HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS

F R E D E R I C K,

P R I N C E of W A L E S.

May it please Your Royal Highness,

PRESUME to approach Your ROYAL HIGHNESS with a complete English Edition of a Performance, which was thought by its Author not unworthy the Patronage of the King of France: an Honour to which it was the rather entitled, as the Maps, and Collection of Edicts, that make the principal Part of it, are the Work of a great Chinese Monarch, the late admirable Kang hi, by whose express Orders they were executed.

THE first is a vast Improvement in Geography, a Science which can never be brought to Perfection without the Encouragement of Princes; and the other is a Fund of excellent Politics, which joined to the Treatises on the Government and Morality of the Chinese, may deserve Your Royal Highness's Attention, as they come from a People, who wisely make those Studies the Top of all Science, and have perhaps arriv'd to a greater Proficiency therein than all other Nations.

No Laws or Institutions appear in the general so well contrived as the Chinese to make both King and People happy. By them the People are taught to look on the Sovereign as their Father, and the Sovereign on all Occasions to consider his Subjects as his Children. By the Force of this single Principle the most despotic Emperors on Earth govern with the same Mildness as the most limited Monarchs; and Nations as numerous as the Sands of the Sea are restrained within the Bounds of the most perfect Submission. Hence it is that their History hitherto furnishes more remarkable Instances of intrepid Virtue, as well as of Fidelity in Subjects to their Sovereigns, and of Affection in Princes to their People, than that of Great-Britain itself, which as yet has but faintly admitted the Parental Scheme (the best and surest Basis of Government) into its Politics: Hence likewise China has but seldom experienced Revolutions, which have so often overturned other States; and were it not for the superstitious Sects that have been suffer'd to propagate themselves, had probably never felt any.

IN Consequence of this excellent Maxim, a Chinese Emperor is perpetually labouring to merit the Name of Father of the People. He lays up his Revenues only for the public Service: Whenever any Tax bears too heavy he immediately remits it; the Moment his Governors give him Notice of any public Calamity, he opens his Treasuries to relieve the Distressed. He looks into all Affairs with his own Eyes, and his Ears are open to hear all Complaints. He permits no Set or Profession of Men to impose on, or make a Prey of, the rest. He redresses Grievances in the Law, Religion and Government, the Instant he is inform'd of them. If an Edict appears to have an ill Effect, he causes it to be revoked before it does farther Mischief. He lets no Magistrate run on to oppress, or Foreign Power to injure, his Subjects, but calls them to Account on the first Remonstrance. He rejects every Project tending to their Detriment, tho' ever so much to his own private Interest; and pursues every Scheme which conveys the smallest Advantage to the Nation. He is particularly attentive to encourage the Manufactures; and suffers no Branch of Commerce to sink or languish for want of applying a speedy Remedy. In short, he never does any Thing contrary to the Inclinations of the People, to which he always conforms himself; and for Fear he should deviate in the least Particular from his Paternal Character, he invites his faithful Ministers to examine his Conduct, and apprise him of his Mistakes.

THIS is the glorious Light in which the Chinese History presents their Monarchs to our View; and this is the Light in which the Inhabitants of these Islands figure to themselves Your Future Reign. They can do no less in Justice than think thus advantageously of Your Royal Highness, who so professedly make the British Princes, most renowned for their Benevolence, Generosity and Disinterestedness, the Patterns of Your Imitation. Those sublime Qualities, which have always distinguish'd the greatest Monarchs, and shine so conspicuously in every Action of Your Life, afford an Earnest to them that they will not be deceived in their Expectations; nor can your Posterity ever want the Hearts of their Subjects, (the only sure Support of Sovereigns) so long as they tread in Your Steps.

THAT Your Royal Highness, in Conjunction with Your most Amiable Consort, may continue long to bless these Islands with Your Presence, and secure their lasting Happiness by a Numerous Race of Princes, who shall sit on the British Throne to Latest Time, is the ardent Wish of

Your ROYAL HIGHNESS'S

Most Dutiful,

Most Faithful, and

Most Humble Servant,

THE TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

PERE DU HALDE having in his Preface given a copious Account of the Materials of this Work, it remains only to say something concerning the Manner in which it has been executed, and what we have done on our Side to improve it. Remarks on the present Work,

In order to this, I shall consider the Description of each Country separately: And as this Volume, with Half of the other, relates almost entirely to CHINA, I shall confine my Remarks at present, chiefly to this Part of the Work, which for the History, Natural and Civil, is abundantly more complete than any thing before published; or indeed, than all the Relations that have been hitherto written, put together: Whole Authors, such as Samedo, Magalbanes, Navarette, le Comte &c. having only seen some small Part of the Country, could not be qualified to treat so fully or accurately of Matters, as those who had travelled over all China, and being employed by the Emperor to survey his Dominions, had an Opportunity of coming to the Knowledge of a Multitude of Things, which must have remain'd hidden from other Travellers. So that, notwithstanding the Description of Chinese Tartary, Korea and Tibet is also exceeding curious, and may be esteemed by many as the more valuable Part of the Work, on Account of the ample Discoveries it contains of those Spacious Countries, whereof little more than the Names were known to us before, yet if P. du Halde had treated solely of China, his Labour must needs have been acceptable to the best Judges in this Sort of Literature. Especially since this Part is enriched with Translations of several Chinese Books relating to their Religion, Medicine, Politics and Morality; among which the Declarations, Edicts, Speeches, &c. of Emperors and Ministers, besides giving Light into many of the Customs and Laws of China to be met with no where else, may be affirmed to be as noble Essays upon Liberty and Government, as ever appeared in any Country of Europe, not excepting Great Britain itself, the only Nursery of sound Politics, and Asserter of the common Rights of Mankind, on this Side of the Globe. Preferable to any former of the Kind.

In short, this Performance is valuable, if it was only for collecting into one Body what occurs most material in former Accounts of China; a Work very much wanted, especially as the Books treating of this Country were become very numerous, and several of them not easily to be procured. 'Tis true, certain Topics may be found which are not handled so minutely as in other Writers, some whereof I have taken notice of, and frequently supplied as I went along: But possibly the Author had his Reasons for not enlarging on those Subjects, either because they had not been confirmed by his Correspondents in China, or that they appeared not to be exact; which in general he observes is the Case with most former Relations, without pointing out the particular Authors, who were chiefly of his own Society. Objections answer'd.

It must be confessed likewise, that his geographical Description of China is not near so copious as that published by P. Martini in his Atlas Sinenfis: but then it may be presumed to be far more accurate; the Missionaries having been at every City they describe, and indeed sometimes not sparing to correct Martini's Performance, which is compiled almost wholly from the Chinese Geographers, who, as P. du Halde observes, are very apt to exaggerate Matters that relate to themselves or their Country. Besides, as the Author, in his Account of every District or County in each Province, has inserted whatever is most remarkable with Respect to the Trade and natural produce thereof; and as a particular Description of the Situation of every Chew and Hyen would have swelled the Work to a very great Bulk, and might be learned very justly from the provincial Maps and Plans, he might deem it needless to enter into a farther Detail. Indeed, we should have been very well pleased, if instead thereof he had inserted an Itinerary of the Roads through China, out of some of their Books published in every City for the Use of Travellers, or else the Journals of the Missionaries in their Progress through the Provinces, while they were making the Maps: Which would have been more proper than the Travels he has inserted of other Missionaries, and, with the Maps, would have furnished Materials to render the Geography of China in a manner complete.

Tho' this Work comes out under P. du Halde's Name, yet many of the Pieces were confessedly the Performance of the Missionaries, whose Names are prefixed: Nay, he seems to have had little Share in any of them, farther than to prepare and sometimes abridge them. In the Letter of P. Regis, inserted in the Author's Preface in the Name of the Missionaries concerned with him in drawing the Maps, we meet with some Expressions which seem to favour this Opinion; as, the Work which we offer the public, — we did not think fit to insert them, meaning their Observations of the Variation of the Needle, in this Piece of Geography. Now tho' the first of these Passages seems to relate only to the Maps, yet the last plainly refers to a distinct Geographical Treatise sent to Pere du Halde, as well as the Maps, with a design to be made public: Besides, we often find the Missionaries speaking in their own Persons, in the Articles not given under any Name. But Nobody, I presume, will have the worse Opinion of the Work, for the Missionaries having had the greatest Share therein: It were only to be wished, that the Editor

Editor had given us the Pieces intire just as they came from the Hands of his Correspondents, because it is to be feared some of them may have suffered by a too severe Castigation, as I have observed wherever I found occasion.

State of the present Translation.

THUS much may suffice with Regard to the Original: I come next to acquaint the Reader with the State of the present Translation. In the first Place, I have endeavoured to give a faithful Version of the Author's Sense in the fewest Words, and to avoid a disagreeable Stile; hoping, however, that the Reader will make allowance for small Slips in both, which are inevitable in Works of such various Matters and Length. If there be any thing better than ordinary in either of those Respects, perhaps it may be found in that Part between p. 349 and 638; which, all but about five Sheets and a few Notes, was done by other Hands.

Proper Names reduced to the English Orthography.

Secondly, I have taken a good deal of Care to reduce the proper Names from the French to the English Idiom; tho' in doing it, I met with no small Difficulty, chiefly occasioned by the same Word being written divers Ways: For instance, we meet with Tong, Tung, and sometimes Hiong and Hiung; Kbia, Kia and Hia; Kbi and Ki; Coan, Coan, and Koan; Koen, Quen and Yuan; Koei, Kouei, Kuey and Yuei; Kbing and King, Nbing and Ning; Ngan and Gan; Cien, Tien, Tien and Tien; Tse, tze, tee, sie, se and ce; Van, Voan and Ouan; Tsin, tsin, tein, and a great number of the like. In short, the several Authors of the Pieces that compose the Work, have often different ways of writing the same Words: Besides, now and then, Names occur written according to the Portuguese and other Languages. By this various Orthography, it appears that the French have not yet one settled manner of writing the Chinese Names, owing doubtless in great measure to the Scantiness and Ambiguity of their Alphabet, which to me seems the worst of all others for expressing the Sounds in foreign Languages.

However, I have endeavoured to adjust them in the best manner I could, and believe I have succeeded pretty well, excepting in a very few Instances. Without this Improvement, the Work would have been very uncouth and defective; since the French Orthography must give an English Reader a very false Idea of the Chinese Language, by conveying wrong Sounds and making the Words, which are all Monosyllables, to appear of two or three Syllables. This is so obvious in itself from the above Instances, and has been so fully demonstrated of late by Letters inserted in the public Papers, in Defence of this Work and on other Occasions, that it would be needless to mention any thing farther in Defence of this Alteration. I shall therefore only observe, that P. du Halde, for the same Reason, condemns the French for using the Portuguese Orthography: And indeed, if all Translators would reduce proper Names to the Idiom of their own Language, it would render their Performances exceedingly more useful, as well as prevent a World of Confusion in Geography and History arising from the Neglect of it.

Notes.

I have frequently marked the Variation of the Orthography by a Note at the Bottom of the Page; which Course I have taken to supply, illustrate, or correct the Original whenever a proper Occasion offered: If at any time I appear in Opposition to the Missionaries religious Notions, it is because I judged it not honest to spread their Poison in a Protestant Country without the Antidote along with it. Nor will the well-meaning Romish Laity, I presume, be offended with me for shewing the great Conformity there is between the Doctrines and Practices of their Clergy and those of the Religion of Fo, called Bonzas; since it is visibly done with a benevolent design to free them, by means of the Parallel, from that deplorable Bondage of Mind which they lye under to their deceitful Guides, who palm on them, as so many religious Duties and Precepts of the Gospel, the same gainful Artifices, which they charge the Bonzas with inventing merely to enslave and pick the Pockets of their Followers.

ments.

I have distinguished the Original Notes by Symbols, and my own by Capital Letters of the Alphabet, excepting when they are tacked to the Authors, and then they are inserted between Hooks: I have observed the same Method as to Words now and then inserted for Illustration into the Text. Farther to improve the Translation, I have suited the Running Title at the Top of the Pages to the different Subjects treated of; and have added Marginal or Side Notes to give the Reader a summary View of the Matters handled in each Page. Parentheses and long Digressions that interrupt the Relation in the French, are thrown into the Notes (A), and large Paragraphs sometimes transposed for sake of bringing Arguments on the same Subject together (B). The four Indexes of Matters are brought into one at the End of the Second Volume, to prevent looking in three or four Places for the same thing. Lastly, the two Tables explaining the Chinese and Tartarian Words that occur in the Work, are likewise brought into one, and augmented by a great Number of Terms out of the Text. In short, a good deal of Pains has been bestowed to render this Edition commodious and correct; altho' it must be confessed, notwithstanding all our Care, several Errors have escaped the Press, especially in the Proper Names, for which we crave the Indulgence of our Readers, who will find the most material of them rectified in the Table of Errata.

The particular Maps, their Excellencies.

HAVING given this Account of the Body of the Performance, I proceed next to consider the Maps, Plans, and Cuts that accompany it. The Maps are of two Kinds, general and particular; the particular Maps being 38 in Number, are published just as they came from the Missionaries; and however complete the rest may be, must be allowed to be the most valuable Part of the Work, which indeed seems to have been compiled chiefly with a View to usher them into the World. These Maps are an immense Treasure in Geography; and in fact, the procuring of them cost the Emperor of China immense Sums. Eight Missionaries were employed no less than nine Years in making of them. To this Purpose they travelled over the whole Empire, furnished with various Mathematical Instruments, Carriages, Provisions, and all other Conveniences at the Emperor's Expence: The very Mandarins of every District were ordered to attend them, to give their Assistance in all the ways they were able; so that nothing was wanting to render them accurate. Many of the Originals were fifteen or twenty Foot long, and consequently very minute in their Description: This appears also in some Measure from the great Number of Boroughs or Towns inserted in these Maps, besides the Cities; tho' for want of Room, the Names are omitted, excepting a few of the most remarkable Places, as King te ching, a Town of Kyang si, famous for making the China-Ware; Fo shan, another Town near Kan ton, eminent for its great Trade and Number of Inhabitants, &c. In short, these Maps may be truly affirmed to be the greatest Geographical Work that ever was performed by the Orders of a single Monarch; whether we consider the vast Space of Earth they describe, or the great Number of accurate Observations that were made for determining the Situation of Places. However, it cannot be said that they are all equally exact, for some Part of the Maps of Eastern Tartary are laid down from the Report of the Natives; and it does not appear that any Observations vations were made for those of Tibet: But the Maps of China seem to be drawn with very great Care throughout; and yet it is not to be presumed that every Mountain and River was actually surveyed by the Jesuits. It appears by the Table of Longitudes and Latitudes at the End of this Book, that they passed through all the Cities of the first Rank in every Province: They took the Latitudes of all these Capitals, and determined their Distances from one another by a Chain of Triangles; for the rest probably making Use of the topographical Surveys they found in every District. And this Method doubtless was sufficient to produce accurate Maps of any Country.

(B) See p. 131. Note (A)

However, it must be confessed, these Maps are defective in some Particulars; (1) As wanting the Subdivisions whereby we cannot distinguish the Cheu or Hyen that belong to each Fu or Capital in a Province. (2) For want of the Roads, so that Places seem to lie in Confusion, and one loses the Satisfaction of travelling with the Eye over the Country. (3) Being exhibited on the plain Projection with inclining Meridians Countries are thrown out of their natural Figure and Proportion: Whence this Deformity, tho' scarce discernable in the Maps of Pe che li, Shan tong, Kyang nan and Kyang si, thro' which the Meridian of Pe king passes, is yet very perceptible in those of Shen si, Se cheen and Tun nan, which lie farthest from it.

Their Defects in the French,

As to Orthography, the Maps abound more with Faults than the Texts: For besides those already mentioned which they have in common with it, many of the Names contained in them are written according to two or three different Orthographies: For instance, half of those in the Maps of Pe che li and Quey cheu are after the Portuguese Manner, and half after the French; nay, what is still more incongruous and perplexing, often the Words or Syllables of which a Name is composed are written according to different Idioms. Thus in Pe che li we find Tom tebeou, Tom mim bien, Khim tebeou, Teim tebeou, Tim tebeou, &c. instead of Tong tebeou, Tong ming bien, Khing tebeou, Tjing tebeou, Ting tebeou &c. in the Map of Ho nan, we meet with To xan bien, Lo xan bien, Koang xan bien, for Yo chan, Lo chan, Koang chan, &c.

It is probable, that the Originals have both the Divisions and Roads; but as they are omitted in the Copies sent from China, it was not in our Power to supply them. 'Tis true, P. Martini's Maps of the Provinces are divided according to the Fu: But as Places are exhibited for the most Part in a very different Manner from what they are in P. du Halde's; and we find in one Set many Hyen which are not in the other, or at least have neither the same Names nor Situations, we durst not venture to insert those Divisions, any more than the Names of several Places which are inserted without sufficient Authority in the Dutch Maps, from the Travels of the Jesuits, published in the Work. However, P. Martini's Maps have been of Use often in determining us as to the Choice of the Names, when we found a Difference between the Maps, Tables and Text of du Halde, which frequently happened.

It was no less out of our Power to add the Roads, for want of the Itineraries already mentioned. Indeed, the Places in the Table of Latitudes and Longitudes at the End of this Work, seem to be set down in the Order the Missionaries travelled through them, and thereby we are able to trace their Progress through all the Capital Cities of each Province: But as one cannot from thence lay down the Course of the Roads through the intervening Places, and this Defect may possibly be supplied hereafter by the Communications of the Jesuits themselves, I thought it better to let the Maps remain without the Roads, than draw them at random.

My Intention was to have remedied the third Defect, by drawing all the Maps anew according to a circular Projection, or Dilatation of the Polar Planisphere; but some Gentlemen having been of Opinion that it was better to engrave them immediately after the French Edition, and much Time having been spent in considering what to do, that Resolution was layed aside: However, I have brought the Orthography of the local Names to the English Idiom, and consequently have introduced Uniformity in that Respect between the Maps and the Text, as well as among themselves.

As this was a Matter of no small Importance towards rendering the Maps correct and useful, the Dutch Editors tell us they have rectified an infinite Number of corrupt Names. But on Examination, it will appear that they have left most of them in the Condition they found them: Thus in their Map of Pe che li, we meet with Tim him bien, Yom teim bien, Yom tehim bien, Ham tehim bien, Hiam bo bien, Kiam boam keou, and Numbers of other Names according to the Portuguese Orthography, instead of Ting him bien, Yong tsing bien, Yong tehim bien, Hang tehim bien, Hiang bo bien, Kiang boam keou, &c. in short, often where they have changed the Orthography, they have done it but by halves; thus we find Tien for Tien, Tiao for Chao, Tebuam and Tebuam, Teim, Teim and Tjing, Tom and Tong, Leam and Leang, Tebam and Tebam, Hoam and Hoang. So that by giving the Names sometimes one way, sometimes another, they have introduced even more Confusion in the Maps than there was before (A).

Besides this Improvement as to Orthography, I have endeavoured to give the Maps some others, by inserting certain Particulars out of the Text, which ought of right to accompany them as they serve for Illustration, and to confirm their Authority. (1) In the Title of each Map, I have instanced by whom and when it was made, as far as I could gather from P. du Halde's Preface. (2) The upper Scale is adapted to the Longitude of Paris, that the Reader may know the Distance of the several Places of China from thence, which is more interesting to Europeans, as well as more consistent with their Geography, than to reckon Longitude only from Pe king; and I have chosen the Observation which places this last City 114 Degrees East of Paris, for Sake of its being the Middle, as well as a round Number. (3) To the Scale of Measures, I have added the Content of a Degree in English Miles, according to the Determination of the Academy of Paris, rather than that of Mr. Norwood, which makes it about 69 Miles and a Half, because the former is the Result of several repeated Operations, performed by more exact Methods. (4) All Cities, whose Latitudes were taken, have a single Line drawn under the Name, and a double distinguishes those, where both the Longitude and Latitude have been observed; that the Reader may discover at one View, all the Places where celestial Observations have been made, and pass a Judgment off Hand on the Correctness of the Map. (5) For his farther Satisfaction, I have inserted a Table of the Observations themselves,

(A) Indeed it appears plainly from what the Dutch Editors have done, that they were not able to reduce the Orthography to a Uniformity; and as they were themselves sensible of this, or at least that they had not done it, they express themselves in their Preface very cautiously on the Occasion. Their Words are: P. du Halde, in his Preface speaking of the Maps belonging to the Paris Edition, acknowledged as that Defect with Regard to the Orthography, which he imputes to the Difference between the Chinese [it should be French] and Portuguese Pronunciation. This Confession moved us to apply a Remedy wherever we judged it might be done with Safety. From hence it appears, First, that they did not discover this Defect themselves; Secondly, that they have only remedied it in Part, which as I have shewn is a very inconsiderable one. But how they came, after making any Correction, not to pursue it, for instance, to correct Tom or Kim once, and leave it five times uncorrected, I cannot readily account for; only I should rather impute it to their Diffidence than want of taking Pains, since they have in several other Respects spared no Labour, even when there was no occasion for it, and it had been better let alone.

themselves, that he may see the Authorities whereon the Map is grounded: for both in copying, and engraving Errors will unavoidably creep in (as seems to have been the Case with the Jesuits Maps themselves); and if there did not, the Situations cannot be taken so precisely from a Map as from a Table. The Capital of each Province is distinguished in a different Character, and the most remarkable Variations in the Name, Latitude or Longitude (which amount often to two or three Minutes) from the Map, are marked by a Star.

I think every Map ought to have these five Requisites, especially the last, without which, the best has nothing to recommend it more than the worst, except the Author's Name, which is of no Authority unless with a few who are acquainted with his Merit: But when such Vouchers are inserted, a Map carries its own Credentials along with it, and demands a Preference among a Crowd of others which differ from it. By this means the Curious would be directed to a right Choice, and many hindered from propagating Errors by following false Maps, for want of knowing how to distinguish the good from the bad. To this Defect, doubtless, is to be imputed the little Esteem, or rather great Contempt, that Maps are in here; for Englishmen require Certainty, and are apt to despise any Art where they meet with such endless Difference, without being able to discover where the Truth lies. In short, if this Method was duly pursued, I am persuaded Geography would soon recover the Credit it has lost among us, and be delivered from the Danger of the relapsing into Error, by putting a Stop to those spurious Compositions which are daily obtruded on the Public by ignorant or mercenary Hands; because in such Case, nobody would buy Maps for Use which wanted Vouchers, or did not agree with them: For which Reason, I would earnestly recommend this Practice to all Geographers, and those who wish well to this Science, whose Perfection is of such vast Importance to Commerce and Navigation.

I intended likewise to have inserted in every Map a large Table explaining the Geographical Terms, which would have been of great Use, tho' much the same in all; but wanting Room in most of them, the Reader is desired to have Recourse on Occasion to the Table in the General Map of China, which will supply that Defect. This General Map is drawn anew according to a circular Projection, and accompanied with Vouchers, &c. like the particular Maps; from whence it was copied, and not from Mr. D'Anville's: But the General Map of all (including China, Korea, Tibet, and all Tartary from the Eastern Ocean to the Caspian Sea) is engraven from his Original, without any Variation, except reducing the Names to the English Orthography. I have not altered them in any other Respect, altho' they frequently differ from those in the Jesuits Maps: Whether it was that so much Care was not taken in correcting theirs as his own, or whether he had some particular Informations concerning certain Names, as he seems to have had with Respect to the Division of Korea, and some small Additions below the 40th Degree of Latitude, which are omitted in the Jesuits Maps. But tho' for these Reasons I thought it proper to give the Names in the General Map as I found them written by Mr. D'Anville, yet I did not think them sufficient to warrant my changing those in the Jesuits Maps, or inserting several things in them on his Authority, as the Dutch Editors have done on a bare Presumption that they were changed, or omitted thro' the Carelessness of the Engravers: (A) For that would have been to give Mr. D'Anville's Work for the Jesuits, or confound them together, and, for ought we know, to insert Errors in Place of Truth. I must own, I think it very strange that such considerable Variations should appear between the General and Particular Maps, without being accounted for either in P. du Halde's Preface, or Mr. D'Anville's Dissertation concerning his General Map, inserted in the geographical Observations on Tibet towards the End of the last Volume.

In this Map Mr. D'Anville differs from the Jesuits not only with Regard to the Names, but also the Situation of Plans, as will appear by the comparative Table inserted in our Copy; and has altered that of Asiatick (tolerably well settled by help of astronomical Observations:) But upon what Grounds, I shall examine in a particular Dissertation at the Close of this Preface, and therefore shall say no more of it here.

The Plans of Cities, which are thirty eight, may be considered as so many Topographical Maps designed to afford us an Insight into the Chinese Manner of Fortification, and the Care they have taken to give their Towns the most advantageous Situation for Trade as well as Defence, in which few Nations can compare with, and none exceed them. I need not mention the Plans of Temples and other Cuts, farther than to observe that they are very curiously designed, and furnish a lively Idea of the Things they are intended to represent.

Upon the whole, this Work of P. du Halde, or rather the Chinese Missionaries, is a most noble and valuable Performance: For tho' we are sensible it is not in all Respects so complete as could have been wish'd, and that it might have been executed more to Advantage by a Person less taken up with the Functions of his Religion, and more inured to Works of this Nature than P. du Halde; yet is it richly intitled to the Esteem of the Public with all its Faults, which were they much more considerable than they are, would be recompensed by the Maps alone; these being a whole Atlas of Discoveries at once, and in short, the greatest Improvement in Geography that ever was published in any Age at one time. As to this English Edition, it was the Undertaker's Design to rival the French for Beauty of Printing, Goodness of Paper, and Elegance of Engravings in half the Number of Volumes, and at a fourth Part of the Price to Subscribers: In a Word, it is a most expensive Work to the Undertaker, but to those who subscribe to him one of the cheapest that has been publish'd in this Century.

WHAT has been say'd may suffice to give the Reader an Idea of the present Performance. But before I conclude, it will be proper to add some Remarks for justifying, as well as illustrating the Orthography of the proper Names; with an Explanation of the Coins and Measures mentioned in this Work.

(A) Tho' I cannot but blame the Dutch Editors for corrupting as I may say the Jesuits Maps, by inserting Things out of Mr. D'Anville's, or the Journals of the other Missionaries to be found in the Work, without any Certainty of their being in the Right, yet they are to be commended for some other Additions or Alterations which are grounded on the Text, particularly for inserting some Places out of the Tables of Longitude and Latitude. By this means they have supplied a few Places of Moment which seem to have been omitted by Mistake, as Myen yang cheu in Hu guang, and Ping yueu cheu in Quy cheu. However, I cannot see why in putting in the Name of Myen yang cheu, they should expunge that of U yang huen, which in the Original stood in Place of the former; for possibly this last Name may belong to one of the Situations to be found very near it in the Map. I wonder they were not governed in this, as in most things else by Mr. D'Anville's Map of China, where the last Name is retained, and the former omitted as in the Original. They have committed the like Fault in the Map of Chekyang, where they have inserted Nbin hia huan, and left out Nau huan. In Quang si, they have made 13 Fu instead of 12 by inserting Tu yang, which in the Table by mistake is denominated Fu, tho' by its square Situation in the Map, it should be no more than some Ports, several Errors of this kind are to be met with.

The following TABLE shews the English Characters answering to the French, which are ranged on the Outside; with the Manner of pronouncing the Chinese Words as printed in this Work.

- A. This Vowel is commonly pronounced broad like a in all, call, &c. tho' often like a in Father; but the Variation is not distinguished in the Original. In our Notes the broad a is marked by a Circumflex â. The Vowels.
- e. Is commonly sounded like e in Venial. When it comes before a, it is changed by us into y; thus for Leang, Leao, I write Lyang, Lyau, to make the Word a Monosyllable; only in the Pronunciation, more of the e than the i may be sounded between the L and y, if there be any Occasion for it.
- ê. In the French is expressed in our Translation by é, and is pronounced like a in Father. ê or ee is expressed by è, and pronounced long.
- i. Is sounded commonly close as in sign; sometimes open as in sign, when at the End of Words, and a Consonant goeth before. Sometimes like ee in seen, and then it is marked with a Circumflex in the Notes. At the End of Words, when it comes after a Consonant and before a Vowel, it is changed into y. Thus Tai, mai, are written Tay, may; also for Kiang, fiang, we put Kyang, Syang. Sometimes we have omitted the i; thus for Sine, Sinen, Huen, we write Sve, Sven, bven.
- o. Is commonly sounded as in bone, open, tho' (A) sometimes, but rarely, it is obscure, as in pxon, twon, where it is pronounced soft like e, and very quick. Sometimes we have changed it into w; for œi, writing Wey; for Fœ, Fwœ, and at the End of Words after a into u, See ao.
- u. Is commonly sounded like u, sometimes it is changed into w. Thus for Yuen, tebuen, we write Yœen, ebœen. This often confounded with v Consonant, as in Sine, Sinen, Huen abovementioned, which are sometimes written Sive, Siven, and Hiven in the French: Frequently tis put indifferently for v; thus we meet with Yong and Yung, Kong and Kung &c.
- ou. Before a Vowel at the Beginning of Words, or after a Vowel at the End of a Word, is expressed by us with w. Thus for Ouan and Keou we write Wan and Kew. Coming after a Consonant, it has the Sound of oo, as in good, and is expressed by a Circumflex u: Thus for Fou, Nou, &c. we write Fû, Nû, &c.
- ao. This is a Portuguese Character retained by the French, and is expressed by au, which must be pronounced quick, and thro' the Nose. Thus for Tao, Leao, Miao, we write Tau, Lyau, Myau.
- C. Is always expressed with us by K to prevent the equivocal Sound before e and i, except in some parti- Consonants.
lar Words made Use of in Europe, as Confucius. Sometimes we have changed it into Tj, thus for Gien we write Tjien: Sometimes into S, thus for Teing we write Tjing. See Tj among the double Consonants.
- ç. We commonly express by Tj, sometimes by S.
- g. Before a, o and u, hard as in God. Before e and i, 'tis always changed into j Consonant, to prevent the equivocal Sound; thus for gin, we write jîn.
- h. Is sounded pretty strong as in English. But before o and u like a W. See bo among the double Letters.
- j. This Letter is expressed very exactly in English by zh, but it is doubtful whether ever it ought to be expressed by this Character, or whether it stands for our J Consonant or Y. Sometimes in the Maps it seems to be put instead of our ch.
- k. Is sometimes used indifferently for c. Sometimes as q. Thus for Kœi, Kœue, we write Quey, que.
- m. At the Beginning of Words is expressed by m. But at the End of Words by ng. Thus for Tom, Tim, mim, we write Tong, ting ming. Thus m final is the Portuguese Character, and is found in a great Number of Names especially in the Maps. For the Pronunciation of ng final, see the double Letters.
- n. Before the Vowels as our n; before g after another Manner, see ng.
- q. As q in Quang tong.
- s. Is pronounced sometimes as s with us, sometimes as ts. Thus for se we frequently write tse.
- v. Is put frequently in the Original instead of ou, the Character by which the French expresses our W, which they want in their Language: Thus we find Van and Ouan, &c.
- x. Occurs frequently in Chinese Names, especially in the Maps, and is the Portuguese Character answering to the French Ch and our Sh.
- y. Is commonly used instead of i Vowel at the Beginning of Words, but we always consider it as a Consonant. When put singly, or for a whole Word, we change it into a Vowel. Thus for Tchang and Tang y, we write I chang, Tang i. All other Letters are pronounced like the English.
- Ch. This French Character is expressed by sh, having the same Sound.
- ds. By ds, which is sounded nearly like ts, or rather seems to be used by some Missionaries instead thereof.
- ho. Is a Portuguese Character retained by the French, and is expressed by wh: Thus for Hoang, buon, we write Wbang, wban. Huan and hoan are both written by us wban; the o and u being frequently used promiscuously for each other. If there be any Difference, it is only that the w carries somewhat of the Sound of o in the one, and of the u in the other. Double Consonants.
- ko, ku, kou, are used in the French for our qu; thus they write Kœan, Kuan, kœuan for quan.
- ng. Is expressed by us with ng; at the Beginning of Words it is sounded like the Portuguese n, in a peculiar Manner thro' the Nose. At the End of Words it sounds like n in seen, queen, being lengthened out with a ringing Tone; the g being added not to be sounded, but only to indicate that ringing Tone, or distinguish this sort of n from the common n.
- ss. This Character we express by ts.
- tch. This is a Character made by the French to express the Sound of our Ch, which is put instead thereof.
- ts, tç, tz, and sometimes tc, are used indifferently by the Missionaries for ts, which last Character I have retained. Some use th for ts; and others ds as before observed.
- vo. Is expressed sometimes by Vw: Thus for Voœ we write Vwœ; tho' perhaps a w would be sufficient, as for Voan we write Wan.

