. They instruct the People by almost insensible Degrees, removing Vice, and directing us to Virtue so gently, that we ourselves scarce perceive the Motions. This made Confucius say; "It is a happy Talent to be able, to determine a Law-Suit aright; there are Men who can do this, and actually do it, but it would be much better, were there no Law-Suits at all." Let us search for the Means.

They who would aid a Prince in governing well, cannot, in my Opinion, do better, than to distinguish betwixt his real and principal Interests, and those which either are not necessarily so, or so only in Appearance: and may be neglected without hurting him. Upon this, more than any Thing else, depends a Prince's good or bad Success. What he chiefly ought to understand is, that great Alterations either for the better or the worse, are not made all in one Day, especially in great Empires; that they proceed by little and little from remote Causes, and that tho their Seeds are sown separately, yet their Effects appear all at once. If the ordinary Government depends only upon the Rigour of Laws, and the Severity of the Princes, these Numbers of harsh Laws and cruel Punishments, will be answered by the People with a load of Curses and Rebellions. If on the other Hand, the Prince regard the Rites and good Example, there will result from the People a sincere Union among themselves, and hearty Affections for his Person. Sbi wahang wished as much as Ching tang or Vu wang, to do Honour to the Hall of his Ancestors, by transmitting his Crown to latest Posterity. Yet Tang and Vu founded, each of them, a Dynasty that lasted for 6 or 700 Years, while that of Sbi wahang endured but for thirteen. The Cause of so vast a Difference was as follows.

The Empire may be compared to a Vessel beautiful and precious, but brittle. If it is always placed upon a compact, sure Place, it will continue whole for a long Time; without this Precaution it will be soon broken. Goodness, Justice, the Rites, and Music, composed a firm and compact Basis, upon which Tang and Vu established their Empire. Thus, their Dynasties continued for many Ages, and their Memories is, and ever will be, dear to us and our Posterity. As for Sbi wahang, he established his Authority solely upon Terror and Punishments, neither Virtue or Beneficence having the least share therein: Hence soon followed the Murmurs and Imprecations of his Subjects who hated him, as being their greatest Enemy; and he in Person had well nigh fallen a Sacrifice to so general a Hatred. His Son could not escape this Fate, and at once lost his Life and Empire. This Event is so late, that it may pass as one in our Days; so that I can produce no more interesting Proof to confirm what I have advanced.

A Sovereign may be compared to a Hall, the Officers of his Kingdom to the Steps of the Stairs that lead to it, and the People to the Ground, upon which these Steps stand. If the Hall is so raised above the Ground, that there are betwixt them, for Instance, nine handsome Steps in good Repair, the Look of it is grand; it has a good Effect, and we mount to it with Respect.

If,

(*) Perhaps Kia i, to finish one of the Subjects of his groaning, took occasion here to mention some Circumstances relating to this Prince, whose Education was neglected, which the Historian has curtailed: However that may be, he enters on another Subject.

If, on the other Hand, it is almost on a Level with the Ground it stands on, and has a few pitiful Steps to lead to it; we naturally despise it, and enter the Hall without any Ceremony. The Application of this is easy, and our ancient Emperors understood it well. For which Reason they established that beautiful Variety of different Orders. Nearest their Persons they had the Kong, the King, and the Ta fū: (*) Thro' different Parts of the Empire were dispersed the Kong, the Hew, the Pé, the Tse, the Nan, without counting the Officers of the different Cities, and a great Number of Subalterns.

The Sovereign, raised above all these Orders, appeared so grand and venerable, that all the Officers who approached him, being under the Shelter of his Majesty, were secure from all Insults. The Vulgar have a Proverb: Tho' I killed the Rat, I had a Regard for the Vessel. This Expression, tho' homely, may be applied here. 'Tis the Respect due to the Person of the Prince, that makes even the Horse he rides on, nay, the Straw his Horse eats, respected. Our ancient Rituals prohibited any one from looking into the Mouth of this Horse; and there was a Punishment determined, for any one that trod upon the Straw he was to use. And to this Day, whoever is sitting, when the Table or the Baton of the Prince passes by, instantly rises; they who are on foot compose themselves respectfully: If any one either in a Chariot or on Horse-back, meet the Chariot of the Prince, tho' empty, he immediately alights to the Ground. Can it then be wondered at, that our ancient Laws subjected, to the corporal Punishments they prescribed, only such as were of an Order inferior to the Ta fū? Doubtless our wise Legislators thought it in some Measure inconsistent with the Respect they owed the Prince, to subject to these Laws any one who by his Rank approached his Person; and always believed that as the Prince raised none to distinguished Ranks, but Men of true Merit, it would have been absurd to have employed any such Means to keep them in their Duty.

And indeed we don't find in Antiquity, that a wise Prince punished any one with Death. Matters are a good deal changed in that Respect; they whom our ancient Emperors called by way of Distinction, when they spoke to them, (†) Pé fū, Pé kyew, are liable to be capitally punished; even they, whom to this Day, our Emperors, when they meet them, honour with a Civility, are not exempted. The Kong, the Hew, and the Vang themselves, are subject to the most infamous Punishments, as well as the meanest People. Their Visages are branded, their Noses slit, their Hair cut off, they are whipt, exposed in open Roads, and are sometimes cut in Pieces. Nay, I must say more, it is no rare Thing to see Officers of the highest Rank suffer the most ignominious of all Punishments, by having their Heads cut off. To push things to such Extremities, to pay so little Regard to the highest Distinctions, besides that they are the means to make the Possessors of them take vile Inclinations, is going against the Proverb, and paying no Respect to the Vessel.

Another Proverb says, That let the Shoes be never so well made, they won't make a Pillow, and however neat the Cap may be, it won't mend the Shoes. Formerly, was an Officer broke for Corruption? His Fault was mitigated to the World, and it was only said, that he had not duly attended the Rites. Was he broke for Debauchery? The Harshness of that Expression was softened, and it was said, (‡) that the Curtains about him were too thin. If he was broke for Weakness or Incapacity to discharge his Duty, it was said, that his subaltern Officers obeyed him ill. When an Officer then was declar'd culpable, if the Fault was not of a high Nature, he immediately resign'd his Employment, and Matters went no farther. If his Crime was capital, as soon as the Prince had pronounced it to be such, the Officer turned towards the (§) North, made the ordinary Obeisances, first condemned, and then actually put, himself to Death. So much did Antiquity respect Greatness even when Guilty. But must they then escape? By no means; let them be cashiered, let them be punish'd, nay, put to Death, if they deserve it. But to seize them, to bastonade them, to bind them with Ropes, to deliver them up like the meanest private Persons to the vilest Officer of Justice; can be Spectacles profitable neither to the Small nor Great.

It is pernicious to the People, from whose minds it erases that excellent Maxim; Respect those who are over you, and who by their Rank are venerable. It is pernicious to the Great, in whom it damps those heroic Sentiments which their high Stations inspire. It is pernicious to the Prince, as naturally tending to weaken the Zeal of those upon whom principally depend both his Glory and Safety. For this Reason, the Rites have always recommended to a Prince, that he should treat his Ministers and other great Officers with Civility. Otherwise, the People will forget the Duty they owe to their Superiors; the Effects of which Neglect may be in Time felt by the Prince himself. The great Men will forget themselves, and seeing themselves outwardly degraded, will degrade themselves, if we may so use the Expression, inwardly too. No more will they entertain any Sentiments of Honour; but acquit themselves superficially of their Duty, and catch at every Occasion of plundering, selling, enriching themselves with, and neglecting the public Good. If their Prince is distress'd upon any occasion, they will take but little Concern, nay, perhaps aid the opposite Party underhand, and rejoice at his Difficulties; when they see the State and the Prince both in Danger, their first and only Care is to provide for their own Safety.

(*) Perhaps the Historian has here likewise cut off some Circumstances: at least what follows, has no Connexion with what goes before; Kya in the Thread of this Discourse, speaks of the Regard a Prince ought to have for his Ministers, and other great Officers.

(†) My grand Uncle, as European Princes say, my Cousin, to Persons of a certain Rank.

(‡) Contrary to the Chinese Custom, it being scandalous there for Men and Women to be seen together in Common.

(§) The Emperor sat with his Back to the North, and his Face to the South.

Yu yang was a great Officer under Chong bin. When Chi pé had defeated and killed Chong bin, he offered an Employment to Yu yang, who accepted of it. Chau a little after overcame and put to Death Chi pé, upon which Yu yang appeared inconsolable, and did all he could to place the Son of Chi pé upon his Fathers Throne: History says, he made five different Attempts for that purpose, but all without Success. One asked of Yu yang his Motives for a Conduct so different from his former, with Regard to the two Princes he had served. Chong bin, answered he, used me almost like the most vulgar of his Subjects, tho' I was under him a great Officer; so I took but a vulgar Concern in his Fate. Chi pé treated me according to the Rank I held in his Kingdom, and my Grief for him is proportioned to his Respect for me.

And indeed, if an Officer, for whom a Prince shews a due Regard, is not zealous in that Prince's Service, he must be a Brute. When Affairs are on a right footing betwixt a Prince and an Officer, the latter forgets even the Interests of his own Family to serve those of the State. If an occasion happens that he may be a great Gainer, or must be a considerable Loser, he neglects all Advantages, and hazards every thing rather than to desert his Duty: In short, he sacrifices himself without Reserve to the Service of his Prince. But these Dangers are rare, when the Prince treats his great Men with the Regard prescribed by the Rites; for then there are no Differences among the Princes of the Blood, who after they have lived in Friendship, have the Satisfaction to die in Peace, and to be buried with their Fathers. There are no rebellious Wars among the tributary Princes, each lives and dies in Quiet at Home. Good Ministers seek for no Pretences to retire from Business, which, to their last Breath, it is their Pleasure and Duty to discharge. The Officers of War do the same, and willingly die on a Breach, or in the Frontiers of the Empire. This is meant by the Expression; A wise and an accomplished Prince is safe in Ramparts of Gold. A Comparison that shews the Relation betwixt him and his Grandees. Such were the happy Effects of their Union, betwixt our ancient Princes and their great Officers; but alas! Since their Days, this Maxim is much neglected, this good Custom is abolished. Is not this deplorable?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Kya i, like an able Minister, saw the means of preventing the least Troubles, reforming Abuses, and regulating Manners. No Time, no Station of Life escaped him. His Understanding like a flaming Torch lighted him thro' all. What an Unhappiness was it for a Yuan and a Kyang to banish so great a Man, and to lose the Benefit of his vast Capacity?

Another Discourse of Kya i, to induce the Emperor Ven ti, to lay up Stores of Corn and Money.

(*) QUAN tsé speaking of the People, said, that they might be instructed and formed to good Morals, when there was wherewithal to feed them. But no Antiquity, even the most remote can produce an Instance, nor is there any to this Day, of a People continuing long faithful in their Duty, when they wanted the Necessaries of Life. It was an old saying, that a Man who did not labour the Ground was in danger to want Bread. A Woman who neglects to work at Stuffs, may be soon without Cloaths. The Necessaries of Life are not all to be had at all Times. If they are not frugally managed, they must run short. Such were the Maxims of Antiquity; Maxims which they practised, and whereof the exact Observance formed the Basis of their Government. Thus they never wanted Necessaries.

At present, Agriculture is neglected. Vast Numbers of People live upon the Fruits of the Earth, which very few cultivate. This is equal to a Famine. On the other Hand, Debauchery and Luxury increase; this is the same as if Troops of Robbers plundered the Empire. When Robbery and Famine prevail at once in a State, for what can one answer? Forty Years ago, the Dynasty of the Han began. They did not lay up the least Reserve, either publick or private. This awakens Compassion when one considers it. If Rain was ever wanting to fall just at the Time it was expected, the People were instantly alarmed. Was there a scarce Year? One bartered away his Degrees, another disposed of his Children. This is no unusual Thing. When a State is upon the Brink of Ruin, can the Father or the Master of it be without Dread? That Years of Famine may come, is to be expected. Yu and Tang have themselves passed thro' these shocking Proofs. Let us suppose, that by Misfortune, 2 or 300 Leagues of a Country proves barren. How shall this be remedied? At the same Time, suppose our Frontiers are invaded, and we are obliged to send large Armies to their Defence, how are our Troops to be maintained? There is War and Famine at once, and the Empire impoverished without having any Resource.

It commonly happens in these Cases, that the daring and the strong take advantage of the Opportunity to assemble, to plunder, and to rob where ever they can. While the weaker are for some Time supported by the Price they get for their Children, and then they perish miserably. These are not vain Terrors; you know they are not. You are but half Master of the Extremities of your Empire, which want but an Opportunity to revolt. If so a cruel Piece of News were brought you all of a sudden, how would you behave? Would it be then time to deliberate? Believe me, there is nothing of so great Consequence, as to lay up in Time good Magazines of Provisions: This will, as it were, secure your Empire. When the Treasury is full, and Provisions abound, every thing is calm; and the State is equally able to make a Defence, or to push a Conquest.

(*) A Gloss says, that the erecting of the Granaries which the Emperor had in every City in China, was owing to this Discourse.

The first Step to this is, effectually to labour for the Re-establishment of Agriculture. Do all you can, that your Subjects may each live upon the Fruits of his own Culture. There are every where infinite Numbers of idle and vagabond People: And how many others improperly apply themselves to Employments useless in Society? Dispatch all such to cultivate the Lands which lie barren to the South. This is the best and the most profitable Employment. Nay, if it be necessary, don't spare even Force. Thus, you will have in all Parts, wherewithal to lay up Reserves of Provisions; and by procuring Plenty, you can assure the Repose of all your Empire, whereas, now it is in a dangerous and a melancholy Situation. This is what afflicts me. My presuming to give you this Advice, proceeds only from my Zeal for the Glory and Welfare of your State.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Fundamentals of Government consist in instructing and feeding the People. When we behold with what Vehemence and Zeal, Kya i, in those Days, sought to promote the publick Good, we can't help saying; This is a Man whom we may justly call a proper Counsellor for a Prince.

A Gloss.] In Consequence of this Discourse, Ven ti published Declarations to animate the People to Agriculture; and revived the ancient Rite of cultivating the Earth with his own Hands, to give them an Example.

Chang, surnamed Li vang, was the last of the Children of Kau ti, Founder of the Dynasty of the Han. When his elder Brother Ven ti became Emperor, he made him King of Whay nan. The new King afterwards committed many Faults, and Ven ti, who was naturally mild, took no notice of them, till wearied out by his repeating them, he ordered a Tsyang kyun (*), who was at the same time a Hew, to write the following Reprimand to the Vang of Whay nan. Tho' the Tsyang kyun wrote with his own Hand, it was in Terms, which shewed that it was by the Emperor's Orders.

GREAT King. I have heard often of your Resolution, your Justice, your Continence, Honour, and other good Qualifications; that is to say, that (+) Tyen treating you as one of its Favourites, has crowned you with its Gifts, and given you Qualifications to form you for a (‡) Shing; this is what you ought carefully to attend to: But it would seem by your Conduct that you do not, since you are ungrateful for the Gifts of Tyen. Our present Emperor no sooner mounted the Throne, but he made you the Vang of Whay nan from a Hew. You thought yourself so little deserving of that Honour, that it was with Difficulty you accepted it. However, he invested you with the Kingdom, which on his Part was a singular Favour. Since that Time, you have never appeared at his Court; you only once made a Step to ask Permission for that purpose, but far from demanding it in the regulated Forms, and with the Respect due to a Sovereign; you did not even exactly observe the Regard due from a younger to an elder Brother.

Besides, you have of our own Authority, and as it were to shew its Extent, put to Death a Person of the Rank of Chu hew. Our Emperor is unwilling to enquire into it, but this is an extraordinary Indulgence. The Emperor by our Laws, has the sole Right of filling up the great Employments in every Kingdom; yet you, rejecting a Minister regularly nominated by him, presumptuously demanded that you might be admitted to appoint another. Our Emperor was willing to dispense with the Law, and to indulge you in this. Could there be greater Condescendence. You next attempted, as it were, to degrade the Chu hew in your Territories. You insisted upon their keeping Guard in Linnen Habits at Ching ting the Burying-place of your (||) Mother. This the Emperor would not permit, but it was as it were degrading yourself, when you was thus deprived of the Homage of the Hew; so that in this, he shewed a Regard to your Dignity. This is a fresh Obligation you lie under to him.

Reason would teach, that you ought to exert yourself in answering the Goodness of the Emperor, by an exact Observance of all your Duties: On the contrary, by the Licentiousness both of your Words and Actions, you give him fresh Matter of Offence, and ruin your own Character throughout the Empire. This indeed is judging very ill. All that your Family or your self now possess, comes originally from your Father Kau ti. He many Times endured the Inclemencies of Air, exposing himself to the Dangers of Battles and Sieges, where he was covered with glorious Wounds. Why did he suffer this? It was to establish his Family. Instead of applying yourself seriously to imitate so worthy a Father, instead of performing the Tsi and other Ceremonies, which may revive in your Mind the Ideas of his Virtues and Exploits; you are forming an extravagant Project of degrading the Hew, who are dependant on you, to the Rank of the common People. To degenerate thus into Pride and Avarice, is not to perform the Part of a worthy Son. Not to be able to maintain things upon the same Footing on which you received them from your Father, is to betray a want of Capacity and Wisdom. To make a Point of guarding the Sepulchre of your Mother, and to neglect that of your Father, is to shew a Respect for the one and not for the other, and thus to overthrow all good Order. In your repeated Violations of the Emperor your Masters Orders, where is your Submission and Obedience? In your Neglect of Duty to your elder Brother, where is your Observance of the Rites? In your inflicting on your your greatest Officers infamous Punishments, where is your Clemency? In shewing the greatest Contempt for the Vang and the Hew, that you may honour and raise a worthless young Debauchee, whose only Merit is his Sword, where is your Understanding? In short, in neglecting all Study, in slighting all Council, in running blindly into every Suggestion of your Passion, and Caprice, where is your Conduct? Great Prince, beware! The Way you tempt is dangerous, and may lead you to your Ruin, nay, if I may so say, you degrade your self from the Dignity of Vang.

(*) The highest Degree of the Officers of War.

(†) A Man of the first Order.

(||) She was not Mother to Ven ti.

Instead of staying at your own Court, there with Majesty to receive the Honours due to your Dignity, you flutter about, and piqueing yourself upon equalling Mong paen, you affect to act the Bully; how indecent is that? I repeat it once more, all your Steps are so dangerous, that if you take not Care in Time, I dare pronounce, that (*) Kau ti will receive no more Offerings from your Hands. Formerly Cheu kong put to Death Qyan shu, and imprisoned Tsay shu, in order to secure the Dynasty of the Cheu. Wen kong Prince of Tsi, put to Death his own Brother for Rebellion. Tsin shi wabang put to Death two of his Brothers, and sent his Mother a great way off, in order to secure the Peace of the Empire. Kin wang, whom your Father Kau ti had made Vang of Tay, defended that State very ill against the Hyong nu; and Kau ti deprived him of his Charge. The Vang of Tsi pe took it in his Head to raise Troops: Our Emperor did himself Justice. Such were the former Proceedings at the Court of Tsi and Cheu. We have likewise taken a View of what has been transacted in our Days, by the Tsin and the Han. And will you pretend to dispute with the Emperor, regardless of these Examples, both ancient and modern? Ridiculous!

If you do not amend, your Quality of being the Emperor's Brother, cannot exempt you from being judged by the Laws. If Things come to that Pass, you are infallibly ruin'd, and your Officers great and small, especially your Ministers, must be involv'd in your Fate. To lose in this Manner, at least, your Rank and your State, to become the Object of Compassion to those of the meanest Stations, to see your Officers punished, and draw the Scoffs of a whole Empire upon your own Person, in short, to be a Stain to the Memory of your god-like Father, is what must be very disagreeable to your Spirit. Set then about a Change. Write a respectful Letter to your Brother, and acknowledge your Fault in these Terms: "(+) I had the Unhappiness to lose my Father in my Infancy, the Troubles of the Lyu then succeeded, and lasted for some Time. Since your Accession to the Throne, that happy Change and your Favours puff'd me too much up: Blinded by Pride, I have committed many considerable Faults, which, when I reflect at present upon, fill me at once with the most sensible Grief, and the best grounded Fear. 'Tis with these Sentiments, that humbly prostrate upon the Earth, without daring to raise myself, I wait for the Chastisement I deserve."

If you behave thus, the Emperor, as he is your Emperor, will allow himself to be mollified; and as he is your Brother, will be highly pleas'd at your return to your Duty. Each of you will possess your high Ranks with a mutual Contentment. This is what I wish, and sure tis of the greatest Importance to you, that seriously weighing my Advice, you instantly follow the Course I suggest; for if you hesitate long, the Arrow will be discharged, and it will be in vain to endeavour to stop it.

A Gloss. Li wang was discontented at this Letter, and held on his former Way; soon after, he was judg'd in Form, and banish'd.

The Advice that Kya i proposed under the Emperor Ven ti, to diminish the Power of the tributary Princes by dividing their Estates, was renew'd by Shau tso, under King ti, the succeeding Emperor. The Matter was brought into the Council, whereupon the U and Tsi revolted. King ti retracted, and sacrificed Chau tso, as if he had given the Advice. There is nothing in the Discourse of Chau tso on this Occasion, but what we have already seen in that of Kya i; so I but just mention it, and proceed to other Discourses of that Minister.

A Discourse upon War, address'd to the Emperor King ti.

I HAVE heard, that since the Accession of the present Dynasty to the Throne, the (†) Hu lu have made many Incursions into our Frontiers, and always carried off a Booty, either more or less considerable. In the time of (§) Kau bew, in one Irruption they forced several Cities, ravaged a large Extent of Country, carried off a great Quantity of Cattle, and either killed or made Slaves of many of the Emperor's Subjects. They returned some time after by the same Quarter; we oppos'd them with some Troops, but we were defeated; and a good many of our Officers killed upon the Spot. It is a common saying, that "Victory inspires even Cowards with Courage. And a defeated Army can scarce support itself. Since the Days of Kau bew, these Barbarians entered thrice by Long si, and came always off with Advantage. At present it is otherways; Our Troops that lie on that Side of the Empire, sustained by the Protection of (||) the She shi, and directed by your wise Orders, have revived the Courage of the neighbouring People, and we are in a Con-

(*) He here insinuates to Li wang, that he may come to lose his Life. What follows proves this to be the Sense.

(†) The Chinese Expression is equivalent to this: They say literally, your Subject had the Unhappiness; and above, for I have heard their Expression is, your Subject has heard. The Chinese, not excepting the Vang, make use of this Term when they speak to the Emperor.

dition not only to resist, but to conquer them. There have passed already several Actions, in which we defeated the Barbarians, tho' they had the Advantage in Numbers.

SIR, The Difference of this Success is not owing to the People of Long si, who of themselves are not more nor less brave than they were, but to the Generals and Officers. A Book entitled The Art of War says, "That there are no People, however brave, who can be called invincible, but there are Generals, of whom it may be said, that they never were beaten." Nothing is then of greater Importance, either for the Reputation of your Arms, or the Safety of your Frontiers, than the Choice of your General.

Besides this Choice, there are three other Things of the utmost Importance to the Success of Battle, and to which a good General ought to attend. First, the Ground, which he ought to know perfectly well, in order to be able to make all Advantages of its Situation. Secondly, that his Men become Warlike, by a continual Exercise of their Arms. Thirdly, that the Arms, of which there are different Sorts, be all excellent. As to the Ground, if the Country is incumbered with Rocks, Woods or Rivers, or tho' level, if covered with Bushes, and rank Grass, he ought to employ his Infantry; since a Soldier on Foot is then better worth two others, either on Horseback or in a Chariot. On the contrary, if he meets with a plain level Field, or a Tract of high lying Ground, without either Woods or Rocks, he ought to employ his Cavalry, for then a Horseman or a Charioteer is worth ten foot Soldiers. If the Risings of the Ground are frequent, the Valleys narrow, and separated with a great many Rivers, the best Arms are Bows, shorter Arms are then of small Use; nay, of so little, that one good Archer is then worth a hundred Soldiers otherwise armed. Where they meet with Thickets and Woods, they must have recourse to their Hatchets, for then one good Hatchet-man is worth more than two Pike-men. In Defiles and Windings, the Sword and Dagger are of use: A Man thus armed is then worth ten Archers.

As to the Men themselves, the subaltern Officers ought to be chosen, and the Soldiers well disciplined. Otherwise they will know nothing of Encampments or Marches, it will be easy to disperse, and impossible to rally them; they will let slip every Advantage, and neither have Caution to prevent foreseen, nor Dexterity to extricate themselves from unforeseen Dangers. They will not know when to obey the Signal, either of the (+) Drum or the Kettle-Drum; and a hundred such raw undisciplined Men are not worth two.

As to their Armour, if offensive, it must be sound, handsome, and sharp. If defensive, it must be strong and thick. You may as well expose a Man naked to the Waist, as allow him to carry a bad Cuirass: A Bow that wants force, is not so good as a Dagger. An Arrow that does not fly straight, is as bad as none. And if it does fly, what is the use of it if it has not Force to pierce? A Man had as good be without Steel, as to have it blunt and bad. If a General does not watch over this, and if his Soldiers are but ill armed, five Men are not so good as one. The Book I have cited goes on. "To lead on an Army ill provided with Arms, is to carry Men to be butchered. A Prince who puts a General at the Head of wretched Troops that are to fight, in Effect, delivers them up to the Enemy. And the General, who neglects those Points we have touched upon, is a Traytor to his Prince: In short, a Prince who makes an ill Choice of a General, abandons his Dominions to his Enemy. Their Maxims are very just, and ought to be weighed."

'Tis farther said, and justly too, that as there is a Difference betwixt great and little, between strong and weak, between what is difficult and dangerous, and what is easy and favourable, a Man must understand and attend to all these Circumstances, before he can determine aright how he is to act. Different States ought to have, and generally have, different Manners. The Maxims of a small Kingdom are to yield to a greater, that it may procure Peace. The common Maxim of little States is, whenever Occasion serves, to unite against a greater Power. The Maxim of our Empire is, always to oppose Barbarians against Barbarians.

The Hu lu, with whom we have now to do, have three Advantages which we want. Their Country is full of Mountains and Ditches, to which their Horses are accustomed, and in which neither our Horses nor Chariots can enter, far less, act. These People are accustomed to make irregular IncurSIONS from their Youth, and while they are galloping over Mountains and Plains, know how to shoot very exactly from their Bows. As neither our Horses or Chariots can come at them, how can our poor foot Soldiers make Head against them? Besides the Hu lu fear neither Wind nor Rain, Hunger nor Thirst. They are much fitter for Fatigue, and more hardened to Labour than our People. But when we engage them in a plain open Field, we have great Advantages. The Evolutions of our Cavalry and Chariots put them in Disorder. Our large Bows do Execution at a great Distance; their's make no Impression upon us. When we come even to handy Blows, our Men armed with good Cuirasses, keeping still their Ranks, with either their Swords or their Pikes in their Hands, and sustained by our Archers, soon rout the Barbarians. When our Men skirmish or fight ever so little at a Distance, the defensive Arms of these Barbarians being made of nothing but Skins or Wood, are soon broke to Pieces. If both Sides dismount and engage Hand to Hand, fighting only with short Arms, these Hu lu resist us still less. As they are accustomed only to fight on Horseback, they have not Resolution enough to maintain a Dispute on Foot.

By this Reckoning, we have seven Advantages over these Barbarians, for three that they have over us. If we add to this, that we can easily bring ten Men into the Field for their one; the Victory appears still more certain. However we may always say with great Truth, that Arms are fatal Instruments, (*) A Gloss says, That the Signal for Battle was given by * Drums; and for a Retreat, by Kettle-Drums.

Instruments, and War is a dangerous Trade. The greatest and the strongest may there, in an instant, be levelled with the meanest and the weakest; and it sometimes happens, that by too determined a Resolution to conquer, a Defeat becomes total and irretrievable. Then Repentance is too late. To tread warily, and to leave nothing to Fortune, is always a good Maxim. There are some of these Strangers that voluntarily submit to our Laws; of these may be form'd a Body of several Thousands. They are a Race as hardy and as laborious as the Hu lu: They have all their Manners and all their Qualities; and in my Opinion, may be of great Use. We ought to provide them well in Arms both offensive and defensive, and put at their Head one of our best Officers; who is beforehand a little acquainted with their Manners, and who knows how to gain them: We ought to recommend to this General, to employ those Troops, only in Defiles and Passes, and to make Use of others in open Fields. This in my Opinion is the Way to hazard nothing. Tradition informs us, that an understanding Prince makes his Advantage of every thing, even of a Fool's Words. What am I, but a Man without Wisdom, and without Merit? However I don't despair, but that your Majesty's Wisdom will find something in this Discourse that may be of Use.

Another Discourse of the same Shan tso, to the same Emperor, upon the Manner of securing the Frontiers of the Empire.

I FIND that under the Dynasty of the Tsin, Sbi wbang from the North, attacked Hu me (+) and Yang ywe in the South: He took Arms, not to guard his Frontiers and secure his Subjects, but to gratify an unbounded Pride and an insatiable Avarice: Thus before he saw his ambitious Designs take effect, he threw the whole Empire into Disorder. It is a true Saying, that to make War upon an Enemy with whose Strength or Weakness we are unacquainted, is to hazard all. Sbi wbang found this true by Experience. The Country of the Hu me is very cold, the Bark of the Trees there are about three Inches thick. The Men subsist themselves upon the Flesh of Creatures half raw, and drink nothing but Milk; the Skins of the Beasts are hairy and thick, and the Skins of the Men are as hard in Proportion, and as well formed to endure excessive Colds. Yang ywe on the contrary, is a Country where is almost no Winter, and where the Heats are long and violent, but don't much affect the Inhabitants who are accustomed to them. The Troops of Sbi wbang could not bear the Rigour of these Climates. They who carried them their Provisions perished upon the Road; and no body went to such a Country, but with as much Unwillingness, as if they had been going to receive a Punishment.

In effect, they who were condemned to this Service were, 1st, Officers who had been faulty; 2d, Those who had married in order to be free from the Authority of their Fathers; and lastly, They who had been branded with Infamy, whose Father and Mother had been People who act by Violence, and, contrary to their own Inclinations, are by no means to be depended upon. The Method of Rewards is much better; where there is a Prospect either of Preferment or Spoil, the Soldiers and common People will rush upon the Fire, and expose themselves to the greatest Dangers. But in these Expeditions of Sbi wbang, both Soldiers and Subjects had a thousand Dangers to encounter, and no Reward to expect. Thus every one foresaw the impending Misfortunes of the Dynasty of the Tsin. No sooner had Cbing shin given the Signal and taken the Field, after possessing himself of Ta tse, but the People flocked to him from all Sides, as the Waters of a River follow their natural Course. Thus ended the Expeditions, to which Ambition, Pride and Avarice prompted Sbi wbang.

It is not surprising that the Hu attempt frequent Incurfions into our Frontiers. The Reason is this; They are a People not indebted to the Culture of their Grounds, either for Food or Rayment. Flesh and Milk furnish them with the former, and the Skins of Beasts with the latter. They have neither Towns nor cultivated Fields, nor settled Habitations, but wander up and down like Savages. Do they find in a Spot Pasture and Water for their Herbs? There they stop. Are they in want of Grass? They decamp and seek it where it is to be found. In short, to come and to go costs them nothing. It is their ordinary Employment. Let us then suppose, that this Nation when hunting, should make an Irruption into our Frontiers in several Places: The Princes of Ten, of Tay, of Sbang kyun and Long si, who are upon the Boundaries of these Lands, have so few Subjects to oppose them, that if your Majesty does not send Troops thither, the People in these Quarters must be exposed; and if not supported, Fear may induce them to submit to the Enemy. To send Troops, is attended with another Inconveniency: A few will not answer the Design; and a large Army takes a considerable time to be drawn together. Nay, when it comes into the Field, the Hu are retired too far to attack them. Constantly to keep up a large Body of Troops there, is a vast Expence. To disband them, is inviting the Hu to renew their Incurfions. These are the Inconveniences that have long subsisted, and attend the Empire upon that Quarter.

In order to obviate them, nothing seems to be more expedient, than to establish new Colonies all along our Frontiers, to encourage Families to settle there, by giving them the Property of Lands. For this effect, Fortresses ought to be built, surrounded with good Walls, and furnished with (*) Stones and other Arms. Every one ought to have a reasonable Extent of Land, and to be placed as near the Passes upon the Frontiers, as Conveniency will allow of: And each District,

(+) The Names of Countries.

(*) The Chinese says Pau, which signifies a Machine for throwing Stones: But how it was made, or how it threw the Stones no body knows. Ever since they have had Cannons in China, they likewise call them Pau; but there is this Difference betwixt the two Chinese Characters, that the first is Ta she, and the second Ho pau. Now She signifies a Stone, Ho Fire. Pau signifies Wrapped up, to wrap up, &c.

trict, where at least a thousand Families ought to be settled, should be distinctly marked out by Rivers and other Boundaries. For this Effect, Houses must be first built, and Provisions made for whatever is necessary for Agriculture; then let such as are convicted of certain Crimes, and such as have by some Act of Grace escaped their deserved Punishments, be sent thither. As there will not be sufficient to People the Country, certain Criminals may have Power to ransom themselves, by sending certain Numbers of Slaves both Men and Women, who shall go thither. Honour may likewise be decreed, for such as shall contribute voluntarily a certain Number. In short, if all this is not sufficient for the Purpose, certain Honours and Rewards must be proposed to such as will willingly go; and Magistrates must be ordered, to furnish such as are unmarried with the Means of maintaining Wives, without which, it will be difficult to fix them there.

Not only every Family must be furnished with what is necessary for Agriculture, but Laws must be established that are advantageous for the Society in general. For Example; if the Enemy shall make any Inroads upon our Lands, and any of them be taken Prisoners, the Magistrates shall be obliged immediately to pay a reasonable and a fixed Price for the Property of half the Slaves thus taken, which Property shall devolve to those who have taken them. Thus these People, partly from a Prospect of Advantage, partly from their own mutual Defence, as Allies and Relations, will become hardened, and ready to fall upon the Hu, if they shall rebel. As they will be accustomed to the Climate from their Youth, and acquainted with whatever relates to these Barbarians, they will the less fear them, and be more able either to restrain or conquer them, than any Troops sent thither for that Purpose. Thus you will shun the Inconveniences that attended Shi wbang, and must attend every Prince that sends out his Armies upon such an Expedition. You will secure your Frontiers by procuring them real Advantages, which will encrease in progress of Time; and these Establishments when made, will leave a grateful Remembrance of your Virtues and Glories to future Ages.

GR EAT Prince. I hear with Joy, that your Majesty is determined to secure your Frontiers by establishing Colonies, which for the future will save a vast deal of Expence and Trouble. You cannot give your People a more solid Proof of your Goodness, than by thus cutting off all Occasions of future Inconveniences. There is no more now to be done, but that your Officers second your Majesty's good Intentions; and like wise and distinguished Men, manage the Inclinations, and win so upon the Affections of the People who are first transplanted, that they shall have no occasion to regret the leaving their native Country. In this Case, I dare assure you, that there will be no want of Colonists; and that in a short time, all the poorer Sort of People will encourage one another, and assemble themselves to go thither.

Besides these Colonies will answer two Purposes: The one is the Cultivation of desert Countries; the other, the Security of the Frontiers. With Respect to the first Point, what is to be observed according to the Method of the Ancients, is as follows: Before any City is built, or any District regulated, Care must be taken to pitch upon a healthy Place where the Waters are good, and where the Soil, by the Beauty of its Trees and the Quantity of its good Vegetables, is promising and inviting. When such a Spot is fixed upon, then the City may be built, and its Dependances on all Quarters marked out: The good and arable Lands must be divided, and each one's Possession bounded by hedges of Communication. Every House ought at least, to have one Parlour, and two convenient Chambers in good repair, secured with sufficient Doors, and tolerably well furnished; so that these new Inhabitants finding there whatever is necessary, may the more easily forget their ancient Dwellings, and more cheerfully improve their new Settlements. Each of these Cities ought to be provided with Physicians and (*) U's; the one to take care of the Sick; the other of Burials and funeral Ceremonies. Marriages must be promoted, and the Customs of mutual Rejoicings and Condolences, attended with mutual Assurances, encouraged; Burying-Places must be assigned them; in short, nothing must be wanting that is requisite to their fixed and lasting Settlement.

With Respect to the second Point, which is the Security of the Frontiers; what I have farther learned of the Ancients to be necessary on this Head, is as follows. That all the Families of the District be divided into fives. That every five Families be under one Head. And that every fifty Families be incorporated in a Li, which is to be under a Chief of greater Distinction than the former. That four Li thus formed may make a Lyew, which shall be under an Officer. In short, that ten Lyew may compose an I, which is to have a Commandant, who shall be superior to all the other Officers. That the Officers be Men who are well acquainted with the Country, and the most proper to make themselves popular. That every subaltern Officer shall have regulated Times, when those under him are to perform their Exercises, to which all the younger People must duly repair. That every Officer shall be at the Head of his respective Troops when they march against an Enemy. That the People of one District shall not be allowed to settle in another, but that being accustomed one with another, they may live in Harmony together. Thus, if an Alarm should spread at Night, they will the better know one another's Voices in order to their mutual Assistance. In the Day-time, during the Heat of Combat, they will more easily distinguish each other; and tho' at a Distance, will more readily expose themselves even to Death for their common Safety. That to all these Regulations, Rewards be appointed for the Brave, and Punishments for the Cowardly: Thus in a short Time, we may hope to see Soldiers, who will never turn their Backs upon an Enemy.

(*) It is plain, that this Expression has not the Signification of a Sorcerer or Magician, which it has elsewhere.

Under the Empire of the said King ti, the King of U resolved to attack the King of Lyang. As he had no lawful Reason for so unjust a Proceeding, Mey ching endeavoured all he could to dissuade him, and for that end drew up the following Discourse.

SIR; It is a common and a true Saying, that if a Prince is accomplished, every thing succeeds well with him. If he is inconsistent with himself in any Point, a single Slip will make him miscarry; and that Miscarriage often brings him to the Brink of Ruin. Sbun, notwithstanding he was afterwards Emperor, did not possess a (*) Foot of Ground. Yu, whose Jurisdiction did not extend over ten Families, saw himself Master of the whole Empire, and of, I don't know how many other Princes. Ching tang and Va vang were born Princes, yet neither of them was possessed of ten Leagues of Ground. Each of these in his Life-time became Emperor, and Founder of an illustrious Dynasty. What was the Secret of their Success? In a few Words it was this; Being careful to do nothing that could make them blush before Tyen (†), or that could hurt them in the Affections of the People, they always followed the Dictates of that right Reason they had received from Tyen, and looked upon themselves as the common Fathers of their Country. Their Subjects on their Part, answer'd this Conduct with suitable Sentiments of Affection. There were none in Posts during their Time, who were afraid of ruining themselves, for making a plain and frank Declaration of whatever they thought conducive to the Public Well-fare. Thus, these great Princes met with Success in their Life-time, and with Fame and Veneration after their Deaths.

I wish I were able to discover the Bottom of my Heart, and to shew the Zeal from which I speak. I know of how small Importance I am, and how much Reason I have to fear you will slight my Council. However, I beg you will give some Attention, or rather awaken the Sentiments engraven upon your own Heart on this Occasion. Suppose there were a Rock equally high and rugged, at whose Foot there lay an unfathomable Abyss. Suppose that a Man loaded with a vast Weight, were placed upon the Extremity of this Rock in such a Manner, that half hanging, half standing, both he and his Load were prevented from falling entirely, only by a (‡) small weak Thread. What Man in such a Situation, seeing on the one Hand that his Fall was hindered by next to nothing, and on the other, that if he did fall he must infallibly perish; who I say, would not tremble? And yet, allow me to say it, this is very near the Condition you are actually in: But it is only in your own Power to escape the Danger. The Enterprize into which you are engaged, is infinitely (§) difficult and dangerous. Give it up, and in the Twinkling of an Eye, you may be assured of a (||) permanent Prosperity. To be able to pass the rest of your Days in Peace, in Joy, and the Possession of a powerful State, and yet to engage your Forces in an Enterprize equally painful and fruitless, allow me to say, is what I cannot comprehend the Meaning of.

Some People there are whom their own Shadows frighten, and to shun the Sight of it, are always foolishly turning and returning. But would they peaceably remain in a Shade, the Phantom would disappear, and they would be easy. The best Method for a Man who is afraid to be over-heard, is to hold his Peace. The Man who is afraid his Project should be known, had best abandon it. Is boiling Water upon a large Fire? To blow upon that Water with one's Mouth, to allay the Boiling would be fruitless; the only Way would be to take away the Fuel; any other Method would be (—) ridiculous. The Happiness of Prince and People both, depends upon certain Foundations, which ought to be well established. Their Unhappiness likewise has its Seeds, but the wise Man crushes its Growth. To succeed in this, the most minute Beginnings must be watched. For that which appears but an inconsiderable Matter at first, in a short time, becomes important and weighty. The Water which distils from the Mountain Tay, in a long Course makes itself a Passage thro' the Stone, which one would think had been wrought by a Chissel. A Cord frequently drawn up and down thro' a Plank in the same Place, becomes at last two Pieces, tho' it is longer a doing than if it had been cut by Steel. In short, that Tree, which, tho' now ten Foot in Circumference, was raised from a very small Seedling, when tender and young, was every way flexible, and might have been easily plucked up. But how vastly different is it now from what it then was? (†) Evil is of the same Nature. Think upon this, my Prince, I conjure you, think upon it seriously. Do not begin to abandon, nor change the wholesome Maxims of your Ancestors; Such a Conduct never goes unpunished.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] When this Remonstrance was presented, the Design of Vang had not yet taken Air; and very few People were acquainted with it: For this Reason, Mey ching, thro' all this Piece, speaks in too general, and sometimes in dark Terms. But Vang understood him.

We have already seen the Declaration which the Emperor Vu ti made, by which he demanded of the wise Men presented to him, especially of Tong chong shu, proper Advice about Government and other Points. The Answers of Chong shu were so long, that I shall only give some Passages.

Extracts of the Answers of Chong shu, to the Emperor Vu ti.

YOUR Majesty, in your Declaration, was graciously pleased to command, that some Information may be given you about what is called the order of (*) Tyen, (Heaven) and about the (†) Nature and Affections of Man. This is a Task to which I own myself very unequal. All I can do, in Consequence of your Commands, is to inform your Majesty, that, after a serious Examination of past Events, particularly of those in which we are instructed by the (‡) Chun tshu; nothing seems to me more capable to inspire Princes with a filial and respectful Awe, than the Method in which Tyen uses to deal with Men. When ever a Dynasty begins to deviate from the right Ways of Wisdom and Virtue, Tyen commonly sends them some Chastisement in order to reclaim them. If the reigning Prince pays no Regard to such a Warning, it employs Prodigies and extraordinary Appearances to inspire him with a just Dread. If all these are ineffectual, and the Prince persists; his utter Ruin is near.

By this Conduct of Tyen, it is plain that his Heart is full of Tenderneſs to Princes, and that he means only to reclaim them by Correction. In effect, his Design is to aid and support them; and he never abandons them, till their Disorders proceed to the last Extremities. The most essential Point then for a Prince, is, that he use his utmost Efforts, First, to receive Instruction and Lights in whatever relates to his own Duties. Secondly, to make so good Use of them, that he may daily advance in Merit and Virtue. Thus, and no otherways may a right Change be wrought, and happy Consequences expected. "Do not relax in your Endeavours Day nor Night," says the Shi king; "Use your utmost Efforts," says the Shu king: Would not all this seem to say, that there is a Necessity to put a Violence upon one's Self in these Cases?

The Dynasty Chew was wretchedly torn in Pieces, under the Reign of Yew wang and Li wang. But when there arose a Prince, who incessantly called to Mind the Virtues of his Ancestors, and animated himself by their Example, to support the Glory of that Empire he had received from their Hands, who applied himself as well to remedy the Abuses, as to supply the Defects of Government; (§) Sbang tyen assisted him, and furnished him with able Ministers. Hence he always succeeded. Under him the good Government of the first Chew revived. He was a Subject of the Poets in his own Time, and after his Death, his Memory was celebrated; as it continues to be to this Day, by Elogies.

Such is the ordinary Effect of a sincere Attachment for Virtue, and of that continual Application recommended by the Shu king. What this Emperor obtained by these Means, another might have obtained in the same Manner: For tho' Honour commonly attends Virtue; yet, properly speaking, it is not Virtue that raises the Man, says Confucius, on the contrary, it is the Man, that can give a value to the Virtue. The Peace or Disquiet of States, their Ruin or their Glory depends upon Princes. When any one of them loses his Empire, this Event is not to be attributed to the Order of Tyen, who deprives them of their Power to maintain themselves on the Throne, but to their own Imprudence and Disorders: I know, that it is very truly said, that the Foundation of a Monarchy is a thing beyond the Forces of one Man to compass, that it is a Boon from Tyen, perhaps the greatest he makes to Mankind, and that the Consent of the Universality of the People to own one Man as their common Parent, and the happy Omens that attend such a Consent, are, as it were, the great Seal of Heaven in his Favour. But besides that, even this, in some Sort, is only the Consequence of Virtue, which, as Confucius says, does not long remain by itself; besides this, I say, we never speak thus, but where we treat of the Foundation of a Dynasty.

After having set the good Princes Tau and Sbun, their Government, their Virtues, in Contrast with the bad Princes Kye and Chew, and the unhappy Consequences of their Vices, Tong chong shu concludes in these Words:

"So true it is, that the Manners of People depend on those who are over them, as the Clay upon the Wheel depends upon the Potter who forms it, and as the Metal in the Crucible depends upon the Founder, who throws it into what Mold he pleases."

He then shews how the Corruption of Manners, tho' before very great, grew still more excessive under Shi whang. And then he goes on,

"The best Carver in the World, says Confucius, cannot work upon a Piece of rotten Wood; and it would be losing ones Pains to prop an earthen Wall already old, and which threatens to fall every Moment. In such a Situation did the Han, who succeeded the Tsin, find the Empire. For this Reason, in Spite of the greatest Qualities and good Intentions of our Emperors, since the Beginning

(*) The Chinese says, Tyen Ming.

(†) The Chinese Expression is: Sing, T'ing, which perhaps must be translated Reason and the Passions. This is often the Sense of these Words. It is enough to mention this here for we commonly use the most general Signification in the Translation.

(‡) Name of a Book, said to be written by Confucius.

(§) Sbang, signifies Supreme, Tyen the same as elsewhere: The Reader may make his own Observation upon the Meaning of this Passage.

ing of the Dynasty, they have not obtained all the good Effects which were to be wish'd for. It would seem that the greater Care they took to deserve Success, the less they met with. They made Laws, but all the Effect of them was to augment the Number of Criminals. They gave Orders, which only served for new Occasions of Frauds: This is as if one should try to stop the bubbling of boiling Water, by throwing other boiling Water upon it. Allow me, that in order to explain my Thoughts, how so great an Evil may be remedied, to use the Comparison of a Kin (*). Sometimes the Keys are so disordered, that it is in vain to endeavour to tune them, by touching them here or there. The shortest way is to change the Strings, and new mount the Instrument. If a Kin is not new mounted when it has Occasion, the most able Musician in the World, will not be able to give it its right Melody.

'Tis thus of Government. Why has not the Success till this time never answered the good Intentions and Cares of the Han? Because they working always upon the Ground-Work of the Government of the Tsin, had no other Aim but to avoid their Excesses. The Government of the Ancients must be recurred to; above all, you must begin with a hearty Endeavour for the Conversion of the People, and for making them in love with Virtue. For Want of beginning here, all the Means they employed during the seventy Years they reigned, were unsuccessful. Try this, Great Sir, and endeavour to procure to your People, the Instruction of which they stand in need. By your Regulations, and by your Example, inspire them with an Esteem for Virtue. Lay a greater Stress upon this, than upon Proclamations, Sentences and Punishments. You will see the Reformation of Abuses, and the Prosperity of your Government, advance in Proportion with the Pains you take. Success and Plenty will follow those Calamities that are now too frequent.

The Shi king says; "Procure the real good of your People, let not the least Individual escape your Care: Tyen (Heaven) will crown you with Blessings." It thus speaks to those who govern, and informs them, that it is thus, they can draw down the Rewards of Heaven. But what must the Princes do more? They must honour and practise the five (+) Virtues. It is by making them flourish, that a Prince deserves the Assistance of Tyen, the Protection of the Quey shin; and that he puts himself in a Condition, to make the happy Effects of his Government, felt to the utmost Bounds of his Empire.

SECOND DISCOURSE.

IN the second Discourse, which is only a Consequence of the former; he suggests to Vü ti, to re-establish the (†) great College, or the great School, in order to furnish the Empire with good Masters, capable to instruct and to form his Subjects to Virtue. He bemoans the small Number which were then in the Empire. He not only suggests that the great College should be re-established in order to encrease their Number, but that none should be put into Places of Trust, except Men of Merit, and no Regard ought to be had to the Sons of great Officers, who had nothing to recommend them but their Riches, or at most, the Services of their Fathers. He blames the advancing such to Employments, as had nothing to plead but the Merit of a Parent, and desires that they should advance only by Degrees.

'Twas not thus, continues he, in former Ages; Then, every different Genius had a suitable Employment allotted; a Capacity that were but midlings, was always employed in midling Affairs. Was there a Person whose Merit was extraordinary, they made no Scruple to advance him all of a sudden to the most exalted Station. Thus, a Man by having the Means of exerting his Genius, he was of great Use to the Public. At present, it is otherways. A Man of the most distinguished Merit, remains a long time in the lowest Obscurity: And a Person whose Talents are but ordinary, jumps at once into Employments far above his Comprehension.

THIRD DISCOURSE.

IN this third Discourse, Tong chong shu, after excusing himself for having so ill digested the Matters he had treated of in the foregoing Discourse, returns to the main Point, which regards the Instruction and Reformation of the People. He Expresses himself thus:

Anciently, says he, besides that all the Officers in the Empire made it their principal Study: There were other Officers established on purpose to watch over it. In this consisted the Basis of their Government: And nothing was so much at Heart, as to inculcate on the People both by Instruction and Example, a sincere Love for Virtue. By these Means sometimes it happened, that there was not one Criminal found throughout the whole Empire. But of late, this excellent Method has been disused. The People thus neglected, have abandoned Justice, and blindly follow their Lusts, without the Dread of any Laws to restrain them. There are now such a vast Number of Criminals, that every Year they may be counted by (§) Wan. If one attend ever so little to this vast Difference, one cannot help concluding, that the ancient Method must be absolutely followed: And this the (||) Chun tshü makes us fully sensible of, when it censures every thing that deviates from wise Antiquity. All that is required of, and commanded to Men by Tyen, is comprized under this Word Ming (+). To fulfill all that this Expression signifies, is the Height of human Perfection. The Powers or the Faculties which every one brings into the World with him at his Birth, are all comprehended under the Term (*) Sing: But, our Nature, in order to bring it to the Perfection of which it is capable, must be aided by Instruction. All the Passions natural to Man are comprehended under the Word (+) Tsing. But these Passions must have Rules to hinder them from running into Excess. The essential Duties of a good Prince, and his first Cares are, respectfully to enter into the Views of Tyen his Superior, and conform himself to its Orders: To procure to his People the Instruction which is necessary to give their Nature the Perfection of which it is capable. In short, to make Laws, to establish the Distinction of Ranks and other Regulations, which may best answer the End of preventing or stopping the Unruliness of Passions. Is there a Prince who omits none of these Duties? His Throne is firm, and his Government established upon a solid Foundation.

Man has received from Tyen his Ming, but it is different from other Beings, even Animals. From this (‡) Ming, spring in a Family, the Duties of Father to Son, of Son to Father, &c. In a State, those betwixt Prince and Subject, and the Difference and Respect due to old Age. Thence proceed the Union, Friendship, Politeness, and the other subordinate Links of Society. These are the Characteristics of Superiority that Tyen has given to Man, above all other created Beings upon Earth. Tyen has produced the five Grains, and the six Kinds of domestic Animals for his Nourishment. Silk and Wool, &c. for his Cloathing. It has given him the Faculty of taming for his Use, Oxen and Horses; even Leopards and Tygers may by him be shut up into Cages, and brought under Subjection. In Effect, it is owing to a celestial Intelligence, that he is raised above other Beings. He who understands, as he ought, his own Dignity, and the celestial Nature he has received, will not debase himself to the Rank of inferior Creatures, but maintain his own, and distinguish himself from them by the Knowledge he possesses, and the Regard he pays to Charity, Justice, Temperance, the Observance of the Rites, and the other Virtues. The Esteem he entertains for these leads him to practise them; at last, they become so agreeably habitual, that his doing of Good and following Reason becomes not only a Duty, but a Pleasure. To him who has attained to this Perfection, is properly given the Name of Wise: And it is in that Sense, that Confucius says, no Man ought to be called Wise, who forgets his Ming, or misunderstands his Nature.

Ching se syew, an Author who lived towards the End of the Dynasty of the Song, speaking of the Discourse from which these Passages are transcribed, says: Of all the Literati, who wrote under the western Han, Chong shu appears to me, to be the only one who has altered nothing in the Doctrines of Confucius and Mengius. Thus he often reminds his Prince of the Maxims and Examples of the ancient Emperors Tau and Shun.

Nyen ngan, in a Discourse addressed to the same Emperor, touches upon two Points. First, the Luxury that reigned. Secondly, the War which was carrying on.

At present, nothing is to be seen all over the Empire, but Luxury and expensive Follies upon curious and magnificent Equipages, Habits and Houses. Never was all Refinements upon sensual Pleasures, carried to such an Extravagance. There is no jumble of Colours but what is worn. Every Day produces new Concerts, and Delicacies for the Palate cannot be any farther improved: One would say, that there was an universal Endeavour in the Empire to give a Loosé to all the Passions. The People have got such a Taste, that there is nothing glaring and affected but what they covet. To allow of these foolish Extravagancies, is to teach the People to love them, and to follow their own vicious Byas. Whatever is fine, ornamented, costly, or curious, naturally strikes the Senses, and easily seduces. Repasts serve no longer the End of Nourishment, but of Gluttony and Debauchery. Music, whose original Design was to calm the Emotions of the Heart, serves now to kindle up the most shameful Passions. A sincere Attachment to the Rites, is now degenerated into Ostentation, Grimace, and superstitious Vanities. Dissimulation and Chicane, have turned Wisdom out of Doors. I would willingly know if Tricking, Ostentation, Gallantry, and Intemperance, are good Lessons for a People? Are these the Means of keeping them in their Duty? Surely not; and one needs not be astonished that they make a new Progress in Crimes every Day of their Lives. What I wish for is, that your Zeal for your People and the Good of your State, may set you upon remedying these Disorders as soon as possible.

After he has sharply exposed the bad Consequences of Sbi whang's ambitious Expeditions, he makes the Application and goes on.

I hear of nothing at present, but military Expeditions. Here Fortresses are built, and there the Barbarians are attacked: Such a People has submitted, and we are going to attack such another. The Hjong nu are terrified, and we have burnt (§) their Long tsing. These Designs are applauded by all your Council: For my share, I can easily see how certain of your Ministers and Officers may find their Account in all these: But is this for the Good of your Empire? I maintain it is not. When you can enjoy a profound Peace, needlessly to involve yourself in foreign Wars, to make useless Conquests, and to drain your own State, is not to act as the Father of your People (*) Nature.

(†) Inclinations, Affections, Passions.

(‡) Ming, the same as above; but here the Author applies Ming and Sing to the same thing. Yin to right Reason, according to the Book Chung yung, which begins with these Words. Tyen Ming chin wuy sing. Tyen ming, and Sing, have the same Signification.

It is Ming, say the Commentators, so far, as it comes from Tyen: and it is Sing so far, as it constitutes Man.

(§) A Gloss says, that this was the Place, where these People perform'd their Tsü to Tyen. [that is, made their Offering. See the Note, p. 312.]

People. From an unbounded Ambition, or merely to gratify yourself, to irritate the Hyong ni, who are willing to be at Peace with you, is to very ill to provide for the future Repose of your Frontiers. These Expeditions, tho' attended with the desired Success, may really be looked upon as Misfortunes, which will draw with them a long Train of Unhappiness. The Resentment of these Barbarians will continue. What will your Subjects who are their Neighbours suffer hereafter? and how many Alarms must your other Subjects feel? Believe me, these are not the Means to prolong the Dynasty of the Han.

We see on all Hands, the forging of Cuirasses, the scowring of Swords, the sharpening of Arrows, and the bending of Bows. Nothing is met on the Roads, but Armies marching, and Waggons loaded with Provisions; but we meet them with Grief. Whatever may be told you to the contrary, these are the Sentiments of all, except a very few of your Subjects. And it appears to me, to be so much the better founded, in that the most terrible Revolutions have been produced by Wars. Is a Prince seen in any Difficulty? then bad Designs begin to be hatched. Such a one possesses in the Heart of your Empire ten Cities, and almost a hundred Leagues of Land: Your House is then no longer in Safety: Take Care: Sbi wabang was entirely taken up with his ambitious Projects. A Man of no Consequence at the Head of Troops, armed with almost nothing but Sticks, gave the Signal, which hastened his Ruin. Now a-days, there are some who want neither Credit nor Power, and are much more to be dreaded. Think upon it, Prince; the greatest Revolutions often depend on Inconsiderable Circumstances.

Frequent Remonstrances were made to the Emperor Vu ti, because Luxury prevailed in his Reign, and Agriculture was neglected. This Prince, one Day addressing himself to Tong fang so, said to him; I want to reform my People; suggest to me the Means, and lay before me the Measures you think most proper. Tong fang so answered him in Writing, in the following Terms.

SIR, I might propose Yau, Shun, Yu, Tang, &c. as Patterns for your Imitation, but their happy Reigns have been long over. Why should we go so far back? I will confine myself to Times not so remote, and to domestic Examples. I propose to you those of Ven ti, whose Reign was so lately, that some of our old Men have had the Happiness to see it. But Ven ti, when raised to the high Dignity of (*) Tyen tsé, and in Possession of the vast Empire of which you are now Master, wore none but rough-spun Cloaths without any Ornaments. His Drawers were made of an ill dressed Skin. An ordinary Belt served him for keeping his Sword. His Arms had nothing in them that were curious; his Seat was a very indifferent Matt; and his Apartments had no Furniture that was either costly or glaring. The Ornaments and Riches of his Equipage, consisted in Bags full of useful Writings, with which he had been presented; the Embellishments of his Person were Wisdom and Virtue, and the Rules of his Conduct, Charity and Justice. All the Empire endeavoured to imitate these aimable Examples with which they were charmed.

Now a-days, we see Things quite different. Your Majesty is pent up within the vast Circumference of a Palace, which of itself is a large City; you undertake a prodigious Number of new Buildings, and give each of them fine Names. On the left is the Palace of Fong wabang: On the right that of Shing ming: So that in general, it is a Palace of a thousand, or rather ten thousand Gates. In your inner Apartments, your Wives are loaded with Diamonds and other precious Ornaments. Your Horses are richly harnessed, and even the Collars of your Dogs are costly. In short, you cause Wood and Clay to be clothed in Embroidery: Witness these theatrical Chariots whose Evolutions you love so well; every thing there is dazzling, rich and curious: On this Side you cause to be founded and erected Bells of a hundred thousand Pound Weight: On the other Side you are making Drums, whose Noise equals that of Thunder. In short, there is nothing to be seen but the Comedies and Dancings of the Daughters of Ching. I frankly own to you, Sir, that to behave thus, to carry Luxury to such an Excess, and yet to endeavour at the same time, to inculcate upon your Subjects Frugality, Modesty, Temperance and Application to Agriculture, is to aim at an Impossibility.

If then, your Majesty consults me in good earnest; if you really design to follow my Advice, or at least want to know my Opinion, I would advise your Majesty to bring together all that Trumpery of vain Ornaments; to pile them up in a Square, and then set them on Fire, that all the Empire may be witness of your Reformation. If you begin thus, you may become a second Yau, or another Shun. Our I king says; "There are certain Points so essential, that when they are perfectly observed, the rest follow a-course."

Ching te syew says of this Piece: So was a little testy, he had his own Way of representing Things. But he was otherways, an upright, sincere, and an able Man: Vu ti employed him a long time.

(*) That is Emperor: I have before explained the Literal Meaning of this Expression.

Under the same Emperor Vu ti, Kong sun hong his Minister of State proposed that the People should be prohibited the Use of the Bow: Vu ti ordered that a Deliberation should be made on this Head. U kyew presented a Writing to the Emperor, in which he gave his Opinion against it. The Extract of his Discourse is as follows.

1. SHI WHANG, during his Reign, made such a Prohibition. His true Motive for making it was to prevent the Revolts, of which he had some Reason to be afraid; it is true, he made a Handle of another Pretext: Some Quarrels happened, in which, some on both Sides were killed. He then gave out that it was in Order to prevent these Disorders, that he published this Prohibition, which was observed with Rigour, but did not at all prevent these Commotions. All the Difference was, that they then fought Hand to Hand with Spades, or such like Instruments of Handy-craft or Agriculture. Shi whang was likewise unsuccessful in preventing that which was his true Motive for making this Prohibition. Notwithstanding of this Order, he was beaten by the Forces of a very inconsiderable Person, who were rather armed with Staves than Weapons; and soon after he himself lost his Empire. 2. There are at present, say some, a great many Robbers, and this Prohibition will diminish their Numbers, or at least render them less hurtful: But it will be so far from answering this End, it will even destroy it. The Wicked will break this as well as other Laws, and the Virtuous alone will observe it. They will thereby be out of a Condition to give good Advice to the Bad, who will soon become more insolent. 3. The intended Prohibition is against the Custom of our ancient Emperors, who were so far from depriving their Subjects of the Use of the Bow and Arrow, that they recommended to them the Use of both, and appointed proper Times for that Exercise. We read in the Book of Rites: "When a Son is born into a Family, a Bow and Arrow are hung before the Gate."

Under the Emperor Swen ti, new Establishments were made, and the Lands upon the Frontiers towards the Hyong nu, were cultivated. Upon these last disputing the Grounds, there was a Battle. Several Chinese were made Prisoners, and soon set at liberty. Some were for laying hold upon that Opportunity, and for engaging Swen ti to make War. Whey syang, one of his Ministers, opposed this, and, in order to dissuade the Emperor from it, made the following Discourse.

WHEN there are Commotions, or Rebellions in a State, and if they can be quelled only by the Force of Arms; in such a Case, War is justifiable. When an Enemy unjustly invades a Kingdom, makes a great Ravage, and will hearken to no just Terms; to take Arms then for the Defence of our Country, is entering into a necessary War. When the Difference is about Trifles, when Pride and Jealousy has a greater share in the Resentment than Interest, it is a War of Anger and Frenzy. When the Desire of being enriched with its Spoils, is the Motive of invading an Enemy's Country, it is then a War of Avarice. Lastly, if it is only to acquire Glory, to shew a Superiority, or to humble a Rival; it is a War of Vanity and Ambition. In the two first Cases, a People seldom succeeds, but in the two last, never. This is what is commonly said, and this common Opinion of Men is founded upon the ordinary Conduct of Tyen. But it is visible that the Hyong nu have no Intention to attack us: They have made no Irruption upon our Territories: They have indeed disputed a Piece of Ground, upon which our People intended to make a Settlement. The Dispute grew warm: Some Prisoners were made: But they were afterwards very handsomely set at Liberty: So that it is not worth while to take any farther Notice of it.

Nevertheless, I understand that your great Officers of War press you to put them at the Head of Troops, in order to march into the Country of the Hyong nu. If your Majesty consent to this, what Name will you give this War? In my Opinion it will neither be just nor necessary. Besides, your People, especially those on that Quarter, are already so miserable, that the Father and the Son are reduced to make Use of the same wretched Habit: I know not how many People live upon Roots, and wild Herbs. What will be the Consequence, if you march thither a numerous Body of Men? Even tho' they may be victorious, their Victory will be more destructive than it can be useful. It is said, (*) that Wars are followed by bad and barren Years. It is likewise said, that this proceeds from the Inclemency of their Seasons, introduced by the Groans and Sighs of People ruined by the Consequences of Wars. But if Famine succeeds to War, let us suppose, that it is by a useless foreign Conquest being made; will not that occasion a vast deal of Disorder at Home? For my share, I believe this is so much the more to be dreaded as the Governors of your Provinces, and even the Men who are in the most exalted Stations about your own Person, are very ill chosen: Because Corruption and Disorder thereby encrease every Day: Because it is no rare thing for a Son to kill his Father, a younger, his elder Brother, and a Wife, her Husband. This very Year, two hundred and twenty two Crimes of this kind have happened.

Tho' there were no other Disorders or Troubles to be feared, can this Evil of itself be looked upon as Slight? And yet your Officers, without giving themselves any Trouble, press you to bring into the Field an Army, on a very trifling Occasion, against these foreign Barbarians. This is not the Thing that presses most. Confucius understanding that one of the Ki, when ready to die, discovered great Fear, lest his Family should suffer by the Spite of a certain Cbwen yu. Why does he not rather dread, says the Philosopher, the Disorders which he leaves in it? I would willingly say as much to them, who advise you into a War at present. I am far from being of this Opinion: I conjure you at least, before you come to any Resolution, to deliberate maturely with the Hew of Ping chang, and Ping ngen, and Lo chang, and others of their Character. If they incline for War, let it, in Gods Name, be carried on.

On Occasion of an Eclipse of the Sun and an Earthquake, the Emperor Ywen ti published a Declaration, ordering the Defects of the Government to be exposed; and Quang hong, who was then Po se, presented the following Discourse to the Emperor.

SIRE! Behold what are the present Manners of your Empire. Riches are in great request, Virtue, almost in none. Uprightness, Modesty, Temperance, are rare, especially at Court. The most natural, and the most common Laws are overthrown. Alliance carries it from Blood. Your nearest Relations are nothing in Comparison to certain remote Allies: The greatest Number of your Ministers and Officers, study only the Grimace of Complaisance, and how to enrich themselves by your Indulgence. Such is the State of Things. And such is the Source of those Calamities that afflict your Empire. This is what you must endeavour to remedy; otherways, your (*) Amnesties are useless.

The Court is commonly the Pattern of the People's Manners. When your great Men, not only live in a mutual good Understanding, but even yield to one another on certain Occasions, Disputes and Quarrels will very soon become rare among their Inferiors. Robberies and Outrages will soon cease, by the great Men becoming charitable and liberal. In short, let Justice, Temperance, Modesty, and Humanity obtain at Court; Unanimity will soon reign among the People. They will excite one another to follow so fair Examples. By these Means our wisest Princes, without using almost any Severity, have made Virtue flourish. But if Vice reigns at Court, it diffuses itself thro' the rest of the Empire so easily, that if there is among the People the least (†) Coldness or Misunderstanding, it immediately improves into Disputes and Quarrels. Haughtiness among the Great, is always productive of Insolence among the Small: If great Officers are seen to affect an independant Authority, to abuse the Favour, and make a Traffic unknown to him, of the Authority, of their Prince: In a short Time, nothing will be heard of among the People, but Robberies, Rapines, and Factions. But at present &c. (‡)

If then Vice reigns throughout the whole Empire, in Spite of both Amnesties and Chastisements: It is not Tyen that occasions it, but the wrong Measures that are taken to prevent them. I have found out several Passages of Antiquity to this Purpose. A Prince of Cbing made great Account of such as were strong and hardy. In a short Time, he had a good Number of Subjects, who could each of them subdue a Tyger. Má kong Prince of Tsin, above all Things esteemed those who were capable of an inviolable Affection to his Person. And there were soon several found, who pushed their Attachments to him so far, as to kill themselves when he died. A Princess of Tsin loved the U; the People immediately gave into a thousand Superstitions. A Hew of Tsin was a great Oeconomist: All his People were the same. Tay vang was Humanity and Goodness itself: Thus, there was no such Thing as Revenge heard of amongst his Subjects: But each easily forgave his Neighbour. To judge by these Instances, will it not fairly follow, that such as the Prince and the Court are, such commonly are his Subjects?

Your Majesty, whom the Admonitions of Heaven have inspired with a respectful Dread, and whose Compassion for your Subjects is redoubled, has done well to begin, by reforming your self: You have put a Stop to the useless and sumptuous Works begun at Kan swen. You have abandoned the Expeditions, you designed against Cbu yay. How much Joy has your Declaration upon these two Points caused thro' the whole Empire? Persevere in these fair Paths. Enquire into whatever calls for a Reformation in your Court. When your Family is once well regulated, extend your Cares farther. In what regards Music and Poetry, confine yourself to the Taste of Ta and (||) Song; let it be grave, serious, and instructive. Shun those of Cbing and Wey. Open a large Door for Remonstrances: Seek out for Men of Merit: Above all, honour those who are disinterested, upright, and sincere. And banish from your Court all Flatterers. Apply your self to the reading of our King, examine the Practice of the happiest Ages. In this Manner, study whatever is humane and natural in Government, and what produces Union and Peace. In short, endeavour by setting them the fair Example of your Virtues, to reform the Ideas and correct the Vices of your Subjects. And at least, let all your Empire see, that Wisdom and Virtue alone, can recommend a Man at your Court.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Discourse may be called a good one, both for its Sense and Expression. There is not one Word but has its Meaning.

(*) On occasion of some Singular Event, the Emperors pardon certain Criminals. This Custom still holds, and is called Ta he, or the great Pardon.

(†) The Chinese Expression is: Change of Colour.

(‡) He repeats here more at length, what he had said in the Beginning about the Manners of the Court, and then proceeds.

(||) Names of Chapters in the Sái king.

There is in the same Book another Discourse of the same Author to the forementioned Emperour Ywen ti. This Prince had two Faults to correct, the first was, He was Irresolute and bestowed all his Favours on the Relations of the Queen, who abused her Trust. For which reason Quang heng in the present Discourse, touches on two Points, that are essential to all Persons, but more especially so to a Prince. The first, is to know his weak Side, and to correct it; the second, to regulate his Family.

BEFORE he directly enters upon the Subject, he exhorts Ywen ti to strengthen himself in the laudable Passion he had of worthily sustaining the Glory of his Ancestors, of advancing more and more the prosperous State of the Empire he held from them, and of securing it to his Descendants. 'Twas thus, says he, that Ching wang did; he had always in his Mind the Virtues and Example of Ven wang his Grand-father, and of Vu wang his Father. His own Reign was full of Happiness and Glory: But when Encomiums were made upon it, he attributed all his Honour to his Ancestors, saying, that all he did was but following their Views, and imperfectly imitating their Examples. Thus, he always deserved the Favour of Shang tyen, and the Assistance of Quey shin.

After this Exordium, Quang heng explains what he means by a Man's understanding his own (*) Nature and correcting it, and in what Manner he ought to be understood. Every one, says he, ought carefully to examine what he possesses in too large or too scanty a Degree; then to cut of from one Part, in order to add to the other. For Instance, Persons who have naturally a great deal of Wit, or who have acquired a great Compass of Knowledge, are liable to be distracted amidst a great variety of Views. They ought to guard against this. Those on the contrary, whose Experience is small, and whose Capacity is but moderate, ought to dread, lest a good many things, even of Importance, may escape them. These Defects they must supply as well as they can. Men brave and vigorous ought to be afraid, and guard against their being violent. Persons who are gentle, good, and compassionate, ought to guard against Weakness, Irresolution, &c.

As to the second Head, he says nothing but what I have (†) mentioned before. He only endeavours to make his Prince sensible of what Consequence it is to him, to regulate his Favours in the best manner, and not to give much way to particular Inclinations against his real Interest, and to the Prejudice of his own Blood.

There is in the same Book a third Discourse of Quang heng's addressed to Ching ti, the Son and Successor of Ywen ti.

THIS Prince had newly mounted the Throne. Quang heng in a very short Exordium, praises the filial Piety he had shewn. After which, he exhorts him to increase the good Foundation he already had by his (‡) Application. For this End he principally recommended two Things.

The first is, carefully to fortify himself against a Passion for Women. Upon this he speaks of Marriage, as necessary to accomplish the Will of Tyen, and of the Preference which ought to be given to the Virtue of one Woman, besides the other Qualities she may possess. He cites the Encomiums bestowed by the Shi king, upon the Wife of Ven wang, who was of no small Assistance to him to make Virtue flourish. He puts him in Mind by way of Contrast, of the fatal Consequences, which the Passion of some Princes for some particular Concubines was attended with. He invites him to read History, to be the more fully convinced that the Ruin of Dynasties had most frequently taken its Rise from this.

The second Thing which Quang heng recommends to the young Emperor Ching ti, is, the frequent reading of the King, upon which he makes an Encomium. It is, says he, a Summary, or an Abridgment of the Words and Actions of the ancient Sages. One cannot enter too deeply into its Meaning: There all the Duties are marked out, both with Regard to Tyen and Man: In short, every thing that a Prince ought to do in order to render his Subjects happy. He ends by exhorting him to acquit himself worthily of the (§) great Ceremony which he was soon to perform: And to give, by that first publick Action, an Idea of what was to be expected from him, in the following Part of his Reign.

I was willing to insert here the Extract of three Discourses of Quang Heng, the two first addressed to the Emperour Ywen ti, and the third to Ching ti his Successor: but I thought I ought not for that reason to omit a Piece of another Author under Ywen ti, his Name was Kong yu, on occasion of a bad Year, addressed this Emperour, exhorting him to imitate the Temperance, Frugality, and Modesty of the Ancients.

AMONGST the Ancients, every thing was determined by certain Rules: In the Palace of our Emperors, the Number of Women never exceeded nine, and that of the Horses, eight. The Walls were handsome and in good repair, but without Ornaments. The Wood was clean (*) Quang heng uses the Expression Sing or Nature. But Ching ti says upon this Passage: that by this Expression, is understood the Nature or Temper that depends upon Organs and Matter. He does not speak here of that Nature Sing, or natural Reason, which is also named the Order or Law of Tyen.

(†) It was, says a Gloss, the Character of Ywen ti.

(‡) The Chinese says literally, tho' you have natural Capacity, Sin, I wish that you would add a Heart, Shing. Sin Shing.

(§) It was that, of which Confucius says: The End is to honour the supreme Lord, or the supreme Emperour Shang ti.

clean and smooth, but without Sculpture. The same Simplicity was observable in their Chariots and all their Moveables. The Circumference of their Park was but for a few Leagues, and the Entrance of it free to all Degrees of People. Their Revenue was the Tythe of the Grounds, which was all that ever was paid them. Every Family furnished three Days Work of a Man in a Year, and that was all the Average they had. The personal Estate of the Emperor was a hundred Leagues of Ground: From the rest he drew the Tythe. Every Family was at its own Ease: And these fortunate Times are highly celebrated by fine Odes.

In Times more modern, our Ancestors Kau tsü, Hyau wen, and Hyau king, fell into a pretty close Imitation of Antiquity. Their Women never exceeded Ten, and the Horses in their Stables a Hundred. The Emperor Hyau wen, approached the most near to the ancient Simplicity. His Habits were of a coarse plain Stuff, and his Breeches of ill drest Leather. Never did Gold, Silver, or Carvings appear upon his Moveables. Things are much changed since. Not only every Emperor has exceeded his Predecessor in Expences, but Luxury has crept into all the Orders of the Empire. The Question now is, who shall be most richly clothed, most finely accoutred, or who shall have the handsomest Sword, or the finest Sabre. In short, every one without any Ceremony, uses what before was only proper for the Sovereign to wear. Thus should the Emperor appear to give an Audience, or march out for any Ceremony, were it not for some other Circumstances, he could scarce be distinguished. This indeed is a great Disorder, and the worst of it is, that it is not perceived.

Formerly Chau kong, Prince of Lü, when the Rights of the Emperor were laid before him, that he might be inspir'd with the Respect due to his Sovereign, "How do I act contrary to them," says he? He himself alone, was blind to his own Conduct. Now a-Days, how many imitate him? The Ta yü encroaches upon the Chu bew: The Chu bew acts like a petty Emperor, and the Emperor himself, a good deal exceeds what Reason prescribes. The Evil is great, and may already pass as inveterate. But if there is a Remedy, it is you, O Prince, alone that must apply it. If there is a Possibility to recall former Times? your Example must do it. I say, if they can be recalled, for according to my small Measure of Understanding, it appears impossible to put things upon the ancient footing. But we ought to come as near them as we can.

As for what regards your Palace as it is at present, it is a determin'd Point: You cannot touch it. But you will find, if you please, enough to retrench from other Things. Formerly, as now, the Kingdom of Tsi wrought the Stuffs and Habits for the Court. Three Officers were expressly deputed for this, and they supplied the rest: But then these Stuffs and Habits, amounted only to ten great Bales. At present, these Stuffs employ in the same Kingdom, Officers and Workmen without Number. This single Article, amounts annually to some scores of (*) Wan. The Moveables of Gold and Silver for the Court, are wrought at Szü and Quang han. These are computed to amount to five hundred Wan in the Year. The Expences of the Overseers of your Work about the Court, and the Workmen, either employed for your Self or the Queen, amount annually to five thousand Wan: You maintain in your Stables near Ten thousand Horses; these consume a great deal of Corn. There goes frequently from your Queen (I have seen it my self more than once) Tables, not only rich and well appointed, but even loaded with Vessels of Gold and Silver. These are Presents she makes to some one or other, and often to People whom it does not become her to treat with so much Honour. What will the Amount of your Queens Expences be? I cannot exactly tell; but they must be very great. In the mean Time, your People are in Misery. A great Number of your poor Subjects are dying of Famine. Many Coarces lie above Ground exposed to the Dogs; and this too happens, while your Stables are full of Horses who feed upon Corn, and are so plump and wanton, for the most Part, that either to take down their Fat or their Mettle, they must every Day have a breathing. Ought Things to go thus under a Prince, whom Tyen, [Heaven] by placing on the Throne, has appointed as the Father and Mother of his People? Is that Tyen then become blind?

These excessive Expences began properly under (+) Vü ti. He filled his Palace with all the handsome Girls he could gather from all Quarters of his Empire, they amounted to Five thousand. Under Chau ti, who was young and weak, Ho quang had all the Authority. This Ho quang was ignorant both of Reason and Religion. After he had heaped up in the Palace a useless Mass of Gold, Silver and Jewels, he made a curious Search after Birds, Fishes, Turtles, Oxen, and extraordinary Horses, Tygers, and even Leopards, with other such wild Beasts; all to supply Ponds and a Menagery, which was in the Inside of the Palace to divert his Women. An indecent Thing, if ever any was so contrary to the Will of Tyen, and I even believe, notwithstanding of what Ho quang pretended, contrary to the Orders that Vü ti had left him on his Death-bed.

Since that Time, the Evil has increased. Under Swen ti the most Women were entertained. Such a Chu bew would have had a hundred, and all the rich Men as many. Within Doors, Numbers of Women had scarce any other Employment than to bewail their Fate, and to vent a thousand Imprecations. Without, appeared a Company of useless Men. An Officer, for Instance, of an ordinary Rank, entertained for his Diversions, some Dozens of Comedians. In the mean Time, the People suffered: Multitudes died; and one would have said, that all Endeavours had been used to people Tombs, and to dispeople the World. The Court was the Source of this Evil, but it is now become almost general. Every one sets it up as a kind of a Law for himself, that that he should follow what had been in Vogue for so many Reigns. This is the present State of Things, and I cannot think upon it without the most sensible Grief.

(*) A Wan is 10,000 Ounces of Silver.

(+) This is only to be understood with respect to the Dynasty of the Han.

I conjure your Majesty, to go a little farther back than these latter Reigns, to examine with Attention, and to imitate the laudable Frugality of some of your Ancestors, to cut off two Thirds of the Expences of your Court, in Moveables, Habits, and Equipages.

The Number of the Children you may hope for, does not depend upon the Number of your Wives. You may chuse from among them a Score of the most Virtuous, and send the rest off in Search of Husbands: Forty Horses are sufficient for your Stables. Of all the vast Parks you now possess, if you please, you may reserve one: Give the rest to be cultivated by poor People. In a Time of such Misery and Barrenness as the present, are not the Retrenchments I propose, indispensable Duties? Can you be sensible of your People's Sufferings, and not endeavour effectually to remove them? Would that be to answer the Designs of (*) Tyen? That Tyen, when he makes (†) Kings, does it for the good of the People. His Design, doubtless, never was, to place a Man in that Station, that he might divert himself as he pleased. Don't presume too much, says the Shi king, to those who reign, upon what Tyen has done in your Favour. You may meet with a troublesome Reverse. To discharge the Duty of a King, is not so easy a Matter. (‡) Shang ti examines you very strictly. Don't divide your Heart.

A Gloss. Ywen ti took this Remonstrance so well, that he retrenched his Habits, his Moveables and his Horses: And forbade that any of the Beasts in his Menagery to be fed with Flesh; dismissing all his Comedians; and giving to the People great Part of his Parks.

Under the Emperor Swen ti, when they were Deliberating about the Means of laying up Provisions for the Armies on the Frontiers: Chang chang proposed that Criminals, with an Exception of some Crimes, might have it in their power to redeem themselves by Furnishing a certain Quantity of Grain: Upon this Syau Whang chi, made the following Remonstrance.

THE People at the same time, have in their Hearts two Principles very opposite, the one of Good, the other of Evil. They have a Stock of Goodness and Justice, but they have likewise, a Fund of Avarice and Interest; against both which, they ought to be fortified by Instructions and by Laws. Yau, as great a Prince as he was, during the Course of his Reign, never could extirpate from the Hearts of his Subjects all Passion and all Interest: But he took his Measures so well, that Passion and Injustice yielded to Reason and Equity. Under the destructive Reign of Kyê, Corruption, tho' at the greatest Height, had never entirely stifled in the Hearts of the People, the Principles of Virtue and Equity, but that of Avarice was their Predominant. This is properly the Difference betwixt these two Reigns; a Difference, to which those who are intrusted with Rule cannot enough attend.

It is proposed to your Majesty, that those convicted of certain Crimes, may be permitted to ransom themselves, by furnishing a Quantity of Corn. This I cannot approve of, for when two Men are equally guilty, why should the one escape because he is rich, and the other die because he is poor? Shall the Heinousness of Crimes then no longer be the only Rule of Punishment? Shall Poverty and Riches have any Share in it? Are we then henceforward to see two Laws established, where indeed there is but one? This is a Disorder which must infallibly be attended by another. For as soon as this Innovation is known, where is the Son, or where is the Brother, that to ransom the Life of his Father, of his Brother, or any other of his Relations, will not use all imaginable Methods to save them? Their Hopes of Success will render them blind to Danger: What a Source of new Crimes will this afford? For one Man whose Life Money will save, there will be ten who will lose theirs under the Punishment. This is, at the same Time, to weaken the Love of Virtue and the Force of our Laws. When these Bases of Government are once ruined, I doubt much, if your Ministers, let them be as able as Chew kong and Chau kong, can ever re-establish them.

In former Days, the Granaries of the Prince were open to the Subject, Did they want? He furnished wherewithall to supply their pressing Necessities. If they were free of all these Necessities? He allowed his People to live in Plenty. We read in the Shi king these Words: Have Pity upon those poor People who suffer. Apply yourself to succour them preferably to us. In this Passage the Princes addressed Tyen: And thus the Poet chuses to express their Goodness and Compassion for their People. But we find at the same Time, a suitable return of Zeal on the People's Part for their Sovereign. The Poet makes them speak thus: Water, instantly Water; and render fertile the Domain of our Prince; then extend that Blessing to our Lands. Tho' our Times fall short of those of the Ancients, the Zeal of your Subjects still subsists: They are loaded with Duties to supply the Exigencies of our Frontiers: A Poll Tax is added to the Tax; your Subjects suffer a great deal, and are not insensible of their Misery: Notwithstanding of which, they make it their Duty to furnish all the necessary Charges. Nobody remonstrates against these; they being, the ordinary Means of providing for the Safety of States. But for the Method that is now proposed, it is a direct Breach of the Laws: It naturally tends to make ten Men perish for one, there is no Choice to be made. Your Virtues, Sir, and the Care you have taken for the Instruction of your People, have put Things upon so good a Footing, that your Government will reflect no Dishonour upon Yau and Shun; but you would degenerate, should you follow the Council that has been given you.

The Effect of this Discourse.] Swen ti laid this Discourse before Chang-Chang, who notwithstanding persisted in his former Opinion, which drew a Reply from Syau whang chi, wherein he exposed at large the Inconveniences that had followed upon a like Experiment. This Reply made the Emperor drop the Project of Chang-Chang.

A Remonstrance of Lyew hyang to the Emperor Ching ti, upon the extravagant Expences he had been at, and which he still continued to lay out upon Interment of the Princes of his House.

SIR; I find in our I king this Maxim, which is principally calculated for Princes. "You live happy; do not forget, your Happiness may soon change. You find yourself now settled on the highest Pinacle of Fortune, remember that you may tumble down." This is the way to render the Repose you now enjoy in your own Person durable, and to transmit the high Station you now fill to the Descendants of your Family. A wise Prince cannot do better than to examine History, and attentively to weigh the different Events which are there pointed out, and to trace back and to sound their Springs, to distinguish what is worthy of Praise or Blame, that he may the better profit by what he reads. By this he will, at least, have one Advantage, that he can readily point out this Truth, so proper to inspire with a respectful Dread; That there never was, till this Day, a Family to which Tyen has for ever assured the Empire.

Confucius reading the Sbi king, and coming to a certain Passage in the Ode, which is intitled Ven vang; "How terrible, cried he, with a Sigh, are the Judgments of Tyen! And how great is this Truth; That the first Care of a Man ought to be, to leave, as an Inheritance to his Descendants, a large share of Virtue!" How true is it, that without it, all other Goods are useless and transitory? If Tyen had ordered it otherwise, how could Princes have been kept in their Duty? Or how could Subjects have been animated to Virtue? Thus spoke Confucius, in bewailing the Lot of the Wits, and that of the Ing, who were become Subjects of the Cbew. Yau himself, that wise, that virtuous Prince, could not render his Son capable of the Empire, and chose another for his Successor. Yu and Tang, in Spite of all their Cares, could not perpetuate Virtue in their House, and the Empire passed to another Family. How many Changes of Dynasties have happened since that Time! Kau ti, the Founder of yours, seeing himself Master of the Empire, entertained the Thought of removing his Court to Lo yang (A). Lyew king represented to him, how needless that Expence would be. Kau ti immediately desisted, and fixed his Court at Qyang chong. There he frequently called to mind the Fates of the Dynasties of Cbew and Tsin. This first, said he, had many great Princes, to whom I cannot, I cannot be compared. It has, however, at last degenerated, and is now lost. The last had only two Princes, both without Virtue, so it was soon at an End. Full of these Thoughts, he carefully avoided the Faults of Tsin, and applied himself, as much as Circumstances would allow him, to imitate the first Cbew. In short, during his whole Reign, he was extremely attentive, vigilant, and circumspect. That wise Prince understood in its full Extent, what I have cited from Confucius.

Hyau wen being at (*) Pa lin, in examining the Situation of the Place; finding that on the North Side the Mountain was not very steep, appeared very uneasy and thoughtful: Then addressing himself to the great Men who were about him, he told them the Reasons. I am thinking, says he, how I may best secure from Insults the Tomb of (†) Kau tsü; and I am contriving for that Effect a Pile of the largest and hardest Stone, with the best Cement that can be made.

Chang che shi answered: "If there is nothing in the Tomb to excite Avarice, if it had all the Thickness and Solidity of Mount Nan, it is the same thing, as if it had many Openings. If there is nothing in it to prompt Avarice, it is secure without a Rampart". And, indeed, what has a Prince to dread after Death? But it is otherwise with his Family and the State. Their Prosperity and their Ruin depend upon many Things. This demands our Precaution; the little Expression, Chang che shi, is full of Meaning: It expresses what I would say. Hyau wen understood it well, and left off his intended Expences.

Formerly, say our Books, the Corps of the Deceased was clothed in strong thick Habits, and placed in some remote Spot built about with Faggots, without any other Security. Afterwards, some wise Men judged it requisite to change this Custom, and brought in Use the double Coffin. It is said this Change was made under Whang ti. This Whang ti was himself buried under Mount Kyau: As Yau was upon Tsi in. Both their Burials were very frugal, and their Sepulchres no way magnificent. Sbun was buried at Tsang ü, without any other Attendants but his two Wives. The Place of Yu's Sepulchre is at Whey ki, without so much as a Tree growing round it. Where is the Sepulchre of Ching tang, and the other Emperors of his Dynasty? Neither History nor Tradition give us any Light into this Point. Ven vang, Vü vang, and Cbew kong, have theirs at Pi. That of Mü kong King of Tsing is at Yong. That of Chu li tse at Vü kü. All their Tombs are very mean, and it was a wise Precaution which these Princes took in ordering them to be so. With respect to their Children or their Subjects, 'twas the Effect of Wisdom and Piety in them, to conform themselves to the Royal Intentions. Cbew kong was the younger Brother of the Emperor Vü vang. He was intrusted with his Funeral, and defrayed it at a very cheap Rate. Confucius buried his Mother at Fang, in an old Tomb only four Foot high; but being much damaged by the Rains, the Disciples of Confucius not only repaired, but embellished it. Their Master understanding this, "Alas, cried he, with Tears! Antiquity would not have acted thus."

(A) Now Ho-nan fü in the Province of Ho-nan.

(*) The Name of the Place, where Kau ti's Burying-Place was.

(†) The same with Kau ti or Kau whang ti, Founder of the Dynasty of the Han, and Father to Ven ti, or Hyau wen.

Ten lyu ki the making a Journey into the Kingdom of Tsi, his Son who was with him died on the Road as they returned. He caused him to be buried in the Habits of the Season in a Grave not very deep, without any more Mold upon him, than was necessary to shew that a dead Body had been buried in that Spot. This done, he said, weeping for his Son; "It is the Fate of our Bodies to return to Dust. It is an unalterable Decree that Rottenness shall penetrate every where, whatever Precaution we use to prevent it." The Place of his Son's Birth was but 100 Leagues distant from that of his Death. His Father caused him to be buried in the Spot where he died, without being at the trouble to (*) transport him to the burial Place of his Family. Confucius on a Journey, understanding what Ten lyu had done and said on this Head; He both approved and commended him, as being well versed in the Rites. Confucius was certainly a dutiful Son; Ten lyu an affectionate Father: Shun and Tu loyal Subjects; and Chew kong loved Yu wang as his elder Brother, and honoured him as his Emperor. Yet we see that all these great Men, as if they had acted in Concert with one another, shunn'd Magnificence and Expences in Funerals and upon Sepulchres. Was this Motive a mean Parsimony? Doubtless not: Who dares to suspect them of that? But besides other Considerations, they had this one, that they thereby less exposed the Bodies of the Dead to the Insults of the Living.

The King of Wen acted quite otherwise; he erected to his Father, without much regarding the Rites, a Monument equally sumptuous and proud. Within ten Years he saw it demolished and plundered by the People of Tse; the same Thing happened to the five Kings of Tsin, in a Sepulchre where their dead Bodies were interred, together with a good deal of Riches. These Riches were seen carried off, and the Remains of their Bodies were left in so pitiful a Condition, that one cannot think of it without Horror. At last Sbi wahang, the King of Tsin, becoming Emperor, he chose for his Sepulchre the Mountain Li, whose Foundation he caused to dig, if we may so speak, even to the (+) Center of the Earth. On its Surface he erected a Mausoleum which might pass for a (‡) Mountain. It was 500 Feet high, and at least half a League in Circumference. On the Outside was a vast Tomb of Stone, where one might walk as easily as in the largest Hall. In the Middle was a sumptuous Coffin, and all around there were Lamps and Flambeaux, whose Flames were fed by human Fat. Within this Tomb, there was upon one Side a Pond of Quick-silver, upon which were scattered Birds of Gold and Silver: On the other, a compleat Magazine of Moveables and Arms: Here and there were the most precious Jewels in Thousands. In short, the Magnificence and Riches, either of the Coffin, the Tomb, or the Buildings wherein it was placed, is inexpressible. He not only expended immense Sums upon it, but it cost him the Lives of a great many of his Subjects. Besides the People of his Palace who had perished there, the Workmen who had been buried alive were counted by (§) Wan. The People no longer able to support this Tyranny, all of a sudden run to Arms, upon the first Signal of a Revolt. These Works upon the Mountain Li were not yet finished, when Chew ehong encamped at its Foot; and soon after Hang si rased these vast Walls, burnt these beautiful Buildings, penetrated into that proud Monument, carried off all its Riches, and made that Sepulchre a Place of Horror: However the Coffin still remained there. It is said, a Shepherd searching in the midst of these Labyrinths for a stray Sheep, happened to drop some Fire, which caught the Coffin and consumed it. Surely, never did any Prince carry his Magnificence farther than Sbi wahang, especially with regard to his Sepulchre. You see what are the Consequences. Can any thing more dismal be conceived?

But to return. It is plain from History, that always where there was most Virtue, there was least Pomp, even as to what related to Sepulchres: That those who are acknowledged, by all the World, to have been the most understanding of the Ancients, were the most removed from Pomp: That those who valued themselves upon their Magnificence on this Point, were such as had no Reputation, either as to Wisdom or Virtue; and that those who had the smallest Share of both, always carried this Ostentation and Magnificence the farthest: It appears, that the most sumptuous and the most rich Tombs and Myau, were soon pillaged and demolished. Can one deliberate, after this, upon the Course that he is to follow?

There was a Time, when the Chew beginning to degenerate, gave into Luxury and Expences. The rest of the Government felt it. Yen Vang, a clear-sighted Prince, succeeded them: He perceived the Cause of the Evil: He applied a Remedy: He revived a decent Frugality: And set the first Example himself. This Example had such an Effect, that it put the Government upon a right Footing: His Reign was flourishing, and his Posterity numerous; and it is his Memory which our Sbi king, in the Ode Se kan, celebrates. On the contrary, Nyen kong, King of Li, valued himself upon erecting fine Terrasses, inclosing vast Parks, and magnificently adorning the Halls of his Ancestors. He died without Posterity, and the (||) Chun tssu does not spare him. Will any one after this, prefer Pomp to Oeconomy? Your Majesty, at your Accession, shewed your Value for, and gave more than one Proof of, this last Virtue. Your Moderation, especially, was admired, in the Conveniencies which you proposed to make at the ancient Sepulchre of your Family. You soon changed that Method in the new Sepulchre, that you have begun at Chang lin. What proud Terrasses, or rather what laboured Mountains! How many private Coffins have been removed for it! We may count them by ten Thousands. How much Money has been been expended, and the Charges already amount to more than a hundred Wan. The Dead hate you, the Living endure you, but murmur at you. The Breath of these Groans and Imprecations blasts the Seasons, and sterilizes the Ground.

I am a Person without Understanding, but my way of Reasoning is this: If the Dead know what passes here, surely, by disturbing so many Coffins, you make a great many Enemies among them. If the Dead are unconscious of what is done on Earth, what End can these profuse Expences upon the Sepulchre of one Man, serve? Only one, which is, that they attract the Eyes of the Living. But Men of Wisdom and Virtue, far from approving these Expences, only behold them with Regret. A People which is harassed, is far from relishing such expensive Lessons of filial Piety. We shall suppose, that there are some Persons abandoned to Wisdom and Virtue, whose Inclinations lead them to Pomp, that applaud this Undertaking. Is there any thing in such Applauses that can flatter you? You, Sir, are naturally full of Goodness, Sincerity, and Uprightness. Your Genius is Superior, and never was there a Prince more capable to reflect a Lustre upon his Dynasty, or more closely to follow, even the most wise among our ancient Sages and ancient Emperors. Will you then, on the contrary, imitate the Faults of so bad a Prince as Sbi wbang? Will you, like him, disregarding the Repose and Safety of your Empire, and the Sentiments of every wise and virtuous Man, undertake these proud and useless Works? Will you buy, at such a Price, the Applause of certain worthless Sycophants? Nothing can be more melancholy if you do, nor can I help blushing in your behalf. You have many other Patterns to follow; amongst the Ancients, Wbang ti, Yau, Shun, Yü, Tang, Vü wang, Chew kong; amongst those who are more modern, Vü kong, Yen hyu, Confucius, &c. But without even going so far back as them, you find in Hyau wen, who was one of your own Ancestors, an Example of this Kind, which you ought to follow; and in Sbi wbang one, which you ought to shun. To conclude, I advise you to abandon the Works of Chang lin, to fix on the ancient Sepulchre of your Family, and to regulate by the Counsels of all your great Men the Accommodations which ought to be made there.

A Gloss.] Ching ti, at first, appeared touched with this Discourse of Lyew hyang; nevertheless he did not follow his Counsel.

Another Remonstrance of the same Lyew hyang, to the same Emperor Ching ti, upon his abandoning the Government to the Relations of the Empress.

SIR; There is no Emperor, who does not wish to maintain in his State good Order and Peace, during his Reign; and who does not propose to transmit his Crown to his Descendants; notwithstanding of which, great Revolutions are not rare: And it is still more frequent to see, at least, dangerous Commotions in States. The most ordinary and immediate Cause of these Misfortunes is attributed, and I believe justly too, to Princes giving, or at least permitting too great an Authority to certain of their Subjects. This appears evident in a great Number of Examples which are furnished us, by the ancient Book (*) Chun tssü. In Times nearer our own, Chau wang, King of Tsing, saw his Kingdom brought to the Brink of Ruin, by making his Uncles on the Mother's Side, too powerful. However he was happy, in finding two faithful Subjects who supported him. Eul shi, the Successor of Sbi wbang, gave himself entirely up to Chau kau. This last begun, by removing from about his Person every one whom he suspected: After which, he freely abused his Power. A Revolt soon followed; Eul shi lost his Empire and his Life, at once. This Example is not ancient, since to this Prince, who was the last of the Dynasty of the Tsin, the Dynasty of the Han succeeded.

But this very Dynasty furnishes us with an Example yet more recent: In the second Generation, it saw itself at the Brink of Ruin. The Lyu, whom the Favour of the Empress, a Descendant of that House, had raised, seiz'd the Helm of Government, and all Honours and Employments were engrossed, either by them or their Creatures. They had the Command of the Troops, both to the North and South; their Pride and their Haughtiness even exceeded their Power, and they were within one Step of mounting the Throne, which they were ready to take, when the Hew's of Kyang and of Chubi, supported by some others of their Character, with a Courage and Zeal worthy of themselves, opposed the Lyu, rooted them out, and confirmed the Throne to the Lyew (+).

The Wang (+) are at this Time, what the Lyu were before. No less than 23 of them are raised to the highest Honours. One of them, who is Generalissimo of your Troops, absolutely and arbitrarily disposes of every Thing. Five others, who are of the same Family of the Lyew, carry their Pride and their Insolence yet higher. They frequently cloak their Avarice, their Violence, and even sometimes the most mean and the most shameful Passions, under the Pretence of public Good. When this Pretence cannot take Place, they have Recourse to your and the Empress's Name. They make every one sensible of the Relations they bear to her, and what she bears to you; and under this Title they attempt every thing. All the first Employments of the great Tribunals are filled with their Creatures. Is there any one of their Cabal who applauds them? Does he mount to the first Offices? Is there any Unwillingness expressed, that he ought not to be raised in that manner? The Effects of their Vengeance are soon felt. Happy is he, to whom it does not cost his Life. They have in Pay vast Numbers of wordy Sycophants, who are always praising them every where. Even your Ministers are in their Interest.

(*) This Book cites a great many; but as they are only Names of Men and Countries, I omit them.

(†) Family-Name of the Dynasty, surnamed Han.

(‡) Name of the Family of the Empress, Consort to the Emperor Ching ti.

You see truly, great Prince, upon what footing these Wang are, while the Princes of your House are buried in Obscurity. Those amongst them, whom they understand to possess any Degree of Merit, are removed to a Distance, by a thousand Artifices. You are often put in mind, that you may entertain a Distrust of them, of the Examples of the Princes of (*) Ten and Kay-chi: But they take care never once to mention the (†) Lyu and the Ho: In short, never did the Wang fu, under the Chew; never did the Hew of Yang, under the Tsin; nor the Lyu and the Ho, under the Han, your Predecessors, attain to so great a Pitch of Power, as have the Wang under your Reign. The same State never suffers two Powers so extremely opposite. Either your House is in the utmost Danger, or that of the Wang ought to perish. Remember of whom you are descended. Will it not be shameful for you to let your Empire pass to meer Allies, and to reduce those who are of your own Blood, to the most vile Conditions? If you have not a due Sense of your own personal Interest, study at least to support the Splendor of your Ancestors. This touches your own Honour: This touches even the Honour of the Empress; for it is a settled Rule with the most remote Antiquity, that a Woman ought to prefer the Family into which she enters by Marriage, to that from whence she is descended. The Security of the Happiness of States must be begun at a Distance; and Troubles must be prevented before they arrive. By doing otherwise all is hazarded.

It is not yet too late if you please, but if you will believe me, do not delay it. Call near your own Person such of the Princes of your Blood as have Merit, and make them enter into a Share of the Government; but above all, trust the least Part of it to your Allies. Hyau wen excluded them, and his Reign was peaceable. It is the true Interest of both Families, that your Allies should be enriched by your Favours, in Consideration of the Empress: That they should have wherewithal to support themselves in Time to come on a good Footing; but that your House should reign and should govern. This is the Method by which both of them, each according to its own Rank, should continue and flourish for many Ages. But if your Majesty should act otherwise, there is all Reason to fear, that we may yet in our Days, see the tragical Events of which I have spoken, and that you will leave to Posterity a melancholy Memorial of your Reign.

A Gloss.] Ching ti having read this Remonstrance, caused Lyew hyang to come into his Presence; and shewing by his Sighs that he was very much touched with his Discourse, he told him; You may depend upon it, that I will think upon and provide for every Thing, that you have represented to me. Besides he raised him to a considerable Post in the Government.

Towards the Reign of Ching ti, People gave into all kinds of Superstitions, and pretended Secrets, particularly into a Search after a kind of Immortality. In the Collection from whence I take these Pieces, there is a Discourse of Ku yong, which represents to the Emperor the Vanity of these Researches, and concludes, by desiring him not to suffer any one of these Mountebanks to appear at his Court. All his Proof consists of Examples drawn from History (‡); so that to point it out as I have done, is to give an Abstract of the Discourse.

PRINCE; It is commonly said, that every one ought to conform himself to the Rank that he bears: And that he who acts otherwise, is in hazard to displease the Sovereign, and to feel the Effects of his Indignation. According to this Maxim, I ought to hold my Peace; and being but a petty Officer, ought not to propose any Thing that is considerable; but I own this is a Maxim that I cannot approve of. The fear of Punishment, and the hopes of raising my Fortune, no way affect me. 'Tis true, that if I am silent, agreeable to the humble Rank I possess, I may quietly pass the Remainder of my Days; but then after my Death, my Body will be no sooner rotten, than my Name shall be forgot. There is no degree of Rest, and no Pitch of Fortune that I would purchase at this Price. My Ambition is not confined to this Life: I endeavour to merit, that after my Death, my Name may be seen engraven upon Monuments of Stone, and that my Figure may be seen gravely sitting in a lofty Hall, before which there is a handsome Court. I should be sensibly afflicted, should I pass my Life without being (‡) useful to my Country, and thus deserve to be forgot as soon as I am dead.

This is what employs me Night and Day: And this is my Motive for presenting to you this Petition. It is a common and a true Saying, That to preserve others is the Means of preserving one's self, and that to shut up the Way to one's self, is to shut it up to others; and accordingly every one receives either Reward or Punishment, in proportion as he does good or evil. Sbi wbang destroyed the Chew, and seized six Kingdoms. Under him Virtue was without Honour and without Reward. Under him, the Ceremonies, in honour of the Chiefs of our three famous Dynasties, were disused. In short, he did all he could to extinguish the (§) true Doctrine. Thus he died amidst Alarms and Troubles; his Son was killed, and with him his Posterity perished. Punishments, which perfectly well agree to his Conduct with respect to others.

(*) Two Princes of the reigning Family, who had occasioned some Commotions.

(†) Two Families, two of which were Empresses, who abused their too great Authority.

(‡) The ordinary Fund of the Chinese Eloquence.

(§) A Gloss says, that he who procures Honours to the great Men of past Ages, does real Service to the State.

(§) The Chinese says, Tyen Hyu, the Doctrine of Tyen, or the Celestial Doctrine.

Fu wang observed a contrary Conduct. Before he descended from the Chariot, which served him to gain the Victory, he gave orders to preserve the Descendants of our five Ti. He afterwards made the Prince of Ki, one of the (*) Hya, and the Prince of Song, one of the Ing, these Families, and to shew, at the same time, that he did not pretend to possess the Empire, so as not to do Good to others. Thus his Family, as a Recompense, multiplied so exceedingly, that the Number of those who carried the Pictures of their Ancestors into their Hall, formed, as it were, the Course of a fine River. At present, the Royal Family Ing, has no direct Heirs which are in Place, and Ching wang who was the Chief, has no body who continues the Ceremonies in his Honour. Is it not for this, that you as yet have no Heir?

According to the Interpretation which Ku lyang gives of a Passage of Chun tsiu, Confucius and his Family are descended of the Ing. Your Majesty would do very well, to honour them with the Title of Successors in Chief to that Royal Family, in order to continue the Ceremonies. It is true, that they descend only in a collateral Line, but what does that signify? The first of a Family who becomes a Prince, becomes thereby President of the Ceremonies, altho' it was formerly the Right of another. A Prince (†) of distinguished Merit, tho' born of a Woman of the second Order, is sometimes justly preferred to the (‡) Son of the Wife. Besides, an ancient Tradition says, that the Descendants of Persons of Merit and Virtue, ought never to be without Lands. By much stronger Reasons, those of Confucius, that eminently wise and virtuous Man, and who has the Advantage to be descended from the Ing, ought not. Ching wang celebrated the Funeral of the great Chew kong; his Uncle treated him only as a Chu hero. (§) Whang tyen, as it is said, found that to be too little, and testified its Resentment by a great Storm.

At present, the Hall of Confucius is but little honoured, and his Descendants are in the Rank of mean People. It is not the Intention of the Whang tyen, that so great a Man should not be respected in the ordinary Ceremonies, except by People of so mean a Condition. Confucius, without possessing any Kingdom, had all the Qualities of a great King; for which Reason, Ku lyang called him a King without a Kingdom. Your Majesty then with that Consideration, can grant to his Descendants what I propose. Besides that, I don't doubt but that this good Action will contribute to the Happiness of your Empire. It is the Means of eternizing your Memory, and my Reason is this. Till this time, it has never been the Custom to honour great Men in the Persons of their Descendants: The wise Kings your Successors, will follow this Custom, and it will eternally be remembered, that it was introduced under your Reign: Is this a thing to be neglected?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Aim of Mey fu was to illustrate the Family of Confucius, that he might more certainly obtain what he wanted.

The Gloss.] Ching ti granted to the Family of Confucius, what Mey fu proposed.

Under Ching ti, on account of some extraordinary Phenomena's, a pretended Astrologer, proposed to send a large Army against the Barbarians of the North: Adding, that when the Army was on foot, the first Officer of Distinction, who should commit any Fault, should be put to Death: That thereby the rest might be struck with Respect, and the Barbarians with Terror: That the bad Omens might be averted, and every thing might succeed. Ching ti half inclined to this Advice, and asked the Opinion of Wang kya, who gave it in Writing as follows.

IT is not by empty Words, but by virtuous Actions, that you must try to gain the Hearts of the People. Tyen must be answered and obeyed by a real and solid Virtue, and not by a fair Outside. No, that is not allowed, nor is it indeed easy to impose upon common People, and far less is it either allowable or possible to impose upon Shang tyen, or to escape his (||) penetrating Sight. When he causes extraordinary Phenomenons to appear, it is either to keep Princes in their Duty, or to reclaim them. If they profit by this Warning, and if they seriously practise Virtue, the Minds of the People are satisfied, and Tyen obtains his Aim.

As for what certain Talkers say, who take Advantage of every thing to enhance their own Value, and who pretend to see in the Stars, the Necessity and Success of these Expeditions against our Neighbours, I am far from finding in their Discourses, the true manner of answering and obeying Tyen. On the contrary, I think I see the melancholy Prelude of the most fatal Revolutions. Nothing, it is true, is more terrible, than to see a considerable Officer dragged for the least Fault, with his Hands tied behind his Back, to the Gate of the Palace, there to undergo the most disgraceful Punishment. But can all this Pomp of Terror hinder it from being said with Truth, that it is always dangerous to stir without Necessity: And that the Advice of these Talkers, was not an Advice to be followed. As for me, all that I see in the Councils given you, are either Flatteries in order to engage you in Enterprizes that are really very dangerous: Or, frivolous Reasons founded upon new Conjectures, in order to induce you to an extravagant Severity. Is there any thing more capable to spoil the most Virtuous Prince, than Flattery? Is there any thing more ready to attract the Hatred and Curses of the Subjects, than Expeditions, that are as hazardous as they are unnecessary?

As for these trifling Reasonings that are founded upon vain Conjectures, they visibly wound the true Doctrine. And the extravagant Severity with which, by this Means, they would inspire you, is diametrically opposite to Clemency and Gentleness; Virtues, upon which the greatest Princes have always valued themselves. Formerly Mu kong, King of Tsing, preferred the Advice of a certain Talker, to the wise Councils of his wife General Pe li lu; this cost him the entire Ruin of his Army. Mu kong then openly acknowledged his Fault, but it was too late, for his Army was defeated: Believe me, that the Quality which bids fairest to render a Prince famous in after Ages, is the Faculty of discerning those who would impose on his Judgment, and his Care not to give into the Advice of People, who are without Experience, and without Wisdom. Your Majesty may be convinced of this, by reading History: To which I advise you as much as possible: And I conjure you above all, never to take the first Advice that is offered, without a due Examination.

The Emperor Ngay ti had a Favorite, whose Name was Tong hyen, whom he loaded with Honours and Riches: This made every body repine at his Conduct. Wang kya upon this, made a Remonstrance to the Emperor: Wherein, having laid before the Emperor, a full Account of the Favours he had beaped upon Tong hyen: Together with the Riches, the Pride, and the Vanity of that Favorite: He gave an Instance of two Persons, who by a like Bounty, were raised under other Reigns, and whose Fortune had so far intoxicated them, that they threw the State into Confusion, and likewise ruined themselves. He concluded, with pressing the Emperor to weigh these two Examples, and other Instances of past Ages, and to moderate his Favours with Regard to Tong hyen; were it for no other Reason, but for the good of that Favorite, whom these extravagant Favours could not fail to hurt. The History says, that this Remonstrance by no means pleas'd Ngay ti, whose Affection for Tong hyen was not at all diminished: That notwithstanding, he was ashamed to act openly against the Remonstrance; he took an indirect Method of increasing the Riches of his Favorite. The Empress's Consort produced an Ordinance, either real or supposititious, by which the Empress's Dowager left to Tong hyen an Estate, containing 2000 Families: This Ordinance was sent to Wang kya the Minister of State, in order to put it in Execution. Wang kya immediately sealed it and sent it to the Emperor, with a second Remonstrance, which is as follows.

IT is a common and a true Saying, that Tyen is the Master of Dignities and Lands. Thus the Shi king says, when it speaks of Sovereigns. "Tyen deposes under his Commands, a capable and a virtuous Man." In this Respect therefore, they who reign are in Tyen's Place. What then is more proper to inspire them in their Distribution of Favours and Graces, with a serious Attention and a respectful Dread? Whoever therefore misplaces them, is almost always punished with the Murmurs and Curses of the People, by the Disorders of the Seasons, by epidemical Diseases, and such like Plagues. No Man can be more alarmed than I am, to see on the one Hand, your Majesty in a bad state of Health, and on the other, the excessive Favours you heap upon a Minion, by lavishing on him the highest Titles, by draining your Treasures, and fearing, if I may so say, that they will not be sufficient for him: In short, in some measure, by degrading yourself, and stooping to raise him.

Hyau wen, one of your Ancestors, was anxious to raise a certain Terrass. But upon a Computation of how much it would cost him, altho' the Sum was but moderate, and not above a hundred (*) Kin, yet he gave up his Project, notwithstanding of his Inclination. Hyen your Favorite understands better Things. It is not rare to see him, tho' a Subject, draw out of the Royal Treasury a thousand Kin, in order to gratify some Family. This is what has not been seen since the most remote Antiquity: For this Reason, he is cursed all over the Empire. There is a Proverb in Country Places; That the Man who is pointed out with the Finger, never dies of a Disease. I tremble for Tong hyen; yet I understand, that an Order of the late Empress is produced, by which the Ministers of State and others, are commanded to put him in Possession of what formerly was the Estate of three Hew. For my share, I am inclin'd to believe, that these late Earthquakes, these Rockings of the Mountains, and Eclipses of the Sun, are so many Advices given you, not to raise the Subject above the Sovereign. Hyen, who has been for a long time overloaded with your Favours, has been seen insolently to disdain them, and when he had received Lands from you, to demand an Exchange: But after having obtained it, to return incessantly to the Charge, and fatigue you with new Demands: He being always importunate and insatiable, and you always easy and condescending to his Desires and Caprices: This has been observed for a long time. But as nothing is more contrary to the Respect that is due to you, and to the Good of your State, there is not one of your good Subjects, who does not behold it with Grief.

Your Health is precious, and you have as yet no Heir. These Circumstances demand of you a singular Application to gain the Heart of Tyen, to render yourself amiable to your Subjects, and thereby thereby to deserve his auspicious Protection. Yet this is what you do not in the least think of; being entirely employed in making the Fortune of one Subject, you forget all the rest, and even your own Health. Whence can it proceed, that you are so insensible of what supported Kau tsü in so many Exploits, I mean, the Desire and Hopes of perpetuating the Throne in his Family? The Book (*) Hyau king says: "If there are at the Court of a Prince seven Officers truly zealous, and who have Courage enough to make respectful Remonstrances upon occasions, tho' that Prince be a little irregular in his Conduct, he will not, for all that, lose his Crown." If I presume at present, to send back to your Majesty this Ordinance sealed up, it is not because I fail in my Respect to the Orders of the Court, nor that I court my own Ruin by offending you; it is because I dare not produce it; it is because for the Honour of your Majesty, and the Good of your Estate, I am very much afraid, lest it should come to the Ears of the Public: All I do, and all I say, is not in order to raise my own Value, or to make a Shew of my Zeal to your Majesty. Be pleased to examine yourself, what other Motive could engage me to make these reiterated Remonstrances, notwithstanding of the Danger to which they expose me.

The Emperor Kang hi praises these two Remonstrances of Wang kya, especially the one I have now translated: Several other Authors are cited, some dead, others living, who praise this Piece. Wang kya perished, but not entirely for these Remonstrances, but for some other Affair which Teng byen's Vengeance had raised against him. He was thrown into Prison, where it is said, he was starved to Death. His melancholy Fate, stopped the Mouths of all the other zealous Subjects.

Under the Emperor Ngay ti, Tan yu a Tartar Prince to the North West of China, wrote a Letter of Submission, begging the Emperor's Permission to come in Person, and to pay him his Homage. The greater Part of the Ministers and Officers of State, looked upon this Request as an Occasion of a great, but useless Expence. Tang yong was of another Opinion, and presented a Remonstrance to the Emperor on that Head, where he lays before him at large, all the Troubles that these People had occasioned since the Days of the Tsin. Representing at the same time, that it was both for the Honour and Advantage of China, that these People should submit. He adds, that the Proposal of Tan yu could not be rejected without irritating him, in which case, the Emperor must feel the Effect of it for a long Time. The Emperor, upon this Remonstrance, accepted the Proposal of Tan yu, and sent him his Permission for what he wanted. In the Book from which these Pieces are extracted, some Reflections, which an ancient Author named Hü yu, made upon the Events treated of in this Piece, are inserted in the Margin.

A good many of our Emperors, says that Author, seeing every thing quiet at Home, have endeavoured to make Conquests abroad; and have valued themselves upon submitting those People, which the former Dynasties could not subdue. Such amongst others was, Vü ti one of the Han, who during thirty Years, employed vast Armies against his Neighbours to the North West, but without Success. On the contrary, under the Reigns of Swen ti, Yuen ti, Ching ti, and Ngay ti, Princes, who never troubled their Head about making Conquests, these People submitted themselves, particularly in the time of Ngay ti, under whose Reign the Dynasty Hü was much decay'd: (†) U sun paid him Homage according to the Rites, and more than Fifty petty Princes of the western Kingdoms, had Seals which they received from our Emperor.

Tho' nothing, in Appearance, was more glorious, or more advantageous for China, for my Share, when I consider it in that Situation, I compare it to a great Tree which shoots forth large Branches and thick Leaves, but whose Trunk and Root the Worms devour. The Tree, notwithstanding of its beautiful Appearance, is in great Danger. Thus, our wise Kings of Antiquity, applied themselves carefully to regulate their Empire well at Home: This they made their principal Study, and were far from neglecting it, in order to form Designs abroad. O! How well did these great Men understand Matters?

Kong quang, a Minister under Ngay ti, proposed to that Prince, to destroy the Palaces of such of his Ancestors, whose Times and Ranks were passed. This Proposition appeared in general, reasonable. All the Difficulty was, with Respect to the Palace of the (§) Hya yü, upon which there were different Opinions. Yuan le, Pong swen, and some others, were of Opinion, that it should be destroy'd, saying, that tho' Hya yü was a very great Prince, and tho' the Empire owed him great Obligations, yet his Time being expired, according to the Degrees both of Succession and Relation, his Palace ought to be destroyed. Lyew hing, Wang shun, and some others, were of a contrary Sentiment. They presented upon that Head, a short Discourse to the Emperor. It consisted entirely in crying up the Reign of Hya yü, who according to them, and to History, was a very great Prince, and particularly a great Conqueror. They ended, by saying, that the (†) King determined nothing so clearly with Respect to the Number of Degrees, but that their Palaces might yet stand. They shewed by some Examples, that they have stood for seven Generations at one time: Ngay ti followed this last Advice, and the Palace of Hya yü was preserved.

Ping ti succeeded Ngay ti, but reigned only a short Time. Vang pwen possessed himself of the Throne, and the Dynasty of the Han was interrupted for upwards of twenty Years. Syew, otherwise called Wen shû, Grand-son of Kau tsu, restored it in the ninth Generation: And the Han having remounted the Throne, possessed it for upwards of 200 Years. This Restorer of the Dynasty of the Han, has been Surnamed Quang vu.

In the 27th Year of his Reign, some body presented a Memorial to him, to engage him to make War upon the Barbarians in the North West: Which Proposition he answered in the following Declaration.

I REMEMBER, that I have often read in the Whang she kong, that what is flexible, altho' it appears weak, carries it from what is stiff and strong. This is an Allusion which lets us see, that what is called Force and Power, ought to yeild, and in effect does yeild, to Gentleness and Virtue. Thus it is usually said, When a Prince is virtuous, that which contributes to his Pleasure, contributes to that of his People. On the contrary, when a Prince is without Virtue, his Pleasures are of such a Nature, as cannot be relished by the Subjects. It is added with Reason, that the Pleasures of the first Kind are durable, but those of the second Sort, are short liv'd and fatal to the Enjoyer. The Prince who seeks to meddle in foreign Affairs, fatigues himself to no purpose. He who confines himself to those at Home, easily brings them to a happy Period. Is a Prince in Peace? People attach themselves to him: Are his Affairs perplexed? They take Occasion to raise a thousand Storms against him. Thence proceeds this Maxim, that the Prince who endeavours to extend his Territories, renders them desert and barren: He who endeavours to grow in Virtue, sees, that, at the same time, his Strength encreases. Is a Prince content with what he has? He can preserve it without great Trouble. But would he invade the Property of others? He labours for his own Hurt and Destruction. Victories of that kind, are at the Bottom real Defeats. My Government is as yet very imperfect: My Empire is frequently subject to public Calamities: My poor People have Difficulty to subsist themselves, and pass their time very poorly: What shall become of them, if by ill timed Undertakings, I should encrease their Miseries.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] (*) Quang vu had been long at the Head of Armies, he knew well, how much the People suffered by War: So that it is not at all surprizing, that he took Care not to engage them needlessly in it.

A Gloss.] After this Declaration, no body presumed to advise Quang vu to any Project of War.

Ming ti, the fourth Son of Quang vu, succeeded him. When he was (+) Tay tse, he had Wen yong for his Preceptor, who being infirm, petitioned to be allowed to retire from Court. Ming ti, who was now Emperor, answered the Petition of Wen yong in a Writing, which I am now to translate.

I HAVE had the Pleasure to study under you from my Child-hood, for during nine Years Notwithstanding of your Cares, I am yet a Man without Judgment, and without Understanding. Our five King are Extensive: The Words of our ancient Sages are full of Mysteries and deep: It is all that forms a Genius of the first Order, to be able to penetrate to their Bottom: This is far above the Capacities of a Man, without Genius and without Abilities, like me. Your Assistance can yet be of great Use to me, and I am very sensible, how little I deserve what you are so complaisant as to tell me, when you ask Permission to retire. Others, besides you, have used such Terms to their Disciples, but these Disciples were, in effect, able Men, who had perfectly comprehended our King. Besides, they were obliged to leave their Master by indispensable Duties, and by Family Affairs. They gave him Testimonies of their Grief, which he answered by the Marks of Esteem, which every one of them deserved. As for me, I am far from deserving those which you bestow upon me in your Petition. But since you absolutely desire to be gone, I dare not presume to hinder you: I only recommend to you, to take care of your weak State of Health, and to spare nothing for that Effect, and in short, to put a due Value upon your own (‡) precious Person.

Chang ti succeeded his Father Ming ti: In the second Year of his Reign, there was a great Drought. His Advisers attributed this Calamity, to his not raising the Relations of Empress Dowager. So it was immediately proposed to the Emperor that they should be raised, but this was opposed by the Empress Dowager, who caused the following Declaration to be published

THESE Talkers who attribute the Drought to my Relations being without Dignities, talk thus, either to flatter me, or from some other secret Motive. What they say, is without any Foundation; (§) Five Brothers of an Empress were made Hew in one Day: But this did not produce the least Rain. Every one knows how many Commotions the Relations of the Em-

(*) Quang vu himself, in a Letter to one of his Officers, says: I have been ten Years in the Army, and have no relish for empty Compliments.

(†) Tay, signifies great, very great: Tse, signifies a Son. To these two Characters, is commonly joined the Character Whang, and then they say Whang tay tse, to express that Son of the Emperor, who is appointed his Successor.

presses have occasioned under other Reigns; for which Reason, the Emperor and I judged it convenient, that my Relations should have no share in the Government. I have often told this to my Son, who is the present Emperor, and yet he is pressed to raise the (*) Ma upon the footing of the (†) Yu; Is that reasonable? I have the Honour to be Empress, that is to say, (‡) Mother of the Empire. The Cloaths that I wear, are of Silk, but they are plain and without Embroidery. My Table is neither magnificent nor delicate. My Servants are clothed with the most common to set a Pattern to my Relations, that I may induce them to do the same. But instead of imitating my Conduct in this, I know that they make it a subject of their Raillery, and look upon my Frugality and Modesty, as the Effect of sordid Parsimony. Not long since, I past by the Gate called Yolong, where I met one of my Relations: Having stopt a little to ask his News, I saw in his Train, a long Rank of Chariots together with a light and a numerous Troop of Horsemen, every one of which seemed to be a flying Dragon. His meanest Domestics were all richly clothed. As my Servants and his were too near, I did not care to put myself into a Passion, or to give him a public Reprimand. But in order to bring him to himself, I took care, without telling him for what Reason, to cut off his Appointments for a whole Year. Notwithstanding of this, I did not see that he endeavoured to reform himself, or that he shewed that he was sensible of the public Calamities. It is ordinarily said; Who shall know the Subjects but the Prince? And indeed, I know my Relations and Servants better than any other. No! Whatever may be said on this Subject, I will never abandon the wise Views of the late Emperor, or degenerate from the Virtue of my (§) deceased Father. I will take care not to renew the thing that has once already overthrown the Dynasty of the Han.

The Emperor Ching ti, after having read over and over again, with great Sighs, this Declaration of the Empress Dowager, renewed his Instances with her, in the following Terms.

IT has for a long time, been usual to make the Sons of the Emperor Vang or Kings, and the Brothers of the Empress, Hew. The one Custom is as well established as the other. Your Modesty and Disinterestedness, certainly do you a great deal of Honour. But why would you hinder me from being as liberal and as beneficial, as any of my Ancestors? Of three Uncles by the Mother whom I would make Hew, one is aged, and the other infirm. What Consequences then are to be dreaded? If you do not yield, I own to you, it will give me great Pain. So I beg that you would instantly consent, that it should be done.

The Empress answered her Son's Instances, by the following Declaration.

IT was not upon slight Grounds, and without due Deliberation, that I made my former Declaration. I am far from endeavouring to set up my Modesty in Prejudice of your Liberality. What I have in View, is the real and the solid Good of both Houses. Formerly the Empress (||) Tew proposed, to make the elder Brother of the Empress (†) Wang, a Hew. Kau tsü, says Ya yü, in opposing this, made a Regulation, that none should be raised to this Dignity, but a Person of the reigning Family, or of some Families, from which the reigning Family has had great Obligations. But what great Services have the Ma performed that they should now be put upon the same footing with the Yu? Besides, it is with Families that are raised and enriched in so short a time, as with certain Trees, that are made to bear twice in a Year: This cannot last. In short, I see but two Reasons that can induce a Family to wish for Riches and Plenty: The one is, to do honour to their Ancestors, by being in a Condition to acquit themselves of the Ceremonies that are appointed on their Account: The other is, that they themselves may live comfortably and happily. My Brothers have tasted more than sufficiently of your Favours, to make them to do this: What Occasion is there for them to have an Appennage? I oppose it once more, and I have seriously weighed it. Give over your Jealousies and your Uneasinesses on that Account. The most solid Mark of Piety which I can give to my Ancestors is, in securing the Fortune of my Brothers, by checking its Growth. We are in dangerous Times. Corn is at an excessive Price; and the People are miserable: This employs and afflicts me Night and Day. At such a melancholy Juncture, ought I to be thinking to raise my Relations, and to sacrifice to them, what I owe to the Empire; I who am its Mother? No! Speak no more of it to me; my natural Temper is well known: I am firm in my Resolutions, and it is fruitless to irritate me by an obstinate Resistance. If we shall see happier Times when Peace and Plenty shall be diffused over all, then I will confine my Cares to my Grand-son: I will meddle no more in Government, let my Son act as he pleases.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] After praising the Wisdom, Firmness, and Resolution of this Princess; she reflected, says he, upon the fine Instructions and Examples of her Father. Her Vigilance and Zeal, may serve as a Rule and a Mirror to the Empresses of all Ages.