*Tis difficult to ascertain the Characters sometimes when two or three different Sorts are employed to express the same Sound, as in this last Case, ou being the Character commonly used by the French instead of w; and what a confused Medley must we have made, had we retained the various Characters used in the Original to express the Sound of ts, being no less than g. viz. c, ç, s, ss, th, tc, tç, ts, tz.

(A) See the Note at bone in the following Table of the Chinese Words.

From the foregoing Table, we may likewise perceive the Barrenness both of the Chinese and French Alphabet; the former wants the a, b, d, r, x, z, which they express by ya, p, t, l, sh, ch. The latter wants the ch, j Consonant, w, and indeed properly the K and Q, which the Chinese, and most other Oriental Nations have, wherefore it is very unfit for expressing the Sounds of most foreign Languages.

That the Reader may have a more thorough and regular View of our Method of writing the Chinese Names, I have subjoined a Comparative Table of all the Words which compose the Chinese Language, written according to the Portuguese, French and English Idioms. The Portuguese Column is taken from Bayer's Chinese Grammar, in his Museum Sinicum, and the French from Pere le Comte's Travels; only I have changed the m final which the latter used, into ng, to make the Words more agreeable to the Orthography of the latter French Missionaries. I have also marked the â with a Circumflex, in those Words where I conceive it ought to be pronounced broad, as it is in all, fall, &c. I have also distinguished the other Vowels according to the Rules already layed down, so far as I found them marked in P. le Comte's Table, which is defective both in that and other respects.

An Alphabetical Table of all the Words which compose the Chinese Language according to the Portuguese, French, and English Pronunciation.

(2) This is also written ang, the like happens in other Words of this Form, where the o and a are used promiscuously by the Missionaries.

(A) This Word and the four following may be written and pronounced with a v Consonant, Cheva, chevâ, &c., but I take the u to be the true Pronunciation, only it may have more of the s in this cheva, and of the s in the former, according to what I have remarked before. The like is to be observed of all Words in these Forms, throughout the following Letters.

(a) This Word and the next may be pronounced hio, hien;

but as the v is of the obscure kind, and the other Letters which are not obscure, are pronounced clearly, I take chev and cheu to be the true Orthography.

(c) In the Words of this Form, which generally come at the End of each Letter, the s is so obscure or mute, that it seems to be an e. Hence some might pronounce chua, chon or huâ; but I think it best to keep to the general Rules of Orthography; and if the sch be pronounced very soft, and the s both soft and quick, the Pronunciation will, I presume, be sufficiently just.

This Table would have been more Regular, had the Chinese Words, reduced to the Order of the English Alphabet as well as Idiom, been placed in the first Column. However the Reader may observe by it three Things. 1. That the Words contained under the several Letters are formed agreeable to one common Rule in the Chinese Language, tho' they are not equally numerous under each. 2. That according to the Portuguese and French way of writing, many of them appear to be of two or three Syllables, and must be so pronounced according to the English Orthography; whereas according to our way of writing them, they are all Monosyllables, agreeable to the Genius of the Chinese Language. 3. That the Change of Orthography is natural as well necessary; nor so difficult and uncertain as many are apt to think.

The chief Difficulty is in pronouncing certain Characters consisting of double Consonants, which are not used in our Language; but as we have several other double and even some treble Consonants, a little Practice must make this easy. For Instance, it cannot be very difficult for an Englishman, who can say bran, sling, prong, swing, strong, &c. to pronounce in one Sound, fwen, ywen, Syang, Kyang, Hyang, fwen, lwi, tsyen; for the same Rule is to be observed in pronouncing fw, yw, fy, &c. together, that is observed in pronouncing br, st, &c. that is, to pronounce them as if they were but one Letter; which is learned by putting a Vowel between, and pronouncing it very quick, so as by degrees to throw it quite out.

The Chinese Coins, Weights and Measures, being ascertain'd in this Work, by those of the Portuguese and French, it will be necessary for the Reader's Information, to reduce the Latter to the English.

Coins.

COINS and WEIGHTS. (E)

Portuguese Taël— Value an Ounce of Silver, which in China is equivalent to 7 Livres, 10 Sols. But it goes only for 6 Shillings and 8 pence English.

French Livre— About eleven pence English.
23 Livres at present are equivalent to a Guinea.

Sol or Sou— The 20th part of a Livre, somewhat more than a Half-penny.

Denier— The 12th part of a Sol.

Measures.

MEASURES.

The Paris Foot— To the English as 1068 is to 1000 or 12, $\frac{8 \frac{1}{2}}{10}$ Inches.

Toise or Fathom— 6 Paris Feet, or 6 Feet 4,896 Inches English.

Great French League, 20 to a degree— Contains 18,282 English Feet, or is equal to 3 English Miles, 3 Furlongs and 462 Feet.

Common French League, 25 in a degree— Contains 14625 $\frac{1}{2}$ English Feet, or is nearly 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ English Miles.

Geometrical or Geographical Mile, 60 to a Degree— Contains 5000 Geometrical Feet, each equal to 14, $\frac{6 \frac{2}{3}}{10}$ Inches English.

English Miles, of which 69 $\frac{1}{2}$ according to Norwood, and 69 $\frac{1}{4}$ according to the Academy of Paris go to a Degree.— Contains 8 Furlongs, or 5280 English Feet.

(p) I take the French choua and chua to have the same Pronunciation, the rather because the Portuguese has no Word in the Table answering to the latter. And perhaps the French Word answering Xoa, should not be choua, but choa; as in the Letter Ch in the French Column opposite to Choa, we find tehou, not tehoua.

A DISSERTATION concerning Mr. d'Anville's General Map; wherein the Situation given by him to Astrakhan, and his Method of graduating the said Map, are examin'd, and shewn to be erroneous.

THE Design of this General Map is, not only to give us a general View of the Countries included in the particular Maps, but likewise of all the other Countries Westward to the Caspian Sea. This we are told was done pursuant to the Request of the Missionaries, who had provided some Materials for the Purpose †, and indeed had made a Map of the Whole themselves, as appears from the Copy sent into France by P. Regis, which was drawn from the Memoirs of the Tartars and Mandarins §: But those Materials not being sufficient to set the Geography of the Countries West of Kasbgar in a proper Light, they recommended the adjusting that Part to the French Geographers. Accordingly Mr. d'Anville, Geographer in ordinary to the King, being apply'd to, readily undertook the Task, and having finished it, to support his Performance drew up a Memoir, which is inserted in the Observations on Tibet at the end of this Work.

As the most important Point to be settled for regulating the rest was the Longitude of Astrakhan, Mr. d'Anville examined the Distance very carefully between Paris and that City, by an uninterrupted Series of Measures, and found it to be 47 Degrees, 18 Minutes, according to the ordinary Method of projecting or graduating Maps: But on the Supposition that the Degrees of Longitude are one thirtieth part larger than they ought, he determined the Longitude of Astrakhan to be 48°. 55'. which are the extended Degrees reduced to contracted Degrees. Considering the Doctrine of the Contraction of the Degrees of Longitude in the Manner he supposes was at best uncertain, methinks it would have been Mr. d'Anville's safest way to have adhered to the Determination of 47°. 18'. according to the extended Graduation; especially as it agreed within 18 Minutes of the Situation given Astrakhan by Mr. de l'Isle in his Maps made for the Use of the present King of France, where it is put at 67 Degrees of Longitude East of Ferro, and consequently 47 East of Paris.

'Tis true, there is no determining the Number of the Degrees of Longitude between two distant Places by Itinerary Measures alone, and as Mr. d'Anville (uncertain as to the due Content of the Degrees) made use only of such, he could not determine whether the Longitude of Astrakhan ought to be 47°. 18'. or 48°. 55'. But if he had gone another way to work, and made use of Observations, as it may be presumed Mr. de l'Isle did, he might have been able to determine the Matter.

The Observations I mean are those made in Russia, whereof the Principal is, that of the Longitude of Moskow, which places this City in 36°. 20'. Now supposing this Observation to be tolerably exact, as there is good Reason to believe it is (A), we shall have the Longitude of 4 Parts in 5 of the Space between Paris and Astrakhan determined to our Hands; and consequently to determine the Longitude of Astrakhan, it remains only to settle the Meridian Distance between it and Moskow, which Mr. de l'Isle (who has placed Moskow according to the above Observation) has adjusted to 10°. 40': So that Astrakhan must lie in about 47 Degrees East of Paris, as he places it; and there is the more Reason to believe his Determination to be pretty just, because in that Space he had the Latitude of Astrakhan, and several of the intervening Places, besides Olearius's Map of the Volga and other helps, to guide him.

Thus it appears that the Longitude of Astrakhan is but about 47 Degrees, whether there be a Contraction of the Degrees or not: For in determining the Meridian Distance astronomically no Regard is had to the Content of the Degrees. If it be objected that the Meridian Distance between Moskow and Astrakhan determined by Measures is adjusted according to the extended Graduation; I answer, that will cause but a small Difference in the Situation, since, if it be settled according to the contracted Graduation, it will make the Longitude of Astrakhan but 47°. 21'. 20': The Difference between contracted and extended Degrees amounting, in a Space of 10°. 40'. to no more than 21 Minutes 20 Seconds.

As therefore the Longitude of Astrakhan, regulated by that of Moskow, agrees so nearly with what Mr. d'Anville had determined it by Itinerary Measures according to the extended or common Graduation, I think it ought to be a convincing Proof with him, that 47°. 18'. or thereabouts, and not 48°. 55'. is the true Longitude of that City. And indeed if Mr. d'Anville was acquainted with the Longitude of Moskow, as it may be presumed he was, I cannot conceive why he did not choose to make use of it in settling the Longitude of Astrakhan, rather than to depend wholly on Measures, especially when he found his Computation in extended Degrees tally'd so well with Mr. de l'Isle's Computation (according to the same Graduation) grounded on the Longitude of Moskow; unless it may be that he was so strongly prepossessed in favour of his Hypothesis of the Contraction that he would not admit of any Observation to be exact which seem'd to oppose it.

I am of Opinion that what chiefly induced Mr. d'Anville to give Astrakhan so great an easterly Situation was, the Jesuits Maps of Tartary, where several Parts seem to be placed at a Distance, not reconcilable with the Position given by the European Geographers to Astrakhan and the Caspian Sea. But if the Lake of Aral in Khorazm or Karezm has the Position and Extent given it in Mr. Kyrisov's Map of the Russian Empire, there will not be so much Room to spare as Mr. d'Anville imagines. Besides as this Geographer, by frequently varying from them, seems to have had sufficient Cause not to think their Determinations infallible with respect to the Situation of Places, he ought as well to have concluded

(A) That the Longitude of Moskow, or rather Moskoo, is tolerably exact, appears by comparing it with that of Petersburg, lately found by Mr. de l'Isle, the Astronomer (a Member of the Academy in this last City,) to be 27°. 57' 30" East of Paris which deducted from that of Moskow gives 8°. 22' 30" for the Meridian Distance, differing about half a Degree in defect from the Map of Mr. de l'Isle, who places Petersburg so much more to the West than it ought to be; but agreeing precisely with Mr. Korshov's Map of the Russian Empire published at Petersburg in 1734, which, with regard at least to the Situation of those two Capitals, may be presumed to be exact.

concluded the Fault lay on their Side, in placing those Parts many Degrees too far East ward(s), as to have supposed that our Geographers have either removed Astrakhan too much Westward, or extended the Space between Astrakhan and Pe king several Degrees beyond the Truth, in consequence of giving too great an Extent to the Degrees of Longitude.

Ill Con-

In effect, notwithstanding Mr. d'Anville has advanced Astrakhan so much Eastward, to bring the Caspian Sea nearer China, yet he was obliged to bring Kijbegar two Degrees nearer the Caspian Sea than the Jesuits have placed it, in order to adjust its Situation to his own Notions of the Geography of those Parts. And in this perhaps he has not done amiss, the rather because the Situation of Kijbegar was determined from Itineraries alone without Observations of the Latitude: But I believe he is to blame in placing Mount Altay one Degree more Eastward than the Jesuits have done; it should in all likelihood rather be removed so much more to the West if either way. This he has in some measure been forced to, by placing Astrakhan so much Eastward.

He varies from his De-
in the Map.

After all, I will not pretend to say the Longitude of Astrakhan, as computed by Mr. de l'Isle, is absolutely exact; on the contrary, I judge it ought to be put at least half a Degree more Eastward: However I do not impute his Mistake, if he has really committed any, to the common Method of graduating Maps, but the difficulty of settling the Longitude to any Degree of Certainty by Itinerary Measures, even when assisted with the Latitudes (c).

On the other hand, as nothing but an Observation made at Astrakhan can fully determine which Situation is the right, I will not presume absolutely to assert that Mr. d'Anville's Conclusion is wrong, tho' his Premises be false: But whether it be so or not, this I will venture to affirm, that he was in the wrong to vary from himself, by giving that City a different Situation in his Map from what he had determined it by Computation.

The Meridian Difference between Paris and Pe king being $113^{\circ} 51'$ according to the Observation of P. Gaubil, which Mr. d'Anville follows, Astrakhan, according to the above Determination of $48^{\circ} 55'$, ought to lie in $64^{\circ} 56'$ West of the Meridian of Pe king; whereas Mr. d'Anville has placed it in $62^{\circ} 46'$, which makes its Longitude from Paris $51^{\circ} 5'$. This may appear very strange to other Geographers, but if we examine his Motives they will appear still stranger.

His Notion
ing contracted to extended Degrees by altering their Number,

Mr. d'Anville had but two ways rationally of exhibiting Places, that is, by graduating his Map either according to extended or contracted Degrees, without altering their Longitudes, at least as he had determined them himself: But neither of those Methods would serve his Purpose. As the Jesuits had projected their Maps after the ordinary Graduation, he considered that if he vary'd therefrom to follow his own Hypothesis of the Contraction of Degrees, the Countries included in the Part taken from them would want $\frac{1}{4}$ of the Dimensions given them therein; and if he lay'd the Situations down according to the extended Graduation, the Countries added by him would be as much extended beyond their true Dimensions. Mr. d'Anville therefore, desirous to avoid both these Inconveniencies, has taken a Method, which I believe was never employ'd, or indeed ever entered into the Head of any Geographer, before. For to conform to the Practice of the Jesuits, he projects his Map according to the ordinary extended Graduation: But that the Countries which he has added might not be too much extended, he reduced the Difference of Longitude between Astrakhan and Pe king in contracted Degrees to extended Degrees, by deducting $2^{\circ} 10'$ for the 30th Part, according to his Hypothesis of the Contraction; whence Astrakhan comes to lie in $62^{\circ} 46'$ instead of $64^{\circ} 56'$. In consequence of this extraordinary proceeding, Mr. d'Anville has not only placed Astrakhan $2^{\circ} 10'$ more East than he had determined it, but cut off $3^{\circ} 47'$ of the Meridian Distance between Astrakhan and Pe king determined by numerous Observations, and admitted by himself to be just.

surd and erroneous.

The first of these two Errors appears manifestly enough from the State of the Question: But on what Grounds such a Change can be justifiable is hard to discover. He cannot pretend that $62^{\circ} 46'$ is the true Longitude, because he determined it to be $64^{\circ} 56'$: 'Tis in vain to allege that $62^{\circ} 46'$ of the usual Graduation are equivalent to $64^{\circ} 56'$ of his contracted Degrees; since, let that be as it will, there is still a Difference of $2^{\circ} 10'$ in the Longitude. 'Twill be as little to the Purpose to say that the Countries have the same Extent as they would have in the other way of Graduation, since still they have not the same Situation: Unless he will maintain that a Geographer is at liberty to alter the Situations of Places as often as he alters the Manner of graduating his Maps; or that if Countries be lay'd down according to their true Extent, it matters not how wrongly they are situated as to Longitude and Latitude, which no Geographer I presume will pretend to assert.

in the Distance between
Pe king.

That Mr. d'Anville has retrenched $3^{\circ} 47'$ from the Meridian Distance between Paris and Pe king is no less obvious: For whereas he places Astrakhan in $47^{\circ} 18'$ of extended Graduation East of Paris, and in $62^{\circ} 46'$ West of Pe king, these two Sums added together make but $110^{\circ} 4'$ which deducted from $113^{\circ} 51'$ (the Difference of Longitude between Paris and Pe king) there remain $3^{\circ} 47'$. If Mr. d'Anville should still imagine, that he has made allowance for that Defect, by substituting $110^{\circ} 4'$ of extended Degrees in place of $113^{\circ} 51'$ of contracted Degrees, he is greatly mistaken; for tho' $110^{\circ} 4'$ of extended Degrees should be equal in Quantity to $113^{\circ} 51'$ of contracted, according to his way of reckoning, yet they are not equal in Number to them; which Number had been determined and admitted by him for the true Difference of Longitude between Paris and Pe king, and consequently could not be altered.

I

(a) On this occasion it may be proper to observe, that the Missionaries finding Astrakhan marked (by what mistake I know not) in Mr. de l'Isle's Chart of the Caspian Sea, at 67 Degrees East of Paris, instead of Ferra, which is 20 Degrees more Westward, P. Gaubil sends P. Sauvot Word in November 1725, that they were mightily embarrassed at Pe king, on account of a Map (possibly the Original of that sent to France as mentioned before) made in the Palace from the Report of certain Tartars who came from the Caspian Sea; and concludes that in Case Mr. de l'Isle has no good Observation made at Astrakhan, or some Place whose Distance from it is known, he is of Opinion, that City should be placed 7 or 8 Degrees more to the West. Hence it appears, that in the Map just mentioned, Astrakhan is put 59 or 60 Degrees East of Paris, that is, about 54 or 55 Degrees West of Pe king, which is 10 Degrees nearer the Meridian of Pe king than Mr. d'Anville computes it, and 12 nearer than Mr. de l'Isle puts it. Now I will not say, that erroneous Situation given Astrakhan in the said Chart had influenced the Geographical Determinations of the Jesuits, and induced them to place Kijbegar and Mount Altay more Eastward than ordinary, because their Maps were made before Mr. de l'Isle's Chart came to their Hands: But I am of Opinion their General Map above mentioned, and Memoirs relating to the Distance from Kijbegar and Harkas to the Caspian Sea, might have influenced Mr. d'Anville in his Opinion of the Contraction of the Degrees of Longitude, and consequently in the Situation he has given Astrakhan. † See Sauvot, Obi. Marh. Geography, &c. p. 135.

(c) For Instance, Mr. Kyrilow, in his Map of the Russian Empire before mentioned, places Archangel in Russia, above 16 Degrees East of the Meridian of Petersburg, altho' Mr. de l'Isle, of the Academy there, found the Meridian Distance between those two Cities no more than $8^{\circ} 30'$, which is an Error of $7^{\circ} 30'$ in so short a Space. And there is the more Reason to believe that Observation is not very remote from the Truth, because his Brother in his latter Maps places it not above 10 Degrees to the East.

I grant that Degrees of Longitude may be supposed greater or lesser in Quantity, and that Maps may be graduated with either Sort; I grant also that they may be converted one into the other by increasing or diminishing the Quantity: But I deny that a lesser Number of Degrees can be substituted in place of a greater, when the greater Number has been determined by exact Observations for the Difference of Longitude between two Places; because that would be to alter the very Nature of the Longitude, which consists properly in the Number, not the Quantity of Degrees: As in determining the Difference of Longitude between two Meridians, Astronomers determine the Number of Degrees independent of their Quantities, which differ in every Parallel; so that let the Quantities contained in the Degrees to be chang'd be what they will, their Number must be still the same. It is obvious, therefore, that Mr. d'Anville's Notion of converting extended into contracted Degrees, and vice versa, is absurd, erroneous, and repugnant to the fundamental Principles of Geography, as making the Longitude variable and uncertain; and in effect after all he has not chang'd contracted into extended Degrees, as he imagines, but only contracted or reduced the Dimensions of Countries by putting Places under wrong Meridians.

Mr. d'Anville has therefore imposed on himself, and introduced Error and Confusion to no purpose into his Map, which by this means is such an odd Composition, that, according to his Method of graduating, Places in the Part added by him fall under wrong Meridians; and if it be graduated according to the contracted Degrees, Places, in the Parts taken from the Jesuits Maps, whose Longitudes are determined by Observation, will fall under wrong Meridians, as will appear from the Map it self, which I have graduated both ways: So that while one Part errs in respect of Dimensions, the other Part errs interchangeably in respect of Situations. In short, there is only one way of mending this Map, and that is by graduating the Part added by Mr. d'Anville, or perhaps rather all to the West of China, with contracted Degrees, according to his Sense of them, and the rest in extended Degrees (b): And indeed this Course would have been much better than that which he has taken; for tho' the Projection would not have been uniform and regular, yet Places would have had their true Positions, which is the most essential End of Maps.

To conclude: Mr. d'Anville was no more under a necessity of conforming to the Jesuits Manner of Graduation, since he thought it false, than to their Manner in projecting his Map, in which he varies from them; and the rather, since he has not scrupled to alter the Positions as determined by them sometimes 3 or 4 Degrees in his other Maps, as will be observed elsewhere: By which means he renders the Manner of Graduation useless, by altering the Dimensions as well as Situations which Countries had in consequence thereof.

From what has been urged I think it is evident that, supposing the Degrees of Longitude were less than they are commonly esteemed, Mr. d'Anville had no reason to graduate his General Map in the Manner he has done. This is all I shall say to it at present: But in the Part of the Work above mentioned, where Mr. d'Anville is introduced giving an Account of it, I shall consider the Situations of Places in the Countries added by him, and how far the Tables of the Oriental Geographers, which he has made use of, are to be rely'd upon. I shall also, in my Preface to the Second Volume, or before the Description of Tartary, examine his General Maps of Tartary and Tibet, which differ both from the Jesuits Maps, and his own General Map of all, which has been the Subject of our present Remarks. In the mean time, I must do Mr. d'Anville the Justice to declare that, however faulty his Map or Maps may be in the Particulars mentioned, he has notwithstanding in other Respects discovered a great Capacity for Geography; that he has taken no small Pains to consult Authors, and adjust the Situation of Places, which is a very difficult Task where Observations are wanting; that he has put the Countries between the Rivers Amur and Sir in a much better Light for the general than they were in before; and in short, that the Science is greatly obliged to him for his Endeavours to reform the Geography of those Parts, which, as he observes, lie in great Confusion.

(b) The Map will answer both these Views tolerably well, if the Reader, in determining the Longitudes of Places, will make use of the prick'd-line Meridians, from the 20th Westward of Peking for the Western Parts, and the black-line Meridians for the Parts to the East of the 20th Meridian.

P. Du HALDE'S PREFACE

TO HIS

Description of CHINA, CHINESE-TARTARY, &c.

CHINA has for a long Time past excited the Curiosity of Europeans; altho' the first Accounts they had of it gain'd very little Credit among them. The Narrative publish'd by the Venetian (A) who travelled over some Provinces of that Empire, in the Retinue of the Tartars, pass'd for a Romance. All he recounts concerning the Antiquity of this Monarchy, the Wisdom of its Laws and Government, the Fertility of its Lands, and Richness of its Trade, as well as the prodigious Multitude of its Inhabitants, the Politeness of their Manners, their Industry to promote Arts and Husbandry, their Taste and Zeal for the Sciences; all this, I say, was look'd on as mere Fiction, which had not so much as the Air of Probability. We cou'd not believe that beyond so many half-barbarous Nations, and at the very Extremity of all Asia, a powerful Nation was to be found scarce inferior to any of the best-govern'd States of Europe.

But by degrees these Prejudices diminished, and that Author's Veracity began to be acknowledged, especially when it appeared that what he had advanced agreed with the Accounts of the first Missionaries, who towards the End of the 15th Century found Admittance into China, which till then, out of a Principle of Policy, had been deny'd to Strangers. One cannot avoid giving Credit to the Testimony of Persons, whose Condition, Integrity, Capacity and Disinterestedness take away all Grounds of Suspicion.

This awaken'd the Curiosity of People, and changed the Indifference which they shewed before for China into an earnest Desire to be acquainted with it. But this Curiosity gave rise to a great many trifling and false Relations.

As soon as an European Vessel arriv'd in a Port of China, it was usual for some of the Ship's Crew, during the few Months stay they made there, to gather all the Information they cou'd, both from the Report of the Natives and their own Observation; this they committed to Writing, and at their Return gave out they had made great Discoveries: and it is from such inaccurate Materials as these, pick'd up in the Outskirts of so vast a Country, that their Relations are compos'd.

Others again, with less sincerity, have, in order to entertain their Readers, supply'd by Invention the Want of proper Remarks. This appears to be the Method taken by a certain Italian Traveller (B) who in a Book printed at Naples in 1720, entitled Giro del Mondo, [a Voyage round the World,] has given a particular Description of the Emperor of China's Palace; of which he cou'd have no Idea, but what his Fancy suggested: and the more easily to gain Credit in what he advances, he makes no Scruple to affirm that Pere Grimaldi, President of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, introduced him into the Palace.

All that's true in this Matter is; That he was at Pe-king, and walk'd up and down that great City, follow'd by a Chinese, who serv'd both as his Footman and Valet; that he frequently visit'd the Jesuits, who did him all the good Offices they were able; that he desired them to get him a Sight of the Emperor, or at least his Palace, but it was not in their Power; That coming to a Bridge, which it was necessary to pass in going to the Palace, he was constrain'd to turn back, because his Valet wou'd not venture any farther; and that he was oblig'd to leave Pe-king without seeing more of the Palace than the South-Gate, which is always shut.

The

(A) Marco Polo, commonly call'd Marco Paulus Venetus, and Mark Paul the Venetian, who was in China toward the End of the 13th Century.

(B) The Author here aimed at is Dr. I. Francis Gemelli Careri, well known by his Travels round the World, which were first publish'd about the Beginning of this Century, and have been printed in several Languages, and are to be found in the Fourth Volume of Churchill's English Collection. This Censure of Pere du Halde is doubtless taken from the Extract of a Letter from a Missionary at Pe-king, in the Preface to the 15th Volume of the Lettres Edifiantes & Curieuses, p. 14.

The whole of this is Fact; whence it follows that the Description, which he has given of the Palace, the Halls, and Imperial Throne, the Audience he was at, and all the rest, is purely his own Invention. How cou'd P. Grimaldi, notwithstanding his high Station, without the Emperor's express Order introduce an unknown Person into the Palace among the Members of a Tribunal going to Audience? a Thing which neither a Minister of State, nor even a Prince of the Blood has Power to do.

Ancient Accounts of China by Arabian Merchants censur'd

But how unfaithfully soever others may have written of China, I am much surpriz'd that an Author, (C) famous for his Parts and Learning, shou'd lose his Time in translating into French, and illustrating with long Dissertations, two ancient Arabian Accounts concerning China, which are nothing but a Parcel of Absurdities and Lyes. It needs no great skill in Criticism to perceive that the Writers of those Accounts deserve no manner of Credit, and never were in China; but when the Mind is once prejudiced, it is disposed to adopt the most ridiculous Fables, and to receive every thing as Truth, which tends to run down the Persons whom we do not love, and even make a Merit of not loving. (D)

All Men of Learning are not induc'd with that Sagacity and Penetration, to take a Thing in its proper Light at once, and to distinguish the true from the false; as is found in those rational and judicious Reflections made by a learned * Academician concerning China, and propos'd by way of Doubts to P. Parennin, who returned Satisfactory Answers.

The bad Tendency of injudicious and false Relations.

Relations that are either made without Judgment, fictitious, or written with Partiality, have a bad Effect on the Mind, by rendering those suspected which are faithful; and instilling, even into Persons of Understanding, certain Prejudices, which they have much ado to shake off again. How many, for instance, are there who will not be persuaded but the Chinese carry the Origin of their Empire much higher than the Deluge, and even than the Creation itself?

But if so absurd a Notion has entered into the Heads of a small number of Chinese, who have been deceived by the fictitious Epoch's of certain Astronomers, all the rest of the Nation laugh at their Ignorance. What should we say of those Chinese, who, on hearing that one European Author had asserted that the World has existed from all Eternity, shou'd conclude that to be the general Opinion over all Europe?

The Chinese are guided by their Great History, which, far from giving into such Whimfies, fixes the Commencement of their Empire at Fo-hi: neither do they pretend to determine when that Monarch or his Successors, down to Tau, began their Reigns, or how long they continued. But from the Time of their last named-Emperor they deem their Chronology sure: and indeed there is very little to be corrected therein, either with regard to the Duration and Order of the respective Reigns, or the remarkable Events.

The best Accounts of China written by the Missionaries.

Whatever Prejudices certain Persons may have entertained, thus far must be allowed, that the most exact Accounts we have of China came by way of the Missionaries; who have spent most part of their Lives either in the Capital City or Provinces of that great Empire, and were thereby qualify'd better than any others to give a faithful Account of it.

Yet hitherto defective.

Nevertheless the Relations, which they have hitherto published, are pretty much confined, and sometimes even defective. Most of their Authors, being employed about the Affairs of their Missions, mind little more than to inform Europeans of the Disposition they found those People in to embrace the Faith, and of the Progress of the Gospel amongst them. So that if they mention any thing remarkable relating to the Country, it is only occasionally and in brief, without dwelling on the Subject. Some indeed, at the request of the Learned in Europe, have at their leisure Hours enter'd deeper in their Enquiries; but their Observations, tho' pretty curious in themselves, have sometimes wanted Exactness, as being taken from the Chinese Books, whose Authors are naturally inclined to exaggerate the Rarities and Wonders of their Country.

Principally as to the Geography.

The Points wherein they have happened to be mistaken principally regard the Geography, occasion'd by their depending a little too much on the Accuracy of the Chi Shu; which are certain Books, containing the History of every City and its District. Among other remarkable Things to be found in these Books, are the Plan of the City, and the Number of Market Towns and Villages belonging to it, with their Distances from one another. These Distances are reckon'd by Li's or Furlongs, which are of different Lengths in different Provinces; just like the Leagues of the different Provinces of Kingdoms in Europe. The City of Tong-chew, for instance, which lies East of Pe-king, is reckon'd to be 40 Li's distant: nevertheless according to the Measure employed by the Missionary Geographers, who made the Maps, the Distance is not above 30; in the Province, of Shang-tong, 10 Li's make but 8 of their Li's, which are almost equal to those used in the North Part of the Province of Hu-quang. But the Provinces of Kyang-nan, Fo-kyen and some others, reckon the Li's very differently, as the Missionaries found by comparing them with the same Measure. This is sufficient to shew that the Longitudes given by the Peres Martini and Noel (E) cannot be exact, because they were determined by the Distances as computed by the Chinese in Li's or Furlongs, whereof the exact Length ought to be known before they are made use of.