Chong ti, one Day, entertaining the great Officers of his Guard in one of his Apartments to the South; in his Way thither, he happened to pass through a large Hall, where the Habits and Moveables, which had been used by the Empress Quang yé, the Wife of his Grand-father Quang vü, lay. He seemed to be touched with seeing this, and changed Colour immediately; and he that instant ordered, that a Habit of Ceremony for each Season, and upwards of fifty Trunks full of ordinary Habits should be reserved. He distributed all the rest among the Vang, sending each of them that which he had allotted him. He did more for the Vang of Zong ping who commanded the Frontiers. He accompanied his Present with a Letter, of which the following is a Translation into our Language.

THE great Officer who came from you, has instructed me in every thing with Regard to you. I immediately gave him Audience, and approved of all your Steps. Notwithstanding of the Distance I am from you, I frequently employ my self in your Troubles and Labours: And you cannot believe with how much Sadness and Uneasiness I do it.

One of these Days, when I was to treat the Officers of my Guard, in an Apartment to the South, as I was going there, I past by the Hall, where the Things, which formerly Quang yé wore, were kept. Confucius says: When we see any thing that has been worn by a Person whose Memory has been dear to us; and if that Person is no more, the Sentiments of Tenderness and Grief, naturally arise in our Hearts. I have proved the Truth of this on this Occasion; you are too good a (*) Son, and too faithful a Friend, not to feel the same thing, when you receive the Present that I have sent you, which is a Trunk full of the Habits which the Empress Quang yé has left behind her, together with the Ornaments of her Head: This, perhaps, will be some Comfort to you at the Time, when your Grief for the Loss of her, may be greatest. Your Descendants may hereby, likewise, see the Fashions of the Habits of the Empress in our Times. The Family of Confucius, as yet, preserve his Chariot, his Chaise, his Bonnet, and his Shoes. Such is the Force of Wisdom, that when it is eminent, it renders itself long agreeable. It would be natural at the same time, to send you something which had belonged to Quang vü: But in the second of the Years, named Chong yuen, all that he left behind him, was divided among all the Wang: I only augment my Present, with a Horse from the Country of the (†) Wan. This Animal has something singular about him, in that he bleeds at a little Hole, which he by Nature has upon his Shoulder. A Song, made under Vü ti, celebrates a certain Horse, called Celestial, and which, as it is said, Seated Blood. There is something resembling this, in the Horse I send you. Alas! While I am writing you this, perhaps you are actually hastening to stop some Incurfion, or to maintain the Posts which our Troops possess. I frequently think on your Alarms and Fatigues, and am perfectly sensible of them. I recommend it to you, that you should treat yourself well, and take care of your Health. I (‡) long much to see you soon.

Kyang ke, who was originally of Tü, was poor, but virtuous. He more particularly distinguished himself by his Piety towards his Mother, who was a Widow. All the Neighbourhood praised him so much to the Magistrates, that the Emperor being informed of it, made him a (§) Ta fû. Kyang kè becoming infirm, obtained Permission to retire to his own Country: But he was not forgotten in his Absence; Chang ti gave an Order in his Favour, conceived in the following Terms.

SOME time ago, one of the Ta fû, named Kyang kè, retired on Account of an Illness. I wish very much, to be informed about his Health. Filial Piety, which is the Foundation and Principal of all the Virtues, is likewise, as it were, their Crown. Kè, of all my Subjects, has distinguished himself most in this Respect. When this Order comes to Hand, let him receive out of the Royal Granaries, a thousand Measures of Corn. On the eighth Moon of every Year, let the Magistrate of each Place, give him Wine and a Sheep, and enquire from me about his Health. (||) If any thing happens to him, let an Animal of the second Order, be employed in the ordinary Ceremonies.

Ho ti, the fourth Son of Chang ti, succeeded him. When he mounted the Throne, the Empress his Mother, agreeable to the Intentions of the deceased Emperor, published the following Declaration.

THE Emperor Hyau vü, being to punish the (‡) U and the Yee, in order to supply the Expences of War, imposed a Tax on Salt and Iron. The Invasions of the Barbarians since that time, have been so frequent, that this has been continued ever since. The late Emperor studied to diminish the Imposts and Taxes. As for that upon Salt and Iron, finding it had been established for a long time, and he himself not being free of the Apprehensions of a War, he thought it not convenient to touch them. But Experience has let us see, that by the bad Management of the Commissaries, the People have been very much distressed; and yet the State has reaped no great Advantages. This gave him a sensible Pain, and induced him on his Death-bed, to order that the Tax on Salt and Iron should be abolished; and to give both of them up, to the People;

(*) The Vang [or Wang] of Tong pang, was likewise Grand-son to Quang vü.

People; reserving however, certain Rights payable to the ordinary Magistrates of the Place, according to the ancient Customs. In consequence of that Order, we make the present Declaration, ordaining, that it be published throughout all the Empire, so that every one knowing our Intentions, may conform thereto.

Ssang ti, an Infant three Months old, succeeded to Ho ti. The Empress was Regent. In the Book from which these Pieces are taken, there is one of that Princess; the Substance of which is as follows:

She bewails the Corruption of Manners, which she attributes to the little Application that was bestowed in studying the King. She invites Persons of Reputation, to instruct the Princesses and Princesses of the Blood, of whom there were upwards of forty, each above five Years of Age. Several Schools were appointed with very good Masters, over whom this excellent Princess watched with great Care. She did the same to the young People of her own Family.

Vu ti, first Emperor of the seventh Dynasty, which was called (*) Tsin, recommends it to his Subjects, that they should advise him freely.

THE most difficult Part of an Officer's Duty, is to make Remonstrances to his Prince. If the Prince is difficult on this Head, he stops the Mouth of his most zealous and faithful Officers. This is what I cannot think of, without sending up profound Sighs. I have formerly, by an express Declaration, recommended to my Subjects that should freely give me those Advices, which they shall judge to be useful to me. In effect, I am resolved to profit by them, as much as I can. To encrease this Liberty, I declare as follows. If a Remonstrance is good and sound at Bottom, tho' it is but in a homely Dress, and even, tho' there may be an inconsiderate Expression in it; I will, that it be not imputed as a Crime to the Author, but that such shall be wink'd at and pardoned. And that all the Empire may know, that People may now give Advice, without any Danger, I ordain, that Kong shau, and Ki mu fu, who were so much wanting in their Respect to my Person, be released.

Kyen ywen ti, another Emperor of the same Dynasty, undertook to reduce (†) U, and nominated Kyau yang ku General of his Troops, honouring him with several Titles: And amongst others, with that of Kay fu. The latter, in order to excuse himself, presented the following Discourse.

YOUR Majesty, by a new Excess of Bounty, designs to put me at the Head of your Armies; and at the same time, to honour me with the Title of Kay fu, &c. I read that Order with Respect and Acknowledgment; but, in the ten Years since I first began to serve you, I have had but too many honourable and important Posts. I know of how little Value I am, and how little deserving the Posts, with which your Majesty has honoured me. And I deserve yet less, those with which you would now honour me. I likewise know, how great a Crime it is, for one to abuse his Prince's Favour too long; these Thoughts employ me Night and Day, inspire me with a just Dread, and turn those Honours with which you load me, into Matter of Sadness. It is a Saying of the Antients; To receive the greatest Honours and the largest Pensions, without having a well known Merit, and without having done very important Services, is to preclude from great Employments, those who are capable of them; and to frustrate those who have done great Services, of the Reward which they have deserved. By Favour of an Alliance, I have been raised enough already, and perhaps too much. Your Majesty ought to take care; and yet I see by an Effect of your Bounty, you design new Employments for me, and new Titles, yet more Illustrious. As I have not deserved them by my Services, I dare not accept of them. That would be to dishonour my high Rank, and at the same time, to expose me to a fatal Down-fall. I have been for some time thinking upon retiring, that I may guard the Tomb of my dearest Father. But how can I do this, when I have these Posts? I fear, lest I should displease you, if I should refuse your Favours. But on the other Hand I think, that I would do ill to accept of them. It is a Maxim of Antiquity, that one ought to know to circumscribe himself, and especially, a great Officer ought to take care to stop where he ought. This Maxim appears to me so essential, that notwithstanding of my Defect of Virtue, I have it very much at Heart, to follow it. Within these eight Years, your Majesty omitted nothing to draw Men of Merit to your Court, where you gave Employments to them all. But I do not see, that the Success has answered your good Intentions. There is a great Likelihood, that many Men of Merit live in Obscurity and Oblivion: That others are not advanced in Proportion to their Services: Notwithstanding of this, if I am raised to new Honours and new Employments, can I accept of them without blushing?

I have been in Post this long time, notwithstanding of my little Merit; but after all, I am far short of the Rank, in which your excessive Goodness would now place me. Allow me, to mention some People, who are a great deal more deserving than me. Li bi, Tseng chi, and Li yun, are Persons worthy of your Choice. The first, who is already Ta fu, joins to a perfect Disinterestedness, extended Views, an unshaken Integrity, and a venerable Gravity. The second, who is Ta fu likewise, watches with a singular Attention over his Actions, and never suffers the least indecent Liberty; he is a Man in his personal Character, who is without Reproach, and who lives

(*) I write Tsin, not Tsing; tho' it ought to be done, in order to distinguish it from that Dynasty, of which Schi wahang was Founder. These two Chinese Characters are quite different.

(†) The Name of a Kingdom which composed part of the Empire, but had revolted from the Dynasty of the Tsin.

without soothing his Passions, or being contaminated with the Guilt of others, lives well with all the World. The third, who is likewise Ta fū, is a Man, as understanding and disinterested as the other two, and besides that, has an easy Air, and a great Simplicity of Manners. These three great Men are grown old at Court; where they have always lived and served with Honour. They have filled several Posts, but their Families are far from being Rich. To prefer me to these great Men, would be to baulk the Expectations of all the Empire. I am so far from aspiring beyond my Capacity, that I am thinking upon retiring, and I am resolved to do it in a short Time. The present State of your Affairs, obliges me to defer it a little. But permit me, and I beg it as a Favour, not to accept of your new Honours. Allow me to confine myself to the Station in which I am, and to repair to the Post upon the Frontiers, where my too long Absence, may have already occasioned bad Consequences.

A Gloss. The Emperor did not yeild to the Excuses of Yang kú, who was indeed a Man of great Merit, and besides that, Twin Brother to the Empress. He was therefore made General, and in less than two Years he reduced U, which till that time, had substracted itself from the Dominion of the Tsin.

Lyew she lays before the Emperor the Advantages of the Virtue Yang: It consists in respecting, and willingly yeilding to, others.

OUR wise Kings of Antiquity, have much valued the Virtue Yang, and showed a particular Esteem for it. These Princes had two Views in this; the first was, that it might procure them Men of Merit. The second was, to strangle Jealousy, Intrigues, and Disputes. Every Man esteems Virtue and Merit: And every Man is glad to have it thought, that he possesses them. Our Antients knew this well; and when they recommended Deference, they were far from pretending, that by an ill judged Modesty, Persons of Merit and Virtue, should yeild Honours and Employments to those who had neither of these Qualifications. What they meant was, that Men of Merit paying Deference to one another, and mutually yeilding to one another, there should be none amongst them, either unknown or forgotten. Formerly, was any one named to a great Employment? He immediately excused himself, and proposed filling up that Post, with a Person whom he judged more capable. If so laudable a Custom were once revived, how easy would it be for a Prince, to form a just and a judicious Knowledge of the Persons who serve him? It is to this Day, an Usage, that when an Officer is upon the Point of being advanced, he excuses himself, in Appearance at least, for his want of Capacity. But we no more see that they propose another, for filling up the Posts that is designed for them. Thus, properly speaking, there is no more real Deference amongst the Great: And for that Reason, says Confucius, there can be nothing expected from the People, but Envy, Quarrels and Contentions. Alas! The Spirit of Envy reigns but too much amongst the great themselves, instead of the Spirit of Deference. Thence proceed two great Evils. Merit is frequently forgotten, and frequently, when it appears, it must grapple with Calumny.

When the Spirit of Deference obtains, those who have real Merit, soon enjoy the Reputation that is their due: For every one when Occasion presents, endeavours to yeild to them. And as no body cares to yeild to a Man whom he does not esteem, if then Men without Virtue and Capacity fill Posts, there will at least be very few such, and they can never be advanced higher. At present, great and midling Capacities are so blended together, that it is very difficult for a Prince to make a just Discernment of them, as formerly.

A King of Tsi, was very fond of the Instrument of Music Yu, and assembled 300 Men to play upon it in Concert; a certain Person, whose Name was Nan ko, who understood nothing of the Matter, seeing 300 Men playing all together, thought, that with a little Impudence, he might pass in the Crowd. And in effect, he received Wages for a long time. When that King was dead, his Successor gave out, that he was still a great Lover of the Instrument Yu, than his Predecessor; But that he wanted to hear each of these 300 Men, play singly. At this News, Nan ko fled: How many Nan ko are got into Posts, ever since the Virtue Yang, and all the laudable Customs that were its Consequences has been disused?

At least, If Merit could break thro' that Crowd, and raise itself to the highest Employments it might continue there in Safety. But what has it not to dread now a-days? When Envy and Ambition have unhappily succeeded to the Spirit of this Virtue. In effect, to commit no Faults, belongs only to a Wisdom and Virtue of the first Rate. Thus Confucius commending Yen tse, whom he loved best of all his Disciples, thought it a sufficient Elogium to say of him, that he never fell twice into the same Fault. But if that Crowd of ambitious Hangers-on, with which the Court now swarms, finds their Access precluded by a Man of a superior Merit, it is ordinary for them to fret. Thence forward they lay themselves out to speak ill of them; they frequently calumniate them; at least, they take great Care to observe them, and to inhance and aggravate the smallest Faults that escape them. However favourably a Prince is prepossessed for an Officer, if he hears frequent Complaints of him, he can't help enquiring into their Causes; if he finds them groundless, it is a great Happiness. But if he finds they are just, he either dissembles, and then his Authority gradually suffers, or he punishes with Rigour; and then the Number of Criminals become so great, that a Man has scarce Grounds for hoping any thing else, but to be comprehended in them, either sooner or later. Thus, not only Men of Merit shyn to appear in Public; but even they who are in Posts, being apprehensive of some troublesome Reverse, retired as soon as they can. But what great Services can a Prince or a State hope for, from People who live in continual Alarms, and who are always providing for their own Safety? When Affairs come to that pass, a Prince is much to be lamented.

But how shall these Evils be remedied? By re-establishing the antient Practice, which in my Opinion, is not very difficult to do. Amongst those who are, at present, in great Posts, or in those Ranks that lead to them, there are many understanding virtuous Persons; and if they are not very forward in proposing others to the Posts, to which they themselves are named, it is not because they are ignorant of the Value or Advantages of such a Deference, but because the Custom is alter'd, and they follow the Torrent: When Shun gave the Post of Se kong, to Yu: This last respectfully excused himself, and earnestly begged, that it might be disposed of either to Tsi, Ki, or Kyew yu, as being more worthy than he. When I was named Yu quan, he presented, Cbu, Hu, Hyong, and Pa, as Persons preferable to himself in his Opinion. Pei did the same, when he was charged with the Care of the Rites. He would have yielded to Quey or Long. In short, in these antient Times, they who were raised, acted thus. The Usage which obtains now a-days, of a Person who is raised to a Post, presenting to the Emperor a Writing, by way of Thanksgiving, is, I think, a small Vestige of that, which was practised anciently with so much Advantage. Great Use may be made of this. There is nothing to be done, but to regulate in good earnest, that these Writings, which contain only empty Thanks, or frivolous Excuses, shall actually be rejected; and that none shall be presented to the Prince, but those which with this Excuse shall point out good Subjects for filling up the Posts in Question. Every one doubtless will do this. And then it lies at the Emperor's Door, to compare those who are proposed to him, and to prefer in each Rank, those to whom the Deference is paid, by the greatest Number of Voices. Then a great many deserving Persons, who at present live retired, and are only employed on their own private Perfection, will be obliged to appear, and fill up the great Posts of the State; even they, who court these great Posts, will endeavour to merit by their Conduct, a good many Voices for themselves. Thus the Choice of Officers shall be founded, if we may say so, on the Judgment of the whole Empire. The Prince shall see with the Eyes of almost all his Officers, the Merit of each of them. From thenceforth vain Discourses, and secret Intrigues which ruin all, shall cease. If then, they who at present fill the first Ranks, should back this Proposal before the Prince, and without reflecting that it comes from a Person of slender Understanding, should get it put in Execution, I believe that they would thereby render to the State, the most important Piece of Service, that could at this time be expected of them.

Under the same Dynasty of Tsin Yu pu opened a great College at Pan yang: He advertised it by a Writing, in which he explained its Rules. Upwards of 700 young Students repaired to it. At the first opening of the Classes, Yu pu made them the following short Discourse.

BE HOLD you here, young Students, assembled in a very numerous Body, all of you destin'd, one Day, to fill the most important Posts; all of you in the Flower of your Age, and full of a becoming Warmth. This Day, for you, is opened this new Academy. For what End do you come here? Doubtless you come to learn how to speak well, how to write well, and above all, how to live well. You come here, to lay the Foundations of an eminent Virtue, to render yourself capable, of what is of the greatest Dignity in the Common-wealth, and in one Word, seriously to study true Wisdom.

It is of Importance to acquaint you, that at first, this kind of Study has nothing in it very agreeable, or very inviting: Nay, it frequently happens, that at first setting out, it is not much relished. But in time, it is quite otherwise; different Exercises succeed one another; you perfect yourselves by little and little, you acquire new Attainments every Day by reading, you make new Discoveries of yourselves, you study to go to the Bottom of them; the Genius opens, the Heart dilates, and you feel the Value of this true Wisdom: In its Search, you take a Pleasure, which surpasses every other Pleasure, and is fairly worth them all. In short, a Man is agreeably surprized, to find himself intirely changed, without his almost perceiving after what manner this Change is brought about. Yes! the Tincture which the Heart and the Genius receives from studying with Ardour and Constancy, is, for its Duration, beyond the most valuable Tinctures. These last, either wear out or fade; but the other, when thoroughly imbibed, is subject to none of those Disadvantages.

That the Heart may take it in well, you must in some Measure imitate the Painters; these Artists begin by rightly preparing the Stuff which they are to paint; upon this Ground they lay the Colours which they design to give it. The wise Man act thus in Morality; within, his Heart is pure and upright; and without, his Actions are corresponding. This is essential and indispensable: But every one can give it more or less Lustre, according as his Disposition is more or less happy, and according as his Application is more or less constant. Besides, altho' the Capacity is not equal, yet when the Man is not improv'd by Study, the Defect does not lie in the Capacity so much, as in the Resolution; A Man may be very well mounted, says the Proverb, tho' he does not ride the Horse (*) Ki: A Man may be a good Disciple, without being as well qualified as (+) Yen-tse. The grand Point is Constancy. You begin to lop and saw, and then you immediately give over. If the Tree was tender or rotten, it could neither be pruned nor sawed very quickly. On the contrary, by continuing your Toil, you can cut or cleave the hardest Marble.

Take

(*) A famous Horse.

(+) The most beloved Disciple of Confucius.

Take Courage then, young Gentlemen, all you have to do in this College, is to study the great Rules which our antient Sages have left us. With the Helps you have, you may advance a great Deal in a few Years, and soon gain both the Esteem and Respect of those who are in Posts about Court, and thereby early enter upon Employments. There are some People in the World, who, without retiring themselves like you, without having the Advantages that you have, and even under Pressures both from Nature and Fortune, have not failed to become excellent Writers, famous Ministers, and very great Men: But these are very extraordinary Persons, and cannot serve for a Rule. He who is not possessed of so excellent Qualifications, should try, as it were, to form a large River, by damming up the Water by little and little: or to raise a Mountain, by heaping together the Grains of Sand. There are Enterprizes in Nature in which we cannot succeed, without Constancy: Such now is yours, young Gentlemen. But then, in case, that for a short time, giving up all other Care, you should apply yourself in good Earnest, and with Ardour, and direct all your Studies to one Point, you will infallibly make a great Progress. And tho', perhaps, you may not all advance with an equal Pace, yet there is none amongst you, but may make a very considerable Progress.

In the Book from which these Pieces are extracted, Yu pá is very much praised, who tho' living at a Time, when the Politeness, the Wisdom, and the Eloquence of the Antients were very much neglected, yet endeavoured all he could, to recover them.

Under the same Dynasty of the Tsin, the Emperor Ming ti, a little after he mounted the Throne, designed to give an important Employment to Yu long, who, under the preceeding Reign, had been advanced in the Army: Yu lyang (a), in order to excuse himself, presented the following Discourse to the Emperor.

SIR: For upwards of these ten Years I have been in Posts; it is rare for a Man to advance himself so fast, and with so little Expence as I have done: For this, I am indebted to the Bounty of the late Emperor; and I have a due Sense of Gratitude. But at the same time, I am not ignorant, that Favours ought always to bear some proportion to Merit, and that an excessive Favour by raising a Man too high, exposes him to the most fatal Down-fall. To know where to stop, is a Maxim of Wisdom, proper for all Mankind; and is more applicable to me, than any other Person. Tho' I am very far from being ambitious of new Honours, I am yet farther from a Desire to obtain them, in prejudice of those who are more worthy of them than me. Under the Reign of the late Emperor, I was raised to the highest Posts of the Army; but I owed them less to my Merit or my Services, than to the Goodness which his Alliance with me inspired him with. Yet as at that time, very few People well qualified were presented to him, this Scarcity in some Measure, might justify the Honour he did me. At present, Things are on another Footing: Under the auspicious Reign of your Majesty, we see at Court, and throughout all the Provinces, a great Number of Persons of the highest Merit, all equally devoted to your Service. But at this Juncture, to give me the Employments that your Majesty offers, and to unite in my Person, all that is of greatest Importance, both in the Gown and the Sword, allow me to say, looks, as if you deviated from that sovereign Equity, which has rendered the Dawnings of your Reign so bright. It must, at least give Occasion to suspect, that your Conduct is influenced by private Inclinations.

As I am Brother of the Empress, I belong to you in a strict Sense: You know how many Commotions the raising of such Allies have occasioned in past Ages, and how odious the Remembrance of these past Misfortunes renders any such Choice to all the Empire, especially when it is into a Post which gives the Person chosen, any Share in the Government. Profit by this Knowledge. Tho' I had Talents greater than I have; and tho' you judged that they might be very useful to you, yet it would be prudent for you to deprive yourself of them, rather than to go against a Prejudice so universal, and founded upon so many fatal Events. To endeavour absolutely to overbear it, would be to nourish Suspicions and Murmurs in the Hearts of your Subjects, and to expose yourself to the greatest Misfortunes.

It is not even sufficient, in order to guard against those Inconveniences, that your Ministers and great Officers, should penetrate into the Uprightness of your Intentions, and approve of your Choice. For how can they go from Door to Door all over the Empire, to justify it? I am naturally as fond as any Man, to see my Riches and Honours encrease; and am far from being insensible of the new Honours which your Majesty offers me. Besides, the Manner in which you offer them, and your own high Station, makes me afraid, lest you be disobliged at my Refusal; and that this Refusal should expose me to the Loss of my Dignity, or perhaps my Life. Tho' I have but little Understanding, yet I am not so blind, as needlessly to expose myself to your Displeasure, and all its Consequences. But, being instructed by the Events of past Times, I am afraid of being the Occasion of Commotions; and the Good of your State is infinitely dearer to me than my Dignity, or even my Life. For this Reason, I desired more than once to retire. And it is this, which likewise engages me to refuse the new Post, with which your Majesty would honour me. Weigh, I beg of you, the Reason which I have freely laid before you, for my not accepting this Honour. If your Majesty shall judge, that my opposing you in this Manner is a Crime, I will willingly undergo the Chastisement, and look upon the Day of my Death, or the Beginning of my Life.

Ming ti yielded to these Reasons, and named another.

(a) One of these Names must be wrong, but we cannot say which.

The Emperor Hyau ven ti, by a publick Declaration, invited all the Subjects to assist him with their Counsels. After having set forth in his Declaration, all that we have seen in other Declarations of that kind; the Example of the wise and famous Emperors of Antiquity, and the Inconveniency of a Practice contrary to theirs: He concludes his Declaration in these Terms.

OUR Intention then is, and we heartily wish it, that all our Subjects, from the greatest to the meanest of our Officers, the simple Literati, the Trades-men, the Merchants, and others, may set forth to us what they believe to be of Advantage to the State, and capable to contribute to the Happiness of the People. Let these who judge any thing to be deficient in the present Government, especially with Regard to what appears to them hurtful to Morals and Virtue, act in the same Manner. I recommend to all, not only not to conceal any thing of that Kind, but to speak it out freely, and without Disguise: It is not fine long Discourses that I want. But short full Memorials, which I my self can examine. It will then be as easy for these who present them, to shun the Faults capable to offend me, as it is for me to draw from them, all the useful Instruction I hope for.

A Fowl which had four Wings and four Feet, was presented to the Emperor Swen vù ti. Tswi quang at that time, possessed at his Court the Post of Tay chang. The Emperor who esteemed him, sent to him, and asked him what he thought of that Monster. Tswi quang took this Occasion to give the Emperor some Advice with Regard to his Conduct. The whole Writing which he presented, is as follows.

I HAVE read in the History of the five Elements, which is a Book written in the Days of the Han, that under the Reign of Swen ti, in an Apartment of the Palace, a Hen became a Cock in his Feathers, but remained a Hen in all other Respects. Under the Reign of Twen ti, in the House of one of the Ministers of State, a Hen became a Cock by little and little. She got his Head, his Neck, his Spurs, his Crow, and even called the Hens to her. In one of the Years nam'd Yong quang, there was presented to the Emperor a Cock, from whom grew Horns. Lyew byang, who was alive at that time, explained these Prodigies. He said, that Hens being domestic Animals, represented those who came about the Person of the Prince, and that these monstrous Changes informed the Emperor, that he had People about him who were carrying on bad Designs, and were contriving to disturb the State. He particularly pointed out She byen, who was then a Favorite. In effect, in the first of the Years named King ning, She byen was judged guilty, and verified the Prediction. Under the Emperor Ling i, in the first Year called Quang bo, a Hen happened to be entirely changed in her Feathers, and to be like a Cock all but the Head. The Emperor, having order'd the great Officers to deliberate upon this Point, and to lay before him the Result of their Reasonings; Tsay i answered for the Rest and said: The Head is the principal Part of the Body, and is the Symbol of Sovereignty. All the Body of the Hen is changed except the Head. In order to answer this Omen as you ought, your Majesty must entirely change your Manner of Government, otherwise, your Misfortunes will be very great. In effect, a little after happen'd the Revolt of Chang ka, which threw the Empire into Disorder. The then reigning Emperor, altered nothing of the Severity of his Government. He harassed his Subjects more, so that there were Rebellions on all Sides, and the Disorder was general. Lyew kyang, and Tsay i, were two very understanding Men: and their Explanations were confirmed by the Event. Now, altho' the Fowl, of which we are treating at present, is different in its Figure from the extraordinary Fowls in those Days; it nevertheless admits of the same Interpretation, and the Omen is very much to be dreaded. These extraordinary Feet and Wings, are Symbols of some Persons, who are caballing and plotting together to raise Commotions. These Wings and Feet are of different Sizes. There are Commotions of several kinds: But neither these four Feet, nor these four Wings have their natural Bigness: These Cabals are still weak, and it is easy to disconcert them.

It is a common Opinion, that Calamities and Monsters are Omens, and at the same time, Advices and Instructions to Princes. Those Princes who are wise, see them, and enter into themselves: Thus every thing turns out happily with Regard to them. On the contrary, Princes without Understanding, become yet more insatuated, which brings them to the greatest Misfortunes. The Sbi king, the Sbu king, and the Chun tsyü, the History of the Tsin and the Han, furnish us with many Examples, of which your Majesty is not ignorant. Is there not then in our Days, some new She byen at Court? At least, it is certain, upon our Frontiers towards the South, a great many People have perished: And the Fields have been seen covered with Bones, without any Burial. It is not without Grief and Murmurs, that the Living see this, and the Souls that belonged to these dead Bodies, are yet more sensible of this. The Troops sent to I yang, likewise have suffered a great deal. Behold the Heat of Summer is come, and they are not yet returned: On the Side of Tong chew, very few People are returned, of a great many who were employed in the Convoys of Provisions. In short, the People is overwhelmed with Trouble and Misery; and nothing is more common at present, than to see People who hang or strangle themselves in Despair. You may judge of the State of Agriculture every where. The Grounds and Trade were never in so bad a State: What loud Cries would Kyai and Kü yang, if they were alive, make in their Remonstrances? You are set up as the Father and Mother of your Subjects: Instead of appearing sensible of their Sufferings, or effectually labouring for their Relief, you entirely abandon yourself to your Pleasures, and hazard even your Empire. Why do you not call to mind how much this cost Tay tsü: You are born with a very penetrating Understanding; make Use of these Qualifications; examine with a just Dread, the Views of Tyen ti: Treat your Officers according to their Ranks; but at the same time, keep them to their Duty. Remember Teng tong, and Tong hyen: It was even the Favour of their Prince, by being too excessive, that caused their Ruin. Acquit yourself at the stated Times, of the Ceremonies that are appointed; honour the Aged and the Wife; apply yourself to procure Peace to your People; give proper Orders for the Relief of the Poor, and for that effect, retrench your Expences in Entertainments, in useless Labours, in Concerts, and in Wine; set the Day apart for Business, and the Night for Rest: Don't hinder sincere and understanding People, from coming near your Person; banish all Flatterers. Then there will be nothing but happy Omens.

The Emperor took this Advice very well. Some Days after, Yu kau and some others, who had been plotting secretly, were discovered, convicted, and put to Death. For which Reason, the Emperor esteemed Tsui quang more than ever, and treated him with greater Distinction.

Under the same Dynasty, King ching proposed to the Emperor, to take off the Prohibitions upon Salt. In his Supplication he speaks as follows.

THE Book of Rites, in the Chapter Tse leng, says plainly, "That the People must not be prohibited from taking in Forests, in Mountains, in Meadows and Lakes, that which can serve to nourish them; such as Venison, Fruit, and the like." It likewise requires the Proprietors should be the first to invite them, and to conduct thither, such as stand in need of any of these Things. But at the same time, it requires that whoever shall dare to use Force, or to carry off any thing by Violence, shall be condemned to Death without Pardon. This may be called a Willingness in every one to assist, and to communicate to another, part of what he himself has. It is true, that in the same Book of Rites, in the Times of the Cheu, we read Prohibitions from fishing, &c. but it was only for a certain time, in order to prevent the young Fry from being destroy'd, and the Rivers and Lakes from being drained, by Peoples fishing out of Season. These Prohibitions were so far from being a Grievance, that they preserved and encreased the Fishes, to the great Advantage of the People.

The first Care of a Father of a Family is, to provide plentifully for the Subsistence of his Children: This is what they pride themselves in above any thing else. For a like, or a better Reason, the Sovereign, who is the Father and Mother of his People, ought to do the same. We never see a rich Father of a Family, refusing a little Vinegar to his Children, or some such Trifle capable to create an Appetite. Is it then becoming, that a Sovereign of a rich and powerful Empire, should be less indulgent to his Subjects, and refuse them the most common thing that Tyen [Heaven] has ordained for their Use. And yet this is done, by forbidding them Salt. I know that the Motive of this Prohibition, which is more antient than your Reign, or even your Dynasty, is the Revenue, that thereby accrues to the Prince. But is not this like imitating a Man, who tho' he is rich, takes Care only of his Mouth and his Teeth, and neglects the rest of his Body? Do not all the People, Men and Women, work for their Sovereign? That which they furnish every Year, is it not sufficient to maintain his Dignity, and to support his Troops. Can a Prince, for whom so many People work, be in any Dread of Want? Is it reasonable that such a Dread, should make him to forbid the People, from using what is presented them by certain Ponds. The antient Kings acted quite otherwise. Their first Care was to provide for the Wants of their People, and thereby they rendered them docile and attentive to Instruction. This was what makes them so celebrated; and for this, the Sbi king praises them. I am a Man, whose Knowledge is but small, and whose Views are confined: But I love to read, and I read a great deal. When, after having seen in our antient Books, the Indulgence which our Kings had for their Subjects, I come to certain Books of modern Date, where I find Taxes upon Taxes: I can't help saying with a Sigh, What a Difference there is betwixt ancient and modern Times? How much at large were People in these Days? How confined now? Many Dynasties have succeeded one another without lightning the Yoke: Your Dynasty, Sir, has the Honour already, to have begun well. It has almost abolished the Taxes upon Corn and Stuffs. How many Encomiums has it already received, among the most distant People? Kings, whom their Dignity has raised above the Level of Mankind, ought likewise to carry their Virtue much higher. This is their Duty; nay their true Interest. Tay vang, by the Contempt that he expressed of a Jewel, submitted and devoted the whole People to his Person; on the contrary, in the Ode Kyé chu, we have a King represented to us who is odious and unhappy, for having over-burdened his People. Tho' your Predecessors have carried their Goodness to their Subjects to a great Height, yet I should wish for the Honour of your Reign, that your Majesty would carry it yet a little higher. It is said, that two things are commonly very fatal to Princes. Too great Prodigality in their great Men, and too much Avarice in themselves. If it is unworthy of a Prince, and even dangerous in him to make a Difficulty in parting with his Treasures; how much more so will it be to dispute with his People the Profit of a little Salt. It is a common and a true Saying, That it is better for a Prince to hoard up in his Subjects Houses, than in his own Granaries and Coffers. When this Hoard is in the People's Hands, they are satisfied, and the Prince is rich. But when all is heaped up only in the Royal Granaries and Exchequer, the People are poor and discontented. When the People are discontented, how can they be profitably instructed, or successfully inspired with the Love of Virture. When they are poor, can the Prince be long rich? I therefore wish, that your Majesty, improving upon the Goodness of your Ancestors, would take off the Prohibition from the Salt Pits, and only make some Regulations for preserving it in Plenty.

The Emperor having ordered this Supplication to be deliberated on, the Chief of his Counsel were of Opinion, that the Prohibition should subsist. It is very antient, said they: And in the preceeding Dynasties, when there were Deliberations for the same Effect, it was always concluded to maintain them. It is true, that in Progress of Time, it occasioned Murmurs, and some Com-motions among the People; but this must not be attributed to the Prohibition, but to the Neg-ligence and Malice of the Commissaries.

Notwithstanding of the Advice of the Counsel, the Emperor caused the following Declaration to be published.

IT is true, that the Prohibition upon Salt is very antient, and has, as it were, past into a Rule, yet all the Dynasties do not resemble one another. Some of them have been more solici-tous to promote the Good of the People than others. As for me, if any thing appears capable to advance the Happiness of my People, or to facilitate their Devotion to the Rites, and the Love of Virtue: That is a sufficient Motive for me to embrace it, provided it is consistent with Rea-son. This appears in what was proposed to me by King ching; so that as soon as the proper Re-gulations for preserving the Salt Pits are made, let the Prohibitions be taken off. Let this our present Order be published and executed.

After the Emperor Ven ti, Founder of the Dynasty of the Swi, had reduced the Kingdom of Chin, (†) all his Officers applauded his Victory, and proposed the making Choice of some Mountain, where they should repair to perform the Ceremony of Fong chen. Ven ti rejected this Proposal, and that they might not renew their Solicitations, published the following Order.

ISENT one of my Generals, to reduce to Reason, a petty rebellious Kingdom. The Ex-pedition was successful, and what then? Yet every one flatters and applauds me. I am even pressed, notwithstanding of my Defects in Virtue, to perform the Ceremonies of Fong chen, upon some famous Mountain. As for my share, I never heard that Shang ti was to be moved with trifling empty Talk. I absolutely forbid any one ever to speak of this to me again.

A Letter of the same Emperor Ven ti, Founder of the Dynasty of the Swi, to Tang the King of Korea.

EVER since (‡) Tyen raised me to the Throne, I have had nothing so much at Heart, as the Happiness and Quiet of my Subjects. By leaving you in Possession of the maritime Countries, I thereby intended to make known to all the World, how much removed I am from all Avarice; and that all I propose by reigning, is, that I may render my Subjects content and virtuous. I may likewise pretend, that you on your Part, remain in your Duty, and that you in Proportion, enter into the same Views, and like a good Subject, imitate my Examples. And yet I under-stand, that you disturb your Neighbours: It is said, you streighten (§) Ki tan, and deprive it of all Liberty. You exact Contributions of more Kinds than one, from Mey ko. Whence proceeds that Itch of Oppression? Or how dare you to harass the States which are in Subjection to me? If you are in want of Labourers, I have Plenty: Why don't you call for them? For some Years, you have foolishly been busied in heaping up Stores and Provisions, you have your Agents for that Effect, distributed thro' all Quarters; and you drain these little States. Why is all this done? If you have not formed bad Designs, and fearing, lest they should be discovered, you act every thing underhand.

An Envoy was dispatch'd from my Court to you; my Intention in sending him was to give you, as one of my foreign Subjects, a Mark of my Goodness and Esteem. But I design'd at the same time, that after having informed himself of what related to your Subjects, that he should give you some Advice on my Part, on the Manner of Government. Nevertheless, you caused him to be watched under your own Eye, and shut him up in his House as in a Prison. You concealed, as much as you could, his Arrival from your Subjects. You prohibited the Officers of your Court, from whom you could not conceal him, from visiting him; in short, you have, as it were, shut both his Eyes and his Ears, and you appeared frightned, lest he should have been able to inform himself of the State of your Affairs, but I have taken care to be informed in another Manner, of all your Steps, which are not like those of a good Subject. I have put you in Possession of a great Extent of Ground, and the Title and Honours of a (*) King. In short, I have loaded you with Favours; all the Empire knows I have: And yet, all this is not sufficient to make you sensible of my Good-ness. You want Gratitude; you express a distrust of me; and you render yourself suspected, by sending, under different Pretexes, Persons, who secretly examine all that passes at my Court. Is this the Conduct of a faithful and a blameless Subject?

Notwithstanding of all this, as I impute your Faults, partly to the little Care I have taken to instruct you in your Duties, I am willing to forget what is past. But you must amend, and an-swer my Indulgence, by a sincere and real Submission: You must exactly fulfill the Duties of a foreign Subject: You must follow and imitate my Government: In Place of hating and harasssing these other Strangers, who are your Neighbours; you must, by your Example, inculcate upon them Submission and Virtue: And above all things, you must remember, that tho' they are weaker than you, yet, like you, they are my Subjects. But do not think to impose upon me by vain Appearances: A thorough Change must be wrought upon you, if you desire that I should treat you as a good Subject. And then being satisfied with your Amendment, I will never decree your Punishment. Our wise and ancient Emperors, above all things, esteemed Gentleness and Justice: Notwithstanding, that I come far short of the Virtue of these great Princes, yet I make it my Duty to imitate them. All my Empire knows this: And that alone, ought to free you of all Dread and Distrust.

If, after the Assurances I have given you, I send Troops against you, what will all my Subjects say of me? But above all, what will the Strangers that are subdued, like you, to my Empire, say? Free yourself therefore of your Suspicions; change your Conduct, and be easy. It is true, I have subdued Chin: But if you continue in your Duty, that ought not to alarm you: All the World knows that Chin forced me to punish him. After being many times pardoned, he attacked the Hew of Fong, who was faithful to me, and killed a great many of his People. He plundered on all Sides, and had the Boldness to advance even to my Frontiers. I had often than once, during the Space of ten Years, given him Advices with Regard to his Conduct. But instead of profiting by them, he grew insolent upon my Goodness, and trusting to the (*) Kyang, which bounds his Territories, he valued neither my Advices nor my Threatnings. He even encreased the Number of his Forces, and seem'd to defy me with his Insolence. Being forc'd to it by so open a Rebellion, I sent against him, one of my Generals with only a few Troops: This Expedition lasted but for a Month. One Morning, avenged me of ten Years obstinacy, and the Defeat of Chin was followed with universal Peace. Both the Shin (†) and Men rejoiced at this. You alone, I hear, are alarmed, and uneasy: I see the Reason but too well. As it was not the Fear of Chin that engaged me to treat you well, so his Defeat is no Motive for my oppressing you. But if I were of an Humour to do it, who could protect you? What Comparifon is there betwixt the Waters of (‡) Lya, which are upon your Frontiers, and the great Kyang which covered Chin? Is your Country more populous, than that of Chin? Doubtless not. And if I should punish your past Faults, as they deserve, it would cost me but little. I would have no more to do, but to send against you, some of my Officers: But I do not love to hurt any body. For which Reason, I follow the more moderate Course; I advise you, instruct you, and give you Time for your Amendment: If you answer my Gentleness as you ought, you may live easy and happy.

(§) Tay tsong, the second Emperor of the Dynasty of the Tang, whom Historians have compared with the most famous Princes of Antiquity, drew up a Writing, upon the Difference betwixt good and bad Government, and upon the difficulty of reigning well. As he drew it up chiefly for his own Use, he entitled it the Mirror of Gold, or the Precious Mirror.

AFTER having each Day, spent the necessary Time for dispatching the Affairs of my Empire, I take a Pleasure in reviewing and reflecting upon the Histories of past Ages. I examine the Manners of every Dynasty, the good and bad Examples of all their Princes, their Revolutions and their Causes. I have always done this with Profit, and I have done it as often as I can mention. Every time I read, what is said of Fo bi and Whang ti, and the matchless Government of Yau and Shun, I always stop. I feel, I admire, I praise, and all this, without wearying. When I come towards the End of the Hya, the Ing, the Tsin, and certain Reigns of the Han, I am seized with an uneasy Dread. I seem to walk upon a rotten Board, or upon a thin Surface of Ice over a deep River. When I reflect from whence it proceeded, why under all the Princes who have wished to reign in Peace, and to transmit their Empire to a numerous Posterity, there has yet happened so many Troubles and Revolutions: I find that the most common Cause, was the little Care which these Princes had to reflect upon themselves, and the Aversion they had to hear any thing that could discompose them. Thus in the End, they became blind, both to their Duties and their Defects; and this Blindness occasioned their Ruin: With what a Dread does this Reflection inspire me.

It is in order to shun this Blindness, that after having seen by reading History, what are the Principles of good Government, and what are the Springs of Commotions; of all these I compose a Mirror for my self, in which I may behold my Faults, in order to endeavour to amend them. The most essential Character of good Government is, not to raise any to Posts, but Men of Merit and Virtue. A Prince who acts thus, reigns happily; but there is nothing more dangerous and fatal for a State, than a contrary Conduct. Is a Prince in any Difficulty? He never fails to consult his Ministers and his other great Officers. If these are all understanding zealous Men, let the Danger be ever so great, it seldom ends in his losing all. And what cannot be enough lamented, is, that Princes, heedless of this Choice, are intirely taken up with empty Pleasures. Ah! how much better would it be for them, to make a Pleasure of their Duty: But above all, of a Duty so important as is the Choice of good Officers, especially good Ministers!

It is commonly said, that Shun and Yu, these two great Princes, loved no Pleasure, and that, on the contrary, the two Tyrants, Kyé and Chew, loved it much. I am of a different Opinion. The bad bad Conduct of Kye and Chew, cost them a thousand Disquiets, abridged their Days, consequently disturbed their Lives, and rendered them of a short Duration. Can this be called the Love of Pleasure? On the contrary, is it not to have a true Taste of Pleasure, to love it like Sbun and Tu, who owed a long and quiet Life to their Virtue, and who calmly tasted the Pleasures of a happy and peaceful Reign? It must be allowed, that Complexions and Dispositions are very different; some are good, and others bad: And that there are different Degrees in each Kind. The Virtues and Actions of Yau, Sbun, Tu, and Tang, give us ground to believe, that (*) Tyen has distributed Cruelties of these bad Princes. However, we may truly say, that the Happiness of Princes and States, depends less upon their Complexions and natural Dispositions, than their Care of keeping that just Mean in every thing, which common Sense dictates.

We read in U ki, that a Prince of (†) Sang applying himself solely to certain Exercises of Virtue, and neglecting to keep his Army on Foot, lost his State; that the Prince of I perished likewise, but for a quite different Reason, he laying all his Strefs on his Forces, and neglecting Virtue. Therefore Confucius says, that the Government of a State, ought to be justly tempered with Gentleness and Resolution, with Severity and Mercy. And indeed, Goodness and Justice should always go Hand in Hand; to make too great Concessions to the one in Prejudice of the other, is a fundamental Fault, and may be attended with very bad Consequences. What a Conduct therefore is it, for a Man to deviate from both the one and the other? And what would one say of a Man, who was absolutely destitute of Goodness? An Emperor raised to the highest Degree of Honour, to which a Man can rise, is obliged at once, to love his People, and to endeavour to make them happy. Two Things are requisite for this: Good Order and Security. As for good Order, Regulations must be made, and they must be supported with Example. As for Security, an Army must be kept on Foot, to intimidate Enemies from undertaking any Thing upon the Frontiers. For as it is by no means convenient, to terrify the People by a standing Army; it is likewise rare, that Gentleness alone, and the Virtue of a Prince, can over-awe the Barbarians, and secure the Frontiers. When the great Fish, Kin, appears above the Water, the Billows become smooth. When the (‡) Whang, and the Ho, plunge, or dive under the Water, there is no fair Weather to be expected: It is their Flight in the Air, which prognosticates that.

A very important Point for a Prince, is to know how to accommodate himself to the different Tempers of Men, and to profit by their several Talents. It is an universally received Maxim, that as he who intends to build a large House, should begin, by chusing a good Architect, and then to proceed to buy Materials proper for his Plan: In the same Manner, a Governour ought to begin by chusing his Ministers, in order to assist himself by their Understanding and by their Councils, in the Government of his Subjects. In attentively reflecting upon the past Dynasties, I observe, that when the Prince had a solid Love for Virtue, he never wanted virtuous People about him; but when he shewed a Passion for Building, and other Works of Art, all the able Men in that Way appeared: If he loved hunting, he got a parcel of excellent Hunts-men about him: Was he enchanted with Music? He was presented with Crowds of People from Chin and Wey: Sometimes it might happen, that the Prince debased himself so far, as to love Painting, and such like Ornaments. Then (§) Yen and Chau were in Vogue. When all Avenues are blocked up to sincere Remonstrances, then few zealous, or faithful Persons are seen at Court. Is a Prince fond of Applause? Numerous are the Crowds of his Flatterers. Our Ancients, indeed, had a good deal of Reason to compare a Prince to a Vessel, and the People to the Liquor that it contains. As the Liquor takes the Figure of the Vessel, so the Subjects commonly imitate the Prince. How great a Motive ought this to be for him to aim at Perfection? But as the finest Stone requires to be polished, in order to become a fine Vessel; thus Man stands in need of Study and Application, in order to acquire true Wisdom.

Yen vang and Confucius had their Masters: And if these great Men had need of Masters, how much more have others? so that one of the most remarkable Differences betwixt a good and a bad Prince, is, that the good Prince fights for Persons of Merit and Virtue, in the same manner, as the Labourer expects his Crop; and receives them with the same Joy, as the Husbandman, who has a little before been threatened with Drought, sees a plentiful Shower fall upon his Fields: On the other Hand, a bad Prince, commonly has an Aversion for any Man, who has more Merit than himself: And admits none about his Person, but those who are without Merit and without Virtue. O how hard it is, for a Man thoroughly to divest himself of the bad Inclinations, to which he has a long time been habituated! Vang puen, and Sun bau, at first, counterfeited to be good Princes: But as they acted only by Interest, and as their pretended Virtue was only Hypocrisy and Dissimulation, they did not long hold it out. They returned to their natural Byas; People knew them, and abandoned them: A Bark of plain Boards joined together only with Glew, cannot hold out long, against the large Billows. A Horse, who is bred up on purpose, in order, on some Occasions, to make a hundred Leagues at a Stretch, if he is put to the Trial, frequently bursts before the Journey is ended: This exactly was the Case of Vang puen and Sun bau. We saw (†) Sang and I, were two Countries.

(‡) The Names of two Water-Fowl. These Allegories admit of a double Sense: The Billows denoting the Irruptions of the Barbarians, which the Power of Arms, figured under the Fish Kin, quells: And by the Birds Whang and Ho, the People, who should be easy and satisfied, while the State is without any Commotion: or else, by the Fish Kin, is denoted brave Persons, who are capable to head Troops: And by the Birds Whang and Ho, those who are fitted for Governing, and must be drawn from Obscurity, and put in Poss. If we apply these Allegories with what goes before, the first Sense appears the most natural: But if to what follows, the last appears to be the Meaning.

law verified in their Persons, as in a great many others, our antient Proverbs. That as the (*) Shin cannot be made use of, when we would measure large Stones: Thus, a midling Capacity will not do for great Things, &c. And the most simple Virtue, if it is constant, is more worth, than the most political Cunning. Oh! what a Difference is there betwixt Prince and Prince, and Man and Man. Kau tsü respected Li tsong so much, that he held up his Train, to do him the greater Honour. Syu chew, being disobliged with the wise Advices of Pi kan, inhumanly ordered his Heart to be pluck'd out. Ching tang always had a real Esteem, and a cordial Love for his Minister I yun. Kyé had a wife and zealous Minister in Long pong; and yet he caused him to be put to Death. Chwang, King of Tsü, after having held a Council, and discovering a Superiority of Genius over all his Ministers, went from the Council Board (+) melancholy and thoughtful. This Melancholy hung about him, even in his easier Hours. On the contrary, Vá bú, rejoiced and triumphed in a Manner, in such a Superiority. The Reason of this is, that Princes who are without Capacity, want either to conceal or persevere in their Faults; but Understanding Princes, want to be acquainted with their Failings.

When I cast my Eyes upon Kau tsü and Ching tang, I compare the Reigns of these great Princes, to these Years, that are remarkable by a just Temper of Heat and Cold, and by a Regulation of the Seasons, which diffuses Plenty over all. It is said, that when the Empire is well governed, Ki ling, an Animal of an auspicious Omen, appears. Were not Kau tsü, and Ching tang, real Ki ling in their kinds? I own, I think they were. When I next consider the Kyé and Chew, I think, that I see in their Reigns, these direful unhappy Years, which the Irregularity of the Seasons, renders barren and fatal. These Years, usually produce a great Number of destructive Insects, and even frightful cruel Monsters. Alas! Were not these wicked Princes Kyé and Chew, Monsters themselves? How much Instruction do I not find, in reflecting upon these two Opposites. I know very well, it is said, that Tyen has more or less favourable Conjunctions for States. That is true: But that does not hinder the Happiness or Unhappiness of States, from depending on the Conduct of Men. Was there not under Ching tang, a seven Years Drought? This Prince having pared his Nails, devoted himself as a Victim. Immediately there fell a Rain, for a hundred Leagues all round. In the Time of one Emperor, Mulberry-Trees were seen all of a sudden, to grow in the Palace. This Prince struck with a Prodigy, which was explained to him, as being very dreadful, solidly applied himself to Virtue; and instead of the Dangers that threatned him, he receiv'd the Homage of the Ambassadors of sixteen Courts, at his Palace. Who then dares say, that it is not the Business of Princes to make their States happy?

Some say, that it is a very difficult Thing to reign: Others say, it is easy. The first, to prove their Opinion, reason thus: The Dignity of Emperor, raises a Prince above the rest of Mankind: He has an absolute Power: Rewards and Punishments are in his Hand: He not only possesses the Riches of his Empire: But he likewise can, as he has a Mind, serve himself with all the Abilities and the Talents of all his Subjects. What then can he wish for, which he may not obtain? Or what then can he undertake, which he may not execute? They who are of the contrary Opinion, reason otherways: If a Prince, say they, shall fail in his Respect to Tyen, Prodiges streight appear, and Monsters are born. Does he exasperate his Subjects Minds? He is often punished by an untimely Death, as happened to Vá i and Chew. Would he indulge himself in any Passion, as for instance, bringing Things of greater Rarity and Value, from afar? In making large Parks, fine Ponds, great Buildings, lofty Terraces? He must for these Ends, load the People at least, with Averages, and Agriculture must thereby suffer. Hence proceed Scarcity and Famine. The People groan, they murmur, they faint. If the Prince is insensible, and neglects to remedy this: He is look'd upon as a Tyrant, born, not to govern, but to oppress, the People. He is the Object of public Curses: What worse can he dread? But every Prince, who values his Reputation, ought, as much as he can, to be watchful in his Endeavours, to diminish the Taxes, to shun every thing that can overload the People, and to procure their Happiness and Tranquility. But he cannot do all this, without very great Self-denial, and without repressing his most darling Inclinations: Then, it is easy enough.

There is another Difficulty yet greater; which is the right Choice of Persons who are put in Posts, and the employing each of them according to his Talent. A Man, whom the Prince very much esteems, and looks upon, as equally capable and virtuous, may have many Failings, and even, Vices. Another, whom all the World deserts for real and well known Faults, may have, at the same time, some good Qualities, of which an advantageous Use may be made. When this proves the Case, what Course must be followed? Should a Prince reject a Man who has Abilities, he thereby deprives himself of an useful Assistant. Should he know a Man to be vicious, and yet not abandon him: This has given Rise to the most fatal Commotions in a State. Even they, who to all Appearance are blameless, have not always suitable Talents; nor ought they to be indifferently employ'd in every thing. Kong cho was very serviceable to a great Kingdom. But Tse tsan would have miscarried there; yet he was Minister in a smaller State, where he did Wonders. Chew pá stammered, and spoke ill. (†) Kau tsü did not, however, fail to make him a Hew, and he richly repaid that Honour, by confirming upon the Throne his Family, when it was almost ruined. Tse tsü, on the contrary, was an eloquent Man, and a fine Speaker; and yet, notwithstanding standing of his fine Speeches, he never could raise himself: He was seen to beg for a Post under Ven ti, about his Menagery, and yet he could not obtain it.

Out of different Talents, always to make the best Choice, and that too, among Persons, whose Talents are the same, are difficult, but necessary, Things, in order to reign well. There is a Difference, not only in Talents, but in natural Dispositions, in Tempers, in Conditions, in Inclinations, and even in Virtues. In all these Kinds, there are different Species, and different Orders in every Species. What Difference, for Example, is there between the common (*) Hyau and a Hyau of the first Order? The first consists, in cheerfully serving the Father and the Mother, in never failing to them in Point of Respect, and in providing for all their Necessities. The second exerts itself, in procuring the Good of the State, in re-establishing Peace in Families, and in exactly observing all the Rites. Shun possessed the Virtue Hyau in an eminent Degree, and yet he had not the good Fortune to please his Parents. Tsen tsan, possessed the Virtue (+) I in in a very exalted Measure: Yet he was not the Person, whom Confucius praised the most of all his Scholars. Confucius said, that a Son has not the true Virtue Hyau, if he indifferently obeys all that his Father commands: And that a Minister, who implicitly gives into all the Views of his Prince, does not possess the Virtue (†) Chong. Thus the great Chew kong, being less afraid of displeasing his Prince, than of not serving him honestly, secured the Peace of his Empire, by the just Punishment of a Criminal who was dear to his Prince. I ya, on the contrary, in order to assure his Fortune, took Care always to accommodate himself to his King's Inclination: When (§) Quan chong was dead, he was advanced, and he soon threw every thing in Disorder. (||) Ki feng, upon a pressing Occasion, bravely exposed himself to certain Death, that he might save a Person whom he acknowledged as his Prince. (4) Yuen yang, that he might gratify a private Resentment, reduced the Empire, within two Inches of Ruin. In Chia yuen and others, Fidelity and Uprightness have been seen, not only without Reward, but even in Misery and under Oppression. In Tjay pi, and others, Treason has been covered with the most specious Outside.

Does not all this prove the Difficulty of reigning well? This Difficulty would be still greater, had we not these Histories, where an attentive Prince may learn to distinguish real and faithful Subjects, from self designing Flatterers. The Kings of Tsin, owed it to the Bravery and Ability of Pe ki that they became Masters of the Kingdom of Chau: And yet one of them put him to Death. Ya fu, under the Emperor King ti, prevented the Disasters, that otherwise might have attended the Rebellion of the tributary Princes; and yet, under that same Emperor, Ya fu ended his Days, under the Hands of an Executioner. Wen chong was treated in the same manner by the King of the Tze, tho' that Prince, without the Advice of Wen shong, could never have subdued his Enemy U. In short, U si, as a Reward of long and very faithful Services, had a Sword, with which he had orders to kill himself. We shall suppose, that these great Men were Criminals; but did they deserve to perish in this Manner? Surely not. It was Injustice and Passion, on the Part of the Princes. As for Chau kau, Han feng, Hing pu, and Chin bi; altho' all of them had their Merit, and some of them had done very important Services, yet they forgot, and belyed themselves: Thus their Punishment was warranted by Justice. But their Faults should have been wisely prevented; and it is a Blemish in Kau tsu, who was so great a Prince, that he did not know how to preserve Persons of so extraordinary Qualifications, who had served him so well. The Founder of the Dynasty of the Han, in this respect, was much inferior to its Restorer Quang vu. This last, knew how to reward his Generals as well as Kau tsu. But like him, he did not expose them to be forgotten by him. It is thus, that a Prince ought to act, with Regard to those, to whom he in some measure, owes his being raised, or preserved upon the Throne. It is a bad Reward of their Services, to expose them to lose their Fruits.

The Difficulty of reigning well, in my Opinion, may be enough seen from what I have already said; but we shall render it still more perceptible. As a Prince is elevated in a high Rank above the rest of Mankind, he is in the most conspicuous Point of Light. If he commands any thing that is not agreeable to the most exact Reason; he not only does himself a considerable Injury, but he is despised by every wise Man: Does any Action or Gesture escape him, which is unbecoming his Majesty? A general Sneer goes round, among both great and small. Does he advance any one to Posts? Then there rise a thousand jealous Murmurs. Has he Regard for a Recommendation? All the Candidates cry out, that every thing is bestowed by Inclination and Interest; and that nothing is given to Merit. If he raises a Man of acknowledged Merit, to the first Employment; it is immediately attributed to Chance, and not to the Discernment of the Prince. By good Luck, say they, for once, he has not blundered. Is any one in Post, who has not so great (*) Hyau, Respect and Love for Parents. The Sense of this Character is more ample here.

(†) I in, Goodness, Charity, Clemency. This Word is sometimes put for Virtue, or any virtuous Man in general.

(‡) Zeal and Loyalty for ones Prince.

(§) He was first Minister to Chewang wang, King of Tsi; and very strongly recommended to that Prince, never to put I ya in Post.

(||) Kau tsu, the Founder of the Dynasty of the Han, while he was disputing the Empire with Hyang yu, was besieged in a City; his Army being at a great Distance, Ki feng, who commanded in the City, marched out in form; seeming as if he would surrender himself, and abandon Kau tsu. This News caused great Joy in the besieging Camp. The Guards grew careless, and Kau tsu, flying out of another Gate with some Horsemen, forced the Guards, and saved himself. Hyang yu having entered into the City, summoned Ki feng to give up Kau tsu. I have deceived you, answered Ki feng; that I might give him an Opportunity to escape. Hyang yu, in a great Passion, ordered Ki feng to be burnt on the Spot.

(4) Yuen yang, was the Enemy of Shau tsu: The first had given the Emperor a useful Advice, which had been followed. As it related to a Tributary Prince: Yuen yang, that he might ruin Shau tsu, by his Intrigues, alarmed all the Tributary Princes, who took up Arms against the Emperor. They were appeased by sacrificing Shau tsu. This was what Yuen yang wanted.

Merit? People never scruple to say, that the Prince has no Understanding. If a Prince speaks pretty frequently, he is a Caviller. Does he speak little? There is nothing in him; and he does not know how to instruct those who are about him. Does he follow the Dictates of his Humour, and show some Passion? He spreads over the Court, and through the whole Empire, a very prejudicial Terror. Is he moderate, easy, and indulgent? The Laws and his Orders are ill observed. Are the People at ease? The (||) Officers have too much to do, and are discouraged. Are the Officers satisfied? The People are harassed, and complain. All the Empire is like a great Tree, of which the Court is, as it were, the Trunk and the Root. Cannot a Prince then know, all the disastrous Events that afflict his State? No Skin, no Hair, says an antient Proverb. The essential Point therefore to a State, is, that the Court be provided with good Ministers. That is true, but Ministers like (*) I in and Pu yue, are very rare.

The Court being provided in good Ministers, the next Point of Consequence is, to have faithful, able, and indefatigable Generals on the Frontiers. But the (+) Wbey shang, and the Li nu, are hard to find at present. Besides, when a Prince is so happy, as to find People of such a Merit, he cannot help taking a liking for them. After he is instructed of the Danger a Man suffers on the Frontiers, he does great Violence to himself, in sending Persons, whom he loves, thither: He knows, that on the other Hand, if he fails to send them, he is in danger to see the Leaves of his great Tree fall, and its Branches cut down. Nay, perhaps the Tree perish intirely: What does not a Prince, who has an equal Share of Goodness and Wisdom, suffer when this is the Case? As for me, when I am revolving these Thoughts in my Mind, I feel all the Weight of Royalty: But being yet more sensible of another's Pains, than of my own, I frequently say, to myself: If a Prince, who is an absolute Master, has so much to suffer, what must they suffer, who without being Masters like him, share and bear with him the Weight of Government? The I king says, The Chinese Books do not drain their Subjects. Thus, Words seldom give the exact Meaning of Thoughts, in all their Extent. I have aimed at nothing in this Discourse, but to express in a few Words, that which employs me inwardly. Tho', according to the Proverb, He who suffers, has some Comfort in singing his Pains; yet this is not the Reason why I have taken up my Pen: I am yet farther, from endeavouring to dazzle the Sight by a shining Discourse. I strive to instruct myself: This is my End. But at the same time, I do not at all blush, to lay before all wise Men in this Writing, my Thoughts and my Sentiments.

[The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Nothing is better conceived, or better expressed, than what Tay tsong says of Government in general, and of the Choice of Officers in particular. This is reminding Antiquity to purpose. Tay tsong did more; he imitated it. His Government almost equall'd that of our three famous Dynasties.

The same Emperor Tay tsong, in the third of the Years called Chin quan (A), made the following Ordinance.

THE Virtue (4) Hyau, is the Foundation of all the other Virtues. It is the most essential Instruction. In my Youth, I received good Lessons upon this Virtue. My Father, and my Master, did not only make me repeat the Book of Verses, the Book of Rites, and others, but at the same time, they let me see the great Springs, upon which the Good of States and the Government of People depend. With these Advantages I extirpated by one Expedition, all the Enemies of the State; and secured Quiet and Liberty to my People, who had just emerg'd from beneath Oppression. Besides, my Heart is full of Goodness; and if at any Time, I have discovered more Justice and Severity, than Clemency, the Reason is, because there are Crimes, to which Mercy cannot be absolutely extended; in the same manner, as there are some Enemies, with whom we must necessarily use Force and Courage. I have had nothing in View, but the Good of the whole, and the Peace of the Empire. Passion has no share in what I have done. The Emperor, my Father, when he retir'd to Ta ngan, charged me with the Government, I was obliged to obey him. As I feel all its Weight, it is all my Employment. I am in the Inside of my Palace, and amongst my Queens, as if I were in a frozen Valley. Frequently do I pass whole Nights without Sleep. I rise before Day. All my Words and Thoughts, are directed to answer, as far as I am able, the Goodness of (†) Tyen, and the Intentions of my Father. That I may better succeed herein; being full of Compassion even for the Guilty, I want to regulate Punishments anew, to prevent and relieve the Misery of the People; to punish and check those who oppress them; to invite near my Person, and to put in Posts, Men of Virtue and Merit; to open a wide Door to Remonstrances, and to take away from those who would present them, all Dread; that I may thereby, if possible, make new Acquirements in Knowledge, every Moment.

(A) In the Chinese it is Yuan; under which are comprehended equally, all the Judges, Magistrates, Officers of War &c. Some French Books have used another Expression, calling them Mandarins. This, if one has a mind, may serve here; and in other Passages, where I have used the Term Officers. I must only inform the Reader, that the Word Mandarin, has no Resemblance to the Chinese Sound. I believe it is a Portuguese Word, and is derived from Mandar to Ordain.

(a) The third of the Years Chin quan, answers to the third Year of his Reign, and of Christ, 629. These Names of Years are, as it were, Epochs, Marks, or Titles, by which the Years of every Emperor are designated; for the Chinese never mention their Emperors, whether dead or living, by their proper Names, out of reverence to them, as if they were too sacred to be pronounced. The curious chronological Table of the Chinese, published by P. Faupet, (as already observed, P. 133. Note 1.) gives us these Epochs of the Emperors, some of whom have had no less than ten, during the Course of their Reign. Without this Table, we should have been at a Loss to fix the Dates of the Decrees, which the Missionary who translated them from the Chinese, ought to have done, for his Readers' satisfaction.

(*) Two famous Ministers, mentioned in the Shi king.

(†) Wbey shang and Li nu, were two Generals, famous in their Time.

(4) Filial Piety.

(†) The Chinese says, to the Heart of Tyen.

My Application in all this, is so constant, that I don't even allow myself one Day of Relaxation. My great Passion is, that every thing may be regular; that my Subjects may follow Reason in all things, and may be solidly virtuous. Thus, when I see any thing not in its proper Place, and any of my Subjects vicious, I immediately take myself to Task, for the small Talent I have for Instruction, and effectual Reformation: I have good Reason for doing all this. For in short, the Shu king says, Virtue, when pure and solid, touches (§) Shin: What effect then, must it not have upon the People? I am told from different Quarters, that the People enter into their Duty; that Robberies are become rare; and that the Prisons in several Cities are empty. I learn all this with Pleasure: But I forbear to attribute it to my Care and Example. My Reflections on this Head, are as follows; People are weary, say I to my self, of Commotions and Rapines: They are now returning to the Paths of Virtue: These happy Dispositions must be improved, in order to endeavour the Conversion of the whole Empire. My military Expeditions have occasioned me to run over a great Part of the Provinces. At every Village I came to, I sigh'd and beat my Breast, at the Misery of the poor People: Being convinced of it with my own Eyes, I did not allow one Man to be employed in the useless Averages. I did my best, to make all my Subjects live at Ease, to the end, that Parents might be more able to educate their Children well, that their Children on their Parts, might acquit themselves better of all their Duties with Regard to their Parents, and that the other Virtues may flourish with the Virtue Hyau.

In order to make known to my whole Empire, that I have nothing more at Heart; When this Ordinance is published, let there be given in my Name, and on my Part, in every District, five Measures of Rice, to those who distinguish themselves by their Hyau; two Measures to every one who is Four score Years of Age; Three to those who are Ninety; as many to those who are a Hundred, together with two Pieces of Stuff: Besides, at the Beginning of every Moon, let a Measure of Rice be given to every Woman who brings forth a Son. As for they, whom the Calamities of the Times have forced to abandon their Country; let some be at Pains to persuade them to return, and at their Return, let them be furnished at my Expence, with what may put them on Foot again, in the same Condition as formerly. I likewise ordain, the general Officers of every Province, to examine carefully, which of their subaltern Officers are excellent, which good, and which bad, in order to send me a sealed List of them. That each Officer in his District, take care to inform me if there are any, no matter in what Station, in whom is discerned a true Talent for Business or for War, or have distinguished themselves by their Virtue; let a Memorial for this Effect be drawn up. Lastly, if there are any, who, having been a little debauched in the late Commotions, have reclaimed themselves so far, as to amend in Time of Peace. I likewise want to be informed about them. To bewail ones Faults; and to correct them, is a Thing, that many of our ancient Kings, whose Example I much value, have esteemed. Let this present Ordinance be immediately published. It is a common and a true Saying, that one Day being unhappily lost, the Loss is frequently felt for three Years. The Empire cannot be too soon instructed in my Intentions.

In the third of the Years, named Chin quan, Li ta lyang was raised to the Dignity of Ta fù, and had the Government of all the Territory of Leang chew given him. Some time after, a Deputy of the Emperor Tay tong passing that Way, saw an excellent Hawk, and immediately proposed to Ta lyang, to make a Present of it to the Emperor. Ta lyang gave it to the Deputy, in order to send it if he thought fit. In the mean Time, he secretly conveyed to the Emperor, a Memorial conceived in the following Terms.

YOUR Majesty, long ago, openly laid aside the Diversion of Hunting. Yet one of your Deputies has asked a Bird for you, for that Purpose. He either did it because he well knew your Inclinations in that Point, and thought that it would give you a Pleasure; or he has done it of his own Head, and without knowing your Intentions. If the Latter was the Case, he must be a very weak Fellow, and very unfit for his Employment; But if he knew your Intentions, your Majesty must have changed your first Resolutions, and as it were, annulled your former Orders.

TAY TSONG'S ANSWER.

YOUR rare Ability for Affairs, both of Peace and War, joined to a singular Honesty, and an unshaken Firmness, induc'd me to commit to your Care, the Management and Safety of a People, at a great Distance from me, and almost Forreigners. I am extremely well satisfied with the Manner in which you discharge this important Trust. I am charmed with the Honour you acquire, and I have always in my Mind, your Services and Zeal. I have not indeed tried the Officer, who was the occasion of my being presented with the Hawk; but I have a due Esteem for the good Advice you send me on this Occasion, at such a Distance, and for your Care in recalling to your Memory, the Past, in order to my being instructed with Regard to the Future. I read your honest Heart thro' all your Writing, and while I read, I sigh'd, and incessantly praised you. Am I not happy, said I to myself, in having such an Officer? Never deviate from your Honesty; persevere to the end, in worthily filling the high Rank you possess. To this Conduct, says the Shi king, the Favour of the Shin, and the greatest Prosperity, are inseperable. In the Opinion (§) Shin, signifies a Spirit. I have elsewhere translated it Spirit; the Reader may use it as he has a mind.

It does not determine, neither here nor in other Places, whether it be of the Singular or Plural Number.

nion of our Antients, an Advice given in Season, is a very rich Present. The Advice I have now got from you, certainly has its own Value; and to shew you that I esteem it, I send you three Vessels of Gold, which are not indeed massy, but they have been used by me. One of the most proper Methods for your worthily filling your important Employments, and your supporting your high Reputation, is, to employ your leisure Hours, in reading some useful Book. That I may animate you to this, I augment my Present, with a Copy of the History of the Han, written by Sun. The Facts are there laid down in few, but well chosen, Words, and the political Observations are masterly: So that one may say, that this Book contains the Substance of the great Art of Governing, and the mutual Duties of Sovereigns and Subjects. I hope that you will read this Book with the greater Care, as you receive it from me.

Towards the End of the Years, named Chin quan, the same Emperor Tay tsong, composed, for the Instruction of his Son and Heir, a Book, intituled the Rule of Sovereigns. This Book consisted of twelve Chapters. The first was intituled, Concerning what regards the Person of the Sovereign: The second, Concerning his advancing Relations: The third, Of the Care in searching for wise Men: The fourth, Of the Choice of Officers: The fifth, Of Readiness to hear Advice and Remonstrances: The sixth, Of his Care to banish Backbiting and Calumny: The seventh recommends, The avoiding of Pride: The eighth, The Love of a decent Frugality: The ninth treats, Of Rewards and Punishments: The tenth, Of Application in promoting Agriculture: The eleventh treats, Of the military Art, of which a Prince ought not to be ignorant: And the twelfth, Of the Learning, which he ought principally to esteem and cultivate. All these Matters were treated in such a manner, as served both to form the Prince to Virtue, and to teach him how to govern well. Tay tsong addresses this Book to his Son, and begins with the following Preface.

THESE twelve Chapters, tho' they are short, contain the great Rules of our ancient and wise Kings, and the Duties of good Princes. On a Prince depend Troubles or Peace, the Ruin or Prosperity of his State. It is easy to know these Rules, and to be acquainted with these Duties: But the great Point is to follow, and to fulfill them: This is not so easy: And it is still more difficult to persevere invariably in them, to the end. It must not be imagined, that these wicked Princes, knew no other Path, but that of Vice; and that our wise and virtuous Emperors, whose Memories are so much celebrated, were unacquainted with all Paths, but those of Virtue. Both the one and the other, knew the two different Roads: But the one is downwards, and easy to follow: The other leads over Heights that seem fatiguing. Groveling Souls, without regarding the other, follow the easy Path, which conducts them to their Ruin. Great Souls, on the contrary, without being discouraged at the Difficulty, bravely take the other Road. But the Prosperity which soon attends them, rewards their Courage. Thus Men, by their different Conduct, become happy or unhappy, and all that is told us of the Gates of good and bad Fortune, are either allegorical Representations of what I have now mention'd, or else, they are mere Fictions.

If (+) you would reign as you ought, you must tread the Paths of the great Souls. Propose to yourself as your Patterns, and take for your Masters, our wisest Princes. Do not confine yourself to what I have done. He who endeavours to imitate our greatest Princes, frequently comes far short of them. If a Man aspires only at what is midling, he bids fair not to reach even that. No! Nothing, but a virtue of the first Rate, ought to be your Pattern. For my share, since I mounted the Throne, I have committed many Faults. I have been over curious about fine Stuffs and Embroideries, and even Pearls and precious Stones. To make a constant Use of these, as I have done, is guarding very ill against the Passions. I have adorned my Buildings with Sculptures, I have gone so far, as to raise some Terrasses. This cannot be done, without acting too inconsistently with what is called a Praise-worthy Frugality. I provided myself in Dogs, Horses and Hawks, even from the most distant Countries. It is an empty Curiosity which breaks in upon Disinterestedness, and perfect Temperance. In short, I have made some Journeys of Pleasure, by which, many have suffered. This discovers a gross Ignorance of one's Self, and a great Disregard of others. Don't make my Example, your Authority. I look upon it, as being so faulty, that it might have been attended with fatal Consequences. If it has not, it is owing to my having on the other Hand, re-established the Empire in Peace and Tranquillity. If I have wronged any of my Subjects, I have much oftner relieved their Necessities, and I commonly supplied them with Plenty. The Advantages attending my Victories, my paternal Cares, and my Goodness, have made them either to forget my Faults, or bear with them without repining. They even praise and applaud me; but notwithstanding of all that is said of my Reign, I acknowledge a great many Faults, upon which I cannot think without Shame and Repentance. If you imitate these Faults, what will you not have to dread? You, I say, to whom the Empire as yet owes nothing, and who owe the Empire, only to the Happiness of your Birth. But if, by assuming Inclinations worthy of your Rank, you practise and promote Virtue; if you undertake nothing but what the authorises, your Life will be happy, and your Reign glorious. If, on the contrary, you shall abandon yourself to your Caprice and Passion, you will forfeit your Empire, and lose your Life. It requires Ages to establish, and but Moments to ruin, Empires. Nothing is more easy than to lose a Throne, but great is the Difficulty in rising to it by Merit. Can a Sovereign then be too watchful and attentive?

(+) He speaks to his Son.

An Author, named Hu san feng, says of this Preface. Tay tsong, here acknowledges and confesses his Faults: This is very commendable; but it appears, that he writes all this for his Son; and the great failing of this Prince, was his Love for Women. Notwithstanding this, Tay tsong does not give him one Caution against this Passion: Nothing is more true than the Saying, that Parents never know the Faults of their Children.

An Author, called Ting fong, reasons otherwise upon the same Subject, and says: According to the Maxims of our Antients, nothing is more commendable in Princes, than not to doat upon Women. Tay tsong, who in this Rule of Sovereigns, so exactly instructed the Son in every other Point, never spoke of this important one. Was this because, perceiving that this was his own weak side, he was afraid, should he mention it, of giving People Occasion to talk? One thing is certain, that Kau tsong his Successor, had so blind a Passion for a Woman during his Life, that he left her when he died, the Government of the Empire, which had well nigh ruined all. The Silence of Tay tsong, upon so important a Head, seems to confirm what is too much verified in other Respects; That Princes have commonly some darling Faults, which they do not like should be touched upon.

The same Emperor Tay tsong, marching in Person towards Korea, and arriving at Ing chew, gave order, that the Bones of the Officers and Soldiers, who had died in the War of Lyau tong, should be carefully looked for and collected. He caused them all to be brought together, near the City Lyew chew. He then ordered the Magistrates of the Place, to prepare an Animal of the first Class. He next performed in honour of the Dead, the Ceremony called Tsi: He likewise made use of a (*) Tsi wen of his own Composition, and wept so bitterly, that all his Army was deeply affected.

IT is a true Saying, That Pearls and precious Stones are of no Use, either for Food or Raiment. They do not of themselves, protect us from Cold or Hunger. It is the same, with diverse other vain Ornaments. Ven ti, one of the Han, very rightly says, That Sculpture, Engraving, and such like Arts, are detrimental to Agriculture: That Embroidery, and other Works of that Kind, do, most perniciously, divert Women from employing themselves, as formerly, in making useful Stuffs, and Garments for common Wear. That wise Prince ascribed to these Disorders, the Cold and Want which his People underwent. Kya i, who lived in the Reign of Ven ti, carried these Reflections yet farther. A Man, says he, who does not eat twice a Day, suffers Hunger; and, if he lets a Year slip, without making himself any Cloaths, he endures Cold in the Winter. Now, when a Person undergoes Cold and Hunger, nothing can restrain him: In such a Case, the tenderest Mother cannot restrain her Child; and therefore, by a far more cogent Reason, how should a Prince restrain his People?

Raised, as I am, above the People, above the Nobles, and above the Kings, loaded, in Spite of my Debility, with the Care of making my Empire happy, I incessantly apply my self to it, so far as to forget, even my necessary Meals and my Sleep. I would gladly revive Simplicity and Innocence in my Empire: Yet, as that is not to be hoped for, while our People are in Want, I would fain have every individual Family sufficiently provided for. But alas! I am unable to bring that about. My Granaries are in a manner, empty, and the Scarcity still continues. If there happen but the least Drought or Inundation, my People will, as heretofore, be reduced to feed upon Bran. When I search for the particular Causes of this Calamity, I find myself to be the sole Occasion thereof: By the Delicacy of my Table, and Richness of my Attire, I have taught my Subjects, high Feeding and Luxury.

In short, People follow the Inclinations of Princes, and not their Instructions; it being very rare, that a Sovereign's Exhortation reclaim those whom he hath corrupted by his Example: And, accordingly our prudent Monarchs of old, made their own personal Conduct, the principal Springs of Government. By this means, they effectually corrected all Abuses, and made their Subjects virtuous. In Times nearer our own, some Princes, without being able to equal, have imitated them with Success? And why shall not I do the like? For me to aim at inspiring my People with good Oeconomy and Frugality, with Simplicity and Integrity, while they behold me using choice Silks, Pearls, Embroidery, and costly Gems, is to attempt an Impossibility (+). Yes, I at length know it to be a certain Truth, that it behoves the Sovereign to set the Example; and I will do it.

All my Gold and Silver Moveables, with other Ornaments of those Metals, shall be melted down for the Payment of my Troops, and such like Occasions: And as for my rich Garments, my Pearls, Diamonds, and other precious Stones, Things sufficiently useless, I am instantly going to destroy them all in a Fire, before my Apartment; to convince my whole Empire, that I abhor and detest Luxury. Since a sincere and upright Heart, has the Power to move Tyen or Heaven, I likewise reckon, it may touch my Subjects; and that, at least, they will obey such of my Orders, as they shall see supported by my Example. To begin with my Palace, I ordain, that the Queens, Princes, and Concubines, do henceforward array themselves in Garments, whose finery, shall consist solely in being neat and decent. I forbid their wearing Pearls or any other Ornaments of Price. (+) I will, if possible, bring Matters to such a Pass, that Gold shall be no more esteemed than

(*) A Kind of Funeral Oration.
(†) The Chinese Original says, It is the same, as thinking to stop a Pot of Water from boiling, by increasing the Fire under it; or not to be wet, and yet leap into a River.

(‡) In the Chinese, is specified one particular Sort of Ornament, named Tsi, made of the Feathers of a certain Bird, of a violet Colour, very rare, and highly esteemed. [It is mentioned before.]

than common Earth (*): I will, at least, absolutely banish Luxury. Moderation and Frugality are the Means, whereby People's Wants are to be relieved: It is my Desire, that these Virtues should flourish in my Empire. Let this my present Declaration be immediately published, and be it known unto all Men, that such is my Will and Pleasure.

In the fifth of those Years, styled Whey chang, (z) Vu Tsong, one of the Emperors of the Dynasty of the Tang, published the following Ordinance.

UNDER our [first] three renowned Dynasties, there never was the least mention of Fo: (+) It has been only since the Dynasties of the Han and the Whey, that this Sect, which introduced Images, began to spread itself over China. Thence downwards those foreign Customs have been established insensibly, for want of taking proper Care to prevent it, and are still gaining Ground daily. The People are unhappily bigotted to them, whereby the State is a Sufferer. In the two Courts, in all the Cities, and in the Mountains, nothing is to be seen but Bonzas (†) of both Sexes. The Number and Magnificence of the (A) Bonzaries, are every Day augmenting: Multitudes of Artisans, are perpetually employed in making for them, Images of all Sorts of Materials: Vast Quantities of Gold and Silver, are consumed to adorn them. Many People forget their Prince, their Parents and Relations, to station themselves under a Bonza Master. (B) There are also many wicked Wretches, who abandon Wives and Children, to seek among the Bonzas' Sanctuary, to screen and protect them from the Laws. Can any thing be more pernicious than this? Our Ancestors held it for a Maxim; that if there was but one Man who did not labour, and but one Woman who neglected employing herself in something appertaining to the Silk Manufactures, some one in the State was sensible of the Omission, and underwent either Cold or Hunger. How then must the Case be, in these our Times, when infinite Swarms of Bonzas, both Male and Female, are fed and clothed by the Sweat of others, and employ in all Parts, at an immense Cost, vast Numbers of Workmen, in building and adorning stately Edfices? (c) Are we to seek for any other Cause of that Poverty, to which the Empire was reduced, during the Dynasties of the Tsin, Song, Tsi, and Yang, and of all the Impostures and Knaveries, wherewith those Times abounded?

As to our Dynasty of the Tang, the Princes, who were its Founders, after having successfully employed the Force of Arms to restore the State to its pristine Tranquillity, took care to establish it by prudent Laws; and in order to affect it, far from borrowing any thing from that vile foreign Sect, in the very first of those Years, styled Chin quan, the Emperor Tay tsong, declared himself against it: But he proceeded with too much Lenity and Indolence, so that the Evil has only increased. For my own Part, after having read, and seriously considered the several Representations made to me on this Subject, and having maturely deliberated thereon, with wise and intelligent Persons, I am come to a Resolution. It is a Grievance, and some Remedy must be applied. All my well affected and experienced Officers, throughout the Provinces, press me to set a Hand to the Work: This, in their Opinion, is the Way to dry up the Spring of those Errors, which overspread the whole Empire, and to re-establish the Government of our Ancestors. they think it is the common Interest; and that the very Life of our People, consists in doing it. after this, how can we excuse ourselves from applying the Means? Here then follows what I do ordain. 1. That more than 4600 great Bonzaries, [or Monasteries] which are dispersed throughout the Empire, shall be entirely demolished: Consequently the He and She Bonzas, (d) who have their Abode in those Bonzaries, and by a moderate Computation, amount to no fewer than 26 (e) Wan, must again become Seculars, and pay their Shares of the usual Taxes. 2. That there be also destroyed upwards of four (f) Wan of lesser Bonzaries, which are spread up and down the Provinces: And consequently all the Lands thereunto annexed, amounting to several Wan of Tsing, (g) must revert to our Domains: Likewise, that fifteen Wan, [or 150,000] of Slaves, appertaining to the Bonzas, be intolled by the respective Magistrates, and accounted as part of the People. With regard to such out-landish Bonzas as are come hither, either from Ta tsing, (h) or

(*) He alludes to a Saying of Kau ti, first Emperor of the Dynasty of the Tsi. Viz. If I reign only ten Years, I will make Gold and Earth bear one Price. [See P. 109.]

(+) In the French it is tsing, as if Tsing was another Name, of the Year Whey chang, which was the 5th of Vu tsong. See the last Note in this Page.

(†) The Name of a certain Sectary of Hindostan, whose Doctrine passed into China, not long after the Birth of Christ.

(‡) I use this Word [Bonza] says our Author, because it is used in other French Books; tho' it is not of Chinese Original [it was first brought into Europe by the Portuguese, who seem to have coined it: The Chinese Word being Seng or Ho-seng, which the Author ought at least to have given us.]

(A) This Word seems to be coined by the Jesuits, who translated these Declarations, to supply the Place of Monasteries, which Name he is not willing to give them: tho' in Effect, they are such, and are so called by other Missionaries, in several Parts of this Work.

(B) They are Sanctuaries for all Sorts of Villains, like the Ramiss Monasteries: which for that Reason, will equally fall under the Lash of this Declaration.

(c) Has not the same Complaint been made against the Ramiss Clergy; and ought not the Ramiss Princes to mind those Arguments coming from a Chinese, which they disregard in Protestants, as the Effect of Prejudice?

(d) For there are Bonzaries of Women, as well as of Men; just like the Monasteries and Nunneries in popish Countries.

(e) A Wan is 10,000, so that 26 Wan, amount to 260,000.

(f) Or 40,000.

(g) A certain Land Measure so named.

(h) Several Europeans pretend, that Ta tsing is Palestine: at least, it is certain from a Monument still extant, that under the Dynasty of the Tang, some Christian Priests came into China, who had Churches in more than one Part of the Country, and lived in common. But we cannot easily discover by this Monument, whether they were Catholics, or Nestorians: [Nor does it matter which they were. But since they are layed in the Monument, to come from Ta tsing or Tau tsin, it appears from the Ordinance, that they underwent the same Fate as the Bonzas: nay, what is more remarkable, are considered themselves as Bonzas: Which shews, there appeared to the Chinese, the same conformity between their Religion and that of the Bonzas, which we have already observed, and shall, in its proper Place, shew there is between the latter and the Romish. The Generality of those who read the French will find it difficult to know, when, and by what Emperor, this Decree was made; for his Name is omitted or

Mi bú pa, to propagate the Law, professed in their respective Regions, and are in Number, about 3,000: It is my Decree, that they also return to a secular Life; To the end, that the Customs of our Empire may be uniform, and unmixed. Alas! The putting them on their ancient Footing has been but too long deferred: Why should they be deferred any longer? It is a Matter settled and concluded on. At Sight of this present Ordinance, let every one proceed to Execution. Such is our Will and Pleasure.

A Gloss says, That this Decree was actually executed, some few Particulars only excepted. That two great Bonzaries, with thirty Bonza's belonging to each, were left standing both in the Northern, and the Southern Court; that one Bonzary also was suffer'd to remain in every Government, with a certain Number of Bonzas; that those Bonzaries were distinguished into three different Orders; and that the Number of Bonzas was not alike in all of them.

Wey ching's Remonstrance to the Emperor Tay t'ong.

IT effectually behoves a Prince to love the Good and hate the Wicked; to place near his own Person, Men of Virtue and Merit; and to remove from about him, those who are destitute thereof. By entertaining the former, he furnishes his Court with select Persons: By keeping at a Distance the latter, he avoids being surprized by the Artifices, which Interest and their Passions are, on every Occasion, suggesting to them. As to the rest, there is no Man so bad, but that he has one laudable Quality, and does some little Good: Nor any, however prudent and virtuous, but has some Foible, and is sometimes guilty of slight Faults. But then the Imperfection in this latter, resembles a minute Spot or Blemish in a fine Jewel; while the little Good which the former has in him, may be compared to the sharpened Edge of a Knife-Blade, made only of Lead. This Blade, may indeed be used once: But is it, on that Score, held in any Esteem? On the contrary, a skilful Jeweller, does not refuse a beautiful Gem, on account of a small Blemish. To suffer ones self to be imposed on, or captivated by such slight good Qualities as may be found in a Man, otherways monstrously vicious; and to be discouraged at slender Defects, in a Person otherways of Virtue and Capacity, is to confound the most differing Scents, and to be unable to distinguish a Diamond of the highest Value, from a common Pebble.

But it is a much greater Misfortune, when a Prince, sufficiently qualified to distinguish Men of solid Virtue and real Merit, from such as have neither, neglects to invite the first, or reject the last. You, Great Prince, have an intrepid Courage, joined with a most penetrating Wit and Discernment; a most majestic Air, and uncommon Capacity, unite in your Person. But you do not, methinks, sufficiently temper your Love and your Hatred; and that redounds greatly to your Prejudice: Hence it proceeds, that notwithstanding your Fondness for Men of Virtue and Merit, the Choice you make, is not the most exact: Hence it proceeds, that you have still in your Court, Flatterers, whatever Aversion you have to Adulation. But you, more especially, suffer yourself to be carried too far, by your Aversion to Evil. When you are told Good of any one, you seem not to believe it: Are you told Ill of one? you instantly take it for granted. How great soever your Talent may be, it is still better you should be diffident thereof. Your Conduct in this Particular, seems to me, liable to many Inconveniences. How comes this to pass? It is thus.

As it is the Property of honest Men, to say what Good they know of others: On the contrary, it is the Custom of base Spirits, to speak Ill of every one indiscriminately. If the Prince easily believes the Ill which is told him, and is not ready to believe the Good he hears of People, he takes the direct Way to encourage Slander and Calumny: Which of course would be opening the Gate to wicked Men, and shutting it against good ones. This is a Failing of evil Consequence; for it puts, as if it were a Wall of Separation, between the Sovereign and his virtuous Subjects. Do any Troubles afterwards happen to arise? Are the Prince and State in any Danger? There are none found at Court to apply a Remedy. There are two Sorts of Intimacies, which ought well to be distinguished: The first is, that of good Men among themselves. Of this Tie, Virtue is the Knot. They mutually esteem each other. This Esteem engages them to assist and support each other on every proper Occasion; but it is always by honourable Methods. The second is, that of base and wicked Souls: Tho destitute either of Love or Esteem, they fail not uniting thro' Interest, and helping each other in their Intrigues. The first of these Unions has nothing in it but what is just, and must be useful to the Prince: The second is pure Cabal, nor is there any Thing more pernicious. The Misfortune is, that one may be mistaken for the other; and in such Case, the Consequences are terrible. For if the Prince takes for Cabal, what is say'd or done, by Persons of Virtue and Merit, in behalf of one another, he keeps on his Guard, he mistrusts, and shews them no manner of Respect: If, by a second Error, he takes for a sincere and upright Zeal, the Liberty, wherewith some buz in his Ears, Calumnies against this and that Person, and believes all they tell him, it is still much worse; For he will banish from his Presence, his best Subjects, or at least, grow diffident of them. This they will soon perceive: But in removing the Cause or disguis'd (See before Note 2) in the Title of the Ordinance: (whether by a Mistake of the Printer, or with Design by the Translator, to conceal this remarkable Event, I shall not pretend to say,) and only the Year of his Title mentioned; but that Circumstance helps to discover the Secret: For by the Chronological Table (mentioned P. 135. Note 1. and 514.) the fifth of the Years, named Whey chang, (or as it is written in the said Table Whey chang) is the fifth Year of the Emperor Yu t'ong, which falls in the Year of Christ 845, when consequently this Ordinance was published. The Difference between the Title of Years in the two Authors, happens by an easy Mistake in the Printer or Engraver, of an H for a K, or a K, for an H: Da Halde writing in Hochchang and Fuguet, Kwei tchang.]

Cause of his Jealousy, they may not give him all the Light which would be necessary. Such of his inferior Officers as are privy to the Intrigues, dare not once open their Mouths to make a Discovery. From the Court, this Evil spreads itself into the Provinces; and if it be not speedily plucked up by the very Root, its Consequences are always very fatal. Nothing, indeed like this, has happened yet, nor will, tis to be hoped, in your Time. Your Majesty's Views are, undoubtedly, extended beyond the present Juncture: You will prudently turn any Mistakes, you may have committed of this Kind, to your Advantage; and know how to repair them to your Profit. But what may not be apprehended during some weaker Reign, and under a Prince less disposed readily to recollect and correct himself? Your Majesty cannot do it too soon. Be afraid of transmitting to your Descendants, amidst so many shining Examples, the Faults I take notice of to your Majesty. Let your Promptness, to rid yourself of it, teach them to shun it.

What I have been laying down, my Sovereign, properly speaking, regards only the Choice of your Officers. I shall now offer a Piece of Counsel of a more general Concern, and so of more Importance, with Respect to your well Governing. It is, that you frequently consult the beautiful Mirror (*) of Antiquity. Looking at ourselves in a clear and still Water, we behold our Faces, such as they really are. A Prince, by comparing his own Conduct, with the Steps taken by the Sages of old, may pass thereon a sound Judgment. Informed thereby of his own Defects, the Error he commits, and what are his principal Duties, he leaves very little to be done by his Officers, whose Business it is to remark his Faults, and to give him Advice. He increases, as of himself, in Wisdom and in Virtues. His Government grows daily, more and more perfect; and his Reputation augments proportionably. Consequently, what's more worthy the Applications of a Monarch?

As to the rest, the chief Care of our greatest Princes, Whang ti, Yau, Shun, and Yu, was to make Virtue reign, and to inspire their Subjects with the Love of it. In vain, would a Prince promise himself, by the Assistance of a Code, or Statute-Book, three Feet thick, to govern as they did, without taking Pains and bestirring himself (†). In these happy Days, it was neither the Severity of Laws, nor the Rigour of Punishments, which regulated or reformed People's Manners: It was only the Virtue of those Sage Princes. Careful not to allow any thing disorderly in their own Conduct, and exercising on themselves the strictest Justice, they treated their Subjects gently, and with Lenity: Whereby their Government, without being any way harsh or severe, was extremely vigorous. In effect, Mildness and Justice are the main Springs of Government: These are the Springs, which in a State, should give all Things their Motion; and if Chastisements are used, they ought to apply them as the able Coachman does his Whip, by Intervals, and but very rarely.

What then most of all imports a Sovereign, is to be himself virtuous, and to inspire his People with Virtue. Mankind are internally furnished with Reason and Passions; from whence outwardly proceed their good or bad Actions. Consequently, the only way for them to root out all their Disorders, is to regulate their Hearts. "To this end, our first rate Philosophers have applied their Care. Rightly to give Judgment in Causes, sayed Confucius, is something. I know some Men capable of doing it. But what I would have, is, that some would do it in such a Manner, as not to need any farther Judgment thereupon." To succeed herein, what is to be done? The Way is prudently to regulate and establish Rites; to instruct the People, to acquaint them with the Nature of their Passions, and arm them against Surprise from that Quarter; to oblige and encourage them to make Use of their Reason; to make tighter, if I may so express it, the Ties of Nature, which is common to them, and inspire them with a sincere Affection for each other. This mutual Love, will eradicate all Inclinations to do harm; every one will strive to perform his Duties, and Order will reign universally.

It will be in vain, to think of attaining this, by the Multitude or Rigour of Laws: Only Instruction, supported by good Example, can have such a desirable Effect. Accordingly, the wisest of our Kings, have always assigned Punishments a Place many Degrees below Virtue and Morality: Nor did Shun, as the Sbu king informs us, nominate Kyew yu, to preside over the five Punishments, till he had first giving him orders to cause the five capital Instructions, to be thoroughly inculcated over all the Empire. Nay, farther: The End even of Punishments, is not merely to punish Faults, and make Malefactors suffer; but they are design'd, either to deter People from doing what is Evil, or to remedy some Disorder; to widen the Path of Virtue, and streighten that of Vice. In short, Instruction and Example, ought to be the ordinary Occupations of Sovereigns. When they employ those Means, every one imbibes great and generous Sentiments, and conducts himself by noble Principles; whereas, under bad Princes, however severe they may be in punishing, the Inclinations of the People being wholly base and corrupt, nothing is seen but Trouble and Disorder.

It is, in proportion, the same, as to the Conduct of Magistrates, with Regard to the People under their Jurisdiction; and it may with Reason be affirmed, that the Figure of Metal has scarce more Dependence on the Form of the Crucible in which it is melted, or of the Mould it is to be cast in, than have Peoples Manners on those of the Princes and Magistrates, by whom they are governed: So that a Prince who should imitate our ancient Kings, would revive those happy Times.

(*) Possibly, this Discourse was what induced Tay tseu to compose his Golden Mirror, whereof we have already given the Translation, p. 510.

(†) The Chinese has it, with his Hands a-croft, and doing nothing.

(‡) A famous Minister, by whose Assistance W'ee lung, Prince of Yü, became so powerful, that he was in a Manner, equal to the Emperor himself.

True it is, that those great Monarchs have had very few perfect Imitators. But, even while the Dynasty of the Chew was in its Decay, if the Government had not then, as formerly, Instruction and good Example for its Ground-Work, but greater Reckoning was made of the established Laws, yet we find those Laws to have been observed religiously. "A good Prince, (sayd Qyang (*) chong) is guided by the Laws, and not by his own Views: He makes his particular Ideas and Inclinations give Place to the general Opinion and Benefit; nor can he possibly prosper otherwise."

Thus stood Matters during the first Year of your Majesty's Reign. The Laws were your Rule: You observed them exactly in punishing Crimes; in doubtful Cases, you set the Affair to be debated; you heard all the Suffrages with Patience, and you followed, without Hesitation, that Method which was most approved. Your People, made acquainted with your Decrees, and persuaded of the Equity thereof, received them without murmuring. Your Officers, having Experience of your Steadiness, in what you had once concluded on, dreaded no troublesome Revocations, and seconded you zealously: Each had his Station and his Talents. But for some Years past, Things have changed. You gradually, nay, daily more and more, grow difficult, and even somewhat rigid. You sometimes imitate those Fishers, whose Net restrain the Fish on three Sides only, leaving them Room to escape on the fourth (†). At other Times, and that much more frequently, you imitate those, who with Greediness hunt after the small quantity of Fishes, which are to be found in the least and the shallowest Rivulets (‡). Is a Choice to be made, but more especially, are you to judge of a Fault? Your Humour and your Inclination, are the only Rules you then follow. Have you a Love for any Person? Let his Crime be ever so enormous, right or wrong, you excuse him. Has any one the Misfortune not to please you? How light soever his Fault is, you find means to augment it, by diving into his very Intentions; and when any one makes you some Remonstrance thereupon, you suspect him guilty of Collusion.

What follows such a Conduct? Why, the Laws are rendered utterly useless; they are implored in vain, and the Magistrates dare not maintain them. You indeed, shut up their Mouths; but do not imagine, that in their Hearts, they acquiesce with your Decrees, and that those Decrees are executed without Murmurs. We have a Law specifying, That when the Criminal chances to be any Officer above the fourth Class, or Order, Care shall be taken, that all the superior Officers, give in their Reports, touching his Crime. This Law was enacted in favour of the Accused's Rank and Degree. The View of those who established it, was, to screen the Party from Calumny or Oppression, and bring every thing to Light, which might prove to his Advantage. At present, quite contrariwise, this Law is grossly abused, in order to arm against the Accused, those who have a Right of making the Report. Your Intentions being known to him, they search for, and improve even the minutest Circumstances, which may serve to aggravate the Faults; and seem afraid your Majesty would be offended, if they did not represent them criminal enough. Nay, even when the Case is of such a Nature, that no Law can be found whereby to judge him a Criminal, they examine him independantly of all Laws, and at length find means to make the Fault three times worse than it really is. Your Mind, in the Point, is known; and this is the Reason why, for some Years past, all such as are informed against, are in mortal Dread of having their Affair brought before you; and deem themselves extremely fortunate, whenever it happens to be terminated in the Fa tse (†).

As to the rest, what you transact upon the Throne, and in your Court, your Ministers and Officers do after the Example you set them, in their respective Tribunals. By this Means, Accusations multiply; Proceedings are spun out; and, while the principal Point of Government is either neglected or forgotten, much Time is squandered in canvassing light Slips, and often mere Trifles. What will this pretended Exactness at length produce? It will occasion Multitudes of Crimes, frequently very grievous ones, from the Method of punishing a single Offence, and that often a trivial one; it will stop up the high Road to Justice, and increase the Numbers of Malecontents and ill-disposed Persons. This is not the way to banish Dissensions, or to cause Union, Tranquillity, and good Order, to reign in a State.

Hear what a celebrated Author says, putting his Words into the Mouth of a Prince. — "The generality of People abhor filthy Debauches and Plunderings. These Crimes I never pardon. All People rejoice at it, and my Severity in punishing them, does not make me looked on as a cruel Prince; because I treat the Offenders answerably to the Idea of the Public, and the Horror which they have for those Crimes: So that it is in Conjunction with the Public that I judge them. The People have an Abhorrence also to Nakedness and Hunger: But it is a very different Kind of Abhorrence; for every one, dreading them for his own Sake, compassionates them in others. When therefore, I meet with any induced merely thro' Want to commit a Fault, I am ready enough to pardon him; nor have I found that for so doing, the People charged me, either with Partiality or Weakness. This is because my Conduct herein, also corresponds with the Dispositions of my Subjects: The Public pardons them at the same Time, when I do. In short, such as I treat with Rigour, are, in the general Sentiments of my People, Objects of Abomination: And they to whom I shew Indulgence, are, also in the common Opinion, Objects of Commiseration. The Care I have thus to follow the common and general Idea, gains me the Hearts of my Subjects, and so far prevails, that, without bestowing many Rewards,

(*) A famous Minister, by whose Assistance H'ee long, Prince of Tai, became so powerful, that he was in a Manner, equal to the Emperor himself.

(†) A Symbol, or Emblem, of Princes and Magistrates, who use Clemency and Compassion.

(‡) A Symbol of Rigour and greedy Exaction.

(†) A Tribunal or Court of Judicature so named.

"Rewards, I easily enough, bring them over to Goodness, and with punishing but rarely, effectually turn them from Evil."

The Inference to be drawn from this, is, that in Matter of Punishments, a Prince who follows the general Idea and common Sentiment, hazards nothing; and that, tho' in following it, he should punish certain Faults somewhat too lightly, his so doing would not be attended by any great Inconveniencies. On the contrary, when a Sovereign follows his own particular Notions, if he is a little too indulgent, People say he is weak, and that he opens a Door to Disorders; if he is severe, he passes for cruel, and makes himself odious. Our ancient Princes were mindful of this in their Chastisements, whenever they used any: But they depended very little thereon; it being their chief Care, by Instruction and good Example, to maintain the Bulk of their Subjects in Virtue, and bring back to their Duty such of them as went astray. Alas! How different are the Measures taken now, especially in criminal Cases? No sooner is any Officer accused and imprisoned, but you come to a Resolution with Regard to his Affair, even before his Examination. For Form-sake, this Examination is taken afterwards; and if the Person charged therewith does, right or wrong, bring the Informations to square with your Intentions, which are to him but too well known, he is then a Man of Judgment and Ability: Or if the Judges, without determining upon the Nature of the Fault, or setting the Matter in a proper Light, according to Law, have private Recourse to your Majesty, and ask your Pleasure in the Affair, you then deem them zealous, faithful Officers. Such a Procedure is not the way to allure able Men into your Service, and attach them to you.

When a Man is to be judged, particularly, any old Officer of Consideration, a good Prince ought to remember, that this Man, tho' accused, is nevertheless his Subject, and that he should always retain for him a fatherly Affection. His Heart thus disposed, he ought, as holding the Scale in his Hand, to examine without Prejudice, the Fault whereof such Person is accused, search into and weigh the Evidences: That done, if he is ever so little dubious, he should recur to the Judgment of a Majority of his great Officers; and if the Case seems to them any way doubtful, it behoves him to lean towards the most favourable Side. They who bear the Sovereign's Commission, ought likewise to come into the same Sentiments, and follow this Method, as that which in all Ages has been the most approved. Shun, in deputing Hew yu (A), his criminal Judge, expressly recommended to him, Moderation and Compassion.

Under the Dynasty of the Cheu, when the Accusation was of any Importance, Judgment was never passed, till after the three (+) Orders had given in their respective Opinions. When a Sentence had the Approbation of the Majority, it was then denounced definitively. This is what was termed, accommodating the Laws to the People's Sentiment. The Expression is still in Use; but, alas! How strangely is the Sense perverted? To admit into the Judgments given, Presents, Alliances, Friendships, Enmities, and Revenge, is what they now call accommodating the Laws to the People's Sentiments. The superior Officers, in this Point, suspect their Subalterns; And what Possibility is there, that any real Zeal, or sincere Attachment, can subsist amidst all this Suspicion and Diffidence? "Of old, says Confucius, in criminal Judgments, they strove as far as the Laws would permit, to save the Lives of those accused." At present, they seek for Pretences to condemn them to Death; to this End they stick not to strain the Text of the Code, and have always ready some musty old Statute or other, to authorise their sinister Constructions. In a Word, they lay about to Right and Left, in Search of wherewithal to aggravate Faults.

Whey nan tse says, If the Water is ever so deep (*), we may distinguish, from the Surface (†), whether its Bottom be Gold or Iron. If the Water is not both deep and clear, it will not greatly abound with Fish (§). For my Part, when I find a Prince looking on one, who can cavil at Trifles, as a good and able Judge; holding for a faithful zealous Officer, him who abuses his Subalterns; reckoning frequent Informations for signal Services: I compare him to one, who, to widen a Piece of Leather, stretches and pulls it till he tears it. In my Opinion, a Sovereign ought to take a quite different Course. It suits the Rank he holds, to be perpetually distributing his Favours; to reward liberally, and to punish sparingly; yet, without casting the least Blemish on the Laws: For, in Truth, the Laws are, with Respect to Judgment, the very same as the Ballance is to Weight, or the Line and Level are to Judge of Plans. Therefore, to make Judgment depend on either Love or Hatred, on Humour or Caprice; or on the particular Views of any Person soever, is wanting to judge of Weight without a Ballance, and of Plans, without a Line or Level. Is it not wanting to be deceived?

Chu ko lyang (||) was, while he lived, Equity itself. He openly declared, "That his Heart was a Ballance, which neither Authority, Affection, nor Interest, could turn to any Side." And in this, he said nothing but what was very true. And who was this Chu ko lyang? He was Minister of a State in a Kingdom of no great Extent. What Comparison is there between him and our august Emperors? How then happens it, that the Lord of such a vast and flourishing Empire does not blush at bringing down upon himself the Curses of his Subjects, by rendering their established Laws subordinate to his own Views, nay, even to his particular Inclinations?

I come now to another Point. It frequently happens, that you are disposed to amuse yourself with certain Things, sometimes of very little Moment; nevertheless, you will not have People take

(A) Orig. Huan yu, which seems to be a Mistake.

(+) 1. All the great Officers. 2. All the subaltern Officers.

3. The People.

(*) Orig. 10 Lin in Depth.

(†) By this Comparison, Tay tung is given to understand, that it is in vain for him to dissimble, since People see thro' him.

(§) Tay tung is here reproached with his unfair Conduct, and told, that Spite of his great Genius, or deep Dissimulation, he will never allure Men of true Merit into his Service.

take Notice of your Doings, much less, suffer any to talk of them. On those Occasions, you are observed to fall of a sudden into a Passion, or rather, to feign one, in order to frighten your Subjects, and tie up their Tongues from speaking. If what you do is reasonable, what Harm is there in its being known? If otherwise, what signifies your Endeavours to conceal it? We have a good old Proverb, which says, "The surest way to keep secret what we would not have known, is not to do it." When any one is afraid of being over-heard, his best Way is to be silent. To expect that all we say or do, shall be concealed from all Mankind, or shall never be talked of, is a vain Imagination (*): The Pains we take about it is utterly useless; and all we gain by it, is to make others laugh at our own Expence.

Yau, placed at his Gate a great Drum, on which, whosoever had any Advice to give for the public Good was to strike, and that Prince gave him immediate Audience. Shun affixed a Board, whereon, every one had free Liberty to write down whatever he judged amiss in the Government.

Tang had near his Person a particular Officer, whose Business was to register what Faults he should commit. Vu vang caused to be engraven, on the Moveables of his Apartments, the chief Maxims of the wise Tay kong. Thus did those famous Princes, in the height of their Prosperity, not only watch over themselves, but got others to do it also. Ever steady and impartial, they inspired all their Officers with no less Confidence than Zeal; and Virtue established among them a Harmony, as delightful as beneficial.

"A Prince truly virtuous, (sayd Vu ti) takes Pleasure in hearing Things told him, which are naturally disagreeable to others." In effect, to cherish faithful and sincere Officers, and to drive from him Flatterers and Slanderers, is indisputably, the best Course a Prince can take, both for his own Security, and the Welfare of his State. It has been experienced in all Ages, that no Dynasty was ever known to perish so long as the Sovereign and his Ministers, united by the powerful Bond of Virtue, acted in Concert for the common Good. But it too often happens, that Princes, finding their Power well established, and the public Affairs on a good Footing, have neglected able and zealous Men, in order to advance others, whose supple Dispositions have rendered them more agreeable.

And you, Great Prince, recall to Mind, I beseech you, the Beginning of your Reign, when being moderate, weary, and vigilant, you joyfully embraced whatever beneficial Proposals were made you: If you chanced to make a Slip, how light soever it was, you repaired it instantly; you received even the harshest Remonstrances with Pleasure, which appeared in your Countenance; and accordingly, all Men of Capacity were eager to assist you with their Counsels. But now, that you have nothing to disturb your Quiet, when even the remotest Barbarians are your obedient Vassals, you seem to be quite another Man. Grown haughty and full of yourself, at the same time you exclaim against Flattery, and the Views which accompany it, you listen with Pleasure to Flatterers, who load you with Applauses. You hold florid Discourses, touching the Usefulness of just and sincere Remonstrances; but at the Bottom, you like not to have any such made you. Thus you gradually open the Door to Vice and Lucre. The Path of Virtue is more and more stopped up, and that so visibly, that it is perceived even by those who are least attentive (+). This is no trifling Matter. It was by your former Conduct, that your Empire is become so well settled: By your present Conduct, it cannot avoid falling to Ruin. Is it possible you should not see it? And, in case you really do see it, how chances you do not hasten to apply a Remedy? Ever since I had the Honour to serve your Majesty, my constant Dread has been, lest Men should cease from speaking to you with intire Freedom; and now, with Grief, I find, that such Freedom of Speech is much out of Use to what it was heretofore.

In all the Memorials presented you, relating to national Affairs, the Memorialists content themselves with briefly hinting what Inconveniences have occurred, or at most what are to be feared. As to Means of remedying, or preventing them, I do not observe that they make the least Mention of any. But I do not at all wonder at it: Your Haughtiness keeps you in too high a Sphere; And, even when you imagine you descend from it, you still resemble a Dragon (‡) armed all over with sharp-pointed Scales. Men dread to approach you, and yet far more to irritate you by speaking with Freedom. Such as at first dared not to explain themselves fully, and touched on Matters gently, finding that was not sufficient sought how to compass their Design: But meeting with no Encouragement, they chuse to remain silent; and this they the more readily incline to do, by Reason that were they even assured of bringing you at first to approve their Proposals, as being both momentous and reasonable, they have always Room to fear that your Favorites, not relishing them, will make you alter your Mind; and that all the return they shall meet with from your Majesty for their Zeal, will be some Affront. Even the People of your own Retinue, your Officers, and Domestics, who are perpetually about your Person, are in such awe of you, that when there is a Necessity of informing you of what may give you Displeasure, they stand looking on each other, none daring to open his Mouth. How then dare your Officers without Doors represent to you frankly every thing which their Zeal prompts them to? Your Majesty says, in one of your late Declarations, "When my Officers have any Representation, touching State-Matters, to lay before me, they may do it: But let them not from hence expect that I shall come into all the Measures they propose." Now, I am at a loss to comprehend, how you could resolve to express express yourself in this Manner; for surely it is not the Way to excite People to give you wholesome Advice, but rather to deter them from it. Believe me, nothing but a noble and generous Zeal can induce a Subject to give his Sovereign Advice. It is known to be a delicate Point; and even when they meet with the utmost Encouragement from the Prince, it is much, if on such Occasions, the most Resolute find not within them some Remains of Fear, which hinders them from saying All. To express yourself then as you do, is with one Hand to open a Door for Council, and to shut it with the other: So that one is at a Loss what to depend on, or which Method to chuse. The best Means you can use to procure good Council, is for you to love it really and sincerely. Wen, King of Tsi, affecting a particular Kind of Violet Colour, his whole Kingdom wore no other. A certain King of Tsi having declared that he liked slender Women, all the Ladies of his Palace fasted to get fine Shapes; and several of them died with over-fasting. Now, if a Desire of pleasing the Prince in such Trifles, could have so much Power over Women and the very Populace, how much more might not prudent and zealous Officers be influenced by a Desire to please him, and assist him with their wholesome Council, if they saw he really loved it? But, when the Heart is not so disposed Words are useless, nor can Appearances deceive.

Tay tsong, having perused this Remonstrance, answered it with his own Hand, in the following Terms; viz. — “ I have attentively read over your Discourses, from Beginning to End: It is throughout both, solid and pressing; in short, it is such as I expected from you. I am sensible of my own Want of Virtue and Capacity. I cannot think on our glorious Monarchs of ancient Times, without extreme Confusion. Had I not such stout Rowers (*), how could I safely cross so wide a River? How can we, without salted (†) Mey-tse, rightly give a Sauce the five Relishes? As a Token of my Satisfaction, I make you a small Present of 300 Pieces of Silk.”

The Emperor Kang hi, greatly commends Wey ching's Discourse: Divers Authors, both antient and modern, do also speak in Praise of it. One of them compares Wey ching to Kay i and Tong chong shu, both of them famous under the Han Dynasty. “ They were all one and the same Person (A) (says this Author) the only Difference between them, is the different Ages wherein they flourished.”

In the eleventh of those Years styled Chin quan, (B) the Emperor Tay tsong undertaking to build a great Palace at Fey shan, the same Wey ching dissuaded him from it, by a Remonstrance made on that Occasion.

HE introduces it with an Account, from History, of the unhappy Catastrophe of several Princes, attributing all to their foolish Extravagance. He dwells most on the Dynasty of the Swi, which was of a very short Continuance, and to whom the Tang Dynasty had but lately succeeded. He gives Tay tsong to understand that he is taking the same Road, wherein the others lost themselves. —

“ The People (pursues he) have only changed one tyrannical Government for another, not much unlike it. By pursuing this Course, you may arrive at the same Point. The least that can possibly happen is, you will leave to your Descendants a rifled exhausted Empire, with a Load of Maledictions from their Subjects. Now, the Groans and Execrations of a People bring down the Wrath of the Shin upon both Prince and State: This Wrath is followed by fresh Calamities; Public Calamities naturally cause Troubles and Commotions. There are but few Princes who have not a Love, either for Reputation or for Life: How comes it to pass, that you take not this into Consideration?”

HE begins with telling him, as in the preceeding ones, that his Majesty is no longer the same Person he has been; that he is become haughty, &c. And after animadverting to him, that if it be the Water (‡) which bears up the Bark (§), it is likewise the Water which swallows it up, he proposes to him ten Points whereon to meditate, according to as many different Situations, in which his Heart might chance to find itself.

Does a Prince (says he) find vast Desires grow in his Heart? It behoves him to remember this Sage Maxim, so useful to all Men, and so very necessary for Sovereigns; Learn to be content with what suffices. — Does the Exigence of Affairs require some military Expedition? We have another Maxim, which on that Occasion he should weigh with Attention: Know when to stop seasonably. As the End and Motive of this Expedition are to restore Order, when Order is once restored, then is the Season to stop. — Is he tempted to study how he may distinguish himself? Does he, with such View, meditate some Enterprise? Let him think, That nothing is more glorious to a Man, and especially to a Sovereign, than Humanity and Moderation, which give him the Mastery over himself. — Does he find rising in his Heart, any Motions of Pride and Haughtiness, which his high Rank and Dignity have inspired? Let him reflect, That the greatest Rivers, and the very Sea itself, are lower than the smallest Brooks, without losing their Advantages. —

In his rural Diversions, let him never forget the antient Rule, of inclosing the Game on three Sides only (*). If Indolence or Laziness attacks him, let him call to Mind the Saying: To begin well is of no Signification, except you likewise end well. — If he perceives or fears, that Matters of Moment are, or will be, concealed from his Knowledge: Let him thoroughly examine his Heart; let him utterly banish thence, all Prejudice, all Humour and Caprice, all particular Affections and Aversions; in a Word, let there be a perfect Vacuum: He then will never want zealous and faithful Subjects, who will acquaint him with whatsoever it concerns him to know. With regard to the Care he ought to take, to prevent wicked Men from imposing on him with Calumnies and false Reports; the most effectual Method is, To be himself so virtuous, that wicked Men dare not approach him. In the Distribution of Rewards, let not a Fit of Good-humour carry him too far; and when he is to inflict Punishments, let not Anger have any Part therein.

In the first of those Years styled Shin kong, (A) the Empress Vû hew, greatly harassing her People, in order to preserve, and push farther, certain Conquests, Tyen jin kye, made her the following Remonstrance.

I HAVE constantly heard it said, That Tyen hath placed the Barbarians in the Regions absolutely distinct from our Territories. The Empire under our ancient Princes, was bounded by the Sea, Eastwards; Westward, by Lew ma; Northward by the Desert Ti o no; and its Southern Bound, was what goes by the Name of the Uling (†). These were the Barriers which Tyen had set between us and the Barbarians. It appears from our Chronicles, that diverse Lands, into which our three first famous Dynasties never introduced either their Knowledge or their Arms, are now Part of your Dominion. Your Empire is not only far more extensive than those of the Ing and the Hya (‡), but it even surpasses that of the Han. And does not all this satisfy you? Why should you carry your Arms beyond them, into barbarous and uncultivated Countries? Why should you drain your Treasuries, and harass your People, by attempting needless Conquests? Why will you prefer, to the solid Glory of Governing a flourishing Empire in Peace, the vain and imaginary Honour of constraining a few Savages to wear Caps and Girdles?

Sbi wbang, under the Tsin, and Vû ti, under the Han did so: But our five Ti (§), and our three Wang, never did any thing like it. Now, to prefer the Examples of Sbi wbang and Vû ti, to those of our most illustrious ancient Monarchs, is to hold the Lives of Men as nothing, and make you hated by all your Subjects. Sbi wbang himself, ought to be a warning to you: The Fruit of all his Exploits was, that his Son lost the Empire. Vû ti, one of the Han, imagined, that by the Hoards his Predecessors had left, he might extend his Dominions. He undertook four Wars successively, and maintained them well enough; But his Treasure being quite exhausted, he was obliged to burden his People, and the Misery soon became general: Fathers sold their Children, Husbands, their Wives; infinite Numbers perished thro' mere Want, and Robbers, in numerous Bands, swarmed in every Quarter. At length, Vû ti opened his Eyes, and giving over his military Designs, applied himself to the peaceable Government of his Empire; and, to convince the whole World of his Repentance and Intentions, in nominating Hew (||) to be his Prime Minister, the Title he conferr'd on him was, Fû min hew (‡). This Alteration in Vû ti, procured him the powerful Assistance of Tyen. One of our old Proverbs says, A Coachman fears being over-turned, where he has seen another over-turn. The Comparison, tho' somewhat low, may, for its Sense, be applied to what is ever so great.

He next lays down at large, the vast Expences of a War; and concludes, with exhorting the "Empress, "not to go to seek those Pisnires in their Holes, but only to keep the Frontiers well "guarded."

The same Empress Vû hew, whom her imperial Consort left Regent at his Decease, set aside, and banished the Heir to the Crown, then a Minor. She, long after, recalled him, on a Remonstrance made her on that Occasion, by Sû ngan heng: But, as she still continued ruling singly, tho' far advanced in Years, without saying a Word of restoring the rightful Prince, who was of fit Age to govern, she sayed Sû ngan heng put the following Remonstrance into a little Box, and so got it privately conveyed to her Hands.

A TRULY faithful and zealous Officer, never lets his Zeal give Way to the Times, either in Hopes of gaining the Sovereign's Favour, or thro' a criminal Fear of losing it. A real Philosopher, does not, thro' Apprehension of Death, or Desire of Life, omit doing what is actually his Duty. When, therefore, a Prince's Conduct appears faulty, there is Reason to impute it, partly to his great Officers taking no notice thereof. The late Emperor, on his Demise, (*) intrusted to you, jointly with the Prince his Heir, the Government of the Empire. But, alas! Even under Tau and Shun, there were found a Kong kong, and a Quen. Certain Discontents have occasioned a Division, between your Majesty and that young Prince; which I attribute to the Unhappiness of the Times, but others, to your Ambition. "The Express, say they, wants to dethrone the Li (*), and transmit the Empire to some other Family: Else, considering her great Age, why does she not suffer her Son to reign?"

That which I myself say, and which seems to me to be Fact, is, that your Court swarms with Sycophants, and the Door is shut against wholesome Counsel. As the Empire is attacked by Barbarians, and your People suffer at the rate they do, you will find it very difficult to preserve them, and free yourself from the present Embarrass. This Empire which you now rule over, is the same that once appertained to those illustrious Monarchs Yau and Ven wang. The Sui (†), who lately possessed it, having by their ill Conduct, become unworthy thereof, saw themselves set upon from every Quarter. While like Deer they fled, Numbers of Crows assembled: Then appeared, like an Eagle, (‡) or a flying Dragon, our illustrious Founder of the Tang; who, after he had restored a Calm in the Empire, was acknowledged as its Sovereign. He stipulated with all the Grandees, that only the Li should be made or styled Vang; and that the other Titles of Dignity (§) should not be bestowed on any, but those who had deserved them by their Services. Accordingly, he gave a few of them to such, as had served him well already. The Agreement was confirmed by Oath; nay, even Blood was drawn to that effect. If then your Majesty now fills the Throne, it is not therefore ever the less the Throne of the Tang. "A Magpy, says the Sbi king, builds her Nest, and the Bird Kyew places herself there afterwards." You are a Woman, and born a Subject; yet you are become Empress and Mistress. How comes this to pass? Doubtless, it was done with no other View, but that you should take Care on your Part to act conformable to the Designs of Tyen (or Heaven) and win People's Hearts. There was a Time, when, disgusted with the Conduct of the Heir, who had not then attained to Years of Maturity, you had Thoughts of substituting in his Stead his Brother Vang, of Syang. But, reflecting afterwards, that this Prince was the younger, and rightly fearing to ruin the Royal Family, by creating therein Trouble and Division, you wisely conformed with the People's Wishes, by recalling the rightful Heir from his Exile. This Prince is now of ripe Age; he has withall, many Virtues; he is your Son, and you are his Mother: All this notwithstanding you envy him the Station whereof he is so worthy, and withhold what is his Due.

It is a true Saying, "That those in the Provinces generally follow the Court's Example." By dealing so unjustly by the right Heir, what Sort of Example is it you set the whole Empire? What Hope is there, after this, of reforming its Abuses, of establishing good Manners, and more particularly, of propagating Tenderness and Piety in Families? With what Front dare you henceforward appear, at the Burial-Place of the late Emperor and his Ancestors? You have hitherto, indeed, reigned alone and peaceably: But know you not, that Things are never nearer their Fall, than when they have attained their utmost Perfection? That which is pow'd into a Vessel already full, runs over upon the Ground. It is often so very necessary to come immediately to a Resolution, that to make the least Delay will ruin our whole Design. For my Part, it seems to me, that both Tyen and Men, are ready to declare in favour of the Li (||).

Besides, why, at your Years (for the Water, which is almost all run out, will soon strike the Bell) (‡) why should you still, I say, fatigue yourself both Day and Night? Why do you not throw off the heavy Load of Government, and charge the Prince with it? Your Repose is absolutely concerned; and, if you are more sensible of any thing else, it also concerns your Honour. This Action will gain you the greatest Praises at present, and it solely depends on you, to have it transmitted to Posterity, by Songs and Histories. I therefore exhort you to it, as to a Thing of high Importance to the Tranquillity of the whole Empire. I am of Opinion, that I ought not to prize a short Life, and fail in Duty to my Country by a criminal Silence. I therefore intreat your Majesty, to spare a few Moments from your great Occupations, to examine at leisure these my weak Arguments. If your Majesty does me the Justice to look on me as a sincere and loyal Subject, I conjure you, without Delay, to do what I propose. But, if you ascribe my Remonstrance to any other Motive than that of my Zeal, and are thereat offended, it is in your Power to punish me for it, and, at the Expence of my Head, to convince all your Subjects that you cannot bear the Truth.

For the better Understanding of the foregoing Peice, it is necessary to subjoin what follows.

Vu bew, was originally a Girl of mean Condition; it is even say'd that she was a Slave: But Kau tsong, became so greatly enamoured with her, that he made her Empress. When he was dying, he appointed a Successor, who was already of some Age: However, he declared at the same time, that it was his Will the Empress should govern in Conjunction with his Son. This Prince being married, grew very fond of his Father in Law, whom he advanced, and enriched to such a Degree, that all the Nobles made him on the Occasion pretty home Remonstrances, which were received very ill by the Prince, and caused no change in his Conduct. The Lords then addressed themselves to the Empress, who laying hold of this Opportunity to reign by herself, banished her Son at a great Distance from Court. Many People however were displeased with this Proceeding; but the Grandees having been disgusted with the Prince, had themselves, selves set on the Empress, who besides was very much dreaded. Thus the Exile and Disgrace of the Prince continued for several Years, and the Empress governed alone.

Sü ngan beng, lay on the Watch for a proper Opportunity, which having found, he advised the Empress to recall the Prince, and restore him to his just Rights. The Empress consented to it, and the Prince returning to Court, was declared Successor as before; but that was all, for she still retained the whole Authority. As the Prince was of a mature Age, and seemed to have amended his Faults, every one murmured at the Empress for not resigning the Government, which right belonged to him: But none was bold enough to speak to her, for fear of her Resentment; Besides, she was so besieged by certain Flatterers, who were her Favorites, that it was very difficult to get a Petition conveyed to her. However, Sü ngan beng more courageous than the rest, and encouraged by the Success he met with the first time, found means to inclose the following Remonstrance in a Box, which none but the Empress herself was to open.

The Empress dissembled: But still let Things remain as they were. At length, falling sick, the Grandees took that Occasion to address the Prince to mount the Throne. On his agreeing to the Proposal they told him, the first thing he had to do was to put to Death the two Favorites of the Empress, in whom she put most Confidence. The Prince consented, and marching to the Palace with some Troops, seized those Ministers, and struck off their Heads. The Empress being informed hereof, demanded by what Authority, they came with Force, to take and put her People to Death? She was answered, they had done it by the Prince's Order, and that he was present. The Empress then said, without discovering the least Concern, these two Men had offended him, and he was resolved to punish them. I am well enough satisfied, let him retire to his own Palace. (*) To which it was replied, that, to obey her orders was not convenient; that she being so old and infirm, could no longer take that Care on her, which such a vast Empire required: That it was time for the Prince to assume the Government, and that they entreated her to approve thereof. As she was not in a Condition to oppose it, she was obliged to give her Consent, and a few Months after died.

In the sixth of those Years, named Tali, the Emperor Te tsong (A), published the following Declaration.

TO be a Sovereign, is to have received from T'ien (Heaven), an Order to subvert the People. For this Reason, a good Prince loves his Subjects, not only as his Children, but even as his own Person. He takes Care to feed the Hungry, and cloath the Naked, and yet he thinks he has not done too much, nor is his Goodness satisfied; it always employs his Heart, either in the Care of rendering his Subjects happy, or in the Grief and Confusion of not having fully succeeded. In good Times, his Granaries are in the Hands of his People, and all his Subjects are at their own Ease: The old Men want for nothing, and without Troubles or Disquiets, they see their Children's Children multiply. The Averages are few and easy. The Rule of which our antient Princes laid down, was, three Days Work of a Man in a Year for each Family. In short, when Peace and Harmony obtains in a State, it is easy to promote Virtue there likewise: Alas! I have been burthened with the Government these eight Years, yet I have not been able to reach, or even come near, this. But this is not owing, notwithstanding of my Defect in Virtue, to my not doing all that lies in my Power for that effect, and to my not wishing if I could, to do more. But the Irruptions of the Barbarians, and the Troops that must be kept on foot to secure our Frontiers, and other necessary Expences, have put me out of a Condition to relieve my People, and have obliged me sometimes, even to load them with new Taxes. There has been one continued Succession of Inundations and Droughts. We cannot say, that we have had one plentiful Year. The Husbandmen abandon the Fields; Fathers sell their Children; and the High-ways are full of poor People, whom Necessity have obliged to leave their Country and their Relations. It is not so much their Fault as mine, that thus they forget all their most natural Sentiments. I have neither Skill enough to prevent their Necessities, nor Virtue enough to inspire them with the Courage and Patience which these Extremities require. This gives me real Grief, and the greatest Confusion: Night and Day I think of nothing else. Till such time as I can relieve my People, as the Territory which depends upon this Court has suffered most, I free it for one Year, of all its Averages, and all its Taxes. And I ordain, that my Officers should fall upon some Method, for the Relief and Support of the Poor.

On Occasion of the Rebellion of certain Chu ché, the Emperor Te tsong, travelled into Lyau tong.

The Army of Rebels was defeated, their Chiefs were taken, and upon the Emperor's resolving to publish an Indemnity, the Soothsayers told him, that the Royal Family was still threatned with some new Misfortunes: And that in order to avert them, it was necessary to change somewhat in the present Names and Titles. The great Men proposed, that he should add a Word or two to his own Surname, and Lû ché, as the only Person who opposed it.

SIR, said he, addressing himself to the Emperor, all these Surnames and pompous Titles, are not of ancient Usage. To assume them even in the most flourishing and happy Times, would discover a Want of Modesty. But to encrease them at so melancholy a Juncture as the present, would be very improper, and might be very hurtful. If you are positive to regard what these Soothsayers pretend, I mean, what they say with Regard to changing the present Titles and and Surnames, it would be better, instead of increasing your own, which would render you odious, to testify your Respect for the Advice which Tyen has given you, by retrenching them.

(*) The hereditary Prince, has his Palace a-part to the East of that of the Emperor: And Tong kong, which signifies the Eastern-Palace, is a common Expression to denote the hereditary Prince.

The Emperor took the Advice of Lû ché very well, and resolved to change only the Name of the Years. And then he caused to be shewed to Lû ché, a Declaration minuted by a Secretary of State, and asked his Opinion of it.

Sir, answered Lû ché, The Actions of a Sovereign, are what properly and effectually touches the Heart. Discourses are commonly empty, and, if they are not well executed, they have not the least effect. While you publish a Declaration in such Circumstances, you cannot appear too modest, you cannot too much aggravate your own Failings, nor show too earnest a Desire of reforming yourself. The Emperor agreed to this, and ordered Lû ché to draw a Declaration up, which he did in the following Terms.

Declaration of the Emperor Te tsong, drawn up by Lû ché.

THE best Means by which a Prince ought to govern aright, and promote Virtue in his Empire, are, a sincere Affection for his Subjects, a generous Self-denial in their Favours, a continual Care to correct his own Defects, to repair the Faults he has committed, and to press to Perfection: Ever since I mounted the Throne, to which I succeeded by my Birth-right, there has scarce been any thing but Troubles. These Troubles have obliged me, sometimes to neglect the ordinary Ceremonies with Regard to my Ancestors; and have so much taken up my Mind, that I have not, as I ought, employed myself to acquire Virtue. While with Grief I reflected over and over again, upon these first Years of my Reign, which I have employed so ill, it is time, said I to myself, it is time to begin to repair them, by publicly acknowledging that I have lost them, by laying open, without disguise, the melancholy Effects of my bad Conduct; and by expressing a sincere Desire, to observe a better, in Times to come.

My Ancestors, these illustrious Founders of our Dynasty Tang, after having, by their Valour and their Virtue, delivered the People from Oppression, and given Peace to all the Empire, established an admirable Order. In this, they were assisted by a great Number of excellent Officers in all Ranks, whose Zeal they wisely animated, and whose Services they generously rewarded. Things being put upon so good a footing, continued there; and behold! at the End of 200 Years, (*) you succeed to your Ancestors in their Posts, and to my Father in his Throne. Ever since my Accession, my greatest Fear has been, lest I should fall short of their Wisdom and Virtue; and to do my utmost to imitate them, has been my constant Resolution. But being educated by Women in the Heart of a Palace, till I was pretty well grown up; I at this Day, feel the Effects of an Education, so unsuitable to a Prince. Being quite ignorant of the Affairs of Government, I entered into Possession of a peaceful Empire: But I have not had skill enough to prevent that which may disorder it: Unacquainted with the Fatigues of Husbandmen, unmindful of the Hardships of Soldiers, I have not imparted as I ought, the Effects of my Bounty to either the one or the other of these Professions; by this, I have given them a Right to doubt of my Affection, and a Handle to treat me with Indifference. Besides, instead of employing myself in acknowledging my Defects, I have undertaken useless Wars upon slight Grounds. There has been nothing but the Motions of Troops, of Convoys, and Recruitings. I have increased the ordinary Taxes. Here, I have exacted Chariots, there, Horses. There is not a Province in all the Empire, but what has suffered by these Proceedings; My Officers, and my Soldiers, after being obliged to fight several times in one Day, have spent whole Years, without laying aside, either their Head Pieces or their Armour; far from the Burying-places of their Ancestors, far from their afflicted and forlorn Wives. My People being obliged to leave the Lands without Culture, for continual Averages, have been over-whelmed at once, with Toil and Misery, and reduced to wish for Death, under the Hands of an Executioner, rather than for such a Life.

Mean time, Tyen, above me, gave me frequent Advices, by chastising me; yet I cannot profit by it: Below, Men are breaking out into Murmurings, of which I am not inform'd. Thus Misery increased by little and little, till a rebellious Subject has endeavoured to take the Advantage of this Disorder, and has pushed his Insolence to the utmost Excesses. Forgetful of all shame and dread, he has spread Tumults thro' all. The People and the Nobles, have all suffered by this; and he has carried his Boldness so far, as even to insult the Tombs of my Ancestors. I am the more sensibly concerned at this, as I myself have been the Occasion of it: And I never think of it, without the greatest Confusion, and the most lively Grief. Thanks to the Protection of (+) Tyen ti, which comes from on high, the Shin and Men, united themselves in my Favour. My Ministers, and my Generals, have unanimously done their utmost, to show their Zeal and their Abilities; my Forces have served me well: The Rebel is defeated, and taken. I must now endeavour to remedy the past Evils. It is for an Introduction to this, that I publish the present Declaration.

While I am incessantly employed in remembering my past Faults, my Officers of all Ranks, without (*) He addresses his Discourse to the great Officers.

(+) I have not as yet translated Tyen, which has occurred frequently by itself, and is again to be met with in this Piece. He seems to have determined the Sense of the Word Tyen in the first Line of the Emperor Te tsong's Declaration p. 527. Here, and in other Passages, the Character Ti, which commonly signifies the Earth, is joined to it. As I have always left the Reader to judge of the Sense of Tyen, by that of the Passages with which it is connected, I likewise leave him to judge of the Sense, which it is proper to affix here, and in other Passages, to the Characters of Tyen and Ti, when joined together; and if it is better to make Lû ché say, that the material Heaven and Earth, powerfully protect; and that the Protection of the material Earth, comes from on High; or to understand the Figure in the same Sense as the Expression Chau ting, which literally implies the Court and the Hall, or, the Hall of the Court, signifies the Emperor; and Tong kong, or the Eastern Palace, signifies the Hereditary Prince &c.

without excepting the greatest, in all the Writings they address to me, outvye one another in giving me new Titles: I have never accepted of them: I never wish'd for them. I have only been so complaisant, as to allow, some Days ago, that upon the Advice of the Soothsayers, a certain Affair might be taken into Consideration. But reflecting seriously upon it yesterday, I found myself seized with Dread. Alas! Said I to myself, to (*) penetrate, to comprehend, and as it were, to incorporate with the most impenetrable (+) Ing yang, is to deserve to be called (+) Sbin: To unite one's Virtue with Tyen ti, is to deserve to be called a ($) Sbing. Can a Man, without understanding like me, support these Titles? To govern peacefully and successfully, to promote good Order over all, is what we call (||) Wen. To know the proper Management of Arms, in order to maintain, and establish a happy Tranquillity in the State, is what we call being (+) Warlike. Can these Epithets agree with me? Yet, these are the magnificent Titles, my Officers lavish upon me in their Writings. If, notwithstanding my Unworthiness, I should accept of them, should I not therefore render myself still more unworthy? And would not that be a new Subject of Confusion for me?

I therefore forbid, that henceforth any one, be who he will, either at the Court, or in the Provinces, in their Petitions, or other Writings, should give me the Titles of Sbin, Sbing, Wen, Vu. Man, who is subject to so many Passions, is likewise subject to Inconstancy: Sometimes he follows Virtue, sometimes Vice. Both one and the other, greatly depend upon the different Juncures, in which the Person is: And when the Prince, by his Wisdom and Example, does not promote Virtue, we need not then wonder, that Disorders and Villanies are very frequent. If therefore I, who hitherto have not known how to give my Subjects the Instructions and Examples I ought, should treat with Rigor, all those who have committed Faults, it would be a Kind of Injustice, or at least, too great Severity in me. After this, I would not dare to allow myself to be called the Father and Mother of my People, a Title so essential to a Sovereign.

I therefore design, in the Beginning of this Year, to renew myself, and to pardon what is past: The Year, which now commences, and according to the ordinary Course, ought to be called the fifth Kyen chong, shall be called the first Yuen bing. And I give an universal Indemnity, for all Faults that have been committed until the first Day of the said Year. Li bi hye, Tyen ywe, Wang, U sun, are Persons, who formerly did great Services; some in the Cabinet, others in the Field: I have not been able to gain them: My Conduct towards them, has inspired them with Distrust and Uneasiness: They have shared in the last Commotions: But their Faults, tho' grievous, are nothing in Comparison of mine. It is a common Thing, when a Prince goes astray, that his Subjects should go astray likewise. Have I really been an Emperor? What Effects of my Power and my Goodness have been felt? But it is time that they should be felt, and that all the Empire should be acquainted with the Effects which my Repentance hath had upon me, and the benevolent Inclination with which it inspires me: I pardon Li bi hye, and the three others: I even give them a full Pardon: I re-invest them in their former Ranks; and I will treat them henceforward, as if nothing had happened. (*) Cbu lau, is the Brother of Cbu tse: They are both together at present, in Prison: But they were far distant from one another, when Cbu tse rebelled. It has not been proved, but that the younger of these two Brothers, was first acquainted with the Designs of the elder. Otherways, I would carry my Goodness as far as it would go. But without any further Examination, tho' he helped his Brother, and by that committed a very great Crime, yet, I willingly grant him time to reform.

As for the Troops disbanded, towards the North and South of (+) Whang bo, all I require of them is, that they retire to their former Posts, by the ordinary Roads, without offering any Violence or Harm to any one whatsoever. As for Cbu tse, he is an ungrateful perfidious Villain. He has joined the greatest Insolence to Rebellion and Perfidy. He has committed Outrages, he has plundered and demolished the Tombs of my Ancestors, so that I dare not pardon him: Such as have joined him in his Rebellion, whether People or Soldiers, great or inferior Officers, as they have been deluded by his Artifices, or forced into his Measures by his Violences; if they return to their Duty, no farther Notice shall be taken of them. Talents are differently disposed of. A Man, who cannot succeed in one kind of Business, may do Wonders in another. But as the Architect who plans a Building, heaps up Materials of all Sorts: In the same manner, a Prince, who lays out great Projects, does not confine himself to Persons of one Kind; and he rejects no Man, who can be good for any one thing. Far less should he reject for ever, those who being otherways Men of Merit, have had the Misfortune to make some Slip, by which they have lost their Posts: Provided they become Wise at their own Expences, they effectually reform, and therefore ought to be the Object of my Clemency. If therefore, among those antient Officers, whether great or small, who for slight Offences, have been degraded, broke, or even banished, any one is found, in whom a rare Talent, or an uncommon Capacity is discover'd; let such be presented to me, and I will dispense with the common Rules, by giving them new Posts, according to their Qualifications.

(+) The Name of a River. Ho, signifies a River, Whang, Yellow; which implies, that its Waters are tinged yellow by the Land thro' which they run.

All you brave Officers of my Army, whose Zeal and whose Valour have been long unshaken, have lately given greater Proofs than ever of both, by so seasonably flying, either to defend the Capital, or to Lyau tong, to make head against the Rebels. Never shall I forget, either your toilsome Marches, or your generous Combats. I know well, how much both the State and my Family owe to you. I want to eternise the Memory of your Services, by honouring your Families, and giving you Lands and Revenues. Such of the Soldiers who signaliz'd themselves upon the late Occasion, should likewise have some Distinction. If any amongst them, has unhappily committed any Fault that is criminal, let his Punishment be diminished three Degrees below what the Law ordains. I grant to their Sons and Grand-sons, the Diminution of two Degrees. To die generously in Defence of one's Prince and Country, is a thing which our ancient Sages have much esteemed. To gather together the Bodies and the Bones of the Dead, in order to pay them the last Duties, is a thing recommended by the Book of Rites. These two Kinds of goods Works, tho' each of a different Species, have for their Principle a just and a tender Compassion. We ordain and enjoin the Magistrates of the Cities of all Ranks, that, if within their Jurisdiction, any Officers of War die in our Service, they carefully look for their Bodies, and cause them to be transported immediately to the Place of their Departure: And there if they have no Families, that the Magistrates shall honourably discharge their Burials, and the Ceremonies Tsi, according to the Custom; That they proportionally act in the same Manner towards those, whose Bodies or Bones are yet upon any Field of Battle: That the Magistrates of the Neighbourhood shall gather them together, and bury them decently.

The Necessity of keeping up our Troops in the Field, has harrassed our People for the Convoys. The Villany of some Commissaries, has likewise very much encreased their Yoke. At present, since my Exigencies are not so pressing, I am willing, not only to diminish these oppressive Averages, but to make them a little amends for what they have suffered, I ordain, till I can do better for them, That the Taxes upon Marches, upon Buildings, upon Wood, upon Canes, upon Tea, upon Varnish, and upon Iron, be henceforth abolished. And because the Territory depending upon our Court, has suffered more than all the rest, as it is the Place which the Rebels have over-run, ravaged, and burnt: I remit to it, the half of the Summer Taxes. In that Part of these Territories where I halted with my Army, when I marched out against the Rebels, the Inhabitants of the Place provided every thing in great Order: This was a great Relief to my Troops. In that Spot let a Banner be erected, which may inform all the World of my Faults, and of their good Services. Let Fong tyen, which was hitherto but a Town, be a City of the third Order, and bear the Name of Chi; and let all its Dependances be exempted for five Years, from all Imposts.

The first Principle of a wise Government is, to honour Virtue; Earnestly to search for Men of Virtue and Merit, is the chief Duty of a Prince: These are Maxims universally received in all Ages: I call them to Mind, and meditate upon them Night and Day: With Grief I see that instead of pure Virtue, Artifice and Contention prevails yet chiefly at my Court. Shall this then be the Age, in which there are no more truly wise Men. Doubtless, they are not extinct; but they have retired, and have no Regard to my Words. They observe my Conduct, and probably that prevents them from appearing; therefore this Day, I earnestly recommend it to all the Magistrates of my Empire, that each in his own District, should observe, if there are not some one of these wise Men who bury in a Retreat, a sublime Virtue and rare Talents; who contented with genuine Virtue, practise it in Private, without Shew or Ambition. Let me be acquainted, without failing, of as many of these wise Men as shall be discovered. I shall take Care to invite them according to the Rites, and will omit nothing to engage them in my Service.

Likewise, if any one, whoever he is, is discover'd to possess an unshaken Uprightness and Sincerity, which qualifies him freely to represent to me, what ever is for the common-Good; a profound Knowledge of our antient Monuments, which may render him capable of labouring with Success to reform the Manners of the People; or a singular Genius for War, so as easily to become a General; I will, that all such be presented to me.

In like Manner, I enjoin all Magistrates to keep an exact List of all Orphans, old Men, Widowers and Widows, and other Persons who are destitute of Support, and are not in a Condition to earn their own Livelihood; and let them be relieved according to their Necessities. We likewise enjoin the two first Officers of each City, to appear in Person, at the Gate of the House of every old Man who is above ninety Years of Age, in order to inform themselves of their Health and their Wants. If any Man or Woman shall excell in the Virtue proper to his or her State, more especially if a Woman shall distinguish herself by Modesty, or a Child by filial Piety: Our Intentions is, that a Banner be erected at their House, and that all their Lives, they shall be exempted from such Averages as are least dispensable.

It is the Quality of War to drain a State, it therefore behoves us at present, more than ever, to live frugally and soberly. I design to set an Example of this, by circumscribing myself for the Benefit of my Subjects. Of all my Tributes and ordinary Taxes, I shall only exact so much as is just necessary for the Support of my Troops, and to defray the Ceremonies regulated with Regard to my Ancestors. I absolutely remit the rest to my Subjects; being sorry and ashamed by reason of the Lowness of my Exchequer, that I am not in a Condition to satisfy my Inclination, by giving them more ample Rewards, and greater Largesses. Moreover, if in these our present Letters, any thing has escaped our Attention, which may render the Benefit of our Amnesty in complete;

complete; I ordain the great Officers of our Court and Provinces, to draw up an exact Memorial of what they conceive proper to be added. In the mean time, we declare, that whosoever after the publishing of these Presents, shall presume, either in Justice, or otherways, to reproach any one of a Fault for which he has our Pardon, such a one shall render himself criminal, and incur the Penalty due to that very Fault. If either in the Mountains, or elsewhere, any Arms are stored up or concealed; we ordain, that they shall be produced in the Term of 100 Days, under the Pain of being treated as guilty of Rebellion. In short, as by the antient Regulations, those Declarations, that carry an Indemnity in them, shall be forwarded at the Rate of (*) fifty Leagues in a Day: We Will, that the same Regulations be observed in this Case; to the End, that the Extremities of the Empire may be the sooner informed of it.

[A Gloss.] This Declaration caused a general Joy all over the Empire: Particularly in Shang tong; it so much affected the Officers of War and the Soldiers, that they shed a great many Tears.

The (†) first Years of Te tsong's Reign, being troubled with several Commotions, and that Prince attributing the Fault to himself, in a Conversation he had with Lu ché: The latter talked to him in the following Terms.

GREAT Sir; I am very far from blaming your Modesty. In this you imitate our greatest Princes Tau and Shun. Permit me, however, to inform you of the Conduct of your Ministers, who disorder every thing. He then particularises Lü ki. Te-tsung modestly taking upon him the Defence of his Minister; What say you to this, says he to Lu ché: You now forget your Uprightness, you have not the Courage to attribute the present Misfortunes to me, but to others: But after all, they ought not to be attributed to Men. In all Ages, is it not well known, that the Rise and Fall of Empires, is regulated by the Order of (‡) Tyen? Lü ché retiring without making any reply: But a few Days after, he presented to the Emperor the following Writing, in which having in a lively Manner laid open the Defects of the Government, he concludes thus.

You see, Sir, what in reality causes Commotions and Rebellions. The Evil reaches farther than you imagine, and you alone are ignorant how far it extends. While rebel Troops assemble and march with flying Colours, insulting even your Palace in broad Day; there is not the least Guard at your Gates to defend them, nor even a single Sentinel who dares say who goes there? Where are these Officers, by whose Eyes you see, and by whose Ears you hear. Daunted with the Danger of which they themselves are the Cause, they neither have the Honesty to inform you of its Nature, nor Courage to check its Progress, at the Hazard of their own Life. Yes I say, and maintain it, that your Ministers are very blameable: And I dare aver it; it is likewise a Fault in you, to attribute all to the Order of Tyen. Chew, that Pattern of wicked Princes, did the same. When it was represented to him, that his Disorders and his Cruelty ruined him: It is Tyen, answered the Tyrant, who has made me Emperor, and upon him depends my Destiny. On the contrary, we find, that the Shu king makes a wise Prince speak in a very different Manner. The Author speaks as follows.

"Tyen looks upon what I do, in the same Light in which my People sees it; and Tyen hears my Words with the same Sentiments, with which they are heard by my People. All then that Tyen sees, and all that he hears, is that which passes amongst Men." One must not imagine to himself an Order of Tyen which does not relate to, or has no Connexion with the Actions of Men. Nothing is more unreasonable than to neglect ones Duties, and to impute Miscarriages naturally attending such a Neglect, to the Orders of Tyen. The Text of the I king says: Tyen is propitious; and Confucius commenting upon that Text, says; The Expression (§) Yew, signifies the same thing with the Expression Tsü. But who are they whom Tyen favours? They who are tractable and Docile. Who are they whom Men use to relieve? They in whom is seen Sincerity and Probity. To study ones self with Submission to Tyen, and never to be defective in Faith to Men, are the Means of obtaining Assistance. The I king treating of the Relation of Men to Tyen, and of the Assistance and Favours which the latter grants or denies to the former, immediately lays it down, that an Action is good or bad, to which some Good as a Reward, or some Misfortune as a Punishment, symbolically answers. Hence it evidently appears, that the Orders of Tyen with Regard to Men are not such, as that nothing depends upon Men themselves. In effect, it was never seen, that a State, wherein Reason and Virtue prevailed thro' all the Degrees of Men, was ever at the same time visited by Tyen with fatal Disorders. Neither was it ever seen, that an Empire in which Irregularity universally prevailed, has been blest by Tyen with the Enjoyment of a flourishing Condition and a profound Peace. No; never, never, was such a thing seen.

But if your Majesty has still any Doubt of what I say, behold, without going very far, how you may point out this Truth with your Finger. Ever since, by ill concerted Wars, and never ceasing Levies, the Forces of your Empire have been drained, and your Subjects alarmed and rendered distrustful; there has been nothing but suspicious Intrigues, and Cabals on all Sides. One would think he beheld the Sea tossed by the Fury of the Winds. Every body says loudly in this vast Capital, that if this continues ever so little, some melancholy Event must necessarily happen. But tell me, I beg you, are all they who talk thus, skilled in the Art of Divination? Have they these Pieces are extracted.

(‡) Heaven.

(§) Both the one and the other signifies to aid and to favour. But Tsü is more vulgar, Yew is more sublime, and may serve to denote more than human Assistance.

by the mysterious Secrets of that Art, discovered the Order of Tyen? It is plain, that they only talk from their Observation of the Minds of the People, and the present State of Affairs. In this they are in the Right. Hence, in effect, spring Commotions and Rebellions, and not from what we call the fatal Revolutions of Times.

I am well aware of what is said, that a long and a too great Prosperity, is the Forerunner of Confusion; and that out of Confusion arises Order: That there are States whose Ruin has been preceded by no Calamity; and others, amidst impending Dangers and Misfortunes, have become flourishing: All that is truth in this, instead of contradicting, confirms my Observation. For instance, How is it, says one, that Prosperity introduces Confusion? Because too much Prosperity, unless Men are upon their Guard, naturally inspires an excessive Confidence, and an indolent Security. In what Sense, says another, does Order rise from Confusion? It is, because Trouble awakens and excites Attention and Vigilance, and gives Opportunities for Men of Merit, to exercise their Talents.

To make a just Application of all this, a large Detail must be made of all the Defects and Disorders, that are the Source of the present Calamities. But it is not necessary that Things should come to this Pass; for that which I pointed out to your Majesty in the Beginning of this Discourse, is sufficient; if your Majesty thinks upon that, it will verify again at this time, that out of Confusion itself, Order may arise. There is one Method by which this may be brought about: No Severity, and much Virtue. This is the only Secret I know. In such an Extremity as Things are in at present, he who follows this Method, supports and raises himself; he who leaves it, is ruined. Every Mean amidst these Extremes is dangerous; think on it seriously. To prefer the Judgment of the Public to your private Views, to follow Reason, and not your own Inclinations, as your Guide; to banish from your Person those Sycophants, whose Hearts are yet more designing, than their Tongues are smooth; to employ Men of real Merit, to chase Dissimulation and Artifice from your Court and Councils; and in their stead, to introduce Sincerity and Uprightness, by setting the Example yourself: This is the high Road in good Government, which is easy to be known, and impossible to be mistaken. There is even no Occasion to waste your Spirits, in order to tread in it with Success. You only have Occasion for a little Resolution and Constancy, in order never to leave it. If you have these, I may boldly assure you, that you have nothing to fear, either from your Subjects, or from those fatal Revolutions to which you seem to attribute the present Calamities, and that your Reign will be glorious.

The same Emperor Te tsong, talking one Day with Lû ché, told him, "You have hitherto represented to me, that the Prince composes but one Body with his Subjects, and especially with the Officers he employs; so that there ought to be among them, no Distrust Suspicion or Reserve: And that thus the Prince ought to have, and to express a sincere Disposition, to profit by the Advices of all Kinds of Persons. I have done this, and what has been the Consequence? I know not how many Talkers have imposed upon me. They drive a Trade with their Eloquence, and seem at that Price, to buy the Right of being formidable. They put me in the wrong, whether I am so or not, and these Gentlemen always raise themselves at my Expences. You see that for some time I have dropt Remonstrances, without declaring myself with regard to what they contained. It is not from Indolence, that I have relaxed from these Cares in State Affairs." The Reason of my Silence, is what I have told you. Lû ché some Days after, presented the following Remonstrance upon that Head.

SIR: I have always heard it said, that amongst Men, there is no (*) Assistance without (+) Confidence, and no Confidence without Sincerity. Thus, all our antient Sages have held these two Virtues in singular Esteem. An ancient Tradition goes so far, as to say, That by this, all Business ought to begin and end: And without this, all Business would soon be at an end. If this Truth holds in the smallest Affairs of common Life, how much rather ought it to have Place in Affairs of State? Can then a Sovereign, whose firmest Support is the Sincerity and Uprightness of his Subjects, and especially of those whom he immediately employs, dispense with the Practice of those Virtues? Doubtless not; and permit me to tell your Majesty, that you despise them, when you think that these Virtues have done you wrong. It is a common, and in some measure, a pretty true Saying, that common People have but little Understanding: But it may likewise be truly said, that they understand a great deal in some Points: If they concern either themselves or their Duties; they frequently are mistaken, or in doubt. But when it concerns their Prince, then nothing escapes them, they perfectly well distinguish his good or bad Qualities, they see through all his good, evil, and most secret Inclinations, and publish them. They study and imitate all his Actions.

That which is true of the People in general, is still more so of the Persons, whom the Prince employs in particular. Do they see their Prince use any Artifice with them? They treat him with the same. Are they sensible that he distrusts them? They are cautious and upon their Guard; being entirely taken up with the Care of keeping themselves in Post, they give themselves very little trouble about any thing else, having no Regard for their Duty, or Zeal for their Prince, but in Proportion as he treats them with Honour and Gentleness. In short, as the Shadow follows the Body which forms it, and the Words, the Voice which pronounces them, thus, (*) Sin, signifies to believe, to trust, Confidence, Faith, Fidelity. The Context determines its Sense.

(+) Ching, signifies Sincere, Upright, Sound, Perfect, Sincerity, Uprightness. The Context likewise determines its Sense.

Thus, the Generality of those Persons whom the Prince employs, conform themselves to his Conduct. If a Prince, who is not sincere and upright, require Sincerity and Uprightness in his Officers, he may deceive them for the first time; but they won't trust him a second. No! It is only by carrying Sincerity and Uprightness to the highest Perfection, that a Prince has a Chance to find either of these Virtues in his Servants. Does an Officer of War in your Reign, actually forget what he owes to you and the State? You send others against him, who fight and extirpate him. Some one of your Ministers or other Officers, are deficient in serious Affairs: You order him to be tried. In such Junctures as these, tho' they are frequently very delicate, why should those whom you entrust with the Execution of your Orders, observe them? Why should they impartially do ready Justice upon the Guilty? Because, finding in these unworthy Subjects only Ingratitude, Art and Treachery, they find a Prince full of Gentleness, Sincerity, and Uprightness. So true it is, that it infinitely concerns one never to deviate from these Virtues. Stick close therefore, I conjure you, stick close to these inviolably. Practise them constantly; and tho' you are obliged, for that Effect, to make great Efforts, yet they will be well employ'd: And I am persuaded, you never will have cause to repent of them.

The antient Tradition says: Where is the Man who does not commit Faults? The Point is to know how to correct them. Chwang wey, in our antient Books, praising the Virtue of Ching tang, thought he paid him a great Compliment, by saying, "that he spared for nothing in order to correct himself." Ki fu, being willing to exalt the glorious Reign of Suen wang, says, that all that was defective in that Prince, was abundantly supplied by Chong shan fu, his first Minister. Ching tang, certainly, was a Prince of uncommon Wisdom, and eminent Virtue: Chong wey, who was a Man very virtuous, and very understanding, was Minister of that Prince, and ought to have known him very well; yet he did not go so far as to say, that he committed no Faults: But was satisfied with praising his Care in correcting them. Suen Wang was likewise a very great Prince. The Dynasty of the Chew was ruin'd: He had the Honour to raise it by his wise Government. Ki fu was an understanding Man, and a very good Judge of this Kind: And yet in praising his Master, he never said, that he wanted no Qualification necessary for good Government; always supposing, that his Prince would take care to supply what was defective in himself, by the Assistance of a good Minister.

Whence, I think, we may conclude, that according to the Idea of our Antients, nothing is more to be esteemed or praised, especially in a Prince, than a constant Care to correct his Failings, and to repair his Faults. They had good Grounds for judging in this Manner: For there is no Man, even from the most Ignorant and Stupid, to the most Knowing, who is not sometimes mistaken, and don't sometimes commit Faults. The Difference betwixt these two Characters is, that the former acknowledging their Faults, profit by them, and correct them; but the others, by a false Shame, seeking to cover them, and to excuse them, never endeavour to amend them, and commit still greater.

In Antiquity less remote; when Things rushed to Ruin, Flattery prevailed among Ministers, and Pride among Princes. Throwing out, as it were in Concert, that sincere Confidence which formerly prevailed, and was so strong a Link in Life, they substituted in its Place, the Grimace of Ceremony. A Man then could not approach or leave the Person of his Prince, without having recourse to mean Flatteries; but it was all Show. Men of Merit, being over upright and sincere, could not comply with this Change; and thereby suffered. The Bad, whom Interest render'd fawning, made their Advantage of this, the Sovereigns then began to be intoxicated with their Meannesses and Flatteries, and at the same time, a thousand Divisions sprung up amongst themselves, from their Avarice and Ambition. In short, it is hardly to be expressed, what Evils were occasioned then and afterwards by this affected Complaisance and artful Flattery, which unhappily undermined that honest Liberty and noble Openness, which formerly prevailed, and ought always to prevail, at the Courts of Princes.

Tay tsong, one of your most illustrious Ancestors, united Gentleness and Justice, the civil and the military Virtues, in the highest Degree. By this Wisdom and Valour, he established Peace and Order in the Empire, so that few Reigns have been more flourishing than his. But at present, what is he most praised for, and what has he been most praised for ever since his Reign? You know well, that it is his Ardour in procuring Remonstrances, and his Manner of receiving them. Is not this alone sufficient to make your Majesty comprehend, that in effect nothing is more glorious for a Sovereign, and nothing bids fairer to eternise his Memory.

Your Majesty says, that your Officers have such a way of representing Things, that whatever is good, they take care to attribute to themselves; and whatever happens wrong, to their Prince. I own this is a Fault in them; but after all, it is such a Fault, that instead of obscuring your Virtue, if you please, it may be the Means of brightning it. To admit Remonstrances conceived in these Terms, to shew no Uneasiness at them, but to let them pass current, would be a masterly Stroke in you, worthy of yourself, and tending to your Honour. Besides, what does your Majesty gain by following an opposite Course? When you reject these Remonstrances, do you hinder them from having a Run in the World? For my share, I believe it is quite otherways, and that such a Conduct in you, does not a little contribute to spread them the more. It is true, that by these Means you prevent the like coming to your Hands again; but then at the same time, you hazard your never receiving any more that are useful. Ought the Door to be shut to all Advices, for such a Trifle as that?

The truly wise Man takes care never to relax, even in the smallest Affairs: He keeps well with all, and he displeases none. The most eloquent Discourse makes no Impression upon him, if at the Bottom, it is not supported by Reason and Experience: When both the one and the other give a Sanction to any Proposal that is laid before a wise Man, he is not startled at an ill-turned Period, or a homely Expression. Does he find a Man that agrees with his Views? He does not, for all that, conclude, that he is in the right. Does another differ from him? He does not therefore conclude, that others are in the wrong. He does not suffer himself to be dazzled with what is extraordinary and singular, so as to embrace it; nor to be so much prepossessed with what appears vulgar and homely, as to reject it entirely for that. A Person makes a Discourse to him, which appears empty, and without any Tendency, and that too in very harsh Terms: Yet he does not presume immediately to pronounce, that he is impertinent. Another lays down his Proposal in very smooth, plausible, clear Words, and the Advantage accruing by it, appears to him considerable and certain: And yet he is not very forward in assuring himself that he is an able Man, and that he must follow what he proposes. He examines every thing at his own Leisure: He weighs every thing maturely: After which, he takes what is best from every one. It is by observing this Method, that a Prince may promise himself, that he shall never be ignorant of any thing, that it imports him to know.

On the other hand, Propositions which are dangerous to all Mankind, are much more so to a Prince. The most common may be reduced to four; namely, that of an extravagant Confidence, that of Suspicion, that of Contempt, and that of Passion. Is a Prince abandoned to the first of these? He approves every thing that is told him by any one, be who he will, without examining it very close; and this Approbation frequently has dangerous Consequences. On the contrary, is a Person suspected? He may well propose fine things, and support them with solid Reasonings; but as his Intentions are suspected, these Reasonings have no Weight. Is a Man undervalued? Whatever he proposes is despised, and frequently he himself ruined. Is a Prince possessed with a strong Passion for any thing? Every worthless Wretch, who can be a Tool to his Passion, is raised to Dignity and Posts. A Prince, thus following Passion and Prejudice in Defiance of Reason, becomes hateful to Men of Probity and Virtue, who no longer care to serve him. How then can he succeed in governing right?

It is a good Subject's Duty, to endeavour to render himself useful to his Prince. His Inclination and Interest in this, go Hand in Hand with his Duty. Therefore, he desires to be near the Person of his Prince, to be known to him, and to make him acquainted with his Views. Princes, on their Parts, commonly endeavour to know their People thoroughly. However, it frequently happens, that a Man of Merit finds it difficult to gain Admittance to his Prince, who on the other hand, has oftentimes no less Difficulty, to be perfectly acquainted with those he employs. Whence proceeds this? From nine Faults; of which, six relate to the Sovereign, and three to the Subject. 1. A Desire to overbear every body upon all Subjects. 2. To make a Show of Wit. 3. A Spirit of Contradiction and Wrangling. 4. His hating to hear Truth. 5. The having too severe a Haughtiness, or 6, too violent a Temper. These are the six Faults relating to the Prince; and these produce three on the Part of the Officers. 1. Artful Flattery. 2. An interested Reserve. 3. A cowardly Meanness. These are Faults that stifle Zeal in the Subject, and are a great Hindrance to the Princes knowing Mankind; which is a Science so difficult, that it puzzled Tau himself. A Prince, subject to the Faults I have pointed out, does not fail sometimes to flatter himself, with having fathomed the Capacity or Weakness of his Officers, by an Objection which he starts, or an Answer which he draws from them. Oh! how much is he deceived!

In short, to desire to govern well, and not to make it your principal Study to gain the Hearts of your Subjects, is pursuing wrong Measures: Without this, never did any Prince succeed. But what Measures must be pursued, in order to gain the Hearts of the Subjects? You must study to court, and to search for Men of Merit; you must even make Advances to them, in order to bring them over to your Service. I say you must court and search for Men of Merit; for if a Prince acts in the same Manner with all the World indifferently, Men of Merit will not come near him at all. Nothing then is more important for a Prince, than justly to distinguish true Merit. This is certain; but then it is no less certain, that if the Prince hates sincere Advice, and loves Flattery, he is frequently deceived. One commonly succeeds by accommodating himself to his Sovereign's Views, and by flattering his Inclinations; to oppose him, and tell him disagreeable Truths, is always a dangerous and ticklish Affair, and frequently costs the Adviser dear. It is true, there have been wise Princes, under whom the contrary has happened; and who were so far from frightening Truth away, that they always received her with Encomiums, and crowned her with Rewards: And yet, these Princes themselves, had Reason to be afraid lest the Zeal of Subjects should be too delicate in exerting themselves on that Head. How would it be under a Prince, whose suspicious ill Temper, and Transports, should prove so many Barriers to stop this Zeal?

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] As to the Principles of this Discourse, there is nothing more just, or more distinct.

In the second of the Years named Ywen ho (A), there were Complaints against the great Officers of the Provinces; they being accused of harassing the People, and extorting from them large Sums, under Pretence of some Gratuity which they were raising for the Emperor. Hyen t'ong, who then reigned, published an Ordinance, in which he very much bewail'd this Abuse. In the Conclusion of it, he absolutely prohibits all the great Officers of the Provinces to present any thing at Court, besides what was regulated, and exactly to observe the stated Times for raising the ordinary Taxes. Notwithstanding this Ordinance, which was published in the Spring, Fey kyun, who commanded in the Country of Yang yang, trusting to an Officer of the Palace, who was in his Interests, privately caused Bajons, and other Moveables of Silver, weighing upward of 10,000 Ounces, to be presented to the Emperor, who accepted of them all; but the Secret took Air. Li kyang taking up the Pen, in the Name of many others in Concert, with whom he presented to Hyen t'ong the following Memorial.

SIR: Among the great Qualifications, and eminent Virtues, which render you equal, or superior to so many of your Royal Predecessors; all your Empire, more especially, admires your singular Penetration, which gives you such an Insight into the Misery of your People, and that paternal Goodness, which incessantly engages you to relieve them. Worthless Officers abusing your Name, levy large Sums upon your People, besides the ordinary Taxes. A Present they make to you, serves as a Screen for their Avarice; for the greater Part of it goes to their own Coffers. This Disorder could not escape your Penetration; and you no sooner was appriz'd of it, than in order to apply an effectual Remedy to it, you prohibited that any thing should be presented to you, besides your ordinary Revenues, which should be collected at stated Times. Your Ordinance upon this Head, published last Spring, drew Tears of Joy from us. Your People, both when they read it, or heard it read, made loud Demonstrations of their Joy, by Feasts and Songs. We now, said one to another, we now live in the most happy Days: Let us celebrate the Virtues and Beneficence of that Prince who has reviv'd them.

Such were the Sentiments which your Ordinance, published last Spring, produced in the Hearts of your Subjects. But at present, when you have abolished it, by receiving the Presents of Fey kyun, what do you think is their Discourse? They say, that no Stress is to be laid upon your Ordinances; that you want only to save Appearances, and that the Desire of amassing Riches is your ruling Passion. What can give a greater Wound to your Virtue than this? Fey kyun, if we may judge by this Action, is far from being a good Officer: His Conduct, with regard to you, is artful. Why should he present you with that Plate, against so positive and so late an Ordinance? The most favourable Construction that can be made of such a Step, is, that he did it to sound you, that he might take his Measures according to the Manner in which you accepted of the Present. His way of Reasoning with himself would then be this; If the Emperor rejects this Present, I must act uprightly, and do my Duty; If he accepts it, this Ordinance is only for Form sake: He is pleased with what is offered him; we may act in our own Way, and behave in our usual Manner, to those who are under us. But are not such Actions and Reasonings, a Failure in Obedience, Fidelity, and Uprightness? In a word, are they not Crimes?

However, as Fey kyun is one of your greatest and most powerful Officers of War: Besides, as he possesses a Post of the greatest Importance by its Neighbourhood to Strangers; if, for these or other Reasons, your Majesty is unwilling to punish him according to Law; let us, at least, hope that your Majesty, in order to preserve your Ordinance in Force, will instruct your Subjects of the Provinces anew in your real Intentions, and, for the Credit of your Government, will be pleased to cause an express pressing Order to be issued out in Form, ordaining, that the Plate sent by Fey kyun, shall not remain in the Palace, but be instantly sent back to the ordinary Treasurers.

Hyen t'ong having read the above Memorial, at first appeared surprized, and a little touched. But soon recomposing himself, he caused Li kyang to enter, and he talked to him in the following Terms: The Multiplicity of my Affairs is such, that it is impossible for me to keep each of them present in my Memory. In effect, I have permitted Fey kyun's Present to be received, but it was merely thro' want of Reflection. As for Fey kyun, he is excusable in one Point: When he sent off his Present, my Ordinance was only yet on the Road, and had not reached him: But the Money shall, according to the Request contained in your Memorial, be paid back immediately to the ordinary Treasurers: This was actually done that same Day, and the Emperor gave an Advice, as follows, to all the Ministers of State.

Behold so many Pieces of Plate, with which Fey kyun presented me, contrary to my Orders: But as his People were upon the Road before he had received them, he is less blameable, and I pardon him. As for the Plate itself, we let you to know, that according to our Orders, it shall actually be remitted to our ordinary Treasurers.

This Declaration of the Emperor's agreeably surprized all his Ministers, who complimented one another in common, by Writings drawn up on purpose: And they learned with Joy, both at Court and in the Provinces, with how much Facility the Emperor yielded to Remonstrances.

This is the Substance of what is related in an historical Gloss, by one of the Persons, who, by order of the Emperor Kang hi, was set over the Edition of the Collection, from which these Pieces are extracted. Two Authors of Reputation are cited in the Margin, who say, that this was not the first time that Hyen tsong had issued out Ordinances, which he was not at all displeased to see broken. They speak of this Emperor, as a Prince of no Character in History, as one who was covetous of Money, and suffering himself to be guided by his Eunuchs. This last Evil, says Hsi in, was doubtless the greatest, and the Cause of the other. Ly kyang, and others, would have done much better, had they in their Remonstrances, gone directly to the Ground of the Evil: Because they did not this, their Remedies had a bad Effect.

The same Emperor Hyen tsong, having received a certain kind of a Bone, which was said to be a Bone of (*) Fo, caused it to be introduced, with Ceremony, into the innermost Parts of his Palace, where he kept it guarded with great Respect for three Days, in order to cause it to be transported solemnly into the Temple of that Sect. The People, the Literati, the Kong, and great Numbers of the (†) Vang approved of this Festival. Han yu, who was only She lang in the Tribunal of Crimes, presented the Emperor with the following Remonstrance.

SIR; let me be permitted respectfully to represent to you, that the Doctrine of Fo is, at the Bottom, a vile Sect of some Barbarians. It began to insinuate itself into our Empire, under the last Emperors of the Han; at least, it is certain, that anciently it was not known. Whang ti, it is said, reigned a hundred Years, and lived a hundred and ten. Shau hau reigned ninety Years, and lived a hundred. Chwen hys reigned 79 Years, and lived only 98. Ti ko reigned seventy Years, and lived 105. Yau reigned ninety Years, and lived one hundred and eighteen. Sbun and Tu, each lived 100 Years. Under these great Princes, the Empire enjoyed a profound Peace: Their Subjects being happy and contented, lived to a good old Age. Yet Fo and his Sect were not yet known in China: Cbing tang, the first Emperor of the Shang, likewise lived his hundred Years. Ven vang and Vu vang, the first of the Chew, lived, the one 97, and the other 93 Years. Surely it was not Fo who made them reign and live so long; for no Fo was yet known in China. Ming ti, on the contrary, reigned but eighteen Years. His Descendants were always in Trouble, and succeeded always soon to one another, and soon lost the Empire. The Worship of Fo did not end with the Dynasty of the Han; on the contrary, it increased. Notwithstanding this, in a very short time, a great many Dynasties succeeded one another, namely, the Song, the Tsi, the Lyang, and the Chin. And of all these Princes, Lyang wu ti alone reigned for a long time. This Prince, from his Bigotry to the Sect of Fo would not kill Animals, even for the (‡) Tsi of his Ancestors. He reduced himself to one Meal a Day, and that consisted of Pulse and Fruits. In short, three times during his Reign, did he debase himself to honour Fo by Meannesses unworthy of his Rank. Where did all this end? He was besieged in Tay ching, and press'd so close by Hew king, that he died of Famine, and his Empire passed into other Hands. These Princes, who have founded their Empires upon the Honours they paid to Fo, have been still more unhappy. Let us then conclude, that the Service of Fo is, at least, an useless Thing.

The illustrious Founder of our Dynasty, Tang, when he became Master of the Empire, entertained a Thought of extirpating this Sect. He put the Affair under Deliberation: But unhappily they who were in Post, were Men of a narrow Way of thinking. They were not conversant in Antiquity, and, for the most part, they were ignorant of the Doctrine of our ancient Kings, which is so agreeable to all Times: So that, instead of profiting by the good Dispositions of Kau tsu, to extirpate that Error out of China, they let the Proposal drop. How heartily do I curse them, whenever I think of this!

Your Majesty, whom so much Wisdom, and so much Valour, exalt above the most of the Princes who have reigned these many Years; your Majesty, I say, in the Beginning of your Reign, prohibited this Sect from building new Temples, and any of your Subjects from becoming a Bonza in time to come. This makes me believe, and say with Joy, that at least, under your Reign, the Designs of Kau tsu will be executed. Yet, your Orders have as yet been without Effect: This is too much Condescension already. But besides, how can you yourself annul them by running into an Extreme directly opposite? It is said to be by your Majesty's Orders, that all the Bonzas assemble solemnly to conduct in Procession one of the Bones of Fo, into the inner Part of your Palace, where you design to place it with Honour in an exalted Hall. Notwithstanding the Poorness of my Judgment, I know well that your Majesty, tho' you have given Orders about this Pomp of Worship, Processions and Prayers, is no way devoted at the Bottom to the Sect of Fo. I know well, your real Motive is; that you may render the Joy which fills all Hearts, more solemn, for this plentiful Year. Indulging this Disposition, you have a mind to give some Spectacle, or new Diversion; and for that Reason, you have permitted this Pomp of extraordinary Ceremonies.

For in short, is it probable, that a Prince, so understanding as you are, should have any Belief in that Sect? No! I am persuaded you have not; but the ignorant stupid Vulgar, are easy to be seduced, but hard to be reclaimed. When they perceive that your Majesty pays these outward Honours to Fo, they are convinced that you really honour him: And they don't fail to say; Our great and wise Emperor, giving himself so much ado about honouring Fo; why should we poor People spare our Persons and Lives? There needs no more to persuade them, by Dozens and Hundreds, to burn their Heads and Fingers. The only Contest then among them will be, who shall any Possessions.

(‡) It is said, that in their Stead, he made the Animals appointed for these Ceremonies, of Pulse.

shall soonest squander what he has, in order to take the Habit of a Bonza. At least, from Evening to Morning, the Roads leading to the Bonzaries will be filled with Pilgrims. Old and Young will be seen running thither in Crowds; and for fear of what may happen, divest themselves of what they have. They will go still farther, and if this should be prevented by rigorous Prohibitions affixt to the Bonzaries, there will be simple People enough found, who will flash their Arms and other Parts of their Bodies in honour of Fo (A).

This Abuse, you must be sensible, will be greatly prejudicial to good Morals, hurt our Policy, and render us ridiculous to all the World. But what was this same Fo? A barbarous Foreigner, whose Tongue and Cloaths were different from ours. He never was capable to speak that Language, which our antient Princes have transmitted to us: Nor did he ever wear any Cloaths made in the Fashion regulated by these great Men. He either was ignorant of, or neglected, the most essential Duties of Prince to Subject, and of Son to Father.

In short, let us suppose that this Fo were still alive, and that his Prince had deputed him in his Name, to repair to your Court to pay you Homage; how would your Majesty receive it? At most, after a short Audience, you either would treat him hospitably according to the Rites; and make him a Present of a compleat Habit, or else you would order him a Guard which should have an Eye to his Conduct, and which should convey him to your Frontiers, without allowing him an Opportunity of endeavouring to seduce your People. In this manner would you treat Fo. If he were yet alive, and sent hither by his Prince, why then should he be so much revered so many Years after his Death? Where then is the Decorum of introducing in Pomp into your Palace, and to its innermost Parts, whose Access is so severely prohibited, a rotten Bone, the sorry stinking Remains of his Carcass? Respect the Quey shin, said Confucius, but don't go near them. It has been seen in Antiquity, that Chu hew being obliged to perform a funeral Ceremony without the Bounds of his own State, was afraid of troublesome Consequences: And that in order to guard against the Badness of the Omen, he sent one of these U, who, by using the Herb Lye and other Formalities, averted the Misfortunes.

At present, your Majesty, without taking any Precaution, and without the least Necessity, draws near a rotten stinking Bone, and stops to look at it. Notwithstanding this, your Officers keep Silence, and suffer you to do it, the Tu tse themselves, who by their Employment are more oblig'd to speak, have not made the least Remonstrance. Indeed I blush with Shame. Give up, I conjure you, give up that Bone to your Officers of Justice: Let them cast it into the Water or the Fire, and thus root up the Evil. Thereby you will prevent the Progress of those Suspicions and Doubts, which you have given Rise to in your Empire, prepossess Posterity against these Errors, and verify by your Example, that Sages of the first Rate, in concerting and executing their Designs, far exceed the Generality of Mankind. Oh! How glorious and how graceful would that be in you? Oh! What a Joy would that give to me, and to every truly zealous Subject! Dread no troublesome Consequences: I take these all upon my self. If Fo really can do any thing, let him discharge all his Wrath upon me. Sbang tyen, who fees us inwardly, knows that my Sentiments answer to my Words, and that I am incapable to prevaricate. Happy should I be, if your Majesty would indulge my earnest Prayer. I should not then know how to express my loyal Gratitude.

Hyen tsong, having read this Writing, was in so great an Anger, that he designed to put Han yu to Death. But he was appeased at last by Tsui kyun, Fey tá, and some others. He was satisfied with banishing Tan yu to the Provinces, where he gave him a Post much inferior to that he had at Court.

[The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Expressions here are close and full of Honesty; and at the Bottom, reasonable and sensible. It ought to have been sufficient to have reclaim'd the first Man of the Literati of that Dynasty from the vulgar Errors, and to have given a Value for its Author.

I leave the Reader to judge, both of the Discourse of Han yu, and what the Emperor and he says of it, by which he will know in what manner the Chinese reason, when they refute strange Religions.

Ywen ching, being one of the Censors by his Office, presented the following Discourse to the Emperor.

OUR antient Kings, by establishing different Employments for the common Good, intended that each should acquit himself of his own, with Exactness and Faithfulness, and that they who failed should be cashiered, and even punished with Death. At present, amongst all the Officers of your Empire, We the Censors, without contradiction, are they who most uselessly fill some Employments at your Court, and do the least for our Appointments. It was not thus under Tay tsong: That Prince, who was the Honour of your Family, had Wang quey, and Wey ching: He had them always near his Person, even in the Time of his Diversions. He gave them so much Employment, that he formed no Enterprize, and gave no Orders without taking their Advice. Thus, what was too hard for the Capacity of that Prince, when aided by the Understanding of these two great Men? Nothing was better laid down, than the Projects that were undertaken under that glorious Reign; nothing was ever better conceived, than the Declarations and Ordinances that were then published. Tay tsong treating his Censors thus, was only afraid of making too few. When the three first Orders assembled to take some important Resolution with regard to War, he always caused one of the Censors to assist, and to make the Report to him. The great Officers, who are by their Posts, as it were, the Eyes, Ears, and Arms of their Sovereigns, had then in Tay tsong, not only a vigilant Head, but a good Father, who devoted them to his Person by a tender Generosity, and animated them to his Service by an entire Confidence. As every thing, tho' proposed by the Prince himself, was freely rejected at the Council Board if it was bad; so every thing that was good, was eagerly embraced. Thereby Success became so sure, that in less than four Years there was seen an admirable Order in the Empire: And the Chiefs of our barbarous Neighbours came themselves with their Arms to guard our Emperor. What was the Reason of so great and so ready a Success? Was it the Force of Arms? No, it was the Access which the Prince granted to his Person, it was his Manner of receiving Counsels, and the Zeal of his Officers, especially his Censors, to give him good ones.

How much are Things now changed in this Respect! All the Office of Censors, at present, is reduced to the Appearance they make in their Rank, at certain Ceremonies. But what is the Duty of their Posts by their Institution? It is carefully to observe the Prince, and to supply, by their Advices, every Failing, both in his personal and political Character. It is to propose openly, in full Audience, and in full Council, capital and essential Points, and some others in particular under their Hand and Seal. These several Years, there have been no Audiences or Councils as formerly, nor any Channel regulated for these Writings.

Behold then the Substance of the Censors Post now. When a new Order is publish'd, when any Retrenchment or extraordinary Regulation is made, if they appeared blameable to the Censors, they could under their Hands and Seals represent the Inconveniences, and propose their own Opinions. Alas! say I to my self, when I think of this, when one has even the Freedom of reasoning with the Prince upon Affairs, and to suggest to him Precautions against future Dangers; in short, when at the Council Board and in private Audiences, one labours with the Prince in the Government of the State; yet it does not fail sometimes to happen, that he has difficulty enough to make him yield and quit his own Opinion, and to keep in his Favour against Sycophants and Backbiters. How can we, by a simple Remonstrance, or by an Advice given under our Seals, cause Ordinances to be revoked after they are published, Things already established to be abolished, or draw from the Prince one of these honourable Declarations, of which we had formerly so many, and of late, so few Instances? No, that is not a thing to be hoped for. It appears so impracticable, that he who makes Remonstrances, or gives any Advice with regard to Government, is look'd on as a Knight Errant, sometimes, as an Incendary. Things being on such a Footing, I cannot, notwithstanding my Defect of Merit, hinder myself from blushing, while I uselessly fill a Post which Wang quey and Wey ching possessed under Tay tsong. If your Majesty looks upon me and my Colleagues, as Persons incapable to assist, or unworthy to approach you, we consequently are unworthy to possess the Rank we fill at your Court; we ought to be broke and banished.

But if your Majesty has put me in Post, with a Design that I should be useful: If with the same View you continue to me the Pension and Honours annexed to my Rank, I beg that you would give me an Opportunity of fulfilling its most essential Duties. Formerly, the first Censors were of the Privy Council, as much as the Prime Minister was. Besides, the first Censors were frequently about the Person of the Prince, who called them from time to time, by an express Order: He always received them with an Air of Goodness, which assur'd them, as it were, that their Advices would be agreeable. If your Majesty will be pleased to re-establish Things upon that Footing, I shall endeavour on my Part to answer your Goodness, and worthily to fulfil the Duties of my Function; I will lay before you my weak Thoughts, and perhaps I may be so happy as to propose some that may be of Use to your Service. But if your Majesty shall find nothing in them but what is frivolous and trifling, let me be punished, and die the Death of a Traytor. It would be less shocking for me, to lay down my Censorship, than to possess it on the Terms I do now.

*A Memorial presented to an Emperor under the Dynasty of the Tang, to induce him to rank (*) Han wen kong in the Number of those who accompany Confucius, in the Buildings erected to his Honour.*

THE Sages of the first Rate are glad to be known, provided their Wisdom can be useful. There is one thing admirable in this, which is, that sooner or later, they have Justice done them. Some are in Posts during their Life, and become the Glory and Happiness of their Age: After which, they are entirely, or very near, forgot. Others, who during their Life-time are neglected, are honoured after their Death: And their Memory for many Ages encreases in Fame. Confucius was of the last Sort. From the Times of the (+) Han to those of the Sui, the highest Titles that the Emperors have conferred upon him, have been those of (†) Kong or Hew. At last, under our Dynasty Tang, he got the Title of (§) Vang. The Titles of his Scholars were always changed in Proportion; being made Kong or Hew, when before they were only King or Ta fu. Tho' filial Piety has been always look'd upon, as the Virtue most capable to move Tyen ti, and to touch Quey shin; Tyen tse, whom this Virtue rendered so famous, nevertheless remained, for the Space of five or six hundred Years, among the common Rank of Disciples: And it was only by our Dynasty Tang, that he was advanced to be one of the ten (||) Ché. These were happy and charming Regulations, if ever there were any such.

In the Middle of a dark Night, if the Moon appears all of a sudden, her Splendor appears the more bright. It is the same with the Sun, where he rises from behind the thick Clouds that had long concealed him. The longer the Time is since it thunder'd last, the louder will the next Thunder be.

(*) Han kong, is a Title of Honour bestowed upon Han ju, (the Author of a Piece which we have seen above, against the Bone of Fo,) after his Death.

be. The Wisdom and Memory of (*) Cheong chi, which was neglected or despised under the (†) Cheu and the Tsin, known and respected, but in too small a Degree, under the Han, buried, and as it were extinguished under Tsin, the Song, the Cbin, and the Sui, has at last, under our Dynasty Tang, happily and gloriously, in one Day, been avenged of the Injuries of so many Ages.

If the Dead are conscious, it is easy to judge of the Sentiments, which these great Men entertain about these Changes. But our Dynasty Tang itself has had a Man, whose whole Life was employed in the Maxims of Confucius, who has displayed their Worth in his Discourses and Writings, and expressed it in his Morals and Actions: In the former, he is on a Level with (‡) Pen and Min, in the latter, with Hyew and Hya. Yet he has not a Place at the Feast celebrated in Honour of Confucius. This I think is very inconsistent with the Zeal of our Dynasty in Honour of Confucius, and inconsistent too with the Honour, which the Zeal of our Dynasty has always expressed for departed Sages. One Wen chong tse, without much deserving it, enjoy'd this Honour for a long time; and can it be denied to Han wen kong? None ever deserved it better than he did. He declared an open War with the Sects Yang, Me, Po, Lau, and singly reduced them to the greatest Extremities. He fairly and vigorously maintained the Doctrine of Confucius; he maintains it at this Day in his Writings, from whence Thousands of learned Men draw, at the same time, the same Zeal against the false Sects, the same Love of Virtue, and the same Art of governing a-right, which he himself drew from Confucius. Thus he says in one of his Works, If there had not been so great a Master as Confucius, I would not have called myself a Scholar. And surely, if he had lived with Confucius, he had at present possessed a distinguished Rank in the Monuments erected to the Honour of that great Master.

Under our Dynasty Tang, a Score of Men, famous each in his several Age, for being attached to the Books of Confucius, have been pitched upon to have a Place on that Account in the Hall, and at the Banquet of Confucius. I do not at all blame this; there is nothing in it but what is useful and reasonable: But if this Honour has been granted to twenty Persons, of whom most had not well penetrated into, or comprehended the profound Sense of Confucius: How can it be refused to Wen kong, the Glory of our Dynasty, who so well express'd it in his Conduct, and raised its Value in his Writings? I therefore beseech your Majesty to give Orders, that a Place may be assigned to this great Man; and I doubt not, but such an Order will inspire into your Subjects a new Ardour for Study and Virtue.

In the eighth of the Years named Pau ta, on occasion of some extraordinary Phenomena, the Emperor published the following Declaration.

WE find in the Book Chun tsiu, a great Number of Solar Eclipses, Earthquakes, Comets, extraordinary (§) Showers and Hail. At present, we see these extraordinary Phenomena renewed; Whether the Faults of the Princes draw them on us, or if it is the charitable Warnings of Tyen, [Heaven] whose Heart is full of Goodness; they ought equally to inspire us with a respectful Dread. With these Sentiments, upon seeing these Prodigies, I call to Mind, that formerly my Armies being in the Country of the Min and Pwe, the Officers and Soldiers there, committed great Excesses: Without respecting the Will of Tyen, or being touched with the Necessities of Men, they ruined Agriculture, and brought the People to Misery. Tho' they did this without my Orders, and against my Intentions, yet their Sin falls upon me, and I acknowledge that I am guilty. That I may testify my Repentance, and, in some measure, repair my Faults, I grant an Amnesty to all the Criminals of my Empire, and I ordain, that Care shall be taken, effectually to relieve the Poor, especially such as are destitute.

In the first of the Years called (b) Twang kong, Tay tsong, the second Emperor of the Dynasty Song, gave the Title of Vang to four of his Sons in different Provinces, where they already commanded, and addressed to them the following Discourse, which he published in form of a Declaration.

Declarations under the Dynasty of the Song.

DURING the Years named Hyen te, while the (†) Cheu reigned, I was scarce sixteen Years of Age, and followed my deceased Father, who commanded the imperial Armies, and who reduced to Obedience Yang cheu, Tay cheu, and other Places. Being early accustomed to carry Arms, I frequently fought against the Rebels, and killed many of them with my own Hand. My Brother, who during that time was employed in reducing Lü ho, being informed by my Father's Letters of my Courage and Conduct, said; It is well, we have a worthy younger Brother. At Eighteen I joined him, and was present at the famous Expeditions of Kyan quan, I cheu, and Mo cheu. My Brother mounting the Throne a little after, had two Wars successively upon his Hands, against two Rebel Officers. He marched against them in Person, he committed to me the Care of defending the Capital, and of maintaining Order through all. He returning victorious, I had the Command of his principal Troops, and the Government of Kay song. My Conduct there, during sixteen or seventeen Years, is well known. The Literati and the People, the Husbandmen and the Soldiers, all praised it, and I had the Pleasure to see the Wicked

Wicked themselves reform by my Cares. In short, during the (*) thirteen Years that I have reigned, you know how averse I have been to all Luxury and foolish Expences; you have neither seen me oppress my People by useless Expeditions, or by Voyages of Pleasure abroad, nor lead a voluptuous lost Life at home: Above all, you have seen me upright and sincere, without Affectation, and without Vanity in my Words or Conduct.

As for (†) you who are born to Royalty and Plenty, you have been delicately bred up within a Palace; and this makes me fear, that being unacquainted with the Miseries of the People, and negligent of distinguishing Vice from Virtue, you may commit a great many Faults. I have a thousand things to lay before you on this Head: But I shall confine myself to recommend to you some of the most essential Points. Know therefore, that as you are the Sons of an Emperor, you ought above all things to vanquish and curb your Passions. That you may be assisted in this, always hear with Attention, and take in good Part the Advice that shall be given you, either with regard to your Faults or Defects. Never put your Cloaths on, without compassionately reflecting how many Cares and Pains the Stuffs that you wear have cost. While you are at your Meals, reflect upon the Sweat and the Toils of the Husbandman. If you are to take a Resolution to decide an Affair, or judge in a Cause, put yourself in the calmest Disposition: No Joy, no Anger. I have a great many Affairs to go through, but that does not at all fatigue me. Was I ever seen to express either Impatience or Disgust? I give a great many Audiences: Was I ever known to shew, I will not say Disdain or Haughtiness, but not to treat every one according to his Rank, and with due Civility? Above all, I recommend to you carefully to avoid Defects, to which Princes who have Spirit and Capacity, are very liable. Don't trust too much to your own Understanding, nor despise the Advices of them, whom you believe to be less capable than yourself. It was a good Saying of our Ancestors; I look upon a Man who contradicts me, as my Master, because he wants to instruct me, and to be useful to me. But I dread him, who applauds and flatters me, as my Enemy; for he looks to his own Interest, and not to mine. Don't forget these Maxims, but practise them; and thereby you will keep your Footing and come to a happy End.

Remonstrance of Yun chu to his Emperor, with regard to three Faults which he found in him.

VENTI, one of the Han, was a Prince of singular Virtue; and yet Kya i at that time found somewhat to bewail in his Government. Vu ti, one of his Successors, had reduced and subdued all his barbarous Neighbours; and yet Sin lo and Yen ngan did not fail to inculcate upon him the Ruin of Tsin, as if he had reason to fear the same Fate. These two great Princes were so far from being angry with these Advices, that they took them very well. Thus, the Empire continued without Interruption, for upwards of ten Generations. Eul shi, the Son and Successor of Shi wabang, who was the second and last Emperor of the Tsin, and Tang ti, the second and last Emperor of the Sui, acted quite otherways; therefore they perished in a very short time. I am far from designing to compare a Prince so gentle and virtuous as you, to either of these two last. But I beg you at the same time, to examine how necessary it is, that Things should be on as good a Footing now, as they were under Ven ti and Vu ti. Towards the West, there is a Nation sometimes submissive, and sometimes jealous: You have very powerful Enemies towards the North. Both the one and the other are attentive to what passes in the Empire, and are ready to take Advantage of any Commotions that shall happen. Thus, notwithstanding of the Peace your Empire actually enjoys, your Majesty has reason to be afraid, and to block up every Inlet to the smallest Disorders.

Besides the Care of watching over the Frontiers, and of opening a Door to Advices, which I cannot enough recommend to you; my Zeal for your Glory and the common Good, obliges me to represent to you three Things. In the first Place, you are inconstant in your Government, you frequently alter your Edicts. In the second Place, you often misplace your Favours, and do not always make a right Choice of the Persons whom you employ and trust. In the third Place, you are extravagant in your Gratifications, which are commonly ill judged. There is nothing easier for your Majesty, than to shun these three Defects. It depends only upon yourself: You have no more to do, but heartily to will it; to which I exhort you, and so much the more, because it appears to me, that at last they may be attended with bad Consequences.

Let us touch a little upon each: To what do the People trust, if not to the Words and Edicts of their Sovereign? Anciently, when one was published, every body ran eagerly to read or to hear it; now-a-days it is otherways. They are coldly received. Every one who talks of them, says; This is not constant, we can't depend upon this Edict: Another very different, or perhaps directly contrary, will be soon published. In this manner People talk: This Inconstancy which renders your Edicts despicable, cannot fail to diminish, by little and little, the Respect that is due to Sovereign Authority.

I hear People sometimes reason upon this Inconstancy, and the Cause to which they attribute it is as follows. The most part of your Officers lay before you a Regulation: Beforehand they weigh its Advantages, and lay them before your Majesty; you approve of them. If another, whom you love and value, comes, and in a private Audience, puts Things in another Light, concluding that the former Regulation was by no means convenient; your Majesty immediately changes your Opinion. Therefore, when your zealous and understanding Officers see the Fruit of their Zeal and their Wisdom vanish, they cool, and are discouraged. The second Inconvenience of your your Inconstancy is this; the Sovereign alone can distribute Dignities and Posts, according to the Merits and Services of each. Things not long ago have been much changed not only the being related to the Empress, but even the Post of a Eunuch of the Palace, or the Merit of having some Connexion with them, is a Title of being advanced very quickly. This Method which has been opened one of these Years, is so well known, and so common, that it has got a Name; It is called the Within-door Way. I don't know, but that under the Reigns of some of the Dynasty of the Tang, while Women were at the Helm of Affairs, such Methods might be in Use then. But I know well, that these Reigns have been always look'd upon as the bad Times of the Dynasty; that that Method was then called the indirect Way, and that these Examples are not to be follow'd. If among the Relations of Queens, or amongst the Eunuchs of the Palace, there are found any Men of Virtue, Merit, or great Capacity, they ought to be advanced; but let it be in a quite different manner; and by the Deliberation of the Council, not by indirect sneaking Methods: These are unworthy of your Majesty, and liable to great Inconveniencies. If your Officers who see these Inconveniencies, are silent, and wink at them, that is a great Breach of the Laws. If they vigorously oppose them, that would be to put a bar upon your Goodness, and to resist your Will. To abandon the Defence of the Laws, is what zealous faithful Officers can never resolve to do: To oppose your Goodness and your Orders, is what respectful Subjects will hardly do, for fear of weakening your Authority. This is a perplexing Dilemma. Besides, I beg you would consider, that the principal thing you require of your Officers, is a perfect Equity, which is never byass'd by private Affections, or interested Views. You are in the right to exact this. But how can you obtain it, if in the Distribution of Honours and Posts, you are inconsistent with yourself. As for Gratifications, Princes ought to bestow them; for by their Means, a Prince animates his Officers to serve him well. But besides, that their Donor ought always to be tender of the common Good, there are likewise Rules to be observed in Gratifications. They must be properly made, and discreetly proportioned. But for these several Years, you have carried them to an excess. It is not rare to see you without any Reason, make large Presents, sometimes to a Domestic, sometimes to a Groom of your Bed-chamber, and sometimes to a Physician. Your Subjects know this very well, and say loudly, that your Majesty is a very bad Husband of what your Ancestors have saved, and that you will soon exhaust it all. The People indeed have not seen the inside of your Coffers; nor can they know exactly what is, or what is not there. But on the one Hand, as they are acquainted with your Bounty, so on the other, they feel themselves every Day loaded with new Taxes. Hence, they conclude, that your Exchequer is not very well furnished, and they suspect that what you seek from them, you lavish upon Sycophants. Yes! That People who saw with Pleasure, the Valour and the Services of Wang quey richly rewarded, groans under less considerable, but more frequent and ill judged Gratifications. These Thoughts which I have laid before you, are not my own private Sentiments alone, but those of the Public. All the great Officers about your Person know this as well as me; but the Fear of displeasing you, binds up their Tongues. By their Silence, the Government every Day goes from bad to worse, and the Minds of your Subjects are exasperated to a Degree that makes me tremble.

(*) He succeeded his Brother, who died without Male Issue.

(†) He addresses his Sons, whom he had made Yang.

All I wish then, is, that you would incessantly regulate your Household, and exert yourself in your public Character with that Application, that so vast an Empire requires. Then you will not want zealous loyal Subjects, who will assist you with their Abilities. The Laws by little and little, will be established in their former Vigor; your Revenues being rightly managed, will suffice for the Exigences of the State, and the Security of the Frontiers. In short, that I may end as I have begun, I beg that your Majesty would consider, that the Occasion of the sudden Ruin of the Tsin and the Szei, was, their having shut the Door to Advices, by taking them amiss; and that a Conduct directly opposite, rendered the Reigns of Ven ti and Vu ti in the Times of the Han, glorious, and assured the Crown for a long time to their Posterity.

A DISCOURSE by SHE KYAY.

UNDER the present Dynasty, we have nothing but Imposts, Taxes, and Prohibitions, and these too in the highest Degree. They obtain on the Mountains, and in the Vallies, in Rivers and Seas; upon Salt, and upon Iron, upon Wine and Tea; upon Stuffs and Silks, upon Turnpikes and Roads, upon Brooks and Bridges. Upon all these and many other Things, I every where see Prohibitions laid, &c. While these Prohibitions are rigorously and carefully enforced, I see on the other Hand, the Son abandon the Father, and the People withdraw from the Authority of the Prince; the Husbandmen quit the Spade and the Plough, and the Women the Manufactures of Stuffs: The Tradesmen, each in his way, every Day refine upon vain Ornaments; the Merchants traffic with Pearls and other useless Ornaments; the Gentlemen of the Gown neglect the Study of our ancient Books, whose Summary is Justice and Clarity. Superstition and Error become as so many Customs: Corruption creep into our very Language; empty Flourishes become the Fashion; Numbers of People run about the Streets, and lead an idle Life. A great Number of Magistrates lose their Time at Entertainments; Multitudes of People wear Cloaths far above their Ranks; Buildings become every Day more expensive; Weakness and Innocence oppress'd by Force and Power. The great Officers suffer themselves to be corrupted, and their Underlings to fleece the People. I see, I say, all this; and I see at the same time, that no effectual Remedy is applied, either for preventing or suppressing it.

And yet, according to the Notions of our Antients, those wholesome true Notions, it was a personal Crime in a Son to abandon his Father, nay, it was a public Disorder, and is always a great Abuse. It is rebellious in a Subject to withdraw himself from Authority; for Men to abandon the labouring the Ground, and the Women the Manufactures of Stuffs, is to starve both themselves and others: For the Workmen to refine upon vain Ornaments, the Merchants to traffic in useless Toys, and the Literati to neglect Charity and Justice, is, for each, in his respective Profession, to abandon what is Essential and Capital. For Superstitions to establish themselves in China, is to introduce Barbarism into the Empire. To bring a florid Stile in Vogue, is, as it were, to bury our King: So many idle Vagabonds running about the Streets, and our Magistrates losing their Time at Feasts, is abandoning both public and private Concerns. By the Prevalence of Luxury in Building and Cloaths, all Orders must be soon confounded. By Force and Power not being curbed, the Poor and the Weak are oppress'd. By great Officers suffering themselves to be corrupted by Presents, and the small living upon Rapine, there is an End of Equity and Justice. Where is the Wisdom in not prohibiting, or rather in not putting an effectual Stop to so great Evils, and in enforcing a rigorous Observance of, I do not know how many, Prohibitions, from whatever is necessary to Mankind? Is this the Government of our Ancients? But if any one should ask at me, what should be done in order to re-establish that wise Government, my Answer shall be in two Words: All that is done at present must be forbidden, and all that is forbidden must be done: Such was the Government of our Ancestors.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] Among Laws, there are some more some less important: Some are Capital and Essential, and some are less so. If they are confounded, and the latter are preferred to the former, the People do not know which of them to embrace. The Distinction that ought chiefly to be made in this Case, is very well laid down in this Piece, whose Stile is likewise lively and nervous.

An historical Gloss says, that She kyay was an able, upright, resolute Mn, who loved Good and hated Evil: But a little too greedy of Reputation. For which Reason, he seized all Occasions of speaking and acting. He thereby made himself Enemies who sought to ruin him, and he had some Difficulty to escape their Vengeance.

Jin tsong having no Son, adopted one of his Relations who was a young Man, and created him hereditary Prince. The young Prince being weak and committing several Faults, the Emperor and the Empress had Thoughts of substituting another in his Room: But the Secret was not so well kept, but that the Prince was apprized of it. Upon this, they laid aside their Design: And Jin tsong dying, the young Prince was declared Emperor. He falling sick, and his Disease putting him out of a Condition to take care of his Affairs, the Empress Dowager took the Reins of Government in her own Hand, giving Audiences regularly, and consulting about every thing with the Ministers thro' a Curtain. As soon as the Emperor was recovered, she resigned the Government into his Hands. The Prince having been informed that Jin tsong and the Empress had for some time been consulting to set him aside, he inwardly owed them a grudge; and seemed uneasy, that the Empress had during his Illness, taken upon her the Government. The Officers of the Palace siding with his Resentment, treated that Princess very ill, and let her and her Daughters be in Want of a great many Things. At this Juncture, the Emperor being informed of the Services and Merit of Fû pi, nominated him to be Ting ché, which at that time was a very considerable Post; but Fû pi excused himself from accepting it, and laying hold of so fair an Opportunity exhorted the Emperor to behave otherwise with Regard to the deceased Emperor, and the Empress Dowager who was yet living. He did it as usual, in Writing; and it was in the following Terms.

SIR; I have a due Sense of the Goodness with which you would reward me for some Services that my Duty bound me to perform to the Emperor your Father. But I would be much better pleased, if you yourself would endeavour to acknowledge the Obligations you are under to that Prince, and the Empress his Consort who is yet alive. They chose you as their Successor to the Throne, out of a great many Princes of the Blood, who were as nearly related to them as you. If at present, you possess the glorious Title of the (*) Son of Tyen, if you are Master of the vast Riches of so great an Empire, it is merely thro' their Favour. A singular Favour if ever any was! A Favour for which it is not easy to make suitable Returns. In short, a Favour which you cannot enough acknowledge. Yet, you not only neglect to acquit yourself of the ordinary Ceremonies with Regard to the late Emperor, but you are neither observed to pay the Respect due to the Person, nor to provide for the Exigencies, of the Empress Dowager who is yet alive. How! Is then the most ordinary Civilities too great a Complement to Persons to whom you owe so much? Where is your Gratitude and Piety? Surely all the Empire expects other things of your Majesty. While you were under the Hands of the Physicians, the World was less surprized at this Conduct. But since your Health is recovered, since you bear without any Inconveniency, all the Weight of Affairs; to fulfill all the other Duties of a Prince, and to neglect that of a Son, makes every Officer, both of your Court and in the Provinces, conclude, that your former Negligence was not so much occasioned by your Want of Health, as your Want of Piety. As for my share, I own that I don't understand the Motive that induces you to act in this Manner. Is it because you imagined, that the late Emperor in his Life-time, discovered a Coldness towards you? Is it because you have had unfavourable Accounts on that Head? It is a certain Truth, that the late Emperor if he pleased, might have named another Successor besides you; you; but he chose you, and in Consequence of that Choice, you are his Successor. What surmises or suspicions, even tho' they had a little Foundation, ought to efface a Favour so well known, so great, and so real.

As for the Empress Dowager, if, for some time, she took the Management of Affairs upon her self, she did it at the Request of your Ministers and other great Officers, while you was not in a Condition to manage them yourself; but she never pretended to be a Partner with you in Sovereign Rule. In short, some time ago, she resigned to you the Government; since which time you have reigned and ruled alone. The rest is past and ought to be forgot, nor does it become you to resent it so long as you do. For these petty Reasons of Uneasiness, even tho' they were real, to forget a Benefit of the first Order, is to imitate Yew wang, who is sharply reprimanded in the Sbi king, for a Fault in its kind, not so grievous as yours. I have a sensible Concern when I see you, instead of imitating Sbun, a Prince eminent in so many Respects, particularly in that of his Piety towards his Relations, imitate Yew wang, a Prince who is so infamous in History.

It is said, that it is not the Empress Dowager alone, who must bear with your capricious Temper, your Resentment I hear, extends even to the Daughters of the late Emperor, whom consequently you ought to look upon as your Sisters. You have deprived them of their Apartments, and given it to your own Daughters. Being shut up in a Corner of the Palace, they receive from you not the least Mark of your Goodness; you take no Care of them, and they are to you as Strangers. Permit me then to open my Heart, and to inform you of the Sentiments of the whole Empire, and of my self more especially. The late Emperor reigned for 41 Years. Under a Reign whose Happiness was equal to its Length, the Empire felt the Effects of his Goodness. There is not one of his Officers who is not (*) pierced with his Gratitude: As no Man owes more to him than I do, being raised by him, from one of the poor simple Literati to the greatest Employments, so no body has more sincere, and more lively Sentiments of Gratitude for that good Prince, than I have. By this you may judge, how great the Concern of all the Subjects of your Empire, and of me in particular, is to see the Empress his Consort, and the Princesses his Daughters so much neglected. I am so much affected with it, that I have not the Heart to accept of the Dignity to which you would raise me. What Proportion do my weak Services bear to the Obligations, which your Majesty owes to the late Emperor and Empress Dowager? Such as a Thread, or a Hair of Silk bears to the whole Universe. How inconsistent is it to forget what you owe to them, for the greatest of all Favours, and to reward the trifling Service that I have done you? How absurd is it, not to be sensible of it? I own I am heartily so. What I wish above all things, is, that you would render to the late Emperor the accustomed Duties; and that as a good Son, you would honour the Empress. Besides your owing this Example to all your Empire; it is the way to gain the Hearts of your Officers. As for me, when I shall see you change, tho' I should live only upon Roots and Water, there are no Fatigues nor Hardships that should discourage me, and no Danger that should daunt me from serving your Majesty with Pleasure, to the last Breath of my Life. But at the same time, while, without such a Change wrought, your Majesty offers me every Day new Honours and the greatest Riches, I cannot resolve to accept of them. The State still feels the wise Government of your Ancestors: The Laws which they establish'd are observ'd, the People are submissive, the Officers vigilant, and every thing goes smoothly on. There is no occasion for your Majesty who is yet in Mourning to disturb yourself, or to give a very close Application to Affairs. That which is most pressing, and in which, without you, your Officers can do nothing, is, to take care of whatever relates to the Empress Dowager, and the five betrothed Daughters of Yin tsong: Upon you alone, depends their Fortune, and you alone can make them happy. If you act as a dutiful Son and Brother, you will attach the People to your Person, and draw upon yourself and your Posterity the Assistance of Tyen. I say, that you will attach to you the People; Make a fair trial, they will be sensible of it, and you will be able to point out the Truth of this Promise. I say, that you will draw upon yourself and your Posterity, the Assistance of Tyen. This Point, tho' it be a little more obscure, yet is as certain as the other. Don't pretend to say, that Tyen neither hears nor sees; That Men are very short sighted, and what have I to fear? You would be hood-winkt if you thought so. Behold, what I thought it my Duty to represent to you, while I excuse myself from accepting of the Honour which your Majesty is pleas'd to do me. I own, it is both imprudent and rash to talk so freely. But I dare to assure your Majesty, that what I have here laid before you, is the Dictates of my Honesty and Zeal. Happy would I be, if your Majesty would think it so; and instead of finding Fault with my Boldness, profit by my Honesty.

A Gloss. This Remonstrance was without effect, or at least, without any Answer. Fu pi repeated it six or seven times. But the Emperor Ing-tsong always rejected his Excuses: At last, that Prince by a public Declaration, shewed a Resolution to alter his Conduct, and then Fu pi accepted of the Post that he offered.

Discourse of Se ma quang to the same Emperor Ing tsong, upon filial Piety and Equity.

IT is a (+) common and a true Saying, that in point of personal Perfection, filial Piety is the Chief of all Virtues, and Equity is the Soul of Government. Confucius in his Book upon filial Piety, says, that this Virtue is the Principal and the Foundation of all others. He adds, that he who does not love his Father and Mother, and does not behave to them with all due Respect, tho' he loves the rest of Mankind, and treats them with all the Respect imaginable, cannot in Justice pass for a Man, either of Virtue or Honour; and in effect, is neither the one nor the other. For never did a Tree without a Root shoot forth fair Branches. The late Emperor Yin tsong, by adopting you, and calling you to Empire, made you the noblest Present which was in the Power of Man to make. (*) That Prince is now no more; but he has left an Empress and five Daughters. These as they were nearest to him, so they ought to be dearest to you: and you should express for them, all possible Concern. You cannot fail in this, without answering very ill the Intentions of Yin tsong, and the Obligations you owe him. Formerly, when the Empress Dowager governed in your Palace, the Officers of your Household respected her. Both Great and Small were watchful to serve her. At present, when she has resigned to you the Cares of Government, and meddles no more in Affairs, I apprehend no Alteration with Regard to her will happen. Some of the Officers of your Palace may be idle Fellows, and may neglect, and serve her ill. She is Mother of the Empire, and all the Empire ought to have it at Heart, that she be happy and satisfied. But all the Empire, Sir, relies upon you, and you have more Obligations than one upon you, to take all the Care of this which you are capable to express.

(*) The Chinese says: His Griefs pierced to the Marrow of the Bones.

(+) In the Chinese it is literally: Your Subject has heard say, 'tis a common Phrase with them in this kind of Writing.

I likewise fear, that there are Fire-brands in your Palace, who interpreting in their own Manner, the Words and Actions of the Empress, make Reports of both, which serve either to cool, or to exasperate your Majesty. If there are any of such a Character, they won't fail to mask themselves under the specious Pretexes of Fidelity, Loyalty and Zeal. But they are at the Bottom mean Souls, who have nothing in View but their own Interest, and who endeavour, by the Dispositions which they either believe or see to be in the Prince, to make their own Advantage. If then you discover any of these abandoned Sycophants, ordain, without hearing them, that they shall immediately be put into the Hands of Justice and tried. One Example which you shall make of this sort, will stop the Mouths of all others of that Kind. On the contrary, if you lend an Ear to such Discourses, there will be no end of Backbitings and Calumnies, and they will infallibly be attended with fatal Disorders; this is a Point of the Importance, and deserves your Attention.

In short, it is a received Maxim, and has become as it were proverbial: In Matters of State the Prince alone ought to decide, but in domestic Affairs, the Empress ought to rule; I therefore wish that your Majesty deciding all foreign Affairs by yourself, would leave all Affairs within Doors to the Empress, together with the Distribution of all the Gratuities and Posts there, at least, that nothing of that kind be done without her Advice and Consent. Every thing then will be in order; you will see your Mother, who is above you, happy, and the Officers and your People under you, testify their Satisfaction, by Encomiums and Songs. If, because this Order is not established, the Officers of your Household should be neglectful, and fail in their Services to the Empress; if any of them by false Reports, should embroil you with her, this must be known without Doors: Perhaps the Empress shall fall sick out of Vexation; what a Dishonour will that reflect upon you? How can you answer for it in the Face of the Empire? All the Good you can otherwise do, will not be able to cover your Shame. This is the Tendency of my first Proposition, which was; That filial Piety is in point of personal Perfection, the Chief of all Virtues.

In the Chapter of the Szu king, which is called (||) Hong fan, when the Author comes to recommend it to the Prince to be equitable, and never to be influenced in his Actions by private Inclinations or Aversions; he lays so great Stress upon that Point, that he inculcates the same thing in six different Manners, that he may the better set forth its Importance. He who governs a State, says Cheu jin, ought not to repay private Services done to him before he mounted the Throne, with public Rewards. Much less ought he to employ the Rigour of the Laws, that he may gratify a personal Hatred. We read in the Ta ho (†), he who would promote Reason and Wisdom in his Conduct, ought to keep his Heart equal and ballanced. But the Heart loses that Equality and Ballance, when private Love or Hatred gives it a Bias to one Side or other. From being but one of the Princes of the Blood, you were raised to the Throne on which you now sit; this was a wide Step. It was natural enough after this Rise, that you should retain some private Favour or Resentment, towards those who had formerly done you some good Office, or given you some Disgust: But beware, for these Affections and Disquiets ought not to influence your Government.

The great Rule of Sovereigns, is, to reward Virtue, and to punish Vice; to advance Men of Probity and Merit, and to banish all who want both. Honours and Posts, being the most precious Treasures of States, a Prince ought not to distribute them to his Subjects, whose only Merit is, that they agree with him in some particular Notions. Far less ought he to make use of the Chastisements regulated by the Laws, to satisfy a private Resentment against those who have transgressed them. Formerly, Dignities and Posts were distributed before an Assembly of the whole Court, and Criminals were executed in the Face of the World: As if the Prince would thereby signify, that his private Inclinations had no Part in all that was done; that he distributed Rewards to Persons whom the Public would not think unworthy, and that they whom they judged worthy of Death, were condemned at the same time by the public Voice.

At present, there is a great Mixture among the Officers of your Empire. There are amongst them Men of Virtue and Merit, but they are mixt and confounded in the Crowd. The Good and

(*) The Chinese has it He is retired far off in ascending: I have already taken Notice, that the Chinese Politicallness fluns the blunest Expression of He is dead, and employs more soft Terms, according to Persons and Circumstances.

(||) The great Rule or Rules.

and the Bad are upon a Footing. This is a Disorder infinitely prejudicial to the Good of the State, and I could wish that your Majesty would seriously apply to remedy it. The Thing you must do for that effect, is as follows. Lay yourself out to know those thoroughly, whose Virtue and Capacity are greater than ordinary, and who are thereby most capable to answer the Hopes of the Public. Such as you know to be Men of this kind, draw immediately out of the Crowd, advancing them to the first Posts; and tho' they had formerly the Unhappiness to displease you, yet do not fail to promote them in proportion to their Services. Act in the same manner with Regard to Punishments: However great the Favour be you have for any one, yet if he is guilty of any Crime, and for that detested by worthy Men, and condemned by the Voice of the Public, do not allow yourself to relent so far as to pardon him. By this Conduct, there will soon be no more any Men of Merit out of Posts, nor any weak Persons in them. You will advance Virtue, you will make Vice tremble, and promote Order throughout all your Court. All your People will feel its Effects, and you will build their Happiness upon your Wisdom. And reciprocally making their own Happiness yours, by their Loyalty and Submission; your illustrious Posterity will, in order to reign in Peace, have no more to do but to imitate you.

But on the contrary, if your Majesty, leading an idle Life in your Palace, and abandoning yourself to your Pleasures, should devolve your Authority upon some one of your Officers; if, without examining who has, or who has not, Merit; without distinguishing genuine Virtue from Vice artfully disguised, or regarding any Consequences, you put all indifferently into Posts, the first who shall present; or which is worse still; if making your Inclinations or Regretments your Rule, if you should banish from you all those who have formerly displeased you, and advance only those whom you have always inclined to favour; if you use the Power of rewarding, only that you may gratify Sycophants who have no Merit, and who have done no Service, and that of punishing, only that you may check zealous loyal Subjects, whose Uprightness is all their Crime; then every thing will soon rush to Confusion, both at the Court and in the Provinces: There will be no more Law, no more Order, no more Peace: Can any thing be more fatal both to the Empire in general, and to your Majesty in particular: These are the Reasons why I said that Equity is the principal Point of Government, in the same manner as in personal Perfection, filial Piety is the first of all Virtues. Upon the Value or the Contempt which a Prince shews for these two Virtues, more than upon any thing else, depends the Happiness or the Unhappiness of his State; and the Glory or Shame of his Reign. Weigh this Truth, that you may be the more animated to the right Practice of these two capital Virtues.

A Gloss.] Se ma quang, the Author of this Discourse, was a dutiful Son, a firm Friend, and a loyal Subject; he was a Man of approved Probity, of a reverend Gravity, singular Temperance, and unshaken Uprightness: He was Minister to four Emperors, and was never known to prevaricate.

Another Discourse of the same Se ma quang, to the same Emperor Ing tsong, on Occasion of the public Calamities.

SINCE your Majesty came to the Throne, there have been many extraordinary Phenomena, and public Calamities. Black Spots have appeared in the Sun; and Inundations and Droughts have succeeded one another. During the Summer of the last Year, the heavy Rains begun, and did not end till Autumn was over. Towards the South East of your Court, in a Country where there were upwards of ten Cities, great and small Houses were swallowed up in the Waters, or seen floating and swimming upon the Tops of Trees. How many Families were thereby ruined? Thus universal Misery prevail'd on all Hands: The Son was separated from the Father, and both the one and the other were overwhelmed under the Weight of their Calamities. Parents sold their Children, and Husbands their Wives, at as low Prices as we now commonly give for the vilest Animals: The Famine was so great at Hyu and Ping, that the nearest Relations were seen to eat one another.

To this watry Autumn a Winter succeeded, not as it ought to have been, cold and dry, but moist and temperate, such as the Spring uses to be. Plants and Trees shoot forth out of Season; and in the Spring came very boisterous Winds. At last, in the Summer, the infectious Diseases made a horrible Ravage over upwards of 100 Leagues of Land. The Houses were filled with the Sick, and the Highways with Burials. In the Beginning of this Spring, the Crop appeared prodigiously fine, and then the People began to breathe, in hopes of a plentiful Harvest, which they were just about to reap, when there fell so extraordinary a Rain, that in one Day and a Night, the Rivers and Brooks overflowed, and forced the most rapid Torrents to run against their Streams, overturned the highest Bridges, covered the tallest Hills, made a wide Sea of the level Fields, and ravaged the Harvests.

Here in your Capital, the Desolation is as great; the Inundations has carried off all the Barriers, and has undermined all the Gates and Walls: The Tribunals of the Magistrates, the public Granaries, and the Houses of the Soldiers and People have all suffered. Numbers of People have perished, either by being buried under the Ruins of their Houses, or swallowed up in the Waters. Doubtless, these Calamities are very extraordinary; I don't know if their Parallel has happened for many Ages. Is not your Majesty frightened? Are you not thinking upon a strict and a serious Examination, into the Causes that have contributed to draw down so great Calamities? My Zeal has led me to think for you, and I believe that on your Part, three Causes principally contrilute.

First your Conduct with Regard to the Empress Dowager. This Princess who is full of Wisdom and Goodness became your Mother, by adopting and designing you, in Consort with Jin tsong, for the Empire. Ever since you enter'd into the Palace, she has express'd for you all the Cares of a Mother. When Jin tsong died, and you were sick, that Princess kneel'd before the Imperial Apartment, knocking the Ground with her Fore-head, so as even to wound herself, in praying with the utmost Earnestness for your safety. After this, how could you on the Report some envenom'd Tongue, who exasperated you against her, allow yourself to be persuaded, that this Princess did not entertain for you all the Sentiments of a good Mother? Tho' this should be partly truth, is it allowable for a Son to dispute with his Father and his Mother, and to entertain only for them, the Tendernefs and Respect which he judges to be proportioned to the good or bad Treatment they give him. Who ever heard such a Maxim maintained?

There is another Maxim better established, and universally received. A great Favour, Tradition tells us, ought to cancell all the little Causes of Discontent. The late Emperor drew you from the Government of a Province, for which you was likewise indebted to him, to place you upon the Throne, and to make you Master of the Empire. What has he required of you as a Return for a Present of that Nature? That, at his Entreaty, you would take a Concern about the Empress his Wife, and the Princesses his Daughters. Yet you lost your Temper, as soon as that Prince was put in his Coffin, and even before he was buried, you shut up the Princesses in a retired Apartment; you never almost saw them; you abandoned both the Mother and the Princesses her Daughters, to the Discretion, or rather to the Negligence, of some mean Officers. Permit me, in this Affair to reason from Less to Great. Imagine with yourself, that one of the common People has some Arpents of Ground to subside himself, his Wife and his Daughters upon; finding himself advancing in Years, and without a Son, he adopts a young Man, one of his Relations, and makes him his (*) Heir. The latter finding himself Master of the Estate, no sooner sees his Father dead, than he absolutely disposes of his Goods according to his own Fancy, without shewing any Regard for his Mother, or any Care for his Sisters. They might well sigh, groan, and bewail themselves: But he was insensible of all. What Idea do you think, all the Neighbourhood would entertain of a Son of such a Character? How would he be look'd upon? What would be said of him? Such a Conduct then would lose the Character of a Peasant in his own Village: And what ought an Emperor, upon whom the Eyes of all his Subjects are fixt, to expect from a Conduct, a great deal more extravagant. How is it possible that he can be beloved?

In the second Place, the late Emperor, who was naturally easy and gentle, was always in Pain, when he was obliged to contradict those he employed. During the last Years of his Reign, he was violently tormented with a Pain in his Breast, which disabled him from attending the Cares of Government; so that he was forced to devolve them almost entirely upon some one or other of his Officers. It is to be wish'd, that he had always made a right Choice; but Intrigues and Interest were often seen to prevail over Virtue and Merit. Whatever Care the Authors of these Injustices took to screen themselves, they could deceive only the heedless unattentive Vulgar. Men of Sense saw and bewailed the Evil: But not knowing how to help themselves, as the Prince was in such a Situation, they kept silence. All their Comfort was, that a young Prince, as you were, mounting the Throne, you would examine every thing by yourself, instruct yourself in every thing carefully, and vigorously maintain the Sovereign Authority. They then hoped that all incapable Persons would be removed, that Men of Merit would be advanced, that pure Equity would regulate all Rewards and Punishments, in short, that by this wise Conduct, the Court and all the Empire would soon change its Face.

These were our Hopes, but we have not seen them fulfilled; even in the Beginning of your Reign, you appeared to be as much fatigued with the Weight of Affairs, as ever Jin tsong was, when bowed down with Sickness, in the latter Part of his Reign, you abandoned the Decision of Affairs more than he did, to certain Officers; and one would have said, that you was afraid to have seen clearly into their Conduct. Great Numbers of Memorials have been presented to you, some of them were of the greatest Importance; you paid no Regard to them. Under Pretence of letting Things go as they were formerly, you examined nothing to the Bottom; and while you attentively applied to Trifles, you neglected the material Part of Government.

Officers, who are absolutely worthless, without Virtue and without Merit, are in Posts: You know them, and yet suffer them to continue, as if you had not the Courage to remove them. The Empire does not want for Men of Parts, who join a great deal of Wisdom and Probity to very great Abilities. You are convinc'd of this, and you know them to be such: Notwithstanding of this, you never mind them. Such a Step is dangerous, and subject to great Inconveniences which are pointed out to you, and you are sensible of them; and yet you take that very Step. Another Measure is good, you know it is, and you are taught to point out the Advantage of it with your Finger; and yet you dare not declare yourself and say, My Pleasure is, that this Measure be pursued. Then they who serve you, perceive this Weakness, and take Advantage of it, or rather they abuse you. As they are at present more Masters, than they could be in the latter Part of the last Reign; they are likewise more insolent. Their Caprice, or their Interest, decides every thing. These Gentlemen don't blush at promoting the most Worthless, and at acquitting the most Guilty: In one Word, they dare do every thing, and stick at nothing. Thus it is that you govern in the Empire, but do you hereby worthily answer the Expectations of the World.

(*) The Daughters in China don't inherit any thing from their Parents.

In the third Place, you have, it is true, fine natural Parts: But have you a larger share of them than Tau, Shun, Yu, and Ching tang? You ought, after the Example of these great Princes, to endeavour to improve so fine a Ground-Work, in profiting by the Abilities of wise Men. But this is what you have never been known to do. On the contrary, if you have any thing in your Head which you resolve to execute, you can be diverted from it with the Reasons that expose its inconvenience. No! The bravest Soldiers don't defend a Place in which the Enemy has besieged them, with greater Resolution than you defend your own Opinion. You never once reflect upon any thing that contradicts it. To act in this Manner, is not acting according to the Maxims of our ancient Sages, in uniting many Rivers to form a large Sea. A wise Prince hears and weighs every thing without Prejudice. When he examines the different Views, he does not say; This here is mine, and that there is another's. This Person is my near, and that my distant, Relation. This was first suggested to me, and that came but late. These Circumstances never sway him either to one side or the other; he seeks the best course, and that determines him entirely. But how can he distinguish this best Way, if he lays himself open to Prepossessions.

The Szu king says, "If any one offers an Advice contrary to your Inclinations and your Notions, that is a Reason for presuming that it is good, and for weighing with greater care its Usefulness and Advantages. Another Advice agrees with your Views, for which Reason, you ought to pay the greater Deference to the Reasons that are against it." But if, contrary to these Maxims, you hear with Pleasure, and embrace with Joy, only what is agreeable to your Notions, if you reject, and are even angry at, every thing else; the natural Effect of this Conduct will be, that Flatterers will appear, and that Men of Probity will retire. Is this the way to procure Happiness to your Subjects, and Glory to your Reign? Your Dynasty from its Beginning, after the Example of other Dynasties, established Censors, who were in a manner the Eyes and the Ears of the Prince: So that neither Ministers nor others, dar'd to conceal any thing from him that concern'd him to know. All the Affairs which come to Court, pass through the Hands of Ministers. They deliberate, they decide, and under the Favour of the Prince, they promulgate that Decision: If it happens that a Censor, according to the Duties of his Post, should make any Representations to you upon their Decisions, and lay before you their Reasons: Your Majesty, instead of examining his Memorial by yourself, immediately delivers it into the Hands of those very Persons whose Decisions are censured, and you follow their Judgment. Where are they who have so much Uprightness, as to acknowledge that the Advices of another, are better than what he has resolved upon himself; far less are there any found, who own that they have done wrong, and that they are blame worthy. All that your Majesty gains by acting in this manner, is, that you acquire the Reputation of being a Prince who loves no Advice, and who desires to have none. As for your Officers, they have the Advantage of being absolute Masters, and quiet Possessors of Sovereign Authority.

The three Points which I have touched upon are not secret, all the World is very well apprized of them. Every faithful zealous Officer bewails them. But they are afraid of some Emotion of Anger from you, or some Repentment, almost as terrible, from the interested Persons. For which Reason they dare not talk to you. In the mean time, Sadness, Uneasiness, and Indignation, possess the Hearts of your good Subjects; the more these Sentiments are suppress'd, the more violent they are. And I am not at all surprized, that they have drawn down these intemperate Seasons. If I have the Boldness to talk thus, it is only that I may beg you to consider, that as you are above Men, so Tyen is above you, and to conjure you to answer the Designs of Heaven, and the Desires of your Subjects. You cannot do this better, than by effectually remedying the three Points which I have touched upon. Acquit yourself towards the Empress Dowager with all the Duties of a good Son. Take Care to please her, and make it your Business to render her happy and contented. Extend your Goodness to the young Princesses your Sisters, have an Eye upon their Wants, and settle them when it is time. Delegate the sovereign Authority to no Person, for it belongs to yourself alone. In your Choice of Officers, distinguish true Merit: In Rewards and Punishments, regard nothing but the Importance of the Services, and the Heinousness of the Crimes. Give an utter Exclusion to all Flatterers, and banish such of them as are in Posts. Open a Door to Advice, hear without Prejudice all that is given you; and follow with Courage and Constancy, that which is the most wholesome. Besides, it is not enough to testify by Words, that you will in Time to come, observe this Conduct; you must shew it by your Actions; and these Actions too, must be the Effect of a firm and sincere Resolution. Nothing can resist this Sincerity when it is perfect; even Stones and Metals have more than once yielded to it. How then can Men resist it. But if you are deficient, Appearances will produce nothing. No, they won't make the smallest of your Subjects move. Far less can you hope that it will touch Tyen. Do not deceive yourself, says the Sbi king, by saying he is far exalted above us &c. Notwithstanding of his being exalted above us, yet he is near both to our Words and Actions, which he sees and hears. Scarce do our Thoughts rise from our Hearts, but Tyen is immediately acquainted with them; must he then present himself to your Eyes under a human Shape, and strike your Ears with the Sound of a sensible Voice? I know of how little value I am, and of how little use to you, yet I thought myself obliged to tell you my Opinion and my poor Sentiments, which your Majesty may examine and weigh at Leisure.

Another

TOWARDS the End of the third Moon of this Year, I had the Honour to exhort your Majesty to publish a Declaration, which might open a Door to Advices. A few Days since, your Majesty knowing that I had return'd to Court, ordered that Declaration to be register'd the fifth Day of the fifth Moon. No Man could be more sensible than I was, when I first received these News. Besides its being extremely agreeable to me to understand, that your Majesty design'd to agree to my Proposal, the Advantage which I hoped would thereby accrue to the State, was a still greater Cause of Joy to me. But when I read over that Minute, I own to you, that I found things in it which I could not relish. Let me die a thousand Deaths rather than to dissemble. Nothing could be better than the Beginning and End of this Declaration: But towards the Middle of it, we read these Words. "But if any one, in presenting to us Memorials, Advices or Remonstrances, shall speak from Inclination or Interest, if, forgetting his Station, he should touch too freely upon the great and secret Springs of Government; if he should find fault in other Terms, with things that are established and practised; and in order to enhance his own Value, if he should oppose the Designs of the Court, sell and abandon himself to Popularity, espouse its Inclinations and Abuses, that he may raise an empty Reputation: As all this will be very hurtful if it go unpunished, I cannot dispense with my effectually punishing those who shall be herein culpable."

Sir; I have heard it constantly and truly said; When a wise Prince treats his Officers with Goodness, and expresses a Value for them; when banishing Distrusts and Suspicions, he, as it were, sets their Zeal at large; then, these Officers on their Part, being free from Dread and Uneasiness, are entirely taken up with the Care of serving him well. As they are secure of the Heart of their Prince, they likewise open theirs to him, and suffer him to be ignorant of nothing which they think can be of Service to him. You, by an unseasonable Precaution in a Declaration expressly made for exciting your good Subjects to assist you with their Advices, insert six Restrictions conceived in such a manner, that any who speaks, if Advantage is taken against him, cannot escape his Ruin. In my Opinion, no more effectual way could have been fallen upon to have shut up every body's Mouth.

Let us in the mean time suppose, that any one shall speak. Let him blame or praise ever so little in his Discourse, nothing is more easy than to ruin him, by saying that he speaks from a Motive of private Favour or secret Interest: If an Officer who is in Post shall transiently touch ever so little, upon what in a strict Sense shall not be found within his Sphere, he may be ruined, if his Enemies please to accuse him of having forgotten his Rank. He who shall treat of what may trouble the State, and assure its Repose, may pass, if one has a mind, for having too freely touched upon the great Springs of Government: If by accident, a Person speaks of a Matter, to which any ancient Edict relates, he may pass as a Man who at an improper time, blames Things that were established and practised. Zeal further inspires some one occasionally to declare against a new Regulation, which for some time past may have made a Noise; and if he exposes its Inconvenience, he is accused of endeavouring to make himself popular, by opposing the Views of the Court. Lastly, none dare endeavour to touch the Prince with the Miseries of his People, without exposing himself to be condemned as a Fire-brand, a seditious Person, and the Head of a Rebellion. Things being thus, I can't see any thing upon which one can express himself with Safety.

Surely a Declaration in such Terms, instead of procuring Memorials and Advices, will deprive you of them more than ever. I then very earnestly request you, to strike out that middle Part, and to fill it in another manner, agreeable to what I laid before you in the thirtieth of the third Moon. It concerns the Good of your State and your Honour, that there may be no Room to suspect, that while you demand Advice, you really design to shut the Door against it.

In the sixth of the Years named Kya yew, Chin kyew, was very intimate with two favorite Eunuchs of the Palace, and obtained the important Employment of Kyu mi, managing so by his Intrigues, that not only Affairs that regarded War, but all others pass'd through his Hands. Tang kyay, Fan tse tau, Lin whey, Chau pyen, and Wang tau, who were Censors, openly attacked him, and presented Remonstrances upon Remonstrances against him to the Emperor. Chin kyew recriminated, and accused his Aggressors of caballing: As these last had pointed out the Patrons of Chin kyew, the Emperor had taken their Advices as a Reproach to himself for being governed by the Eunuchs, and this Reproach had piqued him. The Measures he took were, to break Chin kyew and the Censors at the same time, and to give each of them different Employments in the Provinces. Ngew yang iyew, who was afterwards one of the most famous Men of the Song Dynasty, began then to be upon the Ranks. Altho' by his Employment, he was a Subaltern of the Kyu mi, he sided with the Censors, demanding that they should be recalled and re-established. For this effect, he presented the following Remonstrance.

SIR; Since the Beginning of your Reign, you have been seen to open a very large Road to Remonstrances; if it sometimes happened that there was any exceptionable Passage, and which deserved Punishment, you graciously pardoned it, that you might not damp the Zeal of your Officers. I see, nevertheless, that sometime ago, in one Day, you have prosecuted the five Censors, who have accused Chin kyew, you have deprived them all of their Posts, and banished them them from your Court. You cannot imagine what a Surprise this Order of yours has occasioned both in the Court and in the Provinces; and how many Suspicions it has started. As I have not seen the Remonstrances of the Censors, I know not exactly the Strength or Weakness of their Reasons, but I know that Tang kyay, Fan tse tau, &c. have been long in Posts, that hitherto they have behaved in them with Honour, and have at your Court always had the Character of being blameless Men. How can you think, that all at once giving the Lye to their former Probity, they would surprize and deceive you? No! so extraordinary, and so sudden a Change is not naturally to be imagined.

Surely it must be owned, that the Office of Censor has always been attended with its Difficulties, tho' it has met with different Ones at different times, or rather, under different Reigns. Is a Prince naturally uneasy, haughty, cruel, and as averse from being willing to hear his own Faults, as he is eager to search for, and easy to believe those of others? Then his Ministers and great Men are alarmed and in dread. In such Times as those, it is a dangerous and a difficult thing to advise a Prince with regard to his Conduct; the most able have not succeeded in this. But then it is an easy and a safe thing to soothe a Minister or any great Officer. On the contrary, is a Prince gentle, moderate, obliging, severe to himself, and indulgent to others, as ready to justify those whom he employs, as he is to condemn himself? If it happens at the same time, what is natural enough, that a Minister, or some great Man, being supported by People within Doors, has Authority in his Hands, and has Opportunities to be acquainted with every thing before the Emperor, having it in his Power to make any one sensible of the Effects of his Vengeance: In such Junctures, nothing is more easy, than to give Advice to the Prince upon his personal Faults; but it requires surely a great deal of Courage to attack a Minister: Whoever is so hardy as to do it seldom succeeds. This has been the Experience of all Times, and deserves some Attention.

The same Experience tells us, that Princes, according to different Circumstances, have more or less Difficulty to form a right Judgment of what is laid before them; and to know how to do it is a great Art. Two opposite Parties make a Representation to a Prince, each producing its own Reasons, and placing them in the most favourable Light for themselves. Each represents himself as a zealous, faithful and disinterested Person: Each, if you believe himself, has nothing but the public Good at Heart. How shall the Prince determine himself? If he thoroughly knows those who speak; if he knows that such a Man is upright and faithful; that such another has a mean Soul, and is Master of the Art of Dissimulation; if in their Discourses he clearly perceives, that such a thing is for the Good of the State; such another is really private Interest, cloathed in the specious Name of public Good, then he has no more Difficulty to determine himself.

These are the Means that are laid down, by which, a just Judgment, as much as it is possible to make, may be formed. A Discourse is presented to you, in which the Person who presents it talks without any Circumlocutions, in clear express Terms, tho' perhaps a little blunt: You find that he proposes things not at all conformable to, but entirely disagreeing with your Views and Inclinations. The first time you read this, you find Repentment and Anger rise in your Mind; but compose yourself, and know that this Man is a faithful and zealous Subject. There comes a second Discourse whose Expressions are soft and smooth, but void of all Meaning; you find that the Person therein studies to justify your past Orders, and to join with your present Views: Immediately you feel Complaisance and Joy. Repress these Motions, and distrust yourself, lest the Author is a vile Flatterer who sacrifices the Good of the State, and your Glory, to his private Interest. In the same manner, one of your first Officers makes Representations to you, upon an Affair within his Sphere, by reiterated Remonstrances in the Face of the whole Empire. He has no sooner either spoke or written than the whole World is acquainted with it. The Public speaks, examines, and judges of, it. Where is the Man that will say, that it is possible to impose upon the whole World? It is therefore to be presumed, that his Proposals and his Representations are purely the Effect of his Zeal. Another lays before you his Opinion, with regard to things not within his own Sphere. He conceals himself in order to do it; he demands a strict Secrecy: He uses every Mean to engage his Prince to determine himself, without communicating the Affair to any other. This carries an Appearance of his great Esteem for the Abilities of his Sovereign; but at the Bottom, it commonly proceeds from some secret Interest, which he is afraid should be laid open. The Experience of all Times have authorised these Rules. A Prince who knows how to follow them, perceives without any great Difficulty, and that too pretty justly, the different Motives that influence the Person who speaks. We have at present in the Person of your Majesty, a temperate, an assiduous, and a laborious Prince, who pardons nothing in himself, who loves to be instructed in his Faults, even when he is told of them roughly and bluntly. But with regard to those who serve you, and especially the Officers whom you employ, you are quite different; to them, you are all Civility, Beneficence, and Indulgence. You would commit a real Violence upon yourself to change them, you have their Reputation at Heart, you support them as much as possible, and being full of Indulgence towards them, cannot persuade yourself that they can render themselves unworthy. So that I believe I may venture to say, that we live in those Times which I have touched upon, wherein nothing is easier than occasionally to advise the Prince with regard to what relates to his own Person, but it is very dangerous for any one to presume to touch upon any thing that regards the Person of those who are about him.

What I have seen since I came to Court, is as follows; In one of the Years named King yew, Fan chong yen was so bold as to speak in Quality of a Censor, with regard to the Conduct of Lyu i, hyen one of the Ministers, but it cost him his Post, and he was sent to a City of the Province as a private Magistrate. In one of the Years named Whang yew, the same Tang kyay, of whom we are now treating, spoke loudly in Quality of Censor against Wen yen po, who likewise was a Minister; he met with the same Fate as Fan chong yen. The same thing happened some time after to Chau pyen and to Fan tse tau, for having supported Lyang che against Lew kang and his Cabal. Two Years ago, Han kyang was banished to Tjay chew, for having censured Fu pi. Lastly, very lately, Tang kyay, Chau pyen, Fan tse tau, Lyu wbeey, and Wang tau were broken, for having remonstrated against Chin kyew. Among so many Censors, who have been turned out of Post within the Space of twenty Years, I don't know one who was treated so, for having personally offended the Sovereign.

This makes me say, that at present, we may safely and successfully advise the Prince with regard to his personal Conduct; but that an undaunted Courage is requir'd in the Man who dares to attack the Minister, and he seldom or never succeeds when he does: If your Majesty will reflect seriously upon that Passage of History which I have now recalled to your Memory, I think you will naturally enough conclude, that this proceeded from the Zeal and the Courage of Tang kyay and his Collegues. Of all these five Censors that have been lately broken, Lyu wbeey is the only one who lately came into Post. The other four have been long in that Office. Tang kyay for a like Affair was banished into Quang si, where he would have died, if your Majesty had not restored him to Life, by permitting him to change the Air. Fan tse tau and Chau pyen, have once already met with the same Fate, and past many Years as simple Magistrates. All three were re-established in their Posts. All three remembered their past Disgrace, and saw well when they attacked Chin kyew, they had still greater to fear. Notwithstanding this, they did attack him; their Duty told him that they ought to speak; and they bravely did speak. This surely deserves the Title of being faithful Subjects; they having acted always like themselves, and discovered an unshaken Resolution. Their Collegue Wang tau, was one of the poor Literati, without Riches and without Friends: Han kyang becoming accidentally acquainted with him, found in him true Merit. He became his Protector, and drew him out of Obscurity that he might make him Censor. Soon after, Han kyang becoming Chong ching, enter'd into Conspiracies against the Good of the State. Wang tau vigorously opposed him; and supported the Interests of the State against his Artifices and Ambition; but Han kyang still persevering in his Conduct, he was adjudged guilty and to be severely punished. It is well known, how natural it is for one to have a Regard for his Benefactor, and to support, or at least to excuse him, when there is Occasion: But if a Man, as Wang tau has done, prefers his Duty to all other Considerations, and submits all the Sentiments of personal and private Gratitude to the common Good; he can act only from a Principle of strict Honesty and uncommon Equity. Such, Sir, such were the Censors who have been lately broken. I don't flatter them in the Picture I have drawn of them: All the World will easily discover its Likeness.

Is it to be presumed, that Persons of that Character, even supposing that they were deceived, could have any other Motive for attacking Chin kyew than their Duty, or any other View than that of the public Good? Some perhaps, in order to render them odious, may have represented them as plotting, and entering into a Conspiracy form'd to disturb the great Officers, and render themselves formidable. But upon what is this Accusation founded? An Occurrence that is quite modern and very well known, destroys it too much. Last Year, Han kyang informed against Fu pi, who was a Minister of State. Was Tang kyay and Fan-tse-tau seen to lay hold on this Occasion, to join with the Informer? On the contrary, they and their Collegues, with their ordinary Equity, made your Majesty and the whole Empire sensible of the Artifices of the Accuser, and the Innocence of the Accused. Where then is the pretended League, and the pretended Conspiracy of the Censors? No, Sir, Suspensions of this Nature, can never fall upon Persons of their Character: Likewise it appears, that your Majesty has not entirely believed it, else you would have treated them in another Manner, and deprived them of the Ranks they held. But your Majesty could not resolve to let them be without Posts, so you entrusted each of them with pretty important ones. They were given to understand, that they were banished with Regret. In effect, besides its being a Loss to your Court, it stops the Mouth of every one else, and the State must infallibly suffer. It were to be wished, that your Majesty being more attentive to the Zeal, the Disinterestedness, and Constancy of the Censors, had given less Ear to the vain Suspensions of their Adversaries. But this Evil, such as it is, is easy to be repaired. Any Faults which they may have committed, has been sufficiently punished by banishing them. Let your Mercy now take Place; that you may inculcate upon your good Subjects the Disinterestedness, Zeal and Liberty of Speech, recall and restore Tang kyay and his Collegues. All the Empire will then applaud you.

DISCOURSE of the same Ngew yang syew, upon the Sect of (*) Fo.

IT is upwards of 1,000 Years, since China had the Misfortune to be infected with the Sect of Fo; and for these thousand Years there has been no time in which Men of Sense have not always detested it, and have not wish'd it in their Power to destroy it. Our Emperors have more than once prohibited it by their Edicts, and it was often thought that it was abolished: However, it always revived with new Force, and things came to that Pass, that after many and unsuccessful Endeavours, this Evil was look'd upon as incurable. Is it then effectually so? No! It is only that wrong Measures are taken to remedy it. A good Physician, if he treats his Patient well, examines amines the Symptoms and the Cause of his Disease. If he finds that it proceeds from a Weakness of Constitution, or a Lowness of Spirits, he goes straight to its Source, without directly attacking any of the accidental Circumstances by his Remedies. He endeavours to enliven the Spirits, and to strengthen the Constitution, and then the Symptoms fall of course.

The Misfortune which we now bewail must be treated in the same Manner. Fo was a barbarous Foreigner, at a great Distance from our China. His Sect probably sprung up since the time of our three famous Dynasties. But Virtue and Wisdom at that time prevailed in the Empire. The People were well instructed in their Duties, and the Rites were in their Vigour. How then could the Sect of Fo find an Entrance here? After these three first Dynasties the Government was not the same. The Instruction of the People, and the Practice of the ancient Rites, were both neglected. This Negligence increased by degrees; and in 200 Years time it grew to such a Height, that the Sect Fo profited by it, and pierced into the Heart of the Empire where they settled. Let us then go to the Source of so great an Evil; let us revive the Government of our ancient Kings; let us instruct the People as we ought; let us re-establish the ancient Rites all over the Empire; and the Sect of Fo will fall, &c.

The rest of this Discourse is not translated; it is very long, and reduced to two Points: The first explains the ancient Government. He finishes his Explanation by saying, that from the capital City, where the Court resided, to the smallest Villages, there are public Schools, where there are some chosen young Men, who having formed themselves at their Leisure under good Masters, are capable to instruct others in their turns. In the second Place, he extends his Proposition by saying, that the only way to destroy the Sect Fo, is to re-establish the ancient Government, and especially the Instruction of the People, and the Practice of the ancient Rites. Upon this he quotes the Example of Mong tse, who without minding direct Refutations, strongly recommended Charity and Justice to his Fellow-Subjects, and thereby made them abandon the two Sects Tang and Mé.

Discourse of the same Ngew yang syew, upon the Difficulty of Reigning well.

IT is a common and a true Saying, that it is very difficult to become able in the Art of Reigning. But what are these Difficulties? The greatest consists in a right Choice of a first Minister, and knowing how to employ his Abilities properly. Besides, it is a received Maxim, that when a Prince has chosen a prime Minister, he must repose in him a real Confidence. Otherwise, the Minister will be always in an Alarm, and will never dare to propose, or to undertake any thing: Consequently, if he were the ablest Man that ever was, his Ability can be of very little Use to him; and he never can perform any thing great. On the other Hand, to devolve all upon one Man, and to submit nothing that he shall speak to Deliberation, or else to neglect all other Advices and to reject all other Remonstrances; besides its discontenting a great Number, is to expose one's self to the greater Misfortunes. Let us suppose a Prince acts thus, and that he forms some Enterprize upon the bare Advice of a Minister, without having held a Council, and against the Sentiments of a great Number, and the strongest Remonstrances: If the thing by accident should succeed, it is much to be fear'd, that the Prince, exulting in the Success which he owes to Chance, and praising his Minister excessively, shall say in a triumphant Manner, We see more clearly than these wise Men. We should have been wrong to have had any regard to their Advices and their Remonstrances.

A Prince with these Dispositions is much to be bewailed. It is true, bad Success will soon reclaim him; but a Misfortune may be so great, that it may be felt when it is too late to retrieve it. A great many Princes have been thereby ruined, as we may see in our Histories. Two Examples are as follow: (*) Fu kien possessed a very large Dominion: He had good Soldiers, and could have raised nine hundred and sixty thousand Men: Throwing his Eyes upon a little neighbouring State, from his high Degree of Power, he harboured a Desire to become Master of it. It is, said he to himself, but a small Spot of Ground: What Forces have they to resist me? The Conquest is both sure and easy: Upon this, he made every thing ready. All his Subjects were against this Enterprize, which was equally unjust and unreasonable. The best Heads in the Kingdom made Remonstrances against it, even his own Son opposed it; but nothing avail'd: for the Prince, being intoxicated with his own Notions, found Mu yong chwi, one of his Generals, who confirmed him in it. Why, Sir, said he to him, do you hear so many People? What effect can their Discourse have, but to darken your own Understanding? This is an excellent Man, said the Prince. I have found none but him, who, like me, is disposed to secure the Peace of my State by this Conquest. The Troops immediately took the Field, and advanced Southwards to Sheu chun. The Enemy poured upon them before they were assembled, and gave them a total Defeat.

Fu kien did not succeed better in his Enterprizes towards the North, eight hundred thousand Men either perished, or were lost there: The same thing happened to Tsin tay under the Tang. This Prince took it in his Head, to take the Command of Tay yuen from Tsin, and to banish him to Kyun chow. All the understanding loyal People that were at Court, no sooner heard of this, than they did all that lay in their Power, to shew the Emperor that the Resolution was unreasonable. The Prince in the Night-time, while he was all alone, called in Sue wen yu his Favorite, who then filled the Post of Kyu mi; What think you, said he, of my Design? A great many don't don't relish it: 'Tis a Proverb, answered the Minion, that he who builds a House upon the Side of a High-way, can't finish it in three Years. Why do you hear so many People? Who can give you better Advice than yourself? The Emperor pleased with this Answer, said to him; A Sooth-sayer lately promised me, that I should this Year, find a Man capable to second me in the Design I have to make my Kingdom flourish. I have exactly found him in you: He then ordered Sue wen yu to draw up an Order against Tsin. Next Morning, when the Counsel knew of it, they grew all pale. Six Days after, News came, that Tsin being informed of it, had rebelled and advanced at the Head of a great Army. The Emperor being seized with Terror and Fright, cried out; It is that Wretch Sue wen yu, who has thrown me upon this Precipice. He trembled while he was speaking these Words; and was drawing his Sword to kill him with his own Hand. Sir, said Li fong, stopping him, you repent too late; for the Evil is done. And indeed, as the Misfortune was imminent, and none saw any Remedy, the Emperor and all the Counsel dissolved into Tears.

Fu kyen and Tsin tay, each in his Time, followed the Advice of one Man who fell in with their Notions; but their Ruin which was the Consequence, is a Proof of the Danger of this Conduct. And yet Fu kyen proposed nothing less with his General Mu yong chui, than to secure a lasting Peace to his vast State by a Conquest, which appeared to him equally easy and sure. Tsin tay likewise looked upon Sue wen yu as his Oracle. He reckoned that by his Assistance he could aggrandise his Empire, and make that flourish. So true it is, Princes are frequently blind in their Choice of those they employ.

But by your way of reasoning, says one, a Prince ought to put no Confidence in his Minister, however cautious he may have been in the Choice of him. This quite mistakes my Meaning. When kong the King of Tsi, put Confidence in Kong chong; Syen chu, the King of Shu, trusted in Chu ko yang; and both of these Princes did right. But was not all that these two Ministers advised, approved by the wisest Men? Was it ever known that any body remonstrated against what these Princes ordained by their Counsels? If the Body of the Officers had given a contrary Advice to these Princes, or if the People had groan'd and murmur'd, it is to be presumed, that they would not have obstinately pursued the Advices of one Man, and have rendered themselves odious to all besides, and have drawn down upon themselves the Curses of the People.

There is, in my Opinion, a Difficulty still greater in the Art of Governing well; which is, to hear and to form a right Judgment of all. There comes every Day to the Ears of the Prince, Discourses of a good many different Kinds. Sometimes Flattery speaks; and in order to gain a favourable Audience, she embellishes her Discourse with Art and Eloquence. Sometimes a Zeal which indeed is sincere, but disrespectful and blunt; and consequently very importunate. To hear both the one and the other with proper Precautions, is a thing which has its own Difficulty; but does not surpass the Capacity of a Prince, who has a little Understanding and Penetration: As Complaisance and Flattery commonly please every body, especially Princes, a little honest Bluntness and Freedom in contradicting them, naturally displeases them: On such Occasions, it is a very difficult thing for a Prince not to allow himself to be either overreach'd or put in a Passion; yet after all, it is not beyond the Power of an ordinary Wisdom and Virtue.

What then is the grand Difficulty? It is as follows; A considerable Enterprize is set on Foot; some propose to the Prince, to succeed by Means which are not very difficult, and seem to be very plausible, but are at the Bottom very unsure. Others open a way to him, which he sees would conduct him to the Point he seeks: But they are represented to him as so perplexing, and so full of Difficulties, that it appears to him as it were impracticable. I say, that it is not then easy for a Prince to judge aright and to take proper Measures. One or two Passages of our History, may illustrate my Opinion.

At a time when all the Empire was in War, the Prince of Chau, had an Officer of War called Chau ko, who talked the best upon these Matters of any Man in the Kingdom; so that he did not scruple to give himself out as the first Man in the Practice of military Affairs. His Father, who was an Officer of Reputation, and grown old in Arms, frequently talked with his Son upon the Art of War; but he could never puzzle him with his Questions. Notwithstanding this, he never looked on his Son as a Man capable to command. On the contrary, he frequently said with a Sigh; If ever my Son is at the Head of the Army, the Empire must suffer. The old Man dying, the Emperor soon after named Ko, to the Command of his Army. His Mother demanded Audience of the Prince, and told him what she had frequently heard her deceased Husband say: But the Prince had no Regard to what she told him: So Ko was confirm'd in his Post. He then attacked the King of Tsin, and lost the Battle with his Life: The Consequence of his Defeat was, that more than four hundred thousand Subjects of Chau, surrender'd themselves to Tsin.

When Tsin shi wbang was about to subdue the Country of the King, he asked an Officer of War, named Li sin, how many Troops he would need for that Purpose. Li sin, being young and brave, answered, that two hundred thousand Men would be sufficient. This Answer was very agreeable to Shi wbang. However, meeting with Wang tshen an ancient General, he asked his Opinion likewise; he answer'd, that it would require six hundred thousand Men, otherways he was not sure of Success. Shi wbang being nettled at this Answer, said to Wang tshen, you are old, and your Age renders you a Coward. So he immediately named Li sin to command his Army, and gave him two hundred thousand Men with Orders to reduce King. Wang tshen instantly took leave of the Prince, and retired to Ping yang. A little after, Li sin was beaten, and suffering the Enemy to take Possession of seven large Cities, shamefully returned home. Shi wbang acknowledging knowledging his Fault, went in Person to Ping yang, and made his Excuses to Wang tſyen, preſſing him to take the Command of the Troops againſt King. I have told you, answered Wang tſyen, and I tell it you again, I muſt have ſix hundred thouſand Men. Shi whang promiſed to let him have them: When theſe Troops were got together, Wang tſyen advanced againſt King, and happily conquered him.