Inaccuracy of P.P. Martini's and Noel's Tables;

In

(C) This is the late Abbe Renaudot, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris, eminent for his Skill in the Oriental Languages. There is a smart Critique of P. Premare, on the Book in Question, published by P. de Halde, in the Lettres Edificantes, Tom. 19. but the Work is not altogether so faulty as that Jesuit would represent it: it has been translated lately into English.

(D) This Maxim will be found to be almost universal, but none will apply it to themselves.

* M. Dortous de Mairan of the Academy of Sciences. See the 21st Tome of the Lettres Edificantes & Curieuses, p. 76.

(E) The first in his Atlas Chinois, and the latter in his Observations Math. & Phys. in India and China.

In like manner the Peres Regis and Jartoux, by the Observations made with excellent Instruments, both at Si-ning where they dwelt a Month, and at other Cities, always found a Difference of 29 or 30 Minutes between the Altitude taken by themselves and that taken by P. Grueber; and of Grueber's Observations. whether it was that the Instruments used by that Jesuit were too short and not well (F) divided, which is very likely, or that he had no regard to the Diameter of the Sun.

For the rest, I don't think we ought in the least to suspect the Veracity of certain Missionaries who residing in those fine Provinces, where Nature seems to have scatter'd all her Riches, have, by their charming Descriptions, given occasion to imagin that all the rest of the Provinces were like them: For since they speak only of what they saw themselves, they are not to be blamed for the false Conclusions of others, nor is what they have written the less true on that Score. They had not then travelled over all the Provinces, as they have since done, by means whereof they have acquired a most particular and exact Knowledge of the Country.

In short Pere le Comte, who has written so agreeably about China, confined himself to certain Matters; and is so far from pretending to give a methodical Relation of the whole, that he confesses his Letters ought to be consider'd only as Memoirs, which might be of use to those who had Thoughts afterwards of publishing a more complete Description.

'Tis in composing such a Description that I have been at Work for several Years; and the Quantity as well as Variety of Matters, compris'd in the Proposals which I published, has caus'd some to doubt whether the Execution would come up to the Design: yet however vast it appears, I hope it will be found that I have even done more than I promis'd. At least I have spar'd no Pains to make known every thing, with regard to that large Portion of the Earth, that deserv'd Notice; and to assure myself of the Truth of whatever I relate concerning it.

I have had in my Hands a prodigious quantity of Memoirs sent from China; which (tho' most of the Things contained in them were foreign to my Design) I was not tired with reading, because I met from time to time with such Particulars, as either were not known, or else confirm'd the Truth of what has been published already in the printed Relations.

Besides, the frequent Conversations I have had with certain Missionaries returned from China, during their Stay in Europe, but especially the necessary and continual Correspondence carry'd on for these 24 Years past with the other Missionaries in all Parts of the Empire, have supply'd me with all the Helps and Informations which I had occasion for. Some of them have even had the Complaisance to translate with great Care certain Books of the learned Chinese, which are insert'd in this Work, and furnish Proofs to many of the Facts related by me.

In short, the whole being finish'd, I had resolv'd to send it to China, in order to have it examined by some or other of the oldest Missionaries; but while I was thinking of the most proper Means of doing it, I was inform'd that Pere Contancin, whom I had chiefly in View, was arriv'd in France, having been sent into Europe about the Affairs of the Mission.

That able and experienced Father, who had liv'd 30 Years in China (10 at Pe-king, where he had been Superior of the Jesuits House, and the rest of the Time in different Provinces) stay'd more than a Year at Paris, during which Time he had leisure to read over this Work, more than once; and examine it with the most critical Attention. By means of his Assistance, in clearing up certain doubtful Points, as well as adding several curious Particulars, I am convinc'd that I advance nothing which is not strictly Fact, and hence it is that I hope to avoid the Censure I have pass'd on others.

As to the Order of disposing the Materials, it is the same with that observ'd in the Proposals, excepting that I have insert'd the compendious History of the Chinese Monarchy in the first Tome (G); because the previous Knowledge of what relates to the Emperors and the Transactions during their Reigns, is necessary for the more easily understanding the Matters that are handled afterwards.

For the same Reason I begin with a general View of the Empire, containing a summary Account of the Things which are treated more at large in the Body of the Work. This is followed by a short History of certain People, particularly the Si-fan: which Nation heretofore form'd a powerful Dominion, till Civil Wars rent it in Pieces, and compell'd them at length to submit to the Chinese Emperors to whom they were formidable before.

I ought not to omit the curious Travels of certain Missionaries in China, wherein is mark'd down very particularly what daily occurred to their Observation; insomuch that in reading, one seems to accompany them on the Road. These Relations prepare us for the Description that follows of the 15 Provinces which compose the Empire.

This presents to our View a great Number of splendid Cities, celebrated on account of their Situation and Extent; the Multitude of their Inhabitants; the extraordinary Concourse of the Chinese drawn thither for sake of Trade; the Beauty of the publick Buildings, and Plenty which reigns therein: there also one beholds the Produce of fertile Lands, (which often yield two Crops in one Year) in Corn, Trees, and remarkable Fruits; Metals of all sorts, Minerals and precious Marble dug from the Bowels of the Mountains; extraordinary Plants, whose Roots are so wholesome, and thrive in no other Climate; numerous Lakes, and Canals, as well as large and deep Rivers, which abound with all Kinds of Fish; a surprizing Multitude of Stupendous Bridges, which are very strong, and not only embellish'd with divers Ornaments of Sculpture, but every Way fitted for the publick Conveniency; in a word, all the Advantages which Art and Nature can contribute, for the Necessaries and Pleasures of Life.

Plans

Besides the general Map of all, including China, Chinese Tartary, and Tibet as far as the Caspian Sea, there is in this Tome a general Map of China itself, and a particular Map of each Province, with several Plans of the Cities, which differ in Figure from those of other Countries.

Emperors

In short, this first Tome concludes with a succinct History of that great and ancient Monarchy: wherein I conform, as I ought, to the Opinion universally received among the Chinese, who deduce their Chronology from the Reign of the Emperor Tau, and look upon it as indubitable down to the present; as I have remarked in the (I) Advertisement prefixt to that History.

After giving these general Notices of China, I enter into a more particular Detail of what concerns that Nation as to their Character, Manners, Customs, Government, Progress in the Sciences, Religion, Morality, &c. which I handle in so many separate Articles, and, I flatter myself, as fully as the Subject required.

Government
of China

I speak first of the Antiquity and Extent of that Monarchy; the Authority of the Emperor, his Expences, Revenues, Household, the Magnificence of his Palace, and his Retinue when he goes abroad; the Form of Government both Civil and Military; the proper Functions of the Mandarins, their Power, and the Honour paid them; the Forces of the Empire, the Fortresses, the Soldiery, their Arms and Artillery; the Policy which is observed, as well in the Cities for maintaining good Order, as in the great Roads for the Safety and Convenience of Travellers.

Next I treat of the Genius and Character of the Chinese, their Air, Physiognomy, Fashions; their Houses, and elegant Furniture thereof; the Punishments inflicted on Criminals, and the Regulations observed in the Prisons where they are confined.

I proceed to shew how Merit, which alone confers Nobility in China, may be acquired, and how much it differs from the European. As the Grandees are Enemies to Luxury, so far as concerns their Persons, they make the better Figure when they appear abroad: we shall here see what Magnificence the Chinese affect in their Journeys, and Feasts; as well as in their publick Works, such as Bridges, Triumphal Arches, Gates, Towers, Walls of their Cities, &c.

Ceremonies

Every Thing is regulated in China, even to the most common Duties of Society: which gives me an Occasion to speak of the Ceremonies observed by them in point of Civility; in their Visits, and the Presents they make one another; in their Letters, Feasts, Marriages and Funerals.

Agriculture

With regard to the Commonalty, they are wholly employ'd either about Husbandry, Manufactures, or Trade. This leads me to speak of the Esteem set upon Agriculture, and those who apply themselves to it; of the Skill and Industry of the Mechanics; the incredible Trade carry'd on in the Heart of the Empire; the numerous Lakes and Rivers, which render the Provinces fertile and produce Plenty; the Barks and Vessels of Burden for transporting so many rich Commodities from one Province to another; of the antient Coins, and those current at present in the Empire.

Manufactures

Their principal Trade with Foreigners, especially the Europeans, consisting in Varnished Works, Porcelain and Silks; I shew how the Varnish and China Ware are made: and give the Translation of an antient Chinese Author, who teaches us the Method of managing and rearing the Silk-Worms, so as to encrease and improve the Breed. These Matters are render'd still more intelligible by the Plates, where something of each is represented after the Life.

Language

As the Sciences cultivated in China are the only Way to Honours and Employments, and consist chiefly in a thorough Knowledge of their Laws, History and Morality, they deserve a more than ordinary Attention. I introduce this Part, by informing the Reader what sort of Idea he ought to have of the Chinese Language, so widely different from all others both dead and living. In order to this, I remark what is the Genius of it, and how the Words, which are all Monosyllables, must be pronounced, annexing a short Sketch of the Grammar of that Tongue: after which I shew how the Chinese make their Ink, and different Sorts of Paper; with their Method of printing and binding Books.

Education

I proceed next to give an Account of the Studies peculiar to the Chinese Youth, the different Degrees thro' which they pass before they commence Doctor, and the Examinations they must undergo to obtain them. For the Reader's better Information I have inserted an Extract of a Chinese Book on that Subject: wherein is shewn, the Method to be observed in teaching Students; the Choice to be made of Masters; the Passages of History necessary to be learned in order to form the Manners; the Examination of those who aspire to different sorts of Degrees; a Specimen of the Discourses made in the Assembly of the Literati; lastly, the Plan of an Academy, or Society of Learned Men.

Literature

These are only, as it were, the Preliminaries naturally leading to the Chinese Literature, that is, to the Knowledge of those Books, so antient and highly esteemed among them, call'd King: by which Word they understand a sublime and solid Doctrine, grounded on sure Principles. Of these they reckon five, which they consider as Canonical Books of the first Order, and call U-king, or The five Books, by way of Excellence.

Canonical Books of the first Order

I have given the Substance of these 5 Books, viz. (1.) the I-king, a Work purely Symbolical. (2.) the Su-king, which contains the remarkable Events under the first Emperors and Legislators of the Nation; their Instructions about Government; with their Laws and Regulations touching Manners, whereof those antient Heroes were so many Patterns. From this I

Elogies

(1) We have omitted some Paragraphs that follow this, relating to the Authenticity of the Chinese History, in order to supply the said Advertisement, where the same Subject is handled more expressly.

have given some Extracts. (3.) the Shi-king, consisting of Odes or Poems, wherein the Elogies of illustrious Men are recited, and the Laws and Customs of the Empire recorded. Some of these Odes have been selected, and faithfully translated. (4.) the Chun-tsyu, which is inferior to the three former, yet is very much esteemed by the Learned: It contains the Annals of the Kingdom of Lu, the same at present with the Province of Shan-tong. (5.) the Li-ki, being a sort of Memorial of the Laws, Ceremonies and Duties of a Civil Life.

From these Books, which are of greatest Antiquity, I pass to the four Classical or Canonical Books of the second Rank, call'd Tse-shu: These properly are no more than Expositions and Aphorisms, grounded on those ancient Monuments; and were either written by Confucius, or compiled by his Disciples, out of the Maxims and Discourses of that celebrated Philosopher, whom the whole Nation look upon as their Master. First, I give an Abridgment of his Life, and after that an Extract of the most essential Matters, according to the Order of the Chapters or Heads contained in each of his Works; which are, (1.) the Ta-hyo, that is, the Great Science, or Science of Adults; (2.) the Chong-yong, or immutable Medium, which is that just Mean to be found between the two Extremes wherein Virtue consists; (3.) the Lan-yu, that is, moral and pithy Discourses; (4.) Meng-tse, or, the Book of the Philosopher Mençius, which gives the Idea of a perfect Government.

To these four Books I subjoin two others, which are very much esteem'd, and placed by the Chinese among their Classical Books: The first has the Title of Hyan-king, that is, concerning Filial Respect, and contains the Answers made by Confucius to his Disciple Tjeng; the second is named Syau-hyo, which signifies the Science or School of Children.

This is properly what is call'd the Chinese Science, which comprises the fundamental Principles of their Government, and maintains such good Order in the Empire: This, in effect, is the Science most proper for Man, seeing it has regard directly to his Conduct, and the Means of rendering him perfect according to his State and Condition.

Some, perhaps, may think, that the Government of China, which was grounded originally on such Principles, has been gradually weaken'd during a long Series of Years, and under so many different Monarchs: But the Chinese themselves inform us, that they have never deviated from those wise Maxims. This will appear from a cursory View of most of the Dynasties, as they stand in a Collection made by the Orders and Direction of the late Emperor Kang-hi, whose Reign was so long and glorious.

In this curious Collection we meet with the Discourses and Reflections made by those who were most eminent in the State on account of their Dignity, Experience and Knowledge. Part of these are the Edicts, Declarations and Ordinances of different Emperors, and their Instructions which they sent to the Kings, Tributary Princes and Magistrates; the rest are the Discourses and Remonstrances of the Prime Ministers, and other Persons most famed for Wisdom throughout the Realm, to the Emperor. The Whole of what they say turns principally upon good or bad Government, the Improvement of Agriculture, the Means of comforting the People, and supplying their Necessities, the Art and Difficulty of Reigning; on War, the Advancement of Learning, &c. At the End of most of these Pieces are brief Remarks of the Emperor Kang-hi, a Prince skilful in the Art of Reigning, written with a red Pencil, that is, with his own Hand.

The same Matters are handled in two other Books, of which I have given very short Abstracts: The First was compiled under the Dynasty of the Ming; the Second is intitled The illustrious Women; whereby in like manner it appears that, under different Reigns, the Chinese Ladies governed themselves and their Families according to those Maxims.

It appearing from these Evidences, that the fundamental Principles of the Government have been always maintained in China by a constant Observance of them, it is no wonder at all that a State of such vast Extent has subsisted for so many Ages, and still subsists in all its Splendor.

From this Detail of the Chinese Form of Government, I proceed to consider the Religion of these People; their Morality; the Knowledge they had of other Sciences; their Taste in History, Poetry, and the Drama; and lastly, their Skill in point of Medicine. These are the Matters contained in the third Volume.

With regard to the Religions approved of, or tolerated in China, I exhibit, according to the Order of Time, the Doctrines of the different Sects: Here I treat of (1.) the Worship of the ancient Chinese, drawn from their classical Books; but without staying to explain what they understand by * Tyen and † Shang-ti which is the Object of their Worship, I leave the Reader to his own Judgment; (2.) the Sect of Tau-tse, whose System I describe; (3.) the Sect of the Idol Fo, where I explain what those Idolaters call internal and external Doctrine; (4.) the Sect of certain modern Literati, who have made a sort of Philosophy of their own, by means whereof, adhering not so much to the Text of the ancient Books as the Glosses and Comments of some late Writers, they pretend to solve every Thing according to natural Causes: A Treatise I have inserted in form of Dialogue, wherein one of these modern Philosophers unfolds his System concerning the Origin and State of the World, will shew how much these Smatterers in Learning are mistaken.

The Establishment and Progress of the Christian Religion in this Empire being an Article too interesting to be omitted, I thought myself obliged to give the History of it; wherein, tho' I cou'd not avoid speaking occasionally of the Contests which arose latterly among the † Shang-ti, Sovereign Being, Supreme Emperor.

Missionaries

Missionaries, yet I handle them very slightly, acting herein the Part of an Historian, and relating simply, and in few Words, what has been said on both Sides.

Moral Philosophy.

Moral Philosophy has been all along the principal Study of the Chinese, and it is chiefly by their Abilities therein that they attain to the Honours and Dignities of the Empire; but as, in order to be thoroughly informed what their Notions and Maxims are with regard to the Regulation of Manners, it will be necessary to hear what some of their Sages have written thereon, I have given the Abridgement of two Books of Morality: the one pretty Modern, and much esteem'd in the Country; the other more antient, containing Reflections, Maxims and Examples in point of Behaviour.

The Authors of these two Treatises have done no more than explained the Principles dispersed thro' those antient and venerated Books above mention'd. Altho' that on the one Hand, I grant there are among them found Maxims, useful Reflections, and laudable Instances; yet on the other, I disapprove whatever is vicious or criminal in the Actions which they relate, as well as what is false or out of the way in their Remarks and Maxims. (M)

Mathematics.

The other Sciences have not been wholly neglected by the Chinese; but whether they have made any considerable Progress in them, may be judged from the Account I have given. The Reader will at least understand what the Missionary Jesuits have done to assist them in improving some of those Sciences, particularly Astronomy, wherein they were most versed; and in teaching them other Parts of Mathematics which they were ignorant of.

Poetry and History.

For the rest, it can't be deny'd but they have a Taste for Poetry, and especially History: whether we regard the History of their own Nation, which they write faithfully, and without Partiality: or the little Histories they compose not unlike our Romances; which are filled with variety of Incidents contrived to amuse the Fancy, but whose sole End is almost constantly to discourage Vice and recommend Virtue, like those I have inserted, which I believe will afford Pleasure in reading.

I cannot say so much in behalf of their Tragedies, which are formed on Notions very different from ours. However that which I have given, being carefully translated, will shew their Genius, and what they have been able to do this way on their own Bottom, since they never corresponded with any other polite and learned People.

Medicine.

It remains only to speak of the Medicine of the Chinese, and their Method of Practice. This I have done by explaining first the general System in use with their Physicians, and afterwards shewing what is singular among them, namely, their Skill in judging of Distempers by feeling the Pulse, and knowing the Use of their Simples for composing their Remedies. To illustrate this the more, I have inserted three of their Works: The first is a Treatise intitled the Secret of the Pulse, the Author whereof lived some Ages before Christ; The second is a brief Extract of a Chinese Herbal; and the third a Collection of Recipes, made use of by their Physicians in the Cure of divers Distempers.

To these I have added another Extract of a Work, whose Author is not at all favourable to the Physicians of his own Nation. He teaches his Countrymen how they may do without the Assistance of Doctors or their Drugs, by means of a Regimen which he prescribes, and had try'd with Success; he pretends to have found out an easy way of prolonging one's Days in perfect Health, and becoming our own Physician. This concludes the three Volumes which treat of China: wherein I think I have taken notice of every Thing that is necessary in furnishing a complete Account of that Empire.

Description of Chinese Tartary.

The Fourth and last Volume is wholly taken up with the Description of Chinese Tartary, Korea, and Tibet: Of which vast Countries hitherto we have known little more than the Names, as any one may be convinced, by only casting an Eye on the Maps of our ablest Geographers. But here he shall meet with a particular Account of them, partly from the Geographical and Historical Remarks which I have inserted relating to the different Countries; and partly from the Eight Journals of P. Gerbillon's Travels into Tartary, by Order of the Emperor, or in his Retinue. That Father sets down in a very particular Manner whatever occur'd to him from day to day concerning those vast Regions, which extend from China as far as the Russian Dominions. And I question whether the Readers cou'd have acquir'd a more thorough Knowledge, in case they had performed those long and painful Travels themselves.

Travels of P. Gerbillon.

Altho'

(M) The following Lines, which come in here, being foreign to the Subject, we have thought the Notes the most proper Place for them; if rather such Digressions ought not to have been consider'd as Excrescences, and thrown out.

We are far from intending to introduce the Chinese Doctors into Europe to give Lectures on Virtue. The Light of the Gospel shines out among us in full Lustre, and exposes clearly to our View what the whole Strength of human Wisdom has been able to give us but a Glimpse of.

Whatever the Sages of China, as well as the antient Philosophers, have taught worthy Commendation, it has been owing to the Light of Reason, in following which they have acquired some small Knowledge of Truth and its Principles. Whereas Christians have a perfect Knowledge thereof, inasmuch as they know J. C. who is the Truth itself, the sovereign Reason and subsisting Wisdom of God. All human Wisdom is but Folly, if it does not lead to J. C. his Doctrine is to be found no where but in the Scriptures, which have the Character of the Divinity stamp'd on them; and it is to this heavenly Doctrine, that every Man, who has not a Mind to be led away with vain Reasonings, ought invariably to adhere, as to the pure Fountains of Truth.

The Chinese Sages have indeed known some Truths, but neither they, nor the antient Philosophers, so much cry'd up, have known them all: in the Christian Law alone consummate Righteousness is to be found; nor can any one arrive at true Wisdom but by embracing its Rules, and putting them in Practice.

If the Chinese Philosophers have sometimes spoken concerning Humility, the very Name of which was unknown to the Pagan Sages, yet it appears that they understood nothing more thereby than that outward Respect which we ought to have for one another, consisting in a certain Composure of the Countenance, peculiar Postures of the Body, such as falling on the Knees, or prostrate on the Ground; certain Marks of Submission and Obedience paid to Parents, Magistrates, and all Persons in Authority; but that internal Humility, which teaches us to humble our Hearts before God, to acknowledge our Faults, not to be presumptuous, nor attribute any Thing to our own Strength; all this is only to be learned, as St. Augustine observes, from the Doctrine and Actions of J. C. when he tells us learn from me, for I am meek and humble of Heart: when being infinitely great, he made himself little to come to us; when having no Sin of his own to blot out or expiate, he submitted even to Death, and the Cross. He only was capable of teaching and making us love a Virtue so sublime and little known, which is however the Basis of all other Virtues.

Altho' by my Proposals I am not obliged to meddle with that Part of Tartary which belongs to the Russians, yet I have inserted both the Map and Relation of the new Discoveries made by Captain Beerings in his Travels from Tobolsk as far as (N) Kamchatka, where he was sent by the late Czar, to examine if there was a Passage thence into North America.

Of Captain Beerings thro' Siberia.

I conclude the whole with a Table of part of the Latitudes which were observed, and the Longitudes resulting from the Geometrical Operations, which the Missionaries made use of in order to draw the Maps inserted in this Work. These Longitudes are reckon'd from the Meridian of Pe-king, being unwilling to reduce them to that of Paris for fear of committing some Mistake. (O) The Latitudes were observed with excellent Instruments and great Care. They have not inserted in this Catalogue, all that were determin'd, because several of the Observations were made in Places, which either wanted a Name, or were too inconsiderable to be inserted in the Maps. (P)

Table of Latitude and Longitude.

As these Maps make a considerable and very interesting Part of our Design, it may doubtless be expected, that I should give an Account of the Motives which induced the Emperor Kang-hi to have them drawn, and of the Method taken by the Missionaries in executing the Work.

An Account of the Maps.

That great Monarch having perceived the Accuracy of the European Methods from a Map of the Country about Pe-king, which the Missionaries had made by his Order, resolv'd to have Maps of all the Provinces of his Empire, as well as of Tartary so far as is under his Subjection, drawn after the same Manner. In recommending this Work to the Missionaries, he spoke to them in the most obliging Terms, protesting publicly that he look'd on this great Undertaking as a Matter of vast Importance to the Empire, and that he wou'd spare no cost to have it completed.

The first Occasion of them.

In effect, a few Days after he commanded the great Tribunals to nominate Mandarins to superintend the Measurements, to the end that they might give the exact Names of the most remarkable Places they were to pass thro'; and cause the Magistrates of Towns to attend on the Bounds of their respective Districts with their People, and afford such other Assistance as shou'd be deem'd requisite. All this was performed with surprizing Punctuality; which is a manifest Proof of the admirable Order and Policy observ'd through that vast Empire.

The Work was begun the 4th of July 1708, according to our Way of reckoning, or according to the Chinese Kalendar, on the 16th of the 4th Month of the 47th Year of Kang-hi. The Peres Bouvet, Regis and Jartoux, undertook to determine the exact Situation of the famous Wall that separates China from Tartary; which affording a great Number of remarkable Points, by means of the Gates that give Entrance into the Empire, and so many fortify'd Towns with which it is as it were flank'd, might serve to regulate the Longitudes of the Northern Provinces whereof it is the boundary, and consequently of all those that are contiguous to them.

P. Bouvet falling sick after 2 Months application, P. P. Regis and Jartoux continued the Work, and did not return to Pe-king till the January 10, 1709.

The Map which they brought home with them, and was above 15 Foot long, exhibited not only all the windings of this Wall, which sometimes mounts to the tops of Mountains, and sometimes descends into the lowest Vallies, according to the Disposition of the Land, but also all the Streights of the Mountains, and Gates great and small, to the Number of about 300; all the Ports and Military Places, even those which, being built at a certain Distance from the Wall, seem to have been erected purely to support the others that are near them. In short, it exhibits the Positions of all the neighbouring Places, on both sides the Wall, as well as the Passage in and out of the most inconsiderable Rivers.

Map of it 15 Foot long.

The Emperor who was much pleas'd with this Map, no longer doubting the Success of the Undertaking, became more earnest than ever to have it executed in the best Manner.

The 8th of May 1709, the Peres Regis, Jartoux, and Fridelli a German, whom the Emperor had join'd with them, set out from Pe-king to begin the Geography of Eastern Tartary, which is properly the Country of the Manchews who at present have the Dominion in China.

Map of Eastern Tartary and Lyau-tong made by P. P. Regis Jartoux and Fridelli.

This was a difficult Task, because that Country having been as it were abandoned for many Years, it seem'd scarce possible to find the necessary Supplies of Men, Horses and Provisions, for a Work that was to continue for several Months. But as nothing escap'd the Emperor's foresight, he gave so good Orders to the Manchew Mandarins who govern the Cities, whereon those uninhabited Countries depend, and those Orders were so punctually executed, that the Work was never retarded. In advancing towards those Parts they determin'd the Situations of the principal Places of the Province of Lyau-tong or Yuan-tong, bounded on the South by the Great Wall, which having been survey'd the Year before serv'd as a Basis to the Work. In short the Map made this Year compriz'd the Province of Lyau-tong, the antient Country of the Manchews, the northern Bounds of Korea separated from it by the (2) Tumen River, the Territories of the Tartars call'd Tu-pi Ta-se, the Habitations of the Ke-cheng Ta-se, which extend to the Mouth of the greatest River in Tartary, named by the Tartars, Saghalian Ula, and by the Chinese

(N) Orig. Kamtschatka for Kamtschatka, which is the German Orthography.

(O) For our Parts we see no Inconveniency in reckoning Longitude from Paris more than Pe-king, but think it best to compute from both Places.

(P) The Author seems to be mistaken here. An Observation of the Latitude at any Place wou'd help to give Authority to that Part of the Map where it was situated, tho' the Name were unknown. An Observation wou'd even intitle a Village to a Place in a Map before a City which wanted that Advantage, and render it considerable in Geography, however abject it might be in itself.

(2) In the Orig. Tumen Oula, but as Oula or Ula signifies a River, I thought fit to omit it, to prevent the Tautology.

Chinese, He-long-kyang; in a word, all the Districts of the Mongol Princes, whom the Chinese call Tsau Ta-se, from the 45th Degree of Latitude to the 40th by which they returned.

This Work was very agreeable to the Emperor, as well as to the Manchews born at Pe-king, who there beheld their antient Country, and were able to learn more from it in a quarter of an Hour than by discoursing with ever so many Travellers.

Map of Pe-che-li, made by the same Fathers.

These three Fathers were scarce arrived at Pe-king when they had Orders to begin upon the Map of the Province of Pe-che-li, which is that of the Court. They set out the 10th of Dec. the same Year, and did not finish it till the 20th of June 1710. The Province is large, and contains a great number of Cities, whose Positions were not to be neglected, otherwise the mutual Distances wou'd have been greater or lesser than they ought, or the Bearings of the Towns already mark'd down wou'd have disagreed with the Observations.

This Map was the more acceptable, as the Province it described was well known. The Emperor took the Pains to examine it himself, and seeing the Places justly exhibited which he had often passed thro', and caused to be measured by the Manchews, (whose Business it is to survey the Roads when he goes into the Country) he signify'd to the Missionaries that he wou'd answer for the Accuracy of it; and that if the rest proved as good, their Performance wou'd satisfy him, and be out of the reach of Criticism.

Remainder Eastern Tar-tary by the same Jesuits.

The 22d of July 1710, the Emperor ordered the same Missionaries to go towards the Saghalian Ula; he had caused a Town to be built on the South side of that great River, call'd Saghalian Ula Hotun (R), where there are Manchews under a Lieutenant General (named in their Language Maireychain, to guard the Frontiers against the Russians; who descending the River from Nipchû, a City a little to the West, might in a few Days enter the Territories of the Empire.

To support this Lieutenant General, the Emperor has built two other Cities farther up in his Dominions towards the South. They are but a few Days Journey asunder, with Villages all along the Road, where are Relays of Post-Horses. The nearest to the Saghalian Ula Hotun, is Merghen, where is also a Lieutenant General with Troops; the other, named Tsitfekar, (S) is the Seat of the General Commander of all the Country.

Returning from Tsitfekar, which is in the Latitude of 47 Degrees 24 Minutes and 30 Seconds, they had an Opportunity of measuring several Degrees successively from North to South; for the Country consists wholly of Plains which extend beyond the reach of Sight, without either Houses, Trees, or any considerable Rivers. The usual Drink of the Mongols in those Parts, is Water drawn out of Wells, dug here and there, to which they remove their Tents and Flocks, according to the Season and the Plenty or Scarcity of Pasture.

This Map was finish'd the 14th of December, and tho' it was empty enough, yet the Emperor was pleas'd with it, as giving him a View of his new Settlements which he judg'd so necessary to the publick Tranquillity.

Map of Shantung by Regis
and Cordoso.

In the Year 1711 the Geographers, in order to expedite the Work, were divided into two Companies. The Peres Regis and Cordoso, a Portuguese newly landed in China, undertook the Map of the Province of Shan-tong, contiguous to that of Pe-che-li. The Peres Jartoux and Fridelli, accompanied by Pere Bonjour, an Austin Friar, (already known in Europe on account of his Learning) who arriv'd about 3 Months before in China, went beyond the Great Wall as far as Hami (T), the Capital City of a Country of the same Name, and measured almost all the Territories of the Tartars call'd Kalka Ta-se. They returned by the publick Road thro' the Provinces of Shen-si and Shan-si, entering China by the Gate of the Great Wall, which is named Hya-yu-quan, from the Fort that defends it, and is distant from Hami not above Ninety Leagues whereof Twenty go to a Degree: these Missionaries did not arrive at Pe-king before January 1712.

Maps of Shan-si and Shen-si
by De Tartre
and Cordoso.

The Emperor was extremely pleas'd with this Map, and that of Shan-tong made a little before, and having sent to know if more of their Society were not to be found in the Provinces, who were capable of engaging in the same Work, four others were propos'd and approved of. Pere Cordoso went to join Pere de Tartre, who remain'd in Shan-si, with Orders to make the Map of that Province and Shen-si adjoining to it: As soon as they had finish'd these 2 Maps, which were each 10 Feet square, they returned to Pe-king.

The Mandarin who presented these Maps to the Emperor, having inform'd his Majesty, that if he required any Thing to be explain'd, Pere de Tartre was in waiting to obey his Commands, (R) The Chinese H in Hotun, Hami, Hya-yu-quan, &c. is a strong Asperate sounding like a double Hb, or rather is a Sound partaking both of the K and H; hence we find the same Words written sometimes with K, sometimes with H. The best Way wou'd be to make use of both Letters together, or Kb, as Mr D'Anville has done in many Names; but 'tis often difficult to know when that Character is to be used, the H being sometimes confounded with the K in Words which we know ought to be written with a K, as we have observed in our Preface. Pere Soucier by Comparison of Words shews that Pere Gaubil expresses the Chinese H in foreign Names by G. But he mistakes in supposing that he expresses the same Letter by an O in Oloffe, [O-lo-se] Russe or Russian, supposing the O to be prefixed like the Particle He in Hebrew Words. But doubtless the Reason is because the Chinese take the Name from the Tartars, who call the Russians Urûs or Orûs, as well as the Turks, Arabs, and all the other oriental Nations.