Theſe Paſſages of Hiſtory prove what I have advanced with regard to certain perplexing Junctures which a Prince may be in. But how ſhall he act in the End? An Officer makes very reaſonable Propoſals: He lays down Expedients, and answers Difficulties; every thing he ſays, appears as practicable as it is advantageous. Behold Chau ko and Li ſin: Was it not Wiſdom in the Prince to employ them? Yet they ruined all. Another lays down very difficult, and ſeemingly impoſſible Propoſals. Is it not natural to drop them? This was Wang tſen's Caſe: Nevertheless you muſt return to theſe, or renounce your Project entirely. In a Caſe of this kind; to hear what every one propoſes, and to take the proper Meaſures, is what I call difficult.

Moreover, if Shi whang and the Prince of Chau took the wrong Meaſures, there was one thing which, in my Opinion, contributed very much to it. The old experienc'd Generals, far from diſſembling, either with themſelves or their Maſters, the Difficulties of an Enterprize, and being willing to ſecure its Succeſs, lay theſe Difficulties out, as being rather greater than in effect they are. This is diſpleaſing to Princes, who expect to find no Obſtacle to their Deſires. On the contrary, young Officers who are newly advanced, endeavour to enhance their own Valour, and to over-rule other People. They are all Fire and Fury: They ſuffer themſelves to be hurried away, and every thing to them appears eaſy. This commonly pleaſes Princes, eſpecially thoſe who are ambitious of the Title of Conqueror: Theſe hear with Pleaſure, and believe with Eaſe, an Officer who, for a ſmall Expence, takes upon him the Succeſs of an Enterprize, which they have at Heart. This is too ordinary to Princes; and theſe two, whom I have mentioned, committed this Fault, which coſt them dear. But after all, that which was committed by the Prince of Chau was ſtill more conſiderable, nor could he ever afterwards retrieve it.

An Hiſtorian ſays, that Lyen po commanded the Troops of Chau before Ko. Tſin, who was afraid of that old General, uſed Stratagems to have him changed. He ſpread abroad a Report, that he was afraid of Ko; and that he was ſure of Victory, provided he had not to do with him. He took Care that this Report ſhould be communicated by way of Secret, at the Court of Chau. That Prince was caught, and notwithſtanding a good many Remonſtrances, he named Ko his General. But alas! This Ko, was at the Bottom, no other than a fine, frothy Speaker. His Father who knew him well, judged him incapable of Commanding; his Mother acquainted the Prince with this, and all the Officers judged in the ſame manner: Even the Enemy knew his real Character. The Prince alone, who was concerned more than any other, always ſhut his Eyes upon this Point, and in ſpite of all the World ruſhed upon his own Ruin. An enormous Fault, but a Fault of which, ſince that time, we have ſeen many Examples.

Tay tſong, the ſecond Emperor of the Tang, once ſet 300 Priſoners free upon their Word of Honour, that they would return at ſuch a time; which they punctually did, and notwithſtanding that they all had deſerved Death, he gave them all their Pardon. Ngew yang hew, who wrote the Hiſtory of the Tang, compoſed a ſhort critical Diſſertation upon this Subject; which is inſerted in the Collection from which theſe Pieces are extracted, and is as follows.

Unſhaken Honour, and generous Equity, are Virtues proper for Men of Virtue and Honour, and are as dear to them as their Lives. As for the Bad, as all their Principle is to fear Punishment, So Punishment ought to be their Portion, eſpecially if they are Men who by their Villainy have already deſerved Death. I find in the Memoirs of the Dynaſty Tang, that in the ſixth Year of the Reign of Tay tſong, at one time, more than 300 Criminals were freed upon their Word of Honour, and each of them was ſuffered to go to his own Houſe, provided that they ſurrendered themſelves at a ſtated time. Is there any thing elſe in acting thus, than promiſing to one's ſelf to find that Faith and Generoſity in the moſt Vile, which can only be found in the moſt Wiſe and moſt Virtuous? And yet theſe Criminals who were freed, all ſurrendered themſelves at the Day appointed. No body expected this: Muſt we therefore conclude, that becauſe an honeſt Man keeps his Word even at the Hazard of his Life, therefore the ſame Honour ſhall be found in ſo great a Number of Rogues? It is not natural to think this.

It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Goodneſs of Tay tſong, in enlarging ſuch a Number of Criminals, had Force enough to change theſe 300 Perſons; and that Gratitude has a great Power over the Minds of Men. To this I answer: I ſee very well, that Tay tſong both thought and ſaid this. But who knows when he enlarged them, if he did not ſay to himſelf: The Mercy which I ſhew them, will eaſily make them underſtand that if they return they will be pardoned; ſo that they will infallibly return. Who knows, I ſay, whether Tay tſong did not reaſon in this Manner, and whether this was not his Motive for enlarging them? Who knows, on the other hand, but that theſe Criminals actually laid their Account with being pardoned; and that it was not upon this Hope alone that they had the Courage to return? For my ſhare, when I examine this Action, I think I ſee, both on the one Part and the other, Artifice, Intereſt, and Vanity. As for what is called Goodneſs, Honour, Generoſity and Virtue, I ſee no ſuch thing. Tay tſong had been ſix Years upon the Throne: All the Empire had, during that time, felt a thouſand real Effects of his Goodneſs. Theſe 300 Men ſhared it in common with others; and yet they had not amended, but had even rendered themſelves worthy of Death. To ſay that a Freedom for ſome Months had changed them all of a ſudden, ſo as to make them look upon Death as a Welcome to their Country; and to make them neglect Life when in the Balance with Honour and Justice, is, I think, to talk of an Impossibility. What Proof would you have, says one, to persuade you that such a Return was actually owing to these Motives? I answer: If Tay tsong, finding that these Criminals were returned, had inflicted upon every one of them the Punishment he deserved: If he had afterwards enlarged others for such a time; and if these others had returned like the first, and surrendered themselves up at the time appointed; I should have then attributed the Return of the second to their Honesty and Gratitude. But if a Prince should think it proper to do this frequently, he would thereby authorize Homicide. Our ancient Kings never acted in this Manner; their Laws and their Sentences were founded upon Nature, and a Knowledge of the human Heart. They were never seen to deviate from these Principles, or by equivocal Experiments to endeavour to attract vain Encomiums.

Ngew yang hew has written, not only the History of the Tang Dynasty, but likewise that of the five Dynasties, each of which lasted but for a very short time; and all of them continued but for some Dozens of Years, that fell betwixt the Tang and the Song. Upon one of these Princes becoming Emperor from his being the Lord of (*) Shû, and perishing in a very short time, Ngew yang hew takes occasion to expose the Vanity of what the Vulgar call happy Omens. His Discourse, which is inserted in the Imperial Collection, from which these Pieces are extracted, is as follows.

ALAS! Ever since the Times of the Tsin and the Han, nothing is more commonly thought on, or at least talked of, than good and favourable Omens. Tho' there have not been wanting Men of Sense, who have written very well against this Abuse, yet it still subsists. Those which are commonly esteem'd good Omens for Princes, are the Long, the Ki ling, the Fong wbang, the Quey, and that which is named Tsü yu. But I find in the historical Memoirs of Shû, that these pretended good Omens were never so frequent, as when a certain Prince of that Country made himself Emperor. Yet all the World knows, that he was scarce seated upon the Throne, than he fell from it, and miserably perished. If any one shall say that these Omens did not relate to that Prince, I would ask, to whom then did they relate? For besides it being certain that they all appear'd in his Time, they could not be applied to any other in particular, nor to the Empire in general, wherein there never were any Disorders and Commotions. What then is this same (†) Long? It is an Animal which appears so seldom, that he is looked upon as invifible; and for that very Reason has past as being somewhat very mysterious. He loves, as it is said, to mount into the Clouds, and rises even into Heaven; and then he is satisfied. As soon therefore as he shall be so lavish of himself, if we may so speak, as to become vifible, he shall then be no longer mysterious: And when he is seen here in Lakes and Rivers, he is out of his Element, and consequently dissatisfied. How then can one draw an Omen from this? Besides a single one does not always appear, for they are sometimes seen in Troops. For my Part, instead of drawing a good Omen from this, I look upon it as monstrous. The (‡) Fong wbang is a Bird, which flies as far from Men as possibly he can. Antiently, under the happy and flourishing Reign of Shun, Whan was ordered to be Precedent of the Music; which he rendered so compleat and harmonious, that even the Birds and the Beasts were so charm'd with its Sweetness, that they danc'd and leap'd when they heard it. It happened that in these Circumstances, that the Fong wbang appeared likewise. Afterwards it was vainly concluded, that the Apparition of the Fong wbang was the Effect of the Prince's Virtue, and a Presage of his happy Reign. This was an empty Conclusion. For how many times afterwards was the hong wbang seen to appear under Princes without Virtue, and in Reigns without Lustre: Nay, we may venture to say in Times of Confusion and Horror. The same may be said of the (§) Ki ling, an Animal with four Feet, that I have said of the Bird Fong wbang: He flies from Men as far as he can. Formerly when Ngay kong, Prince of Lü, was hunting, he found one: But the Animal turned about his Back upon him, and without giving him one Look, fled away. Ngay kong caused him to be followed and taken; and he was brought to the Prince, but in Chains, and against his Will.

Confucius relating this Fact in his Chun tsyü, expresses it in four Words, which contain two satirical Strokes. He says: That as he was hunting in the West, he caught a (||) Ki ling. When our Historians mention Hunting, they always mark out the precise Place. In every other Passage of the Chun tsyü, Confucius observes this Method very exactly. In this Passage he uses an indeterminate Expression, in the West; thereby giving us to understand, that Ngay kong exceeded, and did not confine his Hunting to this or that Place, but run over a vast Country. Confucius adds, that he took a Ki ling. This is a very rare Animal, and very seldom to be met with. Confucius thereby intimated the insatiable Avarice of Ngay kong, who drained every thing, and from whom not even the most retired Haunts of Animals could escape. This Passage of the Chun tsyü is, in reality, an ingenious Censure upon the Conduct of Ngay kong.

(*) Now the Province of Se chuen.

(†) The Europeans have translated this Word Dragon, but I have never yet met with any body who has ventured to tell me, that he has ever seen a Long, a Feng, a Li ping, or a Ki ling.

(‡) Other Europeans, before me, have translated the two Letters by the Word Eagle.

(§) Some Europeans have translated these two Letters by the Word Unicorn.

(||) Besides the Chun tsyü here cited, an Ode of the Shi king is entitled The Footsteps of the Ki ling, but it does not mention its Appearance.

But Superstitions gradually gained Ground after the Death of Confucius. The Ki ling was then made a happy Omen for Princes: A thousand idle Stories consequently were spread abroad, and gained Credit to this false Notion. A Fong wang appeared under Shun. As he was a very wise and virtuous Prince, and as his Reign was very happy, it might be then allowable to acknowledge in the Fong wang such a thing as a happy Omen. But since that time, the Fong wang having appeared in the most melancholy and disastrous Times, there is not the least Foundation to say, that the Apparition of this Bird ever conveyed with it what was called a good Omen. There is as little Foundation to what is said of the Ki ling: For, in short, no Ki ling ever appear'd under our greatest Princes, such as Yau, Shun, Yu, Tang, Ven, Vu, Cheo kong. Antiquity never mentions it but once, and that too in a Time of Trouble. Whereupon, then, can the Opinion which I have refuted, be founded.

The Tortoise is likewise given us as a good Omen. As for me, I know that this is a blewish Animal, which we frequently meet with in our Rivers, and is often seen even in the Mud. This Animal after it is dead is of Use. I know that the (*) Pu quan value it, and that Tay, in his Book of Rites, puts a living Tortoise among the Number of good Omens: That according to the same Book, the Virtue of the Prince is eminent, when it causes the Tortoises to come into the Rivers of his Palace. But I know likewise that this Book is a wretched Compilation heap'd together from all Hands, and with very little Judgment; in short, it is a very bad Book. We now shall speak of what is called Tsu yu: I own I am ignorant of what it is, or if by these Words we are to understand Animals, or somewhat else. I know that in the Sbi king we read these Words, "Alas! Alas! Tsu yu." Kya i says upon this Text of the Sbi king, that Tsu was a Park of King Ven wang's, and that Yu is the Quality of him who had the Charge of it. These Words were interpreted thus in the Time of (†) Quay. But lately, Interpreters have made them the Names of two Animals, which they say are of good Omen: And as Tsu yu is not mentioned in another Passage, it is not easy to convince People otherwise, who are positive in this Opinion. As to Tortoises, Dragons, Unicorns, and Eagles, which the Vulgar make good Omens for Kings; it is certain that they have appeared in the unfortunate, disastrous Times of five Dynasties; and they were never seen more frequent, than when the King of Sbi, endeavouring to raise himself likewise, had very near perished. The most zealous Espousers of these pretended good Omens, are surely much puzzled about this Passage of History. I profit by their Perplexity, I attack their vain Credulity, and I endeavour to undeceive them.

The same Ngew yang hew speaks of the Times of the five Dynasties, in the following Terms.

IN the History of the five Dynasties, I don't fail to find fine Examples. There were three Men who then lived, of an unshaken Honesty and Disinterestedness: There were ten who generously laid down their Lives for their Prince. What I think extraordinary, and what raises my Indignation, is, that tho' at that time, as at all others, there were Men of Learning in Posts, and Men who gave themselves to imitate our ancient Sages, I don't find a single Man among these, who has done any thing worthy to be recorded. The three illustrious Persons whom I have mentioned, were all of them Men of the Sword; was it therefore, because at that time, among the Literati, there were no Men of Merit and Virtue? Doubtless not. It ought rather to be attributed, partly to unattentive, unthinking Princes, who did not use proper Means to attract them to their Service; and partly to the Aversion the Literati of true Merit, had to Troubles, and their thinking that Times such as these were, not worthy of their Cares. There is not, said Confucius, a Village of ten Families, wherein the Prince may not find some Subject who is Loyal and Zealous: And I believe he speaks Truth. In effect, in the little Histories of these Days, we meet with pretty singular Passages. The following is of a Woman, by which we may conclude, that if the virtuous Literati did not then appear, it was not because there were none of them in the Empire. A Magistrate, whose Name was Wang ing, who had a Post at some Distance from his own Country, died in extreme Poverty, leaving behind him a Son who was very young. His Wife, the Name of whose Family was Li, soon after set out on her Return, carrying along with her the Bones of her Husband, and leading her Son by the Hand. When she came to the Territory of Kay song, she enter'd into an Inn, where the Landlord, not knowing what to think of a single Woman with a Child, refused to give her Lodging. As Night drew on, the poor Woman begged very hard, and shewed great Unwillingness to leave the House. The Landlord losing all Patience, took her by the Hand, and thrust her out of Doors. Then lifting her Eyes to Heaven, she cried with a lamentable Voice, 'Shall it then be truly said, that being the Widow of Wang ing, I was touched by another Man?' At least, I shall not suffer this unhappy Hand to dishonour my whole Body. When she had spoken thus, she snatched up an Ax, with which she gave herself so severe a Blow that she cut her Hand half off. The People who were passing by, stooped at this Sight, and all the Neighbourhood run to her: Some sigh'd, some wept, and others bound up the Wound. The Magistrate being acquainted with her Story, procured her good Medicines, severely punished the Inn-keeper, took care of the Patient, and told her History at the Court. Oh! with what Shame ought this single Action to inspire the Literati of these Times!

(*) This is the Name of an Office or Profession; Pu signifies the Consulting by Divination or otherwise, about the Choice of a Lucky Day: the Success of an Affair, &c.

(†) At the Beginning of the Han Dynasty.

Hya tsü having been deprived of the Post of (*) Kyu mi, Ta yen was put in his Place; this last was the Friend of the Ministers Fû pi, Han ki, Fan chong yen, and of Ngew yang hew, who was Censor. They lived very intimately with one another, and with some others like themselves; One of which was She-kyay, a Man disinterested, honest, and zealous; but too free and bold in Criticizing and Censuring the Actions of others, in his Verses, which he wrote very prettily. Hya tsü being exasperated at a Piece of She kyay's, and discontented at having lost his Employment, informed the Emperor of a Cabal of certain People, who, as he said, were link'd together against any one whatsoever: He then particularly named Fan chong yen and Ngew yang hew. The Emperor then addressing himself to these Ministers: "I have frequently heard People talk, said he, of Cabals formed by (†) mean Wretches, by base Souls, and Men without Merit and without Virtue: But do honest Men who are in Place, and who have both Merit and Virtue, form their Cabals likewise? Fang chong taking up the Discourse; Sir, said he, when honest People unite together and combine to do good, and principally to serve you and promote the public Welfare, no Inconveniency can attend such an Union, which has nothing in it, but what is both very good and very useful: A Prince ought to be very attentive to discover those Engagements from Engagements which are both criminal and dangerous." Ngew yang hew being informed of what had passed, presented to the Emperor the following Discourse.

SIR: In all Times, Engagements equally honourable and virtuous, and Cabals unworthy and dangerous, have been confounded together: In all Times, this Confusion has laid a Foundation for unjust Accusations. Happy the Accused, who, like us, are under a Prince, who is capable to discern Men of Worth and Probity from mean base Souls. A Prince of this Character soon perceives, that when the former unite, the Links of the Chain which binds them together are Reason and Virtue, and its End is, the Public Good. He sees, on the other hand, that the Union formed by bad Men, is founded only upon Interest. But can this be called an Union? For my share, I believe no such thing subsists among them. Each of them has some View, either of Ambition or Avarice. While he thinks that he can be assisted by others, he appears attached to them; but when these Inducements cease, and greater come in his Way, these Gentlemen are seen to destroy, abandon, and betray one another mutually: Nay, tho' they were allied by the nearest Ties of Blood, nothing can bind them. Men of Honour don't act thus: The Rules of the most upright Reason, and the strictest Equity, are what they propose to themselves inviolably to preserve. Their chief Business lies in giving, every Day, new Proofs of their Zeal to the Prince they serve: All they dread to lose, is their Virtue and Reputation. These are their Maxims, these their Exercises, and these their Interests. Do they intend to endeavour to become more virtuous, and to press to Perfection? They keep in the same Tract, they as it were march in Company, and mutually aid one another. Does it concern the Service of the Prince and State? Each of them, for that effect, contributes all he possibly can, without ever relaxing or prevaricating: Such is the Union of Men of Honour, and such the Factions they form. Thus, by how much it imports the Prince to prevent, or to disperse the Wicked, who are united only in Appearance, by so much it is advantageous to him to cherish that sincere Union which among Men of Merit, sometimes forms the Love of Duty and Virtue.

In the Time of the great Emperor Yau, the Officers of the Court were as it were divided into two Parties: One consisting of four bad Men, of which Hong quang was the worst: The other consisted of eight Yen and eight Ki; that is to say, of sixteen Persons equally wise and virtuous, and perfectly united amongst themselves. Yau banished the four bad Men, and joyfully cherished the Union of the sixteen good ones. Then every thing was in Order, and never was any Government more perfect.

When Shun mounted the Throne, there were at his Court, at one time, Kau yu, Whan, Hew tsü, Ki, &c. in all 22 Persons, and in the most distinguished Ranks. The Union amongst them was great; they reciprocally esteemed, and praised one another upon all Occasions. They contended who should yield to one another the highest Rank. This sure was a great Party; Shun profited by it. His Reign was happy; and the Memory of his Government is celebrated to this Day.

The Shu king says, The Tyrant Chew had under him some Millions of Men, but every different Man had a different Heart. Vü wang advanced against him with 3000 Men, but all these 3000 had but one Heart. Under the Tyrant Chew, as there were as many Hearts as there were Persons, there consequently were no Alliances nor Parties. The 3000 under Vü wang, having but one Heart, they may therefore be look'd upon as one great Party: To this supposed Party it was, that Vü wang owed his Success.

In the Times of the later Han, while Hyen ti reigned, under the fine Pretence of Party and Cabal, all the Literati in the Kingdom were search'd out, seiz'd upon, and imprisoned. When the Rebellion of the Yellow Caps happened, all the Persons of Zeal and Wisdom being in Prison, the Confusion was very great. The Court then opened its Eyes, repented, and set at Liberty these pretended Caballers. But this Repentance was too late; for the Evil had gained so much Ground, that it could admit of no Remedy.

Towards the End of the Dynasty Tang, the like Accusations were renewed. This Abuse still encreased, and under the Emperor Chau tsong it grew excessive: This Prince put to Death the very best Men of his Court, for this pretended Crime. The Instigators of this credulous Prince, by his Order, caused a great Number of Men of Merit, to be drowned in the (*) yellow River; joining a poor Clench of Wit to that Cruelty, and saying, that these Gentlemen, who piqued themselves so much in being pure and (+) unstained, ought to drink of these muddy troubled Waters. The Consequences of these Disorders were, that the Tang Dynasty ended. Let us recapitulate all these Passages of History.

(*) This Post was like that of President of the Council of War. meanings, tho' Syau literally signifies Little, and Jiu, a Man.

Among all the Emperors who have yet reigned, none of them had Subjects so averse from uniting, as that bad Prince Chew, the last of the (‡) Shang. Every one of them minded only himself; and this was owing to that Tyrant. Never did any Prince take more Precautions to keep good Men from uniting together than Hyen ti, the last of the Han, did. He kept them all shut up in very close Prisons. Never did any Prince treat Men who were united by Virtue, so cruelly, as Chau tsong, the last of the Han, did. These Princes therefore perished miserably, and ruined their Dynasties. No Court had ever Officers more united, than that of Shun. This Prince never thought proper to express any Dislike at this, but employed every one according to his Capacity: He had no Reason to repent of this. And Posterity, far from blaming, commends, and ever will commend him, for knowing how to distinguish in this, as well as in all other things, betwixt Men of Honour and groveling mean Souls. Yu wang owed his Success and his Empire to the Union of 3000 Men, who all had but one Heart. When they who are united, how ever great their Number may be, are Men of Honour and Probity; their Union is as advantageous to the Prince and the State, as it is agreeable to themselves. I present to you these Passages of History as a Kind of a Mirror, wherein every Sovereign, in my Opinion, may discern clearly enough, that which may be dangerous or useful in every Incident of his Life.

Discourse of Chin hau to the Emperor Shin tsong, upon the principal Part of the Art of Government.

SIR; I most respectfully tell you, that the great Art of Reigning consists in rightly examining the true Doctrine of Antiquity; and in following it: In thoroughly understanding and penetrating into the Difference between Good and Evil; and in knowing where the one begins, and the other ends; lastly, in rightly distinguishing betwixt Subjects who are loyal and zealous in Reality, from those who are only so in Appearance. But when the Prince knows how to do all this, he must likewise possess a determined Resolution, and attach his Heart immovably to Good with an upright Intention. If a Prince is not well founded in what is called the Principles of Reason, Justice and Equity; if he has not clear distinct Notions of all these, he is subject to lend an Ear to a thousand bewitching Discourses, which easily seduce him to take Bad for Good: And if his Resolution is not firmly determined, he will soon quit the Good he has already embraced. A Prince ought to lay it down as a Principle, never to deviate from the Maxims of our ancient wise Men. Let him propose to himself, to imitate the Government of our ancient Kings, and not to hearken to the Maxims which the Corruption of latter Ages has, as it were, established. Let him labour to perfect his own Understanding: Let him put Confidence in deserving Persons: Let him absolutely, and without Regard to any, banish from all Employments, those who want either Honesty or Virtue. Let him advance and raise none to the first Ranks, but Men of approved Wisdom. Thereby he may hope to revive the happy Times of our three ancient Dynasties. But the greatest Misfortunes of States, commonly proceed from small and insensible Beginnings. You must therefore possess a continual Attention, besides a firm and determined Resolution: An Attention which never becomes habitual, but by exercising it by little and little, tho' with Constancy. For this Reason, our ancient Kings, even in the Time of their Diversions and during their Meals, caused some Instruction to be read to them; and kept near their Persons a Man of approved Honesty, who was capable to aid them in this Exercise; and thereby they became famous and virtuous Princes. Behold then, Sir, I speak it with Respect and Obedience to you; behold, what I wish with regard to you.

I wish that your Majesty would make Choice of learned and virtuous Men, who being free from the Trouble of Employments, may entertain you in a manner that is agreeable, but proper to cherish your Virtue. I wish, out of all the wise Men in your Empire, that you would chuse those Persons for Censors, who have the openest Sincerity and firmest Resolution: And give them to understand, that you seriously recommend to them carefully to examine the Faults committed in your Government, and the Abuses established therein, in order to inform you of them with Freedom. Your Majesty, every Day thus acquiring Understanding, will greatly strengthen the good Foundation which you have already laid; and in the End, succeed in establishing a Form of Government upon the noble great Rules of our Ancients. At present, we see with Grief frequent Troubles arising in the State: There are nothing but Robberies on all Sides. The Corruption of Manners is grown to such a Height, that People now blush at nothing. So that we may truly say, that you do not express a Value great enough for Virtue, and that you don't shew Ardour enough for true Wisdom. Make the Maxims of our ancient Sages your sole Study, and the Examples of our ancient Kings your Patterns. Apply yourself in good earnest to follow these Maxims and Examples, for that is the Means of procuring the Happiness of your Subjects.

Discourse of Wang ngan shê to the Emperor Jin tsong, who had reigned a long time, and neglected the Affairs of Government.

SIR: To judge by the History of past Times, when a Reign is long, it is not enough that the Prince is neither too violent nor too cruel. He must have for his People a tender constant Compassion, which renders him attentive to their Exigencies, otherwise, there frequently happens very fatal Troubles. The longest Reigns that have happened since the Days of the Han, were those of the two Vu ti; one, of the Dynasty of the Tsin, the other of the Dynasty Lyang. These two Princes had a great deal of Spirit and Capacity. In the Beginning of their Reigns they did great things; but as they had not a great enough Stock of Tenderness for their People, they at length relaxed: Having neither Wars abroad, nor Commotions at home, they lived as it were from Day to Day, without thinking of what might happen, and above all things, they were far from imagining that they had ought to fear as to their own Persons: Yet they had Difficulty to escape the Fury of the Rebels, and had the Mortification to see the Palace of their Ancestors insulted and demolished; Their Wives and Children in the greatest Want; Their Fields drenched in the Blood of their Subjects, and Hunger kill those who had fled from the Sword. What a Grief was it for a good Son thus to see his illustrious Ancestors dishonoured, what a Grief was it to a Father, for such is a Prince with Regard to his Subjects, to see his Cities and Fields filled with the Dead! They never imagin'd that any such thing would happen. They saw but too late, that these unforeseen Misfortunes were the Fruits of their Indolence.

In effect, the Empire is as it were a fine Vessel equally large and precious: In order to preserve it in a fixed firm Situation, it requires all the Force of the wisest Laws. And in order to keep it safe, it must be committed to the Custody of the most understanding faithful Men. But if a Prince is not animated with the most tender and constant Love for his Subjects, he is in time weary'd out by the fatiguing Cares, which the Support of the Laws and the right Choice of his Officers require. Months and Years pass without his giving himself any Trouble: And while he thinks only upon living quietly, Things appear to go on in their Channel: This Tranquility perhaps may last for some time, but it is difficult to prevent fatal Commotions from happening. You, Sir, have a very penetrating Understanding, with a great deal of Wisdom and Capacity: You likewise love your People; but I entreat you to consider, that you have now reigned for a long time, and in order that you may not be exposed to the Fate of the three Princes I have mentioned, your Love for your People must animate you to support with Constancy, those Cares that are necessary for assuring their Quiet, and the Glory of your Reign.

At present, the greatest Posts should be filled with Men who are virtuous and capable; and the Laws vigorously enforce'd; yet they who rule, are the first to wound them by Regulations inconsistent with them. Amongst your Officers there is a vast deal of Disorder; and among your People a great deal of Misery. Their Manners are every Day more and more corrupted: Abuses increase; and in the mean time, your Majesty enjoying the Honours and Delights of a Throne, remain inactive without minding the Choice of your Officers, and without informing yourself of what is requisite for maintaining or reviving good Order. As for me, I own that my Zeal does not permit me to see such a Negligence without Grief and Uneasiness, nor even to wink at it. A Reign or a Life of this Kind, cannot be very lasting. The three Princes I have mentioned prov'd this; profit by their Misfortune, and don't think you have done enough for securing the Repose of your Empire for ever. I dare say that if you regard this; you will have always some-what to do. Nay, I must add, that if your Indolence continue much longer, I very much fear that it may cost you dear; and then, a useless Repentance will avail you, as little as it did any of these three Princes.

An (*) inveterate Disease, says the Sbu king, requires a strong Medecine which is nauseous to take. I therefore intreat your Majesty to be less sensible of the Nauseousness of the Remedy, than of the Danger of the Disease, with which you are so violently attack'd: Your Majesty having done me the Honour to call me near your Person, and to make me Superintendent of the Officers in your Train, I have a particular Obligation to watch over every thing that may wound the good Order of your Court, the Repose of your State, or the Glory of your Reign. With these Views and from these Motives, I presume to present you with this Remonstrance; being persuaded, that if your Majesty will seriously reflect upon what I have laid before you, you will perceive its Importance better than any body else, and rouse yourself to the great Advantage of all your Empire.

Extract of a DISSERTATION of the same Minister.

IN the Book from which these Pieces are taken, there is another of the same Author. It is a Dissertation wherein he handles the Question; Whether it is lawful for a Son to revenge his Father's Death with his own Hands? He pronounces in the Negative. To suffer such a thing, says he, at a Time in which Laws are in Force, would be a great Disorder. Others before him, have handled the same Subject, especially two famous Literati under the Tang Dynasty; namely, Han-yu, and Lyew tse hew. They agree with Wang ngan shê, that Recourse must be had to the Tribunals. Wang ngan shê proposes an Objection drawn from the Book Chun tsyû, which is ascribed to Confucius, and from a pretty ancient Book of Rites. In answer to these two Texts, he says; That a Son's being authoriz'd to revenge the Death of a Father with his own Hand, is to be only understood of those Times, wherein the Empire being in Confusion and Disorder, no recourse could could be had to Magistrates: He likewise objects that which is found in an apocryphal Collection of the Ordinances of (*) Chew kong, who was famous for his Wisdom and Equity. It is there said, that a Son who kills the Murderer of his Father, provided he immediately declares it to the Magistrate, is not blameable. If, answers Wang ngan shê, there are Magistrates who are in a State to receive and to hear him, why does he not rather apply to them for Justice? No, there is no Appearance that this Regulation was made by Chew kong. Wang ngan shê in the same Dissertation, taking it for granted, that it is a lawful thing, and even a Duty, for a Son to wish that his Father's Death should be revenged; in the Conclusion puts the following Case. The Empire is in Confusion, the Laws have no Force; a Son pursues the Murderer of his Father; they who have the largest share in the Commotions, and thereby have Power in their Hands, support the Murderer in such a Manner, that the Son cannot, without perishing, revenge his Father's Death. What shall he do? Ought he to pursue the Dictates of that Revenge at the Price of his own Life, or to renounce his Revenge, that he may not leave (†) his Father without Posterity. To have it in his Power to revenge the Death of a Father and not to do it, is inconsistent with the Tenderness of a good Son. To revenge his Death, and thereby to extinguish his Posterity, is directly contrary to perfect filial Piety. My Opinion however is, (‡) that it is better to live and to bear with the Confusion, which the not revenging a Father's Death may Occasion; but to cherish in your Heart the Desire of revenging, if possible without your own Death, the Death of your Father. This is all that depends on a reasonable Man. The Possibility of revenging or not revenging, depends on Tyen. To vanquish yourself and to respect Tyen; where is there any thing blameable in this?

A Picture of Wang ngan shê by Su yun, who seeing that Wang ngan shê of whom he had a very bad Notion, was rising at Court, and was upon the Point of obtaining the first Posts, he composed the Picture of a Person, and sent it secretly to Chang ngau tau who was in Post, that he might give him to understand, that it was of Importance that Wang ngan shê should not be raised any higher, or become Minister of State.

IN Affairs of this World, certain Effects follow certain Causes so naturally, that I think one may almost infallibly foretell them; tho' no body but a Man who is out of the Question and entirely at his Ease, can do it with Success. When the Vapours form a Circle round the Moon, every one says, We shall have Wind. When we see Sweat upon the Stones, we are told it will rain. Whence does it proceed, that from these Causes the most Ignorant can conclude what the Effect will be: And that in the Affairs of Life, most People, who are otherways very clear sighted, do not perceive the natural Connection between certain Effects and certain Causes? It is because Interest or Fortune trouble us without: One Man has his Hopes, and another his Fears. Prejudices, form'd by our Passions, possess us within. We have an Inclination for one thing, and an Aversion for another.

Formerly, Shan kyu ywen having observed Wang yen, pronounced without any Scruple, that he would deceive the whole Empire and render the People unhappy. Quo fwen yang having examined Lü ki: If ever, said he, this Man is advanced, it will be at the Expences of our Posterity. O how much more surely may we at present, pronounce what the infallible Consequences of advancing (||) a certain Man will be! For in short, according to what History relates to us of Wan yeng, he was a very dexterous Hypocrite, and had a certain natural Air of Politeness and Gentleness, which he abused, in order to surprize and gain those whom it was his Interest to please. He was a Rogue and a Cheat: But he was neither covetous nor malicious. Under a Prince less weak than Whey ti was, Wang yen could have occasioned no Trouble.

As for Lü ki, he was indeed a very bad Man, and capable of undertaking any thing: But he had neither Knowledge nor Politeness. His Air, his Discourse, and his Manners, were every where forbidding. No Prince, but one as weak as Te tsong, would have suffer'd himself to be govern'd by a Man of such a Character. From all this we may conclude, that the Predictions of Shan kyu ywen and Quo fwen yang, about Wang yen and Lü ki, may yet appear not entirely infallible.

At present a Man is raised, who has continually in his Mouth the finest Maxims of Confucius and Lau tsé, but in his Conduct he follows the Example of (§) Quan chong; he has formed a Retinue of certain Literati, whose Fortunes are disproportioned to their Ambition: They and he have in their Conferences, formed a particular Jargon of their own. They give one another new Names, and strive with one another, who shall bestow the greatest Encomiums upon this School Master of theirs. A Man needs not stick to say, that Hyen jen ywen or Meng tsé, are revived. Let us examine him a little nearer. At the Bottom he is a very bad Man, who conceals under certain

(*) The Regard which the Chings have for their ancient Sages, and their Books that are acknowledged as King, is such, that when any thing containing in them, is clearly proved to be contrary to Reason, they say, that it must not be attributed to these great Men. If any thing is found in their King that is plainly trifling, they chuse to say, that it is a Corruption of the Text, or an Addition of after Ages, rather than to allow that their King originally had any thing in it that is bad. [Is not this a much better Way of saving the Credit of their Canonical Books, than that of justifying such Passages, and maintaining the Doctrines contain'd in them to be good and rational?]

(†) This supposes that he is an only Son, and without Male Issue. Tho' Wang ngan shê does not express this to be the Case.

(‡) We here perceive the Superiority of Christianity over

Philosophy. Let us ask Wang ngan shê a Question: If vanquishing ones self so, as even voluntarily to renounce the Desire of revenging a Father's Death, and to leave Vengeance to that which you call Tyen, would not be a more complete Conquest of yourself, and shew greater Submission to what you call Tyen? This Question would no doubt puzzle him: He would find this Doctrine sublime: He would hardly say, No. And if he be sincere, he will find where withal to correct him, by attentively considering my Words. [If this Doctrine be taken in too strict a Sense, no Man should pursue a Criminal, Wickedness will abound, and penal Laws become useless.]

(§) Wan ngan shê.

(§) The Minister of Wen kang, the King of Tsi, very skillful at harassing the People.

certain Appearances, as much as he possibly can, a very extraordinary Malice and Avarice. In one Word, Wang yen and Lü ki, may be both found in one and the same Man. You may judge what we are then to expect.

As to his outside Appearance: To wash ones Face, and to clean ones Cloaths, are Cares that every one takes about himself; on the contrary, he affects a fordid Air, his Habits are Worsed, his Dyec very near the same with that of Dogs and Hogs. His Head looks always like that of a Prisoner, and his Face like that of a Man in deep Mourning. At every other Turn he is citing Sentences from our King, but is far from practising them in his Conduct. It is ordinary enough, that a Man, who against common Sense, and the most reasonable Inclinations of Nature, strikes into Singularity and an equivocal Outside Appearance, is at the Bottom a bad Man, and wants to disguise himself. This is the Method which Iya shu tyau and Keyfang took, for insinuating themselves at the Court of Fey, where they turned every thing upside down. This too is the Path which this Person treads: Notwithstanding of the good Intentions of an equitable Prince who is zealous for good Order, and notwithstanding of the Capacity of a great and a wise Minister, I see him ready to step into the highest Honours which he has always in his Eye. If this shall happen, (I dare to say this with a great deal more certainty, than what was formerly said about Wang yen and Lü ki) it will be for the Curse of the Empire. If he is stopp'd on his Road, and banished, the Generality of Mankind who are not acquainted with him, will not fail to blame and to cry out against me. It is a Loss, will they say, he was a Man of Merit: Sü syun has carried his Distrust and Suspicious too far. But if he continues to go on, and if he takes some Steps that still remain for him to take; the Sufferings of the Empire will justify my Prediction. I shall then be looked upon as a Prophet: but how small a Consideration is this to a Man who has the Good of the Empire at Heart?

Wang ngan shé became Minister of State: In the Collection from which these Pieces are taken, there are a great many Remonstrances against a Regulation invented by him, which tended to ruin the People: The Memory of this Regulation is cursed to this Day, so that the Prediction of Sü syun was in some Measure justified.

Discourse of Yu t'ing against Auguries, and the Historians who relate them and cry them up.

HOW great Men were our ancient Kings! Their Words were as so many Maxims which might have served for Laws to all the World: And their Actions as so many Patterns to all Ages: Yet notwithstanding the vast Wisdom and Virtues of these great Men, they still distrusted themselves. They were afraid of relaxing and forgetting themselves. In order that they might be kept in Exercise, or corrected in Case of Need, they had always an Officer amongst others of their Train, whose Business it was to remark their Words and Actions, to pass an equitable Judgment upon them, and to transmit them to future Ages. Such was the principal Employment of Historians in their first Institution. Their keeping the Register of Months and Days, in order to give Notice of the Times appointed for Ceremonies, was only an Accession to this Post. The ancient Books contained the Words of our ancient Emperors. The Book which is entituled Tau ki, and that which is called Chun t'fyü, the one of which was written at T'ü, and the other at Lü, are Histories in which their Actions and Discourses, their Conventions and Treaties, their Good and their Evil, their Success and their Miscarriages, are all transmitted.

As for Auguries and Omens, these Books pay no Regard to them. When we come down to the History of the Han, we find that they are collected and delivered with Care; sometimes it was a kind of Cbi, a singular Plant of a reddish Colour; sometimes it was a wild Goose entirely White, here it was a Spring of sweet Wine, and there a sugar'd Dew. Under one Reign, some extraordinary Cloud was remarked. Under another, an antique precious Vase was found. All this was attributed as the Effect of the Virtue of the reigning Prince, or as a certain Prefage of his Success. Never did wise wholesome Antiquity look upon a History as being defective, for not containing any thing of this Nature. And if the Author of a History amuses himself in collecting these kind of Affairs, he certainly deviates from the original Design of History.

As for me, I say that the Happiness or Unhappiness of States depends on Virtue and Vice, and not on these pretended good or bad Auguries. That which rendered the Reign of Yau famous, was the Union which he established among his Neighbours, and the good Intelligence he promoted among the different Kingdoms. Shun could distinguish from among his Officers, and banish from his Court, four bad Men; and could employ sixteen others equally able and virtuous. By this he principally prov'd himself to be the worthy Successor of Yau. Yu knew how to drain off the Waters, and to prepare the Grounds for Culture. This made him famous, and rendered him the Successor of Shun. The Prosperity of Ching tang was owing to his uncommon Charity. The hereditary Virtue, which had for many Generations subsisted in the Family of the Chew, directed him upon the Throne. Can it be denied, that these Emperors independent of good Omens, were very wise Princes, and reigned happily? On the other Hand, (*) Quey ruined himself by his intolerable Pride and stupid Expences. (†) Sin by his tyrannic Cruelty, (‡) Li wang by his Exactions, and (§) Yew wang by his Luxuries, made themselves odious and contemptible. Independently of all Prodigies or bad Omens, these Princes always were, and always justly will be reckoned reckoned Men without Capacity; and their Reigns, which were full of Trouble and Confusion, will be always held in Detestation.

It is said, that in the Times of the Shang under Kau tsong, Mulberry-Trees and Rice were seen to grow spontaneously in the Palace: That this Prodigy was interpreted, as being very unfavourable; and the People were frightened with it. And yet that Emperor retrieved this Dynasty, which was going to decay. Under King kong the Prince of Song, Astrologers tells us, that two Constellations were seen to mingle. Notwithstanding of the frightful Appearance of these Omens, it was to King kong, that the State of Song owed its Repose and Security. This is a Proof, that when a Prince has the Wisdom and Virtue that is requisite to the Rank he possesses, these monstrous Events can never hurt him. Ngay kong the King of Lü caught a (*) Unicorn; and notwithstanding of that good Omen, that Prince being expelled out of his State, was obliged to take Refuge in the Kingdom of (†) Wey. Under Ping ti it was said, that the (‡) Fong wbang were heard to sing; and Wonders were expected from this; yet Vang puen usurp'd the Throne, and interrupted the Han Dynasty. This proves, that if a Prince is without Understanding and Virtue, it is in vain for him to flatter himself with what is called happy Presages.

It is true, that Confucius in the Chun tsü, has pointed out the Eclipses of the Sun, the Earthquakes, the sinking in of Mountains, the falling of Stars, and the Birth and Changes of certain Insects. But this did not proceed from his loving to collect extraordinary things, or to swell his Book: His Design was to induce the Princes, to enter into themselves at the Sight of these Prodigies, and to excite them by Means of the Dread thereof, to correct their Vices, to cultivate Virtue, and to re-establish good Order in the Empire. Besides, that he might not be suspected of supposing the Happiness or Unhappiness of States, and the good or bad Success of Princes to depend on these Events, he expressly finished his Book with the Disaster of Ngay kong, under whom an (§) Unicorn had appeared. Yu tsing then relates certain Passages of the History of the Han, and deplors the Blindness of some Princes in this Point. In short, one of the Emperors of the Dynasty Han, declared against these Auguries, and publicly blamed the Officers of the Provinces, who prognosticated happy Presages. As this Talent became again in Use under the Dynasty Song, Yu tsing exhorts the Prince to abolish them, and to found the Happiness of his Reign upon Virtue, and the Love of his People.

The 7th of the Years named (A) Hi ning, Chinkyé having had a Commission in the Provinces, and having been an Eye Witness of the People's Misery, painted down what he had seen upon a Sheet of Paper in order, to present it to the Emperor: Wang ngan shé who was then Prime Minister, knew very well, that this Misery of the People was attributed to the new Regulation of which he was Author: On this Account, he did all he could to stop the Advices that were given at Court. Chinkyé used a Stratagem, and conveyed his Sheet to the Emperor with the following Discourse.

SIR; I my self have seen the Ruin which the Grass-hoppers made last Summer. There have been great Droughts throughout all the Autumn and the Winter. The End of the Spring is now come, and yet the least Rain has not fallen. The great Draughts has ruined the Corns. It has hindered the smaller Grains, even the Pease, to be sown. The Price of Rice is exorbitant, and every Day encreases. All the World is melancholy and alarmed. Out of ten of your Subjects, there are nine who believe they have reason to fear, that they shall very soon die of Misery. Thus, without any Regard to the prohibitory Edicts, their young Trees have been cut in the Spring. They have fished in all the Rivers and in all the Lakes. Every one of your Subjects endeavour to find wherewithall, to pay your Officers who dun them, and how they shall buy a (||) Shin of Rice. Thus the Trees are ruined in the Country, and the fishing which is hindered from propagating, is destroyed in the Lakes and the Rivers. Besides the Barbarians insult Cbing.

What is the Cause of these Disorders? No other, except that your Officers at the Court and in the Provinces, do not follow Virtue and Reason as the Rules of their Conduct. Alas! Nothing is more easy and more common, then to open a Way to great Calamities. But nothing is more difficult or more rare, than to perceive their Approach at a Distance. They are like Storms that from almost insensible Causes, form and swell by degrees, but pour forth all of a sudden with an uncontrollable Rapidity, and a restless Violence. When Blood runs in Rivulets over the Fields, then the most Stupid can cry out, All is lost! Terrible Misfortune! Dismal Disaster! Wisdom consists not, in deploring these Accidents when they happen, but in preventing their Causes by effectually foreseeing them, and by averting the Evil whether it threatens, or if it actually has begun.

The Evils which I have laid before you are not past Remedy. I only beg your Majesty not to lose Time, but immediately to open your Treasures and your Granaries, for the Relief of the Miserable, and above all things, to annul these burdensome Regulations which are the modern Inventions of your Ministers, but far from being suggested by Wisdom and Virtue. By these Means, you, answering the Intentions of Tyen, may hope to cause the Irregularities of the Seasons to cease, to draw down plentiful and propitious Showers, to restore Life to your expiring People, and for many Generations to secure the Happiness and Glory of your Family.

It is commonly said, that is is of Importance, that a Prince and the Officers who govern under him, should mutually know one another to the Bottom of the Heart. How different is it now-a-days!

(*) The Chinese call it Ki ling.

(†) The Name of a Kingdom.

(‡) A Creature that is famous, and perhaps fabulous. Some Europeans have translated it Eagle.

(§) The Unicorn or the Ki ling, for it is doubtful if the Unicorn is understood by these Words.

(||) The Name of a Measure, and is sufficient for to serve a Man who has not hard Labour for a Day.

(A) That is, the 7th Year of Chin tsong.

a-days! Notwithstanding of my weak Abilities, I see in your Majesty, a Heart full of paternal Tenderness for your People. Ever since your Accession to the Throne, you have given a thousand shining Instances of this. Of the several Measures proposed to you, you have many times embraced that which was most favourable for your People; and you have nothing so much at Heart, as the Lives and Properties of your Subjects. You desire that they may live longer and happier, if it be possible, than the Subjects of Tau and Shun ever did: That is your Ambition; and not to stuff your Coffers, and to heap up more Wealth than there is in all the Empire besides. Doubtless you are far from valuing yourself upon a thing so unworthy of a wise Man and a good Prince.

But your Officers, both at Court and in the Provinces, either have not penetrated, or would not enter into the retir'd Sentiments of your Heart: Among them there is nothing but Exactions, Punishments and Cruelties. Your People, who are subject to Tyen and to you, are reduced to the utmost Extremities. Your Officers who are the Cause, see all this coolly and calmly, without applying the least Relief thereto. You being such as I know you to be, and they being of the Character I have painted, what can we expect from such an opposite Resemblance?

I don't know what your Officers pretend. What I know is, that they are every Day falling upon new Expedients in the Art of Ways and Means of amassing Riches, in which they follow no other Rules but their own Humour and Caprice. At this, I say within myself; Have there then been unhappy Ages and Reigns, without virtuous or able Persons? Must this be attributed to the Prince's bad Choice of Ministers, or to their own ill Government. In happy Antiquity, private Persons of all Ranks, Men and Women, even to the Workmen in the Fields, and the Cutters of Wood, were Zealous for the State. Each endeavoured to assist his Prince in the best Manner he could. At present, Zeal is wanting even in the Body of the Censors. They are all Dumb: or if any of them speak, it is with the View of providing for his own Safety, by excusing himself from a Post which he has not the Courage to fulfill worthily; while your Ministers with insatiable Avarice, pursue what is called Interest, in so base and unworthy a Manner, that there is not a Man of Wisdom or Virtue in the Empire, who has the least Correspondence with them or will even speak to them as they pass by.

Is this to be attributed to the Times? Is this to be attributed to your Majesty? When I would attribute it to the Times, my Memory immediately instructs me that Tau and Shun had a Whan Ki, and such others: That Ching tang and Yen wang had an I and Lyu: That under the Dynasty Han and Tang, all the good Princes had virtuous zealous Officers: That there were Men of the same Character ever since the Beginning of your Dynasty, under your illustrious Ancestors: That there had been seen in several Times, the same Correspondence betwixt the Prince and his Ministers, as there is betwixt the Heart and the Members in the Human Body. It was an admirable Concert regulated by the Voice of the Prince. All conspired together for the Good of the State. And in all the State, such a perfect Correspondence was sensible. Under your Reign, Things are otherways; you are all Clemency and Gentleness, and your Ministers the Reverse.

If this cannot be attributed to the Difference of the Times, it must proceed from your Majesty not following a good Method in the Choice of your Servants, and in the Manner of your Government; this requires your Attention: It concerns the Interest of your House to make a better Choice, and to keep a stricter Hand over those you chuse. A Person who accidentally and occasionally receives a Meal from another, testifies his Gratitude, of which he is void for his Father who has maintained him for so many Years. This Abuse is frequent enough among the meanest People. At present, it is seen to prevail among the Ministers of the first Rank. It is a received Maxim, that Prince and People ought to look upon themselves as Father and Son. With much more Reason ought these Ministers and other great Officers, whom the Prince distinguishes by large Pensions, and by superior Honours, to show him the Gratitude and Zeal of dutiful Sons. But what do we see? On the one Hand, a Prince full of Goodness, and jealous of the Happiness of his State: On the other, Officers, who being satisfied with living upon their Appointments, look upon their Prince not as their Father, but as a Stranger or a Passenger, and are equally indifferent with Regard to the Evils that afflict, or the Dangers that threaten, the State. Is any thing more deplorable than this? Some say, for the Excuse: I confine my self within my own Sphere; I acquit my self of my own Office; I am not concern'd, and it is none of my Business to be troubled about any thing else. Wretched Excuses! It is true, that there are different Ranks and Posts about a Court; but each, in his respective Station, as a good Son owes his Prince, all the Zeal and Loyalty he can pay him, to be defective in any thing of this Kind, is worse than one's disobliging a superior Officer by doing his Duty; and what are all the Advantages he can reap from his Favour with Men, when put in the Ballance with the Misfortune of offending (*) Whang tyen?

For my Share, I see well, that in certain Palaces almost as much respected, and more powerful than yours, the Advice I give you, would have been taken as an Insult and Rashness. I know to what I expose my self: But ten thousand Deaths, shall not daunt me: Behold, what encourages me. Tyen and his Orders, which are above all, claims my Respect; the Honour of my Prince and his Family, which is next to Tyen, my Zeal; and the People, who are next to the Prince, my Compassion: Were I to be cut in Pieces; What am I to be spar'd on such an Occasion? An Insect is crush'd; and who values it?

I am return'd from executing a Commission, which oblig'd me to travel through a good Number of the Provinces, through which your Troops have march'd. A Man, in seeing the State in which the People are, would be apt to say, that there is not a Person in the Empire pire who is charg'd with the Care of them, nor any who is in the least touch'd with these Calamities. Husbands hire out their Wives; Fathers sell their Children; the nearest Relations separate and disperse abroad on all Quarters. Every thing in the Field is ruin'd: neither the Mulberry nor the Fruit-Trees are spar'd. The Havock is irreparable. Many pull down their Houses, and sell the Materials out in Parcels. One Man is harra's'd for Money, another for Gain. But the most merciless Creditors are your Officers and their Commissaries. The poor People languish under their Oppression. One cannot view so much Misery without having his Heart rent. I don't speak by Hearsay: I have seen all I lay before you: I put every thing down, on the very Day it happen'd, in my Journal; and from these Journals, when put together, I have drawn up a Sketch in which it is all represented. As I have put nothing in it but what I have seen, your Majesty may judge that what my Draught contains, is not the Hundreth Part of what has pass'd; tho' I doubt not but what it contains will be more than sufficient to touch your Majesty, to draw Sighs from your Breast, and Tears from your Eyes. But what would be your Grief if you saw what pass'es at a greater Distance, where, as I am informed, the Misery is yet greater. I join this Supplication to my Sketch; I beg your Majesty to examine both the one and the other; if, after mature Deliberation, you (*) execute what I propose, and if in the Space of ten Days it does not rain, order my Head to be cut off, as being a Man disrespectful to T'ien, and undutiful to his Prince: but if, in effect, you shall reap Advantage from my Advice, I shall be so far from expecting any Reward, that I shall always look upon my self as culpable, for having presum'd to act out of my Sphere.

Chin tsong having receiv'd this Draught and Supplication, examin'd them without shewing them to any Body, sending up frequent and heavy Sighs; then putting these Writings in his Sleeve, he shut himself up in the innermost Part of his Palace, getting no Sleep for a whole Night. Next Morning he issued out his Orders conceived in eighteen Articles, which perfectly answer'd what Ching kyé had propos'd; and caused great Acclamations of Joy and Gratitude among the People. Chin tsong, when he issued out that Order, published a Declaration, wherein with a great deal of Modesty he excus'd himself, and press'd his People to advise him. On the third Day a very plentiful Shower fell, which reach'd a great Way round. The Ministers entering in order to congratulate the Emperor, he shew'd them the Supplication, and the Sketch of Ching kyé: To this he added a Reprimand, for which they thank'd him upon their Knees. Wang ngan shé some Days after sought Leave to be retire. People knew very well why, and who had been the Informer against him. Thus Ching kyé was expos'd to all the Creatures of Wang ngan shé. They discover'd that the Address, with which he had convey'd his Advice to the Emperor, was, to send a Courier in the Manner of the (†) Yu tse, who were instigated to demand Justice. Ching kyé lost his Post, was sent as Magistrate to Ing cheu, and the Imposts soon return'd.

In the Collection from which these Pices are drawn, after that which I have just now translated, there follows one of Sü shé presented to the same Emperor (‡) Chin tsong. Sü shé goes a good deal more roundly to work with him than Ching kyé did. This Discourse is divided into three Points. In the first he proves, that the Prince can have no Strength, but in the Affections of his Subjects. He then exhorts him to do all that he could to gain them. All this Point turns on the same Matter upon which Ching kyé has touch'd, namely, the new Imposts, and the new Regulations invented by Wang ngan shé. In the second Point, Sü shé exhorts Chin tsong to promote good Morals and Virtue in his Empire. He says, that upon this, more than upon all his Wealth, depends his Force and Continuance upon the Throne. He proves this by History. One of the Means above others he proposes is, to remove from Posts all Men, who tho' they had Capacity, wanted Virtue. This is always levelled at Wang ngan shé, and to such others. The third Point is upon the Maintenance of the Laws: He makes this principally rest upon the Usefulness of Remonstrances. On this Head he bewails, that the Tribunals established throughout all Ages are now become mute: He then acquaints the Prince that a formidable Authority intimidates them: This is spoke against the Ministers, and particularly against Wang ngan shé. He exhorts the Prince to support the Authority and Liberty of these Tribunals, to fill them with Men of Weight and Authority, whose Understanding may be useful to him, and whose unshaken Firmness may keep the Ministers in Awe. As we have seen these Affairs treated of in several Discourses, and as this of Sü shé is long, I only given the Contents of it, without translating it.

Some Advantages which the Emperor Chin tsong had gain'd over a neighbouring Nation had put him into the Humour of making War. Chang fang ping, who was in Post, resolv'd to dissuade him from it by a Remonstrance. As he did not write well himself, he apply'd to Sü shé, who drew up for him the following Piece.

SIR, The Love of War and of Women are two Passions which appear very different from one another: They however have been compar'd, and at least resemble each other, in so far as, that the Latter in many Respects hurts the Health, and cuts short the Life of a Prince who is tainted with it; in like manner, the former many Ways injures the State, which must infallibly perish when its Prince abandons himself to this Passion. Our antient and wise Kings never made War but when they were indispensably oblig'd to do it. If they gain'd an Advantage over their Enemies, the Fruits of their Victory were a long and a happy Peace. And if they came by the worst, their Losses were not of such Consequence as to reduce them to Extremities. Different Measures were pursued in Times more modern. Our Princes then wantonly made War, only because such was their Will. Thus whether Success or Disasters attend it, War is always a very pernicious Thing. Are they victorious? The bad Consequences of War don't fail to break out, tho' perhaps later, yet not less fatally. Are they vanquish'd? Their Defeat always has very terrible Effects, but nevertheless not so (||) dangerous as those that commonly attend a Course of Victories.

A wise Prince who has gone to the Bottom of this Truth does not suffer himself to be hurried away with the Ardor of signalizing himself by his Exploits, nor even to tempt his Fortune by the Hopes of a Victory, tho' almost certain. He attentively weighs the Evils of War, and never resolves upon it but as the last Tentative. Is a hundred thousand Men brought into the Field? Every thing is in Motion. Large Sums are every Day expended, Millions of Families harass'd, the Cofters and Granaries of the Prince drain'd, the People impoverish'd, and Cold and Hunger prevail. People assemble, they steal, they pillage, and spread Alarms and Confusion throughout all the Empire. The Dying, the Wounded, the Sufferers, break out in Murmurs against the Prince, and bring upon him, as a Chastisement, Inundations, Droughts, and such like Plagues. Sometimes these are occasioned by a General, who being at the Head of an Army, who he knows is devoted to him, puts what Value he has a mind upon his Services. Sometimes by the Subalterns and Soldiers, who being check'd, disband or rebel. In short, War draws along with it a thousand and a thousand Inconveniences: and the Curses of so many innocent People who suffer by it, cannot fail to affect the Prince who loves it, and those who advise him to it. How many Princes either passionately fond of War, or too easy in engaging in it, have proved this by their Misfortunes.

Do not let us, in God's Name, speak of those who have perish'd by shameful Defeats, consider only to what they, whom Victory seems to have followed, have been reduc'd by their Success. Sbi wbang becoming Emperor by the Destruction of six Kingdoms, into which China was at that Time divided, wanted to push his Conquests further. He attack'd (*) Hu and Xweé: What the Empire suffer'd in supporting these Wars is inexpressible. Sbi wbang was obstinate, and extended the Bounds of his Empire, a good deal beyond what our three famous Dynasties possess'd. But when he died he left Things in such a Situation, that the Mold about his Tomb was scarce dry when Eul shi, his Son and Successor, lost his Empire and Life at once.

Under the Han Dynasty, Vu ti being willing to make his best of what Ven ti and King ti his Predecessors had saved, and of the Plenty which their Reign had introduced throughout all the Empire, undertook great Wars. After having subjected and subdued the (†) Hyong nu in the North, he attack'd and subdued a great many other Kingdoms towards the West. Every Year brought about some new Enterprize, and almost always a new Success. At last, in the Year named Kyen ywee, the fatal Consequences of these Wars broke out: More than one Chi bew (§) began to stir in the Empire. These Troubles lasted for thirty long Years, and cut off great Numbers of People. There happen'd on Account of some Sorceries, a remarkable Misunderstanding between the Emperor and his Son; a Misunderstanding which made Seas of Blood stream through the Capital of the Empire, ruin'd the young Prince, and deeply affected his Father. Vu ti indeed bethought himself, and grew more moderate and repented. But it was too late, for he had spent too many Years in War and Confusion.

Ven ti, the Founder of the Dynasty Swei, was no sooner Master of what lyes toward the South of (†) Kyang, than he undertook several Expeditions against the Barbarians. Yeng ti, his Son and Successor, vigorously pursued them: He reduced powerful Kingdoms, and render'd himself very formidable abroad; but the Poople at home being overburdened detested and cursed him: He gave Occasion to Rebellions on all Sides; and these Troubles soon put an End to this Dynasty.

(*) Tay tsong having, with a surprizing Rapidity, subdued Tu que, Kau chang, Tu yu, and other Countries, wanted to signalize himself by some Exploit still more remarkable: He then, without any Necessity, undertook the War against Lyau tong; he marched in Person into the Korea, where he was unsuccessful, and from whence he return'd with Shame. These Wars which he had begun, were still more unseasonably pursued under the Emperess U, whose bad Conduct had well nigh ruin'd the Tang Dynasty. Tay tsong was a Prince whom all the World allows to have had eminent Qualifications: To himself he was severe; to others, gentle, kind, liberal, and indulgent; and yet he was very near falling into the Hands of his Enemies. His Posterity, immediately after him, was in great Danger of being ruin'd: Let it not be said, that their being sav'd was owing as a Reward to his Virtues: We ought to say, that their Dangers were to be attributed as a Punishment of his wantonly making War. Let us return to the Point.

Vu ti and Tay fong loved War: As these Princes, in other Respects had many great and amiable Qualifications, their military Expeditions did not entirely ruin them. Shi wbang and Ven ti, likewise undertook great Wars: As in other Respects, they were cruel and detestable, the sudden Extinction of their Race was the Fruit of their Victories and Conquests. Always when I fall upon these Passages of our History, I shut the Book, and dissolve in Tears: So much am I touched to see that Princes, who had so many great Qualifications, should be so grossly mistaken. O how much had it been to be wished, on their own Accounts, that these four Princes had first met with some remarkable Check; that thereby being disgusted at War, they might have been afraid to be again engag'd in it! Such a Check in this respect, would have been highly for their Advantage. Unhappily for them, they succeeded in their Enterprizes. This Success warm'd them with an Ardour after Fame and Conquest, but blinded them with Regard to all the Consequences: And this makes me say, that if our Princes are victorious, the fatal Consequences of War are a little slower in their Advances; yet they are not less pernicious in their Effects: But when they are conquered, the melancholy Effects of their Defeats are commonly less dangerous. I beg that you would weigh this well.

Sin fong, a good natur'd peaceable Prince, who loved his People very much, reigned for a long Time, without ever once thinking of War. Under his Reign, Arms were encrusted with Rust. This long Peace rendered the Generals and other Officers of War, idle and negligent. Twen hau wanted to take Advantage of this Negligence. He invaded Yen ngan, King ywen, Ling fu, and other Countries with a great Army. The Troops that oppos'd that Rebel, were defeated three or four times. Notwithstanding of these Losses and the great Levies which they were oblig'd to make, not the least Murmur was heard all over the Empire. The War was happily finished, and without any bad Consequences; how happened this? Because they knew their Prince, and that he loved Peace. It was because Tyen ti and Quy shin saw much clearer than the People, that this was no War set on Foot by Avarice, Ambition, or Caprice, but pure Necessity.

Tyen has given you a great deal of Courage, and a large extent of Genius. You have it in View to increase the Wealth and Strength of the Empire. Scarce was you seated on the Throne, when you was seen to be curious about fine Arms, and anxious to be well stor'd with them. The neighbouring States, and your Subjects being heedful of your Actions and Words, concluded, that your Inclinations were for War. Your Ministers then thought this as well as the others. But whether that they were more ignorant or less zealous, they took no Care wisely to oppose these growing Inclinations: Far less did the (*) Kyumi. The Censors themselves were silent, and did not give you the least Advice on this Head. Thus your warlike Inclinations gather'd Strength without any Opposition. Sze kyang and Wban kyang, Men naturally restless, next came in Play: These propos'd to you several Expeditions, as being advantageous and worthy of yourself; some others of their Creatures approved of these Designs. War was made, your Country exhausted by supporting it, and you were frequently defeated. In short, the Wars in the Years Kang ting and King li, which have always been deplored, were not near so deplorable as these. Tyen was irritated, the People exasperated, the Soldiers in the Frontiers discontented, the Court tumultuous and alarm'd, and your Majesty was reduced for whole Months, to make only one Meal a-Day, and that too, pretty late. Behold in what these Expeditions, from which you promised yourself so much Advantage and Glory, ended. Whence proceeded this? It was because you yourself fought for War, without being oblig'd to make it; and your Troops were less animated against the Enemy than against you.

Afflicting as these Losses were, on the one Hand, it was on the other, a singular Favour which Wbang tyen did you in consideration of your Ancestors, by making you reenter into yourself. Alas! The Favour was useless to you, You got about you some Men of trifling Capacities, unable to go to the Bottom of Matters. Their flattering Discourses and Inclinations, allowed you to see nothing in these Defeats, but the Shame attending them. You was positive to wipe all that away by some Victory. Thence proceeded the Expeditions of Hi bo, Mey shan, and Tu li. They indeed succeeded better than the Former; but can these Wars be deemed successful, which occasioned the Death of so many Persons of all Ages, drain'd your State, exhausted your tributary Princes, and whose whole Fruit consists in the Possession of certain useless Lands, and the empty Name of Conqueror.

Dazzled by the false Lustre of this Reputation, without reflecting upon the real Evils which these Wars had occasioned, you undertook a new War against (+) Ngan va. The Expence for the Convoys was extravagant. A prodigious Number of Men died in the Averages. Your Army of 100,000 Men, while you were heaping up Amunition and Provisions, was ruined by Sickness before they came in Sight of the Enemy. This unexpected Misfortune seemed to have cooled you warlike Ardor. But that Passion soon revived. Behold another Army in the Field: Your Troops under the Conduct of Li-byen, had some Advantages; and your Majesty was in Raptures at it. You ordered them to advance, and it appeared, that that at the Bottom of your Heart, you looked upon these neighbouring States as a sure and an easy Conquest.

The Designs of Tyen are difficult to fathom. As for me, I respect and dread them. When in a whole Campaign your Army fights one pitch'd Battle, and comes off victorious, Couriers immediately mediately fly about, and you send Advices of your Victory over all. The great Officers of your Court crowd to give you Joy of your Victory in Writing, as usual. They strive who shall magnify the Success most, and who shall best turn a Complement to please you.

* This was the Name of certain Officers who form'd a Council for the Affairs of War.

(+) Now called Tong King.

In the mean time, a great Number of your Subjects, whose Lives the Sword has cut off, lie dead on the Field of Battle. The Ways are full of People who faint under the Fatigues of the Convoys. Your People in a great many Places, being overburthen'd with their Subsidies and the Cruelty of the Collectors, abandon their Dwellings, and wander up and down. Husbands sell their Wives, and nothing is seen over all the Country, but People who are all pale, emaciated, and ready to hang themselves in Despair. Here a poor old Man weeps over a Son, who was the sole Support of his gray Hairs. There, a Son bewails the Loss of a Father, to whom the War had hindered him from paying the most essential Duties. On one Hand is an Orphan, and on the other a Widow, who sends up the most wofull Cries. Your Majesty neither hears nor sees any thing of this Kind.

It is almost like your Meals, in which you are sometimes served with Beef, Mutton, or other well drest Meats, and you eat heartily: But if before your Meal, you were to see those Animals under the Hands of the Butcher, first to bellow and defend themselves, then to yield to Force, be knock'd on the Head, and have their Throats cut; then stretch'd on the Table, mangled, and hack'd in Pieces: Notwithstanding of all the dressing that could be given them, when they are served up to your Table, the Knife and Fork would drop out of your Hands, and you would not have the Heart to eat them. How would your Majesty behave, could you with your own Eyes, behold the frightful Sight of so many dying Men, and hear with your Ears, the dismal Groans of so many others, who think themselves wretched in living? How can you relish the News of Victory, and the Congratulations attending it? Believe me, tho' you had as able Generals, as well chosen Men, as strong Armies, and as large Provisions of Money and Provisions, as the four Princes whom I have mentioned; yet being instructed by their Example in the fatal Effects, which even the most happy Wars in Appearance produce, you ought wisely to dread to engage in them without Necessity. How much better Reason have you to fear this in the present Situation of Things. Your Officers are not to be compared to theirs. The public Treasures and Granaries are already exhausted. You have scarce wherewithall to pay to the Officers of the Empire, their ordinary appointments, and the Largesses made at (*) Nan kyau, which are of so ancient Usage, have been for a long time retrenched.

However great your Capacity may be, it appears to me, that to stir in such Circumstances, is a very dangerous thing. Sickneses follow, and encrease, Famine. The Robbers from the East and the North, seeing you employed elsewhere, renew their Robberies. If, while you are engag'd in a War of your own making, the People being overwhelmed with always supplying new Subsidies, at length lose Patience, join with, or imitate the Robbers: You will be then reduced to that melancholy State in which the Empire was; when after the Conquests of Sbi wbang, a Robber, who was a mere Scoundrel, by turning Rebel, threw every thing into disorder, and ruined the Dynasty of the Tsin.

I am old, and have had the Honour to serve your Majesty for a long time; my Zeal which was alwas sincere, and increases every Day, makes me pass whole Nights without sleeping, and makes me frequently, even during my Meals, break out into Sighs, and dissolve in Tears. It is a true Maxim, that before we are engaged in any important Affair, we ought to examine if what we design, is agreeable to the Intentions of Tyen (Heaven.) If it is agreeable, it will succeed; if it is not agreeable, it will not succeed. The common Signs by which a Prince can judge whether or not Tyen is favourable to the Designs which he forms, are, on the one Side, regular Seasons, Plenty, Abundance, and other Events of that Nature. Or on the other, a Reverse of all these, Scarcity, Famine, and such like Calamities. But during all these late Years, there has been nothing seen but what is frightful: Eclipses of the Sun, extraordinary Phenomena in the Stars, Earthquakes, Droughts, Inundations, and epidemical Diseases. All these succeed without any Interruption; and I believe that very near the Half of your Subjects are dead. You may, I think by all this, judge if the Heart of Tyen is favourable to your Enterprize, and conclude that it is not.

In the mean time your Majesty, instead of giving up your Design, engages farther and farther in it. I own that this equally astonishes and afflicts me. Does a Son who has offended his Father and Mother, think to appease them? Being more sedate, more assiduous, more docile, and more respectful than he was before his Fault, he makes them sensible that he acknowledges it, and repents. If he does this, they pardon him. But if this Son, instead of thinking upon re-entering into their Favour, shall again break loose in order to trouble the whole House, or to bully and beat the Servants in Presence of his Father and Mother, will such a Conduct be proper for appeasing them? Or will such a Son deserve Pardon?

I therefore beg you to recall the past Time, examine what has made the preceeding Dynasties to flourish, or to fall; and above all things, give a particular Attention to the Will of Tyen, and to the Signs which he gives. Give up your warlike Prospects. Apply yourself to cultivate a good Correspondence with the neighbouring States; to promote good Order and Plenty in your Court and throughout all your Empire; to render your Subjects happy, and thereby confirm your Family mily upon the Throne. Could I see such a Change, I would close my Eyes without regret; tho' I should die on a Dunghill, I shall die satisfied.

(*) That is to say the Suburbs of the South, where the solemn Ceremonies in honour of Sbang ti, or the supreme Emperor, were performed. On this Occasion old Men were treated, and other Largesses were bestowed.

Kau tsü, the Founder of the Han Dynasty, purchased the Honour of a Throne, by the Defeat of several brave and powerful Rivals. Yang yü ti, the Restorer of the same Dynasty, in order to establish it, gave many Battles, and gain'd as many Victories. And yet Kau tsü was very forward to make Peace with the northern Nations. Yang yü ti received, with Pleasure and Thanks, the Proposals that were made him by his Neighbours in the West. Was this because these two Emperors wanted Courage or Skill in the Art of War? Doubtless not: But their long Experience made them to foresee at a Distance, and wisely to prevent, all troublesome Reverses. Your Majesty on the contrary, being at ease in the innermost Part of your Palace, make no Scruple to pronounce; Let these be attacked, and let these be extirpated. Perhaps I am too fearful: I own that this Confidence of yours, to me appears extravagant. But alas what can I do! When a Man designs to dissuade his Prince from any thing, he must watch his Time, and wait till the Prince is half disgusted at it himself: Then he may easily succeed. But to undertake to check the Passion of a Prince when it is in its greatest Force, is attempting a very difficult thing. This is still more true of what is called Ambition, a Passion for Conquest, and a Thirst after Glory. These Passions have a prodigious Sway over the Heart. Whoever possesses these, is hardly diverted from pursuing them, were he one of the petty Literati cloathed in coarse Stuff, if his Spirit is once warm'd with their Force. Yes! while the Passion is strong, to hear the Person who opposes you, to yield up your own Views to the Advice of another, to distinguish what is useful and what is just, in short, to sacrifice your most darling Passions, requires a great Soul, a Penetration, a Moderation, and a Wisdom far above the Level of Mankind.

Your Majesty, who was always passionately fond of War, is more enamour'd with it now than ever. I see this, and yet I venture to dissuade you from it by this Discourse. I do it, first, because having the Honour to know you, I suppose that what is called Greatness of Soul and Moderation, is the same in you, as in other Princes. In the second Place, because I don't at all doubt, but that your Majesty will in the End, heartily repent of having indulg'd this Passion, and that you will then look with an evil Eye upon those, who having the Honour to approach you, did not make to you the least Remonstrance upon this Head. Lastly, because being old and ready to join your Father (†) in another World, I want to prevent the Reproaches he will make me should I, like others, hold my Peace. Think of this, Great Sir, and pardon my Rashness.

MEMORIAL of SU SHE upon GOVERNMENT.

THE Memorial being long, I shall translate some Articles entirely, and give an Abridgement of others.

It is a common Saying and a true; "Other Measures are to be taken in order to govern aright when Times are confus'd, than those which are pursued when all is calm:" And yet there are certain very well known Rules laid down for all these Times. Whence it happens, that a wise Prince or an able Minister, who sees any Perplexity arising, may be sorry, but he never is disconcerted, because he knows what is proper to be done upon these Emergencies. If the People are reduced to Poverty by an Inundation or a Drought, so as to be obliged to disperse themselves, and then to reunite, in order to plunder and to pillage on all Hands: It is well known, that what is then requisite, is to supply the People with Necessaries; and this is the Means of re-establishing Peace. If the Commotion proceeds from a rebellious Subject, who wants to share in Sovereignty, and is at the Head of a powerful Army; it is well known what is then to be done; he must be opposed as soon as possible with good Troops. If it is occasioned by an ungrateful Favorite, who abusing his Princes Favour, usurps his Authority, and without the Concurrence of his Sovereign, makes himself Master of Titles and Fortunes: It is well known, that he must be tried and punished as he deserves, as soon as possible. If the neighbouring Barbarians make Incursions upon our Territories: It is plain that we ought to provide for the Security of our Frontiers. These different Kinds of Troubles, draw after them a great many Evils. But those Evils are felt, they are seen, and their Cause is seen: Thereby a Prince is in a Condition to apply a proper Remedy.

What is troublesome and perplexing is, that when in a State without any of these Causes appearing, all the Effects are felt which they commonly produce: One does not then know where he shall turn his Eyes, and waits as it were with folded Arms till some great Revolution happens; this appears to me the present Situation of Affairs.

For near these (*) hundred Years, the Empire properly speaking, has had no War; and Miracles are talked of this pacific Government. Yet at the Bottom, this is only a fine Name. For in reality the Body of the State cannot be very sound and wholesome, when Agitations and Disquiets affect, and even endanger it, while the Causes are not seen. There are neither Inundations nor Droughts, and yet the People complain and mourn as in Times of the greatest Barrenness. No Rebel has attacked the Empire, or divided its Revenues: Yet these Revenues are not sufficient for their Uses. There is no Favorite at Court, who being too powerful, abuses his Authority. And yet there does not at present appear to be, betwixt the Prince and his first Officers, that fine Harmony that is so essential to Government: And consequently throughout all the Empire the

(†) The Text says, Under the Earth.

(*) This Memorial is of a prior Date to the foregoing Piece. I have already taken Notice, that in the Book from which these Pieces are taken, the Order of Time in which they were composed, is not well observed.

People do not love their Magistrates. Our neighbouring Barbarians have not for a long time, made the least Incurſion upon our Territories. And yet we find, that ſeveral Places of our Provinces are frequently alarmed. Yes! I repeat it; this is our preſent Situation; than which, in my Opinion, nothing can be more perplexing or more dangerous.

A Phyſician viſits ordinary Patients: He feels their Pulſe, he examines their Looks, their Geſtures and their Voices. According to the Rules of his Art and Experience, he determines whether the Diſeaſe proceeds from Cold or Heat, or from a Conflict betwixt both. He proceeds by Rules, and nothing puzzles him. But a Patient of another Kind is preſented to him. It is a Man, who without any apparent Cauſe, is very ill. He eats, he drinks, and acts very near in his ordinary Manner; and when he is aſked where his Illneſs lies, he can't tell you: His Pulſe is not like that of a Man in Health, yet the Phyſician can't account for his Symptoms. If a Quack ſhall be called to this Patient, he will tell him, his Diſeaſe is all a Jeſt, and there is nothing in it. But if the Phyſician is a (||) Pyen ſi, or a Tjong kong, he will be ſurpriz'd and alarm'd. He will perceive that an Evil of this Kind is deeply rooted, and by how much more difficult it is to be diſcovered; by ſo much the more will the Difficulty be to cure it. He will perceive, that ordinary Remedies will avail nothing, and he will ſeriously ſtudy in what Manner the Patient ought to be treated.

I ſee at preſent, Literati, who calling to Mind certain Paſſages of the Hiſtory of the Han and the Tang, and connecting them as well as they can with the Texts of our ancient Books, thereby carefully compoſe Memorials. They think that thus they can remedy the Evils of the Age. But in my Opinion, they are far out in their Reckoning. Our Miſfortunes are of ſuch a Nature, that I can ſee no Remedy for them; except the Prince who is the Head of the State rouſing himſelf, and as it were awaking from his Lethargy, inſpires new Spirit into all the Members of this great Body; that all of them may be ſenſible that he animates them, and that they may know how to behave under him as they ought.

When I look into the Hiſtory of the Ruin of the weſtern Han, I find that neither Tyranny nor Diſſoluteneſs had any Share in it. The Princes under whom it happened, had none of theſe Views: But they were extremely lazy and indolent. They loved their Quiet ſo much, that in order to ſave the Fatigues of ſome Months or Years, they expoſed their Crown and their Families to the Miſfortunes of many Ages. The Sovereign is the ſame thing in a State, as what Heaven is in the Univerſe. (*) Cheong chi commenting upon the Book I king, and ſpeaking of the Properties of the Heaven, takes particular Notice of its conſtant Activity and uninterrupted Motion. In effect, it is this conſtant regular Action that preſerves this World. The Sun and the Moon which give Light, the other Stars which are its Ornaments, the Thunders which are its Voice, the Rains and Dews which are its Benefits, are all the Effects of its Action and Motion. And if the Heaven were without Action and without Motion, I believe that this unmoveable Maſs corrupting of itſelf, and could not long ſubſiſt; far leſs could it influence all the reſt of the System.

If our Prince, taking a happy Byaſs upon this Model, ſhould one of theſe Days diſplay himſelf, ſhining with a new Luſtre, and armed with a noble and formidable Reſolution, ſhould he make all his Subjects ſenſible that he will not bear the Title of Sovereign in vain, and that he is reſolved to animate and be animated for the Good of the Empire which is under him. Then all the Men of Underſtanding would immediately crowd to aſſiſt him with their Advices; and all the Men of Courage would preſent themſelves, and offer to ſerve him at the Expence of their Lives; they would ſtrive with one another, which of them ſhould beſt ſecond the Activity of their Sovereign, and then nothing would be impracticable. But while the Prince, either indolent or irresolute, won't diſcover what his Intentions are, or leaves People to think that he intends nothing at all: Tho' his Officers were equal to the Lyu, the Tſi or the Ki, what can they do? For which Reaſon, I begin this Memorial by requiring in a Sovereign, Activity, and a determined Reſolution effectually to reign and to govern his Empire. I ſhall lay down in the following Articles, what I think is moſt eſſential for doing this with Succeſs.

Su ſhe, after blaming his Prince for too lightly changing the eſta bliſhed Laws and Regulations on account of ſome Inconveniencies, proceeds thus.

They who give theſe Advices, are Literati of a pedantic Knowledge, who found their Opinion upon ſome particular Inſtance of Antiquity. As for me, tho' I own, I think there is ſomewhat defective in our Laws as we now have them; yet the bad Succeſs of the Government is not owing to that Defect, but to the wrong Choice of Men who are put in Poſts. The Laws and Regulations of a State reſembles the five Sounds of Muſic; in the Combination of the five Sounds with the ſix Lyu, ſome can't fail being of a tender laſcivious Strain. In like manner, ſome Inconveniencies will attend ſome Laws and Regulations that are made. Our ancient Sages ſaw this well; therefore their Laws and Regulations were very few. The reſt they truſted to the Virtue and Diſcretion of the Perſons whom they put in Poſt. The Prince ought to apply all his Cares to the right Choice of a firſt Miniſter: But he ought after that, to put a real Confidence in him; and to be thoroughly convinced that he deſerves it. If the Miniſter perceives that the Prince renders himſelf dark with Regard to him, he, on his Part, will be fearful and reſerved: He will then only half profit by his Talents, and nothing that is great can be done.

This Confidence is the more requiſite at preſent, in that, if a Miniſter would put Things upon a good Footing, he will find great Obſtacles in the abandoned Indolence that has crept into all the Members of the State, which is the Reason why People only think of the present, and never disturb themselves about what is to come. A Minister in such Circumstances, must have the Courage to raise himself above the common Ideas, and a great many unwarrantable Customs. This cannot be done without his opening a great Field for Envy, Detraction, and Calumny. If he does not see to the Bottom of his Prince's Heart, will he dare to oppose him?

In another Article Sû shé says: When the Empire is disquieted and in Motion, every one endeavours to make the best of his Talents that he can. Whence it frequently happens, that they who have Courage, having different Interests, endeavour to ruin one another; while they who have only Cunning, supplant and destroy one another with less Noise. These Parties by little and little gain Strength, and put the finishing Hand to the Disorders and Confusion of the Empire. When Peace is re-established, the new Emperor being informed that the former Troubles were occasioned by the Ambition of certain Persons of a greater Merit than ordinary, in order to shun the like Misfortunes, employs only Persons who are naturally gentle, fearful, unambitious, and without any great Capacity. What is the Consequence of this? At the End of a few Years, if the least Difficulty occurs, the Prince has not one Man from whom he can hope Assistance. And if Assistance does not speedily interpose, every thing at least insensibly languishes, and the worst is to be dreaded for the State.

The Sages of a first Rate observe a different Method. In the longest and most profound Peace, they know how to keep the Minds of Men in Exercise, and to animate the Subjects to do all the Good of which they are capable. For this End, they open different Ways agreeable to the different Inclinations of Men; every one enters with Pleasure into some one of these Ways, every one moves, acts, labours; one is animated by this Motive, another by that: In the mean time, all this tends to promote the Interest of the Prince and the State. Thus, to open different Ways, and to put your Subjects in Action, calls for your immediate Application, and you cannot begin too soon. All the Objection that lies to this Advice can easily be refuted.

Sû shé in the rest of this Article, refutes a Maxim which is stretched too far concerning the Gentleness and Indulgence that is proper for the Sovereign, and the Misapplication of the Doctrine of (*) Chong yong by some Pedants.

In another Article Sû shé says;

Sir, behold what is said in general of an Emperor; being placed as it were by way of Loan above the rest of Mankind, charged with extending his Cares to an almost endless Space, that every thing may be kept in order; (†) Does he prosper? Nothing is more high or more firm. Does there happen a troublesome Reverse? Nothing is more abject, nothing more frail. And the Transition from the one State to the other, depends very often upon a mere Trifle. Therefore a Prince who is truly wise and provident, does not lay near so great a Stress upon the Means of making himself feared, as of the Measures he takes to make himself beloved. Whatever Care he takes to maintain his Authority, and however well established it appears, yet it is not chiefly upon this that he founds his Confidence; but upon his knowing that he is too well beloved for any Subject to fail in his Obedience and Respect. He immediately, and in his own Person, assures himself of the Hearts of those he employs: And they, by a wise and loyal Conduct, secure the Hearts of the People. This is his most effectual Security in his high and elevated Situation. He who founds this Security upon his Name of Emperor, or upon his Sovereign Power, or upon the happy Situation in which he has put Things, may indeed maintain his Authority for some time, if no Difficulty occurs; But does a perplexing Juncture happen all of a Sudden? He finds no Zeal in his Servants: They are all with Regard to him, as to one they had met by Accident upon a Road. Does two Roads meet in one? They salute one another in Form, they coldly take their Leave, and each goes his own Way.

Behold what happens to Princes who are too haughty, and who have only the Art to render themselves formidable. Are they in any Difficulty? In vain do they look out for some one to assist them, for no body appears, and this for two Reasons; First, because the Prince is not beloved. Secondly, because his Haughtiness and Fierceness having driven from his Court the Men of the greatest Merit, and kept all others in Fear and upon the Reserve, no body has been accustomed to manage that precious Vessel; and in Times of Trouble and Confusion, every one declines to take the Trouble of it. From all this Sû shé concludes, that the Prince, far from keeping this Vessel always shut up, ought to act so, as that a good many People may be accustomed to manage it: That is to say, that he ought to invite into the Government, all the Men of Abilities that he can, and give each of them an Opportunity of exercising his Talents. He then complains, that Emperors frequently render themselves too inaccessible, both by the Fierceness and Haughtiness with which they treat their Ministers and great Officers, and by a hundred perplexing Ceremonies that are too mortifying and too troublesome. He then shews, that the greatest Emperors both of ancient and modern Times have acted otherways. It is true, says he, that Antiquity recommends to Sovereigns a Gravity worthy of themselves, and a continual watching over their Words and Actions. But it is likewise true, that certain injudicious Literati by abusing many Texts, cherish the Pride of Princes. .... That which seems, continues he, to press most in the State of Indulgence and Laziness, that has gained upon all the Members of the Empire; is, that his Majesty who is the Head, rousing himself and gathering new Strength, would put all the rest in Motion; for this End he lays down five Articles in the following Terms.

1. It is certain, that next to the Sovereign, upon the Ministers and great Officers of War, depends the Happiness or Unhappiness of States. It seems to me, that your Majesty ought to call them frequently into your Presence, and to reason with them upon Affairs. The frequent Councils you hold with them, will produce good Views; at least your Majesty will reap this Advantage, that you will thoroughly be acquainted with your Servants.

2. (*) The Tay chew tse, are they to whom you entrust the Care of your People in the Provinces. It would be proper, when they are changed, either when they are going elsewhere, or when they retire from Business, for them to be obliged to repair to Court; and that your Majesty should set a-part a Time for admitting them, and enquiring at them about the Customs and Manners of the Place they have just left, about the most perplexing Affairs that have occurred therein, and upon the Expedients that contributed most to disengage them. Besides that these Informations may be very useful to you, you will thereby discover the true Talents of Magistrates.

3. In all Times, our Emperors had certain Officers appointed, whose Employment is to entertain them with useful Discourse, and to read and explain to them our King. For a long Time this has been so easily dispensed with, or so superficially perform'd, that it is done with no Advantage: and yet nothing was more wisely establish'd, or more useful, if it is conscientiously discharged. I wish therefore that your Majesty, instead of naming the Officers as you do without much Care, and merely for Form-sake, would chuse Persons proper for this Office: And that they on their Part, without confining themselves to a cold tiresome Lesson upon the King, were capable, upon these Texts, to entertain your Majesty with whatever is most useful and curious in the History of all Ages.

4. If, among the Advices or Memorials that come to your Hands from the Provinces, there are any that either for their fine Dress or Solidity, are above ordinary, it would be proper for your Majesty to call the Author to Court; to interrogate him, to shew him some Marks of Goodness and to commend him, were it no more than to encourage and inspire him with more Liberty to give you useful Advices upon Occasion.

5. Tho' the meanest Officers do not commonly converse with the Prince himself, yet in my Opinion, your Majesty being acquainted by sure Methods, that any one amongst them has done his Duty, should, all of a sudden, and without telling him for what, call him to Court, and acquaint him that you know and approve of his Conduct, and let him taste of your Bounty. This will not only be attended with no Inconveniency, but it will be a good way of inculcating the Sentiments of Honour and Virtue upon others of his Rank. They are very numerous, and considering their small Appointments and the vast Distance that they believe is betwixt them and the Sovereign, they may grow negligent. Both they and all the Empire will thereby perceive the vast Tenderness your Majesty has for your People; your Care to contribute all you can to promote their Happiness, and your Value for Merit in all Ranks of Life; and this, in my Opinion, will be a new Mean, besides those pointed out by the Laws, to encrease the Number of good, and diminish the Number of bad, Officers.

In another Article the same Sa shé says, When no Petition is sent to Court, and when in effect no Person in the Empire has Reason to complain; when no Suppliant appears, and when throughout the Empire every body has either what he wishes, or what he in reason ought to wish for; it is the Effect of the most fine perfect Government in the World, and the brightest Proof of the superior Wisdom, and the perfect Disinterestedness of those who govern. Such were the happy Reigns of the great Princes Tau and Shun. But if it be impossible to put an end to all Supplications and Accusations, it ought to be so ordered, that these Law-suits and Petitions be dispatch'd quickly and without Delay, that the Officers of the Provinces may not affect so prodigious a Distance from these of the Court, and that the most common People may find an easy Access to the Officers of the Provinces.

Man, for instance, has a Heart and two Hands; does he feel a Trouble in any Part about him, were it but an Itching, tho' the Uneasiness in the Main is inconsiderable, and incapable to alarm him, yet he can't keep his Fingers from handling the Part affected, and that too very frequently. Every Time they approach it, is it by an express formal Order of the Heart? No, there is no Occasion for such a precise premeditated Order. For as the Heart naturally and habitually acts for the whole Body, the Hands are likewise naturally habituated to follow the Propensity of the Heart. In this Manner, Things are managed in a State which is governed by Sages of the first Rate. A tender and sincere Love unites the Head with the Members, and the Members with the Head, which is the Emperor, in such a Manner, that their Evils and Dangers, great and small, are in common, and the reciprocal Assistance they give one another is very ready. We don't see this Now-a-days.

Does any one, who is oppress'd or in pinching Necessities, carry his Complaints, or displays his Rights at Court? It is as if he address'd Tyen or Quey shin, for he receives no Answer. The Ministers and other great Officers never by themselves examine Things to the Bottom, but rely upon their inferior Officers. It is thus commonly with mean interested Souls who do nothing but for Money. But when once they receive that, the Affair is dispatch'd in less than a Day. But, do the Petitioners come to them empty handed? they let them dance Attendance

* The same that is now Chi fa, or the first Civil Officers of a City of the first Rank. There are in this Province always several dance for a whole Year. Do you ask of them the most just Thing in the World, and Things that cannot be refus'd you? They find Means to put you off a long Time that they may force you to purchase them. In short, you must either stay for the meere Trifles, or go without your Business.

Under some preceeding Dynasties there were Junctures, in which the Laws being ill-digested or destitute of Vigour, gave Rise to Cheats and Injustice. At present when that Door is shut, another is opened. Law itself is made a Trade of: Is a Man to be wrong'd? They seek in our Laws some Quirk, to which, under some specious Pretext, his Affair may be reduc'd, and by which he may be cast. Is another, who pays well, to be favour'd? However unjust his Plea may be, it is put in such a Light, that under Favour of some Article of our Laws which relate to his Case, he gains his Suit. At present, they complain much of the Multiplicity of their Business. But this is not in reality, because they have more Business now, than they used to have at many other Times; but because the Officers are neither industrious nor expeditious, because they devolve every Thing upon their Underlings who prolong them, in order to extort what they want: thereby their Business grows from Day to Day, from Month to Month, and from Year to Year, till they can scarce see the End of it. Make your Officers laborious and expeditious, otherwise there is no Remedy.

One of the Things which our antient Kings fear'd most, was, least some one of their Subjects losing Courage, and despairing of Success, should entirely abandon the Care of his Honour and Fortune. These wise Princes knew well that when it comes to that Pass they never stop half way in Wickedness, but hold on till they commonly became incorrigible. For which Reason, one of their greatest Cares was to act in such a Manner as that their Subjects, being always animated by Fear and Hope, should never be weary of doing Good. With this View, having establish'd different Degrees of Distinction, and different Posts, to which considerable Appointments were annexed, they never bestow'd them but upon deserving Persons; but they never laid any Man under an Incapacity of enjoying them, and thereby they animated every one to aspire to them. The Road to these Posts and Honours was open to all their Subjects; and they who did not arrive at them, could not justly impute it to any Thing but to their own Disorders and Weakness. Thus there was seen through all the Orders of the State not only a great Ardour for well-doing, but likewise an admirable Constancy not to relax nor prevaricate.

But still what Secret had our ancient Princes to arrive at this? It was as follows: Being persuaded that the Son of a Man of Quality, when he degenerates, has nothing that can in Reason set him above the Level of the most common People; they had Regard to nothing but to Merit and Capacity; they were so determined in this, that be his Birth what it would, without these two Qualifications, he never could propose to be advanced: Thereby, Men of a high Birth had a Check put upon that Licentiousness, which is so natural to them, and they endeavoured to support their Ranks; thereby, the meanest who were conscious of Virtue had a Spur to excite them; thereby, throughout all the Empire a generous Emulation, which produced admirable Effects, encreased every Day. O! what just Notions had these antient Princes! In Progress of Time this Method was lost. Certain Employments were annexed to Persons of a certain Rank; while others, on the contrary, however great their Merit is, can never arrive at the same Employments. Yet now, as formerly, some Promotions are always made with an Eye to Merit and Virtue; at least this is pretended: but I find wrong Measures are taken for this. For Instance, it is now regulated, that when a Man has got his Degree of (*) Tseng tse, he is sure of a Post, which renders him equally noble and rich. Is not this Promotion a little too swift? He has succeeded very well in his Exercises on the Day of Examination. But must we conclude from this that he has Capacity and Genius for his Affairs? What I think still worse is, that those of a certain Condition are either entirely precluded, or some Bounds are assign'd them, beyond which they cannot pass. The Officers of the (†) Cheu and the (‡) Hyen, when they are once divested of their Posts, can never recover them. These then become People, who being reduced to Despair, and who having nothing further to hope for or to fear, grow capable of any thing, and do great Mischief among the People. Such a one amongst them, at the Bottom, is an honest Man; he has Merit and Capacity: An unlucky Accident happens to him, for which he is broken. Thenceforward no more Employments to him, he is put under an everlasting Incapacity, and is a Man who, contrary to the Maxims of our Antients, is render'd desperate, and who consequently is exposed to the Temptation of being very wicked.

I think that these Officers, when they are cashier'd, which in my Opinion never ought to be done but for some grievous Faults and such as shew the Offender to be a bad Man, should have Opportunities and Means of repairing their Faults; at least, they should be left in a Condition to hope to recover their former Character. As the lower Officers of these great Tribunals of the Court are People that cannot be wanted, it has been thought expedient, in order that the Vacancies in their Posts may be supplied, to make a Regulation, that after so many Years of Service they should have Posts given them in the Provinces. There was good reason for this Regulation; but because these Officers for the most part are but poor, it was thought proper to determine that they should be laid under an Incapacity of rising above a certain Rank: so that tho' amongst them there might be found a Man of the first Merit, he could never arrive at great Posts or Dignities, tho' he had lived vested with an Office ever so long: I think Inconveniences attend this: for, in short, he who enters into Posts, at least in some measure, has an Eye to Honour and Distinction: If he is excluded from this, he has no other View from his Services and Labours but to amass Riches. Then it is natural for him to be in good Earnest about this, and it is to be fear'd that this, becoming the ruling Passion both of his Head and his Heart, will transport him to unwarrantable Excesses.

I say almost the same Thing of those People who, by advancing a certain Sum to the Royal Treasury, obtain such and such a Post, but always with this Proviso, that they can not rise higher. It is natural to think, that they will make as much of their Posts as they can: And then it is to be fear'd, that they sell Justice and make the People suffer. I wish that no Man were made Use of whom we are, if we may so speak, obliged to abandon, and who is thereby exposed to the Temptation of abandoning himself. It would therefore be proper that when a Man is put in inferior Posts, an open Way were left him for attaining to the highest, by his Capacity, Merit, and Services.

A Prince who has just Notions of Things, never believes himself fixed upon his Throne, but in the same Degree in which he sees his Subjects fix'd in the Love of Virtue, and a hearty Aversion to whatever is unjust and unreasonable. These People, who under our three famous Dynasties, never deviated from their Obedience and Duty, however great the Danger, or however strong the Temptation was, Were these People, I say, ever animated by the Hopes of Reward, or check'd by the Fear of Punishment? No. But their Heart being fixed in Virtue and the Love of Justice, they could never resolve upon any Thing glaringly inconsistent with these. Cold, Hunger, Ignominy, Death, in short, nothing could make them forget what they ow'd to their Prince. Behold the Reason why each of our three famous Dynasties subsisted so long! Under the following Dynasties Things were alter'd. The Subjects were then seen frequently to neglect their Duty for private Interest, to forget the Orders of their Sovereign upon the least Danger which they run: they made Use of Artifice and Deceit almost in every Thing; and thus they eluded the most rigorous Laws: In short, having a hearty Aversion for their Governors, they rejoiced in their Misfortunes. Then did Inundations or any other Calamity succeed? Did any Rebellion rise? The whole State was turned upside down, and the Emperor found himself without Subjects. All your Literati of different Ages inform us of the same Thing. Under our three famous Dynasties, say they, great Care was taken of what concerned the Instruction of the People. Publick Schools and frequent Exercises were instituted; and for this, the Rites were rigorously enforced. The proper Usages in assuming the Cap for the first Time, in Marriages and the Times both before and after Burials were observed. This was afterwards neglected, and for this Reason, the People at last blush'd at nothing. Such is the common Language of our Literati. For my Share, I remark, that at different Times, since those of our famous Dynasties, Men of Merit and Virtue being supported by the Authority of the Princes, have reviv'd these publick Schools, re-established these Exercises, and reinforced the Observance of these Rites. If therefore this is sufficient for the Conversion of the People, we ought to endeavour to revive the Manners of Antiquity. But we have seen, on the contrary, that the People, by becoming more polish'd, become likewise frequently more wicked, more cunning, more deceitful, more jealous, and more proud.

This makes me say, notwithstanding my too great want of Capacity, that such of our Literati, who talk thus, love Antiquity without thoroughly understanding it, and that they have not rightly dived into the great Secret; they knew in general, that Antiquity had a right Method for rendering the People virtuous by instructing them, but not distinguishing what was effectual for this Purpose, and upon what it was founded, they took up with fine Names, or at least, with fine Appearances. These Appearances are indeed useful; and without them, the Virtues, which is the solid Part, can scarce subsist long. But if the Prince and the Governors confine themselves to simple Appearances; their Flatterers and some superficial Literati will tell them, that Antiquity is reviving, when in reality there is no Change wrought upon the Morals, and the fine Name of the Restorer of Antiquity cannot be supported.

Vu vang no sooner became Emperor than he gave to the People great Largeesses of Corn and Money, thereby making all his Empire sensible that he was quite free from Avarice. He treated Men of Virtue and Merit with a great deal of Honour; thereby giving them to understand that he was neither proud nor passionate. He vested the Descendants of our ancient Princes with Principalities; and in this his Goodness was display'd. He caused Fey hyen and Ngo lay to be put to Death; by this his Justice appeared. In this Manner a Prince ought to act: In this Manner he ought to begin, if he wants to labour with Success, either in forming or reforming the Manners of the People. Every Body was the more charm'd with this Conduct in Vu vang, because his Predecessor Chew observed a Conduct quite contrary to this. Vu vang thereby gain'd all their Hearts. He revived Fidelity, Zeal, Disinterestedness, Modesty, and the Shame of bad Actions. After which, in order to enrich and adorn so beautiful a Foundation, succeeded the Regulation and Observance of the Rites, Music, Public Lessons and Schools, the Exercises of the Bow, solemn Feasts at appointed Times, the Ceremonies of Cap, Marriages, the Times before and after Burials. These outward Appearances struck the Eyes, and revived and cherish'd in the Heart the Sentiments of Virtue: and nothing was more charming than to see how each took a Pleasure in doing his Duty.

Ever since the Days of the Tsin and the Han, all the Stress has been commonly laid upon the Fear of the Laws, and the Rigour of the Officers. This has been made the Support of Government, without Princes troubling themselves much about inculcating the Love of Duty and and Virtue. Thus, for upwards of a thousand Years, Craft, Interest, and Avarice have been gaining Ground in the Hearts of the People; till they have lost the Sense of Shame. When our Literati want to revive what they call Antiquity, by establishing certain Decorums of Ceremonies and Music, all they gain by this is, that the People seeing their Evolutions and Grimace, put their Hands upon their Mouths, and privately stifle their Laugh: or else they will look with Astonishment upon one another, and discover by their Looks that they are by no Means pleased with such Music. This being the Case can it be hoped they should by these Means be reclaimed to a Love for Virtue, and a Hatred of Vice? For my Share, I am of Opinion, that another Method should be followed. In order to inculcate upon them the Virtues, which are the essential Part, you must set them an Example as Vu wang did, and begin by those which it most concerns the People that the Prince should possess, and which it most concerns the Prince that his Subjects should have. For instance, if the People knows not what Fidelity and Honour signifies, how can Peace and good Order long subsist? If the People are quite ignorant of every thing that can be called Generosity, Equity, and Constancy, how can they become united in Dangers? In short, if in the most peaceable Times the Subjects only endeavour how to deceive the Vigilance of their Governors: If in the first Difficulty in which they see their Prince engaged, they are ready to abandon him; how can we flatter our selves with having the Secret of Antiquity for the Amendment of the People? since it is quite otherwise. We may say, on the contrary, that in this Situation of Affairs, if great Revolutions have not happened, it is by mere Chance and good Luck. But, would we inspire the People with Sincerity, Fidelity and Loyalty? the Secret for obtaining this is as follows: The Prince and Governor themselves must be exact in keeping their Word to the People. Would they inspire them with a noble Disinterestedness, and generous Equity? The best Way is for the Prince and the Government to discover no Avarice nor Rapaciousness.

Some Time ago, when there was an Intention to raise towards the West of the Yellow River, the Troops that were necessary on that Quarter, whole Families, and almost all the Persons capable to bear Arms were enlisted. In order to engage them to enlist, they were assur'd by public Manifestoes dispatch'd from Court, that Recourse was only had to them for that Time, and on a pressing Exigency, which could not otherwise be supplied so readily, that they should not be oblig'd to serve long, and that they should afterwards have full Liberty to return to their respective Employments. But instead of this, soon after, they were rigorously detained in the Service, and not a single Man of them dismissed.

In the Years named Pau yuen there were different Motions and Marches made by all the Troops. Occasion was taken from this to increase the Taxes a great deal. This, it was said, was only upon an Emergency, but a good many Years have since intervened, and these Taxes still subsist. When the People are treated thus, how can Honour and the Hatred of Deceit be inculcated on them? To exact from them much less than what you rigorously may, and to keep your Word with them even when it is difficult so to do, are essential Maxims to Governors; if it is said that these Things are impracticable in a State where Finances are established; my Answer is, that if any other Course is held, you will lose Ground instead of gaining.

Discourse of Su shê Brother to the Su shê, proving that a Prince ought to be acquainted with the different Characters of Men.

I HAVE elsewhere declared my Sentiments upon the Art of Governing; and shall not repeat what I have there mentioned. I shall only add, that a Prince who wants to succeed therein ought to apply himself to know the different Capacities and Characters of those he employs: Because, without this, all the rest will be useless. And, in order to render so necessary a Piece of Knowledge easy, I have here collected some Pourtraits different from one another.

Let us suppose, that at present, our Emperor has no body about his Person or in Employments, but Officers of acknowledged Wisdom, approved Probity, and such as are incapable of giving the Prince the least Uneasiness, by deviating from their Duty. It is however useful for him to know, and may be dangerous for him not to know, that there might be found others, and they too amongst Men of Merit, of a quite opposite Character. Some there are, whose ruling Passion is the Love of Glory. These aim only at Renown. Riches has no Charms for them; they may possess them, but their Relations use them. Does a Post present that they can easily procure? They are so far from endeavouring to obtain it, that they take a Pride in yielding it to another who is their Inferior. Not that they are averse from entering into Posts. For if their Prince places them in one, and treats them with Respect, according to the Rites, they are quite ravished. But if he treats them with less Distinction, being intirely insensible of the Motives of Interest and all that, they retire from Business. Is one of these kind of People in Post? Nothing is so temperate, nothing so disinterested; and all this in order to distinguish himself from, and raise himself above, the rest of Mankind. If the Prince, out of Esteem to him, shall endeavour to engage him with considerable Advantages, he is as it were ashamed and dissatisfied at his Heart.

Others grasp after Riches: Posts, with large Pensions annex, are their Delight. They carefully lay hold on all Occasions of enriching themselves, that they and their Families may live at Ease. If such enjoy Lands and Houses, they will perform great Services. But if a Prince, from a false Notion of their Character, shall pretend to engage them by the Distinctions of meer Honour, these Sort of People will never repay him, and they will be always discontented.

To be always in a Humour of over-bearing, is a considerable Failing. And yet there are People of that Character, who otherways have Merit and Capacity, whom if the Prince designs to employ, he ought to manage and to take the proper Measures for that Effect. Otherways they will be continually jangling and contending with others.

There are others who have a mutual Hatred for one another. A Prince ought to take care not to employ both these at once. One Man will sacrifice to his Vengeance, the Success of the most advantageous Enterprize. Another is inflexibly resolute and stiff; a Man of these Characters on some Occasions is necessary, and therefore a Prince ought to employ him: But do not pretend to make such Men bend, for they will first break, and that loses them. An other Man, on the contrary, is fearful: Do not offer Violence to his fear, for your Affairs will thereby suffer. He may be very serviceable to you when no Danger attends the Service. Thus it is, that a Prince ought to study the Characters of his Servants, in order to keep them attach'd to his Person, and to make Advantage of their Capacities.

But there is need of a still more particular Care, in discovering and preventing the bad Designs that may be a forming. They who think to make themselves the Head of a Party, are commonly Masters of the deepest Dissimulation: Their Motions are so subtle, that it is not easy to discern them. When they are really acting on the one Side, they appear intent upon the other: There is nothing with them, but false Attacks and Counter-marches. Men of this Character have been seen in Times past, whose real Views were, usurping the Authority of the Prince, and yet far from contradicting him in any thing, they served him with all the Complaisance and Assiduity imaginable, studying his Inclinations, and carefully procuring all the Occasions of gratifying them. Their Aim was, that the Prince being abandoned to his Pleasures, might abandon the Government to them. They then took that Opportunity, and unless the Prince had been much upon his Guard, they artfully seized the Authority which he had as it were deposited in their Hands. Such formerly was the Conduct of Li lin fu.

Besides, when these Sort of People are once possessed of Authority, all their Care is to contrive the Means of keeping themselves in it, least any one more able than themselves should supplant them, which they are in continual dread of. One of the Methods they commonly employ for this Effect, is to form and to foment different Parties in the State. Thereby they render themselves as it were necessary; while they who can hurt them, being employed in supporting themselves on other Quarters, these other in the mean time enjoy the Fruits of their Artifice. Li lin fu was a Man of this Character likewise.

It is not vicious and disorderly Princes alone, who have reason to be afraid of being thus surprized. Does a Prince love Men of Worth? Has he an Inclination and Esteem for Virtue? Mean Souls are not wanting who make a traffic of this. By what Means? By Vice in disguise, if they are not much on their Guard, appearing like Virtue, and Virtue when disfigured, having a Resemblance of Vice. A designing Man therefore, knowing that his Prince has a Value for Virtue, immediately makes open Profession of it. But if he practises it for some time, he is soon seen to prevaricate. When Occasion favours him, he passes into Villany; this was the Manner in which he celebrated Villain Sbé byen, behaved in his Time. When these Kind of Men have firmly united their Party, and when they are thoroughly acquainted with the weak Side of their Prince, they take all Advantages of it. They place him betwixt two Extreams, the one of which leads to their own Views, the other they well know is disagreeable to their Prince, and thus they as it were drive him in Spite of himself, into their own Designs. This was the Practice of Numbers of Villains in the former Ages, and in particular, of the ambitious and crafty Li ki, when, that she might ruin the Hereditary Prince of Tsin, she sought Permission from Hyen kong to retire.

An understanding Prince, who is thoroughly acquainted with these Characters, knows the Views which each proposes, by the first Steps they take, and resting well assur'd, that the more Pains they take to conceal them, the less justifiable they are, he is never more upon his Guard, than when he is in the dark as to the Motives both of their Words and Actions. Under the Government of our ancient Kings, none were seen in Posts but Men of the most approved Virtue, the others remained in Obscurity. Was this because amongst these last, not a Man sought to be advanced? Doubtless several did; but they no sooner appeared than they were seen through; so that being covered with Shame and Confusion, they condemned themselves to Obscurity. Happy I, if what I have seen laid down can in the least aid my Prince, in rightly distinguishing Men possesst of Virtue and Capacity, from those who have neither the one nor the other.

Another DISCOURSE of the same Sû ché.

AS a Man in Credit and Authority, has in some Measure a certain Resemblance of an ambitious Favorite, the Vulgar confounds these two Characters together; and the just Hatred of the one extends to the other. This is because the unthinking Many take up with exteriour Appearances, and never examine Things to the Bottom. Both the one and the other aim bold Strokes, which encroach, or seem to encroach, upon the Sovereign Authority. And this is the Reason why the Vulgar, being surprized by Appearances, stupidly confound them. As for me, I put a wide Difference betwixt these two Sorts of Men; and tho' I agree with every body, in thinking the Second the Pest of a State, yet I believe it, it is always good for a State never to be without a Person of the first Character. An honest Man, when in trust, if there is Occasion, more sincerely, and more freely than any one else, blames the Extravagance of an ambitious Favorite. And the Steps he sometimes takes, are never such as those, by which an ambitious and ungrateful Minion authorises his Conduct. The Favorite who abuses his Credit, wants to usurp the Sovereign Authority, and to leave his Master nothing but the Name; how does he behave? When within Doors with his Prince, nothing, in Appearance, is more gentle, nothing more submissive. Whatever the Prince proposes is agreed to by the Minion, who is so far from opposing it, that he never is at a Loss for Reasons to support it. The Prince, deluded by his Cunning, grows fonder and fonder of him. Worthless as he is, he greedily listens to what he says: At last, he lets him engross his whole Confidence, and being contented with the Shadow, he abandons to this Favorite all the Substance of his Authority. Then it is, that the ingrateful Minion makes all the Empire sensible of the Degree of Favour to which he is raised. He boldly takes the Ballance in his Hand, and freely decides upon the Lives and Fortunes of his fellow Subjects. Rewards and Punishments come all from his Hands, as if there were no longer any Emperor. He humbles one, and raises another; none but his Creatures are in Posts, all the Officers great and small, are devoted to him, and proud to become his Confidants. Behold the Favorite now as the Master; and the Empire is sure to suffer; but the Evil is, as it were, past Remedy.

Let us now cast our Eyes upon the Conduct of one whom I call a Man of Credit and Authority. What a vast Difference is there betwixt this Character and the one I have just now described! If the Prince, as is sometimes the Case, from a Sally of Passion, shall unseasonably design to engage in some foolish Undertaking, he honestly opposes it; and in respectful, but strong Terms, lays before him his Reasons for dissuading him. If it happens that the Prince, without removing or regarding them, shall obstinately pursue the Dictates of his Passion, tho' evidently against his own Honour and the Good of the State; in that Case, he lets his Prince say on, and without minding the Orders which proceed from the Suggestions of his Passion, he follows the wisest Course, both for the Good of the State and the Honour of his Prince, who recovering from the Transport which dimm'd his Reason, is very well pleased that Things have been managed in that Manner. It is plain, that the Emperor ought to be the first mover of every thing, both at Court and over all the Empire. But the Good of the State likewise requires, that there should be at Court a Number of creditable Officers, who make it their Duty and Employment, incessantly to watch over the Public Good; and who having the Honour to approach the Prince, are incapable of a wretched abject Fawning which makes them truckle to his Passions; who being clothed with a Post, whose very Badges have somewhat formidable in them, instead of making a vain strong Parade, acquit themselves in such a Manner, that a respectful Dread restrains within the Bounds of their Duty, all their Inferiors; while at the same time, the Prince, Sovereign and Master as he is, perceives that he can't do every thing.

Thus behaves a Man, whom I call a Man in Authority; as his Conduct is plainly different from that of an ambitious Favorite, so are his Views. The one seeks to raise and to enrich himself: The other to advance the Good of the State and the Honour of the Prince. All the Empire surely cannot be mistaken in this. I then say, that as an ambitious Favorite is a Pest, so it greatly concerns a State, that it never should be without Men of Credit and Authority. We shall suppose, that there are in it no such Men: Behold, then the Prince abandoned to himself in his most violent Transports, and the most ticklish Juncture. How then can the State fail to suffer?

We shall suppose a Prince easy enough in hearing Remonstrances? What shall become of him, if he has not about him a Man of Weight, Credit and Authority, who will dare to expose himself to ruin, by opposing his Prince, or by making himself answerable for the Event of an important Affair? He will always find People, who, in order to give themselves Airs of Importance, will present to him frequent Remonstrances upon mere Trifles, the good or bad Success of which is of no Consequence. Does an Affair happen that concerns the Welfare, and even the very Being of a State. All these Gentlemen are dumb: Every one of them fearing, lest he should ruin himself. How disastrous is this for a State, and for a Prince who is at once its Master and Father.

Formerly, the Hereditary Prince of Wey assembled Soldiers, that he might take and dispatch out of the Way certain Kyang chong. King Vu ti in great Wrath, brought Troops into the Field against his Son. The two Armies met and fought, but very coldly; and the Hereditary Prince retir'd to a neighbouring Country. The King being still enraged, increased his Armies, and endeavoured to destroy the States that had sheltered the Prince. Had there been then at Court a Man of Credit and Authority, such as I have described; and had this Man boldly raised himself, opposed the King's Fury, had made the Son sensible of the Fault he had committed, and at the same time shewed the Father how much he had been to blame, the King would have found time to cool, and the Prince to have appeased his Anger, and then Matters would have been soon made up. But alas! Tho' every one sees what ought to be spoken and acted, no body dares to speak and act; then it is, that there is not a Man of Authority in the Kingdom.

From all this in my humble Opinion, I think, that we may conclude, that whoever has the Interest of the State really at Heart, ought to look upon it as a real Good, that there is in it some Man of such a Character, who by his great Authority and uncommon Credit, should keep all the Officers of the State in their Duty, and who in perilous Times, may for the Good of the State and the Prince, zealously undertake a bold Stroke, and support it, without ruining himself. I own, that in such Times as the present, in which all the Empire enjoys a profound Peace, such a Person may be (*) dispensed with without any Inconvenience. But, besides that it is prudent to guard at a Distance against all unforeseen Misfortunes, such Persons are always useful in a State.

(*) This Discourse is an Apology for some Person against whose Credit and Authority Murmurs had arisen.

Tyen nan song, after having made a very long Discourse to the Emperor Shin tsong, in which he gave him several Advices concerning Government, concludes in these Terms.

TH O' the Chew Family, after it came to the Possession of the Empire, was always distinguished by Virtue: Tho' Ven wang and Vu wang, by the same Method, laid the glorious Foundation of the Dynasty of that Name; yet it was under their Successor Cbing wang, that these fine Odes are made, which are called (§) Ya and Song. It was under the happy and flourishing Reign of this Prince, that amongst other Things these Odes declared. " Whang tyen, as a good Father, loves whatever is solidly virtuous: Wisdom and Virtue are his most acceptable Sacrifices: " The Design of the Poet is to inculcate upon Cbing wang, by these emphatical Expressions, all necessary Care that he might not degenerate. In effect, nothing is more essential than this is for a Prince; the more flourishing his Reign is, the more ought he to be afraid of himself: And his Subjects cannot give him a stronger Testimony of their Zeal, than to inspire him with this wise Dread. This was not practised under the Chew Dynasty only; for during the famous Reigns of the great Yau and Shun, the Prince and his great Officers were always mutually saying to one another; ' Let us watch, apply ourselves, and be attentive, a Day or two well or ill spent, may have great Consequences.' Permit me, Great Sir, that forgetting my own Insignificance, speaking with the same View that the ancient Book of Verses did, and congratulating you upon a Reign more glorious than any that was seen under the Song Dynasty, I may congratulate you yet more upon having understood this Truth: " That Whang tyen, like a good Father, loves whatever is solidly virtuous, and that Wisdom and Virtue are to him the most acceptable Sacrifices." What Matter of Joy is it for us to see, that this Persuasion renders you careful respectfully to follow the Views of Whang tyen, that it inspires you with a secret Dread lest you should deviate from them, that it makes you seek your own Perfection and your Peoples Happiness in every Object, and every Day to labour with new Ardour therein, and to disregard every thing that might put a Stop to it! It remains, that you should never be inconsistent with yourself: My Zeal makes me wish for this, and with this View it inspires me to call to your Remembrance this Passage in the Book of Verses.

In the first of the Years named Ywen yew, the extraordinary Inundations occasioned a great Barrenness over the Province of Che kyang and Kyang nan. Upon the Information given in by the Officers of these Provinces, the Emperor ordered a hundred (*) Wan of Rice to be furnished out of the Granaries, and twenty Wan of Derniers out of his Treasury, for the Relief of the Poor. The Distribution and Management of this Bounty was, according to Custom, entrusted with certain Officers. These Orders were scarce issued out, when it was told to the Emperor, that the Officers of the Province had perhaps imposed upon him, by representing the Evil to be greater than it really was; besides, that there was Reason to fear, that the Charity would be misapplied; that it would be proper to depute some Commissaries from the Court, who might give Evidence how far the Calamities, occasioned by the Inundations, reach'd, and proportion the Quotas of the Charity according to the different Exigencies of the Sufferers. In consequence of this Advice, a Scheme was presented to his Majesty for that Effect. The Emperor remarking, that Fan tsu yu was not of the Number of those who had made these Remonstrances, tho' by his Employment he naturally ought to have been, put the Scheme into his Hands, and ordered him to give him his Advice thereupon. Fan tsu yu, having read it, sealed it up, and sent it back to the Emperor, with the following Discourse:

GREAT Sir, I find, that under the Tang Dynasty, in one of the Years named Ta li, the Inundations were so great in a certain Quarter, that all the Magistrates gave Accounts of them at the Court, except the Magistrate of Wey mu, who said, that his District had scarce suffered any thing. However it appeared from the Information of a (†) Yu tse, who was deputed for that purpose, that in the Territory of Wey mu, the Waters had overflowed upwards of 3000 (‡) King of Arable Ground. Upon this, the then Emperor venting many heavy Sighs; said, This is strange: it is natural that a Magistrate, who is the Father of the People immediately committed to his Care, should exaggerate their Wants, that he may procure them Relief; but here is one who dissimulates them, surely he is void of all Compassion. He then immediately degraded him from the Post he then held, and gave him one more inconsiderable.

Under the Reign of Te tsong, the Rivers Kyang and Whay having overflowed, did some Damage. Lü che, who then was Minister of State, begged of the Emperor, that he would give some supply to the Places that had suffered. The Emperor having read his Petition, appeared not very inclinable to grant it. If, said he, on these Advices, I should, upon every Damage a Country suffers, be so simple, as to order the Inhabitants Largesses, there is Reason to fear, that I may be imposed upon, and frequently deceived by false Reports. Lü che, not at all discouraged by this Answer, still solicited the Prince, and amongst other Things said to him; Sir, Your Majesty's Fears have very little Foundation, for Flattery is the Vice of the Time. Do the Officers of your Provinces touch in their Memorials on any Points, which they think will be agreeable to you, they exaggerate them, and seem never to be weary of insisting upon them. Are they about to give any Advice that may trouble you? They do it in a very cursory Manner, and instead of aggravating the Evil, diminish it as much as they can: And it too often happens, that by these Advices artfully delivered, vered, false Measures are taken. But what is all this clutter about? a moderate Expence which will win you the Hearts of your Subjects. Is it proper, by an excessive Precaution, to hazard the cooling of their Affection to you? Tjong then agreed to the Arguments.

In the seventh of the Years named Ywen to the Emperor Hyen tjong addressing himself to his Ministers said: 'You are always representing to me that last Year the Countries of Che and Whey have suffered a great deal, first, from the Overflowings of the Water, then by a long Drought; and yet a Yu tse, who has come from thence, says, that the Damage is but inconsiderable. Which shall I then believe? and what Side shall I take?' Li kyang then taking the Discourse in Hand, answered thus in the Name of the rest.

'Sir, We have all the Informations of the Magistrates of these two Countries; when they are attentively read there is no Man but perceives, that he who gives them trembles for himself, lest that the Court should impute to him, the Sufferings of the People. What Appearance is there that Men, in these Dispositions, would dare to incur your Displeasure by false Advice? It is more natural to believe that this Yu tse, whom your Majesty mentions, has talked like a flattering Courtier, whatever he thought would please you. I want to know who this Yu tse is, that he may be brought to Justice, and punished according to our Laws. You are in the Right of it, replies the Emperor, Men are the Wealth of a State; and they ought to be relieved as soon as it is known that they suffer. Suspensions are unreasonable on these Occasions. I was not aware of what I objected on this Head.' Orders were then issued out for relieving the Countries that had suffer'd.

Yes, Great Sir, that which our ancient and wise Kings and Princes dreaded, was, least some of their Officers should prevent their being acquainted with the Miseries of the People: That others, in order to save the Finances, should only half relieve them, or for want of Capacity should not do it effectually. This made these two excellent Ministers Lü che and Li kyang always to speak out. At present, when the two great Provinces of your Empire, who furnish more to the Expences of your Court, and Payment of your Troops than any other, are afflicted with an extreme Famine, will you not fly to relieve them? Behold a great Number of your good Subjects, like so many Children without a Nurse, reduced to Extremity, sending up lamentable Cries, or else being too weak to send them up, wait with open Mouths for what may a little prolong their miserable Life. You are their Father and Mother; and can you be insensible to their Miseries? Will you, by a mistaken Frugality, deny them Relief? My Colleagues say, that a hundred Wan of Rice, and twenty Wan of Derniers are a great deal, and that if the Magistrates shall, according to the Proportions laid out by the Commissaries, faithfully employ it in distributing (*) Rice Gruel among the Poor, the Famine, tho' it were as great as is represented, may be supplied by this Relief. For my Share I maintain, that of all the Methods of relieving the Necessities of the Poor, that of distributing Rice in this Manner, is the least proper and effectual. Besides other Inconveniences, the Poor must be assembled. From these Assemblies arise contagious Distempers, which increase the Calamity. No! when a Prince is really touch'd with the People's Sufferings, this Method is never taken, and he never relieves them by Halves.

My Colleagues say further, that it is the Custom of the People to exaggerate their Losses and Misfortunes. I own, that in certain Years some Irregularities in the Seasons may have given Rise to Cheats; and disingenuous People have taken that Occasion to aggravate their pretended Losses. But this can never be presumed in the present Case, which is not that of a Year indifferently good or bad, or a Barrenness that is doubtful. It is the greatest that has ever been seen; the People being obliged to quit their Dwellings, wander from one Place to another, reduced to Beggary, and expecting Death alone: in Circumstances such as these, to suspect that the Wretched are counterfeiting, and to doubt of their Misery, is a Proof of great Hardheartedness.

Your Majesty is petition'd to name Commissaries from Court, who should repair to the Spot, and cause the Arable Ground to be measured: going thorough the Cities and Villages, and counting the dead Persons, and the ruined Houses: that from their Report you may judge of the Truth of the Information that has been given you, that the Magistrates who have imposed upon you may be punished, and that the Relief may be proportioned more justly, according to the Wants of every Country.

I can say from my own Knowledge, that it is a publick and a notorious Fact, that from the first Moon to the sixth, there has been constant Rains in these Places; these excessive Rains have made the Lake Tay to overflow; the Overflowing of this Lake have laid San Yew and other Cities under Water; the Fields have in such a Manner, and for so long a Time been covered with the Water, that they have not been able for to sow their Rice; the Houses in the Villages have been seen either sunk under, or floating above, the Water; the Husbandmen have sold their Cattle, and are dispersed abroad a begging. I say, that these Calamities are notorious.

I must add that your Majesty being informed of this ought, in order to alleviate it, to shew the same Zeal as you would do in extinguishing a burning, or in assisting Persons who are drowning. Judge if the Suggestions of my Colleagues agree to these Circumstances. Their Methods are very difficult in the Practice, subject to many Inconveniencies, and at the Bottom proper

(*) A little Rice steeped in a good deal of Water, and reduc'd to a kind of Gruel.

(†) Another Author, on a like Occasion, says, It is better to to destroy innocent People. Besides, as the Design of these Enquiries must be known, and that there are Commissaries appointed for that Effect, the Officers of the Provinces will take the Alarm; and every one of them fearing some troublesome Accident to himself, will provide for his own Safety, take as small Concern as he can in the publick Calamities, and leave the People to perish.

After some Examples drawn from History, Fantfil yu continues in these Terms:

SIR, Your Liberalities are divided; three Sorts of Officers being entrusted with them. It is going too far if your Majesty, according to the Project laid before you, should multiply your Precautions, and thereby seem to regret the Bounty you have ordered: This would look as if you undervalued the Lives of Men; and your Subjects will never again dare to have Recourse to you. All that your Ancestors feared on such Occasions was, least the People should not be relieved with sufficient Speed and Liberality. And when they sent Commissaries and Inspectors, it was not to check and intimidate the ordinary Officers, but to embolden them. In effect, these Officers shew a good deal of Difficulty to part with the Corns and the Money for which they are accountable. For this, and for many other Reasons they commonly, by their Representations, rather diminish than encrease the common Calamities. But granting there had been some Misrepresentations, they must have been very few, and must have been some time or other discover'd. The People blab, the Officers are Spies upon one another, the Censors must be acquainted with it, and the Court will have its Information from the Censors. Thus your Majesty will have Time enough to punish the Guilty. In the present Situation my Advice is, that without being very anxious about the little Faults that your Officers have committed, you should apply your whole Care to the Relief of your suffering People. From these Considerations it is, that having examined the Project that has been suggested to you, I have sent it back sealed, begging that your Majesty would suppress it.

Discourse of Wan ling against the bad Sense in which the Sectaries interpret the Expression Ming.

IT is said in the (†) Lun yu that Confucius seldom made Use of the Expression Ming. This is a judicious and true Remark: On the contrary, when the Western Barbarians introduced the Sect of Fo into our China, the Expressions Sing and Ming were frequently and improperly used. It is true, that before the Entrance of that Sect, they had begun to reason upon what is called (‡) Sing, or the Nature of Man. Mong tse having said that it was good, Syan tse affirmed the contrary: And this Opposition served to clear up the Opinion of Mong tse, which was agreed to. In latter Times, the Dispute about what is called Tsing, or Nature, was revived. It continued long, and some designing Men, that they might amuse themselves, have embroil'd the Argument by subtly introducing into their Discourses, the Principles of the Sect of Fo. Whatever is solid in these Disquisitions comes to much the same Thing that was the Opinion of Mong tse, which they embraced, and which is yet their Rule.

As for what regards the Expression (*) Ming, the more tender our Philosophers are in using it, the more bold the Sectaries have been in adapting and corrupting it. The Sect of Fo, whose Aim was to impose upon the World, hath made Life and Death to depend upon what they call Ming, without explaining the Word. The Sect of Astrologers improving upon the Sect of Fo, makes long or short Life, Riches or Poverty, Honour or Disgrace to depend on certain Combinations of five Elements, on certain Motions and certain Situations of the Stars, and out of these, they make what they call Ming or Destiny. The ignorant Vulgar have not Knowledge enough to confute them. Being passionately fond of the Riches and Honours of this World, they see that they do not always follow Merit and Virtue. In Hopes of attaining to them by another Way, they stupidly give into these Errors, which doubtless they would not do, if they knew how to confute the false Sense that is given to the Expression Ming.

Shun from a private Man became Emperor. Thus he rose from the lowest to the highest Degree of Honour. It seemed as if he had been transported thither all of a sudden, and without making one Step towards it. Yet the Truth is, that he was raised to it by his Virtue. Let us go back to the Times of Yau. Let us suppose that Shun was without Wisdom and without Virtue. Would this Ming, of which our Sectaries speak, have been equally effectual in raising Shun to the Throne? Yau by naming Shun to succeed him, excluded his own Son Tan-chu. Why was Tan-chu excluded? Was it because he wanted Virtue, or merely for want of what they call Ming? Shun was already known, valued, and half placed on the Throne, yet he sought to retire. Will our Sectaries dare to say that he was less understanding than them in what they call Ming or Destiny? Sure they will not: On the other hand, if it is allowed that Shun, according to their Principles, foresaw that his Destiny was to reign, it must thence follow that his seeking to retire was all a Sham and Hypocrisy. Who dare either think or say this? To calculate the Revolutions of the Stars is an Art which begun with our (§) I King, of which we own Fo hi to have been the Author. It is undeniable that amongst all our ancient Princes Yen yang understood this Book best. I must ask (‡) Sing is an Expression at least as comprehensive, and of almost the same Signification as the English Word Nature.

(†) The Name of a Book.

ask of our Astrologers whether or not Ven wang knew that which they pretend to find out in their Art, or if ever he was acquainted with what they call Destiny (Ming)? If they deny that he was; what an Insolence is it in them to prefer themselves to that wise Prince! If they say he was; why did Ven wang bewail his Fate and mourn in the Prison in which the Tyrant Cheu confined him? (†) Since the times of Ven wang, who has dived farther into the I King than Confucius? Will they pretend to understand it better than he did? And yet if Confucius understood what they pretend to understand, why did he to an extreme old Age travel over the (*) Seventy-two Kingdoms? We therefore either must absolutely neglect that which the Sectaries contend for, and their Abuse of the Word Ming, or we must acknowledge Ven wang and Confucius to be far inferior to them; and this would be a great (†) Absurdity.

A second Error in their System is; If a Man dies, it is his Ming or Destiny. His Death is therefore to be attributed to his Ming, and to no other Cause: By this way of Reasoning we must conclude that it was not Kyê and Cheu who put Long pong and Pi kau to a cruel and unjust Death. It was the Destiny of these two great Men. We may likewise conclude, that tho' the miserable Tyrants Kyê and Cheu had practised all the Virtues, yet they could not have fail'd to have perish'd miserably, and consequently it would have been wrong to have exhorted them to Virtue in order to have preserv'd their Crown and Life. It is lucky that all the World is not wedded to our Sectaries, even they who consult or hear them have not much Trust to repose in what they say. But if this Error should unhappily prevail, and constantly pass for Truth, behold what must be the absurd Consequences of it.

Has a Judge wittingly either acquitted a guilty, or condemn'd an innocent Person: If this Judge is prosecuted that he may be punished according to Law, he has no more to do but to oppose to the Laws this Ming or Destiny these Sectaries talk of. Oppression is to be no more detested in the Great: Merit, no more to be praised in Tau and Shun, and Tyranny no more to be blam'd in Kyê and Cheu. Each has his respective Ming which directs him; alas, what can be more absurd! I ask of our Astrologers, if Tau and Shun had been born at the time in which Kyê and Cheu were born, would the two first have resembled the two last in Wickedness and Cruelty? On the contrary, if Kyê and Cheu had been born when Tau and Shun were born, would that have render'd them good and virtuous? Will they dare to advance such an Absurdity? And if they dare not, in what will they make this pretended Ming or Destiny, upon which depends the Life and Death of Men, the Prosperity and Ruin of States, to consist?

Let us again suppose that all the World should give full and entire Credit to the Discourse of these Quacks, a Son without once moving, sees his Father in the Hands of a Rebel who is ready to cut his Throat: 'The Ming or Destiny of my Father, says he, is either to die this Death, or not.' The Man who sees his Prince ready to be slain may say the same thing. And if they act otherwise, it may be said upon our Supposition that their conduct opposes a self-evident Truth universally received, and consequently they are to blame. What a detestable Consequence is this?

As for me I distinguish two sorts of Ming: that of the Sectaries, to which they are pleased to annex our Fate independently of ourselves: This is neither a true one, nor is it possible to be known. The other Ming, which depends upon ourselves, is that in which we ought to be instructed, and is useful and even necessary. For Instance, in a quiet well-governed Empire, I support and advance myself by my good Conduct and my Virtue. My Ming then is to be in Honour and in Plenty, but this Ming is not quite independent of me. The State on the contrary is disturbed and ill governed. I bravely support oppress'd Virtue and Wisdom. It costs me my Fortune. I obstinately live, and die in Poverty; then it is that my Ming depends upon me. Every Man who is born must die; Death comes sooner or later: To live in Affluence or Honour, or to live in Poverty and Oblivion, is always Ming: Be it so; but Life or Death may be happy or unhappy. I wish neither to live nor to die unhappily: This is what I am chiefly careful of: It is my Duty, and it is the only Ming, about which I ought to be in Pain.

It is the same with regard to Riches, Honours, Poverty, and Obscurity. These may happen either by good or bad Means. To what are all my Cares directed? that these may never be the Fruits of a Crime, or of an abject Complaisance. This is my Duty, and is the only Ming, on which I shall value myself on being acquainted with. A good Son preserves his Life, that he may serve his Father; and this is both his Duty and his Ming. A loyal zealous Subject hazards his Life for his Prince: This is always his Ming and his Duty. If we extend this to different Accidents and Circumstances, there is no Man alive but may know the Ming he ought to follow. This, according to our Sages, is rightly to understand the Ming: and it is in this Sense, that Confucius speaks when he uses this Expression. Mi tse twan one Day addressing himself to (†) Tse lu. If your Master, said he to him, will be my Patron, the King of Wey will chuse me for one of his Prime Ministers. Tse lu laying this Proposition before Confucius, all his Answer was I have a Ming, (meaning his Duty) and my Ming never will suffer me to be instrumental in promoting a Sycophant, who is without Merit or Virtue. It was almost in the same Sense that Confucius used the Expression Ming at the Death of (||) Ten tse and Pen yew. He bewail'd that by their being snatched away so young, they had no Opportunity of practising all the Virtues of which he knew they were capable. As for Mong tse, he expresses his Opinion very distinctly as follows: 'A Man understands the Ming, says he, very

(†) His Son was going to be made Emperor.

(*) That is, all the Empire.

(†) Especially if we consider, that to be blind, and incapable to gain their Bread otherwise, is enough to set them up as Professors in the Art of foretelling Destinies.

(†) A Disciple of Confucius.

(||) Two Disciples of Confucius.

'very ill, if he designedly shall expose himself under a Wall that is ready to tumble; a Man who thoroughly knows this Matter, is never guilty of such Imprudence. A Villain, says he, in another Passage, has deserved by his Crimes to die in Irons, or under the Hands of the Executioner: Accordingly he does die: Was this his true Ming? By no Means". The Opinion of these great Men very rightly defines what is Ming.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Beauty of this Discourse consists in its being clear, easily understood, and proper both to instruct and reclaim such Sectaries as had been seduced.

In the third of the Years named Ywen fû, Shau shwe chi in the Preamble to a long Discourse, which he presented to the Emperor sealed, says amongst other Things.

WHEN our antient and wise Princes enjoy'd a long Prosperity, in which they met with nothing that was either disastrous or threatening; then being more affrighted than ever, they grew sad and cried out, 'Alas! I see Tyen has forgot me.' Your Majesty, in Imitation of these Princes, has published an Ordinance full of Wisdom and Goodness, which proves the Extent of your Vigilance and Care in fulfilling your Duties. You cannot act more conformably to the Designs of Tyen.

Li kang, in a Discourse presented to the Emperor, after some particular Advices, gives him two general Ones, in these Terms: 'Do every thing, says he, that Man can do, and inwardly preserve a respectful Dread towards Tyen: When Man, on his Side, does all that he can, it is natural for (†) Tyen li to answer his Cares.' Thus, the greatest Princes, such as those who were either the Restorer or Founder of Dynasties, have done all that was in their Power; and when they have succeeded, have attributed the Success to Tyen. At present, the (‡) Enemy scarce appears, when we shamefully leave them Masters of the Field of Battle. To neglect thus all that depends on us, and to rely upon Tyen for our Success, as if Tyen were obliged to favour us, is unreasonable. I therefore beg that you would instantly give the proper Orders to your Ministers and great Officers. Encourage them by your Words and Actions; act in Concert with them as far as you can. After which, you may humbly but bamelessly wait for the Determination of Tyen: and there is Room to hope that we can both repair the Affronts we have received, and the Damage we have sustained.

But, as I said before, we ought always to reserve a respectful Dread towards Tyen. In Effect, Tyen is to Kings, as a Father equally tender and severe. His Affection for them is very great, but at the same time not greater than his Care in watching over their Conduct. Therefore every wise Prince is attentive to the Prohibitions of Tyen; at the least Hint of an Advice that comes from him, he recollects, examines, and labours to correct himself, to become more perfect, and to cherish in his Heart that respectful filial Dread. For several Years, the Irregularity of the Seasons has been great, and Earthquakes with other frightful Phenomena have been frequent. The Intention of Tyen in this, has been to rouse you: These are so many Marks of his loving you, and of his designing to assist you. It lies in your Majesty's Power to answer him by pure and upright Intentions, and by a wise and resolute Conduct. Then these dismal Calamities, and these frightful Presages will be changed unto you for Good.

A Discourse of Fan sun upon Repentance.

AN ancient Tradition says; To day repent of the Faults of Yesterday, and towards the end of every Moon of those committed since its Beginning. Oh! what a wise Saying was that, and what right Measures did our Ancients take to become wise and perfect? at least in being a (†) Yau or a Shun who could do every thing so perfectly, that they never committed any Fault, But if any one commits a Fault, if he effectually and sincerely repents of it, that Fault is done away. Therefore among our ancient Sages, even those of the first Order, there never was one but trod in these Paths.

Fan sun proves this by Examples drawn from Antiquity, to which, as corroborative Proofs, he adds some Texts of the antient (†) King, and then concludes his Discourse thus:

Repentance, says he, implies Transgressions; but by means of that Repentance those Transgressions are every Day diminished, and if there is a Method of arriving at an unerring State, it is this. Ought then this Exercise to be either neglected by, or to grow irksome, to us? But I do not confine the Repentance I recommend to our retracting or correcting what we have said or done amiss. It should extend to our most retired Thoughts and Affections, let an Affection, be it ever so little amiss, arise. Repentance ought immediately to follow it, and this Repentance will prevent its ever proceeding to Words or Actions. To commit Faults, and not to acknowledge them is Blindness; to acknowledge them without correcting them is Folly; to design to correct them, and yet to have but half the Will to do it, that you may spare, or in a manner sooth yourself, is Cowardice. Nothing is more contrary to true Repentance than these Vices.

(†) Li signifies Reason.

(‡) This is spoken of the Tartars, who at last extinguish'd the Seeq Dynasty.

(*) In the Original this is expressed in six Letters.

(†) He seems to have excepted Yau and Shun; but the Application here is general; which proves, that instead of the Words, at least in being a Yau and a Shun, we ought, if we would make just and consistent Sense of it, to read, Even tho' he were a Yau or a Shun, but I have put it as it is in the Text.

When the Sun or Moon is eclipsed, the Eclipse, whether total or partial, is never of long Continuance, and the Moment it ends, these Stars immediately appear in their genuine Lustre. Sins are the Eclipses of Mans Life: And the Eclipse is over the precise Moment in which he repents as he ought. He then recovers his Lustre in the same Manner as these two Luminaries recover theirs. But there happens in Man the very Reverse of what happens in the Heavens. His Eclipse continues as long, as, by his Attachment to his Passions, he is destitute of effectual true Repentance. What then is more important than a right Repentance? And what ought to disgust or discourage us in so useful an Exercise?

In the 32 of the Years named Sbau shing, (A) Hyau tsong mounting the Throne, ordered a Declaration to be published, recommending, that Advices and Memorials might be freely and instantly presented to him. Cbu bi, who then held a Post in the Provinces, addrest a long Discourse to the Emperor, and amongst other Things told him as follows.

The Order of Tyen who loves and protects you, is just publish'd and put in Force (*); nothing yet can cool the Zeal and Attachment of your Subjects. To judge by the Encomiums bestow'd on you, with which the High-ways resound, something extraordinary is expected from your Majesty. Your Subjects look upon you not only as a good Master, but as a Prince, who will do Honour to your Dynasty, recover the Lands usurped by the Barbarians, cure the Miseries of your Suffering People, and revenge the Insults which your Ancestors have received. In what a Manner ought not you to behave, successfully to answer so high Expectations? Upon this depends not only the Glory of your Reign, but the Peace of your State, the Honour of your Dynasty, and the Safety of your Family.

As yet, we have not perceived in your Person and Government, the Faults and Defects of which thro' Modesty, you accuse yourself. But I dare to assure you, that in vain you hope to meet with Success, without two essential Points, which I take the Liberty immediately to recommend to your Consideration. The First is, constantly to study, and to make the Maxims of our ancient Kings familiar to you. The Second is, instantly to renounce, in the most resolute Manner, all Treaties with the Barbarians. These two are important Points, and worthy of your Attention. Without the First, a good many Faults will insensibly escape you. Without the Second, the Government, in the present Situation of Things, must be very defective; and neither of these Maxims can be neglected, without very dangerous Consequences.

That I may more distinctly explain my Thoughts upon this Point, allow me to recall to your Mind, the Times of Yau, Sbun and Yu. You well know, that these Emperors transmitted down to one another, both their Maxims and their Crown. The Maxim they most frequently repeated, was, 'Nothing is more dangerous than the (+) Heart of Man and its Passions;' Nothing is more delicate, (‡) than simple upright Reason. The constant Refinement of it, and giving it an absolute Sway is, the only way to persevere unvariably in the Just Mean. These great Princes were naturally wise, and consequently had less Occasion for Study and Application. Yet the whole Topicks of their Discourse, were the Refinement of their Reason, the giving it an absolute Sway, and carefully treading in the Just Mean. So true it is, that even they who are undoubtedly born wise, have yet need of Study and Application.

Tho' the great Distance betwixt your Majesty and me, deprives me of the Happiness of seeing how nearly you resemble these great Princes in the amiable great Qualifications which you possess, yet I have heard them very advantageously spoken of. But the Voice of the Public likewise informs me, that in the first Years of your Reign, instead of applying yourself to Business, your whole Time was employed in hearing or repeating certain Verses, and some smooth flowing Pieces of Flattery. 'Tis true, that for some Years past, you have given up these frivolous Amusements, you have appeared to be in search of something more solid, and have expressed a Desire of acquiring real Wisdom: But it is said, you have sought for them in the Books of the Sectaries. This is the common Talk in the Country, tho' I know not what Truth is in it.

But permit me to tell you that, if this is true, you take very wrong Measures to answer rightly the Measures of Tyen, and to imitate Yau and Sbun. No! As the Art of governing right is neither to be learned in Sonets and empty Discourses, nor from Dissertations upon (§) the Vacuum Inanity, Quiescence, and Rest. Our ancient wise Princes who succeeded best in that noble Art, applied to acquire thorough just Notions of Things, to improve their Understandings, and to be in a Condition always to pursue the best Measures. A Prince, who is acquainted with this Method, frequently revolves, and attentively examines, the Scope and the Incidents of our ancient History. That he may form a right Judgment of Things, the Principles of Reason and Equity are always before his Eyes. He commits no Mistakes of this Kind. Thereby his Views are dilated, rectified and perfected: His Heart is preserved in the just and upright Mean; and in short, he finds himself capable to govern with the (||) greatest Ease.

On the contrary, if a Prince is without Application, or if, while he applies, he follows any other Method: Tho' otherways he had the most excellent Genius, or happy Dispositions to Virtue, yet his Understanding will never clearly go to the Bottom of Things; nor will he ever know how to distinguish betwixt what is really good, and what is good only in Appearance, or the Substance from the Shadow: In short, he will be apt to commit a thousand Blunders. Tho' perhaps he may not fall into those of the most fatal Consequences, yet he never can become a great Emperor. Is then the giving up of this glorious Character, and being contented with a poor Mediocrity in Reputation, so meagre a Trifle? Doubtless not: And we may here apply that Passage of the I King, which says; That an Error which is but slight in Appearance, is attended with strange Irregularities.

As to the second Point I touched upon, it is certain, that no solid Peace is to be hoped for betwixt us and the Kin (B). Reason makes this Truth plain, it is self evident, and universally known; and if there is any who argue for Peace with them, the Manner in which they reason, is doubtless this. Our Affairs are not at present in such a flourishing Situation, as to undertake to recover by Force what the Kin have usurped from us. We even hazard something in continuing the War, by acting upon the Defensive. It is therefore better for us to take Advantage of the Step which the Kin have made in coming to offer us Presents, to encourage them on our Part, to send an Embassy to them, and civilly to demand a Restitution of our Lands according to the ancient Boundaries, for this Demonstration of Weakness on our Part by flattering their Pride, and perhaps inspiring them with Security, and consequently with Negligence, they will be less eager in attacking us, and less vigilant in guarding themselves. In the mean time, we will be taking Advantage of the Juncture, and will more easily dispose ourselves to push some great Enterprize.

Besides, who knows, but that there is a Possibility that Tyen, by a happy Event in our Favour, may revive in these Barbarians some Sentiments of Equity, and induce them to restore to us our Lands, without our being at the Expence of one Man's Life; why then don't we try this Way? What Harm will there be in the Experiment? This is the Method in which they who are of Opinion that we should enter into Treaty with the Barbarians, reason.

For my Share, I see neither Justice nor Reason in this Way of arguing. I don't perceive one Advantage from it, but many Inconveniencies. Our Affairs, say some, are not in a good Situation. That is true; but why? Because we are always speaking of Treaties of Peace; and till such Time as we are in earnest to talk no more, our Affairs will never be better. Success in War depends on a determined Resolution of conquering or dying. Is any other Expedient propos'd, or is a middle Way betwixt Conquest and Defeat discovered? It is pursued without any Difficulty. Reason may well oppose this, but the Attack becomes weaker, and the Defence less resolute, for Nature, on these Occasions, weakens Reason and Virtue. Yes! I say again, that while these wretched Praters for Peace continue, your Majesty must be always uncertain and unsteady in your Councils; your Ministers too being irresolute, will do their Duty only for Form-sake; and your Generals, with their Subalterns, will no longer be eager to signalise themselves. It will the same in Proportion with the Magistrates all over the Empire. How then can our Affairs be re-established, the Empire strengthened, our Lands recovered, and our Frontiers secured? We impose upon ourselves in even hoping for this.

We deceive ourselves as much in pretending to amuse the Kin by a vain Ceremony. They have neither Charity nor Justice with Regard to us: But they supply it with Craft and Malice. If they really have a Design to attack us, and if they perceive themselves to be in a State to subdue us, they will not suffer themselves to be blinded so far by empty Ceremony, as to give up their Project, and far less that which they now possess. But should we make the Step which is proposed, it would not have the pretended Effect by amusing them; but it would shew our own Weakness. It would be to instruct them in our Situation; it would be to expose ourselves to them, and to convince them that we have neither Skill nor Courage, and to render them more bold in undertaking any thing against us. If, after such a Step, the Kin shall for some time be quiet, we will applaud ourselves, and we will hug ourselves in our Indolence: And as ten Years and more are already past, without our doing any thing for retrieving our Affairs, ten Years and more may pass in the same Manner, if the Kin give us Leave. A Conduct like this, in my Opinion, instead of deceiving the Enemy, deceives ourselves. It urges on our own Destruction; and I am astonished that there should be Persons about your Court, capable to give you such Advice.

By this Way of proceeding, we leave ourselves as it were at the Discretion of the Kin. When they shall perceive themselves weakened and in danger from us, they will have nothing to do but to talk of Peace: Thus, instead of taking Advantage of their Weakness to recover our Right, we must make the first Advances to them: And under the Pretence of Alliance, they will receive from us large Sums every Year. Do they find themselves strong? No Treaty will then bind them, and they will make Use of the first Opportunity of invading our Territories. They who give you these Advices, have nothing in View, but to shun an open Rupture with the Kin. They don't consider that this damps the Zeal, and quells the Courage of your Subjects; that it encourages your Enemies, and in many Respects hurts the State.

For part thirty or forty Years, these Barbarians, in order to ruin us, have taken Advantage of the foolish Desire that we always shewed to treat of Peace. Is not this plain enough to us? Is it not the greatest Blindness to propose Measures that have been so fatal to our Empire? To desire the Kin civilly to restore what they have taken, is a thing equally ridiculous and needless. The Lands which they have invaded, are our Right, why should we refer it to the Discretion of the Barbarians to restore them or not? Let us measure our Forces, and try to retake them. In Case we should succeed, they will no longer be our Masters. But if we think that we are not yet able to recover them, why should we demand them of the Enemy without any Appearance of obtaining them, and thereby make an Acknowledgment of our own Weakness and their Superiority?

Let us in the mean time suppose, that the Kin shall be induced by the Proposal we make them, to restore our Lands; but we must surely pay dear for the Terms on which we purchase such a Favour. We may therefore judge by what (*) is past, that so far as depends upon them, the Peace will be of no long Duration. But when it shall absolutely happen, that without exacting too much of us, the Kin shall determine to grant us the Favour absolutely, and without repenting of it; or if we shall be in a Condition to render their Repentance useless, the Advantage that will then accrue, will not prevent the Shame that must be reflected upon the illustrious Dynasty of the Song, in not being able, by themselves, to recover the Dominion of their ancient Princes, in partly holding it from the Hands of its most inveterate Enemies, and in going, in a Manner, a begging from the Barbarians. For my Share, when Things turn out in that Shape, I can't hinder myself from blushing for your Majesty.

Chu hi having been proposed to fill a considerable Post in the Province Ché kyang, he was nominated to it by the Emperor, who called him to Court, and invited him to leave him some good Advices, before he departed; Whereupon Chu hi made several Discourses, one of which is as follows.

SIR: the Government of States depends chiefly upon the Hearts of their Princes. But the Hearts of Princes may of themselves be swayed, either by Reason or by Passion; and the Difference betwixt these two Rulers, forms the Difference betwixt Interest and Equity, betwixt Cunning and Honesty, and betwixt Vice and Virtue. The Reason which a Man receives from Tyen, is the same with Regard to his Heart, as what Health is with Regard to his Body. Does Reason sway the Heart? All is regular, all is Honesty, Equity and Virtue. On the contrary, Passions are the Diseases of the Heart; Do they predominate? All is Confusion, all is Interest, Cunning and Vice. Where Virtue prevails, at the same time a Joy prevails equally gentle and pure, which renders the Possessor every Day more happy. Vice, on the contrary, is attended with remorseless Pangs, which daily loads the wretched Sinner with fresh Misery. The Regularity and Safety of Empires, their Decay and their Ruin, are all different Effects of these different Causes. But however different these Effects appear, they have one thing in common, which is; That a good or a bad Way of thinking, is the Principle of both. This is implied by Yau, Shun and Tü, in these Words, Nothing is more dangerous than the Passions, and nothing more delicate than Reason. It is, by preserving this Reason, untainted; and by giving it an absolute Sway, that the Just Mean is preserved..... Chu hi then proceeds to say, that he is surprized to see the Reign of a Prince, who at the Age of Maturity mounted the Throne, and graced it with the most amiable Qualifications, so unsuccessful; he says, that he has searched for the Cause of this, and that he believes he has found it. It is, says he roundly to his Prince, because in the Choice of your Officers, you don't follow Reason and Equity. You are even afraid to put in Posts Men of Honesty and Resolution. But why? Because Men of that Character would vigorously oppose these domestic Favorites who embroil every thing, and to whom in your Youth, you were too much exposed by your good Nature. Chu hi having through all his Discourse, which is very long, spoken pretty much in the same Strain, ends it, by begging Pardon and apologizing for his Liberty in a few Words. Protesting that his sole Motive was his Zeal for the State, and for the Glory of his Prince.

A Gloss says, that the Emperor received this Discourse very well; but it does not inform us if he amended by it.

In the fifth of the Years named Chau hing, Chu hi was called to Court, where he had the honourable Employment of reading and explaining to the Emperor, the Books called King. He made his Compliments of Thanks in writing as usual, wherein, after praising the Prince's Thirst for Knowledge, and modestly owning his own Insufficiency, he proceeds in the following Terms.

ITHEREFORE was seized with Dread, when your Orders were signified to me, nor durst I accept of the Honour you did me. I afterwards reflected on these well known Truths, that Man receives from Tyen, a Nature capable of all the Virtues: That he can, not only know and distinguish the different Duties of Prince and Subject, of Father and Son, &c. but he can even judge and determine, of what is proper or improper in different Affairs, and the different Situations of Life. But tho' he is capable of so many things, that he is at the same time subjected to be altered by the Impressions of Matter, and to be touched with the Objects of Sense: That it is naturally to be feared, lest his Reason being neglected, it should by degrees become so far dimmed, that he may fall into a fatal Blindness with Regard to his Duties, and continue therein all his Life: That consequently, Study and Application are as necessary to the Great as to the Small: That in order to assist you in this Exercise, a great deal of Eloquence and Politeness is not necessary.

After having made these Reflections, it appear'd to me, that as I have bestowed a great deal of Time in the Study of our King, I may be useful to you, were it only by putting you upon the Method which I have followed. It is in a few Words as follows. The main Point in this Affair, is, to penetrate into the Bottom and Reason of every thing. In this our Books are a great Assistance to us, and it is with this View that we ought to read them. But there is a Method of doing it with Advantage. When a Man understands a Passage he ought, before he proceed farther, thoroughly to comprehend and to discover, what is most pure and perfect therein, and to let nothing escape him that that he can extract from it. But we never can succeed in this, without preserving ourselves in a constant and a respectful Attention, which is not easy to do, and must be the Fruit of a determined Resolution, &c.

Chubi returns then to his first Proposition, and extends it: But he lays the principal Stress upon the Importance, and the Necessity of that respectful Attention which he expresses by the single Word (*) King.

As for what I have already said, namely, that upon the reading of each Passage, we ought to endeavour to attain to that which is most perfect; it is plain this depends upon (†) Sin. But what is this Sin of Man? It is a Being which is most (‡) Hin, most (§) Ling and most Skin; of an Excellence which we cannot intirely comprehend; which ought to predominate in each of us, as well in our personal Motions as in our civil Actions; and consequently its Presence with us, and our Attention to it, is every Moment necessary. In effect, if the Sin of a Man shall escape, and as it were, rove after the sensible Objects with which the Body is surrounded; his Person and Conduct is immediately sensible of the Absence of that Master. In vain then will a Man have his Body bent, and his Eyes fixed upon a Book. As he is heedless of himself, how can he be in a Condition to meditate upon the Words of our ancient Sages, to examine the different Circumstances in every Action and in every Affair, to draw from this, Directions for his Duties, and practical Conclusions for his Conduct? The wise Man, says Confucius, will not be long wise, if he has not Attention and Application. The Study and Application which I recommend, says Mong tse in what do they principally consist? In a Man's rightly retaining and fixing his Sin. Does a Man in this Manner preserve his Sin, without suffering himself to be distracted by sensible Objects, or troubled by the Passions which they excite? Then, whether he reads or meditates upon what he has read, few Things will escape him. And if he arrives so far as to preserve this Disposition in the Commerce of the World, it will be inviolated amidst the Hurry of Business, and the Diversity of Objects. He will know on all Occasions how to pursue right Measures, and never to deviate from his Duty. This is my Meaning, when I say, that in order to read our King with all possible Advantage, a Man must possess a respectful Attention, and a most determined Resolution.

Lyang ke kya having become Minister of State under the Emperor Hyau t'ong, did all he could to engage Chu hi in the Ministry; Chu hi always excused himself. One Day as Lyang ke kya, by a Letter, press'd him more than ever, Chu hi returned the following Answer.

I HAVE respectfully read the Letter which (||) you have done me the Honour to write to me. A Virtue midling and weak like mine, seeks Protection in Retirement. It is a great Honour for me, that a Man of your Quality, especially one whose Understanding and Honesty are so eminent, should deign to express so much Concern in my Favours. Tho' you are always incapable to act from any other Principles but those of the Public Good, yet there is not a Shadow of Suspicion that you are influenced by any Motive of private Interest on this Occasion, since you can reap none at my Hands. Therefore I have looked upon your Endeavours, purely as the Effects of a favourable Opinion you entertain for me, who has not deserved it.

After so many Instances on your Part, and especially after your last Letter, I doubtless should be prevailed upon, to endeavour to serve the State according to the best of my Abilities, had I a Motive less weak than the one which detains me in my Retirement. You know it is, that I may thereby secure and preserve entire, the Stock of Honesty and Virtue I now possess. This is the Reason that will not permit me to enter into Posts at present. I think it is better for me even not to say any thing as to the Points you have touched upon, which all relate to Government. Give me leave to confine myself to the putting you in Mind of a Saying of Vang tong: One thing, my Prince, I conjure you to observe, said he, which is, to be very regular yourself, that you may regulate the State well. The Sense of this Saying, simple and common as it is, is very extensive. I presume to entreat you to attend to it. The Obligations of a Minister, are to invite and to promote Men of Capacity and Merit, to pardon nothing in himself, and being charged with the whole Weight of Government, to acquit himself so well, that nothing he does can be amended, to make the Prince an accomplished Sovereign, and the People virtuous Subjects. Every thing is possible to one who is possessed of all these Perfections. But is a Minister deficient in any Point? And is that Defect but slight? It is always a Stain on his Character; it is a Breach which, widening by little and little, weakens his Virtue and exposes his Reputation. Then sensible of the Occasions he has of being corrected, and being employed in warding off the Reproaches (*) King: Respect, Respectful Attention, to be attentive with Respect, to respect, to honour, &c.

(†) Sin. Hitherto I have translated this Character whenever I met with it, by the Word Heart, because, in Effect, this Word in the Chinese, as well as in our Language, signifies, according to the different Occasions; of employing it, either that Part of the Body by which the other Parts are put in Motion, or Affections of the Will. But here, as in other Places, it is plain, that this Character extends farther, and signifies the Soul, the Mind. I have, however, chosen, not to translate this and some other Words in the Text: For instance, the Word Niu, which according to the Chinese Definition of it, signifies what is excellent, but difficult to be fathom'd, and thoroughly comprehended: Mien cul pu ka se, and which is used in speaking of the Spirits, of whom they relate Apparitions, &c. and which they honour, either religiously or civilly. Likewise of the Emperors, when they would praise his Penetration and sublime Wisdom.

(‡) Hin, signifies subtle, imperceptible, empty, and is used the last Sense, both in Physics and Morality, especially with the Character Sin: So that Hin Sin, in the common received Use, signifies, Without Prejudice, as for example, Hin Sin, is to hear it without any Prejudice either of the Heart or Mind.

(§) Ling, both by the Dictionaries and Use, signifies Intelligence, Providence, an occult Power, of assisting and acting.

(||) The Chinese Expression is literally: The Instructions which you have had the Goodness to give me.

proaches he is conscious he deserves, is there any Room to hope that he can ever succeed in rendering his Prince an accomplished Sovereign, and the Empire a happy State? The Heart of Tyen is not yet appeased, and the People are exhausted. Cbina is not yet restored to that flourishing Condition that can make her respected; and she has more Reason than ever, to dread the Ambition of the Barbarians. Think I beseech you of this; endeavour effectually to provide against it, and cease to think of me. The Favour with which I beg you would crown your former Favours bestowed on me, is, that you would excuse the Liberty which, without being in Post myself, I have used in speaking to a Man of your Rank.

Yu yun wen, Minister of State under the Emperor Hyau tsong, being about to make War, that he might recover the Losses he had sustained, wanted the Advice of Chang shê, and sent him several obliging Messages by different People. All the Answer Chang shê returned was, to go to the Emperor in Person, and present the following Discourse.

SIR; What do you think was the Reason, why our ancient Emperors reigned so gloriously? Why did every thing succeed to their Wish? Because by their solid and perfect Virtue, they touched the Hearts both of Men and Tyen, and were always consistent with themselves. At present, notwithstanding the Pains your Majesty and your Ministers are at, no body successfully executes the Projects which you form. Be advised by me, reenter into yourself, and carefully examine all your Words, your Actions, and above all, your Thoughts. Examine if there is not some crooked Intention, some private Interest, or some lurking Passion which spoils all. If you discover any such thing, instantly correct it, in order that this Obstacle being removed, and your Heart being returned to the (A) just and true Mean, in which Virtue consists, you may easily distinguish, and constantly pursue the most real Good and the most perfect Bliss. If you act thus, both Tyen and Men will answer you on their Parts, and will even anticipate your Wishes. That which at Present employs you, is the Desire of recovering certain Lands belonging to Cbina. You must first gain the Hearts of your People; but you can't do this by loading them with Services, and over-burthening them with Taxes. If you are tender of their Persons, and spare their Purse, you may succeed. In the present Situation of Affairs, you cannot succeed otherways, than by repressing all your Passions, and giving to your Subjects unsuspected Proofs and evident Examples of the most perfect Equity. What presses most, is, how you are to begin, and what Times and Moments must be chosen; but as this is a Matter upon which I dare not presume to enter, I commit the Consideration of it to your Majesty.

Tsay shin, otherways called Tsay kyew song, from the Place to which he retired to study, was the Disciple of Shu hi, with whom he lived a long Time. Chu hi, towards the End of his Days, having some Thoughts of making a Commentary upon the Shu king, which should be an Abridgment of several others he had already composed, and not being able to undertake it himself, he entrusted it to Tsay shin, who undertook it and finished it ten Years after the Death of Chu hi. When it was printing, he put a Preface before it, which was thought worthy to be inserted into the Imperial Collection, from which I have extracted these Pieces. I shall now translate it, were it only to shew that the Chinese Notions in this Point, is not very different from our own, at least, when the Author of the Preface is at the same time the Author of the Book.

IN the Winter of one of these Years named King ywen, designed by I wi upon the Sexaginary Cycle, my Master, (†) Wen kong, ordered me to compose a Commentary upon the Shu king. Next Year he died. I laboured at that Book for ten Years; and altho' it was not very large, I could not finish it sooner. Thus it must be owned, that a Commentary upon the Shu king is no easy Task. The Government of our two Ti and our three Vang, was properly the Subject of this Book; it contains an Abridgment of their Maxims and their Conduct. It is sufficient to say this. We can easily comprehend, that to penetrate into the Bottom of this Treasure, and to exhaust its Riches, is a long and a tedious Work, and one cannot succeed even indifferently in it, without a vast deal of Labour and Application. From these ancient Times to ours, a good many Ages have passed; and altho' I had been obliged by this Work, only to have displayed an Antiquity so remote, it is easy to conceive the Difficulty of my Task.

One Reflection has encouraged me, notwithstanding this Difficulty, and made me hope for Success in my Undertaking. That fine Government of our two Ti and our three Vang, say I to myself, upon what was it founded? Upon right and pure Reason. Where did they get this Reason? They found it in their own (‡) Hearts; and every one may find the same there. Hence I conclude, that in order to speak with any Justness upon that beautiful Government, to discover its true Principles, and faithfully to explain the Sentiments and Maxims of these great Princes, it is sufficient for me to know the Heart of Man. With this Help, applying myself to the Work, I have found, that under Tau, Shun and Yu, the fundamental Maxim of Government was reduced to these four Words, (§) Tsing, I, che, chong. Under other Reigns, the great Lessons

(A) Est Modus in Rebus, sunt certi denique FINES, QUOS ULTRA CITRAQUE nequit consistere VIRTUS. Horat;

(†) A Title of Honour given to Chu hi after his Death.

(‡) The Chinese Expression is Sin, and has here the same Signification which we have remarked above, in a Piece of Che hi.

(§) Tsing, pure, excellent, to purify, to perfect; I, signifies one, the only, pure, simple; Che, to take, and keep firm. Chong, the upright just Mean. We have here an abridged Citation of a Text which is before translated; if we have a Mind, we may translate these four Chinese Words, by our four English Words. viz. Purely, Simply, Keep, the Mean.

most frequently inculcated, was conceived in these Terms, (*) Kyen chong, Kyen (†) hi, that is to say, establish yourself in the True Mean, train yourself up to what is most perfect.

I have remarked, that the Observation of these fundamental Maxims, and others thereon depending, is sometimes called (‡) Ti, sometimes (§) Iin, in some Passages (||) King, and in others, (¶) Cbing. But I can easily perceive that the same thing was understood under these different Terms, and that all these Expressions in different Views, represented the Excellence of the Heart of Man, when inhabited by Reason. It is in order to express from whence this Heart proceeds, to inspire it with Respect by its Approach to its Original, that the same Book so frequently uses the Expression Tyen. It likewise very often makes Mention of the People; this is in order to make the Prince's Heart sensible, that he owes them his Cares and Tenderness. Is the Prince's Heart upright? Then its first Cares, and as it were its first Fruits, are the Rites, Music, and whatever can contribute to the Instruction of the People. From the same Soil, proceed the Laws, Arts, and Politeness, which give a new Lustre to the others. Then soon follows good Order in Families, a beautiful Government in every State, and a profound Tranquillity over all the Empire. Every thing is possible to a Heart, where pure genuine Reason has the absolute Sway: Such always were the Hearts of our two Ti and our three Vang, and such, after strong Efforts, became the Heart of Tay kya and of Cbing vang. The Heart of Kye and Cheu was quite different, because they neglected and abandoned it. Thence proceeded the Difference which we perceive in the Sbu king, betwixt their two Reigns. If therefore a Prince in this Age, would aspire to revive the fine Government of our two Ti and our three Vang, he must follow their Method and like them, take for his Guide the most refined Reason; like them too, finding it in his own Heart, he ought to give it absolute Power there. In which the following Book can greatly assist him.

After having by myself, for a long Time meditated on the Text, I never have determined any Sense of a disputed Passage, without attentively and critically reading all that was said on the Subject, and digesting it with Deliberation, I then commonly determine it, so as to endeavour to agree with most of the Interpretations. In the Passages where the Sense is more concealed, and the Expression more obscure, I have almost always adher'd to the general Opinion, tho' I have endeavoured to express it in other Terms. I only own, that having undertaken this Commentary purely in Obedience to the Commands of my Master, who formed the Plan of it himself, I have always preferred his Opinion, when he has delivered it on any Passage. He revised my Commentary on the (*) two Tyen and the (†) Yu mo and I still preserve his Manuscript Corrections. Alas! Why was he not in a Condition, in the same Manner, to have revised the whole Work! I have divided all the Sbu king and my own Commentary, into six Volumes. The Text of that Book, according to the Difference of the Dynasties, is of a different Style one Place from another, but thorough all Dynasties, the Government of good Princes is still the same. Their Hearts is seen in this Book, in the same Manner as the Skill and Style of a Painter is seen in his Piece. But a Man must, in order to judge justly both of the one and the other in their Kinds, peruse them with a critical and a careful Eye. I am not so vain, as to think that I have explained all the Beauties of these Images, which the Sbu king gives us in Miniature. I however hope, that my Explanation, which discovers the principal Beauties of it, will not be useless.

In the third of the Years named (A) Kya ting, Ching te syew presented the following Remonstrance to Ning t'ong, who was then on the Throne.

IT is a common and a true Saying, that there is in the Universe a Particle of unextinguished Reason rooted in the Heart of Man, which being at all times the same, is the Cause of certain things being universally condemned at least inwardly, and of others being universally approved. Ever since the World has existed, there has been in it a good deal of Disorder. It has increased to such a Height in some Reigns, that the Laws have been without Force, and the Wicked have without Dread or Shame ventured on every thing. Thus, Corruption has been the Cause why, in Reality, private Passions at last became the Springs of Government. But this Corruption never extinguishes, at least in a great many, the Light of Reason which condemns this Disorder. "These Sentiments, which are as it were common and universal to all Mankind, are, says Lew ngan shi very well, the Rays of that Light and natural Reason, which is communicated to us "from Tyen:" It is never extinguished, and whoever opens his Eyes must perceive it. This Reason always subsists, and we have no more to do but to hear her when she speaks, especially when it is through the Voice of all, or almost all, Mankind.

In the Years named Hi ning, Wang ngan shé, becoming Minister of State, made a certain new Regulation, and as it was a very injurious one, all the World cried out against it. Wang ngan shé, whose Regulation was accommodated to the Princes Avarice, had Credit enough with him, to cause several of them, who had made Remonstrances to them, to be broken; but he could neither stop the Mouths of them nor of others, his Conduct being constantly disapproved of.

In the Years named Sbau hing, there was a Talk of a Peace and Alliance with the Kin. Experience of past Times taught us, that there was no depending upon these Treaties, and that they were pernicious in many Respects. The greatest Part of those who composed the Council, were (*) Kyen: To raise, to establish, to fix. Chong, the Just Mean; the second Kyen is the same with the first.

(†) Ki, the highest Degree in every Kind; Literally, raise the Middle, raise the most perfect.

(‡) Ti, Virtuous in general.

(§) Tia, Goodness, Charity; sometimes Virtue in general.

(||) King, Respect, Respectful, Attention.

(¶) Cbing, Sincerity, Uprightness, Solidity, Perfection.

(*) This is what the Sbu king contain, about the Reigns of Tai and Sbau, who are the two Ti.

(†) The Title of a Chapter in the Sbu king.

(‡) These Years are called Ky ting in P. Fatigue's Table; the third of which fall, in the 16th Year of the Reign of Ning t'ong, called Hing t'ong in the French.

were against this Peace: Tsin wey, the Author of the Advice that was rejected, had Interest enough so far to abuse the Authority of his Prince, whom for a long time he had absolutely managed, as to cause some in the Opposition to be put to Death: But he could not prevent all the Empire from equally disapproving of his Project and his Vengeance. It was to no Purpose to protest against the Regulation of Wan ngan shé, for the Avarice of the Prince authorized it: This Prince therefore completed the Ruin of his People. In vain were Representations made against the pretended Peace with the Kin, for Tsin wey carried it against so many Opinions: All the Advantage that accrued by it was, to render these Barbarians more fierce and more bold in injuring us afterwards; so true it is, that Reason commonly speaks by the Voice of the People, and it is of the greatest Importance to regard it.

Do not let us seek for Examples in Times past, to prove this. In our Days, we have seen in Post, a Han chi cheu, of a mean Soul and a narrow Genius: Who being intoxicated by the Interest which he had found Means to gain with his Prince, decided every thing as he had a Mind; therefore all the World was in the Opposition. For some time, he had Power enough to give the Preference of Evil to Good, and to make his own Ideas or Interest prevail over Men of Sense and Integrity; but at length he died under the Punishments which he deserved in more Respects than one, and by his fatal End, the great Men, whose wise Advices he despised, were gloriously revenged. In effect, the Voice of the People is commonly the Voice of Reason, and Reason is the Voice of Tyen. Therefore as Cbi cheu despised Tyen, could this be done unpunished? Good Princes and good Ministers observe a different Conduct. The Respect which they have for Tyen, makes them regard the public Voice, and the general Sentiments; thereby they gain the Hearts of the People, and draw down the Assistance of Tyen. What have they then to fear? By the just Punishment of a worthless Favorite, you have taken a wide step towards the right Way: But I am afraid that Disease that has continued so long a time, is not yet thoroughly cured. You cannot guard yourself too much against a Relapse. Let me speak plain; you are now sensible how dangerous it is for a Prince to abandon himself too much to a Subject, either out of Favour or out of any other Motive, and to give an Ear to him alone. Persevere in your happy Recovery, found your Government not upon the Suggestions of one Man, who frequently is directed by a Cabal, or animated by Interest, but upon the Sentiments of the Public, or the Advice of the Majority. In the Resolutions which you are to take, sincerely and in good faith, as being in the Presence of Shang ti, endeavour to follow the most equitable Measures. Tyen and Men will then rejoice at this, and all the Empire will feel it. Maturely weigh what I have taken the Liberty to lay before you.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] This Discourse is full of lively Expressions and shining Turns. Every thing in it does Honour to the wisest Antiquity.

Extract of another Discourse of the same Ching te syew, to the Emperor Li t'ong.

SIR, what is most important for a Prince, who like you, endeavours to govern well, is to gain the Heart of Tyen and the Heart of Man, and it is by gaining the Hearts of his Subjects, that a Sovereign gains that of Tyen. In the I king, in one of the Passages upon the Symbol named Ta yew, we read the following Words. While Tyen protects him, he is happy, and every thing turns out to his Advantage. Confucius, commenting upon this Text, says; Who is it that Tyen protects, if it is not he who draws down his Protection by Respect and Submission? Who is it that Men aid, if it is not he who endears himself to them by his Uprightness and Equity? In the first of the Years named Twen yew, while the Emperor Ché ts'ong and the Empress Dowager were reigning, the neighbouring Nations crowded from all Quarters, to put themselves under their Protection, because all the World, at that Time, were persuaded, that they who then ruled, proposed nothing but to fulfill the Designs of Tyen. Sü shé, speaking of the success of these Times, and laying open its Causes, borrows the Expression of Confucius, and says of that Prince and Princess; "They preserved Uprightness and pure Equity towards Men, and the most respectful Submission towards Tyen." But at what Price do you think can these Encomiums be purchased? You must, in all Affairs and upon all Occasions, endeavour worthily to fulfill the Designs of Tyen, and sincerely to seek the Welfare of the People. In your Person we have a Prince, naturally full of Goodness, and in other Respects, both very careful and very laborious. It would seem, as if under your Reign, we were again to see the glorious Years Twen yew to revive. Yet we see nothing but Irregularities in the Seasons, and frightful Appearances in the Heavens. At Court, and in your Armies, your most Loyal Officers are alarmed. In the Provinces, in the Cities, and in the Fields, all the People suffer and lament. This I own to you makes me afraid, least you inwardly use some Reserve, and that you have not exerted yourself as you ought to have done, in gaining the Hearts of Men, and thereby that of Tyen, &c.

In the rest of the Discourse, which is very long, he points out several Faults in the Government: Towards the End of it, he again quotes the Text of the I king, and assures his Prince, that if he does his best to cure these Evils, Tyen and Men will aid him, and that his Reign will not yield to the glorious Years Twen yew: He concludes by these Words. My Zeal is pure and sincere, but it has made my Expressions too bold; I am sensible of this, I acknowledge it, and I submissively wait for my Punishment.

The Emperor Kang hi's Remark.] The Author of this Discourse, exhorts his Prince to touch Tyen, by gaining the Hearts of Men. He reduces the Practice of all, to a perfect Equity and an inviolable Uprightness. This may be called, taking proper Measures for forming a Sovereign.

EXTRACTS

FROM A

An Author speaking of the Game of the Chéfs, which is the Modish Diversion in China, says as follows.

SOME People have said, that the Play of Chéfs was invented by the Emperor Yau, in order to instruct his Son in the Arts of Government and War: But nothing is more unlikely than this. The great Art of Yau consisted in the continual Practice of the five principal Virtues, the Use of which was as familiar to him, as the Use of Hands and Feet is to Mankind. It was Virtue, and not Arms, that he employed in reducing the most barbarous People.

The Art of War, of which the Chéfs is a Kind of a Representation, is the Art of hurting one another. Yau was far from giving his Son any such Lesson. The Play of the Chéfs doubtless did not begin, but since these unhappy Times, wherein all the Empire was desolated by Wars, it is an Invention very unworthy of the great Yau.

From another Author, who declaims against a Fondness for that Play.

A MAN who has a well disposed Heart ought to be ashamed, at a certain Age of having neither Reputation nor Merit. That he may shun this Confusion, he applies himself in his Youth, and makes continual Efforts. Does he succeed, and obtain the Degrees which he proposes as the End of his Labours? He is so far from relaxing, that the Fear of not holding on as he set out, makes him redouble his Application. This is the Conduct that so many great Men of past Ages have observed; they persevered with an invincible Constancy in the Study of our King, even to an advanced Age. Thus some of them have always lived in Honour, and others, after many laborious Years, have at last reaped the Fruits of them, and attained to the highest Posts.

In our Age, Alas! How many leaving the Study of the King, make the Chéfs their whole Business, and abandon themselves to it with so much Eagerness, that they neglect every thing else, even to eat and drink. Does Day-light fail them? They light up Candles, and play on; sometimes even at Day break, the Game is not ended. This Amusement exhausts both the Body and the Mind, and they think of nothing else. Does Business interpose, it is neglected, and the Chéfs is minded; doe Guests come? They are slighted. Nor can you prevail upon one of these Gamesters, to interrupt their trifling Combats, for the greatest ceremonial Banquet, or the most solemn and delectable Music. In short, at this Game as at all others, a Man may lose even his Cloaths; at least, he is in a continual Vexation, Trouble, and Fretting: And why? That he may remain Master of the Field of a Battle, which is no better than a Board, and to gain a kind of Victory, by which, the Conqueror obtains neither Titles, Appointments, nor Lands.

I shall readily grant, that Skill is required in this; but it is a Skill equally useless to public Welfare and to private Families. It is a Road that leads to nothing. If I examine this Play to the Bottom, with Regard to the Art of War, I find nothing in it that is conformable to the Lessons left us by the most famous Masters. If I examine it with Regard to civil Government, I still find in it fewer of the Maxims of our Sages. The Skill required in that Play, is to surprize ones Adversary, to spread Snares for him, and to take Advantage of the Blunders he commits. Can Honour and Uprightness be inspired by these Means? To take, to destroy, and other such Terms, are the Language of these Gamesters. Is this the Way to inculcate Gentleness and Clemency? In short, it may be said of this Play as of others, that it is a trifling Amusement, and diverts useful Business. It is as if you should raise a Piece of Wood, or Stone, and amuse yourself by beating upon it, or fighting with it: I know no Difference betwixt them.

Every wise Man, if he is a private Man, minds his domestic Affairs, and to provide for the Necessities of his Family: If he is at Court, and in the Service of his Prince, then his Endeavours ought to be turned to the giving Proofs of his Zeal. He ought even for this, to neglect his private Concerns. How far should such a Man be from amusing himself with the Chéfs? These Maxims which are standing Rules, were never more seasonable then at present, when a new Dynasty is beginning. The Empire still feels her past Calamities. The principal Business of our Emperor, is, to seek out for brave Captains, and worthy Ministers. If he finds a Man who has the least Capacity, he gives him a Post, and puts him in a Condition to arrive to the highest Fortune. This ought to animate any Man who has a Grain of Spirit: Instead of murdering his Strength and his Time in vain Amusements, he should endeavour to serve the State, and thereby to merit a Place in History. This ought to be a Spur to a well disposed Heart.

A use-

A useless Skill gains you the Game, and you give your Antagonist a total Defeat. What Comparison is there betwixt this Childish Advantage and the Titles, Lands and Pensions, with which the Emperor, if you had a Mind, would reward your Services? Which Part think you is to be preferred; to conduct upon a Chess-board a parcel of wretched Pieces of Wood, or to march at the Head of as many thousand Men? What can you gain in Comparison of the Profit and Honour you may reap by a great Post? If such a Man had bestowed the Time he had spent in this Game upon the Study of our King, he might at this Day have been another (*) Yen tse. If such another, who is equally intoxicated with that trifling Amusement, instead of wasting his Time upon it, had entered upon Government, we should have had in him a (†) Lyang ping; in short, had such another been as much fatigued in the Toils of Commerce as in those of the Chess, his Riches might have equalled those of (‡) Inu. At least, had he exchanged this Amusement for a continual Exercise of Arms, he might thereby have rendered himself useful to the State. How far are these Gamesters from being what they might have been?

OF SOVEREIGN PRINCES.

IWE IWE N relates, that Pin kong, King of Tsin, one Day asked at Se quang; What Qualifications a Sovereign ought to possess? And that Se quang answered. Qualifications necessary in a Prince.

A Sovereign ought to be pure and calm, both within himself, and in the Eye of the World. He ought to have for his People the Love of a Father; to use his utmost Endeavour, that understanding virtuous Persons may be put in Posts, and to give a continual Attention to what is passing in the (§) Universe. He should shun giving too much Scope to the Abuses of the Age in which he lives, and rendering himself too dependant on his Ministers and Favorites. He composes an Order by himself which he ought to maintain, and from that high Station, to extend his Views as far as he can. Above all, to examine carefully and equitably to weigh, the Services done him, that each may have his due Reward. Such is the Idea I have formed of a Prince.

Swen wang, King of Tsi, one Day asked of Yun wen; What was the Rule of the greatest Importance for a Sovereign. Yun wen's Answer was, The Principal one, in my Opinion, is to act little, and always without hurry. A Sovereign, who does not give out too many Orders, is obeyed in what he does order. When there are few Laws, they are better observed, and this prevents a great many Crimes. To leave the World to judge a little for themselves, and to compassionate the Weakness of those who are governed, are Maxims of true Wisdom and eminent Virtue. A perfect Prince scarce acts at all; yet his State is in Order. This is the Idea which is given us by the Shi king and the Shu king. Essential Rule

The Emperor Cbing wang, in giving the Principality of Lü to Pe kyu, caused him to come into his own Presence, and gave him the following Instruction. You are now, said he to him, a Prince, but do you know what are the Duties of a Prince? One of the utmost Importance is: On the one Hand, Majesty is requisite, in order to command Respect from all those above whom your Rank has raised you. On the other Hand, the People ought to be left at Liberty, to give their Prince proper Advices, for this may prevent his committing many Mistakes. That you may reconcile these two Points, admit Remonstrances without any Difficulty, hear them, and read them at Leisure. Neither brow-beat nor threaten those who make them: But don't give into them too easily. Weigh their Contents maturely, that you may extract from them all that is of Use; let all be done with Gravity, that you may not forfeit the Respect you have a Right to, but at the same time, with Gentleness, that you may thereby gain the Hearts of your Officers. This I call, knowing how to reign. and Instructions for them.

Of the Ministers of State, and Generals of Armies.

THERE has always been, says Li te in (||), a great Difference betwixt a Prince and his Ministers. These last have been always much inferior to the other. But antiently, there was no such prodigious Difference betwixt them, as is observed now. If we go so far back as the three famous Dynasties, we find Ministers to whom the Prince never sent Orders to wait upon him. Cbing tang shewed this Piece of Respect for Iin; Kau tsong, for Pü yue; and Vü wang, for Chau kong. These Princes treated those wise Men, at first, as Sages, and then as Ministers. Deference which Sovereigns formerly paid to their Ministers.

In less remote Antiquity, Things were altered, but not in an extreme Degree: The Princes continued to treat their Ministers with Civility, and certain Ceremonies were regulated and observed on this Head. What we read of Kyen ebin and Pi kong, in the Shu king; and what the Shi king relates of Shin pü, Chong shan fü, and some others, proves to us, that in these Times, Ministers were still on a good Footing. During the Times of Antiquity, the Prince and his Ministers were as the Head and Arms of the same Body, or as Father and Son, or Brothers of the same Family. All their Cares and Secrets were in common. They were equally affected with the Happiness or Misfortunes of the State; and indeed, if there is a sure and certain Way for a Sovereign to succeed in the greatest Enterprizes, and to distinguish himself from the Generality of Princes, it is to treat the Minister he makes Choice of, in this Manner. Altered.

This useful laudable Custom was in effect, lost under Tsin shi wahang, who wanted to engross all the Respect to himself; and far from thus respecting his Prime Ministers, he made it a Maxim to treat them with Haughtiness. He went so far as to make them to be tryed as Malefactors, and to die under the Hands of Executioners: A Thing unheard of before that Prince. Under him, the Ministers were confounded with the meanest Officers, and he always treated them proudly. But if the civil obliging Behaviour, which our ancient Kings, from their Esteem for Wisdom and Virtue, used towards their Ministers, was no longer seen under that Prince, neither did the same Loyalty and Zeal any longer subsist among the Ministers.

In this, almost infinite, Distance, at which the Haughtiness of the Prince kept them, they always looked upon him as a formidable Master, whom they durst not presume to love: They still bore the Name of Ministers; but the continual Dread in which they lived, and their Care of providing for their own Safety, no longer left them at the Liberty necessary for fulfilling the Duties of their Functions. Li sé, in the Morning, was made Minister, and that same Night he lost his Life by the Hands of an Executioner. Who would not tremble after such an Example? Therefore they who were in Post, touched their Pensions, took care not to displease the Prince (that is to say, they took care to bubble him) and never minded any thing else.

punished.

Under the Han Dynasty, in the Time of Kau tsü, a Prince who otherways had great Merit, Syau ho, a Minister of State, was clapt into Irons. Under Ven ti, a Prince who was Goodness itself, Cheu pü, a Minister of State, was cited before the Tribunals, and confronted with a Minister of the lowest Rank. King ti put his first Minister Cheu yu, to Death. Vü ti capitally punished several of his, and the same thing happened in late Reigns more than once. Melancholy Events; and to be looked upon as so many Consequences of the wicked Example of Tsin shi wbang!

'Tis true, that since these Times, there have been some Princes who have behaved otherwise to their Ministers: But there has always subsisted so extravagant a Distance betwixt the one and the other, that the Access to the Prince was rendered too difficult; and this is still to be attributed to the unhappy Change begun under Shi wbang. As it was not to be expected that the Prince would put Things upon their former Footing, a great many Persons of Merit, who might have been capable of the first Employments, and even they who had been some time in Post, instead of appearing, retired, or sought to retire. Thereby, the Way was left open to People, whose Merit entirely consisted in Flattery; which pleased the Generality of Princes. How can these happy Reigns, which the Wisdom and Virtue of our Ancestors rendered famous and flourishing, be revived?

After the Death of Vü vang, the first Emperor of the Cheu Dynasty, Cbing vang, his Son being too young, Cheu kong, the younger Brother of Vü vang, was Regent. Hong yu, a famous learned Man, under the Tang Dynasty, proposes Cheu kong as a Pattern for the Princes of that Age.

It is said of Cheu kong, that being at Table, it was very common for him three Times to interrupt his Repast, to do honour to a wise Man, and to serve him with Victuals. While he was in the Bath, if he saw any wise Men enter it, he did not finish his bathing, but immediately left it, that he might adjust their Hair to do them honour, and help them himself. It is said, that he has been seen to do this thirteen times in one Day. One thing is certain, that while he governed, his principal Care and his greatest Anxiety, was to do honour to wise Men; and there was then none in Posts but Men of Virtue and Capacity. Craft and Flattery, and much less Vice and Villany, had then no Footing. Therefore the Empire was quiet, and there was not the least Disturbance. The most barbarous of our Neighbours voluntarily submitted, the Strangers punctually paid their Taxes, and all that is called, the Rites, Music, Jurisprudence, and Government, these great Springs, upon which depend the Regulation and Happiness of States, were in their utmost Perfection; and Innocence and Integrity prevailed over all. There then appeared no disorders of the Seasons, nor Monsters of Nature; the Winds and Rains were regular, Animals and Vegetables thrived, and all the Fields were fertile.

In this high Degree of Glory and Happiness, wherein Cheu kong maintained the Empire, that great Man never relaxed in his Care to enquire after Sages. Was this because these Sages whom he sought after, surpassed him in Wisdom? Doubtless not. Was it because they were rare and hard to come at? Great Numbers of them were in Posts. What could some People have done more? Or why were they still sought after? Because he feared, least somewhat should escape his Care. He was, in Place of his Nephew, charged with rendering the Empire happy; and he wanted that he should not have the least thing wherewith he could reproach himself.

Hong yu then draws a Contrast betwixt his own Times and those of Cheu kong. I shall not translate it, because it would be repeating the same Terms, always tacking them with a Negative. These Repetitions are graceful in the Chinese Language, but they won't do in ours. He concludes that there was then more Occasion for seeking out and promoting wise Men, than was in the Days of Cheu kong; and exhorts the Governors in his Time, herein to imitate the Care of Cheu kong.

That Ministers and Officers of War, in the Concerns of the State, ought to forget all Injuries and private Animosities.

Concerning
Officers of War.

SYAU HO and Tsau tsan, both of them Men of distinguished Merit, grew jealous of one another, and lived together in very bad Understanding: Syau ho had got the better, he was Prime Minister, and Tsau tsan lived retired. Syau ho fell dangerously ill, and the Emperor asked him, who he thought was the most proper Person for succeeding him, in Case he should die?

Syau

Syau bo readily answered; Tsau tsan is without controversy, the most capable of that Employment, nor ought you to think of any other. Tsau tsan was so well acquainted with the Character of Syau bo, that upon the News of his Sickness, he had taken Leave of his Family, and put every thing in Order, that he might repair to Court; so firmly was he persuaded that Syau bo would name him, notwithstanding the bad Terms they lived in. Syau bo actually died; and was succeeded by Tsau tsan, who followed his Plans and Views, and kept Things on a right Footing. This Conduct was remarked and praised by all the World; and the People even made Songs upon it.

Qyo tsey and Li quang pi, two Officers of War, both naturally fierce, were in bad Understanding with one another, and might have passed for Enemies. When the Rebellion of Ngan lü shan happened; Tsey, notwithstanding his natural Haughtiness and his Aversion for Quang pi, fought him out, and with Tears in his Eyes, begged of him to assist him in saving the State, gave him a Detachment of his Army, wrote to Court that he might be promoted, and that he should be given to him as a Second against the Rebels. The Court consented, and the Rebels were defeated. Qyo tsey died a little after; Li quang pi succeeded him in his Command of the Northern Forces, and did not alter the least Point of what had been established by Qyo tsey.

In every State, Men of very great Capacities are but rare; but nothing is more uncommon than a good General. Not that People are wanting who have Genius for War, but they are only known upon Occasions. The Rebellion of Ngan lü shan, gave Qyo tsey and Li quang pi Opportunities of making themselves known by saving the State. It was in the War of Lyau tong, that Chin cho was known for what he was, namely an excellent General.

Tho' in (*) latter Times, Occasions have not been wanting, yet several Reigns have passed without one General of any Reputation appearing. Formerly, private Soldiers, and even Slaves, became excellent Captains; but at present, the Court and the whole Empire does not furnish a single one. Whence proceeds this? Is it not because Military Officers are too much pinched, and their Allowances too small? Is it not likewise because they are too much circumscribed? The King of Chau made Li mü General upon the Frontiers; but he gave him no limits as to his Expences, so that he not only had wherewithall to pay his Troops, but even to bestow upon them Gratuities and Rewards; for this Reason, Li mü did wonders. For my Share, I believe, that if Expences were less spared, and if the Officers had nothing to answer for, but the Success of what they are charged with; we should then soon have good Generals.

There are certain great Men, says Li te yü, of whom a Prince may reap great Advantages; but they are not to be governed as other Men. If a Prince would employ them, he ought chiefly to observe two Things; the first is, to deal pretty roundly with them; the other, to engage them by Favours. If he shews too much Respect for them, they become haughty, and put too great a Value on themselves. It is then dangerous to employ them. If, instead of real Favours, they receive from their Prince only Honours of Ceremony, they are seldom satisfied, they grow neglectful, and never perform great Services.

Kau tsü, the first of the Han Dynasty, of all our Emperors, best practised what I have advised. When the famous King pü wanted to salute him, and to offer him his Services and Allegiance; Kau tsü was carelessly sitting on his Bed, affected to wash his Face, and received King pü without much Form or Ceremony. King pü inwardly boiled with Rage, and repenting of the Step he had taken, was about to have killed himself. However, he went out without saying any thing; but as he was going away, he was by the Prince's Orders conveyed to a large handsome House, where he was every Day splendidly regal'd amidst a Crowd of People who were ordered to serve him, and attended with Officers of all Ranks, who were commanded to do him Honour. King pü was then satisfied, and the more ready to serve Kau tsü, in that the latter discovered very little Concern about him, when he received him.

Nothing is more important, says Sau fuen, than a right Choice of Ministers and Generals. Nothing is likewise more difficult for a Prince, than to fill these Posts worthily, and to reap from the Capacities of those that are put in Posts, the Advantages which he had a Right to expect from them. The Difficulty after all, is far the greatest with Regard to Military Officers. And it is still twice as great, if they who are in Posts are Men who have nothing but Bravery, without Wisdom and Virtue. With Respect to Prime Ministers, it is a sure Rule for a Prince to treat them very civilly, and according to the Rites. As for Military General Officers, there is no certain Rule: With Regard to such of them as are known to be equally wise and brave, virtuous and able, the best Way is to trust them, and to make them sensible that they are trusted. As for these who have only Bravery and Capacity for War, it is an Art to know how to gain them; and this Art requires a great deal of Prudence and Care.

The six Kinds of Animals who are called Domestic, were formerly as wild as any other. As the Tyger and the Leopard tear and bite, so the Horse and the Bull strike; the one with the Hoof, and the other with the Horn. If our first Kings had ordered, that Endeavours should be used to destroy all these Kinds without Distinction, we should have now had neither Horses nor Cows. But their Wisdom made them distinguish, among these Savage Animals, such of them as might be serviceable, and they took proper Methods for subduing and taming them. If Beasts are treated in this Manner, there is much better Reason to observe the same Conduct towards Men. If Princes see any Capacity in one of their Subjects, provided he is not more incorrigibly fierce than a Tyger, they use all the possible Means to bring his Talent to Perfection, and to render it usefull.

(*) The Author lived under the Song Dynasty.

A Prince ought not to give up the Care of providing good Generals whatever Difficulty attends it.

Different
Military Officers.

As I have said before, Military Officers may be divided into two Sorts; one that has an equal Share of Virtue and Wisdom, as of Bravery and Skill. Such were Wey ho and Chau chong què under the (*) Han: Li tsing and Li tsé under the Tang. There are others, whose Merits entirely consist in their Valour and Skill of the Trade of War. Such were Han sing, King pû and Pong ywé, in the Times of the Han: Su ve, Wan che, Hew king tsi and Shing yen tse in the Time of the Tang. As there is no great Plenty of Men of the first Characters, when they are wanting, those of the Second must be employed; and tho' it may be troublesome for a Prince, yet he may do it with Success, if he takes proper Measures. These Sort of People must be gained by Liberality, and when they are consulted, they must be talked to in the Openness of Heart, without any Ceremony. On the one Hand, their Lands and Possessions must be encreased, nor must they want either for Entertainments or Concerts; or for any thing that pleases their Pallate. But on the other Hand, they must be kept within the Bounds of Respect with a Majestic Gravity. Our ancient Princes treated them thus, and they succeeded.

The Motives upon which they Act.

A Modern Politician perhaps may say, that it is Hope alone that animates Officers, that quickens their Invention, and renders them indefatigable and intrepid in Dangers: And that therefore it is a Point of Wisdom, not to treat them too well beforehand, but to let them wait for their Reward, that they may be animated to deserve it by their Services. To this I answer, that it is not true in Fact, That Hope is the only thing that animates Officers. They who have a Capacity only for War, may be divided into two Sorts: The first are they who distinguish themselves but indifferently, and whose Capacity is but midling. The second Kind rise much higher, and have extraordinary Capacities and admirable Abilities. Both the one and the other commonly have Views proportioned to their Capacities. It is according to this, and not according to a Maxim that frequently is mistaken, that a Prince ought to act, and to treat them differently according to their different Dispositions. A Man has an excellent Horse of extraordinary Mettle and Swiftnefs. He is carefully tended, and every thing he eats is nicely chosen; his Stable is kept very clean, and even the Water in which he bathes must come from a limpid Fountain. Does any Emergency happen? This Horse can make 100 Leagues at a Stretch. He perceives that this is required of him, and he performs it without once stumbling: It is not Hope that animates him, for it is impossible to treat him better after his Journey is ended, than before.

A Bird of Prey is bred up in another Manner. If he takes a Pheasant, a Sparrow is given to him as a Reward; does he take a Hare, he gets a Rat. The Bird thereby knowing that he receives but in Proportion as he hunts well, on that Account does his best, and catches more Game than he would do, had he nothing to hope for. Men of extraordinary Capacity, and who have great Views and extensive Projects answerable to their Capacity, I compare to an excellent Race-horse. Not to give them a large Reward beforehand, is, as if by making this Race-horse fast for a long time, you should require him to make 100 Leagues upon a Stretch, with a View of giving him a hearty belly-full afterwards. I compare the others whose Capacity is but midling, and consequently whose Hearts have a different Turn, to a Bird of Prey: When he is crammed he does no more Service. It is a Prince's Part exactly to study the Dispositions and Talents of his Servants, and thereby to take his Measures.

which Kau ti treated them.

Han sing no sooner came over to (†) Kau ti, than this last made him Captain General of his Armies. The first time King pû had kissed that Prince's Hands, was honoured, as he left the Audience, with the Title of Vang, and treated as such. Pong ywé was at once raised by the same Prince, to the Post of Minister of State. Yet these three Men had not then followed his Party; tho' they did him great Services afterwards, and push'd his Enemies very bravely. But while the contrary Party still subsisted, they were rich and bountiful by the Liberalities of Kau ti; and they even died before the Han were absolutely Masters of the Empire. Why did Kau ti behave thus towards them? Because he knew their Capacity and their Genius. He knew well that they were not Men who would engage themselves for a Trifle, or slacken their Endeavours when their Fortune was made. He acted quite otherways towards Fan wéy, Tun kong and Quan ing: Did they take a City from the Enemy, or gain a slight Advantage? They were raised but a few Degrees, and their Pay was encreased in Proportion to their Services. If they did nothing, their Situation was never altered. So that when Kau ti, by the Death of his Enemy, found himself absolute Master of the Empire, each of these two Men counted some Hundreds of Victories. Kau ti then made them (‡) Hew. Why did this Prince for so long time, bestow so moderate Rewards upon them, yet afterwards, on another Occasion, with so much Ease, grant them a Territory of 100 Leagues? Because he treated them according to their Views, which, like their Capacity, were but midling: He knew them to be People who would go thro' every thing in hopes of being advanced, and that they might be spoiled by anticipating their Rewards.

War.

When an Army is raised, the safest Course is to give the Command of it to one General, who is to act as he see proper, and is to be entrusted with the Success. The best Courser in the World, if his Legs are entangled, will be beat by a Dray-Horse. Tho' a Man were a Mong puen, yet if his Arms and Legs are tied, he may be insulted by a Woman. In the same Manner to pinch a General, is putting an Obstacle to his Success, and taking away from him the Right of judging, (*) Names of different Imperial Dynasties.

(†) The same who is called Kau tsu, the first Emperor of the o that he can be capable of nothing that is great. A General is pinched three Ways. The first is, by tying him up to the Orders of the Court. The second is, by dividing his Army, and naming two Generals of equal Authority. The third is, by giving him Persons who have no Authority in the Army, as his Inspectors and Councillors, and yet pinning the General down to follow their Advice and Direction. In the first Case, the General, properly speaking, is no longer General, being but a Spring who is acted by a distant Power: Whence it happens, that acting too slowly, he is almost always without Success. In the second and third Cases, all commonly ends in his returning without doing any thing. For besides Suspensions and Distrusts arising, the very Difference of Notions and Opinions, keeps all in Suspence, till both Time and Opportunity is lost.

However, it is acknowledged on all Hands, that two things principally tend to render a General formidable to the Enemy. Great Activity, and a Character of having Resolution: By his Activity, he is always in a Condition to act either upon the Offensive or Defensive. And by his determined Resolution, he knows how to take his Measures when Occasion offers. Is it not therefore best to leave a General at Liberty, rather than to confine him in that Manner. The Proverb says very well, Too many Shepherds to one Flock, serve only to disturb it: But if one Shepherd keeps it, it marches along with straying. Anciently, when a Prince named a General, he said to him, touching his Chariot with his Hand, "Go along, you are now entrusted with my Troops distant from the Court, and it is your Business to command them absolutely." Suen wang having made Sun tse General of his Troops, caused Ki to be put to Death, tho' he tenderly loved him, for having shewn an Inclination to disturb Sun tse in the Exercise of his Commission. The King of Wey, that he might support Tang tsin who had the Command of his Forces, sacrificed the greatest Favorite he had. What Authority did not Kau tsu give to Whay in and his other Generals? If he had thought fit to have circumscribed them, he never had destroyed the opposite Party, nor been the peaceable Possessor of the Empire.

The Kings of Yen and Chau acted otherways; the one pinched Lo i by means of Ki ky; the other neglected the Advice of Li mi for that of Chau ko. These two Princes, paid dear for their Conduct. The best Way therefore, in my Opinion, is for a Prince who wants to be successful, to leave his General at full Liberty, and to reserve to himself only the Right of judging of the Merit of his Services. That all the Subaltern Officers may be sensible, that they have above them a sole General whom they ought to follow, and that that General may know that he is to be accountable to the Prince. To circumscribe him in one Respect or another, is to hinder him from succeeding; and if he should succeed, it is depriving him of Part of his Glory; but if he does not succeed, all the Blame falls upon him. Who can be satisfied with such a Condition of Life? Great Valour and great Capacity are required in a General; these rendering him both esteemed and respected, procure him the entire Submission both of the Officers and Subalterns. But in order to do this effectually, he must know how to gain their Hearts by his Goodness. When a General is thus qualified, an Army is then a Body, whose Members naturally all do their utmost Endeavours to serve the Head; or it is a Family of which the General is the Father, and the Officers are so many Brothers actuated by one common Inclination. Then he can be stopped by no Danger, and barred by no Difficulty: And he is sure of Success in whatever he undertakes. But at the same time, it must be owned, that it is not the Work of one Day for a General to attain to this, and there are few such Generals. But such, however, were several great Men of Antiquity. Such, for instance, was Tang tsin, General of the Army of Tsi. General as he was, yet was Lodging to be provided for his Men, Water to be procured, or Provisions to be got? He frequently put the first Hand to the Work: Sometimes in digging a Well, sometimes in rearing an Oven, and sometimes in erecting Baracks. Did any one stand in Need of Medicines? He administered them himself. In short, he lived like the common Soldiers, and therefore required that they should be expeditious and brave. If he saw any among them that were either cowardly or lazy, he gave them but three Days as a Tryal; and if in that Time they did not amend, he broke them absolutely. The Effects of this was, that his Soldiers, even the Sick, were not only always ready, but always eager, for the Fight. The confederate Troops of Yen and Tsin, who had attacked Tsi, soon retired and left Tsi in Peace.

Such likewise was the famous U ki in the Kingdom of Whey: After he was made General, he eat, without any Ceremony, with the lowest Officers, and even with the private Men. When he went to sleep, he would not allow so much as a Cloth to be spread for himself. He lived like the private Soldiers; and whatever he had more than them, he divided with the first Corners. Therefore his Men, tho' they had been weakened with (*) Distempers, took a Pleasure in marching to Battle; and Tsing, who then carried all before him, never durst attack U ki. Besides, what do you think were the Motives that induced Tang tsin and U ki to behave thus? It was because they were persuaded, that in order to draw from the Officers and Soldiers all they could perform, they must attach them to themselves; and that the most infallible way for that, was to treat them with Goodness and Benevolence. If a General has only Troops that have been levied betwixt Morning and Night, by whom he is neither known nor loved, it commonly happens, that when they must come to Blows, these Troops no sooner see the Standards display'd and hear the Drums beat, than they go to Confusion and are routed.

Hang sing at the Head of such an Army gained a Victory, but he took care to chuse his Ground, so as that he had a large deep River in his Rear. Some Officers, when the Battle was over, discourting with the General, said to him: Till now, it has been always laid down to us as a Rule in Encampments, to have some Mountains or Rising Grounds, in our Rear and on our Right. On our Left and Front, a Water. You acted quite contrary to this, yet we have got the better. Is the Rule therefore good for nothing? It is very good, answers Han sing, and it generally should be followed, but it does not destroy another which you may likewise find in your Books. Sometimes the best way of saving ourselves, is to be exposed to the greatest Danger of perishing. My Troops are not composed of Veteran Soldiers, whom I have picked, and who are devoted to my Person; they are but patched up. The Necessity wherein they found themselves of either conquering or dying, made every Man fight for his Life. They probably had quitted their Ground, had I posted them otherways.

Han sing, notwithstanding his extraordinary Abilities, had no Hopes to obtain any thing of an Army which he had not time to attach to himself, but from Necessity. And indeed, who could have hoped it otherways? Mong shu, Wbey shang, and many others, were of the same way of thinking. Tho' they were generally esteemed by the Officers and Soldiers for their Capacity and Courage, they yet thought it necessary to engage them by their good Offices. By these they succeeded. At (*) present, an Upstart General is not only put at the Head of raw Troops whom he is entirely unacquainted with, and they with him; but should this General, according to the Maxims of the great Men of Antiquity, apply himself to gain over his Men, instead of being commended for it, he is rendered suspected to his Prince: while this is the Method, how can great Generals be had, or how can they perform important Services?

OF POLITICS.

The just distinction of Politics.

POLITICS, says Lyew (+) hyang, ought to be distinguished into two Sorts: The one sort every way honest and upright; the other, mean and blameful. The principal Design of the first, is, the Good of the People; and the Authors of the second, seek only to procure some private Advantage, or to gratify some Passion. The first always acts uprightly and sincerely; the other very often uses Deceit and Dissimulation. Upon this Rule it was, that the wise Emperor Tau examining his thirteen Officers, kept nine whom he employed, and rejected four whom he caused to be put to Death. The common Fate of the Villain is to ruin himself at last, and to die without Posterity; but the honest upright Man, leaves the Example and Memory of his Virtues as a Legacy to a numerous Issue. The first Principle therefore in Point of Politics, is to propose the Good of the State, and to seek it by all honest Means: This is a Principle from which we are never allowed to deviate, tho' the Empire itself, or a large Accession of Power to its Master, were the Prize.

Besides this first Maxim, which is the most important, there are likewise others that ought not to be neglected by a good Politic Prince. In the Height of Prosperity, to be modest, to know how to yeild when it is proper, to think of the Misfortunes that may happen, to apply a speedy Remedy to the least Disorder that appears, incessantly to watch, lest he should not fulfill all his Duties.

Apply'd to Examples.

While When kong was reigning in the States of Tsi, there were two other little States betwixt the Rivers Hyang and Wbay, of which the one was called Kyang, the other Whang. The King of Tsi, who was their most powerful Neighbour, wanted to attack them, which they knowing very well, they entertained an extreme Aversion for that Prince. It happened that When kong, King of Tsi, in order to support the Chew Family which was then almost gone to Ruin, formed an Alliance with several other Princes, which Alliance was proposed at Yang ko, and concluded at Qyan tse, where it was agreed upon to attack Tsi. The Petty States of Kyang and Whang, whether from their Esteem for When kong, or their Aversion for Tsi, sent their Deputies, and demanded to be admitted as Contracting Parties in that League. When this Affair came to be deliberated upon, Whan chong the Minister of When kong maintained, that they ought not to be admitted. These two Kingdoms, said he, are distant from Tsi, but they border upon Tsi, and are entirely at his Mercy, since he may attack them so suddenly, that it is impossible for you to save them. This would by no Means be for your Honour; and besides, Tsi will thereby become more powerful and formidable. When kong, notwithstanding his Minister's Opposition, admitted Kyang and Whang into the League: While Whan chong lived, no bad Consequences happened upon this Step; for his Wisdom provided against every thing. But as soon as he was dead, Tsi invaded Kyang and Whang. When kong was unable to save them; he passed, tho' groundlessly, for having no good Will to do it, and that he had broken his Faith with them. This Consideration greatly diminished his reputation in Honesty and Politics. The confederated Princes grew cold; he thereby was more weakened, and in a short time Tsi was not in a Condition to support itself. The first Step to its Decay, was the admitting the two little States, Kyang and Whang, into the League: Whan chong, like a good Politician, foresaw, and When kong ought to have foreseen, the bad Consequences of this.

In the Time of the Emperor Yang vang, Tay shu his younger Brother rebelled. After he had given the Emperor great Disturbance, he retired to the States of Chin. The Emperor wanted to penetrate into them that he might there surprize him, but his Army was too weak, and he was not in a condition of succeeding by himself. Tsiang and Tsin had Armies at that time in the Field; so the Emperor applied to these two Powers for Assistance. The Prince of Tsiang, who, beyond Comparison, was the most powerful of the two, instead of assisting the Emperor, sought to profit by his Difficulties. When the Spring came, he encamped on the Banks of the Yellow River, and streightened the Emperor so, that he had almost taken him. Then the Petty Prince of Tsin not knowing what to do, consulted with Ku yen his Minister. "Sir, said Ku yen to him, "It is much better to support your Emperor, than to abandon him to a Prince who is his Tributary as well as yourself. Join your Emperor; not only Justice and Honour, but even your Interest, requires this. The Emperors treat those who are submissive to them, with Gentleness: "Tho' this Rule is not always infallible, yet on this Occasion it appears to me to be certain."

The Prince, who till then, had been in very good Terms with Tsing, and who was afraid to break with him, had some Difficulty to follow this Advice: He desired his Minister to examine it by the Qya and the Herb Sbi. Ku yen did so, and finding them both favourable, Tsin ordered his left Wing to advance to join the Emperor's Army; and with his Right, he besieged Wen, where the Fugitive Tay shu was: All this was done so suddenly, that Tsing could not prevent it. In the fourth Moon, Tay shu was punished for his Rebellion, and the Prince of Tsin came to Court to salute the Emperor, who caused him to eat at his own Table, and bestow'd on him the Territories of Yan fu, Wen ywen and San mau, which encreased his State more than a half. This gave that Prince so much Credit, that within three Years he engaged a good many other Princes to come to Court with him, and pay the Emperor their Homages. The Emperor then made him a Present of a Bow and a Quiver full of Arrows, and honoured him with the Title of Pe. When the Prince of Tsing was informed that Tsin assisted the Emperor, and that Wen was besieged, Bebold, said he, the Masterly Politics of Ku yen. In Effect, it was owing to the Councils of that Minister, that Tsin, from an inconsiderable, became a great, State.

Yu and Hu were two petty States in a pretty large Kingdom: Yet petty as they were, they preserved themselves, because in a Place where their Frontiers touch'd one another, there was a narrow Pass betwixt them and Tsin, which it was not easy to gain. Hyen kong, Prince of Tsin, who passionately wished to swallow up these two States, reasoned about it with Syun si his Minister, and asked him by what Means it might best be done. "Sir, answers Syun si, I see only "one Way, and I believe, if you follow it, you may succeed. That impregnable Pass which "covers both States, is entirely upon the Territories of Yu. When you have declared War "against Hu, send an Ambassador to Yu to demand a Passage for your Troops. But it is requisite, 1. That the Ambassador be a well chosen Person, and of a most engaging Deportment. "2. That he go with a modest humble Equipage. 3. That he carry along with him a fine Present, and especially, that precious Stone of so extraordinary Bigness, which you so much value. "That Stone, answered Hyen kong, is of a very great Value, and the finest and the most precious Jewel I have. If I were sure of attaining to my Ends by means of it, it were well. "But what if the Prince of Yu, after receiving my Present, shall laugh at me, and refuse my Request. There is no fear of that, replied Syun si: Your Request will either be granted, or "your Present will be refused: Yu dares not do otherwise: If he grants you a Passage, he will receive it. But in that Case, your Present will be well bestow'd. Besides, to send your fine "Jewel to Yu is, properly speaking, no other than to take it out of your own Cabinet, and to place it for some time in an outer Gallery.

"But then, replies Hyen kong, this Step will be quite needless. The Prince of Yu has with him Kong chi ki; he will understand our Drift, and persuade his Prince to refuse my Present. "Kong chi ki is a clear sighted Man. He is so, answered Syun si, but as he is but like other Men, he may suffer himself to be wrought upon at least for once; and as he is as complaisant and not so old as his Prince, it is to be supposed he is less resolute. His Complaisance may induce him to say nothing, or very little, on this Occasion; or at least, it is to be hoped, that he will not have the Resolution to make a very vigorous Opposition. Lastly, tho' he should do so, yet the Prince, as being older than him, and tempted by your Present, may perhaps receive it, contrary to the Advice of his Minister. It does not indeed require much Penetration to see into our Designs, but I know that the Prince of Yu has a very shallow Comprehension."

Hyen kong, according to the Advice of Syun si, sent off the Ambassador and the Present. The Prince of Yu was perfectly well pleased with such an Embassy; and being still more charmed with the Present, had already resolv'd within himself upon the Part he was to act; but did not fail to consult with Kong chi ki, at least, for Forms-sake. "Sir, said Kong chi ki, I own that nothing can be more obliging, than what the Ambassador of Tsin has told you; besides, his Present is very rich; but at the Bottom all this is very dangerous for your State. The Proverb says very well, "that when the Lips are chopt, (*) the Teeth must infallibly suffer Cold. Yu and Hu are two little States, who mutually supporting one another, are hardly to be subdued; but if they abandon and betray one another, how can they subsist? Hu must perish first, but Yu will soon meet with the same Fate."

The Prince let his Minister talk on; received the Present of Tsin, and granted the Passage. Hu was first invaded, and four Years after Hyen kong fell upon Yu. Syun si went in Person to the Expedition against Yu, seized the Treasures of that Prince, recovered the precious Jewel, came back full Speed, and presenting it to Hyen kong. "Sir, said he to him, do you remember this Jewel? "Have I been deceived in my Conjectures? No, you have not, answered the Prince; behold my Jewel recovered, and my Horse well fatned." The Advice of Syun si was followed, and gained two two Kingdoms to the Prince. The Advice of Kong shi ki was neglected, and thereby became useless. Notwithstanding this different Success, my Opinion, both as to the one and the other, is this. They were both understanding Men. Kong chi ki was a Minister void of Blame, and Syun si, in more happy Times, would have been the same. It was a Loss, that he lived at a Time, when Wrong, by being common, was no longer hateful.

(*) The Chinese Expression is, The Teeth of the Jawns are very long. In France to have long Teeth, in a Burlesque Sense, signifies to have Fasted, quite contrary to the Meaning in Chinese; which implies, I have acquired much.

(*) Tsing and Chau being at Variance, and each having assembled his Army, they came to Blows. Chau lost the Battle, and Tsing being victorious, besieged Kan tú; but his Troops being weakened with Fatigue, in a short time, he raised the Siege. The King of Chau having returned to his Capital, was inclined to send to his Enemy to treat with him; and to offer six Cities to make Peace. He took this Resolution by the Advice of Chau ho: And Chau ho himself was to manage the Affair. Yu king being informed of this, waited upon the King in order to dissuade him from it. "Permit me, Sir, said he to him, to ask for what Reason Tsing has raised the Siege of Kan tú, and has retired? Is it because he has all of a sudden entertained an other Opinion with Regard to you, and not being able to dethrone you, he has spared you out of Friendship? Or is it not rather because his Troops, tho' victorious, have suffered a great deal? Their Victory has cost them dear; and I doubt not but that the State, in which they found themselves, was the Cause of their Retreat. Tsing besieges one of your Cities, but not being able to take it, he retires: And you, working for him against yourself, want to give him six. He has no more to do but to attack you every Year for some Years to come, and you may continue to treat him in the same Manner, till you shall soon be without any Cities at all." The King having told this to Chau; he answered with an Air of Raillery, "Has Yu king numbered the Forces of Tsing? How does he know that he has gone away merely from Fatigue? But granting he has, if by refusing him a trifling Piece of Ground you make him return next Year, it will be a quite different Affair, for then you will not come off so cheap. He may, perhaps, even penetrate into the very Heart of your Kingdom. I consent, says the King, that you give up this Piece of Ground; but if I do this, will you answer for it, that Tsing will not afterwards attack me? I answer for it! Said Chau ho, no! I cannot, and I dare do it so much the less, because the other Neighbouring States, for instance, Hú and Wbey, have taken Care to gain Tsing by considerable Cessions. But I think it of great Importance for us to gain some Respite, and to open a Way for Negotiations. This is what I offer to bring about. Besides, as a Treaty has for some time subsisted betwixt these two Nations and Tsing, and the six Cities which you propose to offer him, is a Trifle in Comparison of what these States have granted; is it to be believed that he will spare them more than you? So that I will engage for nothing for the Future.

Yu king being informed of all this by the King: "Was not I in the Right, Sir? said he to him, Ho himself acknowledges, that if Tsing shall return, he perhaps may subdue even to the very Heart of your Kingdom. He acknowledges at the same time, that tho' these six Cities are given up, yet we cannot be absolutely sure that Tsing will leave us in quiet. To what purpose then should we give them up, if next Year he shall return, and we, to buy a little Respite, shall give him as many? Your State then must be reduced to nothing. Trust me, Sir; you should have nothing to do with Peace on such Terms. However briskly Tsing shall attack us, and however feebly we defend ourselves, his Conquests and our Losses can never amount in one Year to six Cities. Why give them up without striking one Blow? This is strengthening our Foes by weakning ourselves. Let me add, that this would be to encrease his insatiable Avarice, and to invite him to return. When he returns, you will either give him up the Territory, or not: If you do the first, I have already said, that you will soon be a King without a Kingdom. If you refuse to grant him what he demands, far from thinking himself obliged to you for what you now would offer him, he will take great Offence, and if he can, will make you feel his Resentment."

The King being uncertain and fluctuating betwixt the Advices of Yu king and that of Chau ho, Lew wan, who was executing a Commission towards Tsing, returned to Court. The King laid before him the whole Affair, and asked his Opinion. Lew wan having been corrupted by Tsing, said, that the best way was to give up these six Cities to Tsing. "Believe me, Sir, adds he, Yu king, who maintains the contrary, takes a partial View of the Affair: Tsing you know is victorious: All are dazzled with his Success and court his Friendship; should you exasperate him, the Neighbouring States will take Advantage of his Resentment against you, were it only that they make their Court to him at your Expences: And they will attack you on one Side, while he attacks you on the other. How can you then hold out? On the contrary, if you give up these six Cities to Tsing, every one will conclude, that you are upon good Terms together, and no one will move. It is therefore undoubtedly your wisest Course to yield them up."

Yu king was informed of all; so he immediately demanded an Audience. "Beware Sir, said he, Lew wan is certainly bribed by Tsing. To yield up six Cities, says he, will soften Tsing, and we will thereby prudently impose upon the other Princes. For my Share, I say that it is gratifying the Ambition of Tsing, and publishing your Weakness to all the Empire. But tho' I oppose this Cession so strongly, it is not but that I know that it is sometimes the wisest Course to yield up a Part of a Prince's Dominions, that the rest may be preserved. But that is

(*) The Names of two Kingdoms which formed a Part of the Chinese Empire.

"not the present Case. I maintain, that to give up these six Cities to Tsing, is against your real Interest. Why don't you rather give them up to his Mortal Enemy Tsi? You will thereby put Tsi in a Condition to attack Tsing toward the West, with almost equal Forces. Tsi will readily accept this Proposal, and then you may be both of you revenged of Tsing; and all the World will own your Abilities. When Hu and Whey shall see, that instead of cowardly surrendering, like them, your Territories to Tsing, you put yourself in a Condition not to fear him, they will look upon you as an able Prince, and one who may prove useful to them; nay, they will privately assist you, that they may be in a Condition, if they can, to shake off from themselves the Yoke of Tsing. Thus, by one Stroke, you may engage to yourself, at least, three Kingdoms. Tsing will then talk in another Strain." The King relished this last Advice, and sent Yu king himself, to negotiate the Treaty at the Court of Tsi. The Negotiation proved successful, and the Designs of Tsing upon Chau went to Smoak; of such vast Importance is it for a Prince to have a Person who is at once an honest Man and a good Politician, to advise with.

OF HEREDITARY PRINCES.

CHANG TSE FANG seeing the Han Dynasty well established, and the Empire in Peace, notwithstanding his being a (*) Hew, retired, shut the Door against all the World, and scarce ever stirred abroad. The Emperor was then about to degrade the Hereditary Prince, that he might substitute in his Place another of his Sons, whom he had by one of his second Wives, named Tsi. He had many Obstacles to surmount, and Measures to keep, in this. So that the thing not being finally resolved upon, the Empress sought for some one, who might by his Councils, or otherways, assist her in preserving the Succession to her Son. Chang tse fang was mentioned to her as a Man of great Understanding and Interest. So the Queen instantly sent to him, Lyu tse bew and Kyen ching, to inform him of what was transacting, and to ask his Advice on an Affair of so much Importance to the Welfare of the Empire.

In the Condition in which you represent things, said Chang tse fang, to go and make a Harangue to the Emperor, perhaps that might hasten him to put the finishing Hand to what he now intends, or at best it would be quite needless. But an Expedient has come into my Head, which may be tried and may be successful: For I know Kau ti, and that he would be far from disturbing the Empire. I know four Men who have nothing to fear; (here he named them) and they are four venerable old Men, who seeing how much Men of Learning are undervalued, have retired to the Country, and never would accept of Posts. His Majesty, is acquainted with their Reputation, values their Integrity and Uprightness, and knows that no Treasures can corrupt them. The Hereditary Prince must write to them in a humble modest Manner; he must dispatch Chariots for them, and send to them some understanding Person to engage them to come to him. When they arrive, the Hereditary Prince must treat them as his Guests, and carefully keep them about his Person, so as that the Emperor may take Notice of it, and think that they and all others of their Character are devoted to the Prince.

The Empress took care punctually to execute every thing; the arrival of these four old Men brought others; and every Day there were seen with the Hereditary Prince, a great Number of grave Persons venerable by their Grey Hairs. The Emperor, who perceived this, and particularly remarked four whom the others respected, one Day took Occasion to ask of these four, who they were? Each of them telling his Name; What, is it you! said the Emperor, "I have often heard your Merit talked of, and have been often willing to give you Employments: But you have been obstinate to keep out of the Way; and now, when you have not been sought after, I see you attending my Son; what has brought this Change about? We will freely tell you, Sir, answered they, for why should we dissemble? We have kept ourselves retired, that we might not expose ourselves to the Contempt that is shown to Men of Learning; but understanding that your Heir was a Prince of a truly filial Piety, an universal Benevolence, a remarkable Affection for Men of Letters, and in short, a Prince for whom every Man of Virtue and Merit would willingly sacrifice his Life; we have left our Retirement, that we may come and spend the Remainder of our Days near him. That is well, replied the Emperor, continue to take care to instruct my Heir a-right": Upon this, the four old Men, after they had performed the ordinary Ceremonies, rose and went away. The Emperor following them with his Eyes, caused his Concubine Tsi to come to him; and pointing at the old Men; "You know, said he, what I intended to do for your Son, and it was all very right. But the Hereditary Prince, having these wise old Men in his Party, you must think no more about it." Such was the Success of the Advice which Chang tse fang gave the Empress in Favour of the Prince.

Wbay, the Son, and designed Successor of the Emperor Whey ti, lost his Mother when he was young. When he was of Age to enter upon the Management of Affairs, Kya mye gave the reigning Empress a very disadvantageous Impression of that young Prince. The Empress, who by no means loved the Hereditary Prince, easily believed every thing that was told her. But as she had not Grounds enough for procuring him to be degraded, she pretended to be suspicious that the Reports were false. She kept Kya mye a long time to examine him; and partly by Artifice, partly by Force, she fuddled him, and made him put in Writing, with a very malicious Turn which she likewise suggested, the Report he had made to her; then she carried that Writing to the Emperor. This Trick was at the Bottom too gross and palpable; for what Man would be so mad as freely to give a Writing under his Hand upon such an Occasion? Besides that, supposing Kya myé had not been forced to give this Writing, it ought to have been examined into, whether the Contents were really founded upon any Behaviour of the Hereditary Prince, or merely an idle Surmise.

The Emperor being a weak Prince, never reflected; and most of those who were then in Posts, were not more clear sighted in the Affair than himself. Fey kú was the only Man who thoroughly comprehended the Affair; but either from Fear or Interest, neglected to paint it in its proper Colours. Whey ti did not open his Eyes, so that the Hereditary Prince was degraded, and died without an Opportunity of vindicating himself. Could any thing be more deplorable than this? It being a Proof that tho' in civil Transactions there are no better Evidences than Writings and Subscriptions, yet after all, they are not entirely infallible. History gives us more Examples of this.

Ing tsong had scarce mounted the Throne, when a great Officer, who was in his Favour, wanting to ruin Tsay yang, whom he hated, informed the new Emperor, that Tsay yang had done all he could to dissuade Jin tsong from chusing him for his Successor. Ing tsong being enraged against Tsay yang, was about to have ruined him; but Ngew yang, who was then in Post, prevented him by the following seasonable Remonstrance.

"How do you know, Sir, said he to him, that Tsay yang has opposed you? Do you know it only by hearsay? Or have you any Writing under his Hand that confirms you in your Belief? Even tho' you had Proofs signed under his Hand, yet I would advise your Majesty not easily to give it entire Credit: The Histories of preceeding Ages teach us, that favorite Eunuchs have more than once abused the Credulity of Princes, in order to destroy Men of Worth by forged Writings. How much less ought simple Surmises and Hearsays to be relied upon?" Ing tsong, upon this Remonstrance, was appeased, and neglected the Accusation.

Under another Reign, Ywen sú, the Enemy of Tseu hau, with a Design to destroy him more surely, composed an insolent Remonstrance in the Name of Tseu hau, proper for exasperating the Emperor, to whom he conveyed it. Even under our own (*) Dynasty, She kyay having composed Verses in Praise of Fú pi, wherein he had dropt some Raillery which fell upon a certain Hyan tsú; the latter, in order to be revenged of him, engaged a young Slave to counterfeit the Writing of She kyay. When this Slave was able to counterfeit it exactly, Hyan tsú made her write certain Letters in the Name of She kyay; hinting, as if Tu pi and She kyay were in a Conspiracy to raise a general Rebellion at the Court and in the Provinces. Under any Prince, less Understanding than Ing tsong was, these two great Men had died the most infamous Deaths. Alas! The older we grow, the more corrupted grows the World: And this detestable Villany of counterfeiting Writings, become likewise more common; it is pretty frequently practised at present, even in the most ordinary Affairs, and where the Interest is not great. How much more is it to be feared, least Ambition, Envy and Revenge should have Recourse to this Practice, in order to destroy the Innocent? I am glad to have an Opportunity of repeating these Facts, on Occasion of the Degradation of Whey, that I may inculcate all possible Precaution in so delicate a Point.

Hyen kong, the King of Tsin, had a Concubine, whose Name was Li ki, whom he passionately loved, and by whom he had a Son named I yew. Li ki formed a Design to make her Son succeed to the Throne; and for that End, to ruin the Queen's Son, whose Name was Shin feng, who was of a ripe Age, and had been the declared Heir of the Crown for many Years. As Hyen kong tenderly loved Shin feng, who on his Part acquitted himself in all the Duties of a good Son, Li ki thought, that while he was about the Court with the King his Father, she could never succeed in her Design. She therefore thought upon the Means of separating them; whereupon she opened herself to Eul ú, whom she had taken care beforehand to engage in her Party. Li ki and Eul ú knew Hyen kong to be a Prince greedy of Glory, ambitious and enterprising, so they resolved to propose to him the making of Conquests, which should serve for Provisions to his younger Children. Eul ú took it upon him to propose this to the King; and before he had finally determined himself, the Mother of Eul ú took care to make some Sonnets to be dispersed about, in which these Projects were applauded, by celebrating beforehand the Conquests of the young Prince.

Hyen kong whose Passion was flattered, gave into the Snare. He drew Troops into the Field, and sent the Hereditary Prince, as it were to take Possession of these Lands, which he look'd upon as already conquered. From that Time Li ki never doubted of the Success of her Project; and she discoursed with Yew shi, who was her Creature, about the Means of ruining Shin feng. If you please, said Yew shi, Calumny must do the Business; the handsomest neatest Things are the most easily spoilt, and the most innocent Persons are the least skilful in justifying themselves. Shin feng, whose Reputation has been hitherto so unblemished, will never be able to bear a Calumny, and he will certainly kill himself. Li ki relished this Advice very well; but being afraid, lest Hyen kong might be less apt to take Fire at a flying Report, which was only talked of without Doors; she thought the best Way was to calumniate Shin feng directly to his Father. Li ki therefore one Night came all in Tears, and told Hyen kong with a great Air of Concern, that she had received certain Information that Shin feng was plotting a Rebellion; and that his Majesty's Favours bestowed on her, were the Pretences he used for animating his Party. That therefore she begged Leave to die, or at least to retire, that she might remove every Pretext of that Rebellion. Hyen kong, haughty by Nature, and blinded by Love, far from giving way to this, resolved to ruin his Son Shin feng immediately, and assured Li ki of it, to comfort her. A

(*) This Author lived under Song Dynasty.

As in reality Sbin feng gave him no handle, Hyen kong, in order to ruin him, abandoned his other Projects, declared War against Yò, and made Sbin feng his General. The Expedition, said Hyen kong to Li ki, is very dangerous; in all Probability he will fall in it, and then we shall get rid of him without any Noise. If he shall happen to come off victorious, it will be still time enough to punish him for rebelling against his King and Father; which I know well how to manage. Li ki, ravished with the promising Aspect of her Artifice, imparted her hopes to her Confidants, telling them withal that she had two Things still to fear; The first, lest the King should take the Affair to second Thoughts: The second was, lest that when Sbin feng died, the great Men should cause some other than her Son I yá to be declared the Successor. In order to guard against this second Inconveniency, it was thought proper, that some great Officer of War should be gained over to her Side. Li ké, who was a Man as wicked as he was bold, was thought of for this Purpose. Yew shi, who was charged with the Care of founding him, gave him to understand, that he was certainly informed that Sbin feng was ruined in the King's Affections, and that he must infallibly perish one way or other; that the Question in that Event lay, whom they ought to think of for Hereditary Prince; that considering the King's Passion for Li ki, there was no room to doubt, but that if it was left to his free Determination, he would nominate I yá: That if he [Li ké] would support this Nomination against all Opposition, the King would doubtless be grateful; and that Li ki on her Part, assured him, that if the thing succeeded, he should be a great Man about her Son. Li ké gave him his Word, that if Sbin feng should perish, of which he saw but little Probability, he would be for I yá, and that he was able to support him; that there was nothing now to do but to hasten the Fate of Sbin feng, that Hyen kong might not have time to repent, or to discover their Plots. Immediately, a Report of a Rebellion formed by Sbin feng was spread abroad; but that it was happily discovered. They likewise dispersed Songs, supposing the same thing, which made it to be believed by all the People, and confirmed the King himself in his Mistake. Sbin feng could not bear with the Calumny; and killed himself. Chong eul, the uterine Brother of Sbin feng, fearing a like Fate, left the Kingdom, and retired to the States of Tsi. In the mean time, Hyen kong died without naming any Successor, and Ki tsi, the Son of Sbin feng, who was yet an Infant, was declared King by the great Men of the Kingdom; but Li ké and his Party dispatch'd him, together with his Brother Cho tse; whereupon I yá the Son of Li ki mounted the Throne, but he never reigned in Peace. The Kingdom of Tsin was always in disorder, till at last Chong eul, the Brother of Sbin feng, after an Absence of twenty Years mounted the Throne, and was acknowledged lawful Sovereign. We may conclude, that nothing is more dangerous in a State, than a Woman with whom the Prince is too much in Love.

OF REMONSTRANCES.

ALMOST all the Faults of a Sovereign, says Lyew byang, are of Consequence; they being also many Steps that lead him to his Ruin. When a Man is in Post, if he sees these Faults and yet is silent; he has very little concern for the Safety of his Prince, and he is not a zealous loyal Subject. But this Zeal must likewise be bounded: The common Rule on this Head is, that when a Man has three Times made Remonstrances on the same Point to no Purpose; his best Course is to lay down his Post and to retire: Otherwise, he exposes his own Life, which a reasonable Self-love ought to prevent. To be silent when a Prince commits Faults, is hazarding both the Prince and his State; and to speak boldly, frequently exposes ones self to Ruin. But true Zeal ought to induce us to expose our own Lives, rather than to leave both Prince and State in Danger for want of a wholesome Advice; tho' a Man does enough if he speaks frequently and to no Purpose (§). The Art of it lies in knowing the Prince perfectly well, in maturely weighing the Junctures that are more or less pressing, in taking advantage of all, in sheltering your self, if it is possible, without failing in your Duty to your Prince and your Country.

The same Lyew byang relates the following History. Ling kong reigning in the State of Wey, very much employ'd one Mi tse twan a Man void of all Merit and Virtue, and entrusted no part of the Government with the Wise and Virtuous Kyu pe yá. Su tsiu who was in Post, during all his Life, did his utmost to have the first banished, and the other promoted, but always to no Purpose. Finding his Death approaching, he called his Son, and spoke to him as follows. "I order you after my Death, not to perform the Ceremonies of Mourning in the ordinary Place; for I am not worthy of that Honour. I have not had the Skill to do my Prince the important Service of perswading him to banish Mi tse twan, and to promote Kyu pe yá. Take the Northern-Hall for the Place of the Ceremonies; that is enough for me." Su tsiu being dead, the Prince came to his (†) Tyan, and finding that they had chosen the Hall of the North, for the Place of the Ceremony, asked the Reason of it. The Son of Su tsiu, told him ingenuously what his Father had said to him upon his Deathbed. Ling kong striking the Ground with his Foot, changing his Countenance, and waking as it were from a profound Sleep, said with a Sigh: "My (‡) Master endeavour'd all his Life, but to no purpose, to give me a good Minister, and to engage me to banish a bad One. He has never desisted, and after his Death has found Means to repeat the Remonstrances, which he in vain made me during his Life. Be hold a constant Zeal!" Immediately, Ling kong ordered the Hall of Mourning to be changed according to the Rites, sent away Mi tse twan, and took home Kyu pe yá: All the Kingdom applauded applauded and were glad of this Change, Su tshü had the Lordship of Tshü yu, and it was upon him, that this Exclamation of Confucius in the Book (*) Tü fell; "Oh! What an admirable upright Man was Tshü yu."

Kin kong King of Tshü, had a fine Horse which he loved, and this Horse died by the fault of the Groom. The Prince being in great Rage, snatched a Lance and was going to run him through. But Yen tse who was present, turn'd aside the Blow, and instantly addressing himself to the Prince. "Sir, said he, that Man was very near being dead, before he knew the Heinousness of his Crime. I consent, answered Kin kong, that you make him sensible of it. "Then Yen tse taking the Lance and aiming it at the Criminal: Wretch, said he to him. Attentively hear your Crimes, which are as follows. First, you have been the Cause of the Death of a Horse; which your Prince committed to your special Care: Thereby, you deserve Death. In the second Place, you have been the Cause why my Prince, because you have lost his Horse, has fallen into such a Passion, that he would kill you with his own Hand. Behold a second capital Crime more grievous than the First. Lastly, All the Princes, and all the Neighbouring States will thereby know, that my Prince wants to take away a Man's Life to revenge the Death of a Horse; and thus his Reputation is ruined: And you Wretch have been the Occasion of all these Consequences. Do you rightly conceive your Fault. Let him go, let him go, cry'd the Prince, dont let me break in upon my Goodness, I pardon him."

The same Prince having one day drunk pretty freely, laid aside his Cap and Girdle, put himself into a negligent Dress, took a Musical Instrument into his Hand, and asked of those who were present, if it was allowable in a Virtuous Man to divert himself in that Manner. Every one answered; doubtless it was; why was it not? If it is so, said Kin kong, let the Horses be put to the Chariot, and Yen tse invited hither. Yen tse came upon the first Notice that was given him, but in his Habit of Ceremony as usual. Kin kong seeing Yen tse enter; "We are here," said he, quite free, diverting ourselves, and I have sent for you to share in our Diversions. Yen tse immediately reply'd; Your Pardon, Sir, I cannot do that, if I did, I must violate the Rites and I am prodigiously afraid of infringing them. It is look'd upon as a certain Maxim, that an Emperor who forgets himself so far as to offend in this Point; cannot long preserve the Empire. The same Thing in some measure may be said of all Kings and Princes, great Officers and Fathers of Families; the Sbi king mentions even Man in general, to whom it is more advantageous to die young, than to live in a Forgetfulness of the Rites. Kin kong blush'd and rose at these Words, and thanked Yen tse; I own, said he, that I am a Man without Virtue; but I have none but a parcel of Scoundrels for my Attendants. All these People whom you see, have a great share in my Fault, and I design to cause them to be put to Death as an Atonement for it. Sir, answered Yen tse, the part they have in your Crime, in my Opinion is very inconsiderable. When a Prince is attached to the Rites, none but they who have the same Attachment with him, approach him, the others soon retire. The Reverse of this naturally happens when the Sovereign forgets himself: Don't therefore take up with them: You are in the Right, said Kin kong; so he immediately put on a becoming Habit, drank three Cups to Yen tse, and conducted him back.

The King of U, being resolved to attack the States of King, publicly declared his Intention, adding withal, that he was so determined in it, that whoever should presume to remonstrate against it should be immediately put to Death. An Officer of his Household named Shau i tse, being persuaded of the Danger of that Expedition, sought for the Means to make the Prince sensible of it likewise. But as it was as much as his Life was worth to do it openly, he took another Method. In the Morning he went with his Bow into a Park, where he suffered all the Inconveniences of the falling Dew; and at the ordinary Hour, he presented himself with others before the Prince. On the third Day the Prince observ'd it, and asked how he came to be so wet. "Sir, answer'd he, I have been in the Park, where there was a Grasshopper, perch'd aloft upon a Tree, and being well fill'd with Dew, was singing very pleasantly. A (+) Tang lang was behind her, whom she did not observe, for if she had, she would have soon chang'd her Note. I observ'd this Tang lang which privately glided down, and drawing near the Grasshopper, already reckon'd her as his Prey, but she did not see him. Pretty near him upon the same Tree, there was a (§) Yellow Bird ready to dart upon the Tang lang. I observ'd this Bird likewise, who being quite intent upon his Prey, was lengthning his Neck to seize it, without perceiving that I was below, and that I was looking at him. While I was beholding all this, I said to myself; Poor Creatures, you are employ'd in the hopes of Prey, which presents to you, and you think yourself sure of it; but a Danger is still more near, and you don't perceive it. If you saw your own Situation, the Prey would be insipid to you, you would soon fly away, happy in saving yourself without it. I understand you, said the King, no more of the King, let us think of ourselves."

Chwang wang, King of Tshü, undertook to make a vast Terrass several stories high. This useless Work required a great Expence, and both Officers and People were harass'd with it: The great Officers of the Kingdom, made strong Representations to the Prince upon this Point, but they forfeited their Heads for their Zeal, the Prince having put seventy two of them to Death one after another. Chu yu ki an able Man, who had retired to the Country, having understood what past; while he was labouring his Ground, he entered into a Conversation with his Plough and said: "I design to go and see the King. What are you weary of Life? answered he, personating the Plough, a great many Men of Merit and Figure, who have already presumed to advise the King have gained nothing by it but a speedy Death: And what can you, who are a poor Husbandman pretend to: He then answered in this Manner; Had the Gentlemen in the Court apply'd themselves to Agriculture; they perhaps would have done better than my self: And if I shall advise the King, perhaps I may do better than them. He then left his Plough, and went to present himself before the King."

Chwang wang, seeing him enter, addressing himself to him, said; "Doubtless Chu yu ki is come to make a Remonstrance to me likewise. Who I, Sir, said he, not at all, I will take care of that: It is true I am not Ignorant of what is said; that Sovereigns ought to be just and merciful. It is likewise true, that it is commonly said, that as good Ground profitably receives the Streams which water it: And as no Wood but that which is well plan'd, can suffer to be examined by the Compass and Rule; in the same Manner, wise and virtuous Princes profit by Remonstrances; it is likewise true, that all the World says, that you have undertaken a Work, which oppresses great Numbers of your People. But what am I, that I should presume to make Remonstrances to you upon that Head? No I will take care of that: Immediately turning himself to the Officers that were present, and continuing to speak: "Notwithstanding my Ignorance, said he, I have heard it said, that the King of Yu forfeited his State for not regarding the Councils of Kong chi ki. Chun fell a Sacrifice to Tju in the same Manner. Song never could have subdued Tjau, if he had given any Credit to Hi fu, Tj made himself Master of the States of Lyu, because that Lyu neglected the wholesome Advices of Tse mong: U would have maintain'd himself against Swe, if that Prince had believed Tse si. To what can the Ruin of Tjing be attributed, but to his undervaluing the good Advice of Kyen shu; Lastly, let us go farther back, Kye put Quang wbang pong to Death, for making Remonstrances to him. Kye soon after perished himself, and Tang stepp'd into his Place. Wang tse, for the same Reason, met with the same Fate under Chew, which Chew afterwards lost both the Empire and his Life, and was succeeded by Vu wang. Under one of the Descendants of Vu wang, Tu pe a zealous Minister was rewarded for his Zeal by a cruel Death; from that time forward, that Illustrious Dynasty went to Decay; behold therefore three Emperors, and six other Princes, who, because they undervalued Virtue, and did not profit by Remonstrances, lost all, and ruined themselves.

When Chu yu ki had finished these Words, he went abruptly out, that he might thereby shun the Princes Anger. But Chwang wang caused one to run after him, and when he saw him return, "Draw near without Dread, said he to him, your Advices have made an Impression upon my Mind. All they who have hitherto ventured to make Remonstrances to me, have endeavoured only to exasperate me, without saying any thing to me that was moving; therefore it cost them their Lives. On the contrary, you, without saying any thing that is rude, have laid before me Examples which are as sensible as they are affecting; for which Reason I agree to them." Orders were then given, that the Terras should remain in the same Situation it was then in. Besides, Chwang wang caused it to be published, that he would thenceforth look upon them who gave him useful Advices, as Brothers. This Conversion brought about by a Husbandman, was very much celebrated, and the People of Tju made Songs upon it.

The Reason why Princes commonly don't love Remonstrances, is, a Love for their own Reputation, or some Passion which is too dear to them to quit; or perhaps, both these Causes united. No Prince is so wicked as entirely to renounce the Care of his Reputation. Even they who abandon themselves to the greatest Irregularities, would be very well pleased to have them concealed. Remonstrances make them sensible that their real Character is known, and therefore they hate them. This was formerly the Case of Kye and Chew; and since their Time has been the Case of others. Sometimes a Prince has a Passion which he perceives himself not at all disposed to curb; tho' he is sensible that it is known, and tho' he is acquainted with People's Thoughts about it, yet he does not care that he should be told of it. This is an important Truth. Such was Hyen kong, Prince of Tsin, who could not live without his second Wife Li ki. Such likewise was Wen kong Prince of Tji, who relished no Meats that did not come to him from I in. As for Remonstrance-Makers, there are two Sorts of them. The one Sort proposes to correct the Prince, so as to take care at the same time not to trouble the State, nor ruin themselves. With this View they carefully watch their Times, take their Measures, and use Terms that have nothing in them too strong. Kau shu behaved thus, that he might reconcile (*) Chwang kang with the Queen his Mother. Chang tang, that he might inspire (†) Wen shew with an (*) Chwang kang for some great Dissatisfaction had banished his Mother. That Prince who loved and esteemed Kau shu, caused him one Day to eat at his Table; and from the Honour and Friendship he had for him, presented him with some nice Bit. "Sir, answered Kau shu thanking him, I have an excellent Mother at home, allow me to keep it, that I may carry it to her. She never yet eat any thing that came from your Table." Chwang kang saw the Drift of Kau shu, and found himself affected; so he recalled the Queen-Mother from Banishment, and ever after lived with her in a good Understanding.

Affection

(†) Wen shew was a Prince who loved no body, not even his nearest Relations. Chang tang wanting to make the Prince sensible of this Fault, in the most proper Manner to reclaim him, presented him with a very fine Dog, and a yet finer Goose. That kind of Wild Goose, which in Ching is called Yen, is the Symbol of Alliance and Affection, and anciently was one of the Nuptial Presents. Wen shew received these two Animals, and shewed a great liking for them. Chang tang then took Occasion to make a Remonstrance to that Prince, which was well received, and had its due Effect.

Affection for his Relations. Chang tse sang, that he might support the Hereditary Prince against the Intrigues of the Concubine (*) Tsi, and to rid (†) Kau ti of two other Faults.

Other Remonstrators, without considering Consequences, either with Regard to the State or their own Persons, think only how to gain a Name to themselves, and keep no Measures; they study Tropes and Figures, in order always to chuse the strongest and most striking. Such in their Time were (‡) Li hyen yun, and the great Censor Lyew. Whoever follows the Example of those, may indeed be very sure of gaining a Name in History, but he can never expect any Fruit from his Remonstrances, but to draw down upon himself the Wrath and Indignation of his Prince.

OF GOVERNMENT.

TSE TSAN, Prime Minister of Chin, on his Death-Bed said to Tay shü. You will infallibly succeed me: And I desire, before I die, to give you an Advice. Gentleness and Indulgence may sometimes succeed, but it is only when it is supported by an eminent and approved Virtue; without this, the surest Way is to use some Severity. Fire is an active and violent Element, feared by every body; and for that very Reason occasions the Death of very few. But vast Numbers perish in the Water, which appears to yield easily, and has nothing in it that is formidable. Take Care; for it is a very difficult Task to govern by Gentleness alone.

Some Months after Tse tsan being dead, Tay shü succeeded him; and at first had not Courage enough to conquer his natural Temper so far, as to use Severity. But he soon saw that Gentleness alone spoilt all. Then calling to his Mind the Advice of Tse tsan, and acknowledging his Fault, O my Master! cried he, had I at first profited by your Councils, Things could never have come to this pass. But he then applied the Remedy, by altering his Conduct; and this Change succeeded with him.

In effect, says Confucius upon this Point, a Government of Gentleness alone, frequently renders the People insolent. They require Rigour to curb them; but Severity by itself oppresses and exasperates them. Gentleness ought likewise to be under proper Regulations. A just Mixture of both makes a State happy and peaceable. The two main Springs of Government, are Virtue and Resolution. Princes of the first Rate employ only the former; and are very sparing in the Use of the other. Others who are less perfect use them both, almost promiscuously. Lastly, there are Princes who lay great Stress upon Severity, and little upon Virtue.

Whatever Difference there is among these three Kinds of Government, we may say of them in general, that neither of them can succeed without these two Springs. The first encourages the People in the Practice of Good. The other punishes their Faults and prevents their relapsing. Princes, that they may animate their Subjects to Virtue, besides the Pattern which they themselves set, have several Ways to make their People sensible how much they value it. Thence proceed Rewards, of which there are several Kinds. They likewise have different Ways of testifying their Horror for Vice. Thence proceed Punishments. Nothing is of greater Consequence to a State, than this wise Mixture of Rewards and Punishments. The Faults of Princes in this Point, commonly have fatal Consequences. The Szu king says, I have often heard it repeated, that these two important Points ought entirely to employ a Sovereign.

Have you seen the (||) Nu king touched? You may then observe, that if too great a Motion is given to the large Strings, the little ones are useless, and the Harmony is incomplete: Thus it happens in the Government of a State.

A Reputation which is too quickly gained, and is too glaring in Point of Government, is neither very extensive, nor very lasting. Such a Man for a long time has constantly had a good Character in the Empire, but it has made no great Noise; and he has acquired it by little and little. This is likewise the Meaning of the Proverb; A Horse that is ready to gallop when he leaves the Stable, is not one of those who can make 100 Leagues on a Stretch. To have more Reputation than Merit, to obtain of the Prince Rewards of much greater Value than one's Services, are two things, which in my Opinion, are more to be feared than wished.

Wen kong King of Tsi, having taken Quan cheng for his Minister, one Day said to him: "My Ambition is to see my Government established in such a Manner, as that every one, even (*) Vid. P. 697.

(†) The Dynasty of Tsin being extinct, Lyew pang, who was afterwards Emperor, and surnamed Kau ti, disputing the Crown with some others, being defeated in an Engagement, found himself in such a Situation, that his Person might have fallen into the Hands of the Enemies if they had had a Mind. Yang chi, an Officer of the victorious Army, was of Opinion, that Lyew pang should be dispatched out of the Way. But Ting kong, another Officer of the same Army, secretly gave Lyew pang an Opportunity to escape, telling him withal, I let you escape, but if you come to be Emperor, as probably you will, I desire that you would make me a Hou. When Lyew pang became Master of the Empire, he wanted to have punished Yang chi, and to have rewarded Ting kong. "You don't consider, sir, said Chang tse sang to him: Give me leave to tell you, that Yang chi has shewed his Zeal and Loyalty for the Master he served, and you for that Reason would put him to Death; you ought to promote him: As for Ting kong, he has from interested Views betrayed his Party, and if you promote him, it will be an Invitation to your Subjects to imitate him on the like Occasion. Were my Advice taken, Ting kong should have his Head cut off." Kau ti comprehended the Importance of this Advice, and followed it contrary to his Inclination.

(‡) Under the Tang Dynasty, an Emperor fell in Love with a Slave in the Palace, who afterwards became Empress. She laid hold of so many Opportunities of establishing her own Authority by his Favour, that after the Death of the Emperor she seized the Government, which she kept in Prejudice of the late Emperor's Son the Hereditary Prince, who was banished far from the Court, and made the petty Prince of Li lie. Li hyen and the Censor Lyew, presented her from time to time, the most bitter Remonstrances on this and other Points of her Conduct. The Censor Lyew went so far as to tell her flatly, that she having been once a mean Slave, is left become her to all in that Manner. She caused them both to be put to Death. But afterwards, more moderate and more reasonable Remonstrances made her recall the Prince and establish him anew, but without divesting herself of the Government. This Point of History has been touched upon elsewhere.

(||) An Instrument of Music.

" even of the lowest People, should be satisfied, and say, that every thing goes well. Do you believe that this can be attained to? Yes, answered Quan chong, I believe it may; but not in a Government which follows the Rules of true Wisdom: Why not? replied the King. For the same Reason, answered Quan chong, why a short bit of Rope is not sufficient to draw Water out of a deep Well. Even among understanding Men, there are different Orders, of which some are a great deal above others. By a much stronger Reason, the Multitude cannot reach the sublime Views of the truly Wise. Therefore it is not necessary that they should aim at that Pitch of Perfection. It is sufficient, and even convenient, that they be sensible that their Governors have Views infinitely superior to theirs. They are then more tractable and more submissive." To endeavour to lead the People by the Hand, and as it were to put the Morsel into their Mouths, is spoiling them. They must only be kept in order. Their Safety must be watched over, and they must be fed as a Shepherd feeds his Flock. People must be treated neither with Tyranny nor Severity. But then, Governors must not be afraid of conducting and regulating their Actions. It would be a dangerous Method, before an Ordinance is published, to run from Door to Door begging for Approbation. Governors examine what is convenient, and the Ordinance is issued for every one's Obedience in general. The Wise then approve of it, and the others obey it. This is sufficient, and it is certainly the best Method.

The same When kong being one Day a hunting, and chasing a Deer which he had wounded, met with a good old Man in an agreeable Valley. He asked the old Man how that Place was called? It is called, answered the other with a Smile, the Valley of the simple old Man. Whence did it get that Name, replied the King? From my self, answered the old Man. How! says the King? You have a promising Aspect, and seem to be far from being simple. The History, answers the old Man, since you want to know it, is as follows. My Cow brought forth a Calf, which being grown up, I sold, and bought a Foal. Upon which some of the Neighbours came and jeered me; What, said they, has your Cow brought forth a Foal? never was such a thing before; the Monster must be destroyed. Whereupon they seized and carried the Foal away; and I suffered them to do it. When this Story was heard, every body in the Village cried out, O the Simpleton! And for that Reason, this Place is called the Valley of the simple old Man. Why to you was, answered the King; why did you give up your Foal so?"

Next Morning when When kong returned, and Quan chong came to an Audience, the King told him this Adventure to divert him. But Quan chong with a serious and even a melancholy Air, took the Thing in another Sense. " Sir, said he to the Prince, This is no laughing Matter; the Country Man's Tale was a Lesson to you and to me. Were Yau reigning here, Reason and Justice would reign likewise. Nor would it be treated as a Trifle for a Man's Goods to be taken from him in such a Manner. If this old Man was patient, and suffered himself to be robbed of his Foal without complaining, it was not from Stupidity. He knew that he could obtain Justice only from the Tribunals: Let us retire, Sir, for some time, and seriously examine where the Source of this Evil is, that we may effectually cure it." Confucius thought this Saying of Quan chong so beautiful, that he recommended it to his Disciples not to forget it.

Kang tse reigning in the Principality of Lü; a Father and a Son mutually accused each other before a Judge. The Affair coming before the Prince, he pronounced that the Son must die. Confucius opposed this Sentence, saying, " That it was not then a Time to punish Crimes with the utmost Severity. These poor People, added he, have been long without Instruction, and consequently they understand very little about their Duties. The Son, doubtless has not comprehended the heinousness of the Crime of accusing his Father. This ought to be imputed to the Prince and the other Governors. If they did their Duties right, and especially if they were all virtuous, the People would never fall into such Faults. Kang tse being willing to defend his Judgment, replied; Filial Piety being universally acknowledged the fundamental Point of Government, to stop by the Death of one Man, the Disorders that violate this Duty, is not only allowable, but necessary. I say, Sir, answered Confucius, in the present Situation, it would be Cruelty. Procure to your People the Instruction that is needful; and to that add a good Example. Then you may punish with Rigour; and they that you punish will be sensible that they deserve their Punishment. This Wall is but a (*) fin in Height: Yet there is not one Man in your whole Kingdom, who can all at once, without a Ladder, get to the Top of it. On the contrary, there is scarce any body, who by degrees, cannot get to the Top of that Mountain, which is 100 times higher than the Wall. In the State in which your People are at present, Charity and Justice, these two capital Virtues, and consequently all the others, are to them like a steep Wall. Is this a Time for imputing it as a Crime to any one, because he cannot get to the Top of that Wall? Give Time to the People, says the Shi king, and procure them the Means of being made sensible of their Blindness and their bad Habits."

The King of Ssang conversing with Confucius said to him; My Desires are to be at the Head of a good many Princes; to have my Court in good Order, and furnish'd with good Officers; to keep my People always satisfied and quiet; to see Men of Learning apply themselves to be useful to the State, and to have the Seasons well regulated. If you believe that all these Things are really possible, what do you think must I do to attain to them? Confucius answer'd, I have been in Company with several Princes who have asked Questions of me, but none of them ever asked me so many as you do. However, my Answer to you is, that I believe that all this is possible enough, in the following Manner; As for your first Article, it is sufficient cient, in the Situation in which I see Things, to enter into an Alliance with your Neighbours heartily and sincerely. As for the second, you must be gentle and liberal, with regard to those who come near your Person. To obtain the third, you ought never to treat the Innocent ill, and you must punish the Guilty without Pardon. That you may bring the fourth about, you are to advance Men of Learning when they deserve it, and to let few of them be without Posts. To obtain the fifth, you must honour Tyen and the Spirits. You are in the right of it, said the King: there is nothing in all this but what is probable.