See Pere Soucier, Observations Mathematiques &c. 4°. 1729 Vol. I. Page 168.

(S) In the French in this Place is written Tsitfekar. In the Table of Longitudes at the End of the 4th Volume Tchifkar, and in the Jesuits Maps Tsitfekar, which last Pronunciation I have followed. On this Occasion I must observe that Pere du Halde has observed no Uniformity, in expressing the Sound common among the Chinese and Tartars, and which is designated by the Portuguese and Spaniards, who also have it, by a ç or c with a Plica, call'd by them Cedilla. For we find it express'd no less than 4 different Ways, sometimes by ç as in çeslu, by a single ç in çesle, by ts as in tseng, and by te in the Name in Question; to which Pere du Halde, for what Reason I know not, has added a 5th Character, viz Tç, as in the same Word. So little Uniformity is observed on this Head, that we meet with the Cedilla written 3 different Ways in the same Word, viz Tçevang, Shévang, and Sevang; it partakes some what of our ç, and is founded like an s with a t before it, whistling or straining it between the Teeth: I have distinguish'd this Sort of Sound by ts, tho' perhaps a single s might do as well. It is difficult for those Nations who do not use this Sound to express it in their Characters. Hence Brand in his Account of Isbrand Ides Travels from Moscow to China, writes Sutegar; Isbrand Ides himself, Xixigar; and Mr Kyriellow in his late Map of the Russian Empire, Tschitubigar; which two last Words according to the English Orthography are Chibigar.

(T) Hami is the City, which in some of our Books and Maps is written Camal, in others Chamil or Khamil; so Hya-yu-quan is written Kia-yu-kan not only by Pere Gaubil, but often by Pere du Halde himself, for the Reason before assign'd in Note R.

mands, the Emperor sent for him in, to point out some Places he had himself observ'd in these Provinces: Which done, that Prince said several times I-tyen-pu-tso, He is right in every Thing.

There happened one Thing pretty remarkable in this Audience: The Emperor alledged that the Course of a River was wrong in another Map, which had relation to the Maps of Shan-si and Shen-si: Pere De Tartre, sensible of his Majesty's Mistake, maintained the Truth (with all due Respect,) in so clear a Manner, that the Monarch came into his Opinion; Tso lyau, says he, I am mistaken. A great Concession in an Emperor of China!

The Peres De Mailla and Henderer were ordered to assist Pere Regis in the Province of Honan, after which they all joined in making the Maps of Kyang-nan, Che-kyang, and Fo-kyen; those of the Province of Kyang-si, Quang-tong and Quang-si, fell to the Share of the Peres De Tartre and Cordoso; and those of Se-chwen and Tun-nan to P. Fridelli with P. Bonjour, who dyed in this last Province on the Frontiers of Ava and Pegu the 25th of December 1714.

The 24th of March following Pere Regis was sent into Tun-nan to finish the Map of it, Pere Fridelli having fallen sick there. By the time he had finished his Work that Missionary recovered, and both together set about the Maps of Quay-chew and Hu-quang.

After their return to Pe-king January 1. 1717, nothing remained to be done, but out of the particular Maps of the Provinces to make a general one; and that was far advanc'd by P. Jartoux, who was detain'd at Pe-king by his Indisposition, so that it was finished and presented to the Emperor in the year 1718. That the Reader may be more fully apprized in how particular and accurate a Manner this Work was conducted, I shall insert the Account sent by Pere Regis in the Name of the Missionaries concerned with him in the Execution of it.

I can assure you, says he, that we have omitted nothing requisite for rendering our Work perfect. We have ourselves visited all the Places, even those of least Consideration, throughout the Provinces; examined the Maps and Histories of each City preserved in their Tribunals; made Enquiries of the Mandarins and their Officers, as well as the Principal Inhabitants, whose Territories we pass'd thro'; in short, by measuring as we advanc'd, we still had Measures ready to serve the Triangles, form'd by such Points as were to be fix'd. For after mature Deliberation we thought it best to use the Method of Triangles, all others appearing to us not only too tedious, considering the vast Extent of the Countries of which the Emperor wanted the Map, but scarcely practicable on account of the Towns being so near one another; since it is certain that the least Error, occasioned by the Pendulum going wrong, or the Immersion of one of Jupiter's Satellites not being accurately observed, wou'd cause a considerable Error in the Longitude: For Instance, the Mistake of a Minute in Time wou'd produce an Error of 15 Minutes in Longitude, which are equivalent to four or five Leagues, according to the Difference of the Parallels: So that it might happen, that according to the Observation, two Towns wou'd be made contiguous, at the same time that there wou'd be really some Distance, tho' not much, between them.

Method observed in making the Maps.

Method of Triangles excellent.

This Inconveniency is not to be fear'd in the Method of Triangles: For how is it possible to err four Leagues in the Distance between two Places no farther asunder, when by a Measure that always follows us, and Semi-Circles accurately divided, we fix divers Points between the two Terms, which joined together make as it were a Chain of Triangles? On the other hand nothing is so difficult as to avoid a small Error in Time; the best Pendulums are put out of order by Travelling, and to prevent erring, even in a single Minute, the Observations must be repeated several Days; a Task which wou'd be extremely fatiguing.

The Observations of the Satellites require, not only more Time and Accuracy, but also Telescopes of the same Size, and, if I may so speak, the same Eyes in the Observer and his Correspondent; for, if the one sees them ever so little sooner than the other, some Error will inevitably happen, which must not be suffered in determining small Distances: And if Observations of a Satellite, made in the same Place, by the same Person, differ so in Time as to cause a small Variation in the Longitudes, and oblige us to take a middle Difference among them, (supposing the Difference to become insensible by the Greatness of the Distance) the Results will be still more uncertain when there are several Observers, who have neither the same Instruments nor Addrefs; so that the Difference, arising between the Observations, renders the Position of Places lying near one another doubtful, nor can it be fixt but by the Rules of Geometry; which shews the necessity of having recourse to the Method of Triangles at last.

This Method, when continued without Interruption, has one farther Advantage, as it gives not only the Longitude but also the Latitude of the Towns to be inserted; which, being afterwards examined by the Meridian Altitudes of the Sun or Polar Stars, serves to correct the preceding Operations. This Course we took as often as we were able, and commonly found no sensible Difference between the Observation of the Latitude and the Determination by Triangles. If sometimes we discovered Variations, we did not think ourselves thereby obliged to lay aside this Method, since we find as many in the Observations of the Polar Altitudes, made by the best Astronomers in the same Place. Altho' the Theory, whereon such Observations are grounded, is certain, nevertheless the Practice depends on so many little Circumstances, which must all be attended to in order to obtain perfect Accuracy, that the Operations cannot be always exact, but must vary something more or less. However these little Defects always appear, and may be often corrected in large Works, by connecting the Points fixt by Trigonometry with those whose Position is under Examination.

Another Method, which we judged ought to be employed for greater Precision, was to return to the same Point, already determined, by different Ways, from a considerable Distance, working according to Rules. For if by the last Essay you find the same Situation, the Exactness of the preceding Operations will be proved in some measure to a Demonstration. When

- Care for preventing Mistakes. ' in measuring we cou'd not return to the same Point, our Method was, as we pass'd near the great Towns already marked down, or other fit Places, to look out for the remarkable Towers, or Mountains that commanded them; and from time to time we measured, to see if the Distance resulting from the Operations (when corrected) agreed with the actual Measure.
- Observations of the Longitude for verifying the Work. ' All these Precautions, and many more, too tedious to enumerate, appeared to us necessary when executing a Work, in a Manner worthy the Trust reposed in us by a wise Prince, who judg'd it of the greatest Importance to his State. Moreover the Hopes of meriting his Protection, which was necessary to favour the Progress of Christianity in his Empire, supported us amidst those Dangers and Crosses that are unavoidable by those who have to do with such a Variety of Tempers, and are engag'd in so laborious an Undertaking: Nay, we were willing, for our own Satisfaction, to have repair'd again both to the Eastern and Western Frontiers, as well as to some Places within the Kingdom, situated at convenient Distances, there to examine the Longitudes by repeated Observations of Eclipses; but as the Work was finished, and the Emperor appeared satisfy'd with it, we did not think it proper to engage him in a new and not altogether necessary Affair.
- Not wholly neglected. ' We therefore contented ourselves with Observations of the Moon and Satellites of Jupiter made before our Time in several Cities by Members of our Society, tho' we rejected a few because they did not agree with our Measures, on account of some small Error as to Time in the Observation, which but too often happens to the most experienced. Not but that we ourselves observed some Eclipses of the Moon (X) and found no other Difference in our Observations than is usual in such Cases; where we had any doubt we chose the mean Difference.
- Work compared with those of other Geographers. ' Thus having first made use of the Method of Triangles for determining the Distances between the several Cities, and afterwards compared it with that of Eclipses observed in Places remote from Pe-king, we flatter ourselves that we have followed the surest Course, and even the only one practicable, in prosecuting the greatest Geographical Work that ever was performed according to the Rules of Art.
- More accurate than the Maps of Europe. ' Those who have published Maps of Europe, or any particular Kingdom thereof, have seldom taken the pains themselves to examine the Situation of Places on the Spot. They are content either with such Observations as they can pick up, made by Persons of very unequal Abilities; or with collecting the itinerary Distances, which are scarce ever alike in different Provinces; with procuring the Relations of Travellers, who commonly give the Distances from Report; and with ranging their Materials, partly according to some of those Observations, and partly by Conjecture.
- Defects of Ptolemy's Geography. ' Thus we need not wonder, if Ptolemy himself, the Restorer (Y) of Astronomy and Geography, has committed considerable Faults; not only in speaking of China, whose Capital he places in three Degrees of South Latitude, but with respect to Africa and Europe, both which the Alexandrians were so well acquainted with. Not that he neglected to consult the Astronomical Observations of those who preceded him; for he cites and follows them, so far as to maintain, (on the Authority of the celebrated Pytheas of Marseilles) what passed then for a Falsehood, viz. that in the Isle of Thulé, to which he sailed from the Pillars of Hercules, the Sun at the Summer Solstice rose a little after it set. Ptolemy had also the most esteem'd Itineraries, such as that attributed to the Emperor Antoninus, (in whose Reign he lived) supposed to be a Compend of the Distances measured by the Senate throughout the Roman Empire: Whereof the general Description, under the Name of The whole World, form'd from Agrippa's Memoirs, was by Augustus expos'd in a magnificent Portico at Rome: Nor is it to be doubted but Ptolemy was acquainted with the Descriptions Alexander caused to be made of his Conquests. However it is certain that those Materials were insufficient for making a Geography of the whole Earth, or even a considerable Part of either Europe or Asia, with any tolerable Accuracy. Besides, how among the antient Observations shall we distinguish the good from the bad? which yet is necessary in order to have exact Maps; for an Error in Astronomical Observations, which disappears on account of the great Distance of the Heavens, shews itself at first sight in a Map, by means of the Relation it has to the neighbouring Places known to every Traveller. How could Ptolemy know the just Proportion of Distances, measured several Ages before, under quite different Governments, among barbarous as well as civilized Nations, and in some sort determined by the simple Estimation of a Ship's Course, which, tho' made by able Men, (such as Polybius, Nearchus and Quieseritus; the first sent by Scipio to the Coasts of Africa and Spain, the others by Alexander to discover the Persian Gulf) must have their Defects too; and supposing they had not, there still remains a Difficulty, almost insuperable, which is, to determine precisely how much of the Roads is to be retrenched, in order to fix the exact Distance in a strait Line from one City to another. Altho' Ptolemy, for instance, had a much more particular Account of the Distances from the Caspian Sea to the Indian Ocean, as measured by Diogenes and Beto, at the Command of Alexander, than we find in the sixth Book of Pliny; yet if he never was on the Spot, to mark all the Windings and different Bearings of the Road, occasioned by the various Disposition of the Lands, it was not possible for him to determine, exactly, either the Position of Towns, or Passages of Rivers, much less the intire Course, merely by a few Points only; nor to ascertain the Dimensions of a Country, by means of one or two Geographical Lines, without having the intermediate Points, which are absolutely necessary, to connect the one with the other.
- Observations not distinguish'd in his Tables.
- Uncertainty of ancient Measures.
- Difficulty of allowing for winding of Roads.

But

(X) These Observations may be seen in Pere Soucier's Observat. Mathemat. p. 35, & seqq.
(Y) Ptolemy was the Improver, not the Restorer (as is commonly thought) of those Sciences, which were cultivated down to his Time; one of the Ancients themselves tells us, that in Matters of Geography, he followed those who went before him, inventing nothing of his own.

But as the Knowledge of these Things does not depend on the Force of Genius, and that which must be done to acquire it far surpasses the Strength of a single Person, Ptolemy had no other Way but to have recourse to the Memoirs of Travellers, to combine their Remarks with the Observations, and in a multitude of Instances make use of Conjectures. If notwithstanding these Disadvantages he has composed a useful Work, (the Description which he has given of the World being very ample, and the first that exhibited Places according to Latitude and Longitude), yet it is certain that the greater Part of it is grounded not on Observations made with a View to rectify Geography, but on the Relations of Travellers of very different Talents, and the Reports of some Historians, who have mentioned the Distances only occasionally, and always according to the vulgar Computation.

The Case is otherwise in the Work we offer the Publick; for vast as it is, we judged we ought not to confine ourselves either to the Maps of the Chinese Governors, or to the Distances measured almost throughout the whole Empire, and particularly in Tartary, with great Labour and Exactness, by the Manchews; nor yet to the printed Memoirs, whereof we had divers: But we resolved to begin the whole anew, employing those Materials no farther than as Guides, in the Roads we were to take, and in the Choice of Places for Observation; it being our Intention to reduce all that we did, to the same Measure, as well as Design.

The Measure, which we constantly made use of, had been established some Years before by the Emperor; I mean the Chinese Foot employ'd in the Buildings and Works of the Palace, which differs from the other Chinese Feet, and even from that formerly used in the Tribunal of the Mathematicks: By this Foot Pere Thomas found a Degree to be 200 Li's, or Chinese Furlongs, each consisting of 180 Chinese Fathoms of 10 Feet. As then the 20th Part of a Degree, according to the Experiment of the Academy [at Paris], contains 2853 Toises, each containing 6 Feet of the Châtelet, it is just equal to 1800 Chinese Toises, or 10 Li's; and consequently one Degree comprizing 20 of our great Leagues, call'd also Marine Leagues, contains 200 Li's, or Chinese Furlongs, computing by the Foot above mentioned.

This Proportion furnishes a very easy Method of accommodating a Scale of French Measures to that of our Chinese Maps, since allowing 10 Li's or Chinese Furlongs to one of our Great Leagues, the same Part of a Degree gives the same Number of Leagues in both, as well in the Meridians as Parallels; for tho' these latter diminish according to the ordinary Method, they nevertheless do not, according to the Measure of Great Circles, which are supposed equal by Geographers and Geometricians.

However I cannot forbear taking notice here, that this Doctrine is not altogether certain: Since in our Return from Tsitikar in 1719, when we measured six Degrees from North to South in those Plains, mentioned before, between the 47th and 41st Parallels of Latitude, the Peres Regis and Jartoux always found a Difference between the Degrees, whatever Care they took in measuring; altho' they often examined the Cords divided into Feet, and corrected the Quadrant with which they took the Altitudes, they found an Error somewhat less than thirty Seconds. 'Tis true, that Instrument was no more than two Feet Radius, and tho' divided exactly, gave the Altitude somewhat less, than perhaps one of Nine or Ten Feet would have done, such as Mr Picard made use of in finding the Content of a Degree: 'Tis true also, that the Cords, 10 of which made a Chinese Li, shrunk and extended according to the different Changes of the Air. But on the other hand considering that the Instruments being always the same, the Quantity of the Error ought to be the same; that the Weather was then dry, and without any considerable Variation; that they took care often to measure the Cord with a Toise or Fathom, made for the Purpose; and that in short such imperceptible Defects could not cause a Difference of 258 Chinese Feet, which they found in comparing the 47th Degree with the rest; hence those Missionaries were almost persuaded that there must be some Inequality in the Degrees themselves, altho' it had not been perceived by our Geometricians, but only conjectured by some who supposed the Earth to be like a Spheroid.

But as it would be unadvised to change the Figure of the Earth without unexceptionable Observations, continued under divers Parallels, we determined to make the Degrees equal in all the Great Circles, and all the Parts of the Meridians; conforming ourselves to the generally received Opinion of the Rotundity of the Earth, and referring the Solution of this new Problem to others, who have the Convenience and Leisure which we have not.

In the Course of our Operations, we did not forget to observe the Variations of the Magnetic Needle, both in Tartary and China: But seeing the Declination changes in the same Place in a certain Number of Years, we did not think fit to insert them in this Piece of Geography. It suffices that they served to determine exactly the Bearings of the Roads we took, and to convince us (by Observations made under the same Meridian, in two different Places, both neighbouring and remote) that Geography can draw no Advantage from thence, with regard to the Longitude, as hath been hoped by several eminent Authors; who, while they were taking pains to collect the Declinations mentioned by Mariners and Travellers, never consider'd that they might have vary'd in the Time they were forming their System of Magnetic Meridians, one of which ought to pass thro' Kanton; for we have found, on both sides of that Meridian, such a Difference in the Declinations, that there is no Possibility of reducing them to any of the Hypotheses hitherto published, much less to a constant Rule; seeing the Declinations, observed by us in those Parts, will in all likelihood be no more the same after a certain Period of Years, unless we suppose that the Law, by which the Variations of the Needle in the same Place are regulated, is neither made for Tartary nor China.

By the foregoing Account of this Performance, the Reader may judge of its Merit, as well as of the Application and Fatigue of the Missionaries in drawing such accurate Maps of all the Provinces Provinces of China and Chinese Tartary; a Work, which the Emperor longed to see executed. With regard to Tibet, if it has not been surveyed in the same Manner by the Jesuits, at least the Map has been delineated from divers very exact Journals, as well as itinerary Distances measured by Tartars, who understood the Mathematics and were sent expressly into Tibet by the Emperor, after having received the necessary Instructions from the Missionaries.

The Map of Korea was taken from one which is in the Palace of the King of that Country, and examined on the Frontiers by the Missionaries, employ'd to make the Map of Tartary, as we have explained in the Observations on the Map itself.

As all the Maps are drawn according to the same Scale and general Projection, they seem to be Parts of the same Map divided into so many Portions, and in effect, by joining them, one Map might be made out of the whole. They were presented to the King just as the Missionaries sent them me from China: His Majesty, who knew their Value, was pleased to accept of, and give them a Place in his private Library at Versailles.

To adjust these Maps, and prepare them for Engraving, I pitch'd on Mr D'Anville, Geographer in Ordinary to the King; who, having performed the Work with uncommon Elegance and Accuracy, afterwards drew general Maps from the Particulars, of Dimensions sufficient to shew with what Minuteness and Precision the latter were executed, (A) supposing they had not been inserted in the Work. In drawing his general Map of [Chinese] Tartary, he had recourse to the particular Memoirs of Pere Gerbillon; and to fill it up has added the whole Island of Japan, and some other Lands to the North of it, which are exhibited after a peculiar Manner (B). As to the Map of Tibet, he has regulated that Part bordering on Indostan by such Informations, with respect to this last Country, as may be rely'd on.

In short, the Map placed in the Front of this Work, besides the Countries comprized in the other general Maps, includes all the rest of Tartary as far as the Caspian Sea. With respect to these Parts, the Missionaries had gather'd several Materials, but were not in a Condition to complete them; however they communicated them in order to be made use of, by comparing and connecting them with those which might be collected from other Quarters: This Mr D'Anville has done with a great deal of Care, whereof a particular Account is given in the Geographical and Historical Observations on Tibet.

I shall say nothing concerning the Impression of this Work, nor the Care I have taken to embellish it. It is obvious enough that no Cost has been spared to give it all the Beauty and Ornament it was capable of, in respect to Paper, Print and Engraving. The Frontispieces, Cuts, and Compartments of the Maps, were done from the Draughts, and under the Direction of Mr Humblot, who has to perfection imitated the Taste of the Chinese Pictures; part of which were communicated to me by Mr du Velaer, who lived several Years at Kanton, as Director of the India Company; to whom I am farther obliged for some very curious Remarks concerning the Isle of Hay-nan, where he made some Stay.

Whatever Care I took to write the Chinese Words as they ought to be pronounced, it was difficult to avoid some Faults in the Course of the Impression: But they may be easily corrected by means of the Alphabetical Tables, at the End of the third and fourth Volumes, where they are written truly, and explained for the Reader's farther Help, who may not always remember the Meaning of the Words, which occur often, and are only explained the first time.

As strange as the Chinese Names may appear at first, it must not be imagined that they are as difficult to pronounce in our Tongue, as some have fancy'd: On the contrary, Experience shews, that they may be learned much sooner than the Names used by several Nations of Europe, and, for any thing that appears, may be pronounced with more Ease. What has contributed to make them difficult to us, is the Portuguese Orthography, which has been followed for a while by several of our French Missionaries, tho', to give the Chinese Pronunciation, they ought to be written after a quite different Manner. The Portuguese X is express'd by our Ch (C): For instance, the City which we call Chan-tong, as the Chinese pronounce it, they write Xan-tum; in like Sort the Letter m is the same with them as the Letters ng with us; for Pe-king, which is the Chinese Pronunciation [in our Characters] they write Pe-kim. The Reader therefore must remember that the Names ending with m, which sometimes occur in the Maps, ought to be pronounced as if they ended in ng; like sang, rang, and without laying any Stress on the g, which is added only to distinguish such Words from those that end with a Single n, and are to be pronounced, as if the n, was followed by a mute e; As in non in Latin, and propane in French.

(B) The Manner indeed is peculiar, but the Representation is very crude, and different from that given in Mr Kyrillow's late Map of the Russian Empire, where Tsibo and the other Lands to the North of Japan, seem to be exhibited pretty agreeable to the Truth. (C) The French Ch has the Sound of the English Sh, consequently what they write Chan-tong, must be written by us Shan-tong.

CHINA, CHINESE-TARTARY, &c.

A General View of the Empire of China.

THE Kingdom of China is call'd by the Western Mongols, Name of Katay (A); by the Man-chew Tartars (B) Nikan Kuran (C), and by the Chinese (D) Chong-qua: As to the Name in Use with Europeans, we cannot say, with any certainty, whence it is derived, unless it be from that of the first Royal Family, which carrying their victorious Arms westward, occasion'd the Country to be call'd Tsin, or Tay-tsin.

The Emperor Tsin Shi-wang's Fleet, which according to the Chinese History sail'd to Bengal, must needs have made known to the Indians the Name of Tsin, whose Power was felt at such a distance; and that Name passing from the Indies into Persia and Egypt, it is highly probable (E), came thence to us about the Year 230 before Christ.

However that be, China is, beyond all dispute, the largest and finest Kingdom known to us: For I would not take upon me to say there is no other polite Nation to be found in the Terra Australis, or some other unknown Countries. When, after passing from Europe, we enter on the nearest part of Africa, do not we seem to be got into another World? Even the Indians themselves, tho' not altogether so rude, can be accounted little better than Barbarians, when compared with our civiliz'd Nations. Who would have believ'd, that beyond these, should be found a People powerful, well-govern'd, skilful in Arts, and addicted to the Sciences?

(A) This is to be understood only of that Part of China which lies to the North of the Whang-bo, or yellow River, as will hereafter be explained.

(B) The true Name is Tatars, or Tattars, and not Tartars, which last is known only to the Nations on this side Poland.

(C) In the French Copy Couran instead of Couran, or rather Couran, which signifies a Kingdom.

(D) That is, the Kingdom of the middle; the Chinese, supposing their Country to be situate in the middle of the Earth.

(E) This Origin of the Name seems to us improbable; for tho' the Sin and Sina of the Greeks and Latins came from the Persians, yet as these latter, as well as the Turks, and other *Oriental*s, except the Arabs, say Chin, and not Sin, we cannot well suppose the Name to have been derived from that of the Emperor Tsin. The Arabs say Sin, or Tsin, and the Greeks, Sina, because they have not the Sound of our ch, in their Languages. The Portuguese brought the Name of China into Europe, from either Persia or India; where, according to Navarette, it was first introduced on account of the Silk, which is called Chin; the Italians write Cina, the *German*s, Tschina, but pronounce like the English; the French write Chine, but pronounce like the

When Marco Polo, the Venetian, publish'd his first Relation, in the 13th Century, it was look'd on by most People to be entirely fabulous, and was attacked as a Forgery by some Critics of those Times, on much the same Conjectures that several later Writers have advanced; though it is certain, that this Traveller, who followed the Western Tartars, when they conquer'd China, has asserted nothing but the Truth; this plainly appears from the Account he gives of certain Cities, which are still the same as he describes them, both as to Name and Condition. For who does not perceive, that his Cingiang, situate on the (*) Kyang is the City of Chin-kyang, near that great River? It is easy to account for the small Difference found between the Names, partly from the different Idioms of the Tartar Language, and partly from the Corruption of the Chinese Words by Strangers, who have not had sufficient Time to learn the true Pronunciation of a Language so different from all others.

China.

China extends more from North to South, and is narrower from East to West, than that part of Tartary, which falls within our Plan; but which way soever we measure it, its Extent, taken in a strait Line, is not less than 360 great Leagues of France, 20 whereof go to a Degree. 'Tis divided into 15 Provinces: Those of Shen-si, Shan-si, Pe-che-li, stretch themselves along the famous Wall, which on the North divides it from Tartary; Shan-tong, Kyang-nan, Che-kyang, and Po-kyen, lie along the Eastern Ocean; those of Quang-tong, Quang-si, Yun-nan, and Se-chuen, lie to the South and West; lastly, the Provinces Ho-nan, Hu-quang, Quy-chew and Kiang-si, take up the middle Part.

Government.

Every Province is divided into a certain Number of Jurisdictions, call'd by the Chinese, Fu, on which other Districts of much less Extent, named Cheu and Hyen depend, in the same manner as our Bailiwicks and inferior Courts of Justice do on the Presidencies: The Presidents of the Supreme Courts are call'd (†) Chi-fu, and of the others, Chi-cheu and Chi-hyen. Hence it is, that in every City having the appellation of Fu, there is always found a (‡) Mandarin named Chi-fu, and at least another who is a Chi-hyen: But in the great Cities of all, there are, besides the Chi-fu, two other inferior (¶) Mandarins, with the Title of Chi-hyen; because when the Territory is large, it is divided into two Districts, each of which has immediate recourse to its Chi-hyen.

Each of these two Tribunals has its particular Name, and depends immediately on that of the Chi-fu, which is much more numerous, more powerful, and very often differently named. For instance, besides the six great supreme Courts at Pe-king, there is also the Tribunal peculiar to that City, which is the Capital of the Empire, and named Shun-tyen; under this Tribunal there are two inferior Courts of the two Hyen, or Cities of the third Rank, whereof one is call'd Tay-bing, and the other Ven-ping.

When we speak of the Hyen, or City of the third Rank, the Reader must not imagine it to be a District of small Extent. There are Hyens of 60, 70, and even 80 Leagues in compass, which pay several Millions into the Emperor's Treasury.

What we have said with regard to the Cities of Tay-bing and Ven-ping, is to be understood also of several others, in proportion to the Extent of the Lands belonging to them; so that the Number of Cities of this Kingdom will appear to be greater than it is, if we reckon them according to the printed Catalogues to be had every where of the Fu and Hyen, without distinguishing between those comprized in the same District, and those which are not.

There are some Cities with Courts, named Wey, whose Mandarins, or Governors, have the Title of Wey-shew-pei, and are military Officers; their Jurisdiction seldom extends without the Walls of the Town. There are others appointed in the Villages, and all that commonly falls under their Cognizance relates to certain Persons, who are obliged by their Station and Birth to attend the Service of the Public. These Tribunals, distinguished also by their Names, are sometimes, like those of the Chi-fu and Chi-hyen, included within the same Districts; so that if one relies on the Lists of the Mandarins, or Histories of the Provinces, without enquiring farther, he may reckon three Cities where there is but one. For instance, the Town, which in the History of the Province of Quy-chew is called Li-ping-fu, is in reality the same which in the Province of Hu-quang is call'd U-kay-wei; for being situated on the Borders of two Provinces, it is the Seat of a Chi-fu, subject to the Province of Quy-chew, and of a Wey-shew-pei, who depends on the Province of Hu-quang, as a military Officer. This Instance may suffice to shew, that the Number of Cities in China, tho' very great, is yet much fewer than almost all the printed Relations make it; and that to write with certainty of the Geography of a large Country, it is not enough to travel over it barely for Information, but one must be furnish'd with the proper Helps.

All these Courts depend on the Viceroy of the Province, and the four other general Officers, who are his Assistants, according to the nature of the Business. If it relates to the Revenue and civil Matters, the Affair is brought before the Pu-ching-se, or Treasurer-General: If a criminal Cause, it is refer'd to the Lieutenant-Criminal Ngan-cha-se: If it concerns the Posts, or Salt-branch, &c. recourse is had to the Yen-tau: Lastly, If the Business relates to the Provisions which are collected by way of Tribute, they apply to the Lyang-tau. But besides the Affairs peculiar to their respective Tribunals, these may be apply'd to in Cases of a different Nature; because all the inferior Courts of the Provinces depend on them, and they are by their Stations

(*) Kyang signifies River.

(†) Chi signifies Governor, and Fu, a City of the first Rank.

(‡) Mandarin, or rather Mandarin, signifies Commander: Under which general Appellation the Portuguese (who first enter'd China) comprehend all the Degrees of Chinese Magistrates and Officers, military and civil. In the Language of the Country, they have the Title of Quân, or Quân-fu, that is Prepositus, set bifus, to denote their Authority; and that of Lou-ya, Lord or Master, on account of their Quality; either of these Terms would be more proper than that of Mandarin, which Custom has adopted, and which from the frequent Use of it in Relations of China, has been commonly mistaken for a Chinese Word.

Counsellors to the Viceroy ; in which Quality they are oblig'd several times, every Month, to attend his Tribunal on Matters of Importance relating to the Province.

As the Officers of the Army depend likewise in some Respects upon the Viceroy, and are oblig'd under severe Penalties to give him Notice of the least Commotion among the People within their Districts, it happens that almost all Affairs of the Government, whether civil, criminal, or military, are brought at length before his Tribunal ; and what adds to his Authority is, that all the Decisions of the supreme Courts of Pe-king are grounded commonly on the Informations that come from him, and that they almost always ratify the Sentence which he passes against the Mandarins, whom he hath a Right to displace, and, even previous thereto, of taking away their Seal. 'Tis true, the Treasurer-General, and Lieutenant-Criminal, may accuse the Viceroy of the Province ; but as they fear to come by the worst, and the Law construing such Dissensions as prejudicial to the Publick, they generally speaking agree but too well together, and wink at each other's Conduct. When they proceed so far as to an Impeachment, either the Affair must be very notorious, and cannot fail of being otherwise known at Court, or else must nearly affect their own Honour and Quiet.

Even the Persons sent by the Emperor to inspect into Affairs of the Provinces, for the Good of the People, are often corrupted by the Civilities and Presents of the great Mandarins ; so that on their Return, they make a favourable Report of their Benefactors, tho' at the same time they apprehend a Complaint against them unavoidable. Hence it requires a good deal of Penetration in a Prince to see through the Disguise, and discover the Truth. The late Emperor Kang-hi had this Quality in great Perfection, and many Instances of it might be produced, were this a Place to speak of his extraordinary Wisdom, which has been long admired in the most distant Countries. It may however be affirmed, that in spite of all his Vigilance and Penetration, there were many Disorders of this kind during his Reign : But his fourth Son, who succeeded him, has effectually remedy'd these, by allowing the Persons he deputed, for that purpose, large Sums to defray their Expences, and vigorously punishing both the Corrupter and Corrupted.