Tong ngan yu being nominated to be Intendant of the Territory of Tjing yang, begg'd of Kyen lau that he would give him in a few Words some important Lesson upon Government. Kyen lau answer'd him in three Words, Zeal, Honour and Courage. Tong ngan yu begg'd that he would be a little more explicit upon these Words. Kyen lau reply'd, Zeal and Loyalty for the Prince your Master; Honour and Honesty to maintain the Orders, you shall give, and the Persons you employ, and Courage and Resolution against the Wicked, of all Degrees and Ranks. 'Tis all right, said Tong ngan yu, and I am convinced of the Importance of what you have told me.

Mi tse byen intendant of the Territory of Tan fu, spent some part of his Life in practising upon his (*) Kin, and to all Appearance gave himself no Trouble. In the mean time, every Thing was in Order, and Affairs never went better. U ma ki succeeded him. He preserv'd Order pretty well for some, but it was by being at a great deal of pains Night and Day. Afterwards, they both met together, and U ma ki said to Mi tse byen; when you was at Tau fu, you diverted yourself almost the whole Day, and you made you Post an Amusement; yet when you went away I found every Thing in very good order. As for me, I have been at a great deal of Pains, but all I can gain is to do no Harm. Whence, I beg of you, does this difference proceed? Because, answer'd Mi tse byen smiling, I used my own Powers very sparingly, and made the Powers of others act; but you act all by your own. In effect, the Country People comparing the one with the other, said, that Mi tse byen was an able Man, but that U ma ki did not come near him.

Tse kong being nominated the Magistrate of Sin yang, before he set out for his Government, came to take Leave of his Master Confucius, who told him with a pretty grave Air: Take care while you are in Post, that you be guilty neither of Violence, Oppression, Cruelty nor Theft. Who I? Said Tse kong in a Surprise; I, who have from my Childhood had you for my Master; can I be capable of such Enormities? Is it then possible that you can have so poor an Opinion of me? You don't comprehend my Meaning, answer'd Confucius with a franker Air. There are several Kinds of Violence and Oppression, Cruelty and Theft. Give the Posts that depend upon you, to Persons of Abilities and Virtues; But to set them aside by placing, or even permitting the Wicked and the Weak to fill them, is Violence. To suffer Men who have some Abilities, or even Virtues, if they get the upperhand, to oppress those who want them, or to act in that Manner yourself, is Oppression. Not to be exact and careful in instructing and directing your Inferiors, and yet to be subject to Passion and prompt to punish, is Cruelty. To ascribe the Good another does to yourself, and to deprive him of the Glory he has by it, is Theft. And this is a Theft, not so very rare among many who pass for Men of Honour. Do you believe that to be guilty of Theft, you must steal your Neighbour's Cloaths or Money? Think rightly upon what is said; "A good Magistrate respects the Laws, and ought to be the Guardian of them for the Peoples Advantage; but a bad one make them serve to oppress that very People." Nothing is more true. Thence proceeds Murmurs and Imprecations. Equity and Disinterestedness are two essential Points, and they are both the Duty and Safety of a Magistrate. To stifle the Good another does, or to conceal it, is wrong. But to discover or blaze abroad their Failings, is worse. Never did one lose, and he commonly gains, by enhancing the Value of the Good another does. On the contrary, nothing is gained; and generally every thing is lost, by publishing the Faults of another. Therefore the wise Man never speaks but with a great deal of Caution. Remark this, and be convinced, that a Man never gains any thing for himself by hurting his Neighbour.

Yang chu being one Day with the King of Lyang, was expatiating upon the Government of States, which he advanced and maintained to be a very easy Matter. Master, said the King to him, you have only a Wife and a Concubine, and I know you can't govern them. Yet, if we may believe you, the Government of a State would be a meer Trifle to you. Sir, answer'd Yang chu, that is all true, and is no way inconsistent. A single Shepherd with his Crook in his Hand guides 100 Sheep with Success: But if two (||) Shepherds should undertake to manage one, they would find Difficulty in it. But don't you know the common Proverb; Great Instruments of Music are of no Value to Strollers: Great fishes are produced in great Waters. A Man who fails of Success in small Affairs, may succeed in great ones.

When kong one Day asked his Minister Quan chong, what was most to be feared in a State? Quan chong answer'd: Sir, in my Opinion, nothing is to be more feared than what is called a Rat in a Statue. When kong not understanding the Allegory, Quan chong explained it to him. You know that in a good many Places, they erect Statues to the Genius of the Place. These Statues are of Wood; hollow within and coloured over without. If a Rat gets into one of these, it is driven out of it with great Difficulty. They dare not use Fire for fear of consuming the Wood, and Water would wash off the Colours. Thus the Respect they have for the Statue, protects the Rat. Men without Merit and Virtue, who have the Princes Favour, are very much like like this Rat. They spoil every thing. People see and bewail it, but no body knows how to help it.

(*) An Instrument of Music.

(||) He hints as if his Wife wanted to govern his Concubine in the same manner.

Ki tse, in one of his Travels, passed thro' the Kingdom of Tsin, and had scarce put his Foot ashore, when he cried out with a Sigh; How great is the Oppression of this Kingdom! When he entered into its Capital, he cried out in the same Tone; How much is this Kingdom drained! Then seeing the King and his Court, he said; Alas! Rebellion and Trouble are not far from this Kingdom: His Attendants hearing these Exclamations, said to him; You are but just come into the Kingdom of Tsin, how then can you pronounce upon all this in so decisive a Manner? I will tell you how, answered Ki tse. When I entered the Kingdom, I saw a great deal of Ground lying idle, and the rest of it very ill cultivated; and at the same time I observed, that the Inhabitants, in many Places, were employ'd in very useless Works. Thence I concluded that the People were oppress'd with Averages. When I entered the Capital, I remarked that all the new Buildings were tottering, but the old ones were very firm. On this Account, I said, that the Kingdom was drained. When I came to Court, I observed that the Prince seem'd to have got Eyes only to stare about him on all Sides; nor did he ever open his Mouth to ask the least Question. At the same time, I observed a great deal of Haughtiness and Pride among his great Officers, while they were dumb with Regard to every thing that concern'd the common Good; and not one of them attempted to give the King any Advice. This makes me conclude, that Rebellion and Trouble is not far off.

In this Compilation of Tang king chwen, after the Head of Government, there is a Title upon Queens; under which Denomination are comprehended the Wives and Concubines of Emperors and Kings. While he is running over their History, he attempts to prove that the Women have had a great Share in the Ruin of all the Dynasties. Tang king chwen employs full thirty Pages upon this Article. But the Passages of History are only cited, for which Reason they are not translated.

Towards the End, he says, that Tay tsong, the second Emperor of the Tang Dynasty, partly to save Expences, partly from Compassion, after having made Choice of some Women in his Palace, dismissed the others, and suffered them to marry. He proportionally diminished the Number of the Eunuchs of the Palace, so that at one time, upwards of 3000 Persons left the Palace.

Tang king chwen cites Chang pong ki, who having enquired at what Time little Shoes and small Feet, such as the Chinese Women have, began, pretends that this Usage is not of the first Antiquity. He draws his chief Proof from the Silence of some Verses and Songs made in the Times of the first six Dynasties, about Womens little Feet, and little turn'd up Shoes; tho' in that Detail, we find an Account of all that is thought to make the Fair more graceful.

Of the Daughters of Emperors.

TAY TSONG, the second Emperor of the Tang Dynasty, bestowed one of his Daughters in Marriage upon Wang quey, who was then President of the Court of Rites. When Wang quey received that Princess at his House, he said to her; The Rites prescribe to a Daughter in Law, the Manner in which she is to present herself, before her Father and Mother in Law. 'Tis true, that in later Times wherein most of the best Usages have insensibly decayed, Princesses when they have been married, have not been obliged to observe this Usage; but we have now a very understanding Emperor, who knows of what Importance it is that the Rites should be observed, and whose Pleasure it is that they be not neglected. Therefore, Madam, I hope you will not take it amiss if we receive you as a Daughter in Law ought to be received, it not being out of any Pride or private Vanity that we receive you in this Manner, but from our Zeal for the Observance of the Rites, upon which depends the Good of Families and States. He and his Wife then immediately took the upper Part of the Hall, and when they were both seated, the Royal Daughter in Law, with a Napkin over her Arm, first served them with Water wherein they might wash, then with Victuals to eat, and then they retired. This being told to Tay tsong, he very much approved of it, and ordered that for the future, all Princesses, when they were married, should do the same.

Hyau vu, an Emperor of the Song Dynasty, knowing that Princesses rendered themselves insupportable in the Families into which they married, sought the Means of curing this, and fell amongst others, upon one pretty extraordinary Method. Being resolved that one of his Daughters should marry Kyang min, the Son of Kyong skin, whose Virtues and Services had raised him to the highest Dignities, he secretly ordered a strong Representation to be drawn up in the Name of Kyang min, containing a full and particular Account of the Conduct of these Princesses; and in the Conclusion, he begged Leave to be excused from taking a Woman, such as he had drawn the Picture of, for his Wife. The Writing being actually drawn up, was presented to the Emperor, and is as follows, according to the Account we have of it from Tang king chwen.

Sir; your Majesty has been so good as to (*) appoint the Princess Ling hay to be my Wife. This is an extraordinary Favour which I had little Reason to hope for. Yet I cannot but own, that I received that Order with as much Trouble and Uneasiness, as Respect and Gratitude. My own Unworthiness, and yet more, the Meanness of my Birth, remov'd me far from so high an Alliance. An ordinary Woman, and not a Princess, is a proper match for me. Men like me, tho' we are not very rich, scarce assumed the Bonnet when we are married, we come off with some trifling Presents; and there are none so poor as to have any Difficulty in engaging in an honest suitable Match, with whom they can live happy and contented. On the contrary, I reflect that they who marry Princesses, live, for the most Part, in Uneasiness and Vexation. For which Reason, tho' I have a due Sense of the Honour your Majesty designs to do me, I am so far from being satisfied with it, that if I can't avoid it, I believe the Thoughts of it will be my Death. Pardon, Great Sir, my Openness and Simplicity. I am authorised in thinking and talking in this Manner, by many Examples which History furnishes. Under the Tsin, Wang tun, When wen and Chin chang, each espoused a Princess, and they were all of them Men descended of very ancient Families, equally noble and powerful; and besides that, they were Men of very fine Parts and approved Merit. But what were the Effects of their Alliances? Wang tun and When wen, who before were the bravest and the most esteemed young Men about the Court, degenerated under the Shade of that Favour which this Marriage procured them, living in an Indolence mis-becoming their Quality, and dying despised. As for Chin chang, the Yoke appeared so weighty to him, that he counterfeited Madness, in order to be delivered from it. Since that Time, Tse king was seen to burn his Feet, that he might shun such a Match. Wang yen, notwithstanding his Delicacy, threw himself a-cross the Snow, that he might shun the Woman with whom he was coupled. Ho li, who was equal to Long kong in Beauty, threw himself in Despair into a Well. Lye chwang anointed his Eyes designedly, till he almost became blind; In chong exposed himself to, and with Difficulty escaped, the severest Punishments. Not that they wanted Sense and Resolution: But they were oppressed by the Quality and Authority of their Princesses: They could not carry their Complaints before the Emperor; the Door being there shut against them: They then were left to feed upon the most cruel Vexation; and their Condition was a great deal worse than that of the meanest Slave.

A lively
fine Lady.

Coming and going, the paying and receiving Visits to and from Friends, are Liberties common to every honest Man. But does he marry a Princess? Madam comes and goes as she pleases, and there is no Time appointed for her Return: Nor any Regularity in the Family. The Husband must give up all Acquaintance with his Friends, and almost all Correspondence with his Relations. Sometimes a Princess a little better natured, shall take it in her Head not to treat him quite so ill: Then, first an old Nurse knits her Brows, and then a Bonze; and both represent to Madam, that she does not know how to keep her Rank, and that she will spoil all: Besides, she has a Parcel of vile Eunuchs for her Attendants, who have neither Wit, Dexterity, nor Politeness; who do every thing at Random, who blunder backwards and forwards without minding what they say. Such is the Lady's Privy Counsel. The Nurse pretends that her Age gives her a Right, mortally to hate every one that encroaches upon the Credit she has. The Bonze acts the wise Woman, and tells so many future Events, that it is impossible but some of them should happen by Chance. To these two constant Companions, there is commonly added some old Female Fortune-teller, especially towards the End of a Meal, who rivets all that the others have said. The poor Husband must all this Time have Patience, and think himself happy if he does not suffer worse.

One of his great Difficulties is, how to contrive, so as to see Madam either frequently or seldom. He does not know how to behave, so as to satisfy the Whims of his Princess. Does he frequently come to her? He is refused Admittance: Is he admitted? He cannot leave her when he pleases. Does he leave Madam without her Leave? She believes herself despised, and she becomes furious. Does he take Leave of her after he has seen her? He is gone, says she, to see some other Woman. As for Madam, she goes and comes when she pleases; sometimes early in the Night; sometimes at Day-break; sometimes she spends the Night in playing upon Instruments; sometimes she sits the whole Day with her Arms a-cross, poring upon a Book: Her Life, properly speaking, is but one continued Chain of Whims. Our Rites do not forbid us to have some Concubines; and this is not constructed to be any Injury to the Wife. But if this Wife be a Princess, we must not think of such a thing; for then she will believe herself to be injured, and will not be able to bear it. At the least Rumour, at the least Appearance, at the least Suspicion, some brazen-faced Slave comes out of Madam's Apartment, to be a Spy upon her Husband. If he receives a Visit, or if the Conversation continues for a little time, some old Evesdrop carry all to Madam. These are strange Suspensions.

Lastly, that which renders these Princesses who are married more unsupportable is, that they pay a great many Visits. The Conversation in these Visits always falls upon the Husbands. His Extraction, his Manners, his Conduct, and every thing is brought above-board there. They then read Lectures of Haughtiness and Jealousy to one another: And tho' some of them at first, may have better Sense and more good Nature than others, yet she soon becomes as bad as the rest. Therefore, they who hitherto have espoused Princesses, are very fond of getting rid of them. And they who could not shun it, always have been very unfortunate. The poor Wang tsau was a melancholy Instance of this. Tho' this great Man was equally learned and brave, yet he was basely given up to the Tribunals, and suffered a shameful Death for a Trifle. Tou mwan died in the Flower of his Age of meer Vexation; and so many others have met with the same Fate, that it would be endless to recount them.

Besides, when we take a Wife, our principal Design is to have Children. Nothing is more obstructive to this End, than an outrageous Jealousy: And it has been seen by Experience, that he who marries a Princess, besides a great deal of other Vexation, commonly has the additional one of dying without Posterity. And what am I, that I should flatter myself with shunning these Misfortunes? I will therefore take care not to expose my Person and my Family; for almost most all who have suffered this Yoke, have sunk under it. If some of them have silently submitted to it, and patiently suffered it, it was because by Reason of the Dispositions of the Court, they neither could, nor durst, excuse themselves at first, nor complain afterwards. As for me, I have the Happiness to live under an understanding, just, and gentle Prince, who has no other Rule for his Actions than pure upright Reason, and who is possessed by no Prejudices, therefore I unload my Breast to him.

By your Majesty's Favours, my Family is sufficiently raised; therefore my principal Care ought to be to preserve it in that Situation, and to prevent its Ruin. This is what I presume to hope I shall be able to do in so auspicious a Reign. But, if following the Stream of Custom, I aspire to greater Posts, and higher Dignities, I shall attempt to attain to them only by my Disinterestedness, my Capacity, my Application, and my Services: I own to you freely, Great Sir, that it would be by no Means to my Taste, to owe them to the Alliance with which you design to honour me. Besides, my View, in laying before you my Perplexity, was, not only to discover to you my real Sentiments, and to provide for my own Safety, but likewise to let you the better understand the Misfortunes, which such Alliances occasion in other Families: I beg of your Majesty to examine my Reasons, but above all things, to excuse me. Leave, I beseech you, leave the smaller Birds gaily to flutter about with their Equals. Leave the Worms peaceably to multiply their Species; and honourable as this Alliance is for me, be pleased to deign to revoke it. But if your Majesty refuses to hear my humble Request, I will rather cut off my Hairs; I will rather mangle myself, and then fly beyond Seas.

The Emperor having read this Writing which was drawn up to him by his own Order, publicly made Use of it to reprimand the Princesses, and privately to divert himself.

Of Eunuchs and others, who abuse the Authority which the Favour of the Prince gives them.

A Discourse of Ngew yang syew, a celebrated Author under the Song Dynasty.

IN all Ages, Eunuchs who have had Power, have been look'd upon as the Pests of a State. Character of Eunuchs. They are still more to be feared than Women; and that is saying a great deal. They are insinuating, artful, and patient; they know how to give certain Proofs of their Virtue very dexterously in Matters that don't cost them much, that they may court the Esteem of the Prince. They make Advantage of certain seasonable Occasions, which of themselves are of no Consequence, to make a shew to their Master of their Attachment and Loyalty, that they may gain his Confidence. Do they gain it? They take care to pay themselves for their Trouble: They manage the Prince as they please, either by raising up empty Phantoms to fright him, or by suggesting delusive Hopes to sooth him. The Prince may well have at his Court Men of Capacity, Virtue and Zeal, but he looks upon them as Strangers in Comparison of the Eunuchs, who are always near his Person in the Heart of the Palace; he places his whole Confidence in them, and they well know how to use it, so as to encrease their own Power: The Officers without Doors are of no greater Value, than the Eunuchs have a Mind to put upon them. Then Men of Merit either retire or grow cold, and the poor Prince remains alone in the Hands of his Eunuchs, to whom he has abandoned himself. These Wretches frighten him every Moment, and rendering themselves necessary, they more and more strengthen their Authority, or rather, their Tyranny.

But if the Prince at last opens his Eyes, and seeks the Support of his Officers without Doors, these last know not how then to behave. To temporize and to use Precautions, is letting the Evil encrease. To show a Spirit, to apply a speedy and a vigorous Cure, is hazarding, or rather ruining, all, the Prince himself being no better than a Hostage. When Things come to this pass, the most clear sighted cannot see very far: No View presents to them, but what appears dangerous, and as it were impracticable: If, at all Hazards, they attempt some Enterprize, they commonly miscarry, and ruin the Prince, the State, and themselves. The least Evil that happens, is, that they themselves perish, and by their Death, give occasion to some ambitious Person to take Advantage of that Juncture, for laying the Foundations of his own Power, involving the Sovereign in the Cause of the Eunuchs, gaining the Hearts of the People, and extirpating these Scoundrels: A Prince's Passion for Women is very dangerous for a State, which must infallibly be destroyed if the Passion is not cured. But if the Prince repents of it, the Evil is not without Remedy. On the contrary, if by an extraordinary Confidence he imprudently abandons himself to his Eunuchs, in vain would he retract, for he no longer can do that without perishing. The History of the Tang proves this effectually. For which Reason, I said at first, that powerful Eunuchs are yet more to be feared than Women. Can a Prince be too much upon his Guard?

Tang king chwen afterwards mentions five or six other Discourses upon this Subject: But they repeat almost the same thing. The Conclusion of one of these Discourses, is, that the Eunuchs are necessary in a Palace; that they have had a Place there in the earliest Times, and that they cannot be dispensed with: But that they ought to be kept short by the Head, their Faults punctually punished, and the Government of them entrusted to some Officer of Weight; that a Prince above all, ought to take care to give them no Share in the Government of the State, far less to put them in Posts; and this Piece of Conduct the reigning Emperor exactly observes.

Discourse of Sù ché, who lived under the Sòng Dynasty.

Of wicked Favorites and Ministers.

TO know to set a Prince right without disturbing the Peace of the State, is the Master-Piece of a Loyal wife Man; there have been unhappy Times, wherein a weak Prince has taken up with worthless Favorites, and made them the Trustees of all his Authority. Then all the Officers of Virtue and Loyalty in the State, seeing that every thing was disordered by these Villains, from a Zeal to their Prince and their Country, wanted to rid themselves as soon as they could of these Pests. But they, whose Destruction they wished for, were careful to take proper Precautions against them: The Prince was on their Side, and they were safe by the Danger of attacking them. They who are bold enough to do this, either miscarry, or are infallibly ruined: Or else they succeed, and by their Success displease their Sovereign, and throw the State into Troubles, which are frequently the Preludes of its Destruction. Therefore in the Chun tssu such Persons are treated as Rebels, who, without the Knowledge of the Prince, caused Men, tho' otherways deserving Death, to be put to Death.

In effect, a wife Man, however great his Grief may be to see the Authority of the Prince usurped by worthless wicked Subjects who have surprized him, and however warm his Zeal may be to remedy the Evil which draws along with it so many others, ought to restrain himself: And before he undertakes any thing, to lay down his Measures so well, that both his Prince and Country may thank them: What Success can attend, or how can I promise myself any, by rooting out those whom the Prince loves, and whom he thinks are so far from being guilty, that he owes them a great deal? Is not this vesting myself with the Prerogative of my Sovereign? Must I not be odious to him? Can I appear before him? Will he receive my Homages? Will he hear my Excuses? That indeed would be a Prodigy without an Example.

These worthless Favorites are in an Empire almost the same, as what certain noxious Tumours are in Human Bodies, which reach as far sometimes as the Throat. These Tumours, tho' very troublesome, are too near the Windpipe to admit of being cut off. And if any, thro' Impatience, shall cause them to be cut off, Death unavoidably follows. An Impatience such as this, occasioned the Ruin of the Han and the Tang. From the Time of the Emperor Wên ling to that of the Emperor Hien ti, the Empire was governed, or rather mis-governed by the Eunuchs. None filled the Posts in the State but mean Souls, or their Creatures. Men of Merit and Virtue were happy, if, by retiring, they could be sheltered from the Storms of Persecution which then poured upon them from all Quarters. All the Empire groaned with Grief, and trembled with Indignation. At last, some Persons deliberating upon the Means of remedying these Evils, concluded, that the Eunuchs being the Authors of them, there was a Necessity of destroying them, and that then all would be well. Tew wù and Ho tsin undertook to do this, but without Success; and they lost their Lives. Twen chau next attempted it, and succeeded. But this threw the Empire into Convulsions, and occasioned it to change its Master; and thereby ended the Han Dynasty.

The same thing happened under the Tang. The last Emperors of that Dynasty gave themselves up to the Eunuchs, who turned the State upside down; and every Man who had the least Spark of Loyalty, was sensibly affected with this. But Li shun, Ching chin, and some others, had the greatest Share of Impatience and Boldness. They entered into a Conspiracy to extirpate the Eunuchs, in which they failed and perished. At another Juncture, Tsui cheng laid his Measures better down, and succeeded: But his Success ruined the Tang, and was fatal to the State. These were malignant Swellings in a Part which had too near a Connexion with the Vitals, to be cut off without Danger. However they were cut off, and Death ensued: or to speak without a Figure, the Sovereign Authority was violated by extirpating these Favorites against the Prince's Will; and all that the Conquerors gained, was to perish with that State which they hoped to have saved. Subjects, who are really zealous and loyal, ought never to carry Things this Length. Tew wù and Ho tsin, having miscarried and lost their Lives, their Misfortunes was bewailed. For my Share, I judge otherways; they were happy in not succeeding; for if they had succeeded, their Fate had been as certain, and the Empire must have suffered a great deal more. Have I not then Reason to say, that to know how to correct a Prince without endangering the Peace of a State, is the Master-piece of a loyal wife Man.

Another (A) Discourse of the same Author

ACCORDING to what I have already laid down, when bad Men are possessed of the Prince's Favour, and share in his Authority, he who undertakes to destroy them, is sure to perish, if his Design shall mis-give; or if he succeeds, he thereby occasions the Ruin of the Prince, and the Confusion of the State. At this Rate, some People may say, the Confusion however great, is absolutely incurable. Must we for that Reason, suffer these Villains peaceably to enjoy the Fruits of their Wickedness, never think of banishing or destroying them, and coldly see the Destruction of the Prince and State approaching, for fear of disoblighing the one, or disturbing the other. But this is not my Meaning, therefore I must explain it. It is commonly said that a Man when hard beset, is a quite different Man from what he was formerly. It is a Maxim of War, that an Army ought not to be cooped up in such a Manner as to have no Means of escaping, and that regular Troops have no occasion to put themselves in Danger by running after Robbers. This is founded upon a reasonable Fear, lest Men in Despair should make their utmost Effort, and thereby either gain their Point, or make their Loss equal. (*) U and Yue, when in a Bark together and exposed to be Ship-wreck'd, will mutually help one another to ride out the Tempest, as if they were good Friends. These worthless and wicked Subjects who abuse their Credit and Favour, know very well that they are hated and detested. They likewise know, that if the Prince could be informed of the Abuse they make of the Authority with which he entrusts them, he would never be prevailed upon to pardon them. This renders them incessantly careful to prevent a Blow that would be so fatal to their Interest. On the other Hand, Men of Merit mortally hating these worthless Favorites, under whom they are however obliged to submit, form a Conspiracy, and secretly animate and encourage one another, till it is upon the Point of breaking out. So that we may truly say, that, as many Troubles in a State proceed originally from the former, so the latter, by the Measures they take, are the most immediate Causes of them. These are within Doors and about the Prince's Person; those are without, and never come near him. They may therefore be compared, the one to a Landlord, the other to a Stranger. The Stranger ought to follow, and not to anticipate the Steps of the Person with whom he lodges. But this is the Failing of zealous Persons. The former have this Advantage, that acting in the Prince's Name, when they ordain any thing, they speak in clear and consistent Terms, and the People naturally respect the Will of the Prince. On the contrary, the Zeal of the latter has a certain Air of Rebellion, and it is not easy for them to gain Obedience. For which Reason, we have seen at different Times, many, who having unseasonably declared themselves, were immediately deserted by their Party, and miserably perished.

(A) This Discourse is a Consequence, or rather a Continuation of the Preceding.

They who have an equal Share of Wisdom and Zeal, follow a better Method. If their Merit and Rank give them the least Access to their Prince's Person, they dexterously take Advantage of it to insinuate themselves into his Favour, but without Noise or Bustle. At the same time, that they court the Prince's good Graces, they take great care to do nothing that may give Umbrage to his Favorites. They wink at their Faults, they occasionally express Complaisance for them, and approve of the Designs which they know will be agreeable to them, and which are indifferent in themselves. In short, they manage so, as never to be suspected by them, and shun being the Objects of their Artifices and Resentment. They continue upon this Footing, till these Wretches, being blinded by their Fortune, or intoxicated by some Passion, reel to the very Brink of the Precipice, into which the least Push infallibly plunges them: Wise Men are then as watchful in improving, as they were patient in waiting for this Opportunity. They seize it without the least Disaster happening; and they owe their happy Success to the Moderation of their Zeal, in knowing how to reserve themselves for a favourable Juncture.

It is usually said, that the calm dispassionate wise Man, knows how to execute what he undertakes for the Good of his Country; and in effect, it is thus he ought to behave. For when the Wicked are attacked and but slightly pushed, they unite for their mutual Self-defence; but if they are let alone, they disunite. Each of them acts for himself, and either betray themselves mutually, or clash with one another. Then it is easy to lend the Prince a helping Hand to extricate himself; to pursue other Measures is quite mistaking the Point.

Parallel between the two short Dynasties of Tsin and Sui.

THE illustrious Dynasty of the Chow having fallen into Decay, these unhappy and cursed Times, that are called the Times of War, succeeded. They ended only with Tsin shi wang, who having subdued the other Princes, assumed the Title of Emperor, and founded the Tsin Dynasty. In the same Manner, tho' the Tsin Dynasty was extinguished a long time after, yet it contained as it were two Empires; the one towards the South, the other towards the North: And these remained till the Times of Sui wen ti, who reunited them both, and then begun the Sui Dynasty. Tsin shi wang and Sui wen ti were Princes, who had more than ordinary Abilities, Bravery, Capacity and Spirit. Their first setting out, has somewhat in it more dazzling than any that have been since seen. If one reads their military Expeditions, he will see with what Care they fix'd their Court in an advantageous Place, and erected strong Fortifications for their Defence. He will likewise see, that after they became Masters of the Empire, they took not the least care to perpetuate the Government in their Families, who lost it in the second Generation. Whence proceeded this? Because they deviated from all the Rules of Antiquity. First, instead of confining themselves to a general Inspection, which alone is worthy of a Sovereign, they wanted to govern every thing immediately by themselves. In the second Place, they founded their Government upon Severity and Punishments, and not upon the Laws and Virtue. In the third Place, they deprived themselves of what might have been their most firm Support. Lastly, they entrusted the Education of their Heir to Men very unfit for that Office, and without any Attachment either to their Persons or their Families: It is but too ordinary for (*) Sovereigns to devolve upon another, all the thorny Part of Government, to want Application, and to abandon themselves to their Pleasures. When the Prince at the Head of a State is of this Character, the whole Body feels it: And it is thereby that great Empires are commonly ruined.

The two Princes of whom I speak here, are an Exception in this Kind, for they began their own Ruin in a quite different Manner. Being always afraid lest some body after their Example, should make themselves Master; in order to avoid this Misfortune, they wanted to regulate every thing, even the meanest Trifle, by themselves. Their Ministers and their other Officers had no part in the Government: They made out some Dispatches, and that was all their Employment. Being always treated haughtily, if they happened to displease their Prince, they were immediately punished in a severe and shameful Manner. For this Reason, they were at very little Pains about any thing, besides their own Safety. They touched their Pensions, and managed in the best Manner they could, that they might avoid disobliging the Prince, and thereby keep him in Ignorance of the most important Affairs.

Our ancient Way of Governing was founded on Virtue; even such among them as opened their Way to the Throne by their Swords, when they were seated there, governed according to the Laws and Justice, with Gentleness and Moderation. This charming Way of Governing, so much gained them the Hearts of the People, that they were always found tractable, and susceptible of Instruction. Thence proceed Peace, Unanimity, Loyalty, and Reformation of Manners. It was this Manner of Governing, which preserved the Empire so long in our three first Dynasties.

The two Princes, of whom I speak, left this Path: Being always restless, from an extravagant Fear of losing that which cost them so dear, they altered the Law according to their own Notions: There was nothing then but Suspensions, Searches and Rigors. Sbi wbang, especially, was so cruel, that he rendered himself detestable; so that at the first Signal given by certain Chin, the Rebellion grew general, and an End was soon put to the Tsin Dynasty.

Swi ven ti, tho' he was not so cruel, yet he trod in the Steps of Sbi wbang, and forfeited all in the same Manner. Had these Princes, when they became Sovereigns, each in his respective time, governed with Justice and Gentleness, according to the ancient Methods, they had endeared their Subjects to them; so that if their Descendants had met with some small Opposition, yet they would have been supported with greater Numbers, and could not have been so suddenly ruined. We find in Antiquity, that the Head of a Family, as soon as he is seated in the Throne, divides, as it were, the Empire with his Relations. He assigns them Territories, of which he makes them (†) the Vang or the Hew. And these serve as so many Ramparts to fortify the reigning Family. This was the Reason why the Shang and the Cheu Dynasties continued so long upon the Throne. Sbi wbang observed a quite different Method. The Cheu Dynasty being upon its Decline, and the fine Government of the first Emperors being no longer in Force, the Tributary Princes, without Regard to the Emperor, were naturally often at War with one another, and this gave the finishing Stroke to the Ruin of that Dynasty. Sbi wbang becoming absolute Master, minded nothing but their Divisions; and for fear of falling into the like Inconveniency, made neither a Vang nor a Hew; his nearest Relations remaining private Men: So that when Rebellions happened, he found none whose Interest it was to support him. For which Reason, this Dynasty, which began with so much Lustre, was ruined in a very few Years. Swi ven ti acted in his Time, in the same Manner as Sbi wbang did, and therefore his House met with the same Fate.

Lastly, as it is a main Point, that there should be a right Choice of those to whom the Heir of the Crown is entrusted, there cannot too great Care be taken in making Choice of worthy Persons for that Office. Vu vang chose Cheu kong for his Son Cbing vang. Vu ti chose Ho quang for Chau ti; this Choice was wise and successful. But it happened otherways with Sbi wbang. His eldest Son Fu fu, having one Day taken the Liberty to make a Remonstrance to him, tho' it was in very respectful just Terms, yet it put Sbi wbang into such a Passion, that he banished the Prince a great way to the North. Sbi wbang being soon after attacked on all Hands, he recalled his Son, when he was almost over-powered; but he did ill in entrusting him to Chau kau. This faithless Subject had no View but private Interest, and plotted with Li se. Fu fu did not succeed his Father, the Crown going to Eul shi who completed the Ruin of all. Tong, the eldest Son of Swi ven ti met with the same Fate. His Father, upon some Reports that were made to him, kept him a long time in Prison. When he was dying he let him free, and trusted to the Traytor Quang, who kept, to outward Appearances, better Measures with Tong than he had done with Fu fu; but in the main likewise betrayed him to the opposite Party. There were upwards of 1000 Years betwixt the Tsin and the Swi, but making Allowance for the Distance of Time, they were alike in every thing else. The Han Dynasty succeeded that of the Tsin, and had more than twenty Emperors, who, in all, reigned upwards of 400 Years. The Dynasty of the Tang followed that of the Swi, and counted twenty Emperors of its own, who reigned upwards of two hundred and eighty nine Years. So that we may in some measure, say with Justice, that the Tsin and the Swi were the Forerunners of the Han and the Tang; these last having continued so long, and the first perished so soon.

(*) He resumes these four Points, and enlarges a little upon them. (†) Names of Dignities.

Present Prosperity or Adversity, have their Causes in preceeding Times. When I read the History of Tsi, and see the flourishing Condition of that State, while Yuan chong was Minister under When kong, I am far from attributing all the Glory to Yuan chong; for I ascribe it in a good Measure to (*) Pau shu who had been for some time dead. When soon after, I find the same State ruined by Sba tau, I yu and Kay sang, I attribute the Misfortune not so much to these three Ministers, as to their Predecessor Yuan chong. How happened this? In the following Manner. When Shun managed the Empire under Yau, he caused the four bad Men who wanted to make a Figure, to be banished. Confucius, when he was Minister in the Kingdom of Lü, gave the Kingdom a speedy Riddance of Chau ching a very dangerous Man. If Yuan chong, had herein imitated (+) Shun and Confucius, When kong would never have employed these three Men, and they never then would have been capable to have done any Harm. Behold one Reason for attributing in a great Measure the Disorders, which they occasioned, to Yuan chong. But there are still other Reasons; for I find in History, that when Yuan chong was sick, his Prince asked him whom he thought was most proper to succeed him in Case he died? When I first read that Passage of History, I expected that Yuan chong would have pointed out the Man of the greatest Capacity and Virtue in the Kingdom, but he did no such thing. Yuan chong indeed told the Prince, that Kay sang, I yu and Sba tau, were Men very incapable of such an Employment, and even unworthy to approach his Person. But alas! Ought not Yuan chong, who had lived so many Years with When kong, to have thoroughly known him? Did not he know his Propensity to Pleasures? Did not he know that these three Men were the Ministers of his Debauches? Did he not know that they would long before that Time have been in the highest Posts, had not he himself for a long time, been resolute in keeping them out? Ought he not to have foreseen what was to happen after his Death, if greater Obstacles were not thrown in the Way? Yes, I am not afraid to say, that Yuan chong ruined Tsi; and if it was not from his failing to imitate Confucius and Shun during his Life, it was at least for having failed to name a faithful Minister to succeed him after his Death.

In effect, the greatest Misfortune of Tsi, was not its having these very three wicked Men, but its no longer having a Yuan chong. While he lived, they had no Authority, notwithstanding the Favour they possessed. Yuan chong, when he was dying, told his Prince, that he ought never to put them in Posts; but this was not the main Point. For we shall suppose, that When kong, out of the Regard he had to this Advice, had actually left them without any Posts; were they the only bad Men in the World? Could not When kong have made another bad Choice? The important Matter was, that Yuan chong ought to have laid hold on the Occasion which the Prince furnished him, to promote some able Man: If he had left another like himself, to the State, he had acted to Purpose: And in that Case he might very well have been silent, as to what he said in vain about these three Men.

Of five (†) Pa famous in History, the two most powerful without Contradiction, were When kong Prince of Tsi, and Wen kong Prince of Tsin. This last had nothing superior to the first; and the Ministers he chose undoubtedly were inferior to Yuan chong. Tsi, tis true, had the Misfortune to have Ling kong, a cruel Prince. But Wen kong was succeeded by Hiau kong a Prince excessively good, and whose extreme Indulgence was at least as fatal as the Cruelty of Ling kong. And yet, after the Death of Wen kong, none of the Tributary Princes durst stir. Tsin kept them within the Bounds of Respect and Submission for near 100 Years longer. Tsi, on the contrary, was ruined immediately after the Death of When kong. What occasioned the Difference? Because Tsin, after the Death of Wen kong, had still wise Ministers; who, notwithstanding the Degeneracy of the Princes, kept Things on a good Footing: Tsi, on the contrary, had not one. Was this then, because after the Death of Yuan chong, there was not a Man in the Empire capable to govern. Who can believe that? The Reason was, that such a Man was not obliged to appear. Se tsiu, not being able during his Life, to get Mi tse twan banished, nor Kyu pè yü promoted; when dying, found Means that it should be brought about after his Death. Syau lo, when upon his Death-bed, recommended Tsau tsü to be his Successor, tho' they were Enemies. These may well be called, faithful, zealous Ministers. They knew that the Happiness or Unhappiness of a State, depends upon the Man who is at the Head of it. They would have been unwilling to have died, if the State was thereby to suffer. Their Care, at their latest Breath, was to provide in it a good Minister. Did Yuan chong die thus?

DISCOURSE of Sù ché

WHEN a Person is either to bestow, or to receive a Favour, the wise Man has more Considerations than one. In the first Case, he does not satisfy himself with saying, I can do such a Man a Piece of Service, therefore I will do it. He examines if the thing befits the Person who is to receive it, and if it does not, he goes no further, notwithstanding all the Honour he might reap from it. I can procure such an Employment for such a Person, says a wife Man, and he is a very capable Person, therefore let me do it. I can do such and such a thing for such a Man, but that Man would do wrong to accept of it, therefore I will think no more of it. If the wife Man is to receive a Favour, he reasons in the same Manner. Such an Advantage, says

(*) He had made Yuan chong to appear, and to be put into Post.

(†) That is to say, Had he engaged the Prince to have rid himself of these three bad Men.

(‡) This Title has been given to certain Princes, who without being Emperors, caused certain Forms of Respect and Submission to be paid them, by their Power, not by their Virtue.

says he, will accrue from it, and I do not think myself entirely unworthy; for my Share, I see nothing that should hinder me from accepting of it: But I see otherways clearly, that he who procures it to me, is in the Wrong in procuring it, therefore I refuse to accept of it. To act in another Manner, is in some Measure to co-operate with another Man's Faults: At least, it is very little minding the Ill which others do: To aim, if I may so speak, to be the only wise Man in the World, is, in effect, ceasing to be wise at all. It is easy upon these Maxims, to decide which of the two are in the Right of it, and whither Lyew ki or Ting bong were the wisest. At the Time that the Emperors of the Han Dynasty kept their Court in the East, Lyew ki, the Tributary Prince, gave up his Estate to his younger Brother Lyew king. The Cession was published, accepted, and ratified; Lyew ki always persisting in his Design, notwithstanding all the Representations that were made him upon the Weakness of his Brother Lyew king.

Ting bong, another Prince of the same Rank, formed likewise a Design of making such an Abdication; and that he might meet with no Obstacle, he feigned himself to be an Idiot. But Pau tsing, one of his intimate Friends, soon perceived his Madness not to be real. Upon this, he made such reasonable Remonstrances to his Friend, that Ting bong, who at first thought he had been doing a fine Action, easily saw that he was doing a very bad one. Upon this he appeared the same Man that he had always been, and talked no more of abdicating. His Readiness and his Courage to retract, are very laudable, and besides that, are a Proof, that Vanity, was no Motive of what he intended to do: But that he really thought that he was doing right. Thus it was that Fan, one of the famous Literati reasoned, when he concluded in Favour of Ting, and preferred him to Lyew ki.

Tay pe and Pe i are Objections under the Dynasty Chew. They yielded their Estates to their younger Brothers, and by that Abdication they rendered themselves famous. He answers, that Tay pe and Pe i being the first who set that fine Example, it is no Wonder that they, in their Age, struck the World very much: That Tay pe and Pe i being otherways very well known, the Cession which they made, could be attributed only to their Virtue: But we have since seen Men without Virtue, who with a stupid Ambition have become famous like these two great Men, by blundering foolishly into this Road. Such was Lyew ki, adds Fan: He got himself a Name in his own Time by his Renunciation, but it was at the Expence of the State and his Brother, who could not govern without Confusion. The Motive of Ting bong, on the contrary, when he wanted to abdicate the Crown, says the same Fan, was not the meer Ambition of acquiring a Name, for he thought that he was doing a glorious Action, and at the same time, promoting the Happiness of his Brother and his State. It was proved to him, that his Renunciation was inconsistent with the Good of both; and immediately he retracted and fell back into the beaten Path. Ting bong doubtless is to be preferred; and it is unjust to compare him with Lyew ki. Such is the Decision of Fan; and in my Opinion, it is a right one: But as he might have a little illustrated the Equity of it, it will not be amiss if I do it for him.

Our ancient Kings, by establishing the Custom and making it a Law, that their eldest Son should succeed them, did not act at Random, or from meer Inclination: Their Design was, that the Stock of their Family should be always well distinguished, that thereby they might prevent Troubles. Every Emperor, every Tributary Prince, acknowledged a first Prince of his Race, from whom he held the Crown. The Emperor durst not, as he had a Mind, give to this or t'other Man, the Empire he held of his Ancestors. This is a received Maxim. Doubtless Lyew ki and Ting bong did not make themselves Princes: They were born in that high Rank, and received from their Ancestors the Empire which they wanted to abdicate. But to give a State which a Prince has from his Fathers, to those who have no Right to it, is wrong. Tay pe and Pe i, tis true, did it; but as they did it in very extraordinary Circumstances, theirs is not an Example to be followed; and Lyew ki was wrong in several Respects. He put too little a Value upon a State he had received from his Ancestors; and that was the Cause of his Brothers suffering a great deal. In short, he violated the Laws that were received, and wisely established, for the Quiet of States.

Therefore to judge rightly, and according to the Rites, the Fault of Lyew ki was great. What might mitigate it a little, is, that under the Han Dynasty, when he lived, a good many People took that Method to gain themselves a Name. The Infection began under the Western Han, by Wey boen chin, who being made Hew, yielded the Honour to one of his Brothers. The then reigning Emperor looked upon this Action as a Point of eminent Virtue; and all the Empire, in Imitation of the Prince, applauded him. This Notion prevailed so much, that no Man, tho' otherways wise and virtuous, was esteemed, if he did not perform some Action or other of that Kind. But if this Notion, by being common, a little alleviates the Fault of Lyew ki, we ought by so much the more to esteem Ting bong, who, without suffering himself to be carried away by the Torrent, knew how to persevere in the right Path. For my Share, the more I consider, the more I admire him.

There was, in the Kingdom of Tsi, a Man of great Merit, whose Name was Shin min: That he might acquit himself of the Duties of a good Son, he lived single, and was very diligent about his Father. This made him to be still more esteemed; and the Prince received so favourable a Notion of him, that he wanted to make him one of his Ministers; but Shin min declined it, and his Father asked him why he did so. Because, answered he, I am afraid I shall then cease to be a dutiful Son. But, says the Father, do you consider that when you touch the Salary of a Minister, I shall be in better Circumstances than ever; and you, by fulfilling the Duties of your your Post, will reflect an honour upon me likewise; so that it is our mutual Advantage that you should accept of the Post, and I desire that you would. Sbin min obeyed, and beheld him a Minister. Within three Years Pe kong rebelled, and Se ma tse, who was sent to oppose him, was defeated and killed. Sbin min run to stop the Progress of the Enemy; but his Father, to keep him at home, said to him, Why should you thus leave me, to meet with a certain Death? A Man in my Station, answers Sbin min, owes himself to his Prince, and owes only his Salary to his Father and Mother. It was your Pleasure that I should serve the Prince; and I sacrifice my Life for him. After this, he marched at the Head of a Body of Troops, and hemmed in the Enemy. Pe kong who knew Sbin min, said then to one of his Officers named Sbe ki; We are now in a very bad Situation: Sbin min is able and brave, and keeps us fairly blocked up here. How shall we behave? Behold an Expedient, said Sbe ki; Sbin min, you know, is famous for his filial Piety, we must make sure of his Father's Person. The Son then to relieve his Father, will give an Ear to the advantageous Proposals you make him. Pe kong immediately sent off People, who very dexterously seized the Father, and then sent this Message to Sbin min; We will divide Tsu betwixt us, if you are satisfied, it is well; if not, I have your Father in my Hands, and he shall be put to Death. Sbin min answered, dissolving in Tears; At first I was a dutiful Son, but now I am a faithful Minister: Since at this Juncture, I cannot at once discharge two Duties, let me serve my Prince; my Loyalty requires that I should do for him all that I can. He then attacked the Rebels, defeated them, killed Pe kong, but lost his Father. The Prince wanted to reward his Minister with a Present of 100 Pounds of Gold; but Sbin min refused it, saying, Not to hazard all in the Service of one's Prince, is failing in the Duty of a good Subject, and much more in that of a faithful Minister. But to occasion the Death of one's Father by serving the Prince and the State, is failing in the Duty of a good Son. Since therefore I could not reconcile these two Duties together, with what Face can I appear amongst Men? When he had finished these Words, he killed himself.

Tang king chwen relates other Histories of these Kinds of Heroes, who in this Manner put themselves to Death, that they might not survive a pretended Dishonour: And he is satisfied with saying once for all: In my Opinion, a Man is not to put himself to Death if he has nothing to reproach himself with. There have been found in all Times, says Song ki, People who have thought fit to retire. But they may be divided into very different Kinds. I reduce them all to four, namely, three good, and one bad.

The first are they who have always lived retired, and possess a Virtue so extraordinary, that nothing can conceal them. Yes! There have been seen some Men, who tho' buried amidst Mountains and Deserts, yet were generally known and respected by all the World on account of their Virtue. The Honours which they fly from, pursue them; and the most powerful Princes of their Time, endeavour, if we may so speak, to give them Marks of their Esteem.

The second are they, who after having appeared in the World, and even filled Posts, perceiving the Difficulty of supporting or promoting themselves without palliating and a little favouring the Errors and Corruptions of the Age, have divested themselves of their Posts, and retired from the View of their Prince; but leaving him and all the World in so good an Opinion of their Merit and Virtue, that they have been always regretted.

The third Kind are they, who being naturally fearful, and not believing that they have the Capacity requisite for succeeding in Posts, live retired in their own Country; but behave in such a Manner there, that far from making themselves despised by their Retirement, it is look'd on as the Effect of their Wisdom and Virtue. The first of these three Orders is much preferable to the other two: And it is upon that alone which Confucius bestows Encomiums.

Besides these three Orders, of which each has its own Merit, there is a fourth Kind of People, who being equally crafty and interested, want to pass for Men of Virtue by affecting Retirement; tho' they would be very angry, were they indulged in what they affect. Their View is to draw the Eyes of all the World upon the real Capacity they possess; to make themselves as it were sought after, and thereby to shorten their Way to Employments. But does their Cunning succeed, and are they in Post? They soon drop the specious Mask of Disinterestedness. I have exposed these different Characters that no-body may mistake them, or value any thing of that kind, but that which is valuable.

A short (*) Discourse upon Silence, composed by Wang yong ming, who relates it, together with the Occasion of his delivering it, to Lyang chong yong.

LYANG CHONG YONG was a Person, who joined to an uncommon Capacity noble and generous Inclinations: Scarce was he made (†) Tseng tse, when he found himself stimulated by a laudable Ardor of signalizing himself in some important Post. One Day, as he was revolving these Thoughts in his own Breast, reflecting with himself all of a sudden: I am in the Wrong, said he; it is too soon for me to pretend to govern others. How can I succeed in that, having not yet learned how to govern myself? After this Reflection, he studied more than ever to know himself. He applied himself to find out, as much as he could, if he had any vicious Byass, and he then began to correct a Fault which he found in himself; namely, that of speaking too much. We meet with a Bonzary of these Days; called, The Bonzary of Silence.

Chong yong took occasion to ask me for some Instructions as to the Manner of being seasonably silent. I answered, I myself have the Failing of being too great a Talker. I therefore am well enough qualified to give Lectures of Silence to others. I have remarked that this Fault proceeds either from Vanity, Heedlessness, or Lightness. I here call Vanity, the Passion of making a shining Figure. I call Heedlessness and Lightness, too great an Easiness in suffering ones Heart to rove from that Just Mean which it ought to preserve in every thing. Behold what I have remarked by my own proper Experience. But besides that, our Ancients have left us fine Maxims upon this Head, which are found diffused thorough their Books.

An Abridgment of these Principles is as follows.

They begin with finding Fault with four Kinds of Silence, or Taciturnity. To be silent, when there are any Doubts of Consequence, or not to join in the clearing them up; or what is worse, voluntarily to continue in gross Ignorance, rather than to instruct ones self by Speech, is called Brutality, and Stupidity. To be silent from a wretched Complaisance, or merely to gain the Favour of the Great, is Interest and Flattery. To be silent, in order to conceal ones Faults, under the Mask of being reserved, is Pride. In short, under a modest Silence and a simple Air, to conceal a bad Design, is Hypocrisy. All this is not Silence, or it is a criminal Silence: But there is likewise a laudable Silence, which may proceed from good Motives, and has good Effects.

The wise Man, says Confucius, always speaks with Bashfulness and Modesty, as if he were conscious of some Defect in his Words and Actions. In the most remote Antiquity, a Man who had no Reserve in his Words, past for one who had but little in his Actions, and incapable to fill great Posts. Therefore Bashfulness, Modesty, and Reserve, are, as it were, the first Lessons of that which we call Silence, or the Art of holding one's Tongue. The wise Man, says Confucius again, loves to be silent: At least, he does not love to speak a great deal, because he is employed in the Care of doing well; and the Love which he has for Silence, is continually, and as it were naturally, begotten by his constant Application to watch over his Actions. If therefore, virtuous Men commonly speak little, it is not that they make their Virtue to consist in the Fewness of their Words, nor that they are silent merely for the sake of Silence: They have a much more sublime End: They look upon Silence as an excellent Way of acquiring and preserving Virtue. To meditate seriously, says Confucius, upon some important Truth, is the Way to acquire Knowledge. The least Advantage we reap by it, is, that we shun the gross Faults, into which the Generality of Mankind fall at every step they make. In order to succeed in any Enterprize, quietly to think a long time upon it, is justly termed Wisdom and Prudence. But above all, in order to discover our vicious Inclinations, and the Artifices of Self-love, there is no better Secret, than to examine ourselves in Secrecy and Retirement. Yen tse made such a Progress in this Method, that tho' he scarce spoke to any body, yet he attracted the Esteem and Confidence of all the World by his Virtue. Behold therefore to what a Pitch a Man may attain by practising this Virtue, of which we have a Pattern in Tyen. Tyen never speaks a Word, nor has he occasion to speak. The four Seasons regularly succeed one another; the Vegetables grow at their stated Seasons, wherefore then should he speak? His Silence is Eloquence itself, therefore among Men, the Sages of the first rate alone, are able to imitate this beautiful Pattern.

Lyang chong yong very well understood and profited by this Discourse.

Another Discourse of the same Author, upon the Death of Whang hyang fu, Father of one of his Disciples.

IN the Territory of (*) Chau, there lived one of the Literati, an honest Man; the Name of his Family was Whang, his own Name Ong pau; and he lived in the Lordship of Hyeu fu. He had a Son named Mong sing. This Son came several hundred Leagues, that he might become my Disciple. At the End of some Months, in which he had studied very hard, he took Leave of me for a little time, that he might go and see his Father; and after two or three Months Absence, I saw him return full of new Ardour. When some other Months were over, he wanted to go and see his Father again; and he did so, and returned several times in the Space of a few Years.

Mong sing was a young Man who had very good Qualifications. To a Heart full of Uprightness and Probity, he joined the most engaging and polite Manners. Above all, he was a dutiful Son; but he was of a very delicate Complexion, and incapable to support great Fatigues. For which Reason, the less he feared these Comings and Goings, the more I was afraid for him.

I therefore one Day took him aside, and said to him, My dear Scholar, you surely are very sensible, that it is too fatiguing for you to make such frequent and long Journeys. You may spare yourself the Trouble; for the Duty you owe to your Father, is a lawful Reason why you should continue at Home: Take my Advice, and remain here; and as Occasion presents, put in Practice what you learn at my School.

Mong sing immediately falling upon his Knees, answered me in these Terms. Master, said he, you know not my Father; tho' he was educated upon the Sea-coast, in a pretty Savage Country, yet, yet, from his Childhood, he has had a great Esteem for the Doctrine of our ancient Sages. He has for some time, diligently sought one who might be a Guide to him in this Study, but he never could have the Happiness to meet with what he sought after. Sometime ago, by Means of Syu, Yung, and some others, who had been your Disciples, my Father was made acquainted with, and received some Tincture of, your Doctrine. I cannot express to you the Esteem he had of it; but you may in some measure judge of it, by what I am going to tell you.

(*) In the Works of Wang yong ming, this Discourse is found under the Title Hyo wen, or a Composition for the Ceremony Tse. This is a kind of a Funeral Sermon.

My Father no sooner knew of your Doctrine, than exhorting me to pursue it, My Son, says he, you see I am old: I do not recommend to you the acquiring of Riches, or thrusting yourself into Posts; what I exhort you to, is to advance in Virtue, and to profit under so good a Master, like these Sages who have already left his School. I don't pretend to be an Obstacle to your Advancement: Nor, that on account of my old Age, you should give up so great an Advantage. Tho' your Absence should reduce me to eat only Rice-gruel, and to drink Water; tho' it should even expose me to lie unburied when I am dead, yet should I be satisfied to live and to die in this Manner, that I may procure to you the Means of acquiring true Wisdom. It was in Pursuance of these Instructions of my Father, that I first came to be of the Number of your Disciples; and for that Effect, I travelled some hundred Leagues. Always when I returned to see my Father, in vain did I entreat him to suffer me to continue with him at least three Months; for he would never agree to that. He would not even suffer me to continue for one Month; he always took care at the End of some Days, to have every thing ready for my Journey, pressing his Domestic for that purpose, and exhorting myself to set out: When filial Affection drew Tears into my Eyes, and when in this Condition I presented myself before him, to conjure him to suffer me to serve him some time longer: He answered, my Tears, by beginning his Exhortations anew, and sometimes reproaching me that I had the Heart of a Girl. Yet I see, added he, beginning himself to be affected, that your Intention is good, and that you want to prove to me that you are a good Son, but you go the wrong Way to work. Do that which I would have you do, notwithstanding my Tendernefs; and do not aggravate my Grief. This, in Truth, is the Way in which my Father treated me: And I own frankly to you, that notwithstanding my Desire to profit by your Instructions, it was not my Fault, but that I had stayed longer with him: And if every Time I returned so soon, it was in Obedience to my Father's Commands: For how could I disobey him?

At this Discourse I could not hinder myself from crying out, How wise is Wbang byen sü! He indeed is a good Father: How affectionate, and how obedient is Mong sang! He verily is a good Son: Take Courage then, cried I, my dear Disciple, and endeavour perfectly to answer the Zeal of so wise a Father. Alas! Towards the Beginning of the fourth Moon of this Year, an Express has brought us the melancholy News of the Death of Wbang byen sü. How great is this Loss! True Wisdom has been long neglected. Nothing is more rare, than Men who truly esteem or seriously practise it: They who make the Study of Wisdom all their Business, are so seldom found, that among the Generality of Mankind, they are look'd upon as so many Prodiges. The Name of a wise Man is yet in Vogue, and the World is full of Persons who affect it: But the Name is all they desire: Their Ambition, their Cares, their Actions, and even their Instructions to their Children, proceed all from Vanity and Interest: And if they talk of Wisdom, it is not because they aspire to it, but from mere Show and Ostentation. Among ten who talk of it; nine let it go no farther than their Lips. Above all, at present, it is a very rare thing to find Fathers so wise, as to prefer the Care of their Children's advancing in the Way of true Wisdom, to all the Motives of Interest and natural Affection. Wbang byen sü, whose Death I have heard of, knew how to do this, notwithstanding the Torrent. Alas! What a Loss is he to the World: Since the Distance of Place hinders me from weeping over his Bier, and testifying how much his Death afflicts me, I desire in some measure to make up for that by this Writing. Moreover, by publishing the Zeal of Wbang byen sü for the Advancement of his Son in the Paths of Wisdom; my View is, not only to testify to the World the Esteem which his Zeal has given me for his Person, and the Grief I have for his Death, but likewise to propose him to all the Empire as a beautiful Pattern of a truly paternal Love, and to animate his Son, my Disciple, worthily to answer the Intentions of so wise a Father.

The same Author answers a Question made him by his Friend Wang yong ming, who wrote to him once in these Terms. I see People who reason a great deal upon what Confucius and Yen tse understood by the Expression (*) Lo: May I presume to beg that you would write me your Thoughts upon this Head? Is this Pleasure, this Joy, mentioned by Confucius and Yen tse, the same thing with that Emotion of Heart, which is look'd upon as one of the seven Affections, of which it is capable, and which commonly is called Joy: If Confucius meant nothing but that, it would seem to me, that this Joy is not peculiar to the wise Man alone, since the most ordinary People are equally susceptible of it. If he means a quite different Joy, much more pure and solid, and such as the wise Man is said to preserve amidst the most melancholy and terrible Events, another Difficulty starts; for Confucius, and many others after him, says likewise, that the wise Man ought to be incessantly upon his Guard, and under a continual Dread and Concern: And it would seem to me, as if this were much fitter to occasion Sadness than Pleasure.

The Answer of Wang yong ming, was as follows:

The Joy, of which Confucius speaks, is the Sensation of the Heart, in enjoying the Pleasure of possessing itself. Therefore tho' the Pleasure, mentioned by Confucius, is likewise comprehended hended under that kind of Joy, which is reckoned to be one of the Seven Affections, yet it ought not to be confounded with any other Species of Pleasure, ranged under the same Denomination. This Answer likewise obviates your second Difficulty; for tho' in some Sense it is true, that this Joy, in a certain Measure, is common to all Mankind, yet we may properly say, that it is more peculiar to the Wife.

'Tis true, all Men have a Heart. But the Wife alone are Masters of that Heart. This Pleasure of a Heart, of which one is Master, is known to them alone: The rest are all capable of this Knowledge, but they neither possess nor taste it: They run eagerly after what is inconsistent with it; being blind, and involving themselves more and more in their Difficulties. Not, but that all Mankind may aspire to this Joy. But they must shut their Eyes to every thing else: They must turn them inwards: They must take care to recall their own Hearts to its natural Uprightness, and then will they share in that solid pure Joy. This is all the Answer which at present I have to give you; but give me leave to tell you, that I am a little surprized that you should ask further Questions of me upon this Head, since, during the Conversations which we have had together, you might long since have had all the necessary Information: To amuse yourself still in making Enquiries about this, is just like the Man, who when riding upon an (*) Ass, was searching for him on all Sides.

Kau shen fū having come from Whang chew, a City of (†) Hu quang, to make himself a Disciple of Wang yong ming; as he was about to return at the End of a Year, he took Wang yong ming aside, and said to him; Master, I have had the good Fortune to hear your important Doctrine, upon what is called Firm Resolution. I believe, that I thoroughly understand it, and am able to direct my Conduct accordingly. But as I am now ready to go far from you, I beg that you would give me a Word of Instruction, of which I may preserve the Remembrance Day and Night. Wang yong ming made him this Answer.

In the Study of Wisdom, the Practice of the Husbandmen must be imitated. They indeed begin by carefully chusing the Seed, and committing it to the Ground in due Season; but they do not end here; They then carefully labour the Ground; they kill the Insects; they pluck up the noxious Herbs; they water it where it has need; they labour all Day in the Cultivation of their Field; and frequently in the Night-time, their Mind is employed in these Thoughts. Not, that by their Cares and Fatigues, they hope that their little Crop, tho' the Seed was well chosen and seasonably sown, should be of any great Consequence in the Autumn. You ought now to understand my Meaning; but if you want that I should make it plainer, I must tell you that this firm Resolution of which you so much speak, and which you flatter yourself with possessing, is as the Seed of the Husbandman. Study, Thinking, Reasoning, and putting all in Practice, are Things as necessary in Point of Philosophy, as plowing, dunging, and harrowing are in the Affair of Agriculture. A Heart in whom this Resolution is wanting, is a Field in which nothing good is sown, and in which, consequently nothing but Weeds can grow. A Heart who has this Resolution, and who stops there, is a well sown Field, the Culture of which is afterwards neglected: The good Seed that has been there sown, has been choak'd by the Weeds. I cannot so far dissemble with you, as not to tell you, you are in a Situation something like this.

An Answer of Wang yong ming to two of his Scholars.

QUEN KI is a Man of a great deal of Knowledge, in whom I always have found a great Thirst for true Wisdom. I am charmed to understand that you frequently converse with him; this must turn out to your Advantage. My Answer to what you propose to me, with Regard to him, is as follows. Doubtless, a Man may seek some Post or Pension, especially when otherways he has no Estate; and if without them he cannot provide for his aged Parents, consequently, it is lawful for a Man to take his Degrees, to appear in the World, and to make his Capacity known. For it is absurd, for a Man who aspires to Posts, to depend entirely upon Tyen, without his using any of the human obvious Measures for attaining to it. But he must take care; first, never to deviate from the high Road of Reason, neither in the Designs he has in View, or in the Method of pursuing these Designs. In the second Place, a Man must never suffer himself to be affected with good, or disconcerted with bad Fortune. He who is steady in these two Points, may consistently, with the Character of a wise Man, procure and fill Posts. But if he wants these, especially the former, in vain does he renounce Degrees, Posts, and all that: In vain, does he talk of Virtue from Sun to Sun; all is Vanity. Therefore our Ancients have made it pass into a Proverb: It is not a great Evil to quit the Trade of Philosophy: The Point is, not to quit the Love of true Wisdom, and the Resolution of still pressing towards it: Upon which we must remark, that by its being said, that we never ought to quit this Resolution, it is supposed that we already possess it. Upon this Head it is, that every Man ought to examine himself. The more I perceive the good Qualities which you have, the more I perceive myself inclinable to press you not to render them useless.

My dear Disciple, you are to remember, that by how much the more rare it is to have so happy natural Dispositions as you enjoy, the more easy it is for you to corrupt and abuse them. It is no small Advantage to find a sound Director in the Paths of Wisdom; but know that by how much much the more Difficulty it is to meet with a Man who can instruct us in them, so much the more easy and common it is for us to stray from them, even after they are known to us: Every Man who has a Mind, cannot arrive at that ripe and vigorous Age in which at present you are: But as this does not depend on Man, know likewise, that it is no more in his Power to hinder these fine Years from passing rapidly away. In short, it is as easy for one to suffer himself to be carried away by the Torrent of the Age, as it is difficult to resist it. Weigh all this, my dear Disciples, and let these Considerations animate you to make new Efforts.

(*) The Chinese says in four short Words, Ki hui mi lin, that is to say: To ride an Ass, to seek an Ass. This is literally the French Proverb, which, notwithstanding its Meanness, forms the Conclusion of a very refined Character of Morality

The same Author exhorts his Disciples, to hold frequent Conferences in his Absence.

THE Plants that are most easy to rear, do not fail to die if they have ten Days of nipping Cold, for one of a mild Sun. When I come hither, you endeavour as much as you can to assemble yourselves; not one of you fails to be present at the Conferences that are held; and at these Conferences each of you shews the keenest Desire for Improvement. This gives me a real Pleasure. But I now come hither but very seldom; when I come, I stay but a few Days; and all that I can do is to assemble you three or four times. As soon as I leave you, the Conferences are broken up. Each of you then keeps at home, and the Interval passes without your seeing one another; this is upwards of ten Days of Cold for one of Warmth: How then can Wisdom, which is a Plant so difficult to rear, flourish among you?

I therefore exhort you not to confine your Assemblies thus, to the Time in which I am amongst you. Every five Days, if it is possible, at least every eight Days, you ought, setting aside all other Business, to assemble yourselves once to discourse upon Virtue, and to animate yourselves to the Practice of it. This is an excellent Method for entirely disengaging yourselves from all the Enticements of the Age, and for making a great Progress in a short time, in the true Doctrine, which, at the Bottom, is nothing else but Charity and Justice.

It is a common and a true Saying, that if a Man would make a cheap and a ready Bargain, he must go to Market. Is he to rear a large Building or some other considerable Work? his best Way for succeeding, is to hold a general Consultation beforehand. Assemble yourselves therefore frequently, but carry into these Assemblies neither Passion nor Prejudice. Shew a Friendship and Respect for one another, and know that, in a Commerce such as yours is, he who yields most to others, gains most for himself. If it sometimes happens that you disagree upon any Point, it is then, that without any Heat, or without giving Way to that unhappy Desire which each has of over-bearing his Neighbour, you ought to recollect yourselves more carefully, and to seek out the simple Truth. But if any one, either from Vanity or Jealousy, shall be obstinate in having the upperhand; these frequent Conferences, which of themselves are so advantageous, thereby become quite useless. Reflect seriously on this.

One Day as Wang yong ming (*) was passing through the Piazzas with some of his Disciples, two Porters, for some Reason I am ignorant of, fell a quarrelling. You have neither Reason nor Conscience, said the one. Nay, you have neither of them, answers the other. You are a Rogue, said the first: Your Heart is full of Craft, replies the second. You, says the other, have banished from yours, all manner of Honesty and Probity. Wang yong ming then addressing himself to his Disciples, Do you hear these Porters, said he; they are talking Philosophy? What Philosophy, answered one of his Disciples? I hear them only scolding and bawling. What, don't you understand, said Wang yong ming, that what they are every Moment repeating, are the Words, Reason, Conscience, Heart, Uprightness? If this is not Philosophy, what then is Philosophy? Then let it be Philosophy, said the Disciple; but while they are philosophizing, why should they bawl and scold one another so? Do you ask why, answers Wang yong ming? It is because each of these two Men sees the Defects of his Neighbour, but never reflects upon his own. How many People are like them?

The great Disease of Mankind, says Wang yong ming, is Pride. Is a Son proud? He fails in his Respect to his Parents. Is a Subject proud? He is no longer Loyal to his Prince. Has a Father this Failing? He forgets the Paternal Affections. Is a Friend tainted with this Vice? His Friendship is no longer faithful and constant. The principal Failing of Syang the Brother of Shun, and of Tan chu the Son of Tau, whom History represents as being so vicious, was Pride. The other Failings which they had, were the Fruits of that evil Tree. Ye who would aspire to be wise, if ye want to be really so, must never depart one Moment from that Celestial Reason which is natural to, and forms, as it were, the Essence of, your Soul. This Reason is most pure and most refined in itself. Ye must suffer nothing to alter its Purity. But what must be done for this Effect? No Self, and that is all. I say none, even in the most retired Corner of the Heart, for if it shall lurk there, it will again quicken, and shoot forth into Pride. How did our wise Ancients recommend themselves so much by their Virtue? It was by destroying Self; for when Self is destroyed, humility becomes habitual. But Humility is the Foundation of all Virtues; as Pride, on the contrary, is the Root of all Vices.

In another Passage, the same Author treating of this Subject, and repeating the same Things with some Variation, says; The most universal and dangerous Evil at present, is Pride. This is as the poisoned Source from which all Disorders proceed. A Man is the Slave of Pride, and for that Reason, thinks himself the Lord of others. He approves of what he himself does, and will yield to no body. If a Man is abandoned to that dangerous Vice, he can neither be a dutiful Son, an affectionate Brother, nor a loyal Subject. The inflexible Severity of Syang, towards his Brother Shun, and the incorrigible Licentiousness of Tan chu the Son of Yau, were all so many Slips of this vicious Stock. If you would enter into the Ways of Wisdom, begin by plucking up from your Heart the smallest Root of so dangerous a Vice. Otherways you can never make any Progress. Moreover, it is with Pride as with other Diseases; it is never cured but by its Opposite, which is Humility: But don't deceive yourselves, the Humility which I prescribe against Pride, consists not in merely assuming an Air, outwardly humble and reserved: It ought to be in the Heart, and it consists in being inwardly full of Attention, Moderation, Reserve, and Resignation to others: In putting no great Value upon one's own Capacity, but willingly making the best of another's: In short, in a Man's being divested of Self. Whoever is humble in this manner, cannot fail to be a good Son, Brother, and Subject. This Virtue made Yau and Shun so perfect; they possessing it in its utmost Purity and Extent. In all Encomiums upon these Princes, it is always this Virtue that is praised under different Denominations. Therefore ye who aspire to be Sages, labour to acquire it. But do not deceive yourselves, for it is no easy Matter. It will cost you great Struggles; and above all things, you must have a strict Watch over yourselves.

Wang yang ming being at Long chang, a great Number of Literati became his Disciples. That he might satisfy the Desire which they had to profit under his Direction, he gave them the four following Lessons. Each of you, said he, ought to have, first, a sincere Resolution to aspire to true Wisdom: Secondly, a continual Care, in Reality and in Practice, to take the true Means of acquiring it: Thirdly, an ardent and a courageous Zeal against your own Failings: Fourthly, a wise and moderate Zeal in favour of your Neighbours. I say, that above all things, a sincere Resolution is required: In effect, if, without such a Resolution, no Man can succeed in any thing, even the most mechanical Arts, can he ever hope to succeed in the Study of Wisdom? Why are so many People seen, who, notwithstanding their Profession of aspiring to true Wisdom, spend whole Years, and almost all their Lives, without making any Progress in it? There can be no other Cause than this; That they never form a sincere Resolution on this Head. For it is a certain Truth, that he who has an earnest Desire to become wise, succeeds in it by little and little: And if a Man is firmly resolved to labour constantly in it, he may attain even to the highest Degree of Perfection. On the contrary, as a Ship without a Rudder, tossed by the Winds and carried by the Tide; as a high mettled Horse left to himself, and galloping unchecked from Place to Place, such is the Man who is void of the Resolution I require. Some have said very well: If the Pursuit of Virtue should expose a Man to the Indignation of his Father and Mother, to the Reproaches of his Brethren and Relations, to the Hatred and Contempt of his Neighbours, then they who want Resolution for this extremely difficult Attempt, might plead some Excuse. But on the contrary, if, embracing what is right, is an infallible Way for deserving and securing the Tenderness of a Father and Mother, the Confidence of Relations, with the Esteem and Good-will of Neighbours, what Excuse can they have, who are afraid to venture on this Resolution? If, by deserting Virtue, and enlisting in the Cause of Vice, a Man should become dear to his Father and Mother, agreeable to his Relations, and respected by his Neighbours, it would be more excusable, should he seem to incline to the Side of Vice. But if the contrary is true, as it certainly is, Why should we buy the Unhappiness of being wicked at such a Price, and labour so earnestly to prefer Vice to Virtue? Weigh what I have now told you, and you will not only comprehend, that when a Man aspires to Wisdom, he must above all things seek a sincere Resolution; but you will likewise see, that this Resolution is not so difficult to take, as People imagine: And that nothing is more reasonable.

In the Second Place, I demand a continual Attention in Point of Practice, because, that in effect, without this, a Man must soon be inconsistent with himself: And the Resolution he puts on, tho' perhaps it may be sincere, yet never can be firm and constant. Therefore, in the Judgment which I form of my Followers, I do not give the Preference to those who have the most Wit and Penetration, but to those, whom a continual Watch over themselves have rendered more reserved and more humble. There are some, who being void of Wisdom and Virtue, puff themselves up, that they may appear to be filled with both: And who, not perceiving in themselves a Resolution sufficient for being solidly virtuous, harbour a secret Envy against those who really are so: Who are as full of Pride as they are destitute of Virtue: Who inwardly prefer themselves to others, and who, by vain Discourses, impose upon the World, and endeavour to procure Esteem for themselves. If any one amongst you is found to be of this Character, tho', in other Respects he should be Master of a very extraordinary Understanding, yet for all that, would he not be the Object of your Indignation and Contempt? On the contrary, there are some Persons, who being full of Modesty and a Praise-worthy Reserve, for fear of acting inconsistently with themselves, keep up to their first Resolution, by a constant Practice of Virtue, by great Care, and an equal Application to be instructed: Who sincerely acknowledge their own Faults, readily do Justice to their Neighbour's Virtues, and endeavour to correct themselves by the good Patterns that are set before them: Inwardly, they are full of Regard and Submission towards their Superiors, together with Benevolence and Uprightness towards their Equals: Outwardly, their Behaviour is easy, and at the same time, never deviates from a modest Gravity. If any one amongst you possesses these Qualifications, tho' perhaps he has no great Share of natural Understanding, which of you can refuse him your Esteem and Friendship? Doubtless, each will more willingly prize him, the more sincerely he is seen to humble himself. Weigh what I have now told you, and it will be sufficient to let you understand the Necessity and Practice of that Attention which I require.

In the third Place, I say, that a Man must have an ardent and courageous Zeal against his own Failings. To be guilty of Faults both of Omission and Commission, is, what the wisest are not exempted from. But as they know how to correct them, they, on that Account, don't forfeit the Character of being wise. Every Man ought to examine, if there is any thing in his Conduct contrary to Temperance or Modesty. If he renders to his Superiors and his Equals all their Due: If, for instance, he fulfils all the Duties of a dutiful Son and a faithful Friend: If nothing escapes him that favours the Corruption of the Age, which, at present, promotes over all, universal Deceit and Unjustice: For altho' you are not Men who will plunge yourself with Pleasure into these Disorders, yet it may happen, that some of you being destitute of the Advantages reapt from the Conversation of a good Master, and a virtuous Friend, may heedlessly fall into Faults of this Nature. Examine yourselves upon this Point with the utmost Exactness, and revolving every one of you your own Actions, if you find any such thing, you must speedily retract it by a sincere Repentance; but without, suffering yourselves to be cast down or to cool: Have you till this Period of Time been a wicked Man? Have you for a long time practised the shameful Trade of a Robber? Yet you may from this Day forward wipe out the old Stains, and become wise and virtuous. But if a Man, in whom such a Change is wrought, shall make this Reflection; "Having lived as I hitherto have done, should I henceforward live well, my Conversion will be look'd upon as a Trick, and my Virtue as Hypocrisy: The World, far from entertaining a better Opinion of me, will thereby harbour the strongest Suspicions against me, and I shall draw upon myself fresh Reproach. If this Man, after such a Reflection, should bravely say to himself: "Let the World make what Judgment it pleases of my Change, it is sincere, and it shall be constant: And I am sincerely satisfied to live and to die in Humiliation. O how much would I esteem such a Courage!

I say, in the fourth Place, that a Man ought to have a wise and moderate Zeal with Regard to his Neighbour's Failings. By this I do not at all pretend to prevent you, from assisting your Neighbour to become virtuous. Tho' we owe our first Cares to our own private Perfection, yet we cannot neglect taking some Concern in that of our Friends, without failing in one of the most essential Duties of true Friendship. But if we are to reprove others, there is a Way to do it with Advantage to them. The Advice you give, must not only always proceed from a sincere Friendship, but it must be delivered in mild civil Terms, so as to sweeten all the disagreeable Part of the Rebuke. In this we must exert all the Tendernefs with which Friendship can inspire us, and seasonably draw different Pictures of the Virtues, setting them in the most amiable Light: And painting Vice so, as that its Deformity may strike with Horror; yet all this in such a Manner, as to touch the Heart, without ruffling the Passions. If we act otherways, if we apply too rough a Hand to a sensible Part, without allowing a Man time to guard against the Confusion arising from the Surprise, in vain shall we afterwards endeavour to recompose this exasperated Mind, which starts too far aside at first, and is ever after in Danger of remaining incorrigible.

For which Reason, in my Opinion, when we go about to correct a Fault in any one, the most effectual and the surest Way, is not that of Words: And tho' we may take that Method amongst ourselves, yet I would lay no great Stress upon it with Regard to others. I look upon every Man who attacks my Failings, as my Master: With this View, I receive with Pleasure and Thanks, the Advice that is given me. I am sensible how little Progress I have made in the Paths of true Wisdom. Alas! I have already lost a great many of my Teeth, and I am half deaf. That I may answer the Ardour which I see in you, I pass whole Nights in meditating. Notwithstanding my Age and Application, I am by no means exempt from Vice: Why should I be surprized, if I am not found to be faultless? It is said, that it is the Duty of a Scholar to conceal the Faults of his Master: But, if by this it is meant, that it is not lawful for a Disciple to correct his Master, this Maxim is not true: Or at least, all the Truth that is in it, is, that the Disciple ought not, in correcting his Master, to use either too much Freedom, or too abject a Dissimulation: Do you all assist me in bringing the Good I have about me to Perfection, and in entirely rooting out whatever is faulty, that thus we may mutually help one another in our Progress: Let us begin with exercising, with Regard to one another, the Zeal which we ought to have for the Perfection of our Neighbour.

MY dear Disciples, in all the Letters that I have received from you, which have been a good many, ye all express a great deal of Repentance for what is past, and a great deal of Resolution for what is to come. This gives me an unexpressible Joy and Comfort, but I would feel a great deal more, if I were sure that these are not empty Discourses, and that they are your real Sentiments. What I wish above all things, is, that each of you may see the most secret Intricacies of his own Heart, as plainly as he sees the most sensible Objects at Noon-Day. This is of the utmost Importance. For how can a Man correct his own Faults and Failings, if he does not see them. On the contrary, a Man who is always watchful over his own Faults, that he may instantly correct them, soon becomes Master of his own Heart. Where is the Man who is blameless? I dare affirm, there is none. And he who knows how to correct his Faults aright, is the Man who is the most perfect. Kyu pe yá, in his Time, was lookt upon as a wise Man, and yet it happened that all his Application was directed to commit but a few Faults; nor could

he

he succeed, even in this. Ching tang and Confucius very justly were look'd upon as Sages of the first Order, yet their principal Maxim was, incessantly to labour to correct themselves; and they judged this Care to be necessary to prevent their falling into considerable Faults. I hear it pretty frequently said, How can one be faultless, unless he were a Yau or a Shun? But tho' this Saying is become proverbial, yet I do not think it is exactly true. These Words do not give us an Idea of Yau and Shun, such as indeed they were, and as they knew themselves to be. If these two wise Kings had given themselves out as Men exempted from every Failing, they thereby would have less deserved the Epithet of Wise. But they were far from this Way of thinking. And this is easy to be proved from a Maxim of theirs, handed down to us in the Shu king. On the one Hand, the Heart of Man is full of Weakness and a Propensity to Evil. On the other Hand, true Good, which forms as it were the Center of Reason, consists in an almost indivisible Point. A pure simple Intention is necessary to preserve us always in the Just Mean.

We see, by this Passage of the Shu king, what Opinion these great Men entertained of themselves. They doubtless looked upon themselves to be Men; which made them pronounce in general, that the Heart of Man is full of Weakness: That it is difficult to keep it in the Just Mean: And that we must make strong Endeavours to preserve ourselves in the requisite Purity and Simplicity. In short, we see that all the wise Men of Antiquity, far from thinking themselves free from Faults, have look'd upon the Care of correcting themselves as one of their principal Duties. If some by this way, have made such Progress as to commit none, it was not because their Hearts were formed in another Manner than those of other Men, and not subject to the same Weaknesses; but because, by curbing themselves, by watching with incessant Care over their most secret Motions, and especially by looking upon themselves as being full of Faults, they at last attained to be faultless. I see it clearly, my dear Disciple, that this is the Path in which we ought to tread. But I see it too late, my ancient Habits have left the same Weakness in my Heart, as an inveterate Disease occasions in the Human Body.

For this Reason, I earnestly exhort you, incessantly to be upon your Guard, and not to expose yourselves to the same Difficulties as I have done, by letting your Failings grow into Habits. If, while you are yet young, while your Spirits are active, and your Imagination warm; if before the Inconveniences of Age, and the Cares of a Family have engrossed your Heart; you labour earnestly; your Progress will be great, and your Difficulties but small: But if you shall delay it, besides the daily Encrease of the Cares of this Life, old Age must damp your Understanding, and impair your Vigor. If there are Instances of some Persons who have thus delayed it, and yet have afterwards attained to true Wisdom, this could not have done without very extraordinary Efforts, especially, if it happened after they were forty or fifty Years of Age. After this Period of Life, the Desires of Reformation that we form, are commonly as unsuccessful as those of a Man who would stop the Sun upon our Horizon, when he sees it setting, and conveying its Light from our Eyes. This therefore was understood by Confucius, when he said, that at forty or fifty Years of Age, a Man no longer keeps his Understanding. These Words are remarkable, and seem to imply an Exaggeration, yet they contain a very sensible Truth, and a Truth which the same Confucius elsewhere expresses in more simple Terms. It is not, says he, but after many Struggles that we arrive at true Wisdom: If we do not labour early, how can we support them in old Age, whose inseparable Attendant is Weakness? Alas! I who tell you this, and who begun this Pursuit too late, have but too great Experience of the Truth of these Words. This induces me to press you to make the best of your Time, that you may not be exposed to a useless Repentance.

The same Wang yong ming being at home in the Province of the Ché kyang, one Year in a very dry Summer, the (*) Chi fu of the Place wrote to him, to ask him if there was any Secret to procure the Rain to fall, or if he knew any Man who had such a Secret. Wang yong ming returned him a verbal Answer to his first Letter. Next Day, the Chi fu wrote another more pressing.

To this second Letter, Wang yong ming made the following Answer.

Yesterday, two of your Officers, Yang and Li, presented to me a (†) Letter, which you did me the Honour to write me. I found that it demanded of me a Secret for making the Rain to fall. Never was there a Man more surprized and confounded, than I was at this. My Surprise and Confusion encreased a great deal, when this Morning I received by the Hands of Shin tsyè, your second Letter, which is still more pressing than your first. The Ways of Tyen are dark; our Understanding traces them in vain; and who am I, that I should value myself upon penetrating into them, and seeing them distinctly? Yet, you discover so much Compassion for the People, that I cannot reasonably forbear telling you my Thoughts upon that Point. I have prayed for a long time, answered Confucius, upon an Occasion which you know of. In effect, the Prayer of a wise Man does not precisely consist in reciting some Forms of Prayer in Time of Need, but in a regular Conduct which he takes care to observe. It is some Years since you was born in the Country of (‡) Ywé: Have you not taken care before hand to pray, that as far as you can you may prevent or soften the Miseries of the People, and render them happy and content? Have you delayed it till this time? Doubtless not. Yet the Rain does not fall according to your Wishes: that is true; but what better Way is there for obtaining it?

(*) Or, Governor.

(†) The Chinese literally has it, Your honourable Instructions.

(‡) The ancient Name of a Country, now the Province of Ché kyang.

Anciently, in great Droughts, the Princes abridged their Tables and their Diversions, (*) enlarged their Prisons, diminished their Imposts, carefully regulated the Ceremonies a-new, and relieved by their Charity, those whom Sickness and Poverty oppressed with Sorrow. Then they caused the Assistance of Shan, Chwen and (†) Sbe tsi, to be implored by all; and they themselves implored it in Favour of the People. I find recorded in the ancient Books, the Ceremony Tsi, in honour of Tyen, to beg for Rain. I find that the Princes making a severe Scrutiny into their own Conduct, attributed to themselves all the public Calamities. I find that these very Princes in acknowledging their Faults, begged for time to correct them. The (‡) Li ki, the Chun tsiu, and the Annals named Se ki, have great Numbers of Examples in this kind. This is what I am taught by Antiquity. I do not find that it was then believed, that a few whimsical Characters, and some imprecating Ejaculations upon the Water, could obtain Rain. If in following Ages, there were found some (||) Tau tse, who we are assured could create Rain whenever there was Occasion: We are to believe that they were Men of a pure blameless Life, and a solid constant Virtue: That tho' they did not exactly conform to the true Practice of the Empire, yet for all that, they were very notable, and very extraordinary Men: And that thereby they might command Rain.

But where is the Evidence upon which the Credibility of Things of this kind rests? Upon romantic Histories and Tales. Our King and other Canonical Books mention no such thing; and all Men of Sense, look upon what is said on this head, as amusing Stories. Far less ought we to attribute any such Virtue to the present Tau tse. They are a Parcel of vile Scoundrels, as despicable as the Mountebanks at Fairs, who disperse all kind of Impertinences from their Stages. Can People of this kind, have Thunder, Lightning, Winds, Rain, and other Changes of the Air, at their disposal? How incredible is that?

My Advice to you is, that setting aside all Affairs that may obstruct it another time, you examine yourself a-part, deny yourself and every one about you, in all Expences and Luxuries; exactly repair the Wrongs that you may have done; and then with pure upright Intentions, with sincere Sentiments of Penitence and Grief, invoke Shan, Chwen, Sbe, in Name, and in Favours of the People of your eight (§) Hyen. As for the Prayers and pretended Secrets of the Tau tse, if the People of their own accord employ them, be you satisfied with letting them alone, and not prohibiting them: But lay no Stress on them yourself, and never discover any Value for them.

What you may depend upon is, that if in your ordinary Conduct, you have nothing wherewith you can accuse yourself before (•) Shin ning; if on the present Occasions, you redouble your Watch over yourself, and at the Head of your Colleagues and Subalterns, pray with an upright and a pure Intention; tho' the Drought were equally fatal to me, let Share of Virtue be ever so small, I don't make any Difference betwixt my Interests, and those of the People. If I really had any Secret for procuring the desired Rain, could I be so hard-hearted as to see them afflicted without relieving them? Would I have put you to the Trouble of sending two Messages to me on this Head? Had I done this, I must have been a Brute. Lastly, I promise you, that in a Day or two, I will go to the Suburbs of the South, to second, by my Prayers, your Compassion for the People. If you take my Advice, you will confine yourself to hearty sincere Prayers, without giving into these Errors, and without having it in your View to gain a (‡) Name to yourself. Tyen, misd as he is above us, is never insensible to a sincere and perfect Virtue.

The Person who has printed this Book, adds by Way of Note. In public Calamities, in Inundations, or Droughts, this is the Way in which we are to act. We, in this Manner, are to do all that depends on us. To lay Stress upon the pretended Secrets of the Tau tse, or to discover any Value for them, is great Blindness.

(*) Sang enlarged the Innocent, and those who were less guilty.

(†) Literally it is; Mountains, Rivers, Territories, and Dominions of each Prince: That is to say, the Tutelary Spirits of the Country. This is an ordinary Figure among the Chingse.

(‡) These two Books mention the Ceremony Tu, in order to obtain Rain. The Li ki says, that it was address'd to Ti. The ancient Books sometimes mention Shang ti; sometimes only Ti. As we indifferently say, Offer to the Lord, or Offer to the most high Lord.

(§) Ministers of the Sect of Tau.

(•) The City of the first Order, of which this Mandarin was the first Officer, had in its Jurisdiction, eight Cities of the third Order.

(•) Shin signifies Spirit, spiritual, excellent, impenetrable: Ming; Intelligence, Knowledge, clear Penetration, &c. I leave the Reader to determine the Sense of this Expression, by what goes before, and what follows.

(‡) That is to say, To gain the Reputation of being a compassionate Man, and tender of the People's Sufferings.

L Y E (*) N Y U, or, the Illustrious Women.

MONG KO being of an Age fit for Study, was sent by his Mother to School. One Day, as he returned from it, she asked him, dividing her Thread, how far he had advanced in his Studies, and what he had learned? The Child ingenuously answering, that he had yet learned nothing, she immediately took a Knife and cut a Piece of Work which she had in the Loom. The Boy trembling, asked why she had done that. My Son, said she, you, by learning nothing, have done the same thing, and worse. When a Man would become wife, and render himself illustrious, he must apply in good earnest, and profit by what he hears. This is the only Means of living peaceably at home, and of entering into public Posts, without hazarding any thing. If you neglect Study, as you do, you will be only a Wretch, exposed to all the Miseries of the meanest Conditions of Life. If you undervalue Wisdom, and thus lose the Time appointed for acquiring it, it were better for you to betake yourself to the Trade of a Porter, or any other Business that can make you live. If a Woman can do nothing, and a Man has learned in his Youth to do nothing, they must either steal, or become Slaves. This is commonly said, and nothing is more true.

An example of Conjugal
Chastity.

Mong ko was struck with the Action and Words of his Mother. He took Tse se for his Master, and improved so well under him, that he became a great Philosopher, and the most eminent Man of his Age. One Day, entering into an inner Chamber wherein his Wife was, he found her not very decently dressed. Upon this he was startled, retired hastily, and it was some time before he saw her. His Wife went to her Mother in Law, and as it were taking Leave of her; it is a common Saying, said she to her, that when a Wife is retired in her Chamber, the Husband seldom or never intrudes thither, during the Day-time. When I last was in my Chamber, my Husband surprized me a little negligently dressed, and seemed to be much disobliged at it. I see that he looks upon me as a Stranger. A Woman cannot decently live any time in a strange House. I am therefore come to bid you farewell, that I may return to my Mother's House.

The Mother of Mong ko immediately called him, and said to him: Son, when a Man enters into a House, he ought to inform himself if any body is within, he should give Notice of his being there, by a Servant, or least he should raise his Voice, that he may be heard before he enters. You know that this is usual: And indeed it is the Way to find the Hall in Order after you enter it. As for all other Apartments, when the Door is opened to a Man, he ought to have his Eyes on the Ground. You have been deficient in this, my Son, and thereby discovered an Ignorance of the Rites. After this, how will it become you to be rigid towards others. (+) Mong ko received this Reprimand humbly and thankfully, and then was reconciled with his Wife.

A long time after, Mong tse being at the Court of Tsi, he appeared a little melancholy. When his Mother asked him the Reason, he declined giving her a positive Answer. Another Day as he was wrapt up in Thought, he handled his Staff, and fell a sighing: His Mother perceived it, and said to him: My Son, you lately appeared melancholy to me, and dissembled the Cause. To Day you sigh, when you are handling your Staff. What is the Matter? Mother, answered Mong tse, I have heard that a wise Man ought not to aspire to Posts and Rewards, but by honest Means. And that when Princes will not hear us, we ought not to lavish our Advices upon them: And that if they hear us without profiting by us, we ought not to frequent their Court. I see that the true Doctrine is neglected here. I want to retire, but I see you are now aged. This gives me a great deal of Trouble, and is the Subject of my Uneasiness and Grief.

The Duty of a Wife, answers the Mother, is to provide Victuals, to sew, and to take care of the Inside of the House. The Outside is not her Province. When we are Girls, we are subjected to a Father and Mother. When we are married, we depend upon our Husbands, and we ought to follow them whither they please to carry us. Lastly, when we are Widows, and when our Sons are advanced in Years, we ought to follow them as we once did our Husbands. This is what the Rites prescribe with Regard to our Sex. I am aged, it is true, but no matter for that. Do your Duty, my Son; I shall be no Obstacle to you: I know how to do mine too.

King kyang a young Lady of Quality was married to Mu pe, who held the Rank of Ta fu at the Court of Lü: She had a Son whose Name was Wen pe. When Mu pe died, King kyang finding herself charged with the Education of her Son, took care to make him study a good deal; when his Studies were over, and he returned Home, she had a watchful Eye over his Conduct, and observed more than once, that they who came to see Wen pe treated him with a great deal of Ceremony. From whence she concluded that her Son keeping Company only with those who were his Inferiors, both in Age and other Respects, he would look upon himself as standing no longer in need of Instruction.

(*) Lye, Illustrious; Nyu, Women. Perhaps it may be thought, that what is contained in this Collection, does not answer so pompous a Title. We are to conclude one of these two things: Either, that the Chinese are not very scrupulous whether the Title of a Book is just or not, or that certain Things are a great deal more raised in their Ideas, than they are in ours; which is indeed true enough.

(+) Mong was the Name of the Family, Ko was his Sur-name, or, as the Chinese calls it, his little Name. Tse is an honourable Manner of naming any one.

One Day, when the Company was retired, she called him to her, to give him a Reprimand. Formerly, said she to him, when (*) Vu vang was going out of the Hall of Audience, one of his Garters unloosed, and his Stocking fell down. While he was looking about him, he could not see one Person whom he thought he had (†) a Right to desire to tie his Stocking up. Upon which he stooped and did it himself. Wen kong always had three good Friends at his Side. He maintained five Officers for observing his Faults, and for reprehending him; and not a Day passed over his Head, without hearing thirty Persons telling him of his Failings. Chew kong, at an Entertainment, three times presented the most exquisite Meats to the old Men. He dressed their Hair himself; and when the Duties of his Function obliged him to make Visits, he visited upwards of seventy poor old Men, who lived in the most obscure Streets. The three great Men I have mentioned were Princes, and yet you see how humble they were: But it was with Regard to People more aged than themselves, for they commonly admitted no other into their Presence. Thereby it was, in a Manner, more easy for them to forget the Pre-eminence which their Rank and Dignity gave them, and every Day to make a sensible Progress in Virtue. But you, my Son, take a quite contrary Way, you who are young, and without a Post. Yes, I see all your Acquaintances yield to you in every thing, and look upon you as their Superior: They are doubtless young Persons, and as backward in the World as you: What Advantage then can you reap from these Acquaintances?

Wen pe received this Reprimand with Thankfulness, owned himself to have been in the Wrong, and amended his conduct: He contracted an Intimacy with grave Persons, whom he look'd upon as his Masters. He was commonly seen in Company with venerable old Men; he served them as their Guide and Support as they walked along, and even waited on them at Table. King kyang upon this felt a real Joy. Behold now, said she, my Son forms himself, and is become a Man.

When Wen pe began to enter into the Government, King kyang made him a short Discourse, in which by Similies, all drawn from the Art of making Stuffs, in which she employed herself, she laid before him the Qualifications of such as ought to fill the principal Posts in a Kingdom. Sometime after, Wen pe returning to the Palace, went to salute his Mother, and he found her parcelling out her Thread. Wen pe testified some Concern, lest that Trade should do some Dishonour to his Family, and it might be suspected, as if he did not treat her very well. King kyang sending forth a great Sigh, these, cried she, are the false Notions, by which this, once so flourishing, Kingdom is now ruin'd. What! my Son, can you, who have studied so much, and who are now clothed with Authority, be ignorant? I have many things to acquaint you with; hear them attentively. The wise Kings of Antiquity, industriously sought for the poorest Grounds, whereon they might settle their Subjects. One of their greatest Secrets in the Art of Governing, was, to employ the People in laborious, and even fatiguing, Works; and they were certainly in the right. Fatigue and Labour renders a Man careful and virtuous, but Idleness and Luxury beget and cherish Vice. The Inhabitants of fat fertile Soils, are commonly very lazy and voluptuous; but they whose Ground are poor, are Men of Industry and Virtue.

Besides, you are not to imagine, that in wise Antiquity, Labour and Industry were appointed only for the People. How much did our Emperors themselves work? They regulated their Finances, examined their Magistrates, and the Reports made to them by the several Magistrates. They had the Necessities of the People to watch over; and they provided for them as good Masters and Pastors. They regulated the Punishments, and the last appeal always lay to them, with Regard to the Chastisements of Criminals. They had the public Ceremonies to perform at stated Times, and to prepare them for several Days beforehand. Even an Emperor was not suffered to repose or to divert himself, unless every thing was in order. The very same Rule was observed with Regard to the Tributary Princes. They passed the Morning in acquitting themselves of the Duty and Service they owed to the Emperor, according to the Orders they had received. They employed the Middle of the Day, in what regarded the Government of their private State, and the Evening, in examining Criminal Affairs. In the Night-time, they regulated their Workmen and daily Labourers. The great Men of the Empire, then spent the Morning in the Affairs that belonged to their own Sphere. Towards Noon, they consulted in common about what concerned the Government of the State. In the Evening, they drew up a Memorial of the Things which they were to regulate next Day. And the Night-time was employed in the Cares of their own private Affairs. It was the same in Proportion with all Conditions, above that of the meanest People.

To go from Men to Women; Are you ignorant that the Queens wrought with their own Hands, these violet-coloured Ornaments which hung at our Emperor's Cap? That these red Borders, which distinguished the Princes and the Dukes, were wrought by their Wives: That the large fine Belts worn by the great Men, and their Habits of Ceremony, were wrought by the Wives of the very Persons who wore them? There was a much stronger Reason, why the Women of an inferior Condition wrought their own Husbands Cloaths with their own Hands. Their Labour was not confined to this. These Kinds of Stuffs and Works were offered to Princes, either out of Duty, when they who offered them were their Subjects; or in Presents, when they were not. In short, it was a Crime both for Women and Men to lead a lazy Life. Such were the Customs of our Ancestors: and the Maxims of our ancient Kings, which have been transmitted to us, and according to which, great Men ought to labour, both with their Hands and their Head, were then inviolably practised. We are not to forget these wife Maxims and these laudable Customs.

Reflect, my Son, that I am a Widow, and that you are but lately put into Post. Are then Laziness and Pride becoming in you? For my Share, I endeavour to have nothing to reproach myself with on this Head; and you seem to take that amiss. What can a Prince hope from a Man that has such Dispositions? I am much afraid, lest my Husband has in you, left me a Son unworthy of such a Father, and lest his Posterity should end in your Person. In effect, Wen pé, a little time after, died without Children. King kyang, during her time of Mourning, bewailed her Husband in the Morning, and her Son at Night.

Ki kang, the Brother of Mu pé, an Uncle of Wen pé, was the Head of his Family, and therefore King kyang, according to the Custom, was to go to his House. He therefore went to invite her thither, and talked to her with a great deal of Respect. King kyang followed him with Silence. When she came to the House of Ki kang, without speaking a Word, she entered into the Apartment that was appointed for her. Afterwards, tho' Ki kang treated her always as a Mother, yet she spoke very seldom to him, and always in her Apartment, and at a good Distance. Confucius, to whom this Conduct was related, praised King kyang very much, for her exact Observance of the Rites.

Heroic Spirit
in a Mother.

When Tsé and Tsin were at War with one another, the King of Tsé raised an Army, the Command of which he gave to Tsé fa. The General falling short in Provisions, dispatched a Courier to inform the King of this. He at the same time took that Opportunity of being remembered to his Mother. The Courier repairing to her, How is all with the Army, said she; are the poor Soldiers well? Madam, answered the Messenger, Provisions are fallen scarce among them. Every Soldier, it is true, has hitherto had his Proportion of Pease, but it has been Scanty, and by Tale. And how does your General live, replied she? Madam, said the Messenger, he feels the Famine likewise; every Morning and Night, he has only some Herbs and some very sorry Food, together with a little black Rice. The Conversation went no further; but some time after, when Tsé fa returned victorious, his Mother shut the Gate of her House against him.

Tsé fa being much surprized with this bad Reception, begged some Persons of his Acquaintance, to ask the Reason of it of his Mother. Is my Son, answered she, ignorant of what the King of Tsé formerly did in a War against U? Does he not know, that when that Prince on his March received a Present of Wine, he gave it to his Soldiers to drink? That he did the same with a Bag of dry roasted Rice which he received on another Occasion, and that he reserved none either of the Wine or the Rice to himself. How could my Son be so hard hearted as to eat Morning and Night, what was drest for him, without sharing it with the Soldiers, who were reduced to a few Pease a Day? Tsé fa, victorious as he is, is, in my Eyes, a despicable General; and I don't look upon him as my Son. All this was reported to Tsé fa, who acknowledged his Fault, asked Pardon of his Mother, thanked her for her Instruction; and the Gate was then opened.

exactness in a Widow.

A Widow of the Kingdom of Lü, having prepared every thing at home for the Feast of the New Year, and the last Day of the Old, called her nine Sons to her, and spoke to them in this Manner. My Sons, I know that a Widow ought to keep within the House of her deceased Husband, according to the Rites. But when I reflect, that in my Father's Family there is no Person come to the Age of Discretion, doubtless at this solemn Time, the Ceremonies will be neglected, or but very ill performed; I hope you will not take it amiss, if I go thither this Day. Whatever you please, Mother, said the nine Sons upon their Knees. You ought to know, answered she, that we Women are not Mistresses of ourselves. In our Youth, we are under the Authority of our Father and our Mother. In our riper Age, we are in the Power of our Husbands, in our old Age and Widow-hood, we ought to follow our Children, and in many Respects, to be dependant upon them. My Sons are very well pleased, that this Day I shall repair to my Father's House: This is a little Liberty which I take, and not strictly agreeable to the Rigor of the Rites. But I do it to put Things in Order, in a Place, where probably there would be no Order otherways. This Day, redouble your Vigilance, keep the Door well shut, for I shall not return till it is dark.

Immediately she set out, being accompanied with an old Domestic who had been sent to invite her. When she came thither, she made all the haste she could to put every thing in good Order; and the Day beginning to lower, she thought that it was late. Upon this, she set out on her Return homewards: But before she got thither, the Sky clearing up, she found she had been deceived by the Darkeness of the Day, and that it was not so late as she imagined. She therefore resolved to wait in a retired Place near her House, in to which she entered when it was Night: A Noble-man, who had seen her from a Terrace, found something in this Way of doing, that was extraordinary: He had the Curiosity to cause her to be followed; and he found some Pretence to examine what had past in her House. Those to whom he had entrusted this Commission, informed him that it was an honourable Family, and that every thing was in Order, and even according to the Observation of their Rites.

This Noble-man calling for the Widow, said to her; Such a Day, coming from the Northwards, you stopt a considerable Time in such a Place without the Walls, and did not enter into your House till Night fell: I thought this a pretty extraordinary Thing, and am curious to know what could induce you to act in this Manner. Sir, answers the Widow, it is long since I lost my Husband, who left me with five Sons. Towards the End of the Year, having put every thing in Order Order for the New Year, with the Consent of my Sons, I paid a Visit to my Father's House. When I left them, I said to my Sons and to my Daughters in Law, that I would not come back till Night fell. Partly from Mistake, and partly lest I should meet with some rude Companion, as you know there are many such at a Time like this: I left my Father's House too soon. I found this when I was upon the Road; and not being willing to arrive before the Time which I had fix'd for my Return, (*) I waited in that remote Place, till the Hour should come in which I promised to return. This Noble-man praised her very much, and honoured her with the Title of (†) Mü.

Mang lä, a Subject of the Kingdom of Whey, married the Daughter of Meng yang his Country Man, in a second Marriage. He had five Sons by his first Wife, and three by his second. The five Sons of the first Marriage, could not endure their Step-mother. And tho' she treated them very well, and shewed them all the Tenderneſs imaginable, yet she could not win them over. Being afraid, lest it might be the Fault of her own Sons, she ſeperated them entirely; ſo that they had nothing in common, either with Regard to their Lodging, their Cloaths, or their Viſuals: Yet all was to no Purpoſe; the five Sons of the first Bed, continued to expreſs a great deal of Aversion for their Step-mother. It happened, that the third of theſe five Brothers was made Priſoner, for having neglected his Prince's Orders; and was capitally convicted. The Mother appeared inſoluble, and omitted nothing that could ſoften the Rigors of his Priſon; and beſides that, ſhe did every thing to prevent his being condemned. A great many People ſeemed ſurprized, that ſhe ſhould give herſelf ſo much Uneaſineſs about a young Man, who had expreſt ſo much Aversion for her.

No Matter, ſaid ſhe to them, I look upon him as my own Son, and will do to the laſt, all for him that lies in my Power. Where is the Merit and Virtue of loving one's own Children? Or where is the Mother who does not love them? But I cannot confine myſelf to that. The Father of theſe young Men, ſeeing them deprived of their Mother, eſpouſed me, that I might ſupply her Place to them. Wherefore I ought to look upon myſelf as their Mother. And can one be a Mother without Affection? If the Affection I have for my own Children, ſhould make me neglect theſe, I ſhould be unjuſt. What has a Woman, void of Juſtice and Affection, to do with Life? Tho' he entertained the greateſt Aversion for me, yet his Hatred and diſobliging Manners, could not free me from the Duty I owe him. The Anſwers of this Woman became public, and the King being informed of them, pardoned her Son, from the Regard he had for ſuch a Mother. Ever after that time, not only this rebellious Son, but his Brothers were as full of Reſpect and Submiſſion for their Step-mother, as her own Sons were; and ſhe inſtructed them ſo well, that they honourably filled the firſt Poſts of the Kingdom.

Tyen tſi tſe, the Miniſter of the Kingdom of Tſi, raiſed a pretty moderate Sum from his Dependants, and came to put it in his Mother's Hands. Son, ſaid ſhe, you have been but three Years in Poſt, and I know how much both your Salary, and the Expences you muſt lay out, amount to. How then have you raiſed the Sum which you have now brought to me? Mother, answered Tſi tſe, I own to you freely, that I have received it from the Subaltern Officers. Son, replies the Mother immediately, a good Miniſter ought to ſerve his Prince affectionately and diſintereſtedly; at leaſt, he ought to keep his Hands clean, and to uſe no dirty Ways of enriching himſelf. If any ſuch thing comes into his Head, he ought immediately to reject it. In ſhort, he ought to avoid even the Suſpicion of being eaſy in taking Money which does not come by honeſt Means: To be really as diſintereſted as he would wiſh to appear to be in the Eyes of the World, and thereby to give Authority to his Words. The Prince has done you the Honour to put you in Poſt; your Salary is conſiderable, and you ought to answer his Favours by a blameleſs Conduct. Know, my Son, that the Duties of a Subject, and more eſpecially of a Prince's Miniſter, are not leſs inviolable than thoſe of a Son to a Father. He owes to the Prince his Maſter, a ſincere Affection, an ardent Zeal, and an unſhaken Loyalty. He ought to give Proofs of all theſe Virtues, even at the Hazard of his Life, if there is Occaſion. And as theſe dangerous Occaſions don't often preſent, he at leaſt ought to diſtinguiſh himſelf by a conſtant Uprightneſs and a perfect Diſintereſtedneſs. Beſides the other Advantages of this Conduct, it is the only Way to be ſheltered from the Storms of State. By taking another Road, you become a bad Miniſter, and how then can you be a dutiful Son. Hence, fly from my Preſence; I diſown you as a Son; you may do what you have a Mind with that Money, but what is ill purchaſed, ſhall never enter into my Houſe.

Tyen tſi tſe retired full of Confuſion and Repentance. He returned the Money to thoſe from whom he had taken it; went and accused himſelf before the Throne of his Prince, begging for the Chaiſtifiement he deſerved. Swen wang, who was then King of Tſi, was charmed with the Virtue of this Woman. He cauſed a large Sum to be given her out of his Treafury, pardoned Tyen tſi tſe, and kept him in his Poſt.

Kyang, the Daughter of the King of Tſi, was married unto Swen wang, one of the Emperors of the Chew Dynaſty. This Princeſs was equally witty and virtuous; never was there found any thing blameable in her Words and Actions: But ſhe was grieved to ſee the Prince plunged in an Indolence and a Laziness, unworthy of himself. He went to Bed pretty early every Night, and slept very late next Morning. Behold the Expedient she took to reclaim him.

One Day she laid aside her Earrings, Bodkins, and other Ornaments of her Head; and placing herself a-part upon an Alcove in the Posture of a Criminal, she talked to the Prince in these Terms by the Mouth of a Servant; Sir, I had the Honour to be your Servant; and I have known for a long time, that I have no Merit in any Respect: But there is one thing that I have not remarked till now, and that is, that to all Appearance I am a Rake. It is doubtless on my Account, that contrary to the Rites, your Majesty appears every Day so late, and that you are look'd upon as a Prince who prefers your Pleasure to your Duty. This Character does you so much the more harm, as Pleasure in all Ages, has been look'd upon as the Source of great Numbers of Disorders. This Evil, whatever it is, doubtless proceeds from me. Put a Stop to it, I beg of you immediately, and vindicate your own Character, by punishing the Guilty.

Swen vang then reflecting with himself, Rise, said he to his Wife, resume your Ornaments and your Dignity. It is true, that my Virtue comes far short of my Character: But the Fault is entirely mine, and no way yours. From that time forward, Swen vang applied himself seriously to the Affairs of his State. He gave Audiences early in the Morning, even to the Evening, and gained the Character of being a great Prince.

An Example of Heroic Resolution in a Lady.

Shin feng, the eldest Son of Hyen kong, the King of Tsin, was traduced to his Father by the Concubine Li ki; and not being able to bear so black a Calumny, he put himself to Death. Chong eul, the Brother of Shin feng, and like him, the Son of a King, was afraid of having the same Villany practised upon him: So he immediately left the Kingdom with a Band of well chosen Men, the Principal of whom was Kyew fan. They all retired to the Kingdom of Tsi, where When kong, who was Prince of that Country, received Chong eul very willingly: He gave him an Equipage of twenty Chariots, an honourable Treatment, and Tsi kyang, a Princess of the Blood, for his Wife. Chong eul being very well satisfied with his Fate, laid his Account with spending the Remainder of his Life in this Manner, and willingly renounced all his Pretensions to the Crown of Tsin. Kyew fan could not relish this Indifference of his Prince, to a Kingdom to which he was the rightful Heir, and so much the less, because, since his Banishment, and the Death of his Father Hyen kong, which happened soon after, that Kingdom had changed several Masters, and was then in Confusion. One Day, as Kyew fan, and others of the Retinue of Chong eul, were discoursing a-part on this Head, they concluded, that the Prince must absolutely quit his Retreat, and return to take Possession of his Kingdom. A young Female Slave overheard the Conversation, and related it all to Tsi kyang, who immediately caused this Slave to be put to Death, and went to her Husband Chong eul. Prince, says she to him, all they who are of your Party take it much a mis, that you should confine yourself to live here. They are all of Opinion, that you ought to quit Tsi, that you may assert your undoubted Right to the Crown of Tsin. Yesterday, as they were deliberating upon the Means of engaging you to take this generous Resolution, a young Slave overheard them, and came and told me all. Being afraid, lest she should speak of it to some body else, and thereby create an Obstacle to the Design, I have taken care that she shall live no longer. The Secret is now safe, and you may set out without any Noise. This is the Advice of your faithful Servants, follow it immediately; and return into Tsin, which since you left it, has never enjoyed a Moment of Peace. That Kingdom belongs to you; put yourself in a Way to recover it, and doubtless you will have the Assistance of (*) Sbang ti.

Not answered the Prince, I will not leave this Place; I design to live and to die here. The Princess redoubled her Instances, and endeavoured by several Examples to inspire her Husband with a Passion for Rule, and the Hopes of recovering his Kingdom. But seeing all was in vain, she talked over the Affair with Kyew fan; and they both agreed that they should fuddle the Prince, and that while he was drunk, his Attendants should carry him away on the Road to Tsin. The thing was executed accordingly. Chong eul awaking from his Drunkenness, in the first Emotions of his Anger, snatched a Lance, with which he would have pierced Kyew fan, who put aside the Blow. Then Chong eul seeing himself engaged, and besides having a Kindness for Kyew fan, said to him. If this Enterprize succeed, it is well, I will pardon you; but if it does not succeed, I will (+) hate you mortally. They set out, they advanced, and they arrived at Tsin. Mu kong furnish'd the Prince Chong eul with Troops: He entered the Territories of Tsin; and as soon as his Arrival was heard of, they killed Whay kong, who had been made King, and bestowed the Crown upon the Prince, who took the Name of When kong. Tsi kyang at the same time was declared Queen, and an Embassy was sent for her to the States of Tsi, with all the Honours due to her Dignity.

Uncommon
Virtue.

Ta tse, the Minister of the Kingdom of Tau, was a great deal more anxious about his own, than about his Prince's Interest, or gaining a right Character. His Wife made many Remonstrances to him upon this Head, but he laugh'd at them all. He continued in Post for five Years, at the End of which, being well fatned with the Blood of the People, he divested himself of his Post, that he might go and peaceably enjoy his Riches. They were so great when he went away, that he had in his Train 100 Chariots: While he was yet in Post, every one of his Family killed a prodigious Number of Oxen, that they might compliment him. His Wife, in the midst of these Rejoycings, always wept, tenderly embracing her Son. The Mother of Ta tse was enraged at her Daughter in Law's Way of acting: How ridiculous are you, said she; why will you disturb the Feast thus? What an ill-omen'd Bird are you.

(*) Sbang, signifies, Supreme: Ti, Emperor, Emperor, Lord.

(+) Literally it is: I could have the Heart to eat your Flesh.

I have Reason to weep, answered the Daughter in Law: So much Grandeur, so many Riches, without Merit and without Virtue, threaten this poor Infant with many great Misfortunes. Tsi wen, formerly Minister of the Kingdom of Tsi, enriched the State, and neglected to enrich himself. While alive, he was honoured by the Prince, and adored by the People: When dead, his Posterity was loaded with Honours and Wealth, and his Reputation was always the same. Alas! How little does my Husband resemble him! The Lustre of present Greatness, and the Passion of heaping up Riches, wholly employ him; nor does the Future in the least trouble him. It is said, that in the Mountains of the South there is a Leopard, who, notwithstanding his Voraciousness, in a rainy Season, will live seven Days without any Food, rather than by going abroad spoil the Lustre of his Skin. The more fat Dogs and Swine are, the nearer their Days are to an End. The Miseries of the State are yet greater than my Husband's Riches. He wanted the Art, while he was plundering the People, to win their Love. To me, he seems to be near great Misfortunes. Would to God, I and my dear Babe were well rid of them.

This Discourse put the Mother of Ta tse into such a Passion, that she drove away her Daughter in Law, who retired with her Child to her own Mother. That very Year in which Ta tse had laid down his Post, he and his Servants were unhappily assassinated by a Company of Robbers, who carried away all his Riches. They killed every one about the House, except the Mother of Ta tse. Her Daughter in Law immediately returned to her, that she might serve her in her old Age. Every one praised the Foresight of the Daughter in Law, and the Wisdom she had discovered in preferring Virtue to Riches. People were ravished to see, that after she had saved her own Life, and that of her Son, by her Resolution and her Foresight, that she should repair by her Affiduity in serving her Mother in Law, all that was blamable in her Manner of retiring.

Yen tse, the first Minister of Tsi, was a Man of a very short Stature, but he had amongst his Domestic, a Giant eight Foot high. The Wife of this Domestic, who likewise served Yen tse, was curious to see the Equipage, one Day, as that Minister went abroad in Ceremony. She remarked, that her Husband made his Horse curvett, reared himself in the Stirrups; in short, assumed great Airs, and seemed to be very proud of his vast Height. When the Cavalcade was returned, the Wife of this Giant taking him a-part, school'd him in this Manner. You are, it is true, a poor Man, but you deserve to be poor all your Life long. The Husband being surprized at this unexpected Compliment, asked her what she meant. Behold, said she, your Master: He is scarce three Foot high, and yet he fills the highest Post in the Kingdom, and acquits himself of it in such a Manner, as to procure his Prince a great deal of Glory, without adding one Inch to his own Stature: I looked at him this Morning with all his Retinue, I admired his humble, modest, thoughtful, and almost fearful Air. On the contrary, I observed that you, who tho' you are about eight Foot high, are at best, but a Slave, gave yourself Airs of Importance, and was quite full of yourself. I blush'd for you, and I immediately retired. This Man received her Reprimand very well, express'd a Resolution to amend, and asked his Wife in what Manner he should behave. Imitate, answered she, imitate your Master Yen tse: Happy, if you can contain as much Wisdom and Virtue in your Stature of eight Foot, as he does in that little Body: Serve him as he serves his Prince: If you love to distinguish yourself, it ought to be in that Manner. It is a common and a true Saying, that Virtue can crown the meanest with Glory: And this Glory is a great deal more solid than that of those, whom some accidental Advantages render haughty and proud.

The Husband profited so well by this Lecture, that he was quite a new Man. No body could be more humble, more modest, more diligent in his Service, more zealous for his Master, or more exact in fulfilling his Duties, than he was. Yen tse was struck with this Change, and asked how it came about. The Servant answered, that it was by means of his Wife, and told him the Method she had taken. Yen tse praised the Wisdom of the Wife, and the Docility of the Husband. He valued a Man who was capable of making a constant firm Resolution so readily; and gave him a Post, of which he acquitted himself so well, that he was promoted, and at last became a great Officer.

Tsye yu was a Native of the Kingdom of Tsi, and lived by the Labour of his Hands, but under a mean Appearance, concealed a profound Wisdom. The King, who valued Virtue, and knew how much this Subject possess'd, wanted to employ him; and sent him two Messengers for that Purpose, together with two Chariots loaded with Presents, and an Order to tell him, that the King desired that he would accept of these Presents; with the Government, and general Intendancy of that Part of his State that lies to the South of the River Wbay. Tsye yu smiled at this Compliment, but without speaking a Word, and the Messenger was obliged to return with the Presents, not being able to get any other Answer.

The Wife of Tsye yu was then from home, and when she returned to her House, she observed the Tracks of Chariots, which could not be far from the Gate. How! my Husband, says she entering into the House, have you forgot that Virtue and Disinterestedness, which hitherto was all your Pleasure? Chariots have come to our Door, and they have pass'd no further. Doubtless they were loaded, for the Tracks of them are very deep: How came all this, I pray you? The King, answered Tsye yu, not knowing my Character, and thinking that I was of some Value, wanted to give me the Government of a Part of his Kingdom. He sent a Man on purpose with two Chariots loaded with Presents, to invite me to accept of this Post. You ought to refuse both the Presents and the Post, answered the Wife.

Example of a Wife's love of Retirement.

Tjje yu wanting to know if his Wife spoke sincerely, said to her; We all act under the Influence of a natural Inclination for Honours and Riches. Why should we not accept of them when they come in our Way? And why should you blame me for not being insensible of the King's Favours? Alas! answered the Wife in Tears, Justice, Honesty, Innocence, and to say all in one Word, Virtue is much safer in a retired Life and a decent Poverty, than amidst the Hurry of Business and the Enticements of Riches. Was it wise in you to make so dangerous an Exchange? We have now long lived together; your Labour has furnished us with Food, and mine with Rayment; and thus we have suffered neither Hunger nor Cold. What can be more charming than a Life thus equally innocent and peaceful? Ought you not to have persevered in it? Perhaps you have not considered the Dependence and Slavery that is inseparable from these Presents and Posts: With Respect to Virtue, they deprive a Man of Part of his Liberty; in other Respects, they are often incompatible with perfect Honesty and exact Equity.

Tjje yu then being satisfy'd with his Wife; You may be easy, reply'd he, I have neither accepted of Post nor Present; I congratulate you upon it, answer'd the Wife; but somewhat is still left undone, for it is not quite right to be a Member of a State, and to refuse to serve the Prince, when he desires our Services: Let us retire and live elsewhere. They then pack'd up their little Furniture, chang'd their Names on the Road, that they might not be known, and removed into another Country. They who were afterwards acquainted with what Tjje yu did, praised his Disinterestedness: But above all, they bestow'd vast Encomiums on his Wife; who without yielding to her Husband in any thing, discover'd a greater Foresight, and more elevated Sentiments.

Another.

Lay tse, having early retired from all the Trouble of the World, led a peaceable Life with his Wife, in a solitary Retreat. The Walls of his House were composed of Reeds, and the Roof of Thatch; a Bed of plain Boards, and a Matt of Straw, were all the Furniture of his Chamber; and a coarse Stuff served to cloath both his Wife and him. Their ordinary Food was Pease, which they sowed and reaped with their own Hands. It happened, that at the Court of Tjü, as they were talking of the antient Sages, someone mentioned Lay tse as being equal to any one of them in Virtue: Upon this, the King was desirous to have him at his Court; and to send him Presents to invite him thither, but his Majesty being given to understand, that probably Lay tse would not come, he resolv'd to go in Person, and to find him out. When he came to his Hutt, he found him making Baskets for carrying Earth. I am, said the King humbly to him, a Man without Understanding, and without Wisdom. Yet I am charged with the Weight of a State, which I have received from my Ancestors; help me to support it, I have come hither to invite you. No, Sir, answered Lay tse, I am a Husbandman, and a Clown entirely unworthy of the Honour, and still more incapable of the Employment, which your Majesty is pleas'd to offer me; I am young, and almost helpless, said the King, renewing his Instances; you can form me to Virtue: I sincerely want to improve by your Understanding and your Example: Lay tse appeared to be satisfied, and the King retired.

The Wife of Lay tse being return'd from gather'd some Wood for Fuel: What did this Man want, said she, what is the Meaning of these Chariots whose Tracts I see? It is the King himself in Person, answered Lay tse, who is come to press me to take the Government of the State under him. And have you consented to this, replies the Wife? How could I refuse it, answers the Husband? As for my share, answers the Wife, I know the Proverb which says, he who eats another Man's Bread, submits himself to suffer his Blows. This may be well applied to those who are about a Prince's Person: To day, they are in Credit and Opulence, to morrow, disgraced and punished: And all this according to the Whims of their Masters. You are then going to put yourself in the Power of another? I wish that you never have much cause to repent this, tho' I much fear you shall. As for me, I declare that I never will expose my self to these Dangers: My Liberty is too dear to me, that I should thus part with it, suffer me to leave you; upon this, she went out and proceeded on the Road. Her Husband cried out to her to return, and told her, that he had not yet determin'd himself; She would not deign so much as to look back: But going at one stretch towards the South of the River Kyang, there she stopp'd. Then finding some Uneasiness within her with regard to the Manner in which she was to live, she answer'd herself in these Terms. The Birds and other Animals, every Year let fall more Feathers and Hairs, than will be sufficient to serve me for Cloaths; and there is more Corn and Fruit left in the Fields, than will be sufficient to nourish me.

Lay tse, being touched with the Discourse and Example of his Wife, followed her, notwithstanding his Engagement, to the South of Kyang, a great many People followed them, and transported their Families thither: In less than a Year he formed a new Village, which in three Years grew to be a large Town.

Another.

The King of Tjü, having heard the Wisdom and Virtue of Tu leng tse chong much praised; wanted to make him his Minister, and sent off a Man to him from his Court, to make him this proposal. Tu leng tse chong having heard him, begged the Messenger to wait for a Moment, and that he would then come and give him an Answer. He then went into the Inner-part of his House and addressing himself to his Wife: The King, says he to her, wants to make me one of his Ministers; what is your Opinion of this Proposal? If I consent, to morrow we shall be attended with a numerous Retinue, and we shall have a pompous Equipage: Our Tables shall be well served, and every other thing in Proportion: I say again, what is your Opinion? For many Years,

Years, answered the Wife, we have gained our Livelihood by a little Trade that we have carried on, and we have wanted for none of the Necessaries of Life. Yet you have had leisure enough for Reading, and from time to time to enjoy this fine Air: Even when you work, you are never without your Books on one side of you; your Kin on the other, and a placid Joy in the Middle. The Equipage of which you speak, to me is but an empty Pomp; as to the Table, it may be set out with exquisite Dainties, which at present you want: But is that worth your charging yourself with so many Cares? If you accept what is offered you, you must at the same time renounce that calm Joy which you taste at present; and you will be happy, if in the present Situation of Things, you escape a fatal Death.

Tse chong then came out and told the Messenger, that he could not accept of the Honour he did him, and that he begged the King would pitch upon some body else to fill that Dignity; he then packed up his Furniture, that he might retire elsewhere with his Wife; and in order to be more concealed, he changed his first Trade into that of a Gardener.

Chong eul, the second Son of Hyen kong the King of Tsin, left the Kingdom, that he might avoid the Artifices of the Concubine Li ki, who had already by her Calumnies ruined his elder Brother Shin feng. When he was retiring to the Kingdom of Tsi, he passed through the State of Tsau. The King of that Country, far from doing honour to Chong eul, kept himself at a Distance in a retired Place, from whence, thro' a transparent Curtain, he could distinctly see Chong eul and his Retinue, as they passed along. The Prince was not singular in his Curiosity, for the Ladies of the Place had the same. One of them, the Wife of Hi fu ki, a great Man in the Kingdom, having seen Chong eul pass by, and considered the Aspect of those who attended him, called for her Husband with some Earnestness, and said to him; This fugitive Prince is so young, that no Judgment can yet be formed of his Character. But his Retinue is composed of a chosen Band. Above all, there are three who seem to me of distinguished Merit, and they probably are Noblemen of that Kingdom: I am much deceived, if these People don't find the means of establishing the Prince in his Throne, to which when he shall arrive, he doubtless will resent the good or bad Treatment of the States, thro' which he passes, in this his Retreat. Our Prince, who uses him so haughtily, will be the first that feels his Resentment; and in that Case, you must be involved in his Misfortune. One of our vulgar Proverbs says; If you want to know how the Son will turn out, look upon the Father or the Tutor. Another Proverb says; One may know a great Man by seeing his Attendants, tho' he does not see himself. By these Rules we may judge, that this fugitive Prince will one Day be a great King, and in a Condition to revenge the Affronts he now receives. Take my Advice, and pay your Court to him.

Fu ki believed his Wife; and having no time to prepare any thing else, made the Prince a Present of excellent Wine: And to enhance the Present, he placed a Diamond of vast Value upon the Vessel. Chong eul received the Wine, and returned to him the Diamond. When he was restored to his Father's Throne, the first Enterprize he undertook, was to ravage Tsau, that he might revenge the Neglect which the Prince of that Country had shewn to his Person. But he took care to give a Protection to Fu ki; prohibiting any one not only from doing him any Insult, but from even passing the Bounds of his Enclosure. Every one endeavoured to carry what they held dearest, to his House; some their Fathers, some their Mothers; and all who fled thither were safe. The Orders of the King of Tsin, in this, were so punctually obey'd, that there was a public Market at the Gate, where Goods were quietly bought and sold, as in Time of Peace. Fu ki gave his Wife the Honour of the wise Course he had taken, and she received great Encomiums.

Shu ngau, while an Infant, one Day, as he was walking, met a two headed Serpent, which he killed and buried. When he returned home, he went a crying to his Mother. What makes you cry Child, said the Mother? Because, answered the Boy, I have heard it said, that whoever sees a Serpent with two Heads, dies. I happened on one to Day, as I was walking abroad. What became of the Serpent, said the Mother? I killed it, replied the Child; and least any one should be so misfortunate after me, as to see the same Object, I buried it. Don't cry Child, answer'd she, the Sight of that Serpent will never kill you: The Motive which made you bury it, defeats all the malignant Qualities that were in it. There is no Misfortune but what Charity can avert. Tyen, tho' raised far above us, hears and sees all that passes here below. Does not the Shu king say? "Whang tyen protects Virtue wherever it is, without Acceptation of Persons." Do not cry, my Child, you may be easy; you will live and arrive at a high Rank. In effect, Shu ngau became afterwards one of the first Officers of his Country Tsin. This Prediction which was verif'd in the Event, did great honour to his Mother; and she was looked upon, as one very well versed in the Ways of Tyen.