The publick Censors of the Empire, called Ko-tau-yu-se, who reside at Pe-king, and beside the general Inspection over the whole, have each a particular Province under their Care, are most dreaded of all the great Mandarins. As these Censors are very vigilant, and have their Spies, they can be ignorant of nothing that passes, and it is their Interest to have good Order preserv'd every where. If any Mandarin fails of his Duty, in a matter of Importance, wherein the Publick Peace is concern'd, and the Viceroy does not give immediate Notice thereof, the Censors are oblig'd to inform the supreme Courts, and the Emperor, by a publick Accusation, even tho' the Proof they have be not half sufficient to make out their Charge : And if they be the first by whom his Majesty is appriz'd of the Disorder, it redounds much to their Honour ; on the other hand, if they fail of so doing, they are liable not only to be reprimanded by him, but even to be remov'd from their Employments. Positive Proof is not required, if their Report has the Air of Truth, it is sufficient to ground an Information upon.

Nothing perhaps contributes more to preserve good Order and the ancient Customs, as also to prevent Commotions, which are ordinarily caused by the Love of Novelty, so predominant in the People, as the Fear of these public Censors. It is an addition to their Authority, that if they be ill treated either by the Intrigues of the *Grande*s whom they have accused, or by the Emperors, who sometimes are offended at the Advice their Office obliges them to give ; the whole Nation looks on them as Fathers of their Country, and (if we may so speak) Martyrs for the public Welfare : And indeed there is often found in these Censors an Intrepidity, which shews that this People are very far from wanting Greatness of Soul. For the rest, tho' the Viceroy of the Province has the four great Officers already mentioned under him, and the Mandarins of the inferior Jurisdictions have always one, and sometimes two Assistants ; yet Matters are not ordinarily determined by plurality of Voices : Each Magistrate, great or small, has his Tribunal, or Ya-men ; and so soon as he is fully apprized of the Cause by the Parties, after some few Proceedings, drawn up by proper Persons, he pronounces Sentence just as he thinks fit. Sometimes he orders him who has lost his Cause to be bastonaded, for having commenc'd it with no good Design, or defended it against all appearance of Equity.

The Bastonade, which is the ordinary Punishment of the common People, cannot be inflicted on a Mandarin however inconsiderable, unless he be first depriv'd of his Office ; yet this no way obstructs the Viceroy's Courts of Justice, since he has Power to cashier him on certain Occasions, without waiting for the Answer of the supreme Courts, being only obliged to give them his Reasons, which usually they approve, and often even order the Offender to be prosecuted ; but he has liberty to repair to Pe-king, to justify his Conduct, by presenting his Petition to one of the sovereign Courts, or even carrying his Complaint before the Emperor : And this restrains the Viceroy from acting precipitately, and abusing his Authority.

The greatest Punishment next to the Bastonade, is a sort of Collar made of two Pieces of Wood, of different Sizes, according to the Nature of the Crime, and hollowed in the middle, to fit the Neck of the Offender, which is put between the two, and then the Boards being join'd close together, they are seal'd with the Seal of the Court, fix'd to a slip of Paper, wherein is written the Time that the Punishment is to continue, and the Crime punished.

These two Punishments, and Imprisoning, are all that the Chinese Laws permit the Mandarins of the Provinces to inflict on Criminals ; they may indeed condemn to Banishment, yet their Sentence must be examined by the Supreme Courts ; but they must never go so far as to take away Life, Life, except the Nature of the Crime require speedy Justice, as in Cases of Sedition, or Revolt; then the Emperor gives Authority to the Tjong-tú, and even to the Viceroy, to punish the Offenders with immediate Death.

'Tis true, the Law which requires all Causes relating to capital Offences to be transmitted to Court, would in Europe appear very inconvenient: But in China great Inconveniences would be the consequence of giving the Mandarins Power over the Lives of the People; wherefore the Legislators, who know the disposition of the Nation, have thought it necessary to take that Power out of their Hands.

Punishments of Criminals.

The three capital Punishments are Strangling, Beheading, and cutting in Pieces: This last is inflicted on none but Rebels, those who murder their Masters, and merciless Robbers.

The first is the most common Punishment which the Court adjudges those to, who are worthy of Death. Beheading is the next: The condemn'd Person is not exposed on a Scaffold on the Day of Execution; but being made to kneel in some public Place, with his Hands tied behind, one Executioner holds him so fast that he cannot move, while another coming behind takes off his Head at one Stroke, and at the same time lays him on his Back with such Dexterity, that not one Drop of Blood falls on his Cloaths, which on that Occasion are often better than ordinary: His Relations and Friends, who are ashamed to own him in those unhappy Circumstances, commonly send him new Cloaths, and cause Provisions and Drink to be furnish'd him by the way.

The Executioner is commonly a Soldier, nor is the Office scandalous, but the contrary, if they perform it well. At Pe-king, he accompanies the Criminal, girt with an Apron of yellow Silk, which is the Imperial Colour; and his Cutlas is wrap'd in Silk of the same kind, to shew that he is vested with the Emperor's Authority, and to command the greater Respect from the People.

Indeed in Chinese Authors, mention is made of several other kinds of Punishments, some of them also pretty extraordinary; but it must be observed, at the same time, that they have never been inflicted by any but barbarous Princes, who were look'd on as Tyrants by the whole Nation; Justice, say they, is necessary, but not Cruelty.

But though the Power of the Magistrate be restrain'd by the Laws in criminal Matters, it is in a manner absolute in civil Cases: Since all Affairs, which merely regard private Property, are determin'd by the great Officers of the Provinces, without Appeal to the sovereign Courts of Pe-king, except in Matters of greatest Consequence.

Raising of Taxes.

That which chiefly employs the inferior Mandarins, whether they be the Chi-chew, Chi-byen, or Wey-shew-pei, is gathering of the Taxes, and it requires their personal Attendance. Altho' the Lands in every Province are measured, and what every (c) Arpent is to pay be adjusted, according to the Goodness of the Soil; yet whether through Poverty, or Avarice, the People are usually unwilling to part with it, till the inferior Officers come and harass them for it, being sometimes constrain'd to make use of Blows. When these Tax-gatherers are reproached for their Severity in pressing the Payment, they excuse themselves by saying, That when they are sent into the Villages to levy the Tax, should they not bring it home with them, their Masters would suspect either that they had neglected their Duty, or had taken Bribes; which bare Suspicion, without farther Examination, would be sufficient to procure them the Bastonade. The Mandarins on the other hand pretend to justify their Conduct, by the Necessity they are under of acting in that manner; alledging, that having failed of collecting the Dues in the appointed Time, they have been obliged more than once to pay the Emperor out of their own Pockets, for fear of losing their Employments; which is a Fact known to all those who are acquainted with Affairs; besides, several Provinces are greatly in Arrear to the Royal Treasury, which probably will never be paid. But to remedy this Inconvenience, the present (n) Emperor has ordered that, for the future, the Proprietors of the Lands, and not the Occupiers, shall pay the Taxes.

Besides the great Mandarins of every Province, as before mentioned, there is one still more considerable, call'd Tjong-tú. His Jurisdiction extends over two Provinces; or, should we compare the Viceroys to our Intendants, [in France] (tho' there is a great Difference in respect to their Authority, and the Extent of their Jurisdiction) it comprehends at least two Generalities: For in the larger Provinces, such as Hú-quang, Shen-si, &c. the Tjong-tú has the Care only of one Province; but then it is divided into two Governments, and each Government has its proper Viceroy: How far the Power of this superior Governor extends over the other Viceroys, is determined both by the Laws and Custom: For he is their Superior only in certain Matters; but he has always a Right of deciding Causes, in case of Appeals from the Tribunals of either of the Provincial Governors.

Having given this general Account of the Magistrates and their Jurisdictions, it will be proper to exhibit the Names of the Provinces, and the Cities belonging to each: This is the more necessary, as we find many Errors in the printed Relations; probably either because the Authors have followed the old Catalogues, without considering the Difference between the Times they were made in, and the present; or else have relied on the Report of their Chinese Friends, who, altho' they are Batchelors and Doctors, are often as little acquainted with their Country, as old Lawyers in Europe, who never take any pains to know more of the Land than lies within their own District.

(c) Arpent is a Measure of Land, containing 100 Perches Square, of 18 Foot each. (n) Yong Ching, who died in the Year 1736.

There are in China 173 Tribunals or Jurisdictions, immediately subject to the General Officers and Governors of each Province, named in Chinese, Fu; 1468 inferior Tribunals, or subordinate Jurisdictions, depending immediately on the Chi-fu, whereas 1173 have the Title of Hien, and 235 that of Che-w; these latter however differ somewhat from each other. The greater part have no Authority over the Hien; but some have a Jurisdiction over one, two, and sometimes four Hien, almost equal to that of the Chi-fu. There are likewise several of them which have no dependance on the Chi-fu, but depend immediately on the Viceroy; we shall here give a List of them, which exhibits, at one View, the several Sub-divisions of each Province. By this List, one would be apt to think those the best and largest Provinces, which had most of these Cities [or Mandarinats] in them. But it is not so; for, in some Countries, the Necessity of keeping certain stubborn, and but half civiliz'd People in subjection, obliges the Emperors to encrease the Number of the considerable Mandarins; and thence it is, that the most barren Provinces, such as Quye-chew, have more of them, in proportion, than the most fruitful.

'Tis true, that, generally speaking, the Land in all the Provinces, and even in Quye-chew, is fertile enough, and sometimes brings a double Crop; but 'tis entirely owing to the indefatigable Labour of the Husbandman that those Countries, where the Grounds are low and boggy, are capable of bearing Corn. Add to this, that several Provinces being full of Mountains, which afford but a small quantity of Land fit for Tillage, it happens sometimes, that the whole Produce of the Empire is scarce sufficient for the Sustainance of the prodigious Number of Inhabitants.

Besides the Provinces of Yun-nan, Quye-chew, Se-chew, and Pe-kyen, which are too mountainous to be cultivated sufficiently; that of Cbe-kyang, whose Eastern Part is very fruitful, has hideous Mountains in the Western. The Land of Quang-tong and Quang-si, so fine and fertile along the Sea-Coast, becomes frightful and almost barren in divers Places, the farther it lies from thence. In the Province of Kyang-nan, the large District of Wbey-chew-fü is entirely over-run with very high, and almost uninhabitable Mountains; they abound still more in the Provinces of Sben-si, and Sban-si; all whose Plains, put together, don't amount to a quarter Part of the whole.

When coming from the Province of Quang-tong, you have sail'd between the steep Mountains, which run along its River, and, having made one Stage of the Mey-lin, afterwards come to the River of the Province of Kyang-si, then you begin to discover the most beautiful Country of all Ghina; one Part of it lies upon the great River, adorned with the fine Cities of Ngan-king-fü, Kyang-ning-fü, or Nan-king, and Cbin-kyang-fü; another Part runs along the great Canal, Tu-lyang-bo, beset with the most rich and populous Cities of the Province of Kyang-nan; as Wbay-ngan-fü, Yang-cbew-fü, Chang-cbew-fü, Su-cbew-fü; and a third Part borders on the Sea-Coasts of the Province of Cbe-kyang, where are the Lands of Hang-cbew-fü, the Metropolis, Hu-cbew-fü, and Kya-bing-fü, which alone furnish more Silk than all the other Provinces of China.

It must be confessed, nothing appears more charming than these Plains, which are so level, that they seem to have been laid out by Rule; they are overspread with Cities and large Villages, and cut into an infinite Number of Canals, which have communication with each other, and are navigated without the least Danger: They are covered with an incredible Quantity of magnificent Barks, and the Water of every Canal is clear, and excellent to drink. These Plains are cultivated with an Industry which no People but the Chinese are capable of: They are withal so fertile, that in several Places they yield Rice twice a Year, and frequently Wheat and smaller Grain between the two Crops.

But, whoever judges of China in general by this Country, cannot form an exact Idea of it. The Knowledge of a certain Number of very large Cities is not sufficient to give a distinct Notion of the whole; and had it not been for the Opportunity which the Missionaries had of travelling over the Empire, when they made the Map of it, we should still have been ignorant, that in most of the great Governments, there are Countries which for more than 20 Leagues together are very thinly peopled, almost uncultivated, and often so wild, that they are uninhabitable.

As

As these Countries are remote from the great Roads ordinarily taken by Travellers, they may easily have escaped the Knowledge of former Missionaries, and Authors of printed Relations. The Reason why the Provinces of Shen-si and Se-chen are much commended by some of them, is, because they had seen the District of Si-ngan-fu, which is divided into 37 Cities, most of them rich and populous. To a like Cause are to be attributed the Praises they bestow on the Lands of Cbing-tu-fu, which are cut by artificial Canals, in imitation of those of the Provinces of Kyang-nan, and Che-kyang; they never imagin'd, without doubt, that the Parts which they had travell'd Opportunity of seeing, differed so much, as in effect they do, from those they had travell'd thro'. The Provinces of Ho-nan and Hu-quang are generally commended by those Writers, and not undeservedly; for next to that of Kyang-nan, they are the most populous and fertile. Not but great Part of the Western Side of Ho-nan is desert and uncultivated, and there are larger Deserts still in Hu-quang: But it must be attributed to the quantity of fertile Lands contained in these Provinces, that they commonly produce plenty enough of Rice and other Grain to furnish the neighbouring Provinces, and especially that of the Court: For tho' the Province of Pe-che-li is one vast continued Plain, bounded on the Northwest by Mountains, and on the East by the Ocean, the Soil is always so dry and destitute of Rivulets, that notwithstanding it abounds in Wheat and small Grain, it produces very little Rice, without which the Chinese could hardly make a shift to live. Hence it is, that this Province, and especially Pe-king, which is the Resort of the whole Empire, could scarcely subsist without Supplies of Provisions brought from the other Provinces.

Generally speaking, the whole Country to the North of Whang-bo, [or Yellow River] produces greater Plenty of Rice than Pe-che-li; their Crop consisting in Wheat, small Grain and Pulse. Nevertheless, if the Chinese were as careful as we to cultivate Fruit-Trees, they would have almost as many sorts as there are in Europe. Walnuts, Chestnuts, Plums, Pears, Apples, Peaches, Apricots, and Cherry-Trees thrive almost every where: Vines, Pigs, and Pomegranates multiply exceedingly in some Parts of those Northern Provinces; the only difference is, that they have not so great variety of each Kind; thus they have but 3 or 4 sorts of Apples, 7 or 8 of Pears, as many of Peaches, and no good Cherries at all.

This Defect is sufficiently compensated by other excellent Fruits not known in Europe; particularly one called, by the Chinese, Tse-tse, but by the Portuguese of Macau, Figs; because when it is dry'd it becomes mealy and sweet, like a Fig; the Trees which bear them, when grafted, look very pretty; there is great plenty of them, especially in the Province of Ho-nan; they are as tall, and spreading, as our middling Walnut-Trees; the Leaves are large, and of a beautiful Green, which changes in the Autumn to an agreeable Red: The Fruit also is about the bigness of our Apple, and, as it ripens, grows of a bright Yellow.

Tho' they are of different Kinds, the Fruit of some having a more thin, transparent, and ruddy Rind, while that of others, to give them a finer Flavour, must be put upon Straw to ripen, yet they are all very agreeable to the Sight, and good to eat: They are found also in the Provinces on this side of the Whang-bo; and it is no small Advantage that this kind of Tree will grow in such different Soils.

In these Southern Provinces there grow other Fruits, which are still in greater Esteem with the Chinese: For besides Oranges of several sorts, Limons, and Citrons, which were many Years ago brought into Europe; there are two sorts of Fruit found in the Provinces of Fo-kyen, Quang-fong, and Quang-shi, to which we are strangers. What they call Li-chi, (if it be of a good sort, for there are several) is about the size of a Date: The Stone is equally long and hard, it is cover'd with a soft Pulp, full of Moisture and of an excellent Flavour, which it partly loses when it becomes black and wrinkled, like our ordinary Prunes; the Rind or Skin outwardly resembles Shagreen, but it is smooth within, and of a Figure nearly Oval.

The other sort, which turns to great account in China, is call'd Long-yen, that is, the Dragon's Eye: Its Shape is round, the Rind yellowish, the Pulp white, watery, and often sourish. They pretend, that tho' this is not so pleasant as the Li-chi, it is more wholesome, and never does one hurt: However that be, both these sorts of Fruit are excellent. But the Fruits called in the Indies, Pamplimus, and in China Yew-tse, as well as those named Tsin-lan, or Quang-lan, have nothing in the Taste to recommend them.

The first are ordinarily bigger than our Citrons; the Fruit is sometimes reddish, sometimes white, and of a Taste betwixt sweet and sour. The Tree is more prickly than the Citron Tree.

The second sort, in Figure and Colour, very nearly resembles our large Olives: It is indeed one of the ten Kinds spoken of in the Books, which treat of Olives; and what they say of its Nature, Colour, and the Soil where it grows, suits them very well. In all probability, if they were prepared in the same manner as in Europe, they would have the same Taste. The Tree is large, and the Leaves resemble those of the Olive. When they have a mind to gather the Olives before they are thoroughly ripe, which is their Time of eating them, instead of beating them down with long Poles, which shatters the Branches, and hurts the Tree, they make a Hole in the Body of the Tree, and putting in some Salt, they stop it up, and in a few Days after the Fruit drops of itself.

We must not forget to speak of two other Trees, which besides their Singularity, are useful at Meals. One of them produces a kind of Pepper call'd Wha-Tsyau. 'Tis the Husk of a Grain as big as a Pea; the Kernel of which is too hot and biting to be made use of. The Colour Colour is grey, mix'd with a few Streaks of red. The Plant which produces it, in some Places, grows like a thick Bush, in others it resembles a pretty tall Tree; it is neither so pungent, nor agreeable to the Taste as Pepper, and is seldom used for seasoning Victuals, except by the meaner People. The other Tree yields Peas; for their Figure, Colour, Pod, and Taste, tho' somewhat rank, shew that they are of the kind of ordinary Peas. The Tree is common enough in several Provinces, it is very tall, extends its Branches very wide, and for Thickness scarce yields to any other.

But among the Trees that deserve the Attention of the Public, and are most likely to excite the Envy of Europeans, there are none to be prefer'd to the four I am going to speak of.

The first is the Varnish-Tree, called Tsi-shu, 'tis neither tall, bushy, nor spreading: Its Bark is whitish, its Leaf nearly resembles that of the wild Cherry-Tree; and the Gum, which it distils drop by drop, the Tears of the Turpentine-Tree. It yields a much greater quantity of Liquor if an Incision be made in it; but then it perishes so much the sooner.

'Tis commonly reported, that this Liquor, drawn off cold, has certain venomous Qualities, and that there is no way of preventing its mischievous Effects, in pouring it from one Vessel to another, or stirring it, but by avoiding to suck in the Effluvia with the Breath. The same Caution is to be observed in boiling it. However that be, 'tis certain this Varnish [or Japan] is not less esteem'd on that account, and is continually used by an infinite number of Workmen. It takes all Colours alike; and, if well made, loses nothing of its Lustre and Clearness, either by change of Air, or the age of the Wood to which it is apply'd. But to do it well requires Time and Care; for one or two layings on is not sufficient; nor must a new lay of Varnish be applied till the former, which ought to be very smooth and thin, be dry'd, but not so as to be hard. Care must be taken to see whether such Lay be stiffer, or of a deeper Colour; one must try to bring it by degrees to a certain Temper, which only can render the Work firm, smooth, and clear. This Art is to be attained only by Experience. As the varnished Works must sometimes be set in moist Places, sometimes steep'd in Water, and, in short, turn'd and placed in various Positions, they are seldom very large, like the Pillars fix'd on Stone-Bases, wherewith the Great Hall of the Empire, described hereafter, the Emperor's Apartment, and other Chinese Buildings are supported: Which Pillars are not done over with true Varnish, but another Liquor call'd Tong-yew.

The second Tree is the Tong-shu, whence a Liquor is drawn not much differing from Varnish. At a small distance it appears like the Walnut-Tree: And such the Tartar Mandarin, who came from Pe-king with the Missionaries, took it for, so great is the Resemblance as to the Figure, colour of Bark, the size and fashion of the Leaves, the shape and make of the Nuts. These Nuts are full of a thickish Oil, mixt with an oily Pulp, which they press, otherwise they would lose the greater part of the Liquor.

There goes a Report, that some Servants, after dressing their Supper in a Kettle, wherein this sort of Oil had been boil'd a few Days before, found themselves much disorder'd: Which shews, that it partakes of the bad Quality of the Varnish. To make it fit for use, they boil it with Litharge, and may mix it with any Colour at pleasure. It is often laid without any mixture in Wood, which it preserves against the bad Effects of Rain; as also on the Squares which form the Floors of Chambers: This makes them shine; and provided Care be taken to wash them from time to time, they retain their Lustre. The Pavements of the Apartments, belonging to the Emperor and the Grandees, are made in this manner.

But if they would make a finished piece of Work, for instance, wou'd adorn a Hall, Chamber, or Closet, they first cover the Pillars and Wainscot with a Paste made of Flax, Lime, or such like Materials; when this is dry'd to a certain degree, they with Brushes lay on the Oil, (mix'd with the Colour they pitch on, and boil'd as usual) according to their Design. Sometimes they gild the Moldings, the Carvings, and every thing that is in Relief: But, setting aside the Gilding, these Works scarce yield in Beauty and Lustre to those wherein they employ the Varnish, call'd T-si.

As this Oil is cheap, and the Varnish pretty dear, the Merchants usually mix a great quantity of the Tong-yew with the latter, under pretence, that a little of it is necessary to bring it to a Temper, and make it spread more easily. 'Tis with this Tong-yew that they make Cloth to keep out Rain, like the Oil-Cloth in Europe; but the Cloaths made of it can be worn only in the Northern Parts. In short, the Tong-yew is one of the most useful Trees to be found in China, and we have all the reason in the World to wish we had it in Europe.

The third Tree is that which produces the Tallow. It is as tall as a large Cherry-Tree; the Fruit is contain'd in a Rind called Ten-kyu, which, when ripe, opens in the middle like a Chest-nut; it consists of white Kernels of the bigness of an ordinary Hazle-nut, whose Pulp has the Properties of Tallow; accordingly they make Candles of it when it is melted, often mixing with it a little common Oil, and dipping the Candles in the Wax produc'd by the Tree I am going to speak of: This forms a sort of Crust about the Tallow, which hinders it from running. I shall speak more of it hereafter.

The fourth called Pe-la-shu, that is, the white Wax-Tree, is the most extraordinary of all. 'Tis not so tall as the Tallow-Tree, and differs from it also in the colour of the Bark, which is white; and in the figure of the Leaves, which are longer than broad. A kind of little Worms fasten on these Leaves, wherewith being cover'd, in a short time they form Combs of Wax, much smaller than the Honey-Combs. This Wax is very hard and shining, and is considerably considerably dearer than Bees-Wax. When these Worms are accusom'd to the Trees of any District, they never quit them but on particular Occasions; and once they remove from a Place, they never return, so that others must be procured in their stead, there being Merchants who deal in them.

The Bambú. To the useful Trees may be added the Cane, which the Chinese call Chú-tse, and we Europeans Bambú. It grows as high as most Trees; and tho' it is hollow throughout, except in the knotty Parts, yet 'tis exceeding hard, is capable of sustaining great Weights, and, in some Places, large Houses of Wood. It may be divided into small Splinters or Strings, of which they make Mats, Boxes, and other curious Works. When it is beaten to Pieces, then left to rot, and boiled in Water till it is reduc'd to a kind of Paste, it serves to make Paper of different sorts, both fine and coarse, in which they trade. The Bambú is also made use of for Pipes to convey Water, and several other Occasions too tedious to mention. In short, there are so many sorts of them, in the several Provinces, differing as to size, colour, and other qualities, that it would be tiresome to describe them all. Most kinds of Wood, used by the Carpenters and Joiners in Europe, are to be found in China. In the Northern Provinces the Fir-Tree is employ'd in Building; and in the Southern Part, beyond the River, they ordinarily make use of the Shá-mú.

The Nan-mú much esteemed in China. But that of greatest Esteem among them is called Nan-mú. The Pillars of the Apartments, and ancient Halls, of the Imperial Palace, are all made of it, as well as the Windows, Doors and Beams. The Relations of Travellers speak of it as a Chinese Cedar; possibly, because the Natives look upon it as a Wood that never decays, and for that Reason to be prefer'd to all others. When a Person has a Mind, say they, to build a House, that may last forever, he must use the Nan-mú. However the Leaves of the Nan-mú, at least such as the Missionaries have seen, are not at all like those of the Cedar, as described by Authors who have seen the Cedars of Mount Libanus. This Tree is one of the tallest sort, and very strait; its Branches shoot directly upwards; they begin only at a certain height, and terminate a-top in form of a Nosegay.

The Tse-tan, or Rose-
Wood. The Nan-mú, notwithstanding 'tis so much esteemed by the Chinese, comes far short in Beauty of the Wood named Tse-tan, which at Court is called Rose-Wood. It is of a reddish Black, streaked, and full of very fine Veins, which one would think were painted: It is besides fit for the finest sort of Joinery-Work. The Furniture made of this Wood is much esteemed all over the Empire, and in the Northern Provinces selling at a greater Price than that which is varnished.

The Tse-li-mú, or Iron-
Wood. With regard to Strength and Firmness, there is, perhaps, no Wood comparable to that called by the Portuguese (the better to accommodate the Expression to the Chinese Tse-li-mú) Pão de ferro, that is, Iron-Wood. This Tree is as tall as our large Oak, but differs from it in the thickness of the Trunk, the shape of the Leaves, the colour of the Wood, which is darker, and still more in the Weight. The Anchors of their Ships of War are made of this Wood, and the Emperor's Officers, who accompany'd the Missionaries in their Passage to the Island of Formosa, or Tay-wan, pretended they were preferable to the Iron-Anchors belonging to the Chinese Merchantmen; but in this they must be mistaken: For the Flocks can neither be sufficiently pointed, nor strong enough for taking sure hold; and, by making the Shanks twice as long as those of Iron-Anchors, they must be proportionably weak, be they ever so large.

Tea-Shrub, its different
Sorts. If from Trees we pass to Shrubs, those which bear the Tea ought to be placed in the first Rank, because they are of the greatest use and benefit in China. The Name of Tba, [or Tea] comes to us from the corrupt Pronunciation at Tswoon-chew, and Chang-chew-fú, in the Province of Fo-kyen; in all other Parts of the Empire they use the Word Cha, as do the Portuguese in their Relations. But this Word comprizes many kinds of Tea, consider'd according to the different Names given to it in different Provinces. However, it may be distinguished, by its Qualities, into four Sorts, viz. Song-lo-cha, Vú-i-cha, Pú-eul-cha, and Lo-ngan-cha.

The first Sort is so call'd from a Mountain in the Province of Kyang-nan and District of Wbey-chew-fú, in the Latitude of 29 d. 58 m. 30 f. This Mountain bears the Name of Song-lo-shan; it is neither high nor of great Extent, but cover'd over with these Shrubs, which are cultivated on its Sides, in the same manner as at the Foot of the neighbouring Mountains.

Song-lo, which we call Green-Tea, is planted much in the same manner as Vines, and its Growth is prevented, otherwise it wou'd run up to 6 or 7 Foot in height: It must also be planted anew every 4 or 5 Years, or else the Leaves will become thick, hard and rough. The Flower is white, and shap'd like a Rose of 5 Leaves. In Autumn, when the Flower decays, there appears a Berry in the form of a well-fill'd Nut, somewhat moist, and not ill-tasted.

What I have spoken of the Height of these Shrubs, must be understood of those that grow in the Province of Kyang-nan; in other Parts they let them grow to their natural Height, which is 10 or 12 Feet; for this reason, when the Branches are young, they bend them down, that they may gather the Leaves with greater ease. The Song-lo-cha, preserved several Years, is an excellent Remedy against many Distempers.

Vú-i, or Bo-hea-Tea. The Vú-i-cha grows in the Province of Fo-kyen, and takes its Name also from the famous Mountain Vú-i-shan, situated in the District of Kyen-ning-fú, and two Leagues distant from the little City of Tsong-gan-byen, in 27 d. 47 m. 38 f. Latitude, according to the Observations made on the Spot. This is the most famous Mountain in that Province: It is cover'd with a great Number of Temples, Houses and Hermitages of the Bonzas belonging to the Sect of Tau-kyá, which draw thither a great Concourse of People.

The better to compass their Design of making this Mountain pass for the Abode of the Immortal Beings, they have convey'd Barks, Chariots, and other Things of the same Kind, into the Clefts Clefts of the steepest Rocks all along the Sides of a Rivulet that runs between; insomuch that these fantastical Ornaments are looked upon by the stupid Vulgar as a real Prodigy, believing it impossible that they could have been raised to such inaccessible Places, but by a Power more than human; the Soil of the Mountain which produces this Plant is light, whitish and sandy.

The Shrubs Vu-i-cha and Song-lo-cha are of the same Height and Size, and cultivated in the same manner; the only Difference between them is, that the Leaves of the latter are more long and pointed, give the Water a greenish Tincture, and Experience shews it to be somewhat raking. On the contrary, the Leaves of the Vu-i-cha are short, more round, somewhat blackish and colour the Water yellow, without the least Harshness, or any Quality offensive to the weakest Stomach: Hence the Vu-i-cha is most generally used throughout the Empire. 'Tis difficult to meet with any that is good in the Northern Provinces, where usually that only which consists of the large Leaf is sold; for the more yellow, tender and fine the Leaves of the Vu-i-cha, as well as those of the Song-lo, are, the more they are esteemed: Of these they make three sorts in Places where Tea is gathered.

The first is the Leaf gathered from the Shrubs newly planted, or, as the Chinese express it, are the first Points of the Leaves: This they call Mau-cha; and is scarce ever used but in Presents, or to send to the Emperor. The second is of the Leaves more full grown; this is what they sell by the Name of good Vu-i-cha. The remaining Leaves, which are allowed to grow to their full Bigness, make the third sort, which is very cheap.

There is yet another sort made of the Flower itself, but those who would have it must bespeak it, and pay an excessive Price. The Missionary Geographers, having got a little of it by means of the Mandarins, had it prepared twice or thrice after the usual manner, but found no sensible Change in the Water, either as to Colour or Taste, which is probably the Reason why this Tea is not used by the Emperor or even in the Palace. The Mau-cha above-mentioned is the Imperial Tea, and sold in the Places near the Mountains Song-lo and Vu-i, for Forty or Fifty Sols a Pound [about two Shillings English.]

Under these two sorts of Tea or Cha, we may comprehend all the rest, distinguished by different Names, as Lü-ngan-cha, Hay-cha, &c. The first has its Name from the City of Lü-ngan-chew, although the best Tea of this kind is cultivated no where but on the Sides of the little Hills belonging to the small City of Ho-shan-byen, from whence they are distant about seven Leagues. The Missionaries, having examined it on the Spot, found no Difference between it and the Song-lo-cha, either in the Figure of the Leaves or the manner of Cultivation. If it tinges the Water of a different Colour, and when fresh appears not quite so rough or corrosive to the Taste, it may be attributed to the difference of Soil, which has a sensible Effect on several Plants; since we see in Europe, that Wines of the same kind of Grape are more or less rough in different Parts of the same Province, and in Provinces more distant the Alteration is still more perceptible.

The Chinese however find the Effects of them very different: The Song-lo is hot and raking, which the Lü-ngan Tea is not, and besides is so tempered that it is neither hot nor cold, and is reckoned very wholesome. The Hay-cha comes from Kan-chew-fü in the Province of Kyang-fü, and differs in no Respect from the Lü-ngan-cha, not even in its Roughness or Smoothness upon the Palate, so that it may be called a Species of the Song-lo-cha.

'Tis the same with the other sorts of Tea; for instance, that which the Mongols in Tartary use, called by them Kayel-cha or Karcha, consists only of Leaves, either of the Song-lo or Vu-i-cha, which grow to their full Size, and are mixed without any sorting; because the Chinese think any thing good enough for the Tartars, who cannot distinguish the coarse Tea from the fine, and commonly dilute it with Milk; of this they make both an agreeable and a nourishing Liquor, which they take at any Hour of the Day.

But we must not confound every thing which the Chinese call Cha with the true Tea; for they give that Name to Plants that do not deserve it, and which are indeed otherwise denominated by those who have not Interest enough to make them pass for such. Thus in the Province of Sban-tong, that which is sold by the Name of Meng-ing-cha as admirable Tea, is properly no more than a kind of Moss, which grows on the rocky Parts of a Mountain belonging to the City of Meng-ing-byen. It is of a very bitter Taste; and has this Quality of the true Tea, that, when drank hot after Meals, it promotes Digestion.

The same sort of Tea is found in some parts of the Provinces which are more Northerly than Sban-tong; though it be not made of Leaves, yet the Merchants call it Cha-ye, or Leaves of Tea. In those Countries where the Tea does not usually grow, the common People, who have not the nicest Palates, make use of any thing that resembles the Tea, either in Taste or Effects, and regale themselves upon this coarse Stuff, which they frequently gather from Trees, that, having been long transplanted, degenerate on account of the improper Soil, which does not agree with them; and to make it come cheaper, they lay in their Store when the Leaves are grown old, and become tough and large, which renders the Taste rough and insipid, although it produces the same Effects in those who take it, as the Song-lo or Vu-i Tea.

The third sort of Tea is that which we have named Pü-eul-cha, or Tea of the Village Pü-eul, which is situated in the Province of Yün-nan, and on the Borders of Pegu, Ava, the Laos and Tun-king. Its Neighbourhood to the Mountains, which produce this kind of Tea, has invited the Merchants thither, and by this means it is become considerable; though the Inhabitants debar any Merchant from approaching nearer than the Foot of the Mountains, where they receive the Quantity of Tea for which they have bargained. From these Merchants we learned that the Trees which which produce this Tea are tall and bushy, planted without Order, and propagated without Culture; the Leaves are longer and thicker than those of the Song-lo-cha and Vu-i-cha, and are roll'd up into a kind of Balls, which they sell at a good Price. This sort of Tea is common in the Provinces of Yun-nan and Quey-chew; but the Taste is disagreeable, tho' smooth. The Balls, when cut in pieces, they throw like other Tea into boiling Water, to which it gives a reddish Tincture.

The Chinese Physicians affirm this Drink to be wholesome, as by its Effects it seems to be; The Missionaries, and those who accompanied them, found it very good in slight Disorders, inevitable in long Travels, especially in the excessive Heats of Summer; but its peculiar Qualities are, that it cures the Cholick, stops the Flux, and creates an Appetite; but then it ought to be drank as strong again as Tea is commonly made.

The Tree
which yields
the Oil.

There is another Tree which bears a Fruit, from whence is drawn an Oil called Cha-yew; this Oil when fresh is perhaps the best in all China. It very nearly resembles the Shrub of the Vu-i-cha, with respect to the Figure of its Leaves, Colour of the Wood, and some other Qualities, but differs from it, not only as to its Size, Thickness and Make, but also as to its Figure, Flowers and Fruit, which is naturally oleaginous, and becomes still more so when kept after it is gathered.

These Trees are of a moderate Height, and grow without Culture on the Slope of a Hill, and even in stony Valleys; they bear green Berries of an irregular Shape, filled with a sort of Kernels, which are pretty hard, but not so hard as the Stones of other Fruits.

Shrubs which bear Flowers.

The flowering Trees and Shrubs are very numerous throughout the Empire. In these the Chinese have the Advantage of the Europeans, as the Europeans have of them with regard to Flowers which spring from Seeds and Roots. Large Trees are to be seen there, covered with Flowers, which have a perfect Resemblance of Tulips; the Flowers of others are like Roses, which intermixt with the green Leaves make a very beautiful Appearance.

Odoriferous
Shrubs.

Among the Shrubs I don't know above three or four Sorts whose Flowers are odoriferous; those, called by the Chinese Mo-li-wba, are the most agreeable. The Shrub which bears them is easily propagated in the Southern Parts of China, where it grows to a pretty good Height; but in the Northern Provinces it never exceeds five or six Feet, although they take care in Winter to keep them in Green-Houses made on purpose. The Flower has a great Resemblance of the double Jessamin, both in Figure and Colour, but the Scent is stronger, though no less agreeable: Its Leaf is intirely different, more nearly approaching that of the young Citron Tree.

Flower Quey-wba.

The Tree that produces the Flowers call'd Quey-wba, very common in the Southern Provinces, and sometimes as tall as an Oak, is rarely seen in any of the Northern. These Flowers are small, differing in Colour, and have a very agreeable Odour. The Leaves resemble those of our Bay-Tree; which Resemblance is more easily discerned in the very high Trees, that are principally to be met with in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-si, Yun-nan, and Quang-si, than in the Shrubs of the same Kind. These Flowers are ordinarily yellow, very small, and hang on the Trees in such Clusters, that when they fall they quite cover the Ground: Their Scent is so agreeable, that the Air is perfum'd at a great Distance. There are some Trees which bear four times in the Year; for when the old Flowers fall, others presently succeed, so that very frequently they are to be had even in Winter.

Lan-wba.

There is yet a sort of Plant which is difficult to rear in all but the Maritime Provinces. 'Tis that which bears the Flower call'd Lan-wba, or Lan-wey-wba, whose Smell is still more fragrant than that of the Mo-li-wba, and Quey-wba; but it is not so beautiful to the Eye; the Colour of it is commonly inclining to that of Wax. The most leafy, and the most beautiful Flowers, but entirely insipid, grow like Roses on Trees and Shrubs, which are thought to be of the Peach and Pomegranate kind; they are of a very bright Colour, but produce no Fruit. There is another Shrub which has still less Conformity with any of that Species among us, named by the Chinese, at Pe-king, Wen-quang-shu; for it has different Names, in at least three different Provinces. Its Flower is white, the Leaves of it growing in form of a double and sometimes a triple Rose. The Calix or Cup becomes afterwards a Fruit resembling a Peach, but quite tasteless: The Cells are fill'd with Kernels, or rather Seeds, cover'd with a cartilaginous and blackish Film.

Peonies.

Peonies are found in several Parts of China, much finer than those of Europe: And besides the variety of their Colour, in some Places they have this peculiar to them, that they diffuse a sweet and a most charming Fragrance. Indeed they are the greatest Ornament of their Parterres of Flowers, where one meets with no other sort to compare with our Pink, Tulip, Ranunculus, Anemony, and the like.

Lyen wba,
Nymphaea,
Water-Rose, or Water-Lilly.

In artificial Fishponds, and often in the Marshes, there grows a Flower call'd Lyen-wba, much esteem'd, and cultivated with great Care by the Chinese; by the Leaves, the Fruit and the Stalk, it appears to be the Nymphaea, or Water-Lilly, which is but little valued in Europe: But by the great Care they bestow on it, the Flower becomes double; the Leaves, 'tis said, amount to an Hundred; and the Colours are more lively, and in greater Variety than in Europe. Where the Flower is single, the Cup, as in ours, has ordinarily no more than 5 Leaves, whereof the Pistil grows in form of a Cone, and is divided lengthways into several Cells, which contain a very white sort of Fruit larger than our Beans.

To this Plant, which is much us'd all over the Empire, they attribute a great many Qualities; some it certainly has, such as that of being refreshing; others are questionable, as when the Chinese tell us, that it softens Copper when put into one's Mouth, with a bit of the Root. I shall have occasion to mention this elsewhere. The Flower, call'd in Chinese Pe-tsi, is probably a Species of the little Water-Lilly: The Juice to the Taste is agreeable, and seems to have no corrosive corrosive Qualities. The meaner sort of People in China living, for the most part, on Herbs, Roots and Pulse, together with Rice, which is their ordinary Food, are very careful to cultivate their Kitchen-Gardens: Whenever the Season for one thing is over, another immediately is planted or sown, and by this means they never suffer the least Spot of Earth to lie idle. They have great Variety of these Vegetables, many of which we have in Europe; others we have not. The Seeds of Cabbage, Sorrel, Rue, and some other Plants, which are brought from the Indies, either dye or degenerate in 2 or 3 Years. They have true Cabbages indeed, but they don't come to a Head: They have had Parsly for many Ages, since it is found in their Books under the Name of Shin-tray; but it has neither the Beauty nor Sweetness of ours.

Pot-herbs.

Among the Pot-Herbs which we have not, there is scarce any, except one call'd Pe-tsay, that deserves a Place in our best Kitchen-Gardens. This indeed is exceeding good, and much us'd; some mistake it for a kind of Lettuce: But tho' its first Leaves resemble those of the Roman Lettuce, it differs from it in the Flower, Seed, Taste, and Height. They are best in the Northern Provinces, where they are left in the Ground during the first Hoar-Frosts, by which they become more tender; the Quantity of them that is sown, is almost incredible: In October and November, the nine Gates of Pe-king are stop'd up by Carts loaded with them, which are passing continually from Morning to Sun-set. The ordinary Kinds which grow in any Ground, are propagated in an infinite Degree by the Chinese, who preserve them with Salt or Pickle them; in order to mix with, and give a Relish to their Rice, which, when boild by itself, is insipid.

Pe-tsay, a kind of Lettuce.

In some of the Southern Provinces they cultivate Mallows, boiling their Leaves, and dressing them with Fat or Oil, as we do our Lettuce or Spinage with Butter. This Plant is very wholesome and laxative, without causing any Inconvenience.

The Medicinal Herbs, which we don't there find collected, as at Paris, into a Royal Garden of Plants, might certainly be very numerous in a Country of such vast Extent, and under so many different Climates: But it is not my Design to examine the difference there is between these of China and ours. I shall only speak succinctly of those Plants, which are most esteemed or extraordinary, at least that appeared so to the Missionaries, when they travell'd over the Provinces of that Empire.

Medicinal Herbs.

Rhubarb grows in great Plenty, not only in the Province of Se-chuen, but also in the Mountains of Shen-si, named Swe-shan, or the Mountains of Snow, which extend from Lyang-chew, as far as Su-chew and Si-ning-chew: An incredible Quantity of it is gather'd in those Parts only, where the Missionaries, while they were making the Map thereof, in the Months of October and November, frequently met whole Troops of Camels, loaded with Net-Bags full of Rhubarb. The Flowers resemble Bells scolloped at the Edges; the Leaves are long, and somewhat rough to the Touch. The inside of the Root, when fresh, is whitish; but, as it dries, assumes the Colour it has when it comes to us.

Rhubarb.

The Plant which their Physicians most use, is called by them Fu-ling, and by European Authors Radix Xina, and grows chiefly in Se-chuen; its Leaves, which creep along the Ground, are long, and narrow; on the contrary, the Root grows to a great thickness; and if we may believe the Chinese, sometimes to the Size of a Child's Head. But whatever Truth is in this, it is certain, that it contains in a kind of Shell a white pithy Substance, somewhat clammy: In all appearance, it is on account of its Whiteness, that the right sort is called Pe-fu-ling, or white Fu-ling. It differs from another sort, which is also much used, because it is cheaper, and grows spontaneously in several Parts of China, where it is consider'd as a Species of wild Fu-ling. Some of our Missionaries, who are Natives of that Part of France, where Truffles grow, affirm that the Pe-fu-ling of Shen-si is a perfect Truffle; its Colour is nearly green, but when dry, it grows somewhat yellowish; the Virtues of this Plant are too universally experienc'd to admit of any Doubt; but it is not so easy to determine in what Distemper it is most proper to apply it, because the Chinese Physicians are observ'd to use it indifferently in all their Prescriptions.

The Root of the Plant named Ten-se, is not so commonly used, but bears a greater Price. It is scarce, even in the Province of Se-chuen, where it grows between the 30th and 29th Degrees of Latitude; is of a hot Quality, and account'd an excellent Remedy for Disorders caused by cold Humours, and for all sorts of Obstructions.

Its Figure is singular, being very round on one Side, and almost flat on the other; its flat Side is fasten'd to the Ground by Strings, especially by one, pretty thick, which is in the midst of the rest, and enters deeper into the Substance of the Root; from the Convex Surface, shoot divers Stems, which separating at the Bottom, each makes a little Noddy; by these Marks 'tis easily distinguish'd. They commonly throw away the Branches, and only keep the Root, which they boil, or at least make them pass the Balneum Marie before they are sold.

Ti-wang is another Root of a very beautiful Plant, which grows chiefly in the North of the Province of Ho-nan, in 35 d. 6 m. and 10 f. Latitude, in the District of Whay-king-fu. At first sight one would take it for a kind of Liquorish, having a leguminous Flower, and crooked Pod; but after examining the Leaves, the Seed and the Taste, it is hard to determine under what Species to range it: However that be, it is commonly used by the Chinese, who find it good for strengthening the Stomach, and restoring, by degrees, the loss of Vigour.

Ti-wang.

But of all Plants, next to the Jin-seng, none is so much valued by the Chinese Physicians as the San-tsi, and they attribute almost the same Virtues to both, even preferring the San-tsi in Female Disorders, and in all Cases where there is loss of Blood. It has no Resemblance of the Jin-seng in Figure; it grows in the Province of Quang-si, and is to be found no where but on the Tops of almost inaccessible Mountains. A kind of Goat, of a greyish Colour, is very fond of this Plant: Whence the Chinese say, the Blood of that Animal receives a Medicinal Quality. 'Tis certain, that its Blood has surprizing Effects in case of Hurts, and Contusions received by falls from Horses, and the like Accidents; this the Missionaries have frequently experienc'd. Some of their Servants, who had been thrown by vicious Horses, and depriv'd almost of Speech and Motion, having been so speedily cured by this Remedy, that next Day they were in a Condition to continue their Journey.

We must not forget to observe, that they look on this Potion as a Specific against the Small-Pox; Instances of its Success are frequent: The black and infectious Pustules become of a clear red, as soon as the Patient has taken the Remedy: Hence 'tis prescribed in several Diseases, suppos'd to proceed from bad Qualities in the Blood. But this Plant is both scarce, and dear, and after all, one is not sure of having it pure and unmix'd.

In the Experiments above mentioned, they make use of the Blood of a Goat that has been hunted down; the San-tsi they use, is always that which grows in the Province of Qyang-si, and which the Mandarins, in those Parts, are accustomed to make Presents of to the superior Mandarins, and to their Protectors at Court.

Cassia Trees. In the Province of Yun-nan, towards the Kingdom of Ava, there are Cassia Trees (Cassia Fistula); they are pretty tall, and bear long Pods; whence 'tis called by the Chinese, Chang-ko-tse-shu, The Tree with long Fruit; its Pods are longer than those we see in Europe, and not composed of two convex Shells, like those of ordinary Pulse, but are so many hollow Pipes, divided by Partitions into Cells, which contain a pithy Substance, in every Respect like the Cassia in use with us.

I forbear to speak of the Trees which produce the Betel, tho' 'tis good against several Ailments, and much used in the Southern Provinces; as also of the Palm, the Banana-Tree, Cotton-Tree, the Mango-Tree, Anana's, and several other Plants which grow in the Indies, because they are described in all the Relations of those Countries.

I shall only observe, that the Chinese Cinamon grows in the Province of Qyang-si, and District of Tsin-chew-fu, chiefly on the Mountain Pe-shu. 'Tis not so much esteemed, even in China, as that which comes from other Places; its Colour inclines rather to grey than red, which is the Colour of the best Cinamon of Ceylan; it is also more thick, and rough, nor is it so odoriferous. However, it has the same Virtue of strengthening the Stomach, and exhilarating the Spirits; and Experience shews it has all the Qualities of Cinamon, tho' not in so great Perfection. One meets, now and then, with some more biting than that which comes from the Indies; and this they affirm becomes Grey also, when it is long a drying.

It is not proper here to speak of the Simples and Drugs made use of by the Artificers of China; such a Work wou'd be more suited to the Natural History of that Empire. However, I shall mention the Plant named Tyen and Tyen-wa; 'tis very commonly us'd in all the Provinces: When it is steep'd in Water, and prepar'd in large Tubs, or little Ponds, it yields a Blue, servicable in Dying. Those of Fo-kyen give a more beautiful Teint, and are most esteemed in that sort of Painting which they call Tan-mey.

They scarce employ any thing else but the Juices of Flowers and Herbs for painting Flowers and Figures on Satin, and Satin-Taffaties, whereof the Chinese make their Cloaths, Trimmings and Furniture. These Colours, which penetrate the Substance of the Silk, never fade; and as they have not a Body, they never peel off. They seem to be woven in very finely with the Ground of the Silk, tho' they are only painted in a very delicate manner.

Animals. We have not been able to procure an exact Knowledge of the rare Animals, which they tell us, are found in the Mountains of the Chinese Empire. That which they relate of some has such an Air of Fable, that I think it unworthy the Attention of the Publick. By what is reported all over Se-chwen, the Sin-sin seems to be a kind of Ape; they say it is as large as a middle siz'd Man, and has a greater Resemblance of Mankind than other Apes, both in its Actions, and in the Facility with which it walks on its Hind-Foot.

Man-Bear. What they likewise report of the Jin-byung, or Man-Bear, found in the Defarts of the Province of Shen-si, ought only to be understood of the extraordinary bigness of those Bears compar'd with Man; just as the Animal call'd Ma-lu, or the Horse-Stag, is only a Species of Stags, which are near as high as the little Horses of the Provinces of Se-chwen, and Yun-nan, named Chwen-ma.

Yun-nan also breeds a kind of Stags, to be found no where else; for their size never exceeds that of ordinary Dogs; the Princes and great Men keep them in their Gardens as Curiosities.

But what some Chinese Books mention of the Horse-Tiger, ought to be look'd on as mere Fiction. They pretend it differs from a Horse only in being cover'd with Scales, in having Claws which resemble a Tiger's, and in its bloody Disposition; which in the Spring makes him leave the Water to seize Men and Beasts.

The Missionaries have travell'd along the River Han, that waters the Territory of Syang-yang-fu, in the Province of Hu-quang, where they say these Animals breed: They likewise have cross'd the frightful Mountains of Yun-yang-fu; and, notwithstanding that the Inhabitants made them take Notice of every thing worth observing, and of several things even very trifling, and that the Tartars were very inquisitive after whatever was rare, in order to entertain the Emperor, who had a taste for Natural History, and judg'd it very conducive to the Public Welfare, yet they cou'd neither hear of, nor see any such Creature. That however which is reported con-concerning the Hyang-chang-tse, or odoriferous Deer, is very true; this Animal is not scarce, being found, not only in the Southern Provinces, but even within 4 or 5 Leagues to the West of Pe-king. 'Tis a sort of Deer without Horns, with Hair of a blackish Colour; its Musk-bag is composed of a very thin Skin, covered with Hair exceeding fine; the Flesh is good to eat, and served up at the best Tables. I shall have occasion to speak of it hereafter.

In the Southern Provinces, as Quang-tong, and especially Quang-si, there are Parrots of all sorts, in every respect like those brought from America, they have the same Plumage and Docility for Talking, but they are not comparable to the Birds called Kin-ki, or Golden-Hens; these last are found in the Provinces of Se-chuen, Yun-nan and Shen-si. We have no Bird in Europe that resembles them; their lively red and yellow, the Plume on the Head, the shadowing of the Tail, and the Variety of Colours in the Wings, together with a well shap'd Body, have no doubt given occasion to the Name of Golden-Hen, as it shews the Preference this Bird ought to have over all others: Its Flesh is more delicate than that of a Pheasant; so that, of all the Birds in the East, this perhaps best deserves to be brought into Europe.

Birds Kin-ki, or golden Hens.

Nothing is more to be admired than a little Bird called Tung-wah-fong, mentioned by the Chinese Geographers, according to whom, the Variety of its Colours is surprizing, and its Bill of a shining Red, inclining to Vermillion; but in the Province of Se-chuen, and even at Ching-tu-fu it self, where, they say, it breeds, the Inhabitants know nothing of this Bird, according to the same Geographers, its Life is of no longer Duration than the Flower Tung-wah, and its Beauty surpasses that of the Bird Fong-wahang; which should be our Phoenix, if there ever was such a Bird, as it is described by our Authors.

The *Tung-
wah-fong*.

It is certain that the Fong-wahang, whose Figure is often painted and set off with a vast Number of Ornaments, never appears in any of the Cities or Mountains, to which they have given its Name, at Fong-tsyang-fu in Shen-si, where they say it is, 'tis not more known any where else, as we have already remarked in speaking of Fong-wahang-ching in Tartary (M.)

or Phoenix.

Among the beautiful Birds, they with good Reason reckon the Hay-tsing. 'Tis very rare, being found only in the District of Hong-chan-fu in Shen-si, and some Parts of Tartary; it is not inferior to our finest Falcons, but exceeds them in Bigness and Strength; it may be called the King of the Birds of Prey in Tartary and China; for it is the most beautiful, sprightly and courageous of all, and in such Esteem, that as soon as any of them is caught, it must be carried to Court, where it is presented to the Emperor, and afterwards committed to the Care of the Royal Falconers.

The Butterflies of the Mountain Lo-sew-shan, situated in the District of Whey-chew-fu and Province of Quang-tong, are likewise so much esteemed, that the largest and most uncommon are sent to Court, where they become a Part of certain Ornaments in the Palace: Their Colours are surprizingly diversified and lively; they are much bigger than the Butterflies of Europe, and their Wings a great deal larger. In the Day time they appear without Motion on the Trees, and are easily taken; in the Evening they begin to flutter about, much like our Bats, and some of them seem to be as large, when their Wings are extended: There are also beautiful Butterflies found in the Mountains of Si-shan in the Province of Pe-che-li, which are likewise in Request; but they are small, and not to be compared to these of Mount Lo-sew-shan.

Butterflies.

The Mountains of China are still more valuable, on account of the Mines of different Metals. The Chinese say they are full of Gold and Silver; but that the working of them hitherto has been hindered from some political Views, perhaps, that the publick Tranquillity might not be disturbed by the too great abundance of these Metals, which would make the People haughty and negligent of Agriculture.

Mountains, and Mines
therein.

Thus this immense Fund of hidden Treasure, which they talk so much of, becomes useless. The late Emperor Kang-bi, so famous for his Wisdom, had once given Permission to some of his own Household, who had the Care of his Domain to a large Extent, to open the Silver Mines, but caused them to give over the Work in 2 or 3 Years. Not, say they, because the Profit arising from them was trifling, but rather to prevent the Rabble from assembling together. They add that those who work in the Silver Mines in the Province of Yun-nan, which have always been open, were formerly considerable Gainers by them.

Without doubt, China affords Mines of Gold also. What Gold they have there, is partly dug out of Mines; but most of it is found among the Sands, which the Rivers and Torrents roll from the Mountains in the western Parts of the Provinces of Se-chuen and Yun-nan; this last is the richer of the two. The People called Lo-lo, of whom I shall speak hereafter, and who possess the neighbouring Parts of the Kingdoms of Ava, Pegu and Laos, probably dig a great deal of Gold from their Mountains; since they use to put a good Quantity of Gold Leaves in the Coffins of illustrious Persons, or those who deserved their Esteem. Their Gold is not very beautiful, possibly because not purified: In all likelihood the Lo-lo are not better skilled in Smelting of Gold than Silver, which is still blacker, and fuller of Alloy; but when refined by the Chinese Workmen, it becomes as pure and beautiful as any other Silver. The Gold, which is most beautiful and dear, is found in the Districts of Li-kyang-fu and Yang-chang-fu.

Gold Mines.

As the Gold which comes from those Places is not coined, it is employed in Trade as a Merchandize; but the Demand for it in the Empire is not very considerable, because Gold is scarce ever

(M) It seems from this Circumstance, as if the Description of Tartary was originally designed to have been placed before that of China.

ever used but by the Gilders, and in some trifling Ornaments, for none but the Europeans have any golden Plate.

Coal Mines.

Coal Mines are so numerous in the Provinces, that perhaps no Kingdom in the World besides, has so many and so rich. Those in the Provinces of Shen-si, Sban-si and Pe-che-li are innumerable: So that Coal Supplies all their Furnaces, Kitchens and Stoves, which are used during all the Winter: Without some such Convenience there would be no living in so cold a Country, where Wood for Firing is scarce, and consequently very dear.

Mines of Iron, Tin, and other Metals.

Mines of Iron, Tin, and other Metals for ordinary Use, must needs also be very numerous there, seeing they bear a low Price throughout the Empire. The Missionary Geographers were Witnesses of the Richness of a Tuttenague Mine in the Province of Hu-quang, from whence in a few Days were drawn some hundreds of Quintals.

Copper-Mines. White-Copper.

The Mines of common Copper which are in the Provinces of Yun-nan and Quey-chew, have supplied the Empire with all the small Money that has been coined there for several Years past: But the most extraordinary Copper is that called Pe-tong, or White Copper; it is white when dug out of the Mine, and still more white within than without. It appears by a vast Number of Experiments made at Pe-king, that its Colour is owing to no Mixture, on the contrary, all Mixtures diminish its Beauty; for when it is rightly managed it looks exactly like Silver; and were there not a Necessity of mixing a little Tuttenague, or some such Metal with it, to soften it, and prevent its Brittleness, it would be so much the more extraordinary, as this sort of Copper is, perhaps, to be met with no where but in Cbina, and that only in the Province of Tun-nan. Those who would have it keep its fine Colour, mix a fifth Part of Silver with it instead of other Metal.

Red-Copper.

As for the Copper named Tse-lay-tong, or the Copper which comes of itself; it proves to be nothing else but red Copper washed down by the great Rains from the high Mountains of Tun-nan, and found among the Sands and Flints, in the Channel of the Torrents, when they subside and their Beds become dry.

The Chinese pretend, that the Bracelets of Tse-lay-tong defend the Arms against the Palsy, or rather prevent their Loss of Feeling, by the Discharge of certain Humours. One of the Tartars who accompanied the Missionaries, found as much Benefit from Bracelets made of Tun-nan Gold, as he had received from those of Tse-lay-tong; whence the Virtues ascribed to the exterior Application of that Metal may be justly questioned: However, it is in great Reputation in Tun-nan, and even in Pe-king.

Quarries of extraordinary Stones.

If what they affirm of the Stone called Hyung-Wbang, being an Antidote against Poisons is true, it ought to be looked on as a Source of Riches to the Empire, and preferred to the Rubies of Tun-nan, where Mines or rather Quarries of it are found, as also in several other Provinces, even Northern ones, as Shen-si. 'Tis not a Mineral but a soft Stone, easily formed into Vessels of all kinds, which they tinge with Vermillion, the Stone itself being naturally of a yellowish Colour, and sometimes spotted with black.

What the Chinese Geographers report, of its being an excellent Specifick against malignant Fevers, is uncertain; at least it is not used in the Cure of them in Places where it abounds: Whence it may be presumed, that in case it has that Property, the Physicians there have not discovered it.

Lapis Armenus.

The Lapis Armenus is not very dear in Tun-nan, where it is found in several Places, differing in nothing from what is imported into Europe. 'Tis produced also in the Province of Se-chuen, and in the District of Tay-tong-fu, belonging to Sban-si, which furnishes perhaps the most beautiful Yu-she in all Cbina; 'tis a kind of white Jasper, the white resembling that of Agat; 'tis transparent, and sometimes spotted when it is polished.

Jasper.

Rubies.

The Rubies sold at Tun-nan-fu, are of the right sort, but very small. We know not in what Part of the Province they are found. One meets with some other kinds of Precious Stones at the same City; but they are said to be brought from other Countries, and especially from Ava: at least they are brought by the Merchants of that Kingdom, who come to trade at Tung-chang-fu, whose Jurisdiction borders upon it.

Rock Crystal.

The fairest Rock Crystal does not come from Tun-nan, but is found in the Mountains of Chang-chew-fu, and Chang-pu-byen, in the Province of Fo-kyen, situated in the Latitude of 24 deg. 10 min. The Artificers of those two Cities are very skilful in working it; and they make of it Seals, Buttons, and Figures of Animals.

Marble-Quarries.

There are in the same Province (of Fo-kyen) as also in several others, Quarries of Marble, not inferior to European Marble, were it as well wrought. However, one may meet at the Merchants with Variety of little pieces, well enough polished, and of a pretty good Colour; for instance, the little Tables named Tyen-tsan, wherewith sometimes the Tables at Entertainments are adorned, are very pretty, and spotted with divers Colours, which, though not extraordinary lively, represent very naturally Mountains, Rivers, and Trees: They are made of a Marble commonly dug in the Quarries of Tay-li-fu, whereof they select only certain Pieces.

But tho' there is no want of Marble in Cbina, yet one meets with neither Palace, Temple or other Structure at Peking or elsewhere, which is intirely built with it. Tho' the Chinese Houses are supported by Pillars, it does not appear, that they have yet made any of Marble, or once thought of employing the coloured kind instead of Wood, whereof they are accustomed to make Pillars. Buildings even of the fine Free-stone are rare in this Country: Stone is never used but in Bridges and Triumphal Arches, named Pay-lew, which adorn the Streets of a great Number of Towns in each Province.

The triumphal Arches are mostly adorned with lively Figures of Men, Birds and Flowers, in pierced Work; so neatly detached from the Body of the Arch, that they are joyned together only by Cordons, and thus run into one another without Confusion. This shows the superior Skill of the ancient Workmen; for it is observed that the Triumphal Arches erected of late in certain Cities, fall vastly short of the old ones; the Sculpture is very sparing and appears coarse; the Work is all solid, without being pierced, or having any thing to enliven it.

However, the Order in the modern Pay-lew, is the same as in the old: But this Order is very different from ours, both as to the Disposition and Proportion of the Parts. They have neither Chapters, nor Cornishes; and that which bears some Likeness to our Frizes, is of a Height shocking to an Eye accustomed to the European Architecture; although it is so much the more agreeable to the Chinese Taste, as it affords more Room for the Ornaments, which garnish the Sides of the Inscriptions engraven thereon.

The Stone-Bridges are commonly built like ours, on huge Stone Piers, capable of breaking the Force of the Stream, and sustaining the Weight of Arches, wide and high enough for the largest Barks to pass. They are very numerous in China, and the Emperor spares no Expence, when the Benefit of the Public requires them to be built. There is scarce a more beautiful Bridge to be seen than that of Fu-chew-fu, Capital of the Province of Ho-kyen; the River, which is a Mile and a half broad, is sometimes divided into small Arms, and sometimes interpersed with little Islands. This is all united in joining the Islands by Bridges, which altogether make 8 Li or Furlongs, and 76 Chinese Fathoms. The principal Bridge alone has above 100 Arches, built of white Stone, with carved Bannisters on each Side, upon which at the distance of every tenth Foot are placed little square Pilasters, whose Bases are very large, resembling hollow Barks. Every Pillar bears one or two cross Stones, which support stone Steps, more or less in Number, according to the Breadth of the Bridge.

But that which surpasses all the rest, is the Bridge of Suen-chew-fu, built over the point of an Arm of the Sea, which otherwise must be crossed in a Bark, often not without Danger. It is 2520 Chinese Feet long and 20 broad, supported by 252 huge Piers, 126 on each side: All the Stones are of a greyish Colour, and of the same Length and Thickness, as well those which cross from Pier to Pier, as those which are laid across to join them together.