Pé tsong, by his Wit, arrived early at the highest Posts in the Court of Tsin: But he carried about him a Failing which is dangerous every where, and still more dangerous at a Court, than elsewhere. From an Excess of Honesty, he refused every thing that was advanced, if he saw the least Glimpse of Falshood in it: And he did this with so little Caution, that he frequently covered People with Confusion. His Wife, who knew his Failing, was incessantly exhorting him to correct it. Husband, said she to him, it is commonly said, that People have a natural Inclination for their Prince, even before he does them any good. But it is likewise said, that a Robber has a natural Aversion for the Person he robs, even tho' that Person has done him no harm. This proceeds from the People always expecting Good at the Hand of their Prince, and the indiscreet honesty in a Husband:

And of vir-tuous Prudence in a Wife.

the Robber is always expecting Harm from the Person whom he robs. I conjure you to apply this Reflection to yourself, and be persuaded if there are some who love Honesty wherever it is found, there are many more who hate it, because they fear it. Your Honesty is feared at least by every Man, who is not equally honest himself. You know there are a great Number of these: And they are so many Enemies which you have, who will make you sooner or later feel the Effects of their Hatred: You ought to take a little more care of your Behaviour towards them.

Notwithstanding the wife Advices of his Wife, Pé tsong marched on at his ordinary Pace. One Day as he returned from the Palace, he appeared more gay than usual. I think, said his Wife to him, that I see in your Face, a Joy and Satisfaction which I have not before observed. May I know the Cause? To Day, replied Pé tsong hugging himself, I was at Court with a great many Officers of my Rank. The Conversation, in which I had a good Share, lasted for a long time, and all of them unanimously did me the honour to compare me to the Philosopher Yang tse.

For my Share, answered his Wife, I have sometimes heard Persons who speak little, and who do every thing in a simple Manner, compar'd to certain Trees who have but little Beauty, but whose Fruits are excellent. I should love a Comparison of that Kind much better for you, than the one you are so vain of. For as they compare you to Yang tse, Yang tse himself may be compared to a fair Tree without any Fruit. Yang tse, it is said, speaks a great deal, without taking much care about what he says. And this proves very troublesome to him in its Consequences. In this Respect, the Comparison holds just enough, but I don't see any Reason why you should be vain of it.

Is not this, answered Pé tsong, the same Tune always thrumm'd over and over again? You adapt every thing to your own Notions. I want to reclaim you in good earnest; and the Method I design to pursue, is this. I will give an Entertainment here to my Collegues, and before the Entertainment, we will enter into a Conversation. You shall, from your inner Apartment, hear all that passes, and you shall own yourself to be in the wrong. With all my Heart, said the Wife, I am satisfied. The Day was then fixed, and they had a long Conversation, which was followed by a much longer Entertainment. Pé tsong being, as usual, full of his Success, after he had seen his Company go away, went to his Wife, that he might have her Opinion of the Matter. The Wife saw the Humour her Husband was in, and knew that it would be in vain to endeavour at that time to disabuse him. She therefore resolv'd to dissemble and seemingly to agree with him; I own indeed, says she, that your Companions esteem you, and give you the Preference with Pleasure. However, being very firmly persuaded, that her Husband had every thing to fear from the Enemies he had made, she took another Way, without his perceiving it, to withdraw him from their Vengeance: And for this Purpose, took Advantage of the good Humour in which she had put her Husband, by seeming to be of his way of thinking.

After all, adds she, these Praises which they bestow upon you, however sincere they may be, ought never to render you blind to the present State of Affairs. The Kingdom is threatened with great Confusion. Do you take your Measures so as not to be ruined in it? You know very well that the Royal Family is divided, and that the Division encreases every Day. In such junctures as these, the safest Way is to retire elsewhere without any Noise: But this can never be done so long as you are in Post. Therefore let the Storm which threatens us, be never so dreadful, we ought to wait for it with Courage, but without being (*) lulled asleep ourselves. The Division amongst the Princes is so great, that the worst Part we can act, is that of joining with no Party. Chew li is a Prince of great Merit; and he either will get the better, or at least he will find some Resource. For my Share, if my Advice is taken, you will join yourself with these who are at the Head of his Party, and engage yourself with him.

Pé tsong having mused upon this for some time; you are in the Right of it, said he to his Wife. In Consequence of this Advice, he united himself strictly with Pi yang, the Head of the Party of Chew li, at the very time that the Enemies of Pé tsong were about to ruin him by a Calumny, which certainly would have cost him his Head. The Division in the Royal Family broke out soon after. Pi yang conveyed Chew li out of the Kingdom: And Pé tsong joining them, shunned the Blow which he was about to have received, before he was aware. They who were acquainted with this Conduct, praised the Wisdom and Foresight of the Wife of Pé tsong.

Ling kong, the King of Wey, one time discoursing with his Queen, pretty early in the Night, they heard a great Noise of Horses and Chariots, which came from the East: When this Cavalcade drew near the Palace, the Noise ceased all of a sudden, and sometime after began towards the West. Whence can this happen, said the King by way of discourse? Doubtless, answered the Queen, it is Ti pe yü. How do you know that, said the King, so as to be positive of it? I know, replied the Queen, that the Rite requires every Man to alight before the Gate of the Palace: And they who carry their Respect as far as it can be carried, order Matters so with their Retinue, as that they make very little or no Noise, when they pass by the Gate. I likewise know, that a good Subject with Regard to his Prince, like a good Son with Regard to his Parents, does not serve him in Appearance only, but discharges his Duty when it is dark, as well as when it is broad Day. But I know none but Ti pe yü in your Kingdom, who has this Exactness: For which Reason, I assure you it is he that has passed. The King being curious

to know the Truth, left the Queen for a Moment, informed himself who it was that had past by, and found that it was actually Ti pe yá.

However, returning to the Room in which the Queen was; Madam, said he smiling, I am puzzled, but you have not hit upon the Matter. The Queen then filling out a Bumper, and presenting it to the King, Since I am deceived, said she, you ought to be joyful. Why joyful, said the King? Because, answered the Queen, only one Ti pe yá hath hitherto appeared in your Kingdom: And you have discovered another as punctual as he is. On this Account, I wish you Joy. The Knowledge of this is worth all the Pains you have been at: For upon the Virtue of your Officers, depends the Happiness of your State. This Answer at once surprized and pleased the King. He discovered his Satisfaction to the Queen, and told her that there was indeed no other Ti pe yá. You guessed right, continued he, for it was he who passed by. The thing took Air, and did honour to the Queen.

Ling kong, the King of Tsi, at first married Sbing ki of the Kingdom of Lú. By her he had a Son named Quang, whom he designed should be his Successor. Sbing ki being dead, Ling kong took two Daughters of the Prince of Song; the elder Chong tse, as his Wife; the younger Yong tse, as his Concubine. Yong tse endeavoured to set aside Quang from the Succession, and to substitute in his Room Tsú, the Son of Queen Chong tse, her Sister. Yong tse actually succeeded in persuading Ling kong to agree to this Change, but the Queen Chong tse endeavoured to dissuade him from it, by representing that it was contrary to Custom, and that these Experiments had always fatal Consequences. Quang, said she, is the elder, he is appointed to succeed, and why should he be degraded without any Reason? This is deliberately seeking for Misfortunes. If I repent of it, answered the King, that is my Business. Chong tse in vain opposed it after this, and was ridiculed, as opposing the Advancement of her own Son. Ling kong pushed on by the intriguing Yong tse, declared Quang to be degraded from his Rank, appointed Tu to succeed him, and gave him Kau lyew for his Governor. Some time after, when Ling kong fell sick, and was at the Point of Death, Kau lyew made some Steps to prepare the Subjects for the advancement of Tu, but did not meet with the desired Success, for the Eyes of Ling kong were scarcely closed, when Tsui shu cut the Throat of Kau lyew, and placed Quang upon the Throne. It was then seen, that the Queen Chong tse was in the Right; and every one praised her Equity and Wisdom.

Kong shing tse pi, of the Kingdom of Lú, having inter'd his elder Brother, was touched, and even wearied out with the Lamentations of his Sister in Law. Presenting himself before the Gate of the Widow's Apartment, with a design to comfort her, he told her by way of Compliment, that she ought to moderate her Affliction, for he would take care that she should be again happily married. However, he let several Years pass without minding his Promise. The King of Sá having offered to make him one of his Ministers, he consulted with his Sister in Law, if he should accept of it or not. No! answered she, you ought not. But why ought I not, replies Tse pi? Do you ask why, said she? My Husband was scarce buried, when you came and told me by way of Comfort, That you would marry me again. This was ridiculously unseasonable, and a flagrant Violation of the Rites. My Mourning has been over for several Years, and you have neither done nor said any thing, in order to know my present Disposition. This is not acting like a Man of Sense. Can a Man who is capable of these Kind of Faults, sustain with Honour, the Post of a Minister? For my Share, I think he cannot.

If you wanted to be married again, answered Tse pi, why did you not tell me so yourself? A Woman ought never to make these Kind of Advances, answered the Widow: They upon whom she depends, ought to make them for her. Besides, what I have said, does not proceed from the Desire I have to a second Marriage, for it has always been my Aversion. It is only to make you sensible, how incapable you are of the Post that is offered you. A Man, who pretends to judge of Colours with his Eyes shut, must be deceived. Is not this true? I tell you Sir, the Cases are parallel. If a Man like you, who does not understand even the most common Things of Life, should pretend to be a Minister of State, he cannot fail to draw down upon himself the Curses of Men, and the Chastisement of Tyen. Beware of this, and take my Advice, not to accept of the Post.

Tse pi did not mind his Sister in Law, whom he heard only by way of Amusement. He accepted of the Post of Minister, and before the Year was expired, he died under the Hands of an Executioner. When he was dying, he did Justice to the Zeal and the Wisdom of his Sister in Law, whose Advice he had looked upon as a Piece of Female Revenge.

Ngay vang, King of Wey, seeing the Hereditary Prince at an Age of having Children, caused young Ladies to be sought out, who might be raised to the Rank of his Wives. Amongst those who were brought to Court, there was one that pleased Ngay vang, who sent the others to the Palace of the Hereditary Prince, and caused her to enter into his own. Tu eul, a Lord of the Court, told this Fact to his Mother. That is impossible, said she, it is a strange Disorder. You ought to oppose it strenuously. Alas! The Kingdom has powerful Enemies, whose Forces are vastly superior to hers. A perfect Virtue may supply some Deficiency in Point of Strength; this has frequently happened: But what must become of a State, whose Prince is destitute both of Strength and Virtue? The poor Prince does not perceive, for want of Understanding, he does not perceive the Wrong he does. You, and your Colleagues, ought to make him sensible of it. The Interest of your Families being joined to the Welfare of the State, you have a double Obligation upon you, to admonish him, that you may prevent, as much as lies in your Power, the Consequences

Love of Justice in a Queen.

A Widow's Zeal for her Prince's Honour.

Consequences of such an Injustice. If others are too cowardly to speak out, you, my Son, ought not to be wanting in your Duty. Speak out, this is a Duty you owe to the Prince, of whom you are a Servant, and to the State of which you are a Member.

Yu cul, animated by his Mother's Words, sought a favourable Opportunity of discoursing with the Prince. But before it presented, he was sent to the Court of Tsi, upon a pressing Negotiation. His Mother seeing that her Son had left the Court, without being able to speak with the Prince, caused herself to be carried to the Gate of the Palace. There she lifted aloft a Petition as usual, the Contents of which were, The Widow of Kyo yo has somewhat at Heart, which troubles her. She wants to communicate it to his Majesty. The King ordered she should be introduced to his Presence. As soon as she entered, addressing herself to the King, Sir, said she, your Servant has always heard the exact Observance of the Rites, especially of those due from Man to Woman, reckoned among those things that are of the greatest Importance to the Good of a State. Our Sex has commonly more Softness than Resolution. Doubtless on that Account it is, that the Rites ordain, that Maidens should be early married. Fifteen Years of Age is the common Time of betrothing, and twenty, of consummating the Marriage. But according to these same Rites, when a Maiden receives the Presents that are made her, she is looked upon as the Spouse of him, on whose Account she accepts them. There are certain Ceremonies to be observed on this Head; and in all Times, our wisest Princes have given the Pattern; Experience, having often shewn us that thereon depends the Happiness and the Unhappiness of States. As much as Ton shan contributed to establish the Hya Dynasty, so much did Mo bi promote its Ruin. We may say the same thing of Sin and Tan ki, with Regard to the Shang Dynasty: And of Tay tse and Pau tse, with Regard to the Chew Dynasty. Yet you, Sir, contrary to the Rites, take to yourself a Wife who was destined for your Heir; and without remembering that your Kingdom is surrounded with powerful Neighbours, and cannot subsist if the least Confusion happen, you yourself are introducing a Disorder.

The King having attentively heard this Remonstrance: I am in the Wrong, said he: And immediately he caused the Woman he designed to keep for himself, to remove to the Apartment where the Wives of the Hereditary Prince were. He gave a considerable Present to this Widow, who alone had the Courage to admonish him. And when Yu cul had returned from executing his Commission, he advanced him from the Regard he had to his Mother. Ever after that time, Ngay yang applied himself a great deal more to, and was more exact in, all his Duties. He established such Order in his Household and in his Kingdom, that his Neighbours, tho' powerful, and very ill affected towards him, durst never attack him. This Action did a great deal of honour to the virtuous Mother of Yu cul.

A young Woman of Shin, was promised to a young Man of Fong. When they were both marriageable, the young Man and his Relations came to demand the young Lady, but without making the regulated Presents, or observing the Ceremonies; so that the betrothed Spouse refused to leave her Father's House. As they were pressing her to get over these Formalities. It is a common Saying, answered she, That a good Beginning is of Importance in all Undertakings; and that a Fault which at first appears slight, may have fatal Consequences. What holds true, continued she, in every thing, can it prove false in Marriage? Were not the Duties betwixt Man and Wife, the first that subsisted among Mankind? And are they not the most important of all the Duties of civil Life? Besides, the End of Marriage is to support Families, and as much as possible, to perpetuate the Honours prescribed by the Rites to our Ancestors, by giving them Posterity. But it is a common and a true Saying, That the Water, whose Spring is muddy, can never have a clear Stream. Therefore I never shall marry against the Rites. A Law-suit was then commenced, and she suffered a great deal, but she continued obstinate, in saying, that she would rather part with her Life, than give her Consent. So she lived a Maid all her Life.

Pe i, the Daughter of Swen kong, King of Lü, was promised to Kong quang, the Prince of Song. The time appointed for the Nuptials being come, Kong quang did not himself come to take away Pe i, and was satisfied with sending a Nobleman as his Proxy. But Pe i refused to go along with him; tho' at last, in Obedience to her Father and Mother, she consented. At the End of three Months, the Prince of Song having performed the usual Ceremonies, of seeing his new Spouse in the Hall of his Ancestors, he wanted to consummate the Marriage. But Pe i refused to allow him, because he had not observed the Rites in fetching her away. In order to induce her to consent, he was obliged to procure a pressing Order from the King her Father, and the Queen her Mother. Ten Years after, she became a Widow. In this State of Life, as before, she preserved always an extreme Attachment to the Rites.

One Night her Palace being on Fire; Save yourself, Madam, cried one, the Fire gains Ground. According to the Rites, answered she, a Woman in my Condition, ought not to appear even in her Hall, without two of her Maids of Honour. I wait for them, and then I will remove: The one came, but the other did not appear. They cried to the Princess again, to save herself, but she would not consent till the last Extremity: All the Princes of that Age, praised and admired her Constancy.

A Lady of Song, being married to a Native of Tjay, the Husband was seized with a dangerous Disease. The Mother of the Wife, wanted to recal her Daughter home to her. No! answered the young Lady, I look upon this Accident that has happen'd to my Husband, as happening to myself. Besides, it is usual for a Woman to live and die in the same House where she has been once placed. I will take care not to remove, for a troublesome Distemper with which my Husband is unhappily seized. When our Relations are sick, if the Physicians prescribe for them the Herb Few and the Herb I, we immediately go to gather them; and however noxious the Smell of these Herbs are, we fill our Hands with them, and put them into our Bosom if it is needful, in order to extract from them the Juice: Ought I to do less for my Husband? Every one praised this young Woman; and her Mother made what she said upon the Herbs Few and I, the Subject of an Ode which she composed in her Praises.

Mong i, the Daughter of Wba, was promised to Hyau kong, the Prince of Tsi. This Prince frequently endeavoured to get the Bride home without so many Ceremonies, but she would never consent to this. As Hyau kong delay'd making the nuptial Presents, and doing the usual Ceremonies, he was nick-named the Chaste. This hastened him to defray the Expences of his Nuptials; and he came according to the Rites, in Person, to carry Mong i from the House of her Father Wba. Mong i being informed three times, that Hyau kong was come in Person, suffered herself to be conducted to her Spouse's House. When she came thither, every thing passed according to the Rites, and her Delicacy had Reason to be satisfied.

But some Years after, Hyau kong going to Lyang sye, wanted Mong i to go along with him; the Chariot which carried her over-turned, and broke in Pieces, yet Mong i was not wounded. Hyau kong immediately sent off one of the best Chariots in his Equipage, to conduct her back to Tsi, for fear of some other Accident happening to her. But this Chariot not being a Woman's, Mong i would not go into it; and speaking through the Curtain which she had drawn up, to the Officer, who was sent to her by the King: A Woman of my Rank, said she, never appears, even in a Hall, without her two Maids of Honour. Does she pass from one Apartment into another? She must let the Noise, which she makes on purpose with the Ornaments of her Cloaths, to be heard. Tho' she seldom goes abroad; yet when she does, the Rites prescribe what shall be her Cloaths, and what her Equipage. All this is wisely established, both for preserving exterior Appearances, as for keeping the Mind and the Heart upright. But this Chariot that is brought me, is not in Order, and I cannot use it. To stay longer here, is still worse. Death is the speediest Course, and I will rather die than do any thing against the Rites. The Officer galloped back, to report this Discourse to the King. A suitable Chariot was immediately fitted up, in which Mong i returned to Tsi.

Chau vang, King of Tsi, going abroad in a Voyage of Pleasure, carried along with him one of his Wives, a Daughter of the King of Tsi. One Day, as he left her in a pretty agreeable little Island, on the Banks of the great River Kyang, he received News, that the Water had risen very high, all of a sudden. Upon this, he immediately dispatched some Lords, to bring the Princess from the Place she was then in. These Lords rode in Post-haste to the Princess, to desire her to make all the haste she could out of the Island, and to repair to the Place where the King was, and whether they had Orders to conduct her. When the King calls for me, answered she, he gives his Seal to them whom he sends off. Have you the Seal? The Fear, least the Waters should overtake you, answered they, made us set out in haste, and neglect that Precaution. Then you must return, answered she, for I won't follow you without it. As they represented to her, that the Rise of the Water was very sudden, and in all Appearance would be very great; if they should return for the Seal, it would be impossible for them to return in time. I see plainly, answered she, that by following you, I save my Life, and by remaining here, I perish. But to pass over a Matter of such Importance, that I may escape Death, would be to fail in Fidelity and Courage at the same time. It is much better for me to die. They then set out in haste to get the Seal; but notwithstanding all the Diligence they used, the Island was laid under Water when they returned, and the Princess, with all her Attendants were drowned. The King regretted her mightily, but he yet more praised her Fidelity and Constancy.

Pe kong, King of Tsi, being dead, the King of U being informed of the Wisdom, Virtue, and Beauty of his Widow, sent off a Nobleman to her with a large Sum, two Diamonds of a vast value, and thirty Chariots well equipt, to court her for his Wife. In the Life-time of my Spouse, said she, while he was acting abroad, I did my best to regulate the Inside of his House; I likewise was employed with his other Wives, in the Works that are proper for our Sex. At present, having lost my Husband, I design to pass the Remainder of the Days that Tyen shall give me, near his Tomb. I know the Value of the Rank which your Master offers me: His Presents to invite me, are magnificent, but I cannot accept of the Honour he offers me, without rendering myself unworthy of it; for it would make me forget my deceased Husband, whom I want to honour in Death as I used to do in Life. The Grief of having lost him, ought to have deprived me of Life; and it is failing in Point of Affection, that I have been able to survive him: I often reproach myself for it, but I will take care not to forget myself so far, as to marry another. Carry back your King's Presents, and retire yourself. The King of U, praised the Resolution of this Princess, and honoured her with the Name of (*) Chin ki.

Ling vang, the King of Wey, died without leaving Children by the Queen his Wife, but left a Son by another of his Wives of the second Order, who was immediately declared King. This Promotion made no Alteration in the Mother, who knew how to preserve her Rank. She honoured and served the Queen Dowager, without in the least relaxing in her Cares. And the young King, after his Mother's Example, did the same. At the End of eight Years, the Queen (*) Chin, signifies Chaste; Ki, a Queen, famous in first Antiquity.

A Queen dies to satisfy an obdurate Ob-servance of the Rites.

taking the Mother of this Prince aside, said to her: I am charmed, both with the Manner in which you treat me, and the Care with which you inculcate on the Prince your Son, the same Sentiments: Perhaps I have been in the Wrong to admit of your Services so long, at least, it is now time to return you Thanks. Your Son is on the Throne; and it is not convenient, that the Mother of a King should serve in the Quality of a second Wife. I am a Widow without Children. It is enough for me, if I am suffered to pass the Remainder of my Days quietly here. I am positively resolved to quit this Apartment of Honour, to yield it to you, and never enter into it but at certain times, that I may have the Happiness to see you.

What are you telling me, answered the Mother of the young King? Give me Leave to say, that you have not thought well of the Affair; the King your Spouse, and my Master, had the Misfortune to die young: A hard Fate for a Prince! He was not so happy as to have a Son by his Wife; he had only one by me, who was but his Servant: This was another Matter of Grief to him when he was dying. What! would you give him a third after his Death, by degrading his Wife, to honour his Servant? Do you reflect upon this? It is a common and a true Saying, that the Zeal of a good Subject, and the Piety of a dutiful Son, ought never to relax with the Number of Years. It is as little allowable for me to be weary of the Rank which I hold with Regard to you. It is my Duty to honour and to serve you. If there is any Honour in having given a Successor to your Husband, this Honour cannot free me from what I owe you, as his Wife.

Do not let us talk more, answers the Queen, of what you and I were under the late King, my Husband. His, and your Son, is now upon the Throne: Therefore, notwithstanding the Frankness with which you offer to pay me Honours and Services, I cannot accept of them, without doing a Kind of Injury to the Prince, in the Person of his Mother.

The Concubine made no Reply: But going to the King her Son, Sir, said she, I have always heard, that a wise Man ought never to suffer any thing that is irregular: Regularity, in my Opinion, partly consists, in maintaining the ancient Rites, so as that every one may keep their proper Rank. Yet the Queen Consort of your Father, wants to quit her own Apartment, and presses me to take upon me the Rank which she holds at Court. This is pressing me to act irregularly: But I will rather die than do it: And as I see the Queen cannot be moved by my Remonstrances, I will move her by my Death. When she had spoken thus, she put herself in a Posture to give herself a mortal Blow, but she was prevented. The King then dissolving into Tears, endeavoured to appease her, but she would not consent to live, till the Queen, being informed of her Resolution, promised her, but with regret, to preserve her own Rank, and to allow her to serve and honour her, as formerly. All the World was surprized and charmed, to see how forward these two Women were to pay a mutual Deference, the one to the other. This deserves the Name of Wisdom, and of a Virtue worthy the Encomiums of all Ages.

Surprising
Chastity.

A young Lady of singular Beauty, and of approved Merit, lost her Husband when she was very young. The richest Men in the Kingdom courted her very earnestly, but all in vain. The King himself hearing of her Virtue and Beauty, courted her in form, and sent to her a great Officer, with the ordinary Presents. Her Answer was as follows: My Husband, tis true, soon left me a Widow, but I never will have another. I have wished to have followed him, but he has left me a Son whom I must educate. Many have courted me, but all in vain; and when I thought myself delivered from their Importunities, the King himself renews them. Is it possible still to doubt, whether I will forget my deceased Husband, so far as to take another, and to sacrifice my Duty to a splendid Fortune? I want to prove in good earnest, that I am not capable of so much Meanness, and to undeceive every one, who does not know my Sentiments upon this Head.

After she had spoken in this Manner, she took a Mirror in one Hand, and a Razor in the other, and cut off her own Nose. Now, says she, I am punished, for having suffered so many People to doubt of my Resolution. Carry this Answer to the King, That if I do not put myself to Death, it is because I have not Courage to leave my Son at so tender an Age. What I have done, is sufficient. It was doubtless for my Beauty, that the King courted me. Tell him, that my Face is now only the Figure of Deformity and Ugliness, and then he will easily desist. The Officer related to the King what he had seen. The Prince praised the Resolution of the young Widow, gave her the Title of Kau king, and decreed her other Honours.

A young Officer of Chin, married a Girl of sixteen Years of Age; but a War suddenly breaking out soon after, he was obliged to serve in the Campaign. Before he left his Wife, he said to her: It is uncertain whether I shall live or die. How can I be sure that I shall escape the Dangers of this War? I leave you my Mother in Law, who has no other Child but me; in case I die, what shall become of her? Do you promise me, that you will take care of her? Yes, answers the Wife, I do promise.

A faithful
Widow.

The Officer having actually died in the War, the young Widow took very great care of her Mother in Law, working Night and Day with her own Hands, that she might want for nothing. The three Years of Mourning being over, as she was young and childless, her Father and Mother wanted to bring her back to their House, that they might marry her a second Time, but she rejected the Proposal with great Resolution. Faithfulness and Justice, said she to them, are our principal Duties; when you married me, you yourselves recommended nothing to me, so much as Affection and Obedience to my Husband. But you know that that dear Man when he went to the War, where he lost his Life, express'd to me the Uneasiness his Piety gave him, with Regard

Regard to what should become of his Mother in case she lost him; and asked me if I would promise him to take care of her. This I promised; but besides my promise, there is a Duty incumbent on a Daughter in Law, to serve her Mother in Law. My Husband's Death, far from freeing me from this Duty, puts me under fresh Obligations to perform it. Not to discharge it would render me guilty of Unfaithfulness and Injustice, my dearest Husband will pass for an undutiful Son, who had neglected to provide effectually for the Support of his Mother, and who lightly trusted to a faithful Wife. Let me die rather than expose my Husband or my self to such Reproaches.

The Father and the Mother, seeing the Daughter resolute, spoke no more of marrying her a second Time. The Mother in Law liv'd 28 Years longer, she supplying her Necessities, and diligently serving her, to her last Breath. And after her Death, she paid her the last Duties, and omitted nothing with Regard to the appointed Ceremonies. The Constancy, Faithfulness, and Diligence of this Widow in serving her Mother in Law, procured her a great deal of Esteem. The Magistrate of Whay yang related them at Court, and the then reigning Emperor, sent her forty Pounds Weight of Gold, gave her the Title of (*) Hyau sú, and decreed her other Honours.

Vú vong King of Lú, having gone to pay his Homages to the Emperor Suen gang, caused his eldest Son Ko, and his second Son Hi, to attend him. Suen gang had no great Notion of the elder of these two Brothers, but took a great liking for the younger, so that he appointed him Successor to the King his Father. In effect, when Vú kong died, Hi mounted his Throne, and reigned under the Name of I kong. He had a Son who was afterwards King, and named Hyau kong, but his Name in his infancy was Ching. This Child being yet in his Cradle, Pé yu the Son of (A) Ko, formed a Faction in the Kingdom, kill'd his Uncle I kong who was then reigning, caused himself be proclaimed King by his Party, and broke into the Palace; that he might dispatch the little Ching.

At the first Noise of this Assault, the Governess of the young Prince stript him of his Cloaths, A Loyal and put them upon her own Child, whom she laid in the Royal Cradle. The Rebels kill'd this Child, and being persuaded that it was Prince Ching, neglected the Rest, so that the Governess escaped with the young Prince in her Arms. She scarce got out of the Palace when she met one of the great Lords of the Kingdom; who was Uncle by the Mother's side to the young Prince. Governess, said this Lord to her a-part, is my Nephew Ching dead? No! Sir, said she, here he is, I have put my own Son into the Prince's Cradle, and they have Murdered the One instead of the Other. This Nobleman then gave the Governess an Opportunity to escape safely with the Prince: He remained concealed for eleven Years; at the end of which, all the great Men of Lú unanimously address the Emperor that Pé yu should be put to Death; and the young Prince raised to the Throne of his Father. The Emperor's Consent being obtained Ching was acknowledged King of Lú. When his Accession to the Throne was celebrated, the Governess, who had saved his Life at the expence of her own Blood, was not forgotten.

After Ching wang King of Tsé had mounted the Throne, he placed himself upon an Eminence, where he might see all the Women who were appointed to Lodge in his Palace pass by. Every one raised their Eyes to him, some more, and some less boldly, that they might look at the Prince as they passed. One Woman named Tsé vú, always kept her Eyes upon the Ground and modestly passed by without giving the least sign of Curiosity or Uneasiness. Ching wang being struck with this Modesty, and wanting to amuse himself a little; Young Beauty, who are passing by, said he, I beg you would give me one Glance. Tsé vú did not seem to hear him but went on, her Eyes being still fix'd on the Ground: Ching wang would not rest here; One Glance, said he, and I will make you my Wife; but Tsé vú never raised her Eyes. The Prince added, that he would give her a certain Sum of Money, and raise her Family. His Promises never moved her: At last Ching wang came down from the Eminence, that he might approach and talk more conveniently to her. What, said he, I offer to make you my Wife, together with other Advantages, if you will look at me as you go by, yet you obstinately refuse to do it. Do you then put so high a Price upon your Looks.

Great Sir, answer'd Tsé vú gravely, Bashfulness and Modesty are the Ornaments of our Sex; I thought it was against Decency, and against my Duty, to raise my Eyes to look at you on the Eminence whereon you was placed. This at first made me keep my Eyes on the Ground: If I had raised them afterwards on the magnificent Promises you were pleased to make me, I then had acted from Ambition and Interest, and sacrificed my Duty to these two Passions, and thereby render'd myself unworthy the Honour you did me. These are my Excuses, and the Motives of my Conduct. Ching wang, being charmed with her Answer, took her for his Wife.

Tsé declared War against Lú. The Army of Tsé encamping on the Frontiers of Lú, the Centinels saw a Woman, who was holding one Child in her Arms, and dragging another after her by the Hand, flying towards the Mountains. Some Soldiers running after her, she quitted the Child she was carrying, took up the other and redoubled her Pace. The Child whom she had quitted, followed at a Distance, and cried so pitifully that it was enough to melt the Hearts of the Soldiers; the Woman however fled without once looking back. The General of the Army of Tsé who was hard by, ask'd the Child, whom they took up, if the Woman who fled was his Mother. The Child answer'd that she was. They then ask'd, if the Child whom the Mother carry'd away was his elder or younger Brother. The Child reply'd that he was no Brother (*) Hyau filial Piety. Fá a Woman who is, or has been Married. (A) It is Kia in the French.

Brother of his. The General's Curiosity was raised; and he ordered two Horsemen to gallop after the Woman full Speed, and to bring her back, which was immediately done.

When she came up; Whose is that Child, said the General to her, whom you carry in your Arms; and whose is the Child whom you dropt when you fled? The Child I carry, answer'd she, is the Child of my elder Brother, and the Child I left behind me is my own Son; finding myself closely pursued and despairing to be able to save both, I quitted my own Child. How! said the General, can any thing be dearer to a Mother than her own Child? Did you quit your own, to save your Brother's Son. My Lord, answer'd the Woman, I thought it was my Duty to sacrifice my Tendernefs, and my private Interest, to the common good of my Family. If by following another Course, I had escaped from your Soldiers, and saved my Son, by quitting my Brother's Child, I must have been look'd upon as an interested Person: And then adieu to my Reputation. Our Prince and all his Subjects have a mortal Hatred of all Self-interest.

Upon this Answer; the General caused the Van of his Army, which was then advancing, to halt: told the Woman that she might return Home with her Son and her Nephew; and immediatly dispatched an Officer to the Court of Tsi, with this Letter to his Prince.

"Your Majesty has committed to me the Conquest of Lü: But I take the Liberty, to represent to you, before I engage my self farther in that Enterprize: That it is not time to undertake it. Even the Country-women of this Kingdom know and observe the Maxim of sacrificing all private Interest to the publick Good; what kind of Men therefore must the great Men of the Kingdom, and the Officers of War, be? The Officer whom I send with this, will relate to your Majesty an Adventure which proves what I had the Honour to write to you."

Upon this Letter and the Recital of the Story, an Order came for the Army to retire. The King of Lü being informed of what past, made handsome Presents to this Woman, and gave her the Surname of (*) Iney. The Chinese Historian has here the following Exclamation; Behold the force of perfect Disinterestedness, it having saved, by means of a Country Woman, a whole Kingdom.

A generous Mother.

Under the Reign of Sweng wang, as the Horse Guards were scouring the Country, they met with the Body of a Man newly slain, and at some Paces from the Body, two Brothers, whom they took to be the Authors of the Murder. The Affair coming to be examined into, it was found that the Deceased had receiv'd but one Wound; from whence they concluded, that he had not been struck at all by one of the two Brothers. The Question then was, which of them had given him his mortal Wound. This was a difficult Point to clear up; for the elder Brother said, 'Twas I. The younger on the contrary maintained, that his elder Brother was innocent, and that he alone was Guilty. The inferior Tribunals carried the Affair before the Minister who made his Report to the Emperor.

To set both free, said the Prince, would be to pardon the Murderer and to countenance a Crime. To condemn them both to Death, would be against the Law, since it appears from the Wound that one of them is innocent: A Thought is come into my head; their Mother must know them better than any body else. One of them must die, but which of them, is the Question. This is the Point, for which we must have recourse to their Mother. The Minister having caused the Mother to be called; One of your Sons, said he, has killed a Man and his Guilt must be expiated by his Death; each of them excuses his Brother and takes the Crime upon himself. The Affair has been brought before the Prince, who has pronounced Sentence of Death against one of them, but has referred it to you which of the two shall die.

The poor Woman dissolving into Tears; If there is a Necessity, says she, that one of them must die, let it be the younger. The Minister having caused her to put her answer in Writing, did not fail to testify his Surprise how she came to prefer the elder; contrary to the usual Custom of Women, who generally love their youngest Children best. He therefore told her that he was curious to know why she behaved in that Manner.

My Lord answered she, of these two Brothers, the younger only is my Son, the elder being of a former Wife; but I promised to my deceased Husband, that I would look upon him as my own Son, and hitherto I have been as good as my Word. But to save the younger and not the elder would be to break that Word; and to listen only to the Dictates of interested Tendernefs. The Choice I have made, tho' I think it is a right one, has cost me dear. These last Words were interrupted with Sighs and Sobs. The Minister himself could scarce refrain from Tears, and went away to make his Report to the King, who, in Consideration of the Mother, whose Virtue and generous Disinterestedness he highly praised, pardoned both the Brothers.

A Murder
Prudently prevented by a serving Maid.

One of the Country Literati having a Post at Court, left his Wife at home. A Neighbour of his laid hold on this Occasion to enter into a Criminal Correspondence with her; but knowing that her Husband was expected every Hour back, he seem'd to fear least the Intrigue should be discovered at his Return, and he express his Repentment by some fatal Blow. I will take care of that, answer'd the Wife, for I design to prepare a poisoned Wine, of which I will make him drink. The Husband returned in a few Days, and his Wife talked to him thus. You have been much fatigued, and you must rest yourself, I have got some Wine for you, there is not much of it, but it is excellent in its kind. Bring that Flaggon, continued she to her Maid, and let my Husband taste a little of that Wine. The Servant was much puzzled what to do, she

(*) I, signifies Disinterestedness, a disinterested Person; Ney, the generous Sister, youngest Sister, as if we should say, a disinterested Sister, or she knew that the Wine was poisoned, she had not the Heart to dispatch her Master, nor would she discover her Mistress's Crime. At last she fell on an Expedient which was, to let the Flaggon fall on purpose, and the Wine to run about the Floor. Her Master who was naturally passionate and ignorant of the Service she had done him, used her very ill several Days after; and her Mistress, fearing lest she should discover her, found several Pretexes to beat her cruelly, designing to kill her, by her Blows.

While all this was doing, the Husband being inform'd by one of his Brothers, about his Wife's Conduct, and the Poison which she was said to have prepared for him, began to reflect upon what pass'd in his House, when he returned home, and to look on it as a strong Proof of the Truth of the Information. He caus'd his Wife to be beaten to Death with those very Rods, which she had employ'd to murder her Maid. He then ask'd the Girl why she had not discovered the Truth rather than to suffer her self to be used so ill. I took care not to do that, answer'd she, for thereby my Mistress must have lost both her Life and her Character, and I chose to die my self rather than that should happen. Her Master, partly from Esteem and partly out of Gratitude for having saved his Life, wanted to take her for his Wife, but she would not consent. My Mistress dy'd shamefully, said she, and I ought not to survive her; how dare I presume to take her Place? No! I will rather kill myself. He Master was then satisfied with making her considerable Presents, and endeavouring to marry her agreeably. When the Thing was known in the Neighbourhood, a great Number courted her for Marriage.

A rich Man named Cbu yay having lost his Wife, who left him only a Daughter very young, married again. Having some very fine Pearls, he gave them to his second Wife, who made them into Bracelets, and six Years after Cbu yay dy'd in a strange Country. His Wife in the Excess of her Grief and Lamentation, threw aside her Bracelets of Pearls, which a young Girl of nine Years of Age, her Daughter by a former Husband, took up from the Ground, and without any bodies Knowledge put them into a Box, in which her Mother kept her looking Glass, and other little Affairs which she did not use during the time of her Mourning. When her Brothers and other Friends heard of her Husband's Death, they visited the Widow, and then they were all to set out in search of the Body of the Deceas'd; that they might carry it to the Burying-place of his Ancestors. When they were on their Journey, they came to a Custom-House, where it was Death to every Person in whose Possession any Pearls should be found. The Box [which it seems the Widow had carried a long with her] being search'd, the Pearl Bracelets were found in it. The Crime is evident, said the Officer of the Customs, we must now know who is the Criminal. (*) Tju being afraid for her Mother in Law to whom the Box belonged, addressing her self to the Officer, It is I, said she, who ought to be punished, you need seek for no other Criminal. How can that be, said the Officer who was obliged to make a verbal Tryal of it. When my Father dy'd, answer'd Tju, my Mother in Law threw the Bracelets away, and I thinking they were of Value, gathered them up and put them into this Box without her Knowledge. The Declaration of Tju was reported to the Mother in Law, who immediately came running to know how Matters stood. Yes, my Mother, said the Girl, you threw away these Bracelets, and with your Knowledge, I gathered them up and put them into this Box. They are now seized at this Custom-house, for which Crime the Law inflicts the Pains of Death, and I ought to suffer. Tju was so confident in what she asserted, that her Mother in Law almost believ'd she spoke the Truth.

However, thro' Tenderness and Compassion, she interrupted the Officer who had taken the Evidence of Tju. Sir, said she, I beg you would hear me; My Daughter is not guilty, and you are not to regard what she says. The Bracelets belong to me, and not to her: When my Husband died, I put them into this Box: Grief, Cares, and Fatigues, made me forget where they were, so that I am guilty, and ought to be punished. No, answered the Daughter resolutely, it was I who locked up the Bracelets: It was I, replied the Mother; my Daughter speaks only thus out of Affection for me, and to save me at the Expence of her own Life. My Lord, answered the Girl, My Mother, out of Compassion for me, has taken upon herself a Crime, of which she is not guilty, and exposes her own, to save my Life. In short, neither being able to vanquish the other in this generous Combat, they embraced one another mutually, endeavouring to get the better by their Sighs and Tears. All the Relations were in Tears at this Sight, the most indifferent Spectators could not forbear weeping, and even the Commissary of the Custom-House, let the Papers drop from his Hands.

The President of this Tribunal himself said weeping, Behold, an amiable Generosity of a Mother and a Daughter. Their Dispute is which shall die. As for me, I will suffer Death myself, if there is Occasion, rather than condemn either the one or the other. He then threw the Pearls on the Ground, sent off the whole Company, and ranked this Crime among those whose Authors are unknown. The Company held on in their Journey; and some time after it was known, that the Girl of nine Years of Age had locked up the Pearls, without any one's Knowledge. Thereby the generous Affection of the Tju, and her Mother in Law, was the more valued.

The above Examples are translated from an ancient Collection, whose Author lived 2000 Years ago.

(*) This was the Name of the young Girl, who was then thirteen Years of Age.

If we were to peruse the particular Histories of their Cities, we might find many more ; for, as I have mentioned elsewhere, the Custom in China, is for each City to print the History and Annals of its own District.

These Histories are divided into different Chapters, according to their different Contents. The first exhibits a Map of the Place, with its Situation after their Fashion ; another enumerates the Commodities produced by their Country : And a third, points out the Tribute that is paid to the Emperor. The fourth, the Number of Families it contains. The fifth, the ancient Monuments, if there are any such, in the District : And the last Chapters, the illustrious Men or Women, distinguished by their extraordinary Merit, or any shining Instance of Virtue.

The great Number of these pretended Heroines, which they mention, are young Widows, who put themselves to Death to avoid a second Marriage, to whom they were to be forced.

We likewise see Examples of many others, who were distinguished by their filial Piety, by their Modesty, and by the Constancy with which they suffered Death even in the Flames, rather than to run the least Risque of being dishonoured.

As all we propose, in relating these different Histories, is to give the Reader a Knowledge of the Manner and Learning of the Chinese Nation, and of the Heroism attributed to the Fair Sex, we thought it best to confine ourselves to these few Examples, and the rather so, because in the Books which we have mentioned, the Stories are much of the same kind, and generally told in a dry tedious Manner.

OF THE

RELIGION

CHINESE.

TH E R E are three principal Sects in the Empire of China: 1. The Sect of the Learned, who follow the Doctrine of the antient Books, and look upon Confucius as their Master: 2. That of the Disciples of Lau kyun, which is nothing but a Mixture of Extravagances and Impieties: And 3. That of Idolaters, who worship a God called Fo or Foe, whose Opinions were brought from the Indies into China, about 32 Years after the Crucifixion of Christ.

Three Religions among the Chinese.

Of these Sects, the first only make Profession of a regular Study, in order to advance themselves to the Degrees and Dignities of the Empire, by means of Merit, Wit, and Learning, proper for the Conduct of Life, and the Government of the Empire.

The second has degenerated into a kind of Magic and Enchantment; for the Disciples of this Sect pretend to the Art of making Gold, and of rendering Persons immortal.

The third is nothing but a Heap of Fables and Superstitions, derived from the Indians, and maintained by the Bonzas, who deceive the People under a false Appearance of Piety: They have introduced the Belief of the Metempsychosis, or Transmigration of Souls from one Body to another, which they promise shall be more or less for their Advantage in proportion to the Liberality that is shewn to themselves.

That I may give some Information concerning these different Sects, I shall follow the Order of Time in which they took their Rise, and observe their Progress successively amongst the People. In doing which, I shall relate nothing but what is taken from the Chinese History, or the Memoirs of Persons of Judgment and Sincerity, who are well versed in the Language and Learning of China, where they have spent most Part of their Lives. Nor shall I act any other Part than merely that of an Historian, who confines himself to plain Facts; without entering into Discussions, which have already afforded Matter for so many Volumes, and occasioned Divisions, the Consequences whereof have been too fatal to the Propagation of the [ Romish ] Faith in this vast Empire.

Of the Worship of the Antient Chinese.

IT is a common Opinion, and universally received, amongst those who have searched after the Original of this antient Empire, that the Sons of Noah having dispersed themselves over the Eastern Parts of Asia, some of his Descendants penetrated into China, about 200 Years after the Deluge, and there founded this vast Monarchy; that these first Planters, instructed by a Tradition so nearly handed, concerning the Grandeur and Power of the Supreme Being, taught their Children, and through them their numerous Posterity, to fear and and honour the Sovereign Lord of the Universe, and to live according to the Principles of the Law of Nature, engraven in their Hearts.

Chinese Canonical Books.

Of this, we find Traces in those ancient and valuable Books, which the Chinese call, by way of Eminence, The five Volumes; being the Canonical, or Classical Books of the highest Rank, which they look upon as the Source of all their Science and Morality.

However, these Books are not professed Treatises of Religion purposely made to instruct the People; for they only contain Part of their History. The Authors do not attempt to prove what they advance, but only draw natural Consequences from Principles already allowed, considering those Opinions as fundamental Truths, on which all the rest are built. For which Reason, by the Doctrine contained in these Books, we are best able to discover the System of Religion among the Chinese, and what was the real Object of their Worship.

Their Drift political.

Upon a general View it appears, that the Drift of these Classical Books was to maintain Peace and Tranquillity in the State, by a Regulation of Manners, and an exact Obedience to the Laws: And that to attain this End, the ancient Chinese judged two Things necessary to be observed: viz. The Duties of Religion, and the Rules of good Government.

Chinese worship Shang ti, or Tien.

The chief Object of their Worship was the Supreme Being, the Lord and Sovereign Principle of all Things; whom they adored under the Name either of Shang ti, that is Supreme Emperor, or Tien, which with the Chinese signifies the same Thing: Tien, say the Interpreters, is the Spirit that presides in Heaven, because Heaven is the most excellent Work produced by this first Cause. It is taken also for the material Heavens; the Sense being to be determined by the Subject to which it is applied: The Chinese say, that the Father is the Tien of the Family; the Viceroy, the Tien of the Province; and the Emperor, the Tien of the Kingdom, &c. They likewise honoured, but with a subordinate Worship, inferior Spirits, depending on the Supreme Being; which, according to them, preside over Cities, Rivers, Mountains, &c.

If from the Beginning of the Monarchy they applied themselves to Astronomy, their View in observing the Stars was only to be acquainted with their Motions, and to account for the Appearances of the visible Tien, or Heaven. We do not find that in those early Times they endeavour'd to get a thorough Knowledge of the Course and Secrets of Nature: Such over curious Enquiries have been expressly forbidden, for fear of giving Rise in so volatile and active a People to dangerous Opinions, and such Systems as would be inconsistent with the Repose of the Government, and the public Tranquillity.

Basis of their Politics.

As for their Politics, which consisted in maintaining Regularity and Purity of Manners, they reduced them to this simple Maxim: That those who command should imitate the Conduct of Tien, by treating their Inferiors as their Children; and those who obey, ought to look upon their Superiors as their Fathers.

If Shang ti, or Tien, be an intelligent Being.

But did they regard this Shang ti, or Tien, who was the Object of their Worship, as an Intelligent Being, as the Lord and Creator of Heaven, Earth, and all Things? Is it not likely, that their Vows and Homage were addressed to the visible material Heaven; or, at least, to a Celestial Virtue, void of Understanding, and inseparable from Heaven itself? But this I shall leave to the Judgment of the Reader, and content myself with relating some Passages from the Classical Books.

Account of Tien and his Attributes, from the Shu King.

It appears, particularly from one of their Canonical Books, called Shu King, That this Tien, this first Being, the Object of Public Worship, is the Principle of all Things; the Father of the People, solely Independent, Almighty, who knows the most hidden Things, even the Secrets of the Heart; that he watches over the Government of the Universe, so that no Event happens but by his Orders; that he is holy, without Partiality, and is affected only with the Virtue of Mankind; superlatively Just, punishing Wickedness in the most signal Manner, even in Kings, whom he deposeth, setting up others in their Room, according to his Will and Pleasure: That public Calamities are the Warnings which he gives for the Reformation of Manners, which Calamities are followed by Acts of Mercy and Goodness; as for Instance, when a furious Storm has made Havock with the Harvest and the Trees, immediately after, an illustrious Innocent, some Prince Chew kong, is recalled from Banishment, justified against Slander, and restored to his former Dignity.

The World not governed by Chance, or a general Providence.

We read in the aforesaid Book the solemn Vows which they make to the Supreme Being, for obtaining Rain after a tedious Drought; or for the Recovery of a worthy Emperor, whose Life is despaired of: Which Vows, as the History relates, are generally heard. 'Tis there also acknowledged that when an impious Emperor has been struck with Lightning, it is not the mere Effect of Chance, but the visible Punishment of Heaven, and altogether extraordinary with regard to the Circumstance.

The Variety of Events are not only attributed to Tien at the Time they happen; they speak of them not only on such Occasions when Vice is suppressed and punished, but suppose that there will come a Day of Punishment, which is denounced even while the Wicked glory in their Prosperity. It appears from the Discourses of the first Sages of the Nation, that their Minds were influenced by the Persuasion (whether true or false it matters not) that Tien, by Prodigious or extraordinary Appearances, gives Notice of approaching Miseries, wherewith the State is threatened, that Men may reform their Manners, as the surest Way to appease the impending Wrath of Heaven.

It is reported of the Emperor Chew, that he rejected all the good Thoughts inspired by Tien; that he made no Account of the Prodigious, by which Tien gave him Notice of his Ruin, if he did

did not reform his Life: And when Mention is made of the Emperor Kyê, they say; If he had changed his Conduct after the Calamities sent from on high, Heaven would not have deprived him of the Empire.

It is there recorded, that two great Emperors, who were the Founders of two powerful Dynasties, and admired by Posterity for their rare Virtues, had a great Conflict in their own Minds, when it was proposed to them to ascend the Throne. On the one Side they were solicited by the Grandees of the Empire, as well as by the People; and perhaps even by the secret Motions of Ambition, hard to be distinguished from those of a more plausible Kind: On the other Side, they were withheld by the Duty and Fidelity which a Subject owes to his Prince, notwithstanding he may be very much, and that deservedly, hated. This Principle inculcated and pursued.

This inward Conflict and Uncertainty that disturbed their Minds, proceeded from the Fear of displeasing Shang ti, either by taking up Arms, as they were urged, or by refusing to take them up, in order to free the People from the Oppression under which they groaned, and put a Stop to an Inundation of Crimes: By this Proceeding, they acknowledged their Dependence to be on a Master who forbids Disloyalty, hates Tyranny, loves the People as a Father, and protects the Oppressed.

Almost every Page of the Canonical Books, and especially the Schu king, continues to inculcate this just Dread, as the most proper Curb for the Passions, and the most effectual Remedy against Vice. There likewise we see what Idea these Princes had formed of the Justice, Holiness, and Goodness of the Supreme Lord. In the Times of public Calamities, they were not satisfied with only addressing their Vows to Tyen, and offering Sacrifices, but they applied themselves carefully to inquire into their most minute and secret Faults, which might possibly have drawn down this Punishment from Tyen: They examined if they were not too expensive in their Habits, too luxurious in their Tables, too magnificent in their Equipage and Palaces; all which they resolved to reform.

One of these Princes acknowledges sincerely, that he had not pursued the salutary Thoughts inspired by Tyen. Another Reproaches himself for want of due Application to the Affairs of Government, and for having too much Fondness for innocent Amusements: He considers these Faults as sufficient to draw down on him the Anger of Tyen; and in a humble Manner, confesses them to be the Source of public Calamities. In the Canonical Book called Cbun tsyû, the Misfortunes of a Prince are spoken of as so many Punishments of Tyen, who, to make the Chastisement still greater, rendered him insensible of his Disgrace. The Schu king speaks often of a Master who presides over the Government of Empires and Kingdoms; who has an absolute Dominion over the Wills of Mankind, in order to conduct them to his own wise and just Ends; in short, who rewards and punishes Men by means of one another, without any Detriment to their Liberty.

This Persuasion was so common, that Princes, naturally jealous of their own Glory, never in the least attributed the Success of their wise Government to themselves, but referred it to the Supreme Lord, who governs the Universe; this appears from the single Instance of the Emperor Sven wang. He told the Grandees of his Court, that all the wise Ministers, who had been so useful to the State from the Foundation of the Monarchy to his Time, were so many precious Gifts granted by Tyen, in Regard to the Virtue of the Princes, and the Necessities of the People. Other Instances.

Almost from the Beginning of the Monarchy, it was appointed that the Emperor soon after his Exaltation, should humble himself so far as to plough a few Furrows, and that the Produce of his Tillage should be offered by him in sacrifice to Tyen. The Schu king relates, that the same Emperor before spoken of, having neglected this Ceremony, attributes the public Calamities thereto; and all the Grandees of his Court talked to him in the same Language.

The Emperors, Yau, Shun, Ching tang, &c. are often mentioned in the Classical Books, as Patterns of Imitation; and it is a Maxim perpetually in their Mouths, that the most wicked Man, if he makes Use of the Assistance which Tyen offers him, may attain to the Virtue of those Heroes.

These wise Emperors are represented in the same Book, in a suppliant Posture before Shang ti, deprecating the Evils wherewith their Descendants were threatened. An Emperor of their Race, declares, that his illustrious Ancestors, notwithstanding their extraordinary Talents, could never have governed the Empire as they had done, without the Assistance of Sage Ministers, whom Tyen had given them.

It is farther worth observing, that they attribute nothing to Shang ti but what is seemly, and becoming the Sovereign of the Universe. They ascribe to him Power, Providence, Knowledge, Justice, Goodness, and Clemency; they call him their Father and Lord; they honour him with Worship and Sacrifices worthy of the Supreme Being, and by the Practice of every Virtue. They likewise affirm, that all outward Adoration must fail in pleasing Tyen, if it does not proceed from the Heart, and is not animated by the inward Sentiments. Their Ideas of Shang ti.

It is said in the Schu king, that Shang ti is of infinite Understanding; that he sees from the Top of Heaven what is doing here below; that he makes Use of our Parents to bestow on us the animal and material Part, but that he himself gives an understanding Soul, capable of Reflection, which distinguishes us from Brutes; that he so loveth Virtue, that to offer him Sacrifice, it is not sufficient for the Emperor, to whom this Function belongs, to join the Priesthood to the Royal Dignity, but it is moreover necessary, that he should be either upright or penitent, and that preparatory thereto, he should expiate his Faults with Fasting and Tears; that we cannot fathom the Depth of his Designs and Counsels, and yet ought not to believe that he is too exalted to mind what passes here; that he himself examines all our Actions, and has erected a Tribunal in our own Consciences, whereby we are judged.

Emperor the chief Pontif or high Priest.

The Emperors have always thought themselves chiefly obliged to observe the primitive Rites, the solemn Functions of which belong to them alone, as being the Heads of the Nation: Thus they are Emperors to govern, Masters to teach, and Priests to sacrifice; to the End, that the Imperial Majesty humbling himself in presence of his Court, by the Sacrifices which he offers in the Name of the Empire to the Master of the World, the Sovereign Authority of the Supreme Being may still shine more resplendent, and exalted above any Equal. To this purpose we find it both in the I king and Sbu king.

None else allowed to Sacrifice to
Shang ti.

The Emperor is there say'd to be the only Person who is allowed publicly to render this solemn homage to Shang ti. Shang ti has adopted him for his Son, and appointed him the principal Heir of his Grandeur on Earth; he arms him with his Authority, charges him with his Orders, and heaps Benefits upon him. To sacrifice to the first Being of the Universe requires no less than the most exalted Person in the Empire. It is necessary that he should descend from his Throne, and humble himself in presence of Shang ti, that he might thus draw down the blessings of Heaven on his People, and cause their Vows to ascend thither. This Worship and Sacrifice have continued in being for a great many Ages; and the Chinese History takes care to inform us with how much zeal the Emperors of each Dynasty honoured the supreme Lord of the World. I shall go on with relating what we learn on this Head from the Classical Books.

Zeal of the first Emperors in performing this Rite.

Fo bi, who is supposed to have been Contemporary with Phaleg, was one the Heads of the Colony which came to settle in this extreme part of the East, and is acknowledged for the Founder of the Chinese Monarchy (A). He had nothing more at Heart than to give public Marks of a religious Veneration for the first Being. He bred in a domestic Park, six sorts of Animals to serve as Victims in his Sacrifices, which he solemnly offered twice a Year at the two Solstices, at what time the Tribunals as well as the Shops were shut up: Nor were the People even permitted on those Days to undertake any Journey; they were to think of nothing else but joining with the Prince to honour Shang ti. The Book entitled Li ki, call these two Solemnities, The Festivals of Gratitude to Tyen.

Shin nong, who succeeded Fo bi, not content with the two solstitial Sacrifices, appointed two others at the Equinoxes: The first in Spring, to influence Shang ti in favour of Agriculture, the other in Autumn, after the Harvest, the Tithe of which he ordered to be gathered, and offered the first Fruits to Shang ti. And as Fo bi had brought up six sorts of Animals for sacrificial Uses, Shin nong, out of a pious Emulation, with his own Hands cultivated the Field which furnished the Corn and Fruits for the same Sacrifices.

Whang ti, who succeeded Shin nong, shewed greater Zeal than his Predecessor; for to prevent being hindered by bad Weather, from making the usual Sacrifices in the open Field, he built a large Temple, wherein they might be offered under Shelter in all Seasons, and the People instructed in their principal Duties.

The Empress Lwi tsi, Wife of Whang ti, undertook to breed Silk-worms, and make silken Ornaments befitting those Solemnities. Without the South-gate was a vast Inclosure of arable Land, which furnished the Corn, Rice, and other Fruits appointed for the Sacrifices; and without the North-gate was another great Inclosure full of Mulberry-trees, wherein were nourished abundance of Silk-worms. The same Day that the Emperor went to till the Ground with his principal Courtiers, the Princess repaired to her Mulberry Grove with the Ladies of her Court, encouraging them by her Example to make Silks and Embroidered Works, which she set a-part for Religious Uses.

None but devout Men elected Em-perors.

The Empire becoming Elective, none were raised to the Throne but the Sons of Kings distinguished for their Wisdom, or wise Men who were Associates in the Government: But the Choice fell only upon such as performed the Duties of Religion with the greatest Veneration. It is an Honour to the Throne, (says the Sbu king) that he whom Shang ti associates to himself to govern Mankind, should represent his Virtues on Earth, and be the most perfect Image of them.

This Motive alone induced Whang ti to consent, that his Son should succeed him with the Title of Sbau hau, that is to say, young Fo bi; because from his Infancy he had been a zealous Imitator of the Virtues of the first Founder of the Empire, Tay hau Fo bi.

The Sequel made it appear that they were not deceived in their Choice: For he increased the Pomp and Solemnity of the Sacrifice offered to Shang ti, by harmonious Concerts of Music. His Reign was peaceable and quiet; only the last Years of it were disturb'd by the Conspiracy of nine Cbu bew or feudatory Princes, who endeavour'd to destroy that beautiful System of Subordination established by the first Kings, both in religious Worship and the Government of the State.

Attempt to introduce the Worship of Spirits or Angels.

Their Design being to substitute the fear of Spirits in place of the fear of Shang ti, they had recourse to Magic and Enchantments. They disturbed Houses with evil Spirits, and so terrified the People with their Delusions, that assembling in the Temple on the solemn Days when the Emperor sacrificed, they made it resound with their Clamours, tumultuously requiring that Sacrifice should likewise be offered to these Spirits (B). The Emperor dy'd during these Troubles, and tho' he left four Sons, Chwen hys, Nephew of Whang ti, was chosen for his Successor.

(A) The Chinese themselves are not very certain as to the Time when this Prince lived, the Canonical History beginning with the Emperor Yau. We may add that the Author's making him a Contemporary of Phaleg, and the Head of a Colony of the Noakides is all a Chimera, see before p. 237.

(B) We see here very early the evil effects of the Doctrine of Guardian Angels, which is productive of Idolatry.

This Prince began with extirpating the Race of the nine Enchanters, who were the principal Authors of the Tumult; he appeased the Minds of the People, and restored Order in the Sacrifices. Having reflected on the Inconvenience of assembling an active restless People in the same Place where the Emperor came to sacrifice, he separated the Place of Instruction from that of Sacrifices, and established two great Mandarins, chose from among the Sons of the deceased Emperor, as Presidents; one of whom was charged with the whole Ceremonial, and the other took care of the Instruction of the People. He also settled Rules for choosing the Victims, ordering that they should neither be lame, nor defective, nor of any other Animals but the six Kinds appointed by Fo hi: Likewise that they should be well fed, and of a Colour agreeable to the four Seasons wherein the Sacrifices were made. In a word, he regulated their Age and Size.

Ti ko, Nephew of Chwen huo, was raised to the Throne by the Suffrages of all the Orders of the State; and was addicted no less than his Uncle to the Worship of Shang ti, and the religious Observation of the Ceremonies. It is related in the Annals of this Prince, authorized by the King, that the Empress Twen kyang, who was barren, accompanying the Emperor to a solemn Sacrifice, prayed to Shang ti for Children with so much Fervency, that she conceived almost at the same Time; and ten Months after brought forth a Son, called Hew tse, who was the Ancestor of a glorious Posterity, dignified with a great number of Emperors.

It seems surprising that so prudent a Prince as Ti ko should choose for Successor, neither this miraculous Infant, nor Tau, whom he had by his second Queen Kim tsu, nor Ki lyé, Son of the third Queen Kyen tsé, but should prefer to these young Princes, already so eminent for their Virtues, his Son Chi, by his fourth Queen Chang ti, in whom there was no Quality worthy of the Throne: But he did not reign long.

It is said in the Book intitled Kang kyen (A), that the Providence of Shang ti watched over the Welfare of the State; and that the People, by his Appointment, unanimously deposed this wicked Prince, to place in his stead the virtuous Tau, who joined the Quality of Legislator to that of Emperor, and became a Pattern for all his Successors. The King relates, that he could never have brought the Sciences to their utmost Perfection, within the first sixty Years of his Reign, if it had not been for the extraordinary Assistance of Tyen.

In the six Years of his Reign, the People being greatly multiplied, and the most beautiful Plains quite covered with Water, (supposed by some [Europeans] to be the Remains of the Deluge) the great Tu applied himself to drain off the Water into the Sea, to raise the sunk Lands, and divide them among the People.

Nine Years after, this great Emperor resolving to associate with him in the Empire some wise Person fit to succeed him: "As I perceive no Merit in my nine Sons, (said he to his Ministers) do you therefore find me out a Man, no matter of what Family, provided he is truly Wise, and of known Virtue." Hereupon they mention'd a young Peasant named Shun, who, tho' he continually received ill usage from his Parents and eldest Brother, still behaved with the greatest Respect towards them, and bore their injurious Treatment with unconquerable Patience and Meekness. This is the Man I want, said Tau, he only is able to preserve Order and Peace in the Imperial Family, and regulate all the Families of this vast Empire after that Model. Having proved him yet three Years longer, he afterwards made him his Son-in-law, associated him in the Empire, and appointed him his sole Heir, to the Exclusion of all the Princes of his Blood, and even in Opposition to all the Remonstrances of Shun himself, who did not think himself qualified for being at the Head of so great an Empire.

When he was in Possession of the Throne, the first thing he did, says the Shu king, was to pay his solemn Homage to Shang ti; after which he enacted those wise Laws, whereon the Government of the Empire is founded. He created Mandarins, and gave excellent Precepts relating to the five principal Duties, of the King and the Subject, Father and Children, Husband and Wife, elder and younger Brothers, and of Friends among themselves: Insomuch that, from the Greatest to the Least, every one immediately knew whether he was to command or obey.

His Example gave great Weight to his Precepts; for all Persons who saw his respectful Submission to Tau, whom he looked upon as his Father and Master, were inclined to put in Execution such wise Laws. Shang ti, says the Shu king, seemed to have made himself Shun's Colleague, and to have given him the sole Direction of his Omnipotence, in order to bring about his Designs. Tau dyed universally lamented 28 Years after the Adoption of Shun, who now reigning alone, divided the Offices among several wise Men whose Capacity he had made trial of. After the Example of Tau, he chose no Successor in his own Family, but appointed the Sage Tu, which Choice was generally approved of.

O amiable Shun! says the Li ki, Was there ever a better Prince? While he lived he had nothing at Heart but the public Good, and at his Death, instead of following the Dictates of paternal Affection, and placing his Son on the Throne, he consulted nothing but the Interest of his Subjects. He shewed that he was their true Father, by giving them in the Person of Tu another Prince like himself, and worthy of inheriting his Love for his People.

The Great Tu did not forget a Duty which he believed to be of the highest Nature; for the Worship of Shang ti never flourished more than in his Reign: He even took Care to prevent the Negligence that might cool the Zeal of his Posterity, by establishing Mandarins at Court, and in the Provinces, as so many Sages, whose Business was to represent to the Emperors their Obligation

(A) That is, The General History.

Obligation to worship Shang ti, and to give them, whenever it was necessary, useful Instructions concerning the Practice of the Nine Royal Virtues.

This Liberty which the Sages of the Empire enjoy'd of pointing out to the Prince his principal Duties, was interrupted in process of time under the Tyrant Kyè, an impious and voluptuous Prince, who admitted none into his Councils but young Libertines, ever forward to encourage his Disregard for Religion, and flatter him in his Crimes.

The several Orders of the State, no longer able to bear his Cruelty, and the Scandal of his pernicious Example, deposed him, being the last of the Family of the Hya, and placed in his room Ching tang the Grandson of Whang ti. The only Reason that is alledged for the Fall of the one, and Elevation of the other, is that Kyè was become a wicked Prince, and had forgotten the Oath which, on ascending the Throne, he took to continue the supreme Worship of Shang ti.

Veneration
of Shang ti, promoted by
Ching tang.

Religion being as it were the Foundation of the Shang Dynasty, Ching tang carried the Adoration and respectful Fear due to Shang ti much farther than his Predecessors had done, establishing Mandarins at Court and in the Provinces, with a Privilege of making him Remonstrances, in case he swerved ever so little from this Capital Duty.

The Emperor having offered several fruitless Sacrifices to appease the Wrath of Heaven, on account of a seven Years Famine, which had reduced the People to the greatest Misery, he resolved to offer himself as a Victim of Expiation: Accordingly he divested himself of his imperial Ensigns, and went with the great Lords of his Court to a Mountain, some distance from the City; where, with a bare Head and naked Feet, in the Posture of a Criminal, he prostrated himself nine Times before the supreme Master of the Universe.

"Lord! (said he) since all the Sacrifices that I have offered to implore thy Clemency have been in vain, it is doubtless I myself who have drawn down so many Miseries on my People. Dare I ask wherein I have incurred thy Displeasure? Is it owing to the Magnificence of my Palace, the Delicacies of my Table, or to the Number of my Concubines, which however the Laws allow me? I am resolved to repair all these Faults by my Modesty, Frugality, and Temperance; And if this is not sufficient, I offer myself as a Victim to thy Justice. Let me be punished, provided my People be spared: Let the Thunderbolt fall on my Head; provided that at the same time the Rain falls upon the Plains, and my Subjects be relieved from their Misery." His Prayers being heard, the Sky was covered with Clouds, which sending down Plenty of Rain on the Plains produced a plentiful Harvest.

The Happiness of this Family was in good measure owing to the great Number of Sages, who appeared at the same Time. Their principal Business was to attend the Emperor at the Sacrifices of Shang ti. Among these, the Ko lau (A), I in, distinguished himself in the Reigns of Ching tang and his Son Tay kya.

Declines under Chew.

Under the Tyrant Chew these Sages first began to be neglected: Their Remonstrances and Advice being rewarded with the most cruel Punishment, and often Death itself. In that Reign we meet with the incomparable Wisdom and Virtue of Ven wang and his Son Vu wang. All the Grandees of the Empire having conspired to dethrone Chew, and set Ven wang in his Place, this latter stedfastly opposed their pressing Sollicitations, contenting himself to possess the Virtues which constitute a great Monarch, without the Ambition to become one: He even made use of the Disposition he found them in towards himself, to bring them back to the Obedience which he thought was due to the Tyrant.

For nine Years that the State was in the greatest Confusion, all the Orders of Chew were issued by this virtuous Prince. By his Hands also he offered Sacrifices to Shang ti; for otherwise the feudatory Princes would have refused to assist thereat. On this Occasion the Book intitled I king, speaks elegantly in its enigmatic Style: That all the Oxen killed by Chew were not worth the meanest Offerings of Ven wang: because the former offered his Sacrifices with a Heart polluted with Crimes, whereas the better part of the latter's Offering consisted in the Purity of his Heart.

After the Death of Ven wang, it was unanimously resolved in an Assembly of the Chew bew, (or feudatory Princes) to dethrone the Tyrant, and that Vu wang should head the Enterprize. However he singly opposed that Resolution; at least he demanded Time to examine if it was really the Order of Tyen. He spent two Years in debating the Matter with himself, in which time his Mind was in a continual Uneasiness, not knowing what Part to choose, and fearing to incur the Wrath of Tyen, whether he accepted or refused the Commission.

In short, after many Conflicts within himself, he yielded to the Intreaties and Sollicitations of the whole Empire; and, says Confucius, he made but one Push, for in the first Battle the Tyrant being routed and abandoned by his Party fled to his Palace, where raising a funeral Pile out of the most valuable Things belonging to him, he set Fire to it, and so put an end to the Dynasty of the Shang. Vu wang by unanimous Consent was placed on the Throne, and quickly restored the Government to its former Condition.

It is true, the pretended Orders of Heaven, and Zeal for the public Good, which served to give a Colour to that Usurpation, have not justified this Prince in the Opinion of some later Writers. Although Ching tang and Vu wang have always passed for great Emperors and Patterns of Virtue, yet the famous Chau kan tye declares plainly that the Manner in which they ascended the Throne casts a Blemish on their Glory. He also gives much the Preference to Shun, Ti, Ven wang and Chew kong, who having been the Colleagues of Emperors, assumed nothing to themselves of the Government but the laborious Part.

(A) A Name common to the Ministers of State, whose Number is not limited to four, there being sometimes six or seven.

However that be, it appears by the Instances taken from the Classical Books, that from the Foundation of the Empire under Fo hi, thro' a long Series of Ages, the Supreme Being, commonly known by the Name of Shang ti and Tyen, was the Object of public Worship; and as it were the Soul, and Primum Mobile, of the Government of the Nation: That this Supreme Being was feared, honoured, revered; and that not only the People, but the Grandees of the Empire, and the Emperors themselves were sensible there was above them a Lord and Judge, who rewarded such as obeyed, and punished such as offended him. Shang ti had all their Acknowledgements.

Dependence of the Emperors and Princes on Shang ti and Tyen.

Of all natural Beings, sayd Confucius to his Disciple Tseng tse, none is more eminent than Man; of all the Actions of Men, none is more Praiseworthy than filial Piety; and among the Duties of filial Piety, the most indispensable is, respectfully to obey his Father's Orders: But to render him this Obedience, nothing was more effectual than to associate him with Shang ti, that is, to consider him as invested with the Majesty and Authority of the Most High.

Chew kong, the Brother of Vu wang, acknowledged that absolute Dependence, which the Emperors, as well as their Subjects, had on Shang ti. He tenderly loved the Emperor; and seeing him ready to die in the second Year of his Reign, he prostrated himself before the Supreme Majesty, to implore the Recovery of a Prince, whose Life was so necessary to the State. It is thou Lord, cried he, who hast placed him on the Throne, and appointed him Father of the People. Is it thy Will to punish us by taking him away? If a Victim be indispensable, accept of my Life, which I offer thee in Sacrifice, provided thou sparest my Master, my King, and my Brother.

Manner of their offering themselves in Sacrifice to Shang ti.

Ching wang imitated the Piety of his Father, and when on the Throne observed the same Veneration for the Sovereign Lord of the Universe. How far soever I may be called above other Men, says he in the Shu king, yet I am no more than one of the least of Shang ti's Subjects. How can I dispense with paying him Homage?

Chew kong was his Uncle, and had been his Tutor. The great Authority of so wise a Minister creating Jealousies, some Grandees carried their Envy and Ill-will to such a Pitch, that they obliged him to retire from Court, and banish himself into the Province of Shan tong. But a dreadful Storm, which happened at that Time a little before Harvest, having destroyed all the Produce of the Fields, Ching wang took it for granted, that Tyen was angry, and designed to avenge oppressed Innocence. He therefore ordered Chew kong to be recalled forthwith, and went himself to meet him, thereby to honour his Return. Stopping on the Road to make his Prayers to Shang ti, and represent the Necessities of the People, almost at the same instant there arose a Wind contrary to the former, which restored the largest Trees that had been bent down to their natural Condition, and there was a plentiful Harvest.

It is reported likewise in the Shu king, that three Princes of the Blood, who had seized on the Regency during the Minority of Ching wang, having revolted because he had put himself into the Hands of Chew kong, the Emperor took up Arms to reduce them, but first consulted Shang ti. Tyen, says he, never favours the Arms of Princes, but when they make War for the Love of Peace.

The same Spirit of Religion animated Prince Kang wang. There seemed to be no other Emperor in China, says the Shi king, except Shang ti. The Dread of the Supreme Being was alone sufficient to keep the People within the Bounds of their Duty. Honesty prevailed so much under the Government of this Prince and his Father, to whom he succeeded, that they had no Occasion to strike a Terror into their Subjects by the Rigour of Punishment. Criminals were only confined in Prison, out of which they were let in the Day-time to work at their Trade; and they returned of their own accord in the Evening, to lodge there at Night.

A single Passage out of the Shi king will inform us with what Sentiments of Gratitude and intire Confidence Chau wang used to address Shang ti. Rejoyce, my People, said he one Day to the Husbandmen; Altho' the Spring is hardly at an End, you are going to reap the Produce of Autumn. Our Fields which were but newly sown, are already loaded with the richest Harvest. Thanks be to Shang ti, who puts us so soon in a Condition to enjoy his Gifts. For this reason I will not wait till the End of Autumn to present myself before him, and return him Thanks for such forward Crops.

Thanksgiving.

Mo wang, his Son, followed the Examples of his Predecessors when he was upon the Throne; and as the People were no longer awed by the Fear of the Supreme Being, as they were in the Reigns of Ching wang and his Son, he considered himself as Shang ti's Minister of Justice, and exposed to the View of his Subjects the Punishments which their Crimes deserved. He says in the Shu king, that he is only the Minister of the Most High, to defend the Innocent from Oppression, and hinder the Strong from oppressing the Weak.

They consider themselves as the Ministers of Shang ti.

Religion preserved its exterior Form under the next four Emperors, Kong wang, Te wang, Hyan wang and I wang; But these Princes degenerated greatly from the Virtue of their Ancestors: Like those Trees, says the Shu king, which continue to make a beautiful Appearance with their Leaves, but for want of Culture bear no more Fruit, and begin to degenerate. Thus they became the Objects of Contempt, and the Subjects of a thousand satirical Songs. Hyan wang was so excessively fond of Horses, that to reward his chief Groom he made him Prince of Tsin; not dreaming, doubtless, that one of his Descendents would found the Family of Tsin, which succeeded on the Ruin of that of the Chew.

The Emperors degenerate.

Li wang, his Successor, was detested for his Pride and Tyranny. The Silence of Shang ti, says the Shi king, was an Enigma; one would have sayed, that he slept, contrary to his Custom. Every thing prospered with this wicked Prince; the People durst not fetch their Breath: The very Censors of the Empire, by their Office obliged to give him wholesome Advice, were the forwardest to uphold him in his Crimes by their base Adulations. Whence comes this, cries the Author of the Shi king; Is it that there is no more Justice in Heaven? Shall the Wicked peaceably enjoy the Fruit of his Crimes? Attend, continues he, and you shall see, that Shang ti never suspends the Efforts of his all-powerful Arm but to strike the harder Blow.

In effect, the People revolting against Li wang, his Parents and Relations were cut in Pieces; the Tyrant escaped their Fury by flying and banishing himself. His Son Swen wang had met with the same Fate, if the faithful Chau kong, Ko lau of the Empire, had not made his own Son perfonate the Prince; and, by thus sacrificing him, saved the Life of the Heir to the Crown.

Shang ti omniscient.

Whereupon the Shi king makes this Reflection: It is in vain to hide one's self in the dark; nothing is hidden from Shang ti: The Night is with him as clear as the Day: He penetrates into the most secret Corners, where the Malignity of Man's Heart would withdraw itself from his Sight: He is present every where, and darts his Light into the most obscure Windings of the most impenetrable Labyrinth, where one would attempt to conceal himself.

On this Occasion, Wey wu kong, a venerable old Man 95 Years of Age, made an Ode, which he caused to be sung every Day at the inner Gate of his Palace. In vain, says he, does human Force pretend to establish a State; if the Lord of Heaven does not lend a Hand to strengthen it, it tumbles at the first Shock. 'Tis a Water, which not far from its Spring loses itself in the first Sand it meets with in the Plain: 'Tis a Flower which is blown in the Morning, and withers at Night. A whole Nation is corrupted by the Example of a wicked King.

Omnipotent.

Swen wang was more religious than his Father Li wang, nevertheless his Reign was perplexed with public Calamities. One Year of Drought layed waste the Empire; which this Prince lamented bitterly in the Shi king: To behold these dried up Fields, how can a Heart chuse but be dried up with Sorrow? If Shang ti, who can do any thing, will not deign to cast an Eye of Pity on me, while I am making the Great Sacrifice to him for Rain; alas! what will become of my poor People, who must of necessity perish with Hunger? Would it not be better that the Wrath of Heaven should fall upon me alone, and my People be relieved?

Chinese Philosophers preferred to the Greek and Roman.

I shall allege no farther Instance: It may suffice to have shewn from the Authority of the Canonical Books, that the Chinese Nation for the Space of 2000 Years together acknowledged, revered, and honoured with Sacrifices, a Supreme Being and Sovereign Lord of the Universe, under the Name of Shang ti or Tyen. If these antient Masters of the Chinese Doctrine be compared with the Heathen Sages, we shall find a great Difference between them: For the latter seem to have taught Virtue only to give themselves a Superiority over the rest of Mankind, which they had not on account of Fortune; besides, they dogmatized in so haughty and ostentatious a Manner, that it was evident they sought less the Discovery of the Truth, than to display their own Talents: Whereas the Masters of the Doctrine inculcated in the King (or Canonical Books) were Emperors and Prime Ministers, whose Virtues gave great Weight to their Instructions, who first observed themselves the same coercive Laws they established, and conveyed their Moral Precepts, not using Subtilties and Sophisms, but with a plain and simple Air in a practical Way, aiming at the shortest Method for the Reformation of Manners.

It seems that they would be doing an Injury to the antient Chinese, who followed the Law of Nature, which they received from their Fathers, to tax them with Irreligion, because they had not so clear and distinct a Knowledge of the Deity, as the Christian World have had since their Time: This would be to require too much of these People, since they could not be so well instructed as we are, by means of the Precepts of Christ.

Imperfect Notions of a future State and the Creation.

It is true, that tho' the Canonical Books, especially the Shu king, exhort Men to fear Tyen; and tho' they place the Souls of virtuous Men near Shang ti, yet it does not appear that they have spoken clearly of the everlasting Punishments in the Life to come. In like manner, tho' they affirm that the Supreme Being created all Things, yet they have not treated of it so distinctly, as to judge whether they mean a true Creation, that is, a Production of all Things out of Nothing. However, it must be confessed that, tho' they are silent as to this Point, they have not denied the Possibility thereof, nor, like certain Greek Philosophers, asserted that the Matter of which corporeal Beings are composed is eternal. We likewise do not find that they have treated explicitly concerning the State of the Soul; on the contrary, they seem to have only confused Notions of it, no way agreeable to the Truth: Yet it cannot be doubted but that they believed the Soul exists after its Separation from the Body, as well as the Certainty of Apparitions, of which that related by Confucius is an Instance.

Belief of Apparitions.

This Philosopher declared to his most familiar Disciples, that for several Years he had seen in a Dream the celebrated Chew kong, Son of Ven wang, to whom the Empire was indebted for so many excellent Instructions relating to Morality, and other Doctrines. And it is observable that the learned Chu hi, so famous under the Dynasty of the Song, being asked if Confucius spoke of a Dream, or a real Apparition, answered, without Hesitation, that he meant a real Apparition (A); however Chew kong had been dead 600 Years before. On this Occasion, I shall relate out of the Chinese History two other Passages, nearly of the same Nature, and no less extraordinary than the former. We read in the Shu king, that the Emperor Kau tsong having prayed fervently to (†) Tyen, in order to obtain a worthy Minister of State, fit for reforming the Manners of his Subjects,

(A) But this is no Proof that it was an Apparition, since Confucius only makes it a Dream. Indeed, some of the Confucian Sect, in consequence of their Notion of a particular Providence, have ran into some Extravagancies concerning Guardian Angels, Demons, Apparitions, &c.

(†) Tyen stands for Shang ti, and Shang ti for Tyen, when speaking of the Sovereign Being who hath created and governs Heaven and Earth.

Subjects, Shang ti appeared to him in a Dream, and shewed him the Person designed for him; By the Description of whose Face the Emperor had him searched for, and he was found among a Crowd of ordinary People: Yet this Fu yue, (for that was his Name) raised out of the Dust, as it were to sway the Empire, spake from the first, according to the Maxims of the ancient Sages; whence it is easy to judge that the Doctrine which he taught was commonly received all over the Nation.

Certain Historians since Confucius, relate a received Tradition concerning the Ruin of the Kingdom of Tsau, in the third Year of the Emperor King wang. One of the Lords of this Prince's Court saw in a Dream the Ancestors of that Family, who, after they had lamented the Degeneracy of their Descendants, said among themselves: Our Race will certainly lose the Crown, and the Country of Tsau will no longer continue to be a particular Kingdom, as it has been for these 600 Years past. Such a Man by Name will murder the Prince, and cause this Revolution.

This Lord was too much affected with this Vision, to take it for a mere Dream: But not finding any Person at the Court of Tsau, who bore the Name of the appointed Traitor, he was content to warn the Prince to beware of such a Man, whenever he saw him. The Prince made Use of the Council at first; but afterwards neglecting it, perhaps thro' Forgetfulness, a Man of that Name slew the last of the Kings of Tsau, which then became Part of the Kingdom of (A) Song.

It is observable, that in these ancient Books we find Proofs that the primitive Chinese had Knowledge of the Supreme Being, and payed him religious Worship for a long Series of Ages; nor can we perceive therein, the least Foot-step of idolatrous Worship. This will seem the less surprizing, when we reflect that Idolatry spread but slowly in the World; That according to Eusebius, it first began in Assyria, where there were no Images, till a long time after Belus who introduced them; that China had no Commerce with other Nations, and that the Indies lying between it and Assyria, rendered the Communication still more (B) difficult.

Had it been otherways, the Chinese History would not have failed to speak of it, in the same Manner as it takes Notice of the Time when the Image of Fo was brought into China, several Ages after Confucius. 'Tis true, that from the Time of that Philosopher, Magic, and divers other Errors had infected the Minds of many: It is also possible, that even before him there were Images, and a superstitious Worship to be found among the People in some Provinces: But this cannot be proved from their History; and it appears that the Learned, adhering to the Doctrine which they received from their Fore-fathers, had no Share therein.

That which has contributed greatly to the Preservation of the Religion of the early Ages in China, and preventing its being wholly destroyed, is, that there has been a supreme Tribunal established in the Empire, almost from the Time of its Foundation, with full Authority to condemn, or suppress any Superstitions that might arise; which is called, The Tribunal of Rites.

This Precaution of the Chinese would have proved effectual, was not the Mind of Man so very weak, and liable to be seduced; the strongest Dykes being only the Work of Men, cannot withstand very violent Inundations. We have observed elsewhere, that the whole Body of Philosophers in China, [have been] Idolaters contrary to their own Consciences, thro' fear of a People fond of Images (C), who were ungovernable, and had too much the Ascendant in public Affairs: Nevertheless, the ancient Doctrine of the Chinese, has always found Support from the Tribunal above mentioned, and does by the Assistance of its Degrees, still continue to be the prevailing Sect. The Missionaries, who read the Decrees of the Mandarins, composing this Tribunal, have observed, that tho' they sometimes in private practised certain Superstitions, yet when they assembled in a Body to deliberate about them they openly condemned them.

It is possible that by the same Means, the Belief of a first and Supreme Being has been so long preserved in China, such as we find it in the Classic Books; and it is certain, it has not been deformed as it was among the Greeks and Romans, by the Fictions of the Poets. China, for many Ages, was a Stranger to the Superstitions to be met with in other Nations, who having but a very gross and imperfect Idea of the Deity, have fallen by degrees to honour the Heroes of their Country with the Title of Gods. Whatever Veneration the Chinese have had for their greatest Emperors, they never payed Adoration to any but the Supreme Being; and tho' they have discovered their Esteem and Respect for the Memory of great Men, who have been distinguished by their Rank, their Virtues, and Services, yet they have rather chosen to preserve their Memory by Tablets inscribed with their Names and short Encomiums, than by Pictures or Images. Tablets of the same Kind are often hung up in honour of Magistrates, who have discharged their Trusts to the Satisfaction of the People, and are removed to another Government.

However, the Troubles that happened in the Empire, the civil Wars which divided it, and the Corruption of Manners, which became almost general, had entirely banished the ancient Doctrine: But Confucius revived it, by giving fresh Reputation to the ancient Books; especially the Sbu king, which he recommended as an exact Rule of Manners.

(A) How fond the Author is to propagate the Doctrine of Apparitions, on the Authority of Dreams or any idle Fiction.

(B) The Author seems to forget, that the Idolatry of Fo sprang up in that Part of India next to China, within 300 Years after Belus; and yet did not find Admittance into China for 1200 Years after, which is a much more surprizing Instance than the other.

(C) In the Original it is Idols: Where observe that the Romish Clergy give the Name of Idols to the Images of all Nations, tho' they use them only for sake of Remembrance, as the Bonzas do, if you will believe themselves. Whence it is plain, either that they maliciously bely other Religions, or really look on the Use of Images any way in Religion as Idolatry; and so distinguish between Images and Idols, in order to amuse the Ignorant, and cloak their own Impiety.

No Idolatry among the ancient Chinese.

Ancient Religion still the prevailing Sect.

Free from the Superstition of other Religions.

I have already spoken of the high Esteem this Philosopher was had in, who is still looked upon as the Doctor of the Empire; and yet in his Time, the Sect of Tau tse arose, whose Author came into the World about 52 Years before Confucius. The superstitious Doctrine which he taught, was agreeable for its Novelty; and however extravagant it might appear to reasonable Men, yet it was encouraged by some of the Emperors, besides a great Number of Followers, who brought it in Credit.

Of the Sect of TAU TSE.

Author of this Sect.

L AU KYUN, (A) is the Name of the Philosopher who gave Rise to this new Sect; and if you credit his Disciples, his Birth was very extraordinary: For he lay fourscore Years in his Mother's Womb, and came into the World, by making his Way thro' her left Side, of which monstrous Child-Birth she died.

His Books.

His Books are still extant; but, as it is supposed, much altered by his Followers: Nevertheless, they contain several Maxims and Sentiments worthy of a Philosopher, concerning the moral Virtues, the avoiding Honours, the Contempt of Riches, and that happy Solitude of a Soul, which raising itself above terrestrial Things, believes that it has a Sufficiency in itself.

Amongst the Sentiments, there is one which he often repeated; especially when he spoke of the Production of the World: Tay, says he, [that is the Law or Reason] both produced One, One hath produced Two, Two have produced Three, and Three have produced all Things (B). By this he seems to have had some Knowledge of the Deity (C), but it was a very gross one.

His Morality of the Epicurean Kind.

The Morality of this Philosopher and his Disciples, nearly resembles that of the Epicureans; it consists in putting away vehement Desires and Passions, capable of disturbing the Peace and Tranquillity of the Soul. According to them, it ought to be every wise Man's Care to pass his Life free from Anxiety and Uneasiness; and to this End, never to reflect on what is past, nor be inquisitive after what is to come.

His Followers Quietists

They affirm, that to be agitated with rustling Cares, to be busied about great Projects, to give one's self up to Ambition, Avarice, and other Passions, is to toil more for Posterity than themselves; and that it is Madness to purchase the Happiness of others, at the Expence of our own Repose and Felicity: That we should pursue our own Happiness with Moderation, and not abandon ourselves to over violent Desires; because, whatever we look upon as Happiness, ceases to be so, if it is accompanied with Trouble, Distaste and Inquietude, and the Peace of the Soul be ever so little disturbed.

Pretend to the Liquor of Immortality.

For which Reason, those belonging to this Sect, affect a Calm that suspends, as they say, all the Functions of the Soul: But as this Tranquillity must needs be disturbed by the Thoughts of Death, they boast of having found out a Liquor, by means whereof they may become immortal. They are addicted to Chymistry, and much infatuated with the Notion of the Philosopher's Stone. They are likewise fond of Magic; and are persuaded, that by the Assistance of the Demons whom they invoke, they can succeed in their Designs.

The Hope of escaping Death, induced a great Number of Mandarins to study this diabolical Art: The Women especially, being naturally curious, and exceeding fond of Life, madly gave into these Extravagancies. At length, certain credulous and superstitious Emperors, brought this impious Doctrine in vogue, and greatly multiplied the Number of its Followers.

Emperors infatuated with that Notion

The Emperor Tsin shi whang ti, that sworn Enemy to Learning and learned Men, was persuaded by these Impostors, that they had actually found the Liquor which made Men immortal, and was called Chang feng yo (D).

Yu ti, the sixth Emperor of the Dynasty of the Han, addicted himself wholly to the Study of magical Books, under a Leader of this Sect, named Li shau kyun. Some pretended it was out of Complaisance for the Empress, who embraced this new Philosophy, as being more favourable to her Passions than the Doctrine of the ancient Books, and of Confucius, which she detested.

It was not long before the Provinces were informed of the Emperor's Inclination, and the open Protection given by him to a Sect, which he had embraced himself. The Court was immediately filled with an innumerable Crowd of these false Doctors, who were famous for the Magic Art. That Prince about this Time, lost one of his Queens whom he doated on to Distraction; and being inconsolate for her Loss, one of these Impostors, by his Incantments, caused the deceased Queen to appear before the Emperor: And this Apparition with which he was surprized and terrified, more strongly attached him to the Impieties of this new Sect. He several times drank the Liquor of Immortality: But at last perceived he was as mortal as ever, and being at the Point of Death lamented too late his easy Credulity.

Support this Sect.

However, the new Sect suffered no Prejudice by the Emperor's Death, for it found Protectors in the Princes of the same Dynasty. Two of their most famous Doctors having been authorized to support the Worship which was payed to the Demon in a great Number of Temples already erected

(A) He is also called Li lau kyun, and commonly Pe yang, or Lau tau [P. Couplet. Scient. Sinens. proem. Declar. p. 24.] His Name was Li, and his Surname En; but as he came into the World with white Hair, he was called Lau tai, or the Infant old Man. These Circumstances we have by accident in another Place, of our Author, tho' they more properly come in here. [See the Novel relating to the Philosopher Chewang tse in the second Vol.]

(B) The Chinese Words are Tau feng yo, Yo feng tai, En feng fan, San feng wan &c. see Couplet. ubi supra.

(C) By Deity, here the Author doubtless means the Trinity: so earnest he is to strain Things his own Way, tho' he seems ashamed to speak out.

(D) Yo, medicine; Chang, eternal; Seng, Life.

ed thro' the Empire; they distributed every where, and sold at a high Price little Images, representing the Crowd of Spirits and Men, whom they had ranked among their Gods, and named Syen jin, that is, Immortals (A). This Superstition encreased to such a Degree, that under the Emperors of the Tang Dynasty, they gave the Ministers of this Sect the honourable Title of Tyen tse, that is to say, Heavenly Doctors. The Founder of this Line erected a stately Temple to Lau kyun; and Heven tsong, the sixth Emperor of the same Dynasty, caused his Statue to be brought with great Pomp into the Palace.

The Successors of the Head of this Sect are always honoured with the Dignity of great Mandarins, and reside in a Town of the Province of Kyang si, where they have a magnificent Palace. Crowds of People flock thither from the neighbouring Provinces to procure Remedies for their Diseases, or to learn their Destiny, and what is to happen in the Course of their Lives: They receive of the Tyen tse a Billet filled with magical Characters, and go away well satisfied, without begrudging the Sum they pay for this singular Favour.

But the Doctors of this Sect gained Ground chiefly under the Dynasty of the Song, whose third Emperor Chin tsong was ridiculously led away with their Tricks and Forgeries. These Impostors having in a dark Night hung up a Book on the principal Gate of the Imperial City, filled with Characters, and magical Sentences for invoking Demons, gave out that it had fallen from Heaven: Whereupon the credulous Prince, out of his great Veneration, went on Foot to fetch it; and, after receiving it with the most profound Respect, carried it in triumph into his Palace, and enclosed it in a Gold Box, where he kept it with abundance of Care.

These Tau tse were the Persons who introduced the Multitude of Spirits, till then unknown, whom they worshipped as Deities independent of the Supreme Being, and honoured with the Name of Shang ti: They even deified some of the ancient Kings, and prayed to them.

Whey tsong, the eighth Emperor of the 15th Race of the Song, carried the Superstition to such a Pitch as to give the Name of Shang ti, or Supreme Lord, to a Doctor of this Sect called Shang i (B), who had acquired a great Reputation under the Dynasty of the Han. Till that Time, the Idolaters themselves had distinguished Shang ti from other Deities. Thus a famous Ko lan, who has written on this Subject, attributes the entire Ruin and Extinction of the Song to this (C) Impiety.

This abominable Sect got footing by degrees, partly thro' the Protection of the Princes above-mentioned, partly by flattering the Passions of the Grandees, partly by the Impressions of Wonder and Terror that it made on the Minds of the People. The Compacts of their Ministers with Demons, the Lots which they cast, and the surprizing Effects of their magical Arts (D) infatuated the Multitude, still extremely prejudiced in favour of these Impostors, who are generally called to heal Diseases, and exorcise (E) Demons.

They sacrifice to this Spirit of Darkness three Sorts of Victims, a Hog, a Fish, and a Fowl; they drive a Stake in the Earth, commonly such as serves to tell Fortunes by, and trace upon Paper odd Sorts of Figures, accompanying the Stroke of their Pencil with horrible Cries and Grimaces. They make a frightful Din with Kettles and little Drums: And sometimes, to punish the Crimes of the Chinese, God permits them to take effect. And tho' often they do not succeed, yet these Gentlemen know how to procure Respect and Authority by their Incantments, and the Assistance which the Demon gives them to deceive and seduce the poor deluded (F) People.

In China, great Numbers of profligate Fellows are sold to these Ministers of Iniquity, who follow the Trade of Divination. Tho' they have never seen the Person who consults them, they tell his Name, and all the Circumstances of his Family, in what Manner his House is situated, how many Children he has, their Names and Age; with a hundred other Particulars, which may be naturally enough supposed to be known to the Demons, and are strangely surprizing to weak and credulous Minds, such as the Vulgar among the Chinese often are.

Some of these Conjurors, after invoking the Demons, cause the Figures of the Chief of their Sect and of their Idols to appear in the Air. Formerly they could make a Pencil write of itself, without any body touching it, upon Paper or Sand, the Answers to Questions. They likewise cause all the People of any House to pass in review, in a large Vessel of Water; wherein they also shew the Changes that shall happen in the Empire, and the imaginary Dignities to which those shall be advanced who embrace their Sect. In short, they pronounce mysterious Words without any Meaning, and place Charms on Houses as well as Men's Persons (G): Nothing is more common than to hear such kind of Stories; and, tho' it is very likely that the greater Part of them are only Illusions, yet it is scarce credible that all should be so: Since many Effects ought in reality to be attributed to the Power of the (*) Devil.

(A) Here the Author represents their Saints or Heroes as Gods, and, to countenance the Matter, mis-renders Syen jin Immortals, instead of immortal Men.

(B) And have not the Popes been called Gods by some of the Romish Doctors, which is equally impious?

(C) And yet both the Sect itself, as well as the Popes, are still in being, which shews such Conclusions to be groundless.

(D) Observe how this Author all along acknowledges the Power of Magic, as he does Apparitions, Witchcraft, the Power of Demons, &c. If he can see the Chinese Superstitions, how can he possibly avoid seeing his own?

(E) One Imposture naturally begets another; and why may not the Priests of China make gain of them as well as the Priests of Rome?

(F) Is not this exactly the Case also with the Priests and Laity of the Church of Rome?

(G) In the same manner as the Romish Priests sprinkle Houses and People with Holy Water, or give them Relics and Agnus Dei's to keep in their Closets, or wear about their Persons. With what Face can the Author condemn the Chinese for Superstitions, practised by himself?

(*) The wiser sort of People in China say that these are false Reports spread by those Impostors; and that there is nothing real in them.—[R.M. The wise and honest sort of People in Europe will say the same, whatever the Jesuits would have them believe in order to keep up their Influence over the Ignorant.]

Of the Sect of FO, or (A) FWE.

- Sect of Fo. FOR the Space of 270 Years, the Emperors of the Han Dynasty possessed the Imperial Throne; and about 65 Years after the Birth of Christ, the Emperor Ming ti introduced a new Sect into China, which is still more dangerous than the former, and has made a much more rapid (a) Progress.
- Its Origin. This Prince, on Occasion of a Dream which he had, called to Mind a Sentence, often in the Mouth of Confucius, viz. That the Holy One was to be found in the West. Upon this he sent Ambassadors into the Indies to discover who this Saint was, and search for the true Law which he taught: The Ambassadors believing they had found him among the Worshipers of the Idol Fo, or Fave, carried it into China, and with it the Fables, wherewith the Indian Books were filled, Superstitions, the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis, and Atheism.
- And Progress. This Contagion which began in the Court soon got footing in the Provinces, and spread thro' all the Empire, wherein Magic and Impiety had made already but too much Havock.
- It is hard to say with certainty, in what Part of the Indies this Person appeared: But if the extraordinary Things that his Disciples relate of him are not so many Fables invented by them, I should be apt to believe, with St. Francis Xavier, that he was rather a Spirit than a real (c) Man.
- Miraculous Birth of Fo. They relate that he was born in that Part of the Indies which the Chinese call Shung yen Sho (d); that his Father [named In fan wang] was the King of this Country, and his Mother called Mo ye; that she was delivered of him thro' her right Side (e), and died soon after he was born; that when she conceived, she almost constantly dreamed she had swallowed an Elephant (f); and that hence arose the Honours payed to white Elephants by the Kings of the Indies, who often make War upon each other to procure this Sort of Animal.
- They say, this Monster stood upright upon his Feet as soon as he came into the World, and walked seven Paces, pointing with one Hand to the Heaven, and the other to the Earth; nay, that he even spoke, and pronounced distinctly the following Words, There is none, either in the Heaven or on the Earth, who ought to be adored, but I alone.
- Transform'd to a God at 30. At the Age of seventeen he married three Wives, and had a Son, called by the Chinese, Mo how lo (g); at nineteen he forsook his Wives, and Sons, and all earthly Cares, to retire into a solitary Place, under the Guidance of four Philosophers, called by the Indians, Joghi; at thirty, he was of a sudden transfused by the Divinity, and became (h) Fo, [or a Deity] called by the Indians, Pagod. Henceforward looking upon himself as a God, he minded nothing else but to propagate his Doctrine.
- Works Miracles. As the Devil was always ready to lend him a helping Hand, by his Assistance he did the most wonderful Things; and by the Novelty of his Miracles filled the People with Dread, and procured their Veneration. The Chinese [of the Bonzian Sect] have described these Prodigies in several large Volumes, as well as represented them in Cuts.
- Prodigious Number of Disciples. It is scarcely credible how many Disciples this chimerical God gained: For they reckon four-score thousand who were employ'd by him in infecting all the East with his impious Tenets. Among this great Number there were ten most distinguished for their Rank and Dignity, who published five thousand Volumes in honour of their Master. The Chinese call his Followers [or rather Priests] Seng and Ho shang; the Tartars, Lamas, or La ma seng; the Siamese, Talapouts; and the Japanese (or rather the Europeans) Bonzas.
- Dies at 79. Yet this new God found himself mortal as well as other Men: For at the Age of 79 his Strength failing gave him Notice of his approaching End, and then, to crown all his Impieties, he disgorged all the Poison of Atheism.
- Teaches contrary Doctrines. He declared to his Disciples, that till that Moment he had only spoken to them in Parables; that his Discourses were so many Enigmas; and that for 40 Years he had concealed the Truth under figurative and metaphorical Expressions; but that being about to leave them, he would communicate his real Sentiments, and reveal the Mystery of his Doctrine: Learn then, sayed he to them, that there is no other Principle of all Things but Emptiness and Nothing: From Nothing all Things proceeded, and into Nothing all will return, and this is the End of all our Hopes. But his Disciples adhered to what he first taught, and their Doctrine is directly opposite to Atheism.

(a) Called also Fave kyau.(b) Coplet says it has infected all the Chinese Books and Sects, excepting the Mohammedan. Proem. Declar. ubi sup. p. 27.(c) Could the Bonzas themselves believe any thing more stupid than these Jesuits, who yet are every Moment ridiculing the Stupidity of the Bonzas? Or rather is it possible that Jesuits can really be so stupid as to believe such ridiculous Nonsense?(d) In the Original Chung yen cho instead of Tchang tien cho; the Author having forgotten to accommodate the Name as it occurs in Coplet, (from whom the Extract seems to be taken) to the French Orthography.(e) On Occasion of his monstrous Birth, P. Coplet observes that this Saviour of Mankind, as his Followers call him, hadmore of the Nature of a Viper than a Man; and that the Name Fo (as he writes it) by being compounded of Nen and Homo, intimates as much.(f) Coplet has it, that the Mother dreamed a white Elephant passing down her Throat entered into her Womb; Whence she was reported to have conceived by an Elephant: But that others more rightly conjectured, that the Devil stealing some human Seed, got her with Child in the Shape of that Beast. (Coplet ubi sup. p. 28.)(g) According to Coplet, Lo how lo.(h) He was first named She, or She lya, (corruptly called Shaka by the Japanese) by which Name the whole Body of the Bonzas as well as their Religion is understood. Coplet ubi sup. p. 28.

However these last Words of the Impostor gave Rise to the famous Distinction, which is made in his Doctrine of Exterior and Interior whereof I shall speak hereafter. His Disciples did not fail to spread a great Number of Fables after his Death (A), and easily persuaded a simple and credulous People, that their Master had been born eight thousand Times; that his Soul had successively passed into different Animals; and that he had appeared in the Form of an Ape, a Dragon, an Elephant (B) &c. This was plainly done with a Design to establish the Worship of this false God under the Shape of various Animals (C): Accordingly these different Creatures, through which the Soul of Fo was fayed to have passed, were adored in several Places; the Chinese themselves built many Temples to all sorts of Idols, which multiplied exceedingly throughout the Empire.

Among the great Number of this chimerical Deity's Disciples, there was one named Mo o kya His beloved Disciple. more dear to him than all the Rest, whom he trusted with his greatest Secrets, and charged more particularly to propagate his Doctrine (D): He enjoyed him not to trouble himself with bringing Proofs and tedious Arguments to support his Tenets; but only to put at the Head of his Works, which he should publish, these few Words: It is thus that I have Learned.

This Fo in one of his Books, speaks of a Master more ancient than himself, called by the Chinese, O mi to, and corruptly by the Japanese, Amida; which other Monster appeared in the Kingdom of Bengal, and the Bonzas pretend that he attained to such a high degree of Sanctity, and had acquired such abundant Merit, that it is sufficient at present to invoke him to obtain Pardon for the greatest Crimes (E). On this account the Chinese of this Sect have continually in their Mouths these two Names, O mi to, Fo (F): thinking that the Invocation of these pretended Deities purifies them so effectually that they may afterwards give a Loose to all their Passions, being persuaded that it will cost them nothing but an easy Invocation to expiate their most enormous Crimes (G).

The last Words of Fo, when he was dying, gave rise to a Sect of Atheists among a few Bonzas: But the greater Part of them not able to shake off the Prejudices of their Education, persevered in the first Errors (H) their Master had taught.

Many endeavoured to reconcile the two Doctrines by the Distinction of the Exterior and the Interior: The first being more suitable to the Capacity of the People, prepared their Minds to receive the second, which was fit only for elevated Minds, and the better to be understood, they made use of the following Example.

The exterior Doctrine, say they, is with relation to the Interior, the same as the Center or Frame is to the Arch that is built upon it: For the Frame being only necessary to support the Stones while the Arch is building, becomes useless as soon as that is finished and is taken to pieces; in the same Manner the exterior Doctrine is layed aside as soon as the Interior is embraced.

As to the exterior Doctrine containing the Principles of the Morality which the Bonzas are very careful to inculcate, they say, there is great difference between Good and Evil; that after Death there will be Rewards for those who have done well, and Punishments for those who have done evil; that there are Places appointed for the Souls of both, wherein they are stationed according to their Merit; that the God Fo was born to save Mankind, and to bring back those to the way of Salvation who had strayed from it; that it was he who expiated their Sins, and procured them a happy new-birth in the other World; that there are five Precepts to be observed, the first not to kill any living Creature, the second not to take what belongs to others, the third prohibits Impurity, the fourth lying, and the fifth drinking of Wine.

But above all things they must not be wanting in the Practice of certain charitable Works which their Guides prescribe: "Use the Bonzas well, say they, and furnish them with every thing necessary for their Subsistence; build them Monasteries and Temples, that by their Prayers and the Penances they inflict on themselves for the Expiation of your Sins, they may deliver you from

(A) Our Author omits several very material Things related by others. P. Couplet tells us, that his Body was burned with odoriferous Wood, according to the Custom of the Country; and his Ashes, as they say, distributed among Men, Spirits and Dragons of the Sea; That one of his Teeth, was sent as a Present to the King of the Island of Ceylon, where it was worshipped, till Constantine the Duke of Braganza's Brother having taken it with other Spoil, burnt it and scattered the Ashes, refusing to release it for a vast Sum; and that the Portuguese Historians, in calling it the Tooth of an Ape, have not erred, since Fo is worshipped in Ceylon in the Figure of an Ape, as he is worshipped in other Places under various Forms and Names. [Couplet ubi sup. p. 29.] By this Passage it appears, that the Religion of the Bonzas, has a great Connection with that of the Indians, if it be not at bottom the very same: Yet the Missionaries take little or no Notice of this Conformity.

(B) P. Couplet says his last Appearance was in the Form of a white Elephant; tho' a little before he is fayed to have been begotten by a white Elephant.

(C) 'Tis true these Asiatic Priests, by this Means, have set up more numerous Objects of Worship than the European; but they have no breaden God among them, or any such monstrous Absurdity as Transubstantiation.

(D) But it does not appear that ever he thought of laying Claim to a Supremacy on these Words: as the European Popes have done on Words not so strong.

(E) Here these Asiatic Catholics have gotten the Doctrine of Merits and Supererogation. And indeed the European Catholics seem to have copy'd almost all their Religion from them.

(F) This is like the Papists Jesus-maria.

(G) This answers to the Popish Confession, and Invocation of Saints at privileged Altars, &c. whereby the most atrocious Sins are pretended in like manner to be expiated and done away.

(H) This is very hard and partial Treatment of the Bonzas, who are here first condemned for being Atheists, and then for not being Atheists. But it is almost impossible for the Clergy of one Religion, to represent those of another Religion fairly. They are fearful lest other Religions represented fairly should appear better than their own, and therefore do all they can to blacken them. This Practice the Romish Clergy are guilty of most of all others, as they have most Occasion; and indeed were they to represent the Religion of the Bonzas truly, their Disciples would see very little difference between their own and it; and that their deceitful Guides teach the very same Errors, Impieties and Absurdities, which they condemn in others. Farther to disguise this Conformity, they have also given a very imperfect and confused Account of the Idolatrous Sects in China, and particularly this of the Bonzas.

"from the Punishments you are liable to (A). "At the Funeral Obsequies of your Relations burn Gilt and Silver-Paper, together with Garments and Silks; all which in the other World shall be changed into Gold, Silver, and real Garments: By this Means, your departed Kindred will be supply'd with the things they want, and have wherewithall to gratify the eighteen Guardians of the infernal Regions, who without these Bribes would be inexorable and treat them with great Rigour (B). If you neglect these Commands, you must expect nothing after Death but to be delivered over to the most cruel Torments: Your Soul, by a long Course of Transmigrations shall pass into the vilest Animals; and you shall appear again in the Form of a Mule, a Horse, a Dog, a Rat, or some other Creature still more contemptible."

It is hard to describe what an Influence the Dread of these Chimeras has on the Minds of the credulous and superstitious Chinese (C); which will appear from a Story related by P. le Comte, of a Passage that happened to himself when he lived in the Province of Shen si.

Story showing how they pull the Credulous.

"They called me, says he, one Day to baptize a sick Person, who was an old Man of seventy, and lived upon a small Pension given him by the Emperor. On entering his Room, he said to me, I am obliged to you, my Father, for that you are going to deliver me from a grievous Punishment. That is not all, replied I, Baptism not only delivers Persons from Hell, but conducts them to a Life of Blessedness. What Happiness must it be to go to Heaven, there to enjoy the presence of God everlastingly? I do not well understand, reply'd the sick Person, what you say, and perhaps I have not sufficiently explained myself: You know that I have lived for a long time on the Emperor's Benevolence, and the Bonzas who are thoroughly acquainted with what passes in the next World, have assured me that out of Gratitude I shall be obliged to serve him after my Death, and that my Soul will infallibly pass into one of his Post-Horses to carry Dispatches of the Court into the Provinces. For this Reason they exhort me to perform my Duty well, when I have assumed my new Being; and to take Care not to stumble, nor wince, nor bite, nor hurt any body. Run fast, say they, eat little, and be patient; by which Means you will move the Compassion of the Gods who often convert a good Beast at length into a Man of Quality, and make him a considerable Mandarin: I must own, Father, that this thought shocks me, and I cannot call it to mind without trembling. I dream of it every Night, and sometimes in my sleep fancy myself harnessed, and ready to set out at the first lash of the Rider's whip. I then wake in a Sweat and half distracted, not knowing whether I am still a Man or a Horse. But alas! what will become of me, when it shall be no longer a Dream.

"This then, my Father, is the Resolution that I am come to: They say that those of your Religion are not subject to these Miseries; that the Men will always be Men, and shall be the same in the next World as they are in this: I beseech you therefore to receive me among you. I know that your Religion is hard to be observed (D); but if it was still more rigid I am ready to embrace it, and whatever it cost me I had rather be a Christian than become a Beast. This Discourse and the present Condition of the sick Person moved my Compassion: But reflecting afterwards that God makes use of Simplicity and Ignorance to lead Men to the Truth (E), I took Occasion to convince him of his Errors, and to direct him in the way of Salvation. After I had given him Instructions a long time, at length he believed; and I had the Consolation to see him die, not only possessed of the most rational Sentiments, but with all the Marks of a good Christian."

The Transmigration useful for that end.

It is easy to conceive that since the Chinese are the Dupes of a Doctrine, so absurd and ridiculous as the Transmigration of Souls, the Bonzas who propagate it with great Zeal, draw no small Advantage from it. It is exceeding useful in carrying on all their deceitful Tricks, by which they extort Alms and enlarge their Revenues. Being sprung from the Dregs of the People, and bred from

(A) Can the Author be angry with the Bonzas for this, or think they do amiss? Do not the Romish Clergy inculcate the very same Doctrine, among the Laity of their Church?

(B) The Reader may observe from hence, and what follows, that the Bonzas break three at least of their five moral Precepts, by their impure Practices, and by inventing monstrous Lies, in order to rob others, in a specious sanctify'd way, of what belongs to them. It being absolutely necessary for every Religion to have the Appearance of Goodness, they have taken Care to teach the moral Doctrines; but as a due Observance of them is utterly inconsistent with their views of becoming rich and powerful, they have taken no less Care to set them aside by other Doctrines, which to the unthinking or major Part of Mankind, may appear equally good and necessary. And this is the very Course taken by the Church of Rome. They admit the Decalogue, but by their sanguinary Laws against Heretics (made to secure their Usurpations) they have first repealed the Command against Murder; whence have arisen their Crusades, Massacres, Persecutions, solemn Executions, Dragoonings, Confiscations, Banishments, &c. By decreeing no Faith is to be kept with Heretics, they dissolve one of the chief moral Bonds of Society; and by making it lawful to spoil Heretics, and seize their Possessions, they have abrogated the Command which forbids robbing and stealing; By the Doctrine of the deposing Power in the Pope, they violate the Obedience due to Sovereigns and overturn civil Government. Thus after admitting the moral Principles, which are of a universal Nature, they teach their Followers to violate them with Respect to all Mankind, excepting those of their own Persuasion, who make but about one fifteenth of the whole. Then they give all the Encouragement imaginable to Immorality and Vice in their Adherents, by making the Method of obtaining Remission of the greatest Sins very easy, either in this Life by an Indulgence, a Prayer before an Image or on their Knees, or by a verbal Pardon; or else after this Life by Masses and Prayers for the Dead: To which I may add the making their Monasteries and Churches Sanctuaries for Villains of all kinds. To which infamous Doctrines set on Foot for the Interest of the Church are owing the frequent Assassinations, and numerous other Villanies, daily committed in Popish Countries: To them are owing those profligate Dispositions and wicked Practices, which render Papists so abominable in the Eyes of all the unbelieving Nations wherever they come.

(C) Why is it hard to conceive that the superstitious Chinese should be frighten'd with such Chimeras, when the Author knows the Laity of his own Religion are frighten'd in no less a Degree with the like Chimeras; such as Purgatory, no Salvation out of the Pal of their Church, Power of Demons, Witches, Sorcery &c.

(D) I suspect this whole Story; but am almost morally sure the Chinese could not utter these Words, his own Religion being much more rigid as to Penances, Fasting, &c. than the Romish: Which Austerities, instead of being a Mark of a true Church, are an infallible Sign of a false One.

(E) Observe how silly Ignorance, which is the Banian Maxim and the necessary Parent of Error, is here recommended as the Guide to Truth, and Mother of Devotion.

from their Infancy in an idle Profession, this Doctrine is proper to authorise the Frauds and Artifices, which they contrive to excite the Liberality of the People, whereof one may judge the better from the following Relation of P. le Comte.

"Two of these Bonzas, says he, one Day perceiving, in the Court-Yard of a rich Peasant, two or three large Ducks lying before the Door, began to sigh and weep bitterly. The good Woman, who perceived them from her Chamber, coming out to learn the Cause of their Grief: We know, sayd they, that the Souls of our Fathers have passed into the Bodies of these Creatures; and the Apprehension we are under of your killing them, will certainly kill us with Grief. I own, sayd the Woman, that we had resolv'd to sell them, but since they are your Parents I promise to keep them."

This not being what the Bonzas wanted: "Perhaps, sayd they, your Husband will not be so charitable as yourself, and you may depend on it, that it will be fatal to us if any Accident happens to them."

"In short, after a great deal of Discourse, the honest Peasant was so moved with their counterfeit Grief, that she gave them the Ducks to bring up for some time, which they received with great Respect, making twenty several Prostrations before them: But that very Evening they made a Feast of them for their little Society."

In short the Bonzas are dispersed throughout the Empire, and brought up to this Trade from their infancy. These wretches (A), to continue their Sect, buy Children of seven or eight Years old, and make young Bonzas of them, instructing them in their Mysteries for fifteen or twenty Years to qualify them for the Office: But they are generally very ignorant, few of them understanding the Principles whereon their Doctrines are grounded.

As all the Bonzas are not of equal Eminence, there being different Degrees of them, some are employ'd in begging of Alms; others, who have acquired a Knowledge of Books, and speak politely, make it their Business to visit the Learned, and insinuate themselves into the good Graces of the Mandarins: But the Number of these is small. There are likewise among them venerable old Men, who preside over the Assemblies of Women: However these Assemblies are not very numerous, nor to be met with in many Places.

Tho' the Bonzas have not a regular Hierarchy, yet they have their Superiors, whom they call Ta Ho shang, that is, great Bonzas; and this Rank to which they are raised greatly adds to the Reputation they have acquired by their Age, their grave and modest Carriage, and by their Hypocrisy. There are Monasteries of these Bonzas to be found every where, but they are not all equally frequented by crowds of People.

In every Province there are certain Mountains with Idol-Temples thereon, which have greater Credit than the rest. To these they go very far in Pilgrimage, and the Pilgrims, as soon as they are at the Foot of the Mountain, kneel down and prostrate themselves at every Step they take in ascending up (B). They who cannot go on Pilgrimage, request some of their Friends to buy them a large printed Sheet, marked at one corner by the Bonzas, in the Middle of which is the Figure of the God Fo, with a vast Number of small Circles drawn round about it and on its Garments. The Devotees of both Sexes wear on their Neck or Arm a sort of Rosary, composed of a hundred middle-sized Beads, and eight large ones; on the Top is a large Bead resembling one of the little Snuff-Boxes shaped like Gourds. In turning these Beads between their Fingers, they pronounce these mysterious Words O mi to fo, the Signification of which they themselves don't understand (C): They make above a hundred Genuflexions, after which they draw one of these red Circles upon the Sheet of Paper.

They invite the Bonzas, from time to time, to come to their Houses to pray, and to seal and make authentic the Number of Circles which they have drawn. They carry them in a pompous Manner to Funerals in a little Box closely sealed up by the Bonzas: This they call Lü in, that is, a Passport for travelling from this Life to the next (D): This Passport is not obtained without paying several Taels; but, say they, we ought not to begrudge this expence, because we are sure of a happy Voyage.

Among the Temples of the false Gods (E), there are several famous for the Beauty and Largeness of their Structure, as well as for the strange Shapes of their Images; some are so monstrous, that the poor Chinese at the Sight of them fall prostrate, and knock their Forehead several times against the Ground out of Fear and Dread.

(A) Here the Monastic Life is confessed to be an idle Profession by a Monastic.

(B) How nearly do these resemble Popish Pilgrimages.

(C) This is contradicted by what has been already sayd, I have also observed that this answers to the Jesu Maria of Papists, and here we see the very Rosary, or Beads, in use with them, from whom in all likelihood the Papists took it.

(D) This answers to the Figure of the Cross, and other Trumpery put into the Coffins of deceased Papists; burying in the Habit of some Religious Order and the like: Which Privileges are not granted for nothing neither.

(E) I observed before [p. 647. Note A.] That the Missionaries to blacken the Sect of Tau ts represent their Saints, and Heroes as Gods. They do the same by those of the Bonzas, who yet make the very same Defence, when they are charged with Idolatry, as the Romanists of these latter times do. The Lamas, says a very intelligent Author, teach and practise the fundamental Rule of all rational Religion, which consists in honouring God, assisting nobly, and giving to every one what belongs to him. The Life which the Lamas as well as the Kalmucks lead proves incontestably the two last Points; and the Discourses which some Travellers worthy of Credit have had with them teaching Religion assure us, that they protest strenuously against adoring more than one God; That the Dalay Lama and Küükhtü are his Servants, with whom he communicates for the Instruction and Good of Men; That the Images which they honour are no more than Representations of the Divinity and just holy Men; and that they expose them to the View of People, only to put them in mind of their Duty towards God, and the Acts of Virtue which he is pleas'd they should perform. 'Tis true, I do not think this defence frees them from the Charge of Idolatry, which the Worship of Images necessarily includes: But I think it ought to stop the Mouths of the Missionaries, who, on their own Principles, cannot charge the Sectaries of Fo with Idolatry, without confessing themselves guilty of it. Wherefore to avoid the Retort they have misrepresented the Bonzas, and made Gods of their Saints and Images. *Gen. Hist. of Turke, Moguls, &c. Vol. 2. p. 409.

Sanctified
Outside of the Bonzas,

As the Bonzas have no other View than to get Money, and, whatever Reputation they may have acquired, are in reality nothing but the Dregs of the Empire, they are well acquainted with the Art of cringing before People. They affect Mildness, Complaisance, Humility, and a Modesty which deceive at first Sight; while the Chinese who look no farther than the Outside, take them for so many Saints: Especially when to this sanctified Appearance they join rigorous Fasting, and rising several times in a Night to worship Fo; seeming to sacrifice themselves in some sort for the public (A) Good.

And other Tricks to cheat the People.

That they may seem very meritorious in the Eyes of the Vulgar, and work them up to Compassion which disposes them to Liberality, they appear in the public Streets and Places, inflicting on themselves severe Penances. Some will fasten to their Neck and Feet thick Chains above thirty Foot long, which they drag thro' the Street with a great deal of Pain, and stopping at every Door: You see, say they, how dear it costs us to expiate your Sins; cannot you afford us some trifling (B) Alms?

You see others in the most frequented Places and where cross Streets meet, all over Blood by beating their Heads with a great Stone: But among these Kinds of Penances there is none more surprizing than that of a young Bonza, which is related by P. le Comte in the following Manner:

Story of a Knavish Men-
dicant.

"I met one Day in the Middle of a Village, a young Bonza who was affable, mild, modest, and consequently a very proper Person for the Office of begging Charity. He stood upright in a close Chair stuck all over on the Inside with long sharp Nails, in such a Manner that he could not lean without being wounded; and was carried by two hired Porters very slowly into the Houses, where he besought the People to have Compassion on him.

"I am, sayd he, shut up in this Chair for the good of your Souls, and am resolved never to go out till all the Nails (which were above 2000) are bought. Every Nail is worth six Sols: But then there is not one of them but what will become a Fountain of Blessings in your Houses. If you buy any you will perform an Act of heroic Virtue, and you will give an Alms not to the Bonzas on whom you may bestow your Charity otherways, but to the God Fo, to whose Honour we intend to build a (C) Temple.

"I then passed near the Place where the Bonza was, who, as soon as he saw me, made me the same Compliment as he had done the rest. Whereupon I told him he was very unhappy to give himself so much useless Torment in this World; advising him to leave his Prison, and go to the Temple of the true God to be instructed in heavenly Truths, and submit to a Penance less severe and more (D) salutary.

Good Sneeer
on the Jesuit

"He replied very mildly, and without the least Concern, that he was obliged to me for my Council, but much more so if I would buy a dozen of his Nails, which would certainly make me fortunate in my Journey. Here, sayd he, turning himself to one Side, take these which upon the Faith of a Bonza are the best in my Chair, because they give me the most Pain: However they are all of the same Price (E): He pronounced these Words with an Air and Action, which on any other Occasion would have made me laugh: But then his Delusion excited my Pity, and I was pierced with Grief at the Sight of this miserable Slave of the Devil, who suffered more to damn his Soul, than a Romanist is obliged to do to save his."

Bonzas infi-nuate themselves into Families,

The same Motive of getting Alms causes these Bonzas to repair to the Houses of both Poor and Rich, the instant they are sent for. They go, as many as are desired, and stay as long as the Persons please; and when there is any Assembly of Women, (which happens very rarely, and is never practised unless in some few Places, as has been already observed) they bring with them a grand Bonza, who is distinguished from the rest by the Place that he takes, by the Respect the other Bonzas pay him, and by his Habit, which is worn only by those of his Rank.

Especially among the Women.

These Assemblies of the Ladies bring in a fine Revenue to the Bonzas, there being in every City several Societies, of ten, fifteen or twenty Women, who are commonly of a good Family and advanced in Years, or else Widows, and consequently have Money to dispose of. These they make Superiors [or Lady Abbesses] of the Society in their Turns for one Year; and it is generally at the Superior's House that the Assemblies are held: All the rest contributing a certain Sum of Money to defray the common Expences, necessary for keeping up Order.

Religious Female Assemblies.

On the Day when the Assembly is held, there comes a pretty aged Bonza, who is President, and sings the Anthems to Fo. The Devotees join their Voices, and after they have several times

cried

(A) This is the very Character of the Papish Priests, who by their hypocritical Outside, impose on the unthinking Multitude, who led wholly by Appearances never look deeper.

(B) Is not this in effect, the Practice of the Mendicant Friars in Papish Countries.

(C) This Contrivance is not so oppressive and scandalous as that of the Priests preaching up and selling (or rather of the People being forced to buy) Indulgencies in Spain, Portugal, &c. but will doubtless be altogether as effectual for the good of the Soul.

(D) We hear a great deal of these Millionaries Reproofs and Arguments used to the Bonzas against their Religion, but no Defence or Reply of theirs; as if they had nothing to say for themselves, or were very ignorant, as they are often represented. However, the contrary of this appears from the Relation of a Romish Gentleman, who in his Way to China, thro' the Country of the Mongals (or Mongols) having had an Opportunity of discursing with some of the Lamas about their Religion, began to reproach them for so cruelly deceiving the Vulgar, by making them believe the Kütükhtü and the Dalay lama, are immortal; a Quality which, he sayd, they could not be ignorant, did not belong to Human Creatures, such as they could not deny those two to be. But they knew so well how to turn the Reproach upon himself, by putting him in Mind of some delicate Doctrines of the Roman Church relating to the Infallibility and Supremacy of Popes, that he assured me, says my Author, whose Friend the Gentleman was, that he had Need of all his Skill to bring himself off with Honour. Which shews, continues he, that these People are not altogether so ignorant of the Religions of other Nations, as we are willing to believe. And as he is a Person of Merit, and a good Roman Catholic, to whom this Adventure happened, there is no Room to doubt the Truth of the Fact. I shall only add, that if they are not ignorant of other Religions, it is not probable they are ignorant of their own, tho' they are shy in divulging it, as the same Author observes. * See Gen. Hist. of the Turks, Moguls and Tatars, Vol. 2. p. 489, 490, also p. 488.

(E) This is a curious Piece of Rallery from one idolatrous Priest to another: For the Bonza doubtless knew him to be a Papish Priest who traded with Relics, and such sort of Trumpery as well as himself.

cried O mi to, Fo, and beaten upon some small Kettles, they sit down to Table and regale themselves: But this is only the ordinary Ceremony.

On the more solemn Days, they adorn the House with several Images placed in Form by the Bonzas, and Numbers of grotesque Paintings representing in a hundred different Manners the Torments of Hell. The Prayers and Feasting last for seven Days; during which Time the grand Bonza is assisted by several Bonzas, who join in the Confort.

During these seven Days, their principal Care is to prepare and consecrate Treasures (A) for the other World. To this purpose they build a little Palace with Paper painted and gilt, omitting no Part belonging to a House: This they fill with a great Number of Pasteboard-boxes painted and varnished; containing Ingots of Gold or Silver, (that is to say of gilt Paper) whereof there are several Hundreds, designed to redeem them from the dreadful Punishments that Yen vang, or the King of Hell, inflicts on those who have nothing to give him. They put a Score by themselves, to bribe the Officers of the Tribunal of this King of Shadows; the rest, as well as the House, is for lodging, boarding, and buying some Employment in the other World. They shut all these little Boxes with Padlocks of Paper, and then lock the Doors of the Paper-house, keeping the Keys with great Care.

Consecrated Trifles to relieve the Soul
after Death.

When the Person, who has been at this Expence, happens to die, they first burn the House, in a very serious Manner: Then they burn the Keys both of it and the little Chests, that she may be able to open them and take out the Gold and Silver, which is to be no longer mere Paper, but will be transmuted into fine Silver and Gold, against which tempting Metal Yen vang is not Proof, nothing being more easy than to corrupt (B) him.