'Tis not easy to comprehend where they could find so many large Pieces of Rock, or how they could contrive to cut or place Stones of such enormous Weight, high enough for large Vessels to pass underneath: the Bridge is likewise set off with Ornaments, made of the same sort of Stone. In short, the most remarkable things to be seen elsewhere, however esteemed in the Country, are nothing comparable to this. What I have said is sufficient to give the Reader an Idea of the Magnificence of the Chinese in publick Edifices, and whatever concerns the Good of the People; with regard to which they are no less profuse, than they are sparing in what relates to their Persons and private Buildings. This Magnificence appears still farther in the Quays, which border the Rivers and Canals. 'Tis surprizing to behold of what Length and Breadth they are, and what large Stones they are set with.

But these Works, however splendid they appear, fall far short of those which regard the Rivers and Lakes. Nothing can be of greater publick Convenience, than to be able to go by Water from Kanton, the most Southern Part of the Empire, to Pe-king the most Northern; and that without travelling above one Day by Land, over Mount Mey-lin, where the River of Kyang-fu rises: But one need never quit the Bark, provided he sails about thro' the Provinces of Quang-si and Hu-quang. For the Rivers of Hu-quang and Kyang-fu run Northwards into the Yang-tse-Kyang, which is the greatest River in all China, and traverses it from West to East.

This great River joins the River Pe-ho, which is convey'd Southward from Pe-king, by means of a famous Artificial Canal; so that there is an easy Communication between the Southern Maritime Provinces, and the Northern bordering on Tartary, which becomes an inexhaustible Source of reciprocal Advantages to both. This Canal, which is call'd Yu-hyang-bo, that is; the Canal for conveying Merchandize, and often Yu-bo, or the Royal Canal, is very remarkable for its Length, which is above 160 great French Leagues, and still more so for the Evenness of the Country thro' which it is cut; for in all that Space there were neither Hills, Quarries nor Rocks, which gave the Workmen any Trouble either to level, or to penetrate.

In the Province of Sban-tong is a River of an ordinary largeness, named Wen-bo, whose Stream they have found means to divide. The Point of Division is near a small Eminence, 3 Leagues from the little City of Wen-shan-byen. This Place is call'd Fu-shwei-myau, or the Temple of the division of the Waters, because it is consecrated by the Idolaters to Long-vang, who, according to the Bonzas, is Master of the Waters; the larger quantity of Water, after being divided, supplies that Part of the Canal which runs to the North; where, after it has received the River Wey-bo, from the Province of Ho-nan, and run a long Course, it falls, near the City of Tyen-ting-wei in the Province of Pe-che-li, into the River which comes from Pe-king, and discharges itself into the Eastern Ocean. The other Branch, which is scarce one third Part of the Stream, running Southward [in the Canal] towards the Wang-bo, or Yellow River, meets at first with Pools and Marshes, some whereof serve for its Channel, and others supply it with Water, by means of Sluices, which are open'd and shut at pleasure, with Wooden-Planks that are fastened across the Mouth of the Sluice, in Grooves cut into the Stone-Piers that line it, where it is discharg'd into the Canal.

Rivers and Canals.

Great Canal.

Its Origin and Course.

These Works are in Chinese call'd Cha, and in our Relations Dikes, tho' very improperly; because those which are built in the Canal itself, and contract its Breadth, leaving only Space enough for a large Bark to pass, serve like our Sluices to restrain the Water, when they want at once to stop its Course either entirely, or in part, by laying the Boards across to a certain Height. This Precaution is often necessary, especially in times of Drought: For the Stream of the Canal being only part, as has been observed, of a moderate River, and not able to furnish Water to more than the Depth of 5 or 6 Feet, they have endeavour'd to retard, and even stop the Course of it, by the Elbows made by frequent Turnings and Windings of the Canal: It happens some Years, when there is scarcity of Rain, that it is reduced to three Feet of Water, which is not sufficient to bear the great Imperial Barks, that carry the Provisions and Tributes furnished by the Provinces to Court. In Parts therefore subject to that Inconvenience, they have recourse to this sort of Sluices, [or Reservoirs,] if they deserve that Name, since they have no other Basin besides the Canal itself. The Number of others is not so great as is reported, not exceeding 45, and their Breadth not above 30 Feet, nor are the Sides of the Canal lined with Stone, except here and there: They often need repairing, either in those Places where the Earth, being sandy and loose, easily tumbles down; or else near Ponds, which swell'd by extraordinary Rains, sometimes break down the Banks that are made commonly of Earth, probably the same that was thrown up in digging the Canal.

They have greater Difficulties to struggle with, beyond the Whang-bo: For, to draw the Canal from its Southern side to the great Yang-tse-Kyang, it was necessary to raise great Banks of Stone, and other Works of that kind, to resist the Waters, both of a great Lake which is to the West, and of the River Quay-bo, which swell'd to such a degree, in the time of great Rains, that, after ravaging the Plain, it fell with fury on the Canal; these Works are near Whay-ngan-fu, and the best that have been made for the Service of the Canal. There are also some pretty good ones towards Yang-chew-fu, which serve as Quays to that fine City.

Beyond the Yang-tse-Kyang, the Canal (which is continued from Chin-kyang-fu, thro' Chang-chew-fu, and Su-chew-fu, and receives the several Canals of the Province of Che-kyang,) is more commodious, as it is not embarrass'd with Sluices, or such like Works. The Evenness of the Land, the plenty of Water which has no Descent, and the Nature of the Ground, are Advantages which it wou'd have been difficult for those who made the Canal to have met with else-where.

Imperial Barks.

That which most charms the Eye, is the vast Number of large and beautiful Imperial Barks, divided into Squadrons, commanded each by its Mandarin, advancing in great Order, loaded with the best Things that the Provinces afford. 'Tis commonly reported, and agreeable to the printed Accounts, that the Number of these Barks, maintain'd at the Expence of the Empire, amounts to 10,000. However the Mandarins, who are Surveyors of the Transports of Merchandizes, and count them in their Passage, have often affirm'd, that they never saw above 4 or 5000 of them arrive: But even that Number is surprizing, when we reflect upon the Largeness of those Barks, many whereof carry 80 Tun, and that they are design'd merely for supplying the Imperial City with Necessaries.

In the Countries, where there is no danger of damaging the Great Royal Canal, several little Canals have been cut into it, by the Inhabitants of neighbouring Towns or great Villages. The Advantages that accrue by having a Communication with the whole Kingdom, and thereby facilitating Trade, have made the Chinese surmount Difficulties which frighten Europeans. We meet with an Instance of this in the Canals that pass from Shau-bing-fu to Ning-po-fu; the Waters of one Canal not being on a Level with that of another, the Boat, by means of two Capestanes, is hoisted upon a Stone-Glacier, or Sloping, which being made slippery with Water, the Boat slides down into the second Canal, as swift as an Arrow out of a Bow: For this reason they are made in form of Gondolas, with Keels of a Wood hard enough to sustain the Weight of the Bark. These Boats are proper only for carrying Goods from Ning-po, and the Towns depending on it, as far as the Canal of Shau-bing. They differ much, both as to size and make, from the Imperial Barks, which to be sure wou'd be broken to Pieces, or at least receive some considerable Damage in the Descent.

In the Province of Quang-fi they have joined the River that falls into the Sea at Kanton with that which, after crossing the Province of Hu-quang, enters into the great Yang-tse-Kyang, at the Place where the Royal Canal ends, as has been already observed. The Waters which descend from the Mountains, in the North Part of the Province, form near the City Hing-ngan-byen a small River, which is stopped by a Bank equal to the highest Ground whereon it runs, and its Rapidity makes it swell above the natural Declivity of its Channel, which discharges the Surplus of the Water. But this Canal, which goes not far, before it enters the two Rivers just now mentioned, is neither so commodious, nor so well kept in Repair as the Grand Canal. The Water is often so low, that in many Places the Barks are rather halled along the Gravel, than carry'd by the Stream.

These sorts of Sluices, which are very proper for increasing the Water, by stopping its Course, are commonly made only of Earth, supported by Stakes, and their Mouths secured by Matts, or such like things. But whatever Defects happen, they are supply'd by the Industry and Labour of the Boatmen and Peasants. This Road is chosen by the Merchants, who are deterred from taking that to Kanton, thro' the Province of Kyang-fi, because of the Expence and Trouble they are obliged to be at, by carrying their Goods one Day's Journey over Land.

There

There is some Inconveniency in travelling from Kanton by the Province of Hu-quang; for they must quit the River (which passing to Sbau-chew-fu, falls into that of Kanton) at I-chang-byen, whence it is 7 Leagues and a half to the fine City of Cling-chew, (both in Hu-quang) where they embark on another River which falls into the great Yang-tse-Kyang: But, when the Waters are high, they are not retarded at all in the Road thro' Kyang-si and Hu-quang. 'Tis doubtless of vast Advantage to the whole Kingdom, to have a constant Course of Trade so easily kept up among the Provinces, by means of the Communication carry'd on, as well by the Royal Canal, which leads to Pe-king, as the lesser Canals, which terminate in it, like so many cross Roads.

These Canals are supply'd with Fish from the Rivers and Lakes, wherewith they communicate; one meets with almost all the Kinds that are found in our Rivers in France: Several others come from the Sea, advancing a great way up the Rivers; sometimes those of the largest Size are caught in Places above 150 Leagues from the Coast. There is near Nan-king, a famous Fishery for Shads, call'd She-yu, in the Months of April and May; and at another Place, a good way from thence, there is such plenty of this sort of Fish, that they often carry them to a neighbouring Island call'd Tsong-ming, where they were sold exceeding cheap, at the time the Missionaries made the Map of it.

These Missionaries were so employ'd in settling the Geography of Places, that they had not time to enquire into the various Species of Fish, which are so numerous in the Rivers and Lakes of China: Besides, a Work of that kind wou'd belong to a Natural History of the Country, if it were set on foot. They have, however, observed two or three Things singular enough. The first is, That in the great River Yang-tse-Kyang, not far from the City Kyew-king-fu, in the Province of Kyang-si, a prodigious Number of Barks meet every Year to buy the Spawn of Fishes. About May the People of the Country dam up the River for 9 or 10 Leagues together, in several Places, with Mats and Hurdles, (leaving only Room enough for Barks to pass) in order to stop the Spawn, which they know how to distinguish at first Sight, tho' the Water is scarce alter'd; with this Water, mixt with the Spawn, they fill several Vessels to sell to the Merchants, who at this Season arrive in great Numbers to buy, and transport it into divers Provinces, taking Care to have it stir'd up from time to time. This Water is sold by Measure to such as have Fish-Ponds, and Pools belonging to their Houses; in a few Days the young Fry begin to appear in little Shoals, but the different Kinds cannot be so soon distinguished. The Profit often amounts to a hundred times the Expence; for the common People live much on Fish.

The next Thing remarkable, is the Kin-yu, or Golden-Fish; these are kept, either in little Ponds, made for that purpose, wherewith the Houses of Pleasure, belonging to the Princes and great Lords, are embellish'd; or else in Basins, that commonly adorn the Courts of their Houses: In these Basins, which are more deep than wide, they put the least that can be found: For the smaller they are, they think them the more beautiful; besides, the greater Number may be kept of them, and they afford more Diversion.

Golden Fish.

The prettiest of them are of a curious Red, speckled as it were with Gold-Dust, especially towards the Tail, which is forked with two or three Points; some are of a silver Colour, others White, and some spotted with Red; both sorts are extraordinary lively and active, delighting to play on the Surface of the Water; but then their Smallness renders 'em so tender, that the least impression of Air, and even any violent shaking of the Vessel, will kill great Numbers of them. Those that are bred in Ponds are of various Sizes; some are bigger than our largest Pilchards (s): They teach them to rise up to the Top of the Water at the Noise of a Clapper, which the Person uses who feeds them. What is most surprizing is, that, according to all Accounts, the best way to preserve them is to give them nothing in Winter; 'tis certain they do not feed them for 3 or 4 Months at Pe-king, while the very cold Weather lasts; what they live on in the mean time, under the Ice, it is not easy to understand, except we suppose, either that they find little Worms in the Roots of Herbs, which grow at the Bottom of the Ponds, or else that Pieces of Roots themselves, being softened by the Water, become proper Food for them; but those which, to prevent their being frozen, are taken into the Houses, and kept all Winter in a Chamber, often shut up in a China Vessel, without being fed at all, are towards Spring put into the Basins again, where they sport with the same Strength and Agility as they did the Year before. One wou'd imagine they knew their Masters, and those who carry them Food, by their being so ready to rise at their approach: The greatest Lords themselves delight in feeding them with their own Hands, and spend some Time to observe their nimble Motions, and sporting in the Water.

These Fish, at least the prettiest of them, are caught in a small Lake (o), in the Province of Che-kyang, near the little City of Chang-wa-byen, in the District of Han-chew-fu, and at the Foot of a Mountain call'd Tsien-king, situated in 30 d. 23 m. of Latitude; but as this Lake is small, it is not likely that all the Golden-Fish come from thence, which are seen in the Provinces of China, particularly those of Quan-tong and Fe-kyen, where this Species may be easily preserved and propagated. For 'tis certain, that even the smallest of those that are fed in Vessels are prolific enough; their Spawn is seen swimming on the top of the Water, and provided it is taken up, and kept with Care, the Heat of the Season never fails to animate it.

(s) They scarce ever exceed a Finger's Length, and one of the better sort sells for three or four Crowns.
(o) It is not above 200 Acres in compass.

feng.

But this Kind of Fish is not more beautiful, than those, called by the Chinese Hay-feng, are hideous and ugly; they are however the common Diet of the Chinese, and make a Dish in almost every Meal; they are seen floating on the Coasts of Sban-tong and Fo-kyen: The Missionaries took them at first for so many inanimate Lumps: But the Chinese Mariners having taken one of them, by their Orders, they found it to be alive. It swam in the Basin wherein it was cast, and even liv'd there a pretty while. The Natives having always told them, that this Animal had four Eyes and six Feet, and that in Figure it resembled a Man's Liver, they examin'd it very carefully, but cou'd discover only two Places, which seem'd to be Eyes, by the signs of Fear it shew'd when they moved their Hands before those Parts; indeed, was every thing, that serves it to move with, to be look'd on as Feet, one might reckon as many as there are little Pimples, resembling Buttons, all over its Body; it has neither Prickles nor Bones, and dies the Moment it is squeezed. A little Salt will preserve it, in which it is convey'd to all Parts of the Empire; it is accounted a great Dainty, and so it may really be to a Chinese Palate, tho' it did not appear so to ours. But if one's own Taste is not the same at all times, no wonder it shou'd differ from that of People accusom'd to different Food.

Petrefy'd Sea-Crabs.

I might speak of a kind of Sea-Crabs, (found between the Coast of Kau-chew, in the Province of Quang-tong, and the Isle of Hay-nan) which are subject to Petrefaction without losing their natural Shape, but this is no Novelty in Europe: The Chinese Physicians prescribe them as very proper in burning and acute Fevers; but to prove the certainty of this, Experiments ought to be made to demonstrate the Efficacy of this Remedy.

Remarkable Lakes.

The Chinese tell Wonders also, concerning the Water of certain Lakes and Rivers; but what they report appears to be as false as it seems improbable. Nature being the same in all Countries, extraordinary Effects ought to be rare, which they wou'd not be, if all that is said on this Head, by the Chinese, was true: However it can't be deny'd, but that China is full of considerable Lakes as well as Rivers; such are the Hong-se-Hu in the Kyang-se; Ta-Hu, partly in the Province of Kyang-nan, and partly in that of Che-kyang; the Po-yang-Hu in Kyang-si, and the greatest of all, in Hu-quang, named Tong-ting-Hu. This last Lake is remarkable for the greatness of its Circumference; which is above 80 French Leagues, and the abundance of its Waters, especially in certain Seasons, when two of the largest Rivers in the Province, swollen with the Rains, discharge themselves into it, and when it disembogues them, one can scarcely perceive it to be diminished.

In the Province of Tun-nan there are, at least, three Rivers which terminate in pretty large Lakes, but less than the four already mentioned; the People of the Country name them Hay, that is, Seas. There are also in the same Province, as well as some others, large Brooks, which run under Ground for a considerable Space, and appear again: But there is nothing in all this inconsistent with the Nature of Things, the Countries known to us affording Instances of the like kind.

As the Cities of China, which are very numerous, are almost all built on Lakes, Rivers or Canals, they make without doubt their greatest Ornament, and render travelling by Water extremely commodious, as well as agreeable; this will appear hereafter from the Description of the several Provinces, each of which is preceded by its Map. But first I think it necessary to give an Account of the Great Wall, and certain Nations, which are either independant of the Chinese, or but half-subdued. To these I have added the Travels of certain Missionaries thro' divers Provinces, whose Observations are so particular, that the Reader will imagine he is performing the Journey himself.

Of the GREAT WALL, separating China from Tartary.

THIS celebrated Wall was built by the famous Emperor Tsin Shi-tohang, with a politic View, 221 Years before Christ. It bounds China on the North, and defends it against the neighbouring Tartars, who being at that time divided into various Nations, under different Princes, cou'd only incommode it, by sudden Inroads and Plunderings. There was then no Instance of such a re-union among the Western Tartars, as happen'd about the beginning of the 13th Century, when they conquer'd China. No Work in the World is equal to this; it is continued along three large Provinces, viz. Pe-che-li, Sban-si, and Sben-si, built often in Places which seem inaccessible, and strengthened with a Series of Forts erected at no less Expence. The beginning of this Wall is a large Bulwark of Stone, rais'd in the Sea, to the East of Pe-king, and almost in the same Latitude, being 40 d. 2 m. and 6 f. in the Province of Pe-che-li; it is well terrass'd, and cas'd with Brick, and is as high, and much broader, than the Walls of the Cities of the Empire usually are, that is, from 20 to 25 Feet in height.

P. Regis, and the other Missionaries, who assisted him in making the Map of the Provinces, have often, on the Top of it, apply'd the Cord to measure the Bases of Triangles, and taken the Bearing of Points at a distance; they always found it well pay'd, and wide enough for 5 or 6 Horsemen to march a-breast with ease. The Gates of the Great Wall are defended on the side of China, by pretty large Forts: The first of them to the East is call'd Shang-hay-Quan, it stands near the Wall, which extends, from the Bulwark before-mentioned, the Space of a League, along a Country perfectly level, and does not begin to ascend the Mountains, till after it has pass'd that Place. It was the Chinese General commanding in this Part, who first called in the Tartars of the Province of Lyau-tong, which lies beyond it: And by this gave them an Opportunity of conquering China, notwithstanding the Confidence the Chinese had in their mural Rampart, which they thought impregnable. Such is the vicissitude of human Affairs, that outward Defences, and all the Strength of a State, serve only to produce more sudden Revolutions, and even hasten its Ruin, when unsupported by Virtue in the Subject, and Vigilance in the Prince.

The other Forts, no less remarkable, are Hi-fong-kew, in 40 deg. 26 min. Tu-she-kew in 41 deg. 19 min. 20 sec. Chang-kye-kew, in 40 deg. 5 min. 15 sec. two noted Passes, by which the Tartars, who are subject to China, come to Pe-king; and Ku-Pe-kew, in 40 deg. 43 min. 15 sec. this last was the Way the Emperor Kang-hi usually took to go to Je-bo-el in Tartary: The Place is above 40 Leagues North-eastward from Pe-king. About it are nothing but Mountains, where he used to take the Diversion of Hunting: The Road hither from Pe-king is a grand Work, and level as a Bowling-Green.

Here that great Prince resided above one half of the Year, governing his vast Empire all the while with the same Ease as a Father governs his Family. If he returned late from Hunting, he never went to Rest till he had dispatched all the Petitions, and next Morning rose again before Day-break. It was surprizing to see him at the Age of Sixty, often when it snow'd very hard, on Horseback, in the midst of his Guards, clothed as thinly as themselves, laden with his Bow on one Side and his Quiver on the other, without offering to make use of an empty Chaise which followed him.

All these Forts, which are in the Province of Pe-che-li, are made of Earth, cas'd on both Sides with Brick; but when one leaves that Province and enters Shan-si, towards Tyen-ching-woy, the Wall begins to be only of Earth, is without Battlements, nor so much as plaistered, grows narrow, and is not above 15 Feet in Height. However, after one has pass'd Sha-bu-kew in 40 deg. 19 min. which is the Place the Russians come to directly from Selingbinskoi, it is cas'd on the outside with Brick; some of its Towers also are very large, and built of Brick, on a Foundation of Stone; but it does not always continue the same. The River Whang-bo, which has Centry-Boxes along its Banks, where Soldiers keep Guard day and night, supplies the Place of the Great Wall towards the Borders of Shan-si and Shen-si.

Beyond the Whang-bo, Westward, in the Province of Shen-si, the Wall is only of Earth, low, narrow, and sometimes of Gravel (for it stands in a gravelly Country) and in some Places quite ruined. But then the Entrance is defended by several considerable Cities, as Yu-ling-byen, in 38 deg. 18 min. Ning-hya, (p) 18 deg. 32 min. 8 sec. Lyang-chew (q) in 37 d. 59 m. Kan-chew, in 39 deg. Su-chew and Si-ning, at which Places General Officers are posted with Bodies of Troops. He who resides at Kan-chew is the Generalissimo, whom they name Ti-tu; the rest are only Lieutenant-Generals called Tsong-ping.

Ning-hya is the best of these Cities; it is handsomer, richer and better built than most Cities of the Empire: It is also pretty large; for taking in both the Inclosures, that are inhabited, it is at least 15 Chinese Li in Compass. The Industry of the Inhabitants has rendered the Country about it fertile; for by means of Canals and Sluices which they have made, they can convey the Waters of the Whang-bo into the Lands when they stand in need of Moisture. There are Salt-springs in the Ditches of the Town, from which they make Salt. Here are also Manufacturies of Woollen Goods and Carpets, after the Turkish Fashion. The Mountains are so high and almost perpendicularly steep in the District of Ning-hya, that 7 or 8 Leag. from the City they serve instead of the Great Wall, for the Space of about 10 Leagues. Su-chew, which lies in 39 d. 45 m. 40 f. is a pretty large City; but not equal to Ning-hya, either for Beauty or Trade, tho' it commands the Garrison at Hya-yu-quan, (thro' which the Road lies to Hami) and several Districts of the Kalka Tartars.

The Wall in these Parts is only of Earth, but kept in better Repair than elsewhere, because of the Neighbourhood of the People of Hami, who have submitted to the Emperor within these few Years. The Walls of Hya-yu-quan are not of Brick, but they are well guarded with Soldiers who defend this important Pass.

The Wall ends when you have pass'd the little City Chwang-lan, so named because it stands where two Roads meet, one whereof is in the Valley which goes by Lang-chew to Hya-yu-quan, and the other upon the Mountains which reach to Si-ning-chew; but instead of a Wall there is a pretty broad Trench dug on purpose, excepting in the narrow Passes near to Si-ning, which are walled like those in the Province of Shen-si. The City of Si-ning lying in 36 deg. 59 min. is not large, but exceeds Ning-hya in Trade. All the Furs that come from the Western Tartary, are sold in this Town, or in a neighbouring Borough called To-pa. This last Place is of more Worth than a large City, although it is neither well built nor well situated; for it abounds with almost all sorts of foreign as well as Chinese Commodities, and with various kinds of Drugs, as Saffron, Dates, Coffee, &c.

When P. Regis was at To-pa making the Map of that Country, he met with three or four Armenian Catholics, who kept Shop there, and sold beautiful Skins, which they fetched from Tartary. The Houses and Shops are much dearer in this Borough than in the City of Si-ning, which is but four

Leagues

(p) In the Table of Longitudes and Latitudes, it is put at 38 deg. 18 min. 8 sec. which agrees with the Map, so that 33 deg. 15 min. as in the French, must be a Mistake.

Leagues distant. It is remarkable, that it does not depend on the Mandarins of Si-ning, but on a Lama-Bonza (R), who is always one of the Race to which that Territory belongs. This Family is the most considerable of the Nation called Si-fan or Tu-fan, whereof I shall give a more ample Account hereafter.

The Emperors of the former Race, thinking to procure a more lasting Repose to the Nation, by making the Place, where they kept their Court, impregnable, had built a second Wall as strong and surprizing as the first, which still remains entire in Pe-che-li, 76 Li from Pe-king, at one of the principal Gates named Nan-kew 10 Leagues from thence, on the Side of a high Mountain, by which the Road leads to Swen-wba-fu, and from thence to Tay-tong in the Province of Sben-fi. This is a small City fortified with several Walls, that rise and fall according to the Surface of the Mountains whereon they are built, and surprize the Eye with the Boldness of their Structure.

This Wall, which is called the inner Great Wall, joins the other to the North of Pe-king, near Swen-wba-fu, where there is a Garrison; and is continued along the Western Part of the Province of Pe-che-li, extending into that of Sben-fi, where it is fallen to ruin in several Places. Among the Plans of Cities inserted towards the middle of this Volume, there is one Part of the Great Wall on the Side of Yong-ping-fu.

When we consider the Number of strong Places and Forts built between these two Walls, with the other Works on the Eastern Side, we cannot but admire the Care and Efforts of the Chinese, who seem to have made use of all the Means, which human Forecraft could suggest, for the Defence of their Kingdom, and for preserving the publick Tranquility.

Of the People named SI-FAN, or TU-FAN.

FOR the better understanding what I am going to relate, it is necessary to call to mind what I only just mentioned before, viz. that the little Town of Chwang-lan stands as it were at the meeting of two Valleys; whereof one goes towards the North as far as the Gate of the Great Wall, called Hya-yu-quan, the Space of above a hundred Leagues; and contains three great Cities, Lan-chew, Kan-chew, and Su-chew, with several Forts belonging to them. The other Valley extends Westward above twenty Leagues to Si-ning, and is full also of little Forts, which are subject to that City, and render the Chinese absolute Masters of the plain Country; but they are not so of the Mountains, which are inhabited by a Nation different from the Chinese, who lie to the South of them, as well as from the Tartars, who are to the North.

The Chinese distinguish this Nation into two sorts of People; they call one sort He Si-fan, or black Si-fan; and the other Whang Si-fan, or yellow Si-fan: Not that the one is whiter than the other, for they are in general a little swarthy, but because their respective Tents are of those Colours.

The black
Si-fan.

The black Si-fan have also some pitiful Houses, but are very uncivilized. They are governed by petty Chiefs who depend on a greater. Those whom P. Regis saw were dressed like the Inhabitants of Hami: The Women wore their Hair parted into Tresses hanging down on their Shoulders full of little brass Mirrors.

The yellow
Si-fan.

The yellow Si-fan are subject to certain Families, whereof the eldest is made a Lama, or Tartarian Bonzas, and wears a yellow Habit, which may probably be another reason, for the Chinese Distinction of Black and Yellow Si-fan. These Lamas, who are of the same Family and govern in their respective Districts, have the Power of deciding Causes, and punishing Criminals. They inhabit the same Canton, but in separate Bodies, and without forming large Villages. Their usual Way is to make little Hamlets, consisting of six or seven Families of the same Kindred; which appear like little Camps, or Syau-in, as they are called in the modern Chinese Books of Geography.

The greater Number of them dwell in Tents; but some have their Houses built with Earth, and a few of Brick. They want none of the Necessaries of Life. They have numerous Flocks of Sheep; their Horses indeed are but small, but well shaped, mettlesome and strong.

The Lamas, who govern these People, don't make them uneasy, provided they render them certain Honours, and punctually pay the Dues of Fo, which are very trifling (S). The Armenians who were at To-pa, seemed very well pleased with the Lama, who is Lord of the Place, and was not then above 25 or 26 Years of Age. Far from vexing his Subjects, he only took from each Family a very small Tribute, in Proportion to the Quantity of Land it possessed.

Their Language.

There is said to be some Difference in the Language of these two sorts of Si-fan; but as they understand each other well enough to trade together, it is probable that they differ only as Dialects of the same Language.

The Books and Characters used by their Chiefs, are those of Tibet, which is the Country of the great Lama. Neither of these two Nations are more than half subject to the neighbouring Chinese Mandarins, before whom they rarely appear when cited: and indeed for the most part they don't

(R) Or a Tartarian Bonza, as he is termed towards the Beginning of the next Article, to distinguish these from the Chinese Bonzas or Priests, who yet profess the same Religion.

(S) These Dues I take to be a kind of Tythes, as being exacted on a Religious Account.

don't regard their Citations. It seems, the Mandarins dare not treat them with Rigour, or offer to force them to Obedience, the Mountains they inhabit, whose Tops are covered with Snow even in July, sheltering them against all Pursuits. Nay, as they have the Disposol of the Rhu-harb, which grows in abundance on their Lands, they are courted by the Chinese, who readily leave them in Possession of so frightful a Country, provided they can procure from them the Commodity in the Condition which they require it. They have Customs and Ceremonies very different from the Chinese: For instance, 'tis usual with them to present a large white Handkerchief of Cotton or Taffety, when they go to wait upon the Persons whom they mean to honour. They have also some Customs like those found among the Kalka Tartars, and others which resemble the Customs of the Tartars of Kokonor.

Customs and Manners.

The present Government of the Si-fan, or Tu-fan, is very different from what it was formerly. They have not now one Town in their Possession, and are pent up between the Rivers Ya-long and Yang-tse-kyang, whereas anciently, their Kingdom was well peopled, fortified, and very powerful.

Dominions.

It appears from the Chinese Geographers of the middle Age, from the History of the Provinces of Sben-fi and Se-chwen, and by the great Annals Nyen-i-she, that they had a very large Dominion, and Princes of great Reputation, who both made themselves formidable to their Neighbours, and cut out some Work even to the Emperors of China. On the East-side they not only possessed divers Territories, which at present belong to the Provinces of Se-chwen and Sben-fi, but also pushed their Conquests so far into China as to subdue several Cities of the Rank of Chew, whereof they formed four great Governments: Westward they were Masters of all the Countries from the River Ya-long, to the Borders of Cashmir.

In the seventh Century, Ki-tson, King of the Tu-fan, possessed this vast Dominion, and had several Kings his Tributaries, to whom he sent Patents and Seals of Gold. Having form'd the Plan of an Alliance with China, in the Time of the Emperor Tay-tsong of the Dynasty of Tang, one of the greatest Princes that Monarchy ever had, he sent a most famous Embassy to that Prince, who, pleased with his Politeness, received and dismissed the Ambassadors with the greatest Marks of Honour and Distinction.

History of the Si fan
AN. CHRIS.

Ki-tson, upon this Encouragement, by a second Embassy demanded a Princess of the Imperial Blood, for his Son Long-tsang. The Emperor's Council, looking on this as a very bold Proposal, rejected it with Scorn, without so much as deigning to deliberate on it. Long-tsang succeeding to the Throne on the Death of his Father, came at the Head of 200,000 Men to demand the Princess; and having defeated certain Princes Tributary to China, who opposed his Passage, he penetrated to the Borders of Sben-fi, where the Emperor then kept his Court. The Imperial Council depended on the Resistance of those Princes, because all the other Roads were impracticable to a numerous Army.

After these first Successes, Long-tsang sent one of his Officers with a proud and haughty Letter, which he wrote to the Emperor; wherein he demanded that the Princess should be immediately delivered up to him, with a certain Quantity of Gold, Silver, and Silks, which he said were due to the Husband of a Princess of the Imperial Blood, who came to receive her in Person with so much State and Magnificence.