This Hope, joined to that outward Show which attracts the Eyes, makes such an Impression upon the Minds of these poor Chinese, that nothing but an extraordinary Miracle of Grace can undeceive them (C). In a Word, this Exercise of Religion is perfectly free, for they celebrate the Feasts whenever they please; and you are sure always to have good Words from these Jugglers, who promise you long Life, great Honours for your Children, Abundance of Riches in this World, and above all Things contuminate Happiness in the next. Such are the Extravagancies with which they abuse the Credulity of the People: Whereby they have acquired so great an Ascendant over their Minds that Images are every where to be met with, which the blind Chinese invoke incessantly; especially in Times of Sickness, when they are to go any Journey, or when they are in (D) Danger.

Hope and outward Shew the Basis of false Religions.

P. Fontaney in his Voyage from Siam to China, in a Chinese Vessel, was an Eye-witness of all their Ceremonies, which are no less ridiculous than superstitious. They had, says he, on the Poop of their Vessel, a small Image quite black with the Smoak of a Lamp, which burns continually in Honour of it (E); before they sat down to Dinner, they offered it some of the Victuals; and twice a Day they threw into the Sea little Gondolas made of Paper, to the End, that being employed in oversetting those small Boats, he might spare their own.

Superstitious
Ceremonies for appeasing
Storms at Sea.

But if, notwithstanding these Presents and Offerings, the Waves are agitated in an extraordinary manner by the Spirit which as they believe governs them, they then burn a great many Feathers, whose Smoak and bad Smell infect the Air; pretending by this means to lay the Tempest, and to drive the evil Demon far enough off: But at the Sight of a Mountain, in passing the Channel of Cochin-china, where they have built an Idol-temple, they out-did themselves in their Superstitions.

After they had offered Victuals, burnt Perfumes, lighted Wax-candles, thrown several Figures of gilt Paper into the Sea, and prostrated themselves an infinite Number of times (F), the Sailors prepared a small Vessel made of Boards, about four Foot long, with Masts, Shrouds, Sails, Streamers, Compass, Rudder, Boat, Cannons, Provisions, Merchandises, and every thing even to the Book of Accompts. They had disposed upon the Quarter-Deck, the Forecastle, and the Shrouds, as many small Figures of painted Paper as there were Men in the Vessel: They put this Machine upon a Raft, and lifting it up in a great deal of Form, carried it about the Vessel with the Sound of a Drum and Copper-Bason; the Procession being led by a Sailor habited like a Bonza, who fenced with a long Staff, and shouted as loud as possible: Then they let it down slowly into the Sea, and followed it with their Eyes till it was out of Sight, while the Sham Bonza going to the highest Part of the Stern continued his Shouts, and wished it a happy (G) Voyage.

A Naval Procession.

(A) This, with Merits above mentioned, answers to the imaginary Treasure of the Romish Church.

(B) This stands in Place of Indulgences for delivering out the Treasure of the Church, and of Masses for the Dead. This is their Trick for getting Money, under Pretence of delivering the Souls from Purgatory. The Cheats of the Bonzas you see are exactly the same at Bottom, and all directed to the same Ends as those of the Romish Church; from which they differ only in the Contrivance and Manner of carrying them on.

(C) This is the very Case of the Romish Laity, who are as it were enchanted, by the great Security and Hope given them by their Religion, which likewise is calculated by its exterior Pomp to dazzle the Eyes, and work on the Affections instead of the Understandings of its votaries. So that as the same Causes produce the same Effects, the Romish Missionaries must expect the same Insatiation and Obduracy from the Chinese Laity of the Sect of Fo, that the Protestant Divines experience from the Romish Laity, who are, generally speaking, no less ignorant and bigoted in their Way than the Followers of Fo.

(D) This answers to the Papists ascribing the Power of Protection and healing Diseases to their Saints; whom they invoke for that Purpose, commonly at their Shrines, or before their Images in Romish Countries.

(E) Observe the Folly and Malice of these Missionaries, who cannot let so slight a Circumstance pass them, as the Blackness of the Image, altho' they know it cannot be blacker than the Face of the Lady of Loretta herself, occasioned by the very same Cause.

(F) The Parallel holds in almost every thing; this is like the Papists praying to their Saints, and throwing Reliques into the Sea to appease a Storm.

(G) This resembles the Racket made on Board a Portuguese Ship in a Storm, with their Patron St. Anthony; whom they whip and throw into the Sea, if at length he does not become propitious. But it seems the Bonzas have more Respect for their Saints than to treat them in so scurvy a Manner.

Religious As-semblies of Men.

As there are Assemblies of Women where the Bonzas preside, there are likewise Assemblies of Men, which they call Chang chay or Fasters: Every Assembly has its Superior, who is as it were Master of the rest, and has under him a great Number of Disciples called Fu ti, to whom they give the Name of Tse fu, which signifies Doctor-Father.

When they are industrious, and have gained any Reputation, they easily obtain this Office. They preserve in a Family some old Manuscript, handed down from Father to Son for several Generations: This Book is full of impious Prayers which no-body understands (A), and none but the Head of the Family can repeat. Sometimes these Prayers are followed with surprizing Effects; nor needs there any thing more to raise a Man to the Quality of Tse fu, and gain a great Number of Disciples.

Luxurious Fasting.

The Days on which the Assemblies are held all the Disciples have Notice to appear, and no Person dares stay away. The Superior being seated at the lower end of the Hall, towards the Middle, they all prostrate themselves before him, and then form two Ranks; one to the right, and the other to the left. When the Time is come, they recite these unintelligible and impious Prayers; after which they place themselves at the Table, and plunge themselves into all manner of Access: For nothing can be more pleasant than these Chinese Fasters. To say the Truth, they refrain all their Life-time from the Use of Flesh, Fish, Wine, Onions, Garlic, and every thing that heats the Blood; but they know how to make themselves amends with other Provisions, and especially by the Liberty of eating as often as they (B) please.

Fasting a rare Trick to get Money.

We are not to suppose that this Sort of Abstinence is any great Trouble to a Chinese; for there are great Numbers who do not profess the Art of Fasting, and yet are contented with Rice and Herbs for their Food, as not being able to purchase Flesh (C): Nor is it any Surprize that the Professors of this Sect should be so very strict with Respect to their Abstinence that nothing can prevail on them to break it, for it is an easy Trade to them, by which they gain considerable Revenues.

And a Cloak for all Vices

When once they have obtained the Degree of Tse fu, and gained a great Number of Disciples, the Contribution which each of them is obliged to pay on the Days of Meeting, amounts to a considerable Sum in a Year. Besides the Practice of Fasting, is an excellent Device for covering all the Irregularities of an infamous and libertine Life, and for acquiring a Reputation of Sanctity at a very small (D) Expence.

Bonzas Arts to keep their Followers
staunch.

In short, there are no Stratagems nor ridiculous Inventions which these Ministers of Satan have not recourse to, in order to keep their Followers staunch in their Devotion to the God Fo, and to alienate them from the Preachers of the Gospel (E). One while they persuade them, that the Missionaries seek only to strengthen themselves by the Number of their Disciples, in order to execute Designs destructive to the State; that they gain their Disciples by Help of Money, and that they never want Money, as having the Art of counterfeiting it. Sometimes they make them believe, that the Missionaries pluck out the Eyes of their Profelites to make Telescopes of, for observing the Stars; at other times, they pretend that their Design in coming to China is to make Converts, which are scarce in Europe; that when once a Person who has gone over to them comes to die, there is no escaping out of their Hands; and that by means of certain Charms which they cast upon Souls, they force them to pass over into Europe: Behold, say they, what Dangers we are exposed to from them.

These Extravagancies pronounced with an Air of Confidence and Authority do not fail to impose on credulous Minds. However it must be confessed, they do not make much Impression on the better Sort (F): For, notwithstanding the sanctified Looks which the Bonzas put on, they are known for the most Part to lead debauched Lives; nor have they much Access to a certain sort of People, who think of nothing but indulging themselves, and whose Religion consists only in odd Superstitions, which every one follows according to his Fancy.

Interior Doctrine of Fo.

But be this as it will, what has been mentioned hitherto relates only to the exterior Doctrine of Fo, accommodated to the Artifices which the Bonzas have contrived to impose on the Credulity of the People (G). As to the interior Doctrine, every one is not capable of comprehending its Mysteries,

(A) How then does he know they are impious? What Abundant Malice betrays him into.

(B) This looks invidious, and is only a bare Assertion of an Enemy. But supposing it fact, it is no more than what is practiced by the Ramish Priests themselves as well as the Laity; who regale themselves on fasting Days with the most delicious Things they are allowed to eat, besides drinking Wine and other heating Liquors, which the Bonzas abstain from.

(C) This is a pious way of running down the Benzian Fasting; for is it not the Case of the poor and ordinary sort of People in Popish Countries, especially Spain, Portugal, &c?

(D) I cannot but admire the Weakness of the Author in making these Discoveries and using Arguments, which not only may be turned on the Priests of his Religion, but have actually often been retorted on them by Protestant Divines. All that can be said, is, that he writes not for Protestants, but for Popish Bigots, who never make Use of their Senses.

(E) Is not this the very Practice of the Popish Clergy themselves? Don't they for this End keep the Bible out of the Hands of the Laity, persuade them that all are damned but those of their own Communion, and that Protestants allow Salvation in their Church; forbid them to read Protestant Books, or hear their Arguments, and tell a thousand monstrous and ridiculous Lies to inspire them with Hatred to their Persons as well as their Religion? The Motive to all this on both Sides, is the Fear of losing their Wealth and Power. But the greatest Security the Bonzas can have against the Progress of Popery among them, is the great Conformity between the two Religions: For by the Change, their Followers see they will be just in the same Condition they were before; there being nothing of Novelty to induce them, excepting what arises from the Difference of a few Forms. Besides, they must naturally have a greater Respect for the Saints, Images, and Ceremonies of their own, than those of a foreign Manufacture.

(F) Nor do the Ramish Absurdities and Superstitions gain Credit with the better Sort: but such are called Heretics, and treated as Malefactors (by the sanctified Clergy of that Church) if they dare speak their Minds.

(G) On the whole, (notwithstanding the Account here given, is very imperfect, and otherways disguised by the Author, or those who have sent him the Memoirs) this exterior Doctrine improved by the imposing Bonzas is manifestly so like Christianity, as metamorphosed and cooked up by the Ramish Clergy, that I cannot but think one of them is copied from the other. The Jesuits indeed sensible of the Conformity, and not able to disguise it sufficiently, would have it thought to be a Corruption of Christianity, which they suggest once prevailed in Tibet, and other Parts whence the Bonzas came: But as it appears by their own Account, from the Chinese History, that the Religion of Fo was in those Countries a thousand Years before Christ, it may well be presumed they think the contrary, and that their own Religion was taken from thence, in all the similar Articles Mysteries, not only the common People, but the Generality of the Bonzas themselves, being too stupid to partake thereof; for those who are initiated, must have a sublime Genius fit for attaining the highest Perfection.

This interior Doctrine, which the Masters of the Sect pretend to be the only true, and solid one, is the same that was taught by Fo in the last Moments of his Life, and which his Disciples, in whom he most confided, have taken care to explain and propagate. We need only mention this ridiculous System, to shew what Excess of Folly and Extravagance Mankind is capable of running into.

They teach that a Vacuum, or Nothing, is the Beginning and End of all Things; that from Nothing our first Parents had their Original, and to Nothing they returned after their Death; that the Vacuum is what constitutes our Being and Substance; that from this Nothing, and the Mixture of the Elements, all Things were produced, and to them shall return; that all Beings differ from one another only by their Shape and Qualities, in the same Manner as Snow, Ice, and Hail differ from each other; or as a Man, a Lion, or some other Creature made of the same Metal, differ from each other, which being melted down, lose their Shape and Qualities, but remain the same as to Substance.

Thus, say they, all Beings, as well animate as inanimate, tho' differing in their Form and Qualities, are only the same Thing flowing from the same Principle. This Principle is a most admirable Thing, exceeding pure, entirely free from Alteration, very fine, simple, and by its Simplicity, is the Perfection of all Beings: In short, it is very perfect, and constantly at rest, without either Energy, Power, or Understanding; nay more, its Essence consists in being void of Understanding, Action, or Desires. In order to live happy, we must continually strive by Meditation, and frequent Victories over our selves, to become like this Principle, and to this Purpose must accustom ourselves to do nothing, to wish for nothing, to be sensible of nothing, and to think of nothing. Vices, or Virtues, Rewards or Punishments, Providence and the Immortality of the Soul are quite out of the Question; all Holiness consists in ceasing to be, and in being swallowed by Nothing. The nearer one approaches to the Nature of a Stone, or the Trunk of a Tree, the more perfect he is; in short, it is in Indolence and Inactivity, in a Cessation of all Desires, in a Privation of every Motion of the Body, in an Annihilation of all the Faculties of the Soul, and in the general Suspension of all Thought, that Virtue and Happiness consist. When a Man has once attained this blessed State, all his Vicissitudes and Transmigrations being at an end, he has nothing to fear afterwards, because properly speaking he is nothing; or if he is any thing, he is happy; and to say every thing in one Word, he is perfectly like the God Fo.

This Doctrine is not without its Followers even at Court, where some Grandees embraced it: The Emperor Kau tsong was so bewitched with it, that he resigned the Empire to his adopted Son, that he might give himself up entirely to these stupid and senseless Meditations.

However, the greater Part of the Literati have opposed this Sect of the false Contemplatists, and among others a famous Ko lau, Pwey ghey, a Disciple of Confucius. They attacked it with all their Might, proving that this Apathy, or rather this monstrous Stupidity, of neither doing nor thinking of any thing, overturned all Morality and civil Society; that Man is superior to other Beings, only in that he thinks, reasons, applies himself to the Knowledge of Virtue, and practises it; that to aspire after this foolish Inactivity, is renouncing the most essential Duties, and abolishing the necessary Relation of Father and Son, Husband and Wife, Prince and Subject; that in short if this Doctrine was followed, it would reduce all the Members of a State to a Condition much inferior to that of Beasts.

Thus China is become a Prey to all Sorts of ridiculous and extravagant Opinions: And tho' the Literati oppose the above-mentioned Sects, and treat them as Heresies, altho' they have often inclined the Court to extirpate them throughout the Empire, yet they have hitherto been tolerated, either thro' Fear of exciting Commotions among the Commonality, who are strangely addicted to Images, or because they have had secret Favourers and Protectors among the Literati themselves; many of whom being sprung from the Dregs of the People, with Difficulty quit the Superstitions wherein they were brought up: So that all they ever do, is to condemn them in general as Heresies, which is put in Practice every Year at Pe king.

It is this monstrous Heap of Superstitions, Magic, Idolatry and Atheism, that, having very early infected the Minds of many of the Literati, has spawned a Sect which serves instead of Religion or Philosophy: For we cannot tell what to make of it, and it is well if they can themselves.

Of the Sect of certain Literati of these later Times.

THE modern Doctors, who are Authors of a new Doctrine, by which they pretend to clear up whatever is obscure in the ancient Books, appeared under the nineteenth Family, or that of the Song, above a thousand Years after Idolatry had been brought into China. The Troubles that the different Sects, and the Wars caused in the Empire, entirely banished from it the Love of the Sciences, and introduced Ignorance and Corruption of Manners, which prevailed there for many Ages.

There were then not any Doctors capable of rousing Men's Minds from so general a Lethargy; but the Taste which the Imperial Family of the Song had for the ancient Books, and their Esteem for Persons of Learning reviving by little and little an Emulation for Literature, There arose among the principal Mandarins, Men of Genius and Merit, who undertook to explain not only the ancient Canonical Books, but the Interpretation made thereon by Confucius, his Disciple Mençius, and other celebrated Writers.

Interpreters of the ancient Books.

These Interpreters, who gained a great Reputation, appeared about the Year of Christ 1070: The most famous were Chu tse and Ching tse, who published their Works under the Reign of the sixth Prince of the Song; Chu bi distinguished himself so greatly by his Capacity, that they honoured him with the Name of Prince of the Literati. Tho' these Authors have been in vogue for these 5 or 600 Years past, yet they are still look'd upon as modern, especially when compared with the ancient Interpreters, who lived fifteen Ages before them.

Ancient Doc-
into a Body.

In a Word, about the Year of our Lord, 1400, Yong lo, third Emperor of the 21st Race, or Tay ming Family, made Choice of forty two of the most able Doctors, whom he commanded to reduce the Doctrine, fit for the Learned to follow, into one Body; and to adhere chiefly to the Commentaries of Chu tse and Ching tse, who flourished under the Song.

But corrupted by the Compilers.

These Mandarins applied themselves to this Work; and besides interpreting the Canonical Books with those of Confucius and Mençius, they composed another containing twenty Volumes, and gave it the Title of Sing li ta tswen, that is, Of Nature, or Natural Philosophy. They followed, according to their Orders, the Doctrines of the two Writers above-mentioned, who lived but three Ages before; and that they might not seem to deviate from the Sense and Doctrine of the ancient Books which are so much esteemed in the Empire, they endeavoured by false Interpretations, and wresting the Meaning, to make them speak their own Sentiments.

The Authority of the Emperor, the Reputation of those Mandarins, their ingenious and polite Style, the new Method of handling the Subject, with their Vaunts of understanding the ancient Books, gave a Reputation to their Works, and many of the Literati were deluded thereby.

Their me-
ceeding.

These new Doctors pretended, that what they taught was founded on the I king, the most ancient of the Chinese Books: But their Explanations were very obscure, and full of equivocal Expressions as well as Contradictions. They made Use of certain Terms, aiming to have it thought they still retained the old Doctrines, and yet in reality advancing a new Doctrine; seeming to speak like the Ancients with Relation to the Object of the primitive Worship, and at the same time giving to those Words such an impious Sense as destroys all sort of Worship. The following is a Sketch of their System, which is hard to make Sense of, and perhaps the Inventors did not well

Call the first principle Tay
ki.

understand it themselves. They gave the first Principle of all Things, the Name of Tay ki; and as this Name, by the Confession of Chu tse himself whom they follow in their System, was known neither to Fo bi, the Author of the I king and Founder of the Monarchy, nor to Yen wang, or Chew kong his Son, its Interpreters, (who lived but 1700 Years after Fo bi according to the Opinion of many Chinese) they build on the Authority of Confucius.

Nevertheless P. Couplet, who was well versed in the Books of the Chinese, informs us that Prince of Philosophers mentions it but once; and that only in a short Appendix at the End of his Book, containing his Exposition of the I king; where he says: That the Transmutation contains the Tay ki, and that the latter produce to Qualities, the Perfect and the Imperfect; that these two Qualities produce four Images; and that these four Images produce eight Figures.

Excepting this single Text, there is not a Word of the Tay ki, either in the five Canonical Books called U king (*), or in the four others of Confucius and Mençius; so that the 42 Doctors say, they are beholden to the two Expositors who wrote under the Family of the Song, for having discovered this profound and hidden Doctrine, which was unknown to all Antiquity.

What this
Tay ki is.

Altho' they say, this Tay ki is something not to be expressed, that it is impossible to explain it, that it is separated from Imperfections and Matter, and that one cannot find a Name suitable to it, yet they endeavour to give such an Idea of it, as may authorise their Opinion. And as these two Words Tay ki, signifies Great Pole, or the Ridge of a House, they say, it is with respect to other Beings, what the Ridge is with respect to an Edifice; that it serves to unite together and preserve all the Parts of the Universe, just as the Ridge unites and supports all the Parts which compose the Roof of a House.

They compare it also to the Root of a Tree, and Axel-tree of a Waggon; they call it the Pivot on which the whole turns; the Basis, the Pillar, and the Foundation of all Things. It is not, say they, a chimerical Being like the Vacuum of the Bonzas, but it is a real Being which had Existence before all Things, and yet is not distinguishable from them: For it is the same thing with the Perfect and the Imperfect, the Heaven, the Earth, and the five Elements, inasmuch that every thing may in some Sense be called Tay ki.

A being immovable and ignorant of its own Operations.

They say likewise, that it ought to be considered as a thing immoveable and at rest; when it moves, it produces Yang, which is a perfect subtle active Matter, and in continual Motion; when at rest, it produces Li, a gross imperfect Matter, and without Motion: This is not unlike a Man who keeps himself at Rest, while he profoundly meditates upon a Subject, and proceeds from Rest to Motion when he has investigated what he meditated upon. From the Mixture of these two Sorts of Matter, arise the five Elements, which by their Union and Temperament form the Universe, and the Difference that is found among Bodies: Hence arise the continual Vicissitudes of the several Parts of the Universe, the Motion of the Stars, and the Immobility of the Earth, with the Fruitfulness or Sterility of the Plains. They add, that this Matter, or rather this Virtue diffused thro' Matter, produces, disposes in proper Order, and preserves all Parts of the Universe; That it is the Cause of all the Changes, and yet is ignorant of its own regular Operations.

However,

(*) U signifies five, King stands for the Canonical Book.

However, nothing is more surprizing than to read of the Perfections that these modern Commentators attribute to their Tay ki: They give it infinite Extension and Immensity; it is, say they, a most pure and perfect Principle, without either Beginning or End; it is the Idea, the Model, and the Source of all Things, and the Essence of all other Beings: In short, in other Places, they consider it as an animated Being, and give it the Name of Soul and Spirit; they even speak as if they looked upon it as the supreme Understanding which produced all Things, Did they not disagree with themselves, and in endeavouring to reconcile their System with the ancient Books, fall into the most manifest Contradictions. Some Passages also of their Books, have induced the Chinese to raise Temples to Tay ki.

To the same Being which they call Tay ki, they likewise give the Name of Li: 'Tis this, say they farther, which joined to Matter is the Composition of all natural Bodies, which constitutes each particular Being, and distinguishes it from all others. Their Method of reasoning is as follows: You make out of a Piece of Wood a Stool or a Table; but the Li gives the Wood the Form of the Table or Stool, and when they are broken, the Li of neither subsists any longer.

They reason the same way with Respect to Morality: They call Li that which establishes the reciprocal Duty between the Prince and Subject, Father and Son, Husband and Wife; they give likewise the Name of Li to the Soul, because it informs the Body; and when it ceases to inform it, the Li is said to be destroyed; in the same Manner, say they, as frozen Water dissolved by Heat, loses the Li whereby it became Ice, and resumes its Fluidity and natural Being.

In short, when they have disputed in this perplexed and scarce intelligible Manner concerning the Nature of the Tay ki and Li, they necessarily fall into Atheism; in as much as they exclude every efficient supernatural Cause, and admit no other Principle than an inanimate Virtue united to Matter, to which they give the Name of Li or Tay ki.

But they find themselves most embarrassed, when they attempt to elude the numerous Passages in the ancient Books, which speak distinctly of Spirits, of Justice, of the Providence of a Supreme Being, and the Knowledge which he has of the Secrets of Men's Hearts, &c. likewise when they endeavour to reconcile them to their own gross Conceptions, they inevitably fall into fresh Contradictions, destroy in one Place what they establish in another, of which I shall produce a few Instances.

They teach distinctly that the Soul, by the Empire which it has over its Motions and Affections, may come to the Knowledge of the Supreme Soul, that Understanding which governs all Things; that likewise, the bare Consideration of that wonderful Manner by which the several Beings propagate themselves, each Species producing its Likeness, proves evidently that there is one great intelligent Being, which preserves, governs, and conducts all Things to their proper Ends in the most convenient Manner: They go so far, as to deny this Being to be either inanimate or material; they even affirm that it is a Spirit, that it contains the Excellence of all other Beings, and gives Being to every thing which subsists.

It is no Wonder these modern Commentators should torture their Wits to make their Opinions agree with the ancient Books, since the Principles which they admit were unknown to the ancient Chinese.

I have already observed, that their Tay ki is to be found neither in the I king, which consists only of a Table of 64 Figures, composed out of 84 Lines, some intire, some broken; nor in the Interpretations made of them 1700 Years after Fo bi; nor in the Sbu king, and the other Classical Books. In short, it occurs only, and that but once in a brief Appendix which Confucius has added to his Expositions of the I king. As for the Li, it is no where spoken of in the Sense given it by these new Commentators.

We see then the famous Tay ki has been hatched about 3000 Years after Fo bi; and 1600 after Confucius, who mentions it but once, and, as the most skilful Expositors affirm, meant nothing else by it than the first Matter.

However it must be allowed, that these Commentators have done a Service to the Empire in reviving a Taste for the ancient Books: But then they have done a World of Mischief to a great Number of the middling sort of Literati, who minding less to dive into the Meaning of those precious Monuments themselves, than to fill their Heads with the Notions of the new Commentators, seem to have embraced a kind of Atheism; to which they were before not a little byassed, as well by the Depravation of their Morals, as by the Superstitions wherein they were bred from their Infancy.

However, if we may credit the Testimonies of a great Number of Missionaries, who have spent the chief Part of their Lives in the Empire, and gained an exact Knowledge of the Chinese Affairs, as well by studying their Books, as conversing with the most eminent Literati, The truly Learned have not given into these mad Notions; but without regarding the extravagant Opinions of modern Commentators, adhere strictly to the Text of the ancient Books, according to a Maxim common among them: Sin king pû Sin cbwen, that is, adhere to the Text, and never mind the (A) Commentary.

In effect, it is to the Text and not the Gloss, that all the Literati have right to appeal: In the Text alone, the Chinese Doctrine is marked and fixed, and every thing which the modern Expositors have advanced is without Authority, so long as it appears to be repugnant to the Classic Books. These truly Learned adhering solely to the Text of these Books, have the same Idea of the Supreme Being as the ancient Chinese, and like them understand by the Words (B) Shang ti and Tyen

(A) This is the Protestant Rule also: But the Papist Clergy say to their People, adhere to the Interpretations of the Church, and never mind the Scripture or Text.

(B) Observe that it is not the truly Learned, but the Superstitious and Ignorant who fall into Errors.

Yet infinite, perfect eternal, and intelligent.

in what sense called Li.

They endeavour to elude the ancient Doctrines.

The Tay ki and Li new Inventions.

Many Literati infected with them,

But not the more learned Sort.

The Text not, the Exposition, of Authority.

Tyen (A), not the visible and material Heaven, or a celestial Virtue inanimate and destitute of Understanding, but the first Being, the Author and Principle of all other Beings, the Supreme Lord who disposes of all, who governs all, who enters into the Secrets of the Heart, and from whom nothing is hidden; who punishes Vice, and rewards Virtue, who exalts and casts down at his Pleasure, who ought to be honoured by the Practice of Virtue, &c.

Thus nothing is more common than to hear these Literati complain that the Innocence, Candor, and Simplicity of the primitive Ages is intirely forgotten; that the Learned neglect the ancient Monuments; that many of them are the Disciples of Confucius only in Name; and have no other View but to attain Employments and Dignities, and gain a Reputation by blinding the Eyes of the People with their vain Eloquence.

Mistake of several Missonaries.

Nevertheless as there are Literati, who, by following the modern Commentators and explaining every thing by natural Causes, give way to Atheism and acknowledge no other first Principle than a blind and material Celestial Virtue, the Missionaries newly come to China, were induced to believe it was the common Opinion of the Learned. They agreed however that if the Emperor should explain the true Signification of the Words Tyen and Shang ti, by declaring that he understands by those Words, the Lord of Heaven, and not the material Heaven, their Doubts would vanish, and they would not wrong the Learned of that great Empire so much as to consider them as real Atheists. It is absolutely necessary that the Emperor should speak, says Mr. MAIGROT, the Emperor must explain it. They knew that the late Emperor Kang hi was well versed in the Chinese Books; that it belonged to him as Emperor to examine the Doctors; that he was the Head of the Religion and Doctrine of the Literati; that it was he who judged Sovereignly of the true Sense of the Laws, Ceremonies and Customs, in Quality of High Priest, Legislator, and Master of the Empire.

Emperor
Kang hi's
Explanation of Shang ti
and Tyen.

They therefore resolved in 1700 to consult that Prince, in such a Manner, that he should not perceive their Drift in applying to him for his Explanation. Whereupon he declared by an Edict which was preserved in the Archives, inserted in the public Gazets, and spread all over the Empire: That it was not to the visible and material Heaven that Sacrifices were offered, but only to the Lord and Master of Heaven, the Earth, and all Things; and that for the same Reason, the Tablet before which those Sacrifices were offered, bear this Inscription, to Shang ti, that is to say, to the Supreme Lord; that it is thro' Respect, that none dare call him by his proper Name; and that they use to invoke him by the Name of Supreme Heaven, Bountiful Heaven, and Universal Heaven; in the same Manner as when they speak with Reverence of the Emperor, they call him not by his own Name but say, the Steps of his Throne, the Supreme Court of his Palace; that these Names, tho' different as to the Terms, are yet the same, if Regard be had to the Signification. On another Occasion speaking in Public, he affirms, the learned Chinese say, like him, that the Principle of all Things is called Tyen, Heaven, in a noble and figurative Stile, just as the Emperor is called Chau ting from the Name of his Palace, which is the Place wherein the Imperial Majesty shines with greatest Splendor.

They consulted likewise the Princes, the Grandees of the Empire, the chief Mandarins and principal Literati, and among others, the first President of the imperial Academy, composed of the

the most eminent Doctors, who are properly the Emperor's Literati. All appeared surprized to find there should be learned Men in Europe who believed that the Literati of China honoured a lifeless inanimate Being, such as the visible and material Heaven; and unanimously declared that in invoking Tyen or Shang ti, they invoked the Supreme Lord of Heaven, the Author and Principle of all Things, the Distributer of all Good, who sees every thing, who knows every thing, and whose Wisdom and Providence governs this Universe. What! cried some of them, do we think that every Family ought to have a Head, every City a Governor, every Province a Viceroy, and the whole Empire an independent absolute Master, and can we doubt that there is a first Intelligence, a Supreme Being, a Sovereign Lord of the Universe, who governs with Wisdom and Justice? Do not our ancient Books teach us this? And have we not learned it from our primitive Sages?

We may also know the Sentiments of the same Emperor by the three Inscriptions (*), which he wrote with his own Hand, and gave the Jesuits of Pe king for the Church which they built near the Gate Shun chi mwen, and towards which in the Year 1705, he contributed by a Present of 10,000 Ounces of Silver. The Characters of the Inscription of the Frontispiece are two Chinese (†) Foot and a half high: Those of the Inscriptions on each Column are near one Foot high. Tong ching, who succeeded his Father Kang hi, had the same Idea of Tyen, with him and the Learned of his Empire; as appears from the Manner wherein he speaks in an Edict, published on the following Occasion.

This Prince, always attentive to the Necessities of his People, being informed that the dryness of the Season threatened one of his Provinces with a general Dearth, he immediately shut himself up in his Palace, fasted and prayed till he understood that Plenty of Rain had fallen; after which he published the above-mentioned Edict, wherein, testifying how much he was touched with the Miseries of his People, he ordered all the great Mandarins to inform him carefully whenever any Calamity afflicted their respective Districts, concluding with these Words: There is between Tyen and Mankind an Intercourse of Faults and Punishments, of Prayers and Benefits. Do your Duty, and avoid committing Faults: For it is for your Sins that Tyen punishes us. When Tyen sends any Calamity let us watch over ourselves, mortify ourselves, correct ourselves and pray: 'Tis by praying and correcting ourselves that we mollify Tyen. I do not publish this Order as though I thought myself capable of moving Heaven, but I do it the better to persuade you that there is the Intercourse I have mentioned between Tyen and Men of Faults and Punishments, of Prayers and Benefits.

But he explains himself still more clearly in an Instruction which he gives his People, on Occasion of a Request presented him by one of the first Officers of the Empire. A Superintendent of two Provinces wrote to the Emperor, that in all Places where Temples had been erected in Honour of the General of the Army Lyew mong, neither the Grasshoppers nor Worms did any Damage to the Plains, and that on the contrary the Territories where they had raised no Temple to him always suffered by their Ravages. Other great Mandarins having proposed to him several superstitious Expedients to obtain Rain or fair Weather in Time of Need, his Majesty gave the following Instruction by way of answer, which was published throughout the Empire, and fixed up in the Cities at the Corners of Streets with the Mandarin's Seal.

"With Regard to my giving Notice to some of the principal Officers of the Provinces to prevent the Damage which the Insects might occasion in the Plains, they have misunderstood the Intention of my Orders, and applied a Meaning which does not belong to them. They very wrongly imagine that I give into the ridiculous Error of those who put their Confidence in the Spirits called Quey shen, as if I believed that those pretended Spirits could relieve our Afflictions. This then is my Meaning:

"There is between Tyen and Mankind, a sure and infallible Correspondence as to Rewards and Punishments. When our Fields are ravaged, either by Inundations, Drought or Insects, what is the Cause of such Calamities? They proceed perhaps from the Emperor himself, who swerves from that Uprightness necessary for governing well, and constrains Tyen to employ those Chastisements, in order to oblige him to return to his Duty. Perhaps also they are owing to this, that the principal Officers of the Province, on which these Evils fall, do not seek the public Good, and make Justice the Rule of their Conduct. May not these Calamities likewise arise from hence, that the Governors of Cities neither act with Equity, nor give the People good Examples and Instructions; or else from hence, that in such a Province or Country they violate the Laws, despise the Usages, and live in Disorder? Then the Heart of Man being corrupted, that excellent Union, which ought to subsist between Tyen and him, is disturbed and broken; in Consequence whereof Adversities and Misfortunes pour down upon us in abundance. For Men failing of their Duty in this World, Tyen changes the gracious Inclination which he had towards them.

"Being persuaded that this Doctrine is infallibly true, as soon as I am informed that any Province suffers, either by a long Drought or excessive Rains, I immediately enter into myself, examine carefully my own Conduct, and resolve to rectify the Disorders introduced into my Palace. I remain all the Day long filled with Respect and Fear: I study to render Tyen Marks of Uprightness and Piety, in hopes that by a regular Course of Life I may change the Disposition which Tyen is in to punish us.

"'Tis your Business, great Officers who govern the Provinces, 'tis your Business to second my Intentions. It belongs to you Governors of Cities, it belongs to you People, Soldiers and others, of what Quality and Condition soever ye be, to acquit yourselves also of this Duty. Watch over yourselves, stand in Fear, examine your Condition, labour to perfect yourselves,

(†) The Chinese Foot is somewhat larger than the Foot of the Chateau of Paris.

" mutually assist and exhort one another, reform your Manners, use your Endeavours, correct your Faults, repent of your Sins, follow the Path of Virtue, forsake that of Error, and rest assured that, if on our Parts we do all our Duties, Tyen will suffer himself to be mollified by our regular Conduct, and we shall draw down upon us his Peace and Protection. Scarcity and Affliction will disappear, while Plenty and Joy will succeed in their stead; and we shall have the Pleasure of seeing that renewed in our Days which was admired here, before under the happy Reign of the illustrious Prince Cbing tang.

Way to a void Calamities.

" For I cannot too often remind you, that to prevent Calamities, there is no surer way than to watch over yourselves, to stand in Fear, and labour to become perfect; you must examine your Conduct, correct your Faults, sincerely honour and revere Tyen: For it is by this Attention and this Reverence, that you must expect to touch and mollify him. When we bid you pray to and invoke the Spirits, what is our Intention thereby? 'Tis no more than to bespeak their Mediation, in order to lay before Tyen the Sincerity of our Veneration and Fervency of our Desires. To pretend then in any wise to rely on those Prayers and Invocations for removing from us Misfortunes and Afflictions so long as we neglect to perform our Duty, to watch over ourselves, and to keep our Hearts in the Respect and Fear proper to move Tyen, is to expect to meet with Water in the Brook after closing up its Spring; it is to quit that which is essential, to follow what is only incidental. How can you by such a Conduct hope to obtain the Accomplishment of your Wishes?

Man the Author of his own Misfortunes.

" Moreover consider that Tyen naturally delights to do good, to scatter his Favours, preserve and protect us. If he makes Use of Severity, 'tis the Man who draws it on himself. 'Tis he alone who is the Author of his own Misfortune. And what is most deplorable, the common People who are ignorant and incapable of Reflection, finding themselves afflicted either with excessive Rain or Drought, instead of entering into themselves, examining their own Conduct and correcting their wrong Steps, give themselves over to Grief and Despair; and thus adding Faults to Faults, and Crimes to Crimes, fill up the Measure of their own Unhappiness. For to proceed in such a manner, is to destroy more and more the Union which ought to subsist between Tyen and Mankind; it is in short, to constrain Tyen to discharge upon us his most dreadful Punishments. For my Part, I make no doubt, but the Dearth and other Calamities, which has afflicted us for several Years past, are owing to the Disorders that I speak of.

" Observe then once more what my Opinion is, I am really and entirely persuaded, that there is between Tyen and Mankind a reciprocal Union and perfect Correspondence. I am far from putting my Faith in those Spirits called Quey shin. 'Tis in order to instruct you, especially you the great Officers of the Crown and of the Provinces, that I have not disdained to take in Hand the Pen and explain clearly my Opinion, to the end that you may all conform yourselves to my Sentiments, which is the sole Aim of this Instruction."

The Existence of God and his attributes proved from the Classical Books.

Several Years ago P. Favre, in a Dispute which he had in Presence of 300 Literati, proved from several Passages of the Classical Books, the Existence of a God, his Justice, Goodness, Providence and other Perfections; nor did any of them offer to contradict the Interpretation which he put on their ancient Authors.

A great many Christians, in the Compositions which they are obliged to make for obtaining the Degrees, or keeping them when obtained, have followed the same Method; and instead of incurring the Raillery of the Learned, have met with the Praises and Rewards which they deserved. Sbang king, during the Time that he aspired to his Doctor's Degree, filled the Commentaries which he made on the I king with the like Principles and Maxims, whereby he merited the Approbation of the Learned.

Sect of Literati divided.

From what has been said it appears, that the Sect of the Literati, which is the established one, may properly be divided into two Classes.

Some adhere to the Commentaries.

The first are those who, paying little Regard to the Commentaries of the Moderns, stick closely to the Text of the Classical Books, and have the same Notion of the Supreme Being the Author of the Universe, as the old Chinese, that is, those who lived between the Time of Po hi, and the new Commentators.

Others to the Text of the Classics.

The second are those who, neglecting the Text, seek the Sense of the ancient Doctrine in the Glosses of the new Commentators, and adhering like them to a new Philosophy think to gain a Reputation by their confused and dark Notions; endeavouring to persuade People that they are able to explain every thing by material Causes: Whereto they attribute not only the Production but also the Government of the World, and even their Reason, and yet profess like the others a profound Veneration for the ancient Doctrine, and call themselves the Disciples of Confucius! But the true Disciples of Confucius study him at the Fountain Head, whereas the others seek for his Doctrine only in a small Brook turned out of its true Course, and fall it may be without design into the most frightful Mazes of Atheism.

Objections of certain Missionaries to their Proofs.

However this be, as I here only act the Part of an Historian in relating the Opinions of a great Number of Missionaries who have lived all their Lives in China, I ought not to conceal what some others, persuaded that all the Learned of this Empire are Atheists, oppose to these Testimonies of the Emperor and the principal Literati.

They say then, that the Emperor explained himself in that Manner, and the Literati gave their Testimonies merely thro' Politeness (*) and Complaisance; that the Emperor's Declaration is conceived vationes Ep. Con. p. 134. ibid. pp. 123, 124. [It seems impossible the Emperor should dissemble in this Manner. Without doubt, conceived in equivocal Terms, and is an ambiguous Oracle; in short that no Atheist would refuse to subscribe his Declaration: For tho' that Prince averred that it was not to the visible and material Heaven that he offered Sacrifice, but to the Lord and Creator of Heaven and Earth and all Things, he might mean the Root and Origin of all Beings, which is nothing else but the Li, or celestial Virtue inherent in Matter, which is, according to the Chinese Atheists, the Principal of all Things.

Besides, when we read in their Books, or hear the Chinese affirm, (*) that Life and Death, Poverty and Riches, and all Events in general depend on Tyen or Heaven; that nothing is done but by his Orders, that he rewards the Good and punishes the Wicked, that he cannot be deceived, that he sees all Things, hears all Things, and knows all Things; that he penetrates the secret Recesses of the Heart, that he assists and comforts virtuous People; that his Heart is softened at their Calamities, that he is sensible of their Complaints, and is mollified by their Prayers; that he detests the Proud, abhors the Vicious, &c. All these Expressions, according to them, ought to be looked upon as metaphorical, by which they would have the People understand, that all Things happen as if in reality Heaven was an intelligent Being, rewarded Virtue, punished Vice, &c. (A).

In short, they pretend, that as the Stoics ascribed the Variety of Events to fatal Necessity, in like manner the Chinese Literati attribute to Heaven (that is, to a ruling Virtue in Heaven which influences all Things) Good and Evil, Rewards and Punishments, the Revolutions of States, and in a word all sorts of Events whether happy or unhappy that come to pass in the World; And that it is in this Sense they understand it when they say, that Heaven governs the Universe, rewards good Men, &c.

Having thus given an Account of the Opinions of skillful Persons, who living among the Chinese Literati have thoroughly studied the Doctrine of their Sect, as well as the Thoughts of others who cannot pretend to the same Advantage how good soever their Intentions may be in other Respects, I must not forget a particular sort of Literati very numerous in China, who have composed a System of their own from all the different Sects, and have endeavoured to reconcile all together.

As the Study of Letters is the Road to the highest Dignities, and as it is open to Persons of all Conditions, there must needs be many Literati who being of mean Extraction have been brought up in Idolatry; and when they became Mandarins, either thro' the Prejudice of their Education, or out of a polite Complaisance to the People and to maintain the public Tranquillity, seem to embrace the Opinions of the several different Sects, to which they are so much the rather inclined as the Chinese of all Ranks seldom look farther than the present Life. The Mandarins, who are the living Deities of the Country, have generally no other God but their Fortune; and as that is subject to several troublesome Turns, all their Care is employed to ward off such Misfortunes and to keep themselves safe in their Posts. The Students, who may be looked upon as the lesser Nobility, have nothing at Heart but a certain Honour, which consists in succeeding in their Examinations and attaining to the highest Degree. The Merchants think of nothing from Morning to Night but their Business; and the rest of the People are wholly employed in procuring a Livelihood, that is, a small Quantity of Rice and Pulse: In this Manner is the Time of the Chinese taken up, who scarce ever think of any thing else.

The Literati, of whom I am speaking, are as forward as the other Literati in declaiming against I tū an, that is, false Sects; but Experience shews that they are as much Slaves to Fo as the Vulgar themselves. Their Wives, who are strongly attached to Idols, usually have a kind of Altar in the most honourable Part of their Houses, whereon they place a Company of Images finely gilt; and here, whether out of Complaisance or otherways, these pretended Disciples of Confucius often bow the Knee. Tho' any of them should have Constancy enough to resist the Torrent, at least he will have much Difficulty to withstand the imaginary Methods made Use of for discovering what is to come. When any one of the Family lies a dying, he seldom fails to send for the Bonzas to burn gilt Papers and perform the other Ceremonies; unless he did this, instead of passing for a Philosopher, he would be looked on as a very wicked Man.

The extreme Ignorance of the Chinese greatly contributes to the Readiness wherewith their Doctors, as well as the Vulgar, give into the most ridiculous Superstitions: But this Ignorance has no Relation to their Skill in carrying on Business, for herein they generally exceed the Europeans; nor does it respect their Laws, for no People in the World have better, or are more easily governed; nor yet does it regard one kind of moral Philosophy, which consists of wise Maxims, whereof their Books are full if they would but put them in Practice: But their most skillful Doctors are ignorant of all other Parts of Philosophy, excepting a little of the moral; for they know not how to reason justly on the Effects of Nature, concerning their Souls, or the Supreme Being, with regard to which they seldom trouble their Heads; nor do they employ their Thoughts much about a future State, or the Necessity of Religion. However, there is no Nation in the World more addicted to study: But then they spend their younger Years in learning to read, and the Remainder of their Years is taken up either in the Duties of their Posts, or in composing elegant academical Discourses.

doubt, the true Followers of Confucius are free from Atheism, and perhaps those of the new Sect likewise. For those Missionaries who condemn the new Sect, may wrong them as much as those who condemn the old. In short, the Dispute between them in this single Article (one Part affirming one thing, and the other Part affirming directly the contrary) proves what I have already observed, that they know not how to represent other Religions fairly, and are not much to be regarded in their Censures of them.]

(A) The Missionaries are so addicted themselves to equivocations and mental Reservations, that they cannot believe any body sincere. (*) Ubi Supr. p. 111.

This

The Vulgar
ascribe all natural effects to Demons or Spirits.

This gross Ignorance of Nature makes great Numbers attribute its most common Effects to some evil Genius: But this prevails chiefly among the common People, and especially the Women, who endeavour to appease it by impious and ridiculous Ceremonies. Sometimes this evil Genius is one of their Idols, or rather the Demon which inhabits it (A); Sometimes some high Mountain or great Tree, or an imaginary Dragon which they suppose to be in the Sky or at the bottom of the Sea; or else, which is still more extravagant, it shall be the Quintessence of some Animal, for instance, a Fox, an Ape, a Tortoise, a Frog, &c. This is what they call Tsing, or else Tau quay, or Quay singly, which signifies Monster, or some very supprising Thing.

Ridiculous Notions infused by their villainous Priests,

They affirm, that these Animals after they have lived a long Time have the Power of purifying their Essence, and of divesting themselves of whatever is gross and earthly; and this most subtle Part which remains, delights to disturb the Imagination of Men and Women. A Fox thus purified is terribly to be fear'd. When they are sick, and the Fever begins to make them rave, it is undoubtedly the Demon that torments them: Presently they send for the Tau tse, and it is inconceivable how many juggling Tricks they perform and what Din they make in the House.

It is thus the Demon deludes the People, and even the Smatterers among the Learned: But he makes Use chiefly of three Sorts of Inventions, which contribute greatly to keep them in Ignorance.

who propagate fortune-telling.

The first is what the Chinese call Swan ming, that is, telling of Fortunes. The Country is full of those People who calculate Nativities: They are generally blind, and go from House to House, playing on a kind of Theorbo, offering to tell one's Fortune for about a Half-penny. It is surprizing to hear the Extravagancies they utter concerning the eight Letters that compose the Year, the Day, the Month, and Hour of a Person's Birth, which for that Reason is called Pa-tse. They foretel in a general Manner the Misfortunes wherewith you are threatened; they commonly promise you Riches and Honours with great Success in Trade or Study; they will acquaint you with the Cause of your own Distemper, or that of your Children, and the Reason of your Father's and Mother's Death, which they always pretend is owing to some Image that has been offended and must be appeas'd, and a certain Bonza must be sent for, &c. If what they have foretold comes to pass by mere Chance then the People are confirmed in their Errors; but if their Predictions prove false, they are satisfied with saying: That this Man did not understand his Business, Pu ling.

Drawing of Lots,

The second Thing is drawing the Lots called Pa qua or Ta qua; which is to consult the Spirits often. There are several Ways of doing this, but the most common is to go before an Image and to burn certain Perfumes, knocking the Forehead several Times against the Ground. There is also near the Image a Box full of flat Sticks half a Foot long, inscribed with Enigmatic Characters which pass for so many Oracles: After making several Bows they let fall one at a venture, the Sense of whose Characters is explain'd by the Bonza who presides often at the Ceremony; or else they consult a large Writing which is stuck against the Wall, whereby they discover all the Conjunction. This is what they practise when they undertake any Business or are setting out on a Journey, when they are going to sell or buy any Thing, or are about marrying their Children, and upon a hundred other Occasions, in order to secure a lucky Day and happy Success.

And the
Feng shui or lucky Position of Houses, &c.

But the third Contrivance is the most ridiculous of all, and what the Chinese are most infatuated with, they call it Feng shui, that is, Wind and Water, by which they mean the happy or unhappy Position of a House, and especially of a Burying-place. If by Chance a Neighbour builds a House in a Situation so contrary to yours that one of the Corners of his is opposite to the Side of yours, it is sufficient to make you believe that all is lost; it creates a Hatred that cannot be extinguish'd as long as the new House stands, and is even Grounds for a Prosecution before the Mandarin. But if this has no Effect, the only Remedy you have left is to set up a Dragon, or some other Monster, made of baked Clay, on the middle of your Roof; the Earthen Dragon must give a terrible Look towards the fatal Corner, which threatens you and opens a dreadful Mouth, as it were to swallow up the evil Feng shui, that is, the bad Air (*), and then you will be a little more secure.

Insultation of a Mandarin.

This was the Method taken by the Governor of Kyen chang to defend himself against the Jesuit's Church, which is built upon an Eminence, and overlooks his Palace standing at the Foot of it. He had likewise the wise Precaution to turn the Apartments thereof a little sideways; and raised about two hundred Paces from the Church a kind of Building or Gatehouse three Stories high, to ward off the Influence of the Tyen chu tang, or, Church of the Lord of Heaven. By Misfortune this second Gate became the supposed Cause of the second Governor's Death: For this Mandarin having been troubled with a Defluxion of gross Humours in his Breast, and spit very white Phlegm, it was taken for granted, that this House of three Stories, whose Walls were very white, was the Occasion of his Disorder; whereupon they were immediately daubed over with black, in order to produce a contrary Effect: But this Expedient not succeeding, they imagined it was apply'd too late, and accordingly the Mandarin dyed. After which, upon a like Conceit, they were whitewashed again as at first.

(A) This Author makes Use of the Words Idol and Demon to delude his Readers, and make them imagin they are different from the Images and Saints of the Church of Rome, tho' they are exactly of the same Nature.

(*) By this Word Feng shui, they understand not only a corrupt Air which causes Diseases, but also a kind of Curse which extends even to Posterity.

Many other such Chimeras might be related with regard to the Situation of a House, the Place for the Door, with the Day and Manner of building the Stove for dressing the Rice: But that wherein the Fong shwi triumphs most concerns the Sepulchres of the Dead. There are a sort of Impostors who make a Trade of finding out all the Mountains and Hills, which have a lucky Aspect; and when, after performing a great many juggling Tricks, they have fixed on some Place, no Sum of Money is thought too great for the Purchase of that happy Piece of Ground.

Chinese bewitched with the Fong shwi.

The Chinese look upon the Fong shwi as a Thing, in some Sense, more precious than Life itself, because they are persuaded that the Happiness or Unhappiness of Life depends upon this ridiculous Chimera. In short, if any Person has greater Talents and Capacity than others of the same Age, if he attains his Doctor's Degree early or is raised to a Mandarin, if he has several Children, or lives to a good old Age, all this is owing neither to his Wit, Skill, nor Probity, but it is because his House is happily situated; it is because the Sepulchre of his Ancestors has an admirable Fong shwi.

But to return to those Literati, who seeking to stifle in their Minds the Idea of a first Intelligence, the Author and Governor of all Things, have Recourse to Causes purely material to explain the Origin of all Beings: The Reader probably will not be displeased to hear one of these Philosophers reasoning while he explains his System concerning the Original of the World, his Physics or Doctrine of the Nature of Things, his Plan of Astronomy, the Principles of his Mechanics, his Opinion concerning souls, and his Rules of Morality.

Reflections on the System of the Materialists.

We shall see that he is equally in the wrong, whether he speaks as a Natural or a Moral Philosopher: We shall see how great is the Pride and Blindness of these imaginary learned Men, who, in the Principles and Conclusions of their System, agree so little among themselves, who either prove not at all, or in a very bad manner, the Things which stand most in need of Proof; there being neither Justness nor Solidity in the Conclusions which they draw from the Principles they lay down.

We shall see likewise that they do not want Subtlety to distinguish the true from the false, and with Difficulty admit any thing which is not supported by evident Reasons, while they would be believed upon their own Word, and to elude the Difficulties they are press'd with make Use of Chicanery set off with trifling Eloquence.

A modern Philosopher named Chin, is the Author of the following Tract, which is written in Form of a Dialogue, and was translated from the Chinese by P. Dentrecolles. This Dialogue, wherein the Philosopher explains his Sentiments concerning the Origin and State of the World, is the 12th Discourse; for his Work contains several others on Historical and Moral Subjects, which have no Relation to this.

A DIALOGUE wherein Chin, a Modern Chinese Philosopher, declares his Opinion concerning the Origin and State of the World.

IN a certain delightful Place, were one beheld as in Perspective several fine Country Houses, a curious green Arbor was formed, in which several Persons assembled to enjoy the cool Breezes, and converse together during the Heats of the Summer. Chance having conducted a Stranger thither, they invited him to sit down; and as they judged him likely to contribute to the Pleasure of Conversation, they intreated him to stay a few Days with them, and gratify the earnest Desire they had to hear him Discourse. This he consented to without any Difficulty, and soon drew together a Crowd of Auditors, who were extremely pleased with the free and lively Manner in which he handled several Points of History and Morality.

Dialogue. The Introduction.

The Fame of these Assemblies having soon reached the adjacent Towns, a learned Man belonging to a neighbouring City, desirous of assisting at them, came to the Place, where he found a great Number of Persons together. As he entered the Arbor, one of the Company who perceived him rose up, and approaching the Stranger who sat in the Place of Honour: Sir, said he in his Ear, this venerable Person just come in, is very famous for his profound Erudition, and his Name is Chin yü quey: He is a brisk lively Man, bigotted to his own Opinions, and who in a Dispute will not submit to the most learned Persons in the Empire; he has spent his whole Life in study, and read all manner of Books; if he once begins to discourse of the Doctrine relating to the Heaven and the Earth his Mouth is like an unexhaustible River which glides swiftly along: I cannot imagine what could induce so great a Man to come hither.

At the same instant the Philosopher entred, and looking round at the Assembly saluted them with a gracious Air, moving both his Hands in a complaisant Manner: I am informed, Gentlemen, said he, that Assemblies are held here, wherein a Man of Learning whom I should be glad to call Friend entertains the Company; and I presume he would not hinder me to profit by his Knowledge.

At this Harangue the whole Assembly looked upon each other with some Surprise: For the Stranger was a Person of no great Capacity, all his Merit consisting in an agreeable manner of relating Matter of History; the rest were Men of no Learning, being Followers either of the Sect of Fo or Lau, and very much bigotted to their Images.

We are only assembled here, replied the Stranger, to pass a few Hours in Discourses, fitter to divert the Mind than instruct it; and you know that such Conversation commonly turns upon the History of the Times, or popular Morality, which sort of Entertainment cannot be agreeable to a Person of your Learning.

The Modern Sect not in Vogue at Court.

Sage old Man, replied the Philosopher, it is your Modesty that makes you talk in this Manner, and you seem to have too advantageous an Opinion of me. To say the Truth, I have spent all my Time in study, and even own that I have acquired some Share of Knowledge; but this very Knowledge is a Motive of Concern (*) to me, when I consider that there is no Possibility of bringing into Vogue at Court, either the great Doctrine of Tau, Shun, &c. or the wise Instructions of so many illustrious Men of these later Times, such as the Cheu, the Chin, the Chang and the Chu. I am uneasy to find that these Instructions are not relished by my Friends who possess the chief Places in the Government, but on the contrary that the false Sects overwhelm the Empire; every body runs after the Dilution; nothing but Corruption and Darkness prevail, while the true literary Sect is as it were buried in shameful Oblivion.

How happy are we, replied the Stranger, to find a Person of your Reputation and Merit is willing to gratify our Desire of hearing you! Condescend then to take your Place here, and honour us with your learned Instructions: A great Soul like yours, which aspires to reform the World, should be always disposed to communicate its Discoveries; and our Understandings, narrow as they are, cannot resist the Truths which you will make known to us.

I am very ready to oblige you, replied the Philosopher; all I fear, is, that I shall fall short of your Expectations. At the same time he saluted the Company, and sitting down in the honourable Place which was appointed him, upon what Subject, said he, shall I entertain you? We are desirous, answered the Stranger in the Name of the rest, to be instructed as to what preceded the Heavens and the Earth.

What preceded the Formation of the World.

I consent to it, replied the Philosopher in a grave Tone, and therefore listen to what I shall say: Before the Heavens and the Earth were yet formed, there was in the midst of an immense Void nothing but an extremely confused Substance, Wen jen i ki. This Substance in its chaotic State was infinite and boundless, Va ki: That which was subtle and spirituous in this indefinite Mass, being as it were the Form, Li ki, and the Soul of the Tay ki, the first and supreme State of the Universe, was the very Principle of the Heavens and the Earth, or the Bud which disclosed them: By the same Means an infinite Number of Beings were produced.

The Universe how produced.

In short, every thing that came forth, ought to be placed in the Rank of Productions, whose Springs are astonishing. The World having once gained all its Parts, these sorts of Productions, which as to the Manner of them escape our Senses, grew very rare: For we generally see that the Species are propagated by ordinary and sensible Methods; an Example will express my Thoughts much clearer.

Wood produces Worms within itself, and Vermin are engendered on the Body of Man; these Productions are of those Sorts which we call wonderful, and whose Manner of Generation we are ignorant of. Were not the spirituous Particles of Sweat found on the Body of Man, and likewise in the Wood when it is corrupted, what could be the Origin of these Insects? (+) By the same Rule we may say, that what is found of a more subtle and vivifying Nature in the Tay ki or

(*) These Complaints of the Chinese Philosophers deserve to be taken Notice of: Had his System prevailed among the literary Sect, he had not complained as he does, that the principal Literati could not be persuaded to relish it.

(†) It appears from this Reasoning of the Chinese Philosopher, that he did not believe the Insects were engendered from Eggs, but from Corruption. But the Falacy of this Principle would clearly appear to him, was he to view with Microscopes the admirable Structure of these little Insects with respect to the Variety, Minuteness, and Propriety of their Organs.

Our Philosopher, like all those who endeavour to suppress the Knowledge of a first Cause, is so weak in his System, that to form it he lays down the most absurd and chimerical Principles, and would have his own Fictions pass for fundamental Truths; Whence one may see he had to do with very despicable Adversaries. Is this Tay ki, as he calls it, this shapeless Mass, this supreme Indefinite which preceded all finite Being, self-existent? Has this most subtle Part of the Tay ki, bestowed on itself the Motion which it gives to other Beings, or has it received the same from some other Being which was the first Mover? Could this fine Order of the Universe, this Disposition of its Parts always the same, these animated thinking rational Beings whose Actions are free, be the Effect of a blind Cause which acts by Chance, which prepares nothing, puts nothing in Order, and chooses nothing, is without Will and without Understanding? Yet his Principles establish these Doctrines, which none but a Man void both of Sense and Reason, would maintain. For on sight of a Palace, wherein Symmetry and Proportion as nicely observed, would any one offer to assert that the Stones assembled in that curious Order, and ranged themselves so as to form the different Apartments? That the Wall and the Wood-work erected themselves in order to support the Roof, which afterwards placed itself thereon? In a Word, that this Palace, furnished according to the most perfect Rules of Architecture, was the whimsical Effect of mere Chance? In reading a History or Poem fraught with the most remarkable Events, will any body say it is the fortuitous Concurrence of Characters, ranged by Chance in the Order necessary to describe such a Series of Events, and connect them together? A Child of these Years old would laugh at such Reasoning. These Works of Art plainly shew, that they were raised by wise and industrious Operators. But what must we think of the Structure of this World, which comprizes the most astonishing Wonders? This suspended and immovable Earth which bears us; those Riches which annually spring out of its Bosom, to supply the various Wants of Mankind; that immense Arch of Heaven, which moves continually round this Globe, and covers us; those Abysses of Air and Water which encompass us; that spacious Reservoir of Water called the Ocean, which surrounds the Earth, and is so restrained within Bounds, that it never passes beyond them, but in its greatest Fury dashes its foaming Billows against the Shore; that Sun and those Stars which give us Light; and whose Motions are so constant and regular, that for so many Ages not the least Change has happened in them; those Animals of so many different Kinds; that natural Instinct which directs them to pursue what is for their Benefit, and avoid what is hurtful to them; the Manner in which they are renewed every Day by the Assistance of Food, and their Species propagated by Means of Generation; the Human Body, that Master-piece of Art, formed out of vile Matter, its several Parts and their Uses: That Soul which animates it, is intimately united with it, and sets all the Springs of it in Motion; which thinks, reasons, deliberates, forms distinct Images of Things destroyed as if they were still in being, preserves the Remembrance of what is past as if it was present; which is free, and determines to act just as it pleases. To say that all this can be explained by certain Combinations of a most feeble Matter, induced with an inherent animating Power, is to abuse Reason, and stifle the clearest Conventions: It is to shut ones Ears, and refuse to hear the Voice of all Creatures which are marked with the Seal of the Supreme Intelligent Being who made them, and are incessantly telling us that they are the Work of his Hands. Yet thus it is, that while all Creatures to the vilest Insects proclaim the Power of the Creator, we meet with pretended Philosophers, who wholly given up to frivolous Systems and lost in their own vain Thoughts, endeavour to root out of their Hearts the Opinion of a Deity; and raise Clouds to darken that pure Light which shines about them, in Spight of all their Attempts to extinguish it.

or the Supreme Indefinite, which immediately preceded all infinite Beings, was as it were the Bud from whence the Heavens and the Earth were produced: But that you may understand me thoroughly I will draw a Figure on Paper, which will lay the whole at one View before your Eyes.

A M A P of the Heavens and the Earth, at the Time of their F O R M A T I O N.

1. THE Particles Yang, as the most pure, most subtile, and most light, fly off, rise up, flutter about and embrace the rest. 2. The Particles In, less pure, and by Consequence more heavy, subside, and by that Means unite together in the Middle. 3. All that which encompasses whatever is visible are Particles of the Universe so very small, that they have no sensible Figure, that is Hyu ki.

Explained by Gravitation.

But how do you understand, says one of the Company, that the Yang, that is the more subtile Particles, and the In, or the more gross Particles, should be separated from what you call Tay ki, the Sun and in Consequence of this Separation there should be formed a Sun, a Moon, and all the Stars? Planets.

I'll explain this to you, replied the Philosopher: The finest Matter of the Yang, or of the Assemblage of the more subtile Particles, formed the Sun; the less gross Substance of the In or of the gross Particles, composed in their Turn the Moon; the Stars were formed of the same, took their Places, and made their Revolutions in the Heavens: All which Things became visible, because thenceforward they had their determinate Figure.

The In on their Side being united together, and the gross Particles being linked one to another, formed the Earth, which is placed in the Middle of these immense Spaces. Shortly after the Earth had in its Bosom, and on its superficies, all the Elements well fixed, as Fire, Wood, &c. and in a Word, all the rest of the Beings here below, which having every one their particular Configuration, were easily distinguished. Attend to this Comparison, which will explain what I have been saying: The Air which we continually breathe when expired is rarified and dilated; it has likewise some Degree of Heat, and must be referred to the Yang: But when by Inspiration it enters into our Lungs, it is compressed and condensed; it also partakes something of the Coldness which it ought to bring, and is by that Means of the Nature of the In.

Formation of the Earth Water and Air.

Let us return to the first Combinations of the World: These kinds of Corpuscles which make what is called In being joined and fitted to each other, the Earth and the Water were formed of it, and the five Elements began to exist. The Yang and the smallest Atoms remained suspended and surrounded all this inactive Mass, fluttering and wheeling round about it without ceasing. A Hen's Egg may afford a slight Image hereof; may not the Earth be said to be the Yolk of the Egg, which appears suspended and fixed in the Middle, where it remains immovable? May not the Heavens be looked upon as the White, which embraces the Part that is in the Center, moves about it, and continues in the same Condition without any thing changing Place.

Of the five Elements.

The Motion of the Heavens is thus constant and durable; that subtile and fluid Matter moves and circulates without ceasing; and by this Motion which is peculiar to itself causes the Variety of Seasons, and forms the Winds, Clouds, Thunder and Rain.

Of the Cause of Motion.

The Production of Mankind and other Beings came afterwards, and the whole Universe was then brought to Perfection: In short, all that one can imagine of what is lively, spiritual, and excellent in the Heavens and the Earth, becoming collected and united together in the highest Degree of Perfection possible, has given a wonderful Birth to these extraordinary Men, who in their Turn have contributed to the Improvement of Nature. But for fear you have not yet justly conceived my Meaning, I shall make Use of a second Figure by which you will easily understand it.

Of Mankind and other Beings.

Motion of the Heavens.

1. THE Heavens encompass and surround the Earth, moving from the Left to the Right: There are two fixed Poles, one in the North, the other in the South; there is in the Universe no fixed Points of either East or West; nor is there any thing in a proper Sense high or low.

2. The Space which the Sun runs thro' in the Heavens distinguishes the Hours; when it is exactly at the Point marked U, then it is Noon; when exactly in the Point Tse, it is Midnight: And so of the Rest.

The Sun is the pure Yang; it begins to take its Course from the Hour of Midnight, and comes to us. When it rises every thing in the Universe depending upon Yang ferments and resumes fresh Strength: From Noon it begins to decline, and then every thing of the Nature of Yang grows weak; on the contrary, that which belongs to Yin, assumes new (*) Vigour.

But, sayd one of the Auditors, if the Heaven is a fluid and light Body, in what Place will you fix the Deity Yö wbang, Ta bi? If the Earth is only an Assemblage of thick and heavy Particles, where will be the Abode of (+) Yen wang? Where do the Spirits lodge that are the Executioners of his Justice? In short, where will you place Hell?

Local Hell of the Ben-zardeny'd, and their Gods proved Fictions.

You may be certain, replied the Philosopher, that the Heaven is a very fine and light Substance, which is continually agitated and in Motion: Judge then if it be capable of containing any heavy Thing; it can support nothing but what is of the same Nature with itself; how then can the Deities, such as you represent them, inhabit there? In the Day-time, a clear Sky rolls over our Heads, while the dark Sky advancing by little and little, brings Night along with it; the Day afterwards appears again, and this Motion is constant and regular: Suppose then that Yö wbang, and his Train of inferior Gods, had their Palace in the Sky, these Gods would be carried along constantly with the Sky, and make an infinite Number of Circumgirations. Is this a well contrived System?

Let us come now to the Earth: This is manifestly an enormous Mass, a Composition of Water, Mud, Clay, and Stones, which are heaped up, and kept together by their own proper Weigh: If then you station Yen wang and his Train in this Place, the Court of this essential God must then be in this Heap of Water and Mud: Don't you see that these Things are nothing but mere Fictions?

Let us leave the Deities then, replied one of the Assembly, because you are too much prejudiced against them: But what are become of those great, those extraordinary Men, of whom you have spoken in such pompous Terms, and have put on an Equality with Heaven and Earth? For as the Heaven and Earth are real, and subsist these Heroes of Antiquity, ought likewise to exist: Are we to suppose, according to your Principles, that a Fo bi, a Wbang ti, a Yau, or a Confucius, cease to exist when they cease to appear here below?

comes of the Soul after Death.

You are to understand, replied the Philosopher, that before those Sages were born among us, the Li and the Ki, the two Parts whereof they are composed, preexisted in the Heaven and the Earth. The same Instant that a great Man is formed, these Li and Ki are united together; and from this Union he takes his Origin. When he dies, his fine Qualities and Endowments, his Perfections and Doctrine, becomes the Admiration and Standard of future Ages; they continue to subsist,

(*) On seeing these two Figures drawn by the Chinese Philosopher, the Reader perhaps may ask if in China they still believe the Earth to be square. The Philosopher seems to follow the ancient Opinion, that favours the Name of Chang gué, or the Kingdom of the Middle, which the Chinese gave to their Empire: Imagining the Earth to be square, that they possessed the greater Part of it, and that all the rest consisted only of certain Pieces of Land placed round about it by way of Ornament. This Notion is not suitable to a Globe, where the Middle may be found on any Part of the Surface. But since the Europeans have been at Pe king, the Chinese who visited them, or are any way versed in Mathematics, have forsaken that gross Error, which obtains at present only among those who are ignorant of Astronomy: Just as we erred for many Ages in Europe, with Respect to the Rotundity of the Earth, the Antipodes, &c. The Chinese Mathematicians supposed the Earth to resemble in Shape, a Hen's Egg. The Word Fang, which signifies Square, ought to be rendered Solid, Firm.

(†) This is the Plato of the Chinese Idolaters, who worship Fo.

subsist, and their Duration is equal to that of Heaven and Earth. Indeed the Body of a Sage is destroyed, but his Li, or the thing which makes him what he is, that noble Part of himself, goes to be reunited to the Heaven and Earth as it was before; and as it may be truly said that the Heaven and Earth will always endure, there is likewise Ground to say that real Sages exist for ever (+).

The same Person who had just been speaking to the Philosopher replied: You acknowledge that Confucius is a real Sage, and yet Tradition informs us that he went to consult the illustrious Lau kyun (*), by which Circumstance it appears that Confucius was afraid of Death, and wanted to learn the Secret of becoming immortal.

Don't talk to me of your Lau tse, reply'd the Philosopher, I consider him no otherwise than a common Person, notwithstanding he ridiculously pretended to make himself immortal: What a fine Doctrine has he left behind him, which has nothing for its Principle, and only teaches Indolence and Inactivity. I'll cite but one Passage from the Instructions he gave his Disciples: Consider my Tongue, say'd he to them, does it not subsist while it remains soft and flexible? On the contrary, Is not that which destroys our Teeth their own Hardness? What do you think of this delicate Reasoning? Nature, in the Production of the Universe, has made soft what ought to be soft, and hard what ought to be hard: Suppose that the Teeth which adorn the Mouth were soft and flexible like the Tongue, could we then take any Nourishment that was in the least hard, such as the Grains of Rice boil'd in Water, which is our ordinary Food? And if we were not in a Condition to take this Food, how could we possibly live several Ages, as they make us vainly hope? These are idle and chimerical Notions.

Let us apply this curious Principle of Lau tse, who would have every thing soft, to Natural Philosophy and Morality: We divide the Metals into five Kinds, according to their Colour. Now if you tell me that Gold and Silver, which are so highly valued, are naturally inclinable to be soft, because the Ornaments made of them are easily wrought, I answer: That these Metals are not deserving of such great Esteem, at least with respect to the Use they have in Life, for after all they are good for nothing but to make Vessels and other Ornaments not very necessary; whereas Iron, which is of a lower Rank among Metals, serves purely by its hard Property to open the Furrows which enrich us with Grain, and furnish Provision for our Subsistence, the Hardness of Iron renders it fit for several other Occasions: For instance, to prepare our Food, which we could not make Use of without its Assistance; to make Weapons of, which by putting an End to War are the Cause of Peace and Plenty to the Nation, which terrify or extirpate Robbers, and secure the public Safety.

Let us come to Morality: Those fond and languishing Passions for the Female Sex, don't they proceed from a soft and effeminate Heart? If Women had any Resolution, durst we take the least Liberty in their Presence? There would be no coming near them but as we do Fire, which no Man plays with unpunished: Our I king, that precious Gift of Fo hi, greatly exalts the Character Kang, that is to say, whatever has Firmness; on the contrary, your Lau tse praises nothing but Yew, which signifies Softness, and is entirely opposite to the Doctrine of our Canonical Books.

Moreover it is certain, that the Life of Man never exceeds a hundred Years, and yet he flatters them with the Hopes of holding out for many Ages: He also pretends that the Yang, which is the Soul of Man, is never destroy'd; and that he has found Means to steal from Nature the vivifying Virtue which he can dispose of just as he pleases.

After such Pretences as these, he who had the most vast and ambitious Desires of all Mankind, is so silly as to tell us that all is Vanity; that we ought to set our Hearts on nothing, tho' he himself was more fond of Life than any other Person; that there is nothing commendable but a State of Inactivity and Indolence, yet he himself was always extremely vigorous in his Pursuits: To affect Immortality in this Manner is only to rebel against Nature, and against the Laws of Heaven and Earth.

But it may not be amiss to give you some Account of this Lau tse, whom you so highly esteem. The following is the Substance of his History. He was born towards the End of the Dynasty of the Chew, near the City of Lin pau, in the District of Ho nan. His Father, surnamed Quang, was no more than a poor Peasant, who from his Infancy served as a Labourer in a wealthy Family: He was seventy Years old before he could meet with a Wife, but at length having gained the Affections of a Country Wench of the Age of forty he married her.

This Woman being one Day in a solitary Place, of a sudden conceived by the simple Commerce and Union of the vivifying Virtue of Heaven and Earth, and went with Child of him fourscore Years. The Master whom she served, vex'd that she should be so long without being delivered, turned her out of Doors; upon which she was constrained to lead a wandering Life about the Country, till at length under a Plumb-Tree she brought forth a Son with Hair and Eyebrows as white as Snow. The Mother, who was ignorant of her Husband's Family Name, and knew only his Surname, called the Infant after the Tree under which it was born: Then observing

(+) Every one of the Literati, let his Talents be ever so indifferent, must observe certain Measures when he speaks of the Prince of Literature, and the principal Sages of the Empire: Thus our Philosopher takes a pleasant Method to give Confucius a Duration equal to that of the Heaven and Earth. But what he calls the Duration of Confucius, will equally be the Duration of Millions of Men, whose Souls have in like Manner returned to the Etherial Mass, and become part thereof. 'Tis the same as if one should make Images of Princes, Philosophers and Emperors out of Snow contained in a Vessel: the Snow coming to melt all Distinctions cease, and the whole is reduced to one uniform identical Mass.

His Name. observing that the Tips of his Ears were exceeding long, she took from thence his Surname and called him Lieul, Plumb Tree Ear; but the People, who saw him so very white, called him Lau tse, or the old Boy. When he had attained a certain Age, he became Library-keeper to an Emperor of the Cheu; by whose Favour he obtained a small Mandarinat. He made himself a Proficient in ancient History, and the Knowledge of the Rites of the early Ages; and it was that which induced Confucius to go and discourse him about the Ceremonial, and the Talents of a good Mandarin. Lau tse in his old Age foresaw the approaching downfall of the Cheu Dynasty. He got on the Back of a black Cow, and bending his Course Westward arrived at the entrance of a dismal Valley: This Passage was guarded by an Officer named I, and surnamed Hi. The Book Tau tse, containing five thousand Sentences, was composed by him in the City of Cheu she, in the District of Tsin chwen. At length he died, and his Tomb is to be seen at U.

And Death. This was the Beginning and End of Lau tse: He could not while he was living prevent the Ruin of the Race of the Cheu, whose Subject and Mandarin he was; and yet they would have us believe all the Fables which are confidently reported about his pretended Merit, and among the rest, that after his Death he was placed at the Top of all the Heavens in Quality of the three Purities.

Well! what do you think, Sir, of the Doctrine of Fo, which has been brought to us from the East, cried out those of the Assembly, who were devoted to the Worship of this Idol?

Fo, his Doctrine of the Vacuum, Fo, (†) replied the Philosopher, is another Visionary, who likewise pretended to make himself immortal. According to him the whole World is a mere Vacuum without any thing real in it: Pursuant to which fine Principle he would have us think of nothing, but reduce the Heart to a mere Vacuum, that is, empty it of all Affections, and go so far as even to forget ourselves, as tho' we had no Existence. We have Eyes and Ears, and yet we must neither see nor hear any thing: These Organs ought to be void of every Object; that is their State of Perfection: We have Mouths, Hands and Feet, and yet all these Members must be inactive. His great principle is, that the wonderful Ternary of the Tsing, the Ki, and the Schin, that is, the fine, the subtle and the spiritual, comes to its greatest Perfection when it is united and makes but one: As for the Soul, its Duration, says he, is infinite, for it never is destroy'd.

And Ternary.

Don't you see that this fine Doctrine of annihilating oneself and universal uncaring ends at length in Expectation of a chimerical Immortality, and in desiring that which cannot be obtained. They would seize upon and appropriate the vivifying Virtue of Heaven; they refuse to restore it one Day to Heaven and Earth, and pretend thereby to attain the pure Vacuum.

His Miraculous Birth.

But perhaps, continued he, you are ignorant of the History of this Enthusiast: His Mother saw in a Dream a great white Elephant, and at the same Instant perceived herself with Child: It grew considerably every Day, and at length making its way thro' its Mother's side, and tearing her Bowels, deprived her of Life from whom he received his own. 'Twas thus the Monster came into the World, and ought not he who was to turn it upside down to be reckoned among the Pests of human Race? Is it because he killed his Mother at his Birth that the Idolatrous People fast, make Processions, and perform a hundred other Things of the same Nature to obtain all kind of Happiness for their Mothers? Can it be imagined that this Fo, who could not save his own Mother, is able to protect another body's Mother (A)?

Unable to defend his Dominions he abandons them.

But to proceed: He lived in one of the Kingdoms Westward of this Empire, where he was at the same time Supreme both in Temporals and Spirituals, that is, a King and Head of his Religion. He had a Queen and a Concubine of very great Beauty, of whom he made Goddesses. His Kingdom abounded with Gold, Silver, Merchandises, the Necessaries of Life, and especially precious Stones: But tho' it was rich and fruitful, the Extent of it was small and its Inhabitants had neither Strength nor Courage; on the contrary those of the several Kingdoms wherewith it was surrounded were strong, active, and breathed nothing but Blood and Slaughter, insomuch that the Dominions of Fo were subject to frequent Invasions. Tired out with so many Insults which he could not resist, he abandon'd his Kingdom, and embraced a solitary Life: He then applied himself to exhort the People to the Practice of Virtue, and published the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis which he had invented, whereby the Soul was to migrate backwards and forwards from one body into another; observing however a certain Order by which Virtue was rewarded, and Vice punished. He infatuated the neighbouring Nations with these ridiculous Imaginations; his Design being to intimidate his Persecutors, and to persuade them that if they continued to ravage his Territories they should after this Life be changed into Dogs, Horses, and even into wild Beasts.

Invents the Metempsychosis to terrify his Enemies.

Re-ascends the Throne and grows very powerful.

During the Space of twelve Years, in which he laboured in propagating his Doctrine, he drew after him a prodigious Number of ignorant People whose Brain he had quite turned: With their Assistance he re-ascended his Throne, became very powerful, and marrying again had a numerous Issue. Such was the Effect of his Artifices; and while he talked to his Disciples about nothing but the Emptiness of earthly Possessions, he eagerly sought after them himself, and procured as many as he possibly could.

In short, you are not to judge that the Doctrine of Fo is excellent, because it has spread so much through this Empire, it came in Vogue only in Consequence of the Doctrine of our ancient Sages having

(†) The Account which this Chinese Philosopher gives of Fo, is mixed with Particulars not to be met with elsewhere. 'Twas he we find who invented the Metempsychosis or Transmigration of Souls, he lived 500 Years before Pythagoras; and as this latter is known to have travelled over Egypt and India, there is no Reason to doubt but he took his Doctrine of the Metempsychosis, which he brought into Greece, from the Disciples of Fo.

(a) This is like the Proteflant Argument against the Romish Saints, who cannot be supposed able to protect their Votaries, when they cannot protect their own Images, Reliques, &c. And we shall find that most of the Author's Arguments, conclude equally against Popery and the Religion of this Impostor.

having been almost extinguished. The Ignorance and Corruption of the Heart have given Admittance to the grossest Errors; thus the People having neglected the admirable Lessons of Tau, Shun and Confucius, could only relish the Religion of Fo. This Sect prescribes nothing but a few idle Prayers, for the Attainment of Happiness and a State of Serenity; whereas our Sages exhort us to subdue our Passions, to govern our Desires, and to perform our several Duties, which is a very difficult Task.

This Discourse exasperated a great many of the Auditors: It is to no purpose to say, cried one of them, that every thing is empty in the visible World, and that the Yang or Spirit only is immortal; the great Doctrine of Fo and Tau swallows up all in nothing, the Soul only excepted, which will exist and live for ever. Any one may see that it is Prejudice, and the Spirit of Partiality, which sets you so vehemently against this Doctrine; and is what you spoke just before concerning the System of the World any better grounded?

Nothing could possibly have disgusted the Philosopher more, and it was easy to see that he was nettled with the Reproach. Your Lau tse, replied he, raising his Voice, must needs have been greatly in love with Life, since he sought so many ways of prolonging it, and yet he could not get beyond a hundred Years of Age; but he flattered himself that his Yang, or vivifying Spirit, should never perish. Was not Fo tse equally fond of Life? However he lived no more than sixty three Years, but he was persuaded that his Soul, which was properly himself, should exist for ever.

The Life of all Mankind has a fixed Term: But Lau and Fo have ridiculously imagined, that they were the only privileged Creatures in the World; that every thing which has appeared and shall appear on the Earth will return to nothing; but that as for them they are to be immortal, and that besides what was visible in their Persons, they had an intelligent Spirit, the true Principle of Life: Thus we find in the Doctrine of these Sects this unintelligible Language Fo shi i, Shin cul, Yew sang syang; that is, according to the Sect of Fo, the Body of Fo, the Trunk or Substance is one, but it hath three Images. Lau shi i, Shin cul, Pwen sang tsing; that is, according to the Religion of Lau, the Body of Lau, the Trunk, or Substance is one, but it is distinguished into three Purities.

These Sectaries, to make themselves understood, have recourse to Comparisons: A Branch of an Elder-Tree, planted in the Earth, leaves at length a Quintessence of the Nature of the Elder-Tree; a Fox dying in his hole leaves behind him the vivifying Spirits wherewith he was animated (*). It is thus they pretend that, after the Death of their Master, there remained something of his Person which was born again in this lower World.

These Whims, as you may perceive, place Lau and Fo in the Rank of Trees and Beasts: But as the wild Conceits of the Sect of Fo have infatuated an infinite Number of People, it is necessary that I should enter into a more particular Account of them, which I shall reduce to ten little Articles.

1. In the Book of the Disciples of Fo, intitled, the Utility of the House, it is sayed, that the Body is our Habitation; that the Soul is an immortal Guest who lodges there, and like a Traveller passes from one Inn to another; that a Child is nourished with its Mother's Milk, in the same Manner as the Inhabitants of a Country drink of the River wherewith it is watered: Hence the Bodies of our Parents are nothing but a Lodging, and it is natural to look upon them, with the same contempt as a heap of Wood and Stones designed for the building of a House. Has not this a Tendency to root out of People's Hearts the Virtue Hyau, or reverential Love for Parents? Does it not stifle those Sentiments which unite us so strictly with them, as being nothing but the Participation of the same celestial and vivifying Substance.

2. The same Book, which represents our Bodies as mere Habitations where we take up our Lodging, tends to make us neglect them, and refuse them the Affection as well as Compassion so necessary for their Preservation. This is what inclines the Disciples of Fo, who are disgusted with the present Life, to seek the Means of procuring a better as soon as possible: There are some who go on Pilgrimage to Pagods situate on the Top of steep Rocks, and after they have ended their Prayers, as if they were sure of being heard, cast themselves headlong into some dreadful Abyss; others are lavish of their Lives in giving themselves up to the most shameful Excesses; others who meet with obstacles to their unlawful Passions go by consent and hang or drown themselves, that when they are born again they may become Husband and Wife; these are the evil Consequences of that senseless Doctrine of the Transmigration of Souls.

3. Being accustomed to look upon the Body as a kind of Inn, or resting Place, it is natural to forget the Esteem, Respect and Regard that is due to it: On this Account Women and Maids, who are generally greatly devoted to Fo, are easily seduced by the Bonzas and Tau tse, a sort of People very skilful in amorous Intrigues; they insinuate to them, that the Body which they only pass thro' is nothing but a contemptible Cottage, which they ought not to give themselves any Trouble about, and that many of their Sex, when they grant the Favours required of them, have been enjoyed by Fo without knowing it: At present, continue they, you are the weak and servile Sex, but we promise you faithfully that when you are born again into the World you shall become Men. It often happens that Ladies and young Girls of excellent Parts, and topping Families, are dishonoured by these Varlets, and at length arrive to such a Pitch by their Instructions as to renounce all Shame: They are not contented with one or two private Intrigues, but make

(*) The Women Idolators believe they often see Spirits in the Shape of Foxes, and call them Hsi ti tsing. [Thus Apparitions are propagated; prepossess the Mind with any Absurdity, and People will fancy, nay swear, they have frequent Demonstrations of its Truth. Of this all times have furnished Instances: Witness at present the Affair of the late famous Abbé Paris; one half of the Parisians protesting Miracles are daily wrought at his Tomb, tho' the other half protest to the contrary. An unanswerable Proof of the Uncertainty and Insufficiency of human Testimony.]

4. Those who give into these ridiculous Chimeras affirm, that the Good or Evil of the present Life is the Consequence of their Actions while they were in a pre-existent State, and so think they have a Toleration by this goodly Principle to abandon themselves to Debauchery, and seize the Property of other Persons with Impunity: You must understand, they will say, that we only take back what belongs to us, for we are very positive that you owed us such a Sum in a former Life.

And other Disorders.

If a Libertine, who lays Snares for a young Girl, knows she is addicted to the Worship of Fo, he will say to her: *Don't you remember, that before you were born again you promised to marry me? 5. The Sectaries of Fo are persuaded, that they may give themselves up to the most criminal Actions with Impunity; and that, provided they burn a little Incense in the Night-time, or repeat a few Prayers before an Image, their Crimes are not only blotted out (B), but being under its Protection, they are screened from the Pursuit of Justice: One single Instance will make this plain.

A Thief found means to get into the most inner Apartment of the Imperial Palace, but was discovered and seized by the Officers in waiting; who, after they had thoroughly searched him, stripped him of his Cloaths and found his Body covered over with Slips of Paper filled with Sentences of Fo (C): He imagined that by Virtue of these Papers he would never be discovered, but might go on stealing with Impunity, or at least would find Means to escape.

6. The Devotees of this Sect are entirely taken up with making Pilgrimages to certain Mountains, and live exceeding sparingly that they may be able to purchase Perfumes to burn before the Images: They are insensible to the Necessities of a Father or Mother who suffers from Cold or Hunger for want of Cloaths and Food; their only Care being to gather a Sum of Money sufficient to purchase a rich Picture-Frame for the Altar of Fo, and other strange Deities. They abandon their Kindred (D), and leave their Ancestors without a Tje tang (†). Must not this inspire one with Horror for a Doctrine which makes us forget our deceased Relations, and deprives those who are living of all manner of Assistance?

7. How many do we see among the Vulgar, who believe every thing they are told concerning their Pagods [Churches and Monasteries] which are built in the most solitary and inaccessible Places? They take it for granted that they are the Mansions of Virtue and Innocence; even many are tempted to pass their Days in these sorts of Retreats, that they may imitate Fo in his solitary Life: To this End you will see them all of a sudden renounce their Wives, Children and Possessions. What monstrous folly is this? Do not they know that their Bodies are composed of Flesh, Blood, Bones and animal Spirits? Do they think to make them as insensible as a Log of Wood, or a Stone? Do they imagine they shall no longer feel the Passions so natural to Mankind? All the pompous Exhortations of Fo and Lau upon the Vacuum, and upon the Perfection arising from an absolute Renunciation of all Enjoyments, are so many Snares by which a great Number of People have suffered themselves to be caught, thinking they could really put these Lessons in Practice; but they soon found them to be impracticable. The Empire of the Constitution prevailing, the Passions by being curbed and restrained have only become more ungovernable, and led them into the most enormous

(A) How often do we hear of the like Disorders among the Female Sex and Priests in the Church of Rome? How often do the Intrigues of Monks and Nuns come to Light? What Libertinism was lately discovered in some of the Convents at Paris? All Europe has rang of the late Story of P. Gerard and Miss Cadiz, with many others. The Bosnas make Use of the Doctrine of the Transmigration, and the Romish Priests that of Confession, to debauch the Sex; But of the two, this last is by much the fitter for the Purpose.

(*) Whatever Grounds the Chinese Philosopher might have to consider the Doctrine of Fo as the Source of infinite Disorders, we may with much more Reason reproach his System. For if, according thereto, this Universe is neither created, nor governed by a first and supreme intelligent Being; if the Heaven and Earth preserve themselves in such excellent Order, merely by their natural and necessary Motion; if in short, all Things move mechanically in this great Machine, every body may say to himself, I have no Expectations beyond my own Person, I ought only to think of my present Happiness: The Term of Life is short and uncertain, by what Authority do they pretend to prescribe Laws to me, which Force, not Duty, compels me to submit to? The Encumbrances bestowed on this Submission make but a poor Amends for the Constraint: To say that the Authority which is exercised over me proceeds from Heaven, is mere Nonsense, since the Heaven itself is no more than Matter: Let them not tell me of either Virtues or Vices, they are idle Terms which convey no Ideas, but such as arise from the Prejudice of Education imbibed in our Infancy: Thus all Instructions, Reproofs, Laws, Punishments, and Government is useless or unjust. And Inclination ought to be the sole Rule of our Conduct. These Consequences necessarily follow from this System, and evidently lead to all manner of Crimes. The better to comprehend this rightly, one ought to be in a City wholly consisting of Atheists: Altho' indeed the like never yet was, nor ever will be found. For if there be Atheists in Heart, that is, such as would be glad if there was no God to punish Crimes, it is rare to find Atheists in understanding, that is, whose Reason is so depraved as wholly to forget the Author of their Being, and be ignorant of a Truth, which is stamped on every Part of the Universe. But supposing there was such a City, what Confusion and Corruption must reign therein? It might at first glory in being set free, and no longer in Fear of divine Vengeance: But would it remain long without throwing off every kind of Yoke, and attempting to live in a State of Independance? And would it not give itself up to the most monstrous Excesses?

[This is an idle Harangue of the Editor, for which he has no Ground from any thing spoken by the Author, whose whole Discourse is a lively Inveective against Rebellion, Immorality and Wickedness, which he charges as the necessary Consequences of the Doctrines of a Religion in every thing almost the same with Popery: so that supposing the Chinese to be an Atheist, Popery must be worse than Atheism.]

(B) Is there not the same easy Remission of Sins promised in the Church of Rome, on saying two or three Prayers before an Image or privileged Altar, over and above what is obtained by Indulgences, Pardons, &c.

(C) These are like the Papers containing what they call the Gospel of St. John, Prayers or Sentences out of the Litany of Saints, the Legends or other Books, which as well as the Cross and Agnus Dei's Papists carry about them as Charms to protect them against Harms, and drive away evil Spirits.

(D) The same ill Consequences happen daily in Popish Countries. How many Parents have disinherited their Children, and reduced their Families to Beggary, in order to leave all their Substance to the Church: not for the Good of their Souls, as they imagine, but for the Good of the Priests.

(†) A common Hall, wherein they pay Honours to deceased Persons of the same Family.

enormous Excesses. To carry off Youth of both Sexes, to gratify their carnal Lusts, to seduce virtuous Ladies, to debase themselves to Beasts, and to glory in this Abasement; in short to renounce all Reason and Shame, are the inevitable Consequences of being seduced by this Doctrine.

8. How many other Persons have we seen, who, being infatuated with plausible Discourses about the Vacuum, have neglected all the Duties of social Life, and been wholly taken up in Pursuit of the Happiness promised in the Life to come! This Delusion is not confined to the People only, but has made its Way even into the Palaces of Princes: If we have seen Rebels assemble, and forming an Army besiege the Capital City; if Barbarians have entered the Empire and rendered it tributary; these Misfortunes have happened purely through the Princes Heads being turned with the Maxims and Superstitions of Lau and Fo, whereby they have become incapable of governing their Subjects. Was not Lyang wu ti reduced to die of Famine at Tayching? Was not Whey tsong carried captive into the sandy Deserts of Tartary? Did not Hwentjong shamefully fly to the Mountains of Se chwen? And what Misery did he not suffer there? Thus have these false Sects made Dupes of our Emperors, and brought the Empire to the Brink of Ruin.

Superstitions of Fo and Lau ruinous to several Emperors.

9. Among the Artifices wherewith the Ministers of the Sects of Fo and Tau, seduce the Minds of the Credulous, I must not omit a common Stratagem well calculated for the Purpose. When they initiate any Person into their Mysteries they oblige him to look into a Vessel of Water, where he sees himself in the Condition he then is; they then bid him look a second time, and he appears in the Condition he shall be when born again, provided he continues sincerely devoted to their Deities. By their Skill in the Magic Art it is so ordered, that a rich Man first beholds himself in the Shape of a sick Person, or a common Beggar in the utmost Want, and thereupon takes a Resolution to consecrate all his Substance to the Idol-Temples: After this good Work is performed, they persuade him to look a second Time into the Vessel of Water, and then he sees himself in the Habit of a King, a General of the Army, or Prime Minister of State. If it is a Maid, she beholds herself dressed in the Robes and Jewels of an Empress, a Queen, or favorite Concubine of the Prince; and this is to be their happy State when they enter a-new into the World. By these kind of Inchantments they cunningly dispose the People to Rebellion: Thus prepared, they readily take Arms, fight Battles, and plunder opulent Cities. By such Methods, during the Han Dynasty, two Rebels caused infinite Mischief; which were renewed under that of the Twen, and more lately in the Reign of the Ming, by other Ringleaders of Rebellion, who ought to be looked upon as public Pests, because they destroyed several Millions of Men. You might have seen those Monsters in Nature, for whom no Punishments could be great enough, boast of their Crimes even under the Executioner's Sword; and still influenced by the Inchantment, cry out: We die content, we are upon the Point of entering into that delightful Abode in the West, where Fo waits to receive us, and make us partake of his Bliss (A). 'Tis plain, these false Doctrines are the Spring of many public and private Miseries.

Juggling tricks of their Priests to delude the People, and excite them to Rebellion.

10. There are four sorts of Professions of absolute Use in the Empire, for providing Necessaries and maintaining good Order therein, viz. Those of the Literati, Husbandmen, Mechanics and Merchants: But the Disciples of Fo and Lau are continually exhorting People to abandon these Professions, and to embrace the four following, Those of Ho shang and Tau tse for the Male, and those of Ku and Mi for the Female Sex. These Bonzas and Bonzesses live at the Expence of the Public, and stick at no Lies, Tricks, and Frauds, to procure Alms: They likewise give themselves up to Sloth and Luxury, not denying themselves any Pleasures that a corrupt Imagination can suggest, and even trampling under Foot the Laws of Nature and Society. What Difference is there between such a kind of Life, and that of the vilest Animals? Ta mo, the Person so much cried up, who came out of the West into China, spent, as reported, nine Years in the Mountain Tsong in continual Contemplation. He remained immovable with his Eyes fixed upon the Wall, without changing his Situation; and yet this contemplative Sluggard wanted none of the Necessaries of Life, but was plentifully supplied with all Sorts of Provisions and Cloaths. Suppose, after his Example, every private Person should take it into his Head to imitate this kind of Life, what would become of the most necessary Professions? Who would take care of cultivating the Fields, and carrying on the Manufactures? Whence would they have Garments and Food to support Life? Can it be imagined that a Doctrine, whose Practice if it were universal would overturn the Empire, should be the true Doctrine?

Enemies to Industry, Society and Truth.

The Folly and Mischief of a solitary Life.

Besides, it is incredible how much Money is squandered in building and repairing their Temples, gilding and adorning the Images, celebrating Festivals, and making Processions to their Honour; all these Inventions serve for nothing else but to swallow up the Riches of numerous Families. I have but lightly touched these ten Articles; for there would be no end of relating all the Disorders these Sectaries have caused in the Empire.

Images, Festivals, and Processions ruinous to Families.

As this Account could not be pleasing to the Auditory, one of them made the following Reply: 'To hear you talk, Sir, said he, Fo, Lau, and the rest of our Deities, must deserve nothing but Contempt; thus we must bid adieu to Rewards and Punishments, good and evil Spirits: In short, with one Stroke of the Tongue you demolish the whole System of our Doctrine.'

Those who are fond of popular Notions, replied the Philosopher, pass their Lives in a kind of Drunkenness, and finish them in a Dream; they are swallowed up in a Heap of rascally Fables, from which it is not possible for them to get loose; and the Hopes of obtaining a happy Life, thro' the Protection of Spirits, increases their Infatuation.

Love of Novelty and Credulity.

(A) This Passage frees the Confucians from the Charge of such wicked Stratagems, and shews how much the Bonzean Doctrines, wherever they have prevailed, have destroyed those lovely Sentiments of Humanity and Compassion inculcated in the Chinese Morality. The like we find to be the Effect of some Popish Doctrines, which have changed the Christian Spirit of Meekness, Mercy and Love, into Violence, Cruelty and Hatred.

Gives rise to Impostors. This Inclination of the greater Part of Mankind, joined to their Credulity, was what put it in the Heads of Fo and Lau to establish a Place of Rewards, a Hell, a Palace for the Ruler of the Waters and the rest of the Deities, without mentioning Spirits of an inferior Order, and extraordinary Men who are become immortal. They have above all displayed the Advantages which their Gods bestow, and have placed in Heaven a Yò wbang, Chief of all the pretended immortal Beings, who delegates to these Spirits their Employs, such as to preside over Rain, to distribute Rewards and Punishments, &c.

History of Yò wbang, King of the Spirits. In the Book Yò wbang, we find these Words: In the West there was a Prince of the Kingdom of pure Virtue. This King being forty Years old without having a Son, he and the Queen Pau ywê, obtained one thro' the fervent Prayers they addressed to Lau kyun; and this Son is the Yò whang of whom we speak. Another Text of the Book Hven ú, affirms, that in the Western Parts, there is a Place called the Kingdom of pure Joy; that the King thereof being without Children obtained one of Lau kyun; and it is he who is honoured under the Names of Hven ú Tsù tse.

And of Fo. Let us add what is related in the History of Fo, wherein it is asserted, that in the West there is a Kingdom of pure Innocence, and the Prince who is Heir to the Crown is Fo himself; he, whom he espoused, was called Na to, and they had a Son whose Name was Mo hew lo; soon after the Father spent twelve Years in Solitude, and during his Contemplations was transformed into Fo.

Contrary to Reason and Nature. According to these Traditions it appears, that the Dynasty of the Cheu had reigned 708 Years before the Sect of Fo began. Let us argue of the Time past by the Time present, and of the present by the past; the World has gone on, and will go on in the same Manner: Can it be imagined that the thing, whereof no Footsteps are now to be found, was formerly the Wonder of the World? Run over the Countries West of China and you will meet with nothing but Barbarians, where then shall we find the Kingdom of pure Virtue &c. which these Books mention? Or a Race of Men with three Heads, six Shoulders, and eight Hands (A)? Or People who live two or three hundred Years, and yet experience none of the Inconveniences of old Age? How then can you fancy such Places to be the Abode of immortal Beings? In short, the Fables they relate concerning the King of Heaven and Generalissimo of the Spirits, are invented only to abuse the Credulity of the Vulgar.

But said one of the Auditors, How dare you treat Yò wbang with so much Contempt, since he is the same as Shang ti, mentioned in your Books, for whom you have so profound a Veneration? It is he the Emperor Kau tsong (*) saw in a Dream, and who gave him Fá ywê for his Prime Minister; it is of him Meng tse [or Mençius] speaks, when he says, we must fast, examine, and purify ourselves, before we offer him any sacrifices (†): Dare you deny that there is a Shang ti?

Original of giving Shang ti a bodily Form. In the Times of the Emperors Yau and Shun, replied the Philosopher, the People entertained false Notions concerning Spirits (‡); which gave Rise to the extravagant Fancy of giving a Form to Shang ti. I own, that the Emperor Kau tsong was a virtuous Prince; that he saw in a Dream a Man, who in Shape and Features exactly resembled Fá ywê, tho' the Prince was then ignorant of his Name; that he caused his Picture to be drawn upon the Strength of his Memory; and that giving Orders to find out the Man thus represented, he was in reality brought to him. All this is true; but how comes it to pass, that tho' we have neither seen the flying Dragon, nor the fabulous Bird called Fong wbang, they yet appear very often in Dreams? I answer; People having seen such Figures in Pictures they enter into their Imaginations while asleep.

If you insist that Shang ti appeared to Kau tsong in a human Shape, with the Crown and Robes suitable to the Imperial Dignity, I may easily make you this Reply: That as it was the Emperor Wbang ti who first instituted those Ornaments which distinguish the Emperors from

(A) The Images of Fo, &c. are represented in such Form.

(*) This Objection gravels the Chinese Philosopher. He might have come off by answering, that their Yò wbang was not the Shang ti of the Literati, but he whom the Sect of Tau had honoured with that Name under the Dynasty of the Han, and whose Name was Chang i: But instead of this Answer, which would have been satisfactory, he falls to trifling about the Garments which Shang ti ought to have, and endeavours to make this Piece of History pass for a Fable, or a mere Dream, just as if one should see in a Dream the fabulous Bird called Fong wbang: However, restrained by the Authority of the Classic Books, he has Recourse to the modern Interpreters, and will have Shang ti to be nothing else but his Tay li. Had the Chinese the same Idea of the Li, that Père Mallebranche (who seems to be unacquainted with their Doctrine) has of it, our Philosopher might easily have answered, that the Emperor saw his future Minister in the Li. For that Father assures us, that according to the System of the Chinese Philosophy, all Truths appear in the Li, and agreeably to that System which he has framed in the Work, intitled A Dialogue between a Christian Philosopher and a Chinese Philosopher, he makes the latter speak thus: We admit only of Matter and the Li, that Sovereign Truth, Wisdom, and Justice, which eternally subsists in the Matter, which seasons and disposes it in that beautiful Order wherein it appears, and likewise informs this refined and organized Part of Matter of which we are composed: For in this Sovereign Truth (the Li) all Men are of Necessity united, since more, none less; that they see the eternal Truths and Laws, which are the Bonds of all Societies, &c. This being advanced, one is not surprised to hear the Christian Philosopher answer: Your Li, your Sovereign Justice approaches infinitely more the Idea of our God, than that of this powerful Emperor Shang ti. Unfortunately this Language is new and unheard-of in China; and there is not one of the Literati, but would be strangely surprized to hear he was made to speak in such a Manner.

(†) The Objection, had it been urged home, was strong and perplexing: "If the Shang ti of the Literati (say they to him) was without Life and Understanding, could he have given Kau tsong a faithful Minister, as a Reward of his Virtue? Would it be necessary for a Man to purify himself inwardly, in order to offer solemn Sacrifices to Shang ti in a decent Manner?" — Our Philosopher eludes the Difficulty by having Recourse to his Tay li: But he does not offer to say of the Tay li, what Confucius says of Shang ti: He knows the Bottom of my Heart, Chi ergo, and as most just, Chi kung, let him punish me, if my Intentions are criminal. Our Atheist thinks quite otherways of his Tay li, on which he bestows very fine Names taken in a metaphorical Sense: It is, says he, that which governs and reigns in Heaven, the Earth, and all other Beings. In sacrificing to him, it is sufficient to turn one's face respectfully towards Heaven. He dares not disapprove the Rite of solemn Sacrifices, in Use among the literary Sect, and makes a strange Medley by accommodating his Atheism and Acts of Religion together. All this shews that what most perplexes these Atheists is the Doctrine of the Canonical Books, which not daring openly to reject they vainly endeavour to reconcile with their System.

(‡) Here the Philosopher not knowing how to reconcile with his System the Idea, which the Classic Text naturally gives us of Shang ti in his Apparition to Kau tsong, falls into a manifest Contradiction. He says, that Error and Superstition as to Spirits were introduced in the Times of Yau and Shun, whereby he confesses, that his Doctrine was not the same with that which prevailed in the Reigns of those Princes, which yet was called the Golden Age for its Religion and Morality. He acknowledges that Yau and Shun were Sages of the first Rank, and listened to as Oracles appointed to reform the Empire committed to their Care: And yet charges them with authorising, and even introducing gross and pernicious Errors. How is he to be reconciled with himself.

their Subjects, it will thence follow that Shang ti did not exist before that Emperor; or if he did exist, that he continued naked till the Time of his Reign, when they began to wear a Crown, and cloath themselves with imperial Robes. But I chuse rather to answer thus: That what they call Shang ti is that which rules in Heaven and Earth, and generally over all other Beings; for which Reason it is stiled Ti, that is, Sovereign Master. It appears likewise, by the Manner in which some of our learned Men explain themselves, that Shang ti is at Bottom the same thing as the Tay ki, which I have discoursed to you about. Has ever any body ventured to affirm that Tay ki hath appeared in a visible Shape? Whence it is easy to see, that when it is said Sacrifices must be offered to Shang ti they only ought to be made to Heaven with a pure Heart.

That he ever appeared in a visible Shape deny'd.

Your Arguments, cried one of the Assembly, tend to disprove a Hell, and its God called Yen wang, who sways this subterranean Empire; also the Lo ban, that is to say, Spirits who rule the Destiny of Mankind; yet these are the Spirits which, we are told, convey the Soul into the Body at the Moment of Birth, and drag it away, at the Moment of Death, to the Place of Punishment, where it is cruelly tormented by other Spirits. If a Man in this Life has practised Virtue, he will certainly be born again to a State of Wealth and Splendor; if even Beasts themselves have lived well, according to their Condition, they will find themselves transformed into Men: On the contrary, a Person who gives himself up to shameful Vices, and follows his irregular Appetites, shall become a brute Beast. If Animals are more cruel than is suitable to their Nature, they pass not into a new Life after Death, but their Souls are entirely extinct. These are the Things which we are taught, and yet according to you they are so many Falsities.

That both Man and Beast enjoy a future State,

To speak freely, replied the Philosopher, I do affirm they are all false. Two married Persons cohabit together, they both concur in producing the Embryo which is conceived in the Womb of the Mother, and grows by insensible Degrees: If, according to your Notions, the Fœtus must wait till it is brought to Perfection before the Soul insinuates itself therein, by what Place can it find a proper Entrance? Or we may say rather, that a certain Quantity of Blood being united in the Mother's Womb forms the whole, which there undergoes a Fermentation and begins to have the Power of Motion; it is then a Being of a particular Sort. Thus Man is a Composition resulting from the Union of a sensible Thing with another that is invisible; and this is what we call Ki: While this Union subsists we are capable of Pain; when it is dissolved we become insensible. If a Man has the Palsy on one Side of his Body, you may apply Fire to the paralytic Part and he will feel no Pain. When he dies, the Hing, or that which is visible in him, is separated from the Ki, or that which is invisible: This Ki is evaporated (||) into Atoms, which flutter here and there, or are changed into a cold Wind destitute of all animal Heat, What then remains of the Deceased, upon which your Ministers of Hell can exercise their merciless Cruelty?

Deny'd by the Philosopher on natural Principles.

But suppose that the grand Demon of all He kang fang, (who is one of the 36 Kang of the Tau kya) has a Mind to seize upon the Soul of some Wretch after it has been dispersed, and is able to blow all its Parts dexterously together again, in order to punish it for its Crimes at the Tribunal of the Infernal Judge: Do you believe that these Demons would have Leisure and Patience to re-assemble all the subtle Particles scattered here and there?

This Reasoning of the Philosopher was not without Reply: We are assured, sayd one of them to him, that the God Yen wang, and the other Judges his Ministers, fix the Moment of the Birth of all Mankind; also if they shall marry, and to whom; if they shall have Children, and what their Disposition will be; and whether rich or poor; in short, all that is to happen to them is written in the Book of Yen wang; hence their Fate is inevitable, and no Alteration can be expected. Have you any thing to say against this Doctrine?

Absolute Predestination of the Bonnas.

Don't you remember, replied the Philosopher, a Passage in the Huen ü cbwen, one of your Books? A certain Demon called Yau mo (*) was continually devouring Mankind, but the God Huen ü came to their Assistance, and preserved a great Number from his Fury. Upon which I reason thus: Either Yen wang had determined the Number of those who should be devoured, or he had not. If he had not, your Hypothesis falls to the Ground of itself; but if he had determined the Number, why did the God Huen ü make such useless Efforts to save People who were irrevocably condemned to be devoured? But since we are fallen upon this Topic, pray listen to another Fable, which is pleasant enough: A Person called Pung, lived to the Age of 800 Years, and married 72 Wives one after another. The last dying in her Turn went into the other World, and asked the Ancestors of Pung, what might be the Reason that her Husband lived so many Ages? Is it because his Name, added she, was not recorded in the Register of Yen wang (†)? Yet none can escape him. I will teach you the Mystery, replied the Grandfather of Pung: The Name and Surname of my Grandson your Husband are certainly in the Book, but in the following Manner; when it was necessary

Refuted by their own Principles and Legends.

(||) This Philosopher runs down the Opinion of the Sectaries, who make the Body a transitory Lodging for the Soul, supposing it to be united to the Body in his own Way; but he does not allow it to be spiritual and immortal. He pretends it is a mere subtle Portion of Matter, which is destroyed as well as the Body by the Separation of its Parts. But supposing this, how is the Soul united to the Body? Being Matter, it can be united no otherways than as one Body is united to another; and it is evident that two Bodies can only be united by the Surface. But is such a Union sufficient to explain what we experience, touching the several Parts of the Body and the Sensation of the Soul? Besides, if the Soul consists of Parts as well as the Body, each Part must have Functions peculiar to it. In what Part then will he place the Faculty of thinking? Can Matter become a thinking Being? He must needs maintain farther, according to his Hypothesis, that the Soul, being no more than a Collection of Matter put in Motion, is not a free Agent; that the least Motion which I made with my Hand Yesterday was a necessary Effect, and could no more be avoided than the Sun can avoid rising above the Horizon; and in short, that if I had not moved my Hand it would follow, that from the Beginning of the World Matter had received a natural Motion quite different from that which it had at first. What Absurdities are Men obliged to maintain, when they are resolved not to quit the false Principles they have set on Foot!

(*) St. Epiphanius writes, that Pythagoras invented the Doctrine of the two Principles, which he might have taken from the Disciples of Fo. It appears, that they hold two Gentis of very different Characters: One who seeks to devour as many Men as he can; and the other, who shakes it his whole Business to save those whom the wicked G. dia would swallow up.

(†) All that is said here, relates to the System of the Bonnas, and the idolatrous Worship brought from India. They admit a kind of Paradise, Hell, a God called Ten wang, &c.

to bind up the Leaves, the Officer employed to do it took by Mistake the Leaf on which the Destiny of Pung was written, twisted it like a Lace, and with it sewed the rest together (*). As the Woman could not keep the Secret, Yen wang soon heard of the Story; so that taking the Book and examining the Lace, he blotted out the Name of Pung, who died that very Instant. This Example, continued the Philosopher, proves the direct contrary of your Doctrine, for here is an Instance of one who escaped the Penetration of Yen wang. Can you be certain that others have not escaped by a like Trick? But to convince you that all this is fabulous, it is sufficient to observe, that in the Times of Confucius and Meng tse, no Paper Books were in Use, they wrote upon the Rind of Bambú, or Tables of Wood. Besides, as your subterraneous Hell is nothing but a Heap of Earth, Water and Stones, it is plain, Paper Books and Registers could not be preserved there: You ought therefore to look upon what you read in those Books as so many romantic Fictions.

Marks of its Forgery.

But, replied another, however you may ridicule Hell and its Spirits, dare you say the same of the Guardian Spirits of walled Cities called Ching wbang; or of divers other Places named Tú ti, which are revered thro' the Empire? And can so universal a Worship be false?

Guardian Spirits and

Hear me, replied the Philosopher: In the Reigns of Tau and Sbun, Dwellings were not encompassed with Walls and Ditches, which Custom was first introduced under the Dynasties of the Hya and Sbang, in order to defend them from Thieves and Rebels: At length, they erected a Ching wbang (||), and built Places designed for its Honour; they also built others in Honour of the Tú ti (§). When they took it in their Heads to give the Spirits the pompous Name of Ti ti, because they were looked on as the Nursing Fathers of the People, they divided them into different Classes: Those to whom they attributed the Care of the Fields and cultivated Lands, they honoured with the Title of Shé shin (*); those whose Office was to preside over the Villages, to look after the Health of the Inhabitants, and maintain Peace among them, were honoured under the Title of Tú ti; the Spirits, assigned to the Inside of Houses, and Places of public Assemblies, as Guardians thereof, were revered with the Name of Chung lyew (†); they assign'd to others the desert and mountainous Countries, in Hopes that they would facilitate the Transportation of Provisions and Merchandises, and these were honoured under the Title of Spirits of the high Mountains: In short, those who were placed in the Cities, encompassed with Walls and Ditches, were worshipped by the Name of Ching wbang, as Spirits who preserved such Cities from public Calamities.

Blasphemous to represent the Deity by an Image.

I am now coming to the Point, continued the Philosopher, in reality all these Spirits (:) are nothing but Lumps of Earth differently formed; when the Memory of them is preserved in the Soul, it is just as when I am drinking Water, I think of the Spring from whence it arises, and am obliged to it for the Pleasure and Benefit I receive from it. Dare any one carry the Blasphemy so far as to take for the Image of the true Spirit (†) of Heaven and Earth, who is Purity itself, those grotesque Figures of Clay representing Men, or Women, either on the Inside or Outside of the Pagods, or the Figure of an old Man, such as is placed in private Houses?

Here the Philosopher was thus interrupted: Many Prodigies have been performed by the Ching wbang and the Tú ti, which Prodigies demonstrate their Power; and as they are often seen in the Shape of living Men, how can you say they are nothing but a Lump of Earth?

We must go a little round about, replied the Philosopher, to (‡) explain the Wonders and Apparitions of which you speak: There are Men whose Talents are extraordinary, and who distinguish themselves from the rest of Mankind, by their Courage and Virtue; it appears sometimes, that they are oppressed with Slander, or a sudden Death carries them off without leaving any Posterity behind them: Now these very extraordinary Personages are endued with Souls of an uncommon kind, which are not easily dissipated, but generally retire into the Pagods, and there work surprising Events. They talk of one Wen tyen tsyang, massacred under the Dynasty of the Twen, and of a Yu chung tsyau, who miserably perished under the Ming; whose great Actions have made the People believe, that after their Death they became Ching wbang, or Guardians of Cities.

(:) We see here how much the Philosopher is perplexed by his inability to account for strange and miraculous Events, which can be wrought only by Demons, and yet he would attribute them to natural Causes. He is indeed honest enough not to deny such wonderful Effects, as others would do, who, to get out of the Difficulty, are resolved to admit nothing that is contrary to the Course of Nature: But then it is certain, that the Conjuratorial and Operations of the Devil are too common in China to be denied. 'Tis very remarkable, that in all the Countries where Christianity is not established, the Devil exercises a great Power over the People, and that this Power ceases as soon as the true Religion takes Root there: Nay, this Power of the Spirit of Darkness is entirely restrained by the bare Presence of a Christian Child, of which there have been infinite Instances.

[REMARK. But these Instances du Haldé means, will probably be ranked by Protestants among other pretended Miracles of the Romish Church. And the Reader will find Reason to doubt of several other Positions he advances, where his Religion is concerned.]

(‡) The Text is Ten, Ti, Tse, Yen, Chin, Ché, Shén. It appears that by these Terms Spirit of Heaven, our Atheist intends nothing else but the material Heaven: Just as by Spirits of the Mountains and Rivers he means no more than the visible Mountains, and Rivers themselves.

(||) That there are Guardian Spirits of Cities and the principal Places of the Empire, is an Opinion of great Antiquity in China. The Mandarins at this Day, most averse to the Idolatry among the People, have still Recourse to the Ching wbang, with regard to which, our Philosopher does nothing but quibble in this Place; his Way of reasoning being not unlike that which some of the Chinese use with regard to the Name Tyen chu, that is, Lord of Heaven, which the Missionaries give to God: before Heaven was created, say they, there could not be a Tyen chu, or a Lord of what there was not: Therefore your Tyen chu and the Heaven began to exist both at the same Time. As they relate many remarkable Facts, whether true or false, to prove the Protection granted by the Ching wbang to the Cities and their Inhabitants; and as this Worship is professed and practised by the literary Sect, our Atheist is puzzled how to accommodate these common Notions with his System. There are certain Souls, says he, which are not dissipated in leaving the Body, but still subsist, and seeking out for a Tenement stop at the Dwellings of the Ching wbang, where they work the Miracles that are reported. He had been much more puzzled if the Auditors, turning his own extravagant System against him, had replied: Yea, who boast of having thrown off the Yoke of a Supreme Master, by refusing to acknowledge any, how are you sure but the Souls of your greatest Enemies may be amongst those which subsist after Death? These Souls being no longer restrained by Laws and you not having the Power to avoid them, what have you not to fear from their Anger and Revenge?

may exist some time after his Death. When this Air produces wonderful Effects they are attributed to Spirits, either of craggy Rocks, mountainous Places, Rivers, or Cities; but indeed every thing that is done happens of Necessity, and according to the Laws of Nature. Can you believe that these Spirits take their Rank by Means of an imperial Mandate, which appoints their several Offices? Is it in the Power of any Mortal to assign to this or that Spirit the Office of presiding over such and such Productions? The Spirits you talk of are nothing but the Mountains, Rivers, Fields, and Cities themselves, wherein according to the natural Course of things there sometimes happen uncommon and surprising Effects; it is then ridiculous to say, such a Man, whose Name and Surname we formerly knew, is at present a Spirit that ought to be worshipped.

Permit me to say, replied one of the Assembly, that your Answer does not satisfy me: You say the principal Part of a great Man is his Ki or Soul: Will you then attribute to these remains of a great Man every thing extraordinary that happens, and which seems to be contrary to the Course of Nature? I lived some time ago at Ching cheu, where I saw Willow-Trees produce little odd Figures in the Shape of a Man about two Inches in Height: About the same time it rained black Rice in Kyang si; at Chu cheu there fell out of the Sky Men's Heads about the bigness of a Pea, wherein the Eyes, Mouth and Nose were very exactly formed. These events are publickly known, and believed by wise Men, and you can't say they are according to the Course of Nature.

Confucius, replied the Philosopher, thought it not worth while to mention these Spirits, which are known by their strange Operations: Yet it was not because he was ignorant, that when a Kingdom is threatened with a Revolution, these Prodigies sometimes happen, and are a kind of Fore-runners of some approaching Calamity. This excellent Sage thought it sufficient to say, that we should not give Credit too easily to these Sorts of Miracles, which are of no use but to fill the Mind with Uneasiness and Dread; and because the Sect of Fo has recourse to this Artifice to terrify the Vulgar, it is reckon'd a false and dangerous Sect. I acknowledge (*) that when some dreadful Event is near at Hand, for instance, a Famine or a great Mortality, the five Elements are in Confusion and produce Monsters: But if at these Conjunctions Men seriously set about to reform their Manners, and practise Virtue, all these Omens will be attended with no ill Consequence.

Omens and Prodigies forerunners of public Calamities.

You are unwilling then, replied one of the Stangers-by, to look upon the immortal Spirits as Authors of these Prodigies: But to attribute them to natural Causes only seems very unaccountable. I shall endeavour to convince you by a single Example: Under the Dynasty of the Ming, in the City of Yen tse, of the Province of Ho nan, there died one of the common People called Cheu, surnamed Tyen pau. The third Day after his Interment his Wife took Wine and Pulse, and went to the Burying-place to make this small Offering: But stopping in the Way, not far from a Rock, there suddenly proceeded from it Lightning, accompanied with the most dreadful Noise. At the same Instant, part of the Rock fell down and discovered in a hollow Space within it a Stone Chest; which the Woman having a Curiosity to peep into drew near it, and thro' a large Slit therein, perceived that it contained a Sabre with a very rich Handle, and a Book which much resembled a Book of Magic. This she took and returned to her own House, where she set herself to peruse it, and find out the Sense; after which she undertook to foretel several Events among the Neighbours, which fell out exactly according to her Predictions.

Ridiculous Story of an Enchantress.

The Inhabitants of the Place, who were Witnesses of these Things, conceived so great an Esteem for her that they stiled her the Mother of Fo; and in less than a Year this new Prophetess grew into such Reputation, that she was followed by more than ten thousand People, and continued to work surprising Miracles. By the Assistance of her magical Book, if she did but blow upon a Field of Corn, or Rice, it was immediately changed into Swords and Spears, and every one thought he saw an Army in Battle-array: With one single Word she could turn a Joint-stool into a Leopard or Tyger; and a weak Fence of Pales into high Walls surrounded with Ditches. But now to shew what all this tended to.

One Day, when it was least expected, there happened an almost general Revolt; whereupon the Mandarins of the Army march'd immediately with Troops to seize the Ringleaders, but found greater Resistance than they imagined, and a bloody Battle ensued. However, at length the Rebels were overcome, and the Enchantress being among the Prisoners was thrown into a Dungeon loaded with Irons, where she remained three Days, unable to set herself at Liberty, her Art forsaking her as soon as she was in Irons. But you must own, that this Woman could not have worked such Prodigies without the Assistance of the immortal Beings.

All that I shall admit, said the Philosopher, is that certain Magicians, or such sort of People who pretend to the Rank of Immortals, having been able to steal (+) from Heaven and Earth the Knowledge of a Change which was to happen in Nature, composed the Book of future Events, and hid it within the Rock. When the fatal time of the Revolt drew near, according to the natural Course of Things, the Enchanters appeared, whose Predictions being listened to, favour'd the Rebellion, wherein so many perished. In short, tho' these Calamities necessarily happened in Consequence of the Situation of the Heaven and Earth, yet the criminal Boldness of the Magicians, who intrenched upon the Rights of Heaven by searching into the secrets of Futurity, will not escape the

Punishment

(*) Our Philosopher durst not deny what is so often repeated in the Shu king: That certain Signs which happen, are Notices given Mankind by Shang ti, of some approaching Calamity, unless they prevent them by reforming their Manners: But to reconcile this Doctrine with his System, he argues in a most wretched manner. For in short, how can there be, according to the Laws of Nature as he supposes, certain Presages of Events, that are uncertain, and which depend on the free and changeable Will of Men? Can we avoid acknowledging a Superior Intelligent Being, which connects the Presage of a Comet or Earthquake, with the Event of a Rebellion, or dethroning of a Monarch?

(+) This Theft from Heaven and Earth by the Magicians, is, as plainly appears, a mere Absurdity: which proves that to expose the System of a Philosopher, who attributes all things to natural Causes, you need only set him to reason upon Nature: for nothing is more likely to discover his Extravagance and confound his Pride.

Punishment due to them; and those who consult or listen to these pretended Immortals, (supposed to associate themselves with Spirits) have always proved dangerous to their Country.

Pretended Miracles.

I must not pass by your last Words, say'd one of the Assembly: You cannot be ignorant that the King of Kin (*) flying after a defeat pass'd the deep River of Yang tse, and by an unlooked-for Miracle the Water only reach'd his Horses Girths. In like Manner the last Heir, of the Race of the Tsen, having beheld almost his whole Army cut in Pieces, was obliged to fly with Precipitation towards the North; when coming, as you know, to the Side of a great River, and not finding a Ferry-Boat, there suddenly appeared in the Air a great metal Bridge, by which he cross'd the Stream. You say that these are Prodigies not worthy to be mentioned?

Idly admitted and accounted for.

My thoughts concerning it, replied the Philosopher, are these: That which both in Heaven and Earth is the Principle of the most wonderful Productions, this Being, this Ki, strengthens the Weak, and weakens those who are too strong (+). Before the Dynasties of the Hya and Sbang, the Earth being very thinly peopled, and the Number of Mankind but small, Heaven which was then in its full Vigor was more likely to produce Sages and extraordinary Men, who supported and propagated their Species: But it degenerated in after Times, and Men being greatly multiplied, the Malice and Corruption of their Hearts prevail'd, whilst Integrity and Virtue the Ways of Heaven, (†) Reason and Order were hardly discover'd. Heaven could not suffer such a Multitude of wicked Mortals; wherefore he sent his Plagues among them, those Blood-thirsty Villains who delight in nothing but War. He rais'd up a Pe chi who caus'd the Ruin of Cbau, and the numerous Troops that he commanded. Lyew tau che was another Firebrand of War, who carried Rapine and Desolation into all the Provinces. As for your two Citations from the History: You ought not to doubt that this Favour was granted to these Princes, in order to preserve some Remains of the Tsen Dynasty, and the Kin Nation, which without this extraordinary Assistance had become extinct. 'Tis certain, the Conduct of Heaven (||) is not blind, nor void of Reason: If it crosses Prosperity (§), 'tis because it proceeds beyond Bounds; of which I'll give you an Example.

Tsen not blind or void of Reason.

'Twas the Design of Heaven to restore the Han Dynasty; for which Reason, when Quang vi was stopped on the Banks of a large and rapid River, it caus'd the Waters to freeze in an Instant, that he and his Troops should find no Difficulty in their Passage. When the Order observ'd by Heaven (•) for the Government of the World is ready to produce any great Change, for instance, when Heaven is on the Point of abandoning a reigning Dynasty, there then happen extraordinary Events, as so many fatal Prefages: But these are not always the same, tho' they always proceed from the same Cause.

The Auditors having praised the Philosopher's Subtlety and Penetration, one of them say'd: After all, Sir, the Religion of Fo and Lau are spread thro' the Empire, and have long since taken deep Root in Mens Hearts. Consider you alone oppose them: I wish you attack'd them with even stronger Arguments than are us'd against them in the ancient Books; but still, that would not secure you from the Assaults of an infinite Number of Adversaries who follow those Doctrines, and you have no more than one Mouth and one Tongue to answer them. Do you think you would be able to withstand them? And are you not afraid lest by endeavouring to teach others the Source of true Happiness, you should bring upon yourself real Misfortunes?

The Philosopher took the Meaning of this Compliment; and judging he had display'd his Learning to no purpose, as soon as it grew duskish he rose to return into the City. The Chiefs of the Assembly accompanied him as far as the Bridge; and so this Conversation ended.

Mohammedism increases in China.

These are the principal Sects which prevail in China: For there is no Occasion to speak of the Mohammedan Sect, settled above 600 Years ago in divers Provinces; where they live in quiet, because they take no great Pains to extend their Doctrine and make Proselytes. In ancient Times they encreas'd their Numbers solely by the Alliances and Marriages they contract'd; but for some Years past they have made a considerable Progress by help of their Money: They every where buy up Children, whose Parents, unable to educate, make no Scruple to sell them. During a Famine, which wast'd the Province of Sban tong, they purchas'd above 10,000. They marry them, and either buy or build a considerable Share of a City, and even whole Country Towns to settle them in. Hence, by little and little, they are grown to such a Head in many Places as not to suffer any to live among them who goes not to the Mosk; by which Means they have multiplied exceedingly within these hundred Years.

Judaism diminishes.

Neither shall I speak of the Handful of Jews, who entred China under the Dynasty of the Han, which began 200 Years before Christ. There were at first many Families of them: But they are now reduced to seven, which marry among themselves, without mixing with the Mohammedans, having nothing in common with the latter, either as to the Books or Ceremonies relating to their Religion. They have but one Synagogue, which is in Kay fong fu, the Capital of Ho nan. If the Reader would know more concerning them, he may peruse the Letter of P. Gozani, insert'd in the 7th Tome of the Edifying and Curious Letters written by certain Jesuit Missionaries, till the Publication of farther Particulars since sent from China.

But I can by no Means omit giving an Account (A) of the Rise and Progress, in this vast Empire, of the Christian Religion, introduced by the Missionaries about two Centuries ago.