The Emperor, offended at such a Demand, immediately sent Orders to his Troops on the Frontiers to assemble, and to gain Time, he amused the Envoy with Hopes, giving him every Day a sumptuous Entertainment: But as soon as he understood that the Imperial Army was ready to march, he dismissed the Envoy with Disgrace, and without returning any Answer to the Letter of the King his Master.

The General Hew-byen-tsi set out at the same time, and as soon as he had joined the Army, he attacked that of Long-tsang, and routed it. However the Loss was not so considerable on the Prince's Side, but that, after having rallied his Troops, he found himself in a Condition to give the Emperor Uneasiness; for which Reason, as he promised to retire, in case the Princess was sent him with an Equipage suitable to her Dignity, the Emperor's Council were of Opinion, that he should give his Consent: Accordingly the Princess set out with a great deal of Pomp, and after the Ceremonies of Marriage were over, Long-tsang retired, and became a faithful Ally. He was very serviceable to the Empire on divers Occasions; particularly when the General Alena usurped a Tributary Kingdom of China, Long-tsang aided the Emperor's General with all his Forces, fought himself in Person, and had a good Share in the Victory by killing the Rebel.

Ki-li-so, who succeeded Long-tsang, did nothing to disturb the Peace which he had with the Empire and all his Neighbours: On the contrary, he studied only to continue it, by the Treaties which he made with different Nations of Tartars, and especially with the Wbey-be. This Prince died without any Issue, leaving his Kingdom equally powerful in domestick Forces and foreign Alliances.

696.

The Wbey-be Tartars.

Su-fi, his next Heir and Successor, was of a more warlike Genius; he was call'd in with his Tartarian Confederates, and some other Allies of the Empire, to assist the Emperor Wben-tsong, obliged at that Time to quit his Court at Chang-gan (the City at present called Si-ngan) and abandon it to the Rebels headed by the General Gan-lo-shan.

The next Heir to the Crown, who called them in, had promised them great Rewards, if they gained the Victory. He kept his Word with them, and besides giving them the Plunder of certain rebellious Cities, and among the rest that of Lo-yang, which was very rich, he made them Presents of great Quantities of Silks and the choicest things that China produced.

But

But whether dissatisfied with those Presents, or grown more haughty and enterprising from the Proof they had given of their Strength, or prompted by Policy to take an Advantage of the Weakness of an Empire exhausted by so many civil Wars; as soon as they heard of the Emperor's Death, they set forward with a formidable Army, and made such incredible Haste, that they were arrived on the Frontiers of the Empire, before there was the least Surmise of their Irruption.

The Governors of Ta-chin-quan, Lan-chew, and all the Country of Ho-si-tu, were surprized, and forced to surrender. The News being brought to Court by some that had fled, he who was then at the Head of Affairs, at first could scarce believe it. However, as he had the Wisdom to provide against the worst, he ordered the most experienced general Officer, then at Court, to depart at the Head of 3000 Horse to learn the Truth.

Ko-tsey, (for that was the General's Name) was scarcely arrived at Hyen-yang, a City not far from the Court, when he received Information that the Enemy's Army, consisting of 300,000 Men, would be there that very Day. He dispatched immediately a Courier to the Minister, to press him for Succours, without which it was impossible for him with such a Handful of Men, to oppose the Tu-fan, who were ready to fall upon the City where the Emperor resided.

The Minister did not stir a Step faster. Mean time the Generals of the Enemy, who knew the Country, were no sooner arrived at Hyen-yang, than they detached a considerable Body of Troops to possess themselves of a Bridge on the River, where the rest of the Army arrived next Day in good Order.

The Emperor, from whom they had till then concealed the Danger he was in; was so confounded with the News, that he abandoned his Palace and fled: The great Men of his Court, the Officers and People all followed his Example. Thus the victorious Army entered the Palaces of the Emperor and the Princes, without Resistance, where they found immense Riches, which they carried away, and then set both the Palaces and the City on fire in different Places.

Ko-tsey had retired with his 3000 Horse, that he might join the Troops, which, on the first Alarm, left Chang-gan; By means of that Reinforcement he saw himself presently at the Head of 40,000 Men; and in order to supply by Policy what he wanted in Strength, he had recourse to the following Stratagem. He ordered a Detachment of Horse, commanded by one of his best Officers, to encamp on the neighbouring Hills, and there, ranging themselves in one Line, to make a dreadful Noise with their Drums, and to light up great Fires every Night in different Parts of the Camp, in View of the Enemy. This Artifice succeeded; for the Tu-fan fearing to be surrounded and overpowered by the united Forces of the Empire, conducted by a General of known Bravery and Experience, returned towards the West, and blocked up the City of Fong-tsyang.

Ma-lin, who commanded in that District, came to the Relief of the Place, and forcing his way thro' a Body of the Enemies Troops, whereof he killed above 1000, threw himself into the Town. As soon as he was entered, he caused all the Gates to be opened, to let the Enemy see he did not fear them. This extraordinary Conduct astonished the Tu-fan, and confirm'd them in their first Suspicions, that there was some Ambuscade prepared to surprize them. Besides, said they, as this General seems not to value his Life, it will cost us dear before we can take the Town, and considering how much weakened we are already, by the Fatigues we have undergone, how shall we be able to withstand an Army perhaps more numerous than our own, and composed of fresh Troops? Hereupon they resolved to retire, contenting themselves with the Spoil they had already gain'd; and by their Retreat gave the Chinese time to repair the Royal City of Chang-gan, whither the Emperor returned some Months after he had quitted it in so shameful a Manner.

Tartars, invade China.

These Troubles were no sooner over, than the Chinese were obliged to take the Field against a new Rebel called Pu-kü, who entered into Confederacy with the Wbey-be Tartars; but he being taken very opportunely off by a sudden Death, the Chinese had the Address to dis-unite the two Nations, by fomenting a Jealousy betwixt them, about the chief Command.

To-ko-lo, who commanded the Wbey-be, would needs be nominated General of the whole Army. This the Tu-fan opposed, as a thing contrary to the Orders they had received from the King their Master, and dishonourable to their Kingdom, which was much superior to the little State possessed by those Tartars. The Chinese Generals, who were encamped in their View, secretly supported the Pretensions of To-ko-lo, and at length joined him. Hereupon the Tu-fan were attacked as they were marching off, and lost 10,000 Men in their Retreat. The King of the Tu-fan meditated how to retrieve his Losses, and being informed that the Wbey-be were retired much dissatisfied with the Chinese, he sent his Army to besiege Ling-chew; the Governor of which City and its District, having but few Troops, carefully shunned an Engagement on such unequal Terms.

The Course he took was to put himself at the Head of 5,000 Horse, and turning suddenly towards the Magazines of the Besiegers, not only burnt them, but carried off all the Spoil which they had taken, with part of their Baggage. This Loss obliged the Tu-fan to retire in Haste to their own Territories. They remained 5 Years without Action, and only thought of Preparations for a new War; but then brought a formidable Army into the Field, which dividing into two Bodies, fell almost at the same time on the Districts of King-chew and Ping-chew.

These numerous Troops easily defeated several Bodies of the Imperial Forces; the brave Ma-lin, who before had driven them from Fong-tsyang, had the same Fate as the other Generals; but at last the General Ko-tsey routed them intirely, by an Ambuscade which he laid for them in their Passage.

This Defeat disposing the King of Tu-fan to Peace, he sent an Embassy to China, more numerous than magnificent; the Ambassador having no less than 500 Men in his Retinue. The Emperor peror to mortify him detained him a long time at Court, without either giving him Audience, or dismissing him. The King of the Tu-fan was greatly incensed at so disagreeable a Reception of his Embassy, and was preparing to take Revenge, when the Emperor happened to dye.

One of the first Cares of his Son Te-tsong, who succeeded him, was to deliberate about the manner of dismissing the Ambassador and his Train. The Course he took was quite different from that of his Predecessor: he feasted the principal Persons of the Embassy, gave them and their Followers rich Habits according to their several Ranks, loaded them with Presents, and sent them back, under the Conduct of one of his Officers, named Wey-ling, who had Orders to justify the final Regard which had been paid to his Ambassadors, by laying the Fault on their bad Conduct, and their having too numerous a Retinue.

Wey-ling, contrary to his Expectation, was received not only with Honour, but also with a Magnificence that surprized the Emperor, and gave him an Esteem for this Court. He had his Expences defrayed, and was sent back with an Ambassador loaded with rich Presents to the Emperor, with an Assurance, that he would never do any thing for the future that might break the good Understanding which he desired to maintain with the Empire: So that the Court not doubting the Sincerity of this Reconciliation, was too easily persuaded that there was nothing more to fear from the Tu-fan.

In the mean time this King dying, Tsang-to his Successor was no sooner in the Throne, than he ordered his Army to take the Field and enter Sben-fi, which they did without being discovered; and defeated all the Imperial Troops they met with till they arrived at the City Kyen-ching, called at present Kyen-yang.

The Chinese Court was alarmed upon this; but the General Li-ching, seeing the Consequences of this Invasion, thought he ought not to wait for the Emperor's Orders; he therefore began his March with all his Troops joined to those of the Province, and coming up with the Enemy as they were on the point of besieging the City, he obtained so compleat a Victory, that he forced them to sue for Peace, which was granted on Condition they should swear to the Terms, as soon as one of the Lords of the Emperor's Court arrived, with full Powers to adjust Matters amicably, and ratify them in his Name by Oath, which was done accordingly: But their treacherous Designs were soon discovered. Some of their Officers who desired the Continuation of the War, endeavoured to seize the Emperor's Envoy and carry him to their Camp. Indeed the General disowned having any Hand in the Matter, and the Envoy imagined he had gained a great Point in his Negotiation with the Chiefs of the Enemy's Army, by prevailing with them to return home, without doing any Damage to the Subjects of the Empire.

This first Expedition not having the Success which the King of the Tu-fan had promised himself, he prepared for a second, and raised an Army strong enough to oppose both the Whey-be Tartars, (who had newly made an Alliance with the Emperor) and the Chinese. At first they took some considerable Forts which lay in their Road, and having possessed themselves of Gan-fi, advanced to Pe-ting, which lies to the South of Ning-hya; where they were surprized and defeated by the Whey-be. Nevertheless, far from retiring, they continued their March towards the Court, with incredible Boldness and Intrepidity; but soon after, when they least expected it, the General Wey-kau fell on them, cut in pieces those Bodies which were drawn up in Order of Battle, carried off 50 of their * Camps, and pursued them as far as the Frontiers. At the same time he dispatched an Officer to the King of Tun-nan, to persuade him to come and join him with all his Force; but that Prince refused for fear of drawing so formidable an Enemy upon himself.

After this Victory, Wey-kau proposed to the Emperor a Method to hinder the IncurSIONS of the Tu-fan; which was to build certain Cities or Fortresses on the Western Frontiers. The Court followed his Advice, and Orders were given to build four in the District of Ning-yang-fu, in the Province of Sben-fi, viz. Tang-ka, Ho-tau, Mu-pu and Ma-ling.

This Precaution was useless; for scarce were these Towns finished, when the Tu-fan returned as usual, and at length took the City Lin-chew, which they had before attempted several times in vain. The General Wey-kau did not give them time to repair their Breaches, before he appeared with his Army, at the Sight of which the Tu-fan abandoned the City, and marched towards Wey-chew in the Province of Se-chuen, which was one of the best Places they had. Wey-kau pursued them, and finding they fled continually before him, he resolved to besiege Wey-chew.

This News startled the King of the Tu-fan, who immediately sent Lun-mang his Prime Minister with considerable Succours. Wey-kau being informed of this, marched out of his Lines to meet the Enemy, defeated the Army of the Prime Minister, and obliged him to surrender himself Prisoner: Immediately after this Victory, he had Admission into the City, which he resolved to make a Place of Arms, and went to besiege the Fortress of Quen-min-ching, but he was baffled there, through the Bravery of the Governor, who made a glorious Resistance.

Wey-chew was one of the Royal Cities, and the Kings of Tu-fan, since the Time of Ki-lo-so, resided there one part of the Year. So that the first thing King I-tay, who succeeded his Brother, did, was by all possible Means to recover it. With this View he levied an Army of 150,000 Men, and sent to besiege it.

On the Report of the March of this Army, the Chinese General threw himself into the City, where he sustained a Siege for 25 Days, and defended it bravely, against the continual Assaults of the Enemy; but the Succours which he expected not arriving, and seeing himself reduced to Extremity, he was at length constrained to surrender.

The Tu-fan, puffed up with their Conquest, advanced towards Ching-tu-fu, the Capital of the Province of Se-chuen. The Chinese General, who with the few Troops he commanded, was unable able to oppose their March, spread a Report that he was gone to possess himself of the Defiles of the Mountains through which they had passed, and caused his little Army to make all the necessary Motions to induce them to believe, that this was really his Design. In effect they were so convinced of it, that for fear of having their Retreat cut off, they contented themselves with executing the principal Order of their Prince, and retired to Wey-chew.

I-tay was a Prince naturally mild, peaceable and full of Tendernefs for his People: As he began the War for no other End, than to recover a Place which had been taken from his Predecessor, as soon as his Troops were returned, he sent to acquaint the Generals posted on the Frontiers of the Empire, that he was willing they should live in Peace, and to convince them his Intentions were sincere, he published an Order, which enjoined all his Officers to act only on the Defensive.

The Cbinefe on their Side behaved with great Generosity on several Occasions. Si-ta-mew, a Tu-fan by Nation, and Governor of Wey-chew, offered to deliver up that Place to Li-ti-yeu, who commanded the Cbinefe Troops on the Frontiers of the Empire. The other Officers were almost unanimously of Opinion, that the Offer ought to be accepted, but Ni-u-fan, one of the principal among them, opposed it strongly.

"A great Empire like ours, said he, ought to prize sincere Dealing more than the Possession of a Town. If we break the Peace first, we shall authorize all the former Perfidies of the Tu-fan, and the Complaints we have made of them would thenceforth be unjust; for whatever they do for the future, either by plundering or ravaging our Frontiers, will be justified by our own Example". The rest yielded to his Reasons, and it was concluded to reject the Offers of the Governor. I-tay took the Opportunity which the Peace afforded him, to govern his Subjects by new Laws, and advanced none to Employments but Men of the greatest Merit. If he was informed of any Person who was remarkable for his Knowledge, and Application to Study, he preferred him to those who were equally experienced in the Management of Affairs. Having heard of one among the Literati of great Reputation named (c) Sbang-pi-pi, and who had no other Recommendation but that of his great Abilities, he sent for him to Court from the farthest Part of the Kingdom; being desirous to examine him himself, and hear him discourse on different Subjects, he was so well satisfied of his Qualifications, that he made him Governour of the City and District of Chen-chew, at present Si-ning.

Notwithstanding all that Sbang-pi-pi could do, in representing that he was fit for nothing but Books, that such a Post required a martial Genius, and that at the Age of 40, it was too late to serve an Apprenticeship to State Affairs, the King ordered him to accept of the Government, and take Possession of it without Delay. That Prince who by the Wisdom and mildness of his Sway, had gained the Hearts of all his Subjects, dying without Issue, Ta-mo, who was nearest of Blood to the Throne, was readily acknowledged by the States, as lawful Successor.

This Prince gave himself up wholly to his Pleasures; he lived in Peace with all his Neighbours, but his Passions together with the Violences and Cruelties he committed, rendered him so odious to his Subjects, that they left their Country in Crowds, to free themselves from his continual Oppressions. In short, he was the first Cause of this Kingdom's falling to decay.

The Distractions encreased much more after his Death; for as he neither left any Children, nor had nominated a Successor, one of the Ministers, gained by the Widow Queen, caused the Son of Pay-va, her Favourite, and one of the greatest Lords of the Kingdom, to be proclaimed King.

On the first Report of this Election, Kye-tu-na, first Minister of State, hastened to the Palace and opposed it. "If the Royal Family is not extinct, cry'd he, is it not a Crime to chuse a King elsewhere?" But his Zeal cost him his Life, for they killed him as he was returning home.

This Conduct of the Court lost them the Hearts of all the People; who were still more incensed, when they understood that the new King was no more than a Child of 3 Years old, whose Name would be only of Use to authorize all the Proceedings of the Favourite; but at last the Queen's Party was so powerful at Court, that they were constrained to comply and acknowledge this young Prince with the usual Ceremonies.

When this News arrived at the Army, which was then near the Frontiers, the great General, Lü-kong-je, refused the Orders that were sent him by the Court, and even conceived Thoughts of making himself King.

He was a Man of boundless Ambition, proud, full of his own Merit, extremely passionate, and often cruel; but on the other hand, he was brave, skilful, and capable of the greatest Undertakings. So without hesitating, he laid hold of this Opportunity to ascend the Throne. He first caused a Report to be spread, that he was preparing to revenge the Royal Family, by extirpating the Usurpers of the Crown: And having augmented his own Army with fresh Troops, marched directly against that of the new King, which he defeated. He also took and plundered Wey-chew, and being joined by a great Number of Officers and Malecontents, he found himself at the Head of 100,000 effective Men. The first Step he made, was to bring the Governors of the Provinces into his Measures.

Sbang-pi-pi was one of the Principal, and in great Reputation among the Soldiery. Ever since King I-tay had made him Governor of Chen-chew, he had apply'd himself with such Assiduity to discipline his Troops, (by making them exercise frequently, and teaching them the various Stratagems of War) that they were reckoned the best in all the Kingdom.

(c) Orig. Cham-pi, where, as in many other Places, the Portuguese Orthography seems to be retain'd thro' Inadvertency.

Lu-kong-je was willing to found him first, and after writing him a deceitful Letter, advanced towards the City. Shang-pi-pi who saw thro' the General's Design, resolved to cross it, and to deceive him in his Turn, wrote him so modest an Answer, that Lu-kong-je did not doubt but he had gained him over to his Side.

Immediately after the Departure of the Courier, Shang-pi-pi began his March with all his Troops, and made such Haste, that he arrived almost as soon as his Letter. That Instant he attacked the Army of Lu-kong-je, which was much stronger than his own, and as this General was surprized and unprovided, he was defeated without any Difficulty.

Lu-kong-je after rallying the rest of his Troops retired, much enraged in his Heart. He saw plainly, that Shang-pi-pi would be a great Obstacle to his ambitious Views, and the more so, as he had given out in his Government, that if they could not have a King of the Royal Blood, it would be better to submit to the Emperor of China, than to favour the Ambition of a rebellious Subject.

Lu-kong-je having recruited his Army, imagin'd the way both to regain his Authority and win the Affections of his Nation, was to enter the Chinese Territories, and give them up to be plundered. He had some Success at the Beginning, but was quickly beaten by the Chinese Generals, who afterwards took from the Tu-fan, the City of Yen-chew and several Fortresses.

Lu-kong-je was no way dismayed at these Losses; he imagin'd that if he was once sole Master of the Kingdom, it would not be difficult to repair them; for which Reason, he bent all his Thoughts on reducing Shang-pi-pi. He had augmented his Army with new Recruits, and with the Tartars, who were old Allies of the Tu-fan, to whom he had promised the plundering of the Frontiers of China. Thus he began his March, and arrived near Chen-chew with a formidable Army.

Shang-pi-pi, without taking too many Men out of his City, had fortified his Camp near the River, on the first News of the Enemy's Approach. But Lu-kong-je, attacked and forced him to abandon it; he passed the River, broke down the Bridge, and followed the Enemy Step by Step on the other Side. And tho' he beheld the Spoil and Ravages that Lu-kong-je made on his Territories, with a Design to draw him to a general Battle, yet he never suffered his Soldiers to cross the River, not so much as to skirmish with the Enemy. The natural Brutishness of Lu-kong-je and his bad Temper, which encreased by the small Success of his Enterprizes, rendered him so insupportable to his Soldiers, that they deserted in Troops to Shang-pi-pi, who received them kindly, and form'd them into new Companies.

The Tartars on their Side, who could no longer bear such an intolerable Yoke, and saw into the ambitious Design of the General, retired. In short, the Desertion, which encreased daily more and more, frightend Lu-kong-je to such a Degree, that he gave himself for lost, and despairing of Success, thought he could not do better, than surrender to the Emperor of China on certain Conditions. Accordingly he departed for the Court, and treated with his Imperial Majesty. Though he could not obtain all his Demands, he pretended to be satisfied, and retired to Ko-chew, a Chinese City, where he lived at ease the Remainder of his Life.

While the ambitious Lu-kong-je was Master of almost the whole Forces of the State, the Princes of the Blood retired into different Parts of the Kingdom, where they had small Patrimonies, tho some of them took Shelter in certain Forts that belong'd to them towards Se-chuen, resolving rather to submit to the Emperor of China, than to an Usurper. Others fortify'd themselves in their Mountains, while some of the most considerable remain'd in the Territories they possess'd, bordering on the Government of Shang-pi-pi. Hence arose an infinite Number of Distractions in the State, which neither the Wisdom and Valour of that General, nor his Successor, were able to appease; and which was the Ruin of this Monarchy at last.

When the Tu-fan, divided into different Parties, were weary of fighting, many Officers and Soldiers joined themselves to Pan-lo-chi, Prince of Liu-kü, a Place in the Borders of the District of 951 Chen-chew, which the Children of Shang-pi-pi had preserved for their Nation. As soon as they beheld a Chief of the Royal Blood, they quickly formed an Army, and to retrieve the Honour of their Country by some glorious Exploit, resolved to attack the King of Hya.

This new King, who was a Tartar, originally of Tu-pa, which is still in the Possession of the Tu-fan, had founded a Dominion in Spight of the Chinese, near the Whang-bo, the Capital whereof 1003 Hya or Khya, was Hya-chew, call'd at present Ning-bya; from which City the new Kingdom took the Name of Hya.

The Tu-fan had much assisted this Prince in his Enterprize; but they alledged that their Services were ill requited, and that their Complaints had been rejected with ill Treatment from the Ministers of the new State; for which Reason, seeing themselves re-united under one of their own Princes, they design'd to be revenged of them for their Ingratitude.

The King of Hya, who was the Founder of this little Monarchy, was named Li-ki-tsyen; he had renewed the War with the Empire, at that Time govern'd by the Imperial Family of the Song; entring suddenly with a numerous Army into the Western Part of Shen-si, which bordered 1003 on the small Dominion that the Tu-fan were still possess'd of.

Pan-lo-chi offer'd to join the Chinese Commander with his Forces, to destroy this growing Power, provided the Emperor would honour him with a Title that might give him more Authority among those of his own Nation. The Emperor liked the Proposal, and sent him Patents as Governor General of the Tu-fan.

The King of Hya, who knew nothing of these private Contracts, after making some Ravages, besieged the Town of Si-lyang, and taking it, put the Governor to Death; he thought to push his Conquest farther, believing that Pan-lo-chi was coming to join him with his Army, to favour his Designs.

Designs. But that Prince having, at the Head of 60,000 Horse, come up with the King of Hya in a few Days, attack'd him with so much Valour, that he entirely defeated his great Army; however, being wounded in the Battle he dyed soon after the Victory.

So-tfo-lo his Successor bent his Thoughts on recovering the ancient Monarchy of his Ancestors. His little Dominion consisted only of 7 or 8 Towns, with some neighbouring Countrys. But he rely'd much on the experience and valour of his Troops, which were very well disciplined; he was in hopes also that the rest of the Tu-san wou'd join him and seek his Protection, when they shou'd see him powerful enough to defend them. He fix'd his Court at Tsong-ko-ching, where he established Officers the same both as to Number and Titles, that the Kings his Predecessors had. Afterwards levying new Forces in the Territories of Li-tsing-chin, Ho-chew, J-chwen, Tjing-tang and throughout all the Parts in general that remain'd to him of the ancient Dominions of the Tu-san, he entred the Territories of the Empire several Times, but was always beaten, and at length concluded a Peace.

The Enterprizes of the King of Hya gave him some uneasiness. That Prince's power encreas'd Daily, which swelled his Pride to such excess, that he had assumed the Title of Emperor: The Chinese Monarch was glad of having So-tfo-lo to oppose him, and to engage that Prince more firmly in his Interest, he made him Governor General of Pau-shun, which stood very conveniently for him. So-tfo-lo dying in the mean Time, the Division, which soon after ensued among his Children, hasten'd the intire ruin of the State of the Tu-san. That Prince had by his first Wife two Children, the one named Hya-chen, and the other Mo-chen-tsu: He had afterwards by a second Venter the Prince Ton-shen. This last Wife had so much influence and favour, that to render her Son more powerful, she perswaded her Husband to imprison his Children by the first, and oblige their Mother to turn Bonze. But they finding means to escape, and deliver their Mother out of the Monastery where she had been shut up, the People who assisted them in getting out of Prison, declared for them.

So-tfo-lo who had recovered from his infatuation approved of this Change, and permitted that Mo-chen-tsu shou'd live at Tsong-ko-ching which he gave him for his Maintenance, for he had removed his Court to Chen-chew. To Kan-ku his other Son he assign'd Hya-chen (D) for the Place of his abode. As to his third Son Ton-shen, who appear'd to him most capable of upholding his Family, he gave up to him all his Authority and the rest of his Dominions. Ton-shen resided at Li-tsing-chin, where he was equally beloved of his People and fear'd by his Neighbours: Inasmuch that all the Tu-san which dwelt to the North of the Whang-bo [or Yellow River] were intirely under his Subjection. Moreover the Emperor of China granted him the Government of the whole Country of Pau-shun, at the Request of So-tfo-lo, who surrendred it in his Favour.

This great Power wherewith the Younger was invested, gave Umbrage to the two Elder, and their Families, who were afraid of being one time or other oppress'd: Nevertheless they resumed Courage, asserting the Privileges of their Seniority, and by the precautions they took, died undisturbed in the Cities that fell to their Share.

Mu-ching, Son of Hya-chen, more uneasy than his Father at the Power of Prince Ton-shen, resolv'd to submit to the Emperor and deliver up to him Kan-ku, Ho-chew, and all the Land, which were in his Possession. As the City of Ho-chew was a Place of great importance for securing the Frontiers of the Empire, the Chinese Monarch received the Proposals of Mu-ching with joy, granting to him and his Posterity in general, whatever he demanded in order to live with Honour in the Empire.

Mo-chen-tsu had for his Heir his Son Kyau-ki-ting, who was much beloved in his little State, but did not survive his Father many Years. His Son Hya-cheng succeeded him: He was a passionate, violent and cruel Prince, whereby he so incens'd his Subjects, that they form'd a Design to depose him, and set up his Uncle Su-nan in his Stead. But the Plot being discovered, Su-nan and almost all his Accomplices were put to Death.

One of the Principal Officers, named Tsien-lo-ki, finding means to escape, carry'd with him Cbo-sa who was of the Prince's Family; and seizing the City of Ki-kü-ching, caus'd him to be proclaimed Prince of that petty State. But Hya-ching hastening thither with his Forces, took the Place, and put Cbo-sa to Death: while Tsien-lo-ki in the midst of all these troubles, found means again to escape to Ho-chew.

The General Van-chau, having been made Governor of this Place by the Emperor of China, Tsien-lo-ki perswaded him that the Conquest of the Country of Tjing-tang was very easy, and that if he had a mind he might make himself Master of it. Van-chau gave credit to him, and immediately attack'd the little City of Mo-chwen, which he took without any Difficulty. It was then that the Prince Hya-ching, seeing himself hated by his People, and vigorously attack'd by the Chinese, resolv'd to submit to the Emperor on advantageous Conditions. To this end he repaired himself to Van-chau, offer'd him all the Territories that belonged to him, and obtained his Demands. The Emperor ratify'd the Treaty and gave the Government of this District to Hü-tsong-cha.

The like happen'd to Long-fu (E) a Son of Mu-ching, whom one of the Chiefs of the Tu-san had put in Possession of the City of Hi-pa-wen. After several Battles fought with Van-chau, wherein wherein he distinguish'd himself by his surprizing Valour, being sometimes Conqueror and sometimes conquered, that Prince submitted upon advantageous Terms, which the Emperor ratified, and thereby all his Territories were re-united to the Empire.

The Family of the third Son of So-tse-lo continued longer in Splendor, but at length it was dispossessed of its Principality by the Mongols, who took the Name of Ywen and Ywen-chau, after the Conquest of China.

In the midst of the Troubles, which arose in the 12th Century between the Chinese Emperors of the Dynasty of the Song, and the Eastern Tartars, called Nu-che, who took the Name of Kin, the Family of Ton-shen made an Alliance with the Kings of Hya, and under their Protection enjoy'd their Territories pretty peaceably: But at length it was involved in the common Ruin by the victorious Founder of the Dynasty of the Ywen, whom our European Authors name Jingbiz-Khán, and the Chinese Cbin-ki-se-Han. (E)

The Year 1227, according to the Chinese History, is the Æra of the intire Ruin of the Tú-fan; from that Time they have remained in their ancient Country without either Name or Power, happy to live there in quiet. So true it is, that the Division of a Government almost always overturns the most flourishing Monarchies. The Tú-fan were always respected by their Neighbours, so long as they were united under Monarchs who were capable of governing them well.

Tho' the Form of the Government has been changed among the Tú-fan, their Belief has always continued the same. The Idolatry of Fo was the Religion of their Kings and Princes, as it is still that of the Chiefs of the Nation. The Lama Bonzas, and sometimes the Ho-shan Bonzas, had great Authority in their Courts: They even chose them to be Ministers of State, and on certain Occasions to command the Armies. Superstition has rather encreased among the Tú-fan since their Decline. Under the Emperors of the Ywen, the Lamas became so powerful, that the Tartar Families thought it was an Honour to have one of their Kindred among these Bonzas. 'Tis likely this introduced among the Tú-fan, who were then Subjects to the Ywen, the Custom of conferring on a Lama of the Family, the Power of Governing and Punishing.

This also has much contributed to their being so extremely devoted to Fo. Their Liberality is never shewn, unless it be in honouring this Idol, which they enrich by their Offerings. For they have Gold in some of their Rivers: And know pretty well how to work it, especially in making Vessels and little Statues.

The use of Gold is also very ancient among 'em: Since the Chinese Books mention that in the Reign of a certain Emperor of the Dynasty of the Han, an Officer having been sent to the Tú-fan, to complain of the Devastations made by some of their Chiefs with their united Forces, they endeavoured to pacify him, by offering him a Quantity of Gold Plate: But the Officer refused it, causing the Tú-fan to be told, that Rice in dishes of Gold did not relish with him.

Their Country is very Mountainous: Lying between the Rivers Whang-bo to the North, Ya-long to the West, and the Yang-tse-kyang to the East. Nevertheless, between these Mountains there are some fine Plains, which are like those of Se-chwen and Yun-nan, principally along the Banks of the great and beautiful River Ya-long: But there is neither Town nor Fortrefs to be met with any where, though there must needs be the remains of Cities, since it is certain there were some formerly in this Country. The Source of the Ya-long, which is both broad and deep, is between 34 and 35 deg. of latitude and 19 of longitude (F).

The Springs of the Yang-tse-kyang, which runs quite thro' China, are in the Country of the Tú-fan. The most famous which the oldest Chinese Books speak of, is named He-shwi, and lies below 33 deg. of lat. and in 15 of long. but it is called by the Tú-fan, Cbúnak, and comes from a Chain of Mountains, which they name Cbúrkála.

I thought fit to take particular notice of this, because the Chinese Books of Geography relate many falsehoods concerning the great River Yang-tse-kyang. These Authors wrote only from common Report, and at a Time when there was scarce any Correspondence with either Tibet or the Tú-fan.

Of the TARTARS of KOKO-NOR.

BEYOND Si-ning, without the Gates of the Great Wall, are the Territories of the Tartars of Koko-Nor. They are properly Eluths (G) by Nation: But since the Extinction of the Royal Family, denominated Ywen-chau, they inhabit to the West of China, along the Province of Se-chwen, between it and Tibet; they take their Name from a great Lake which the Chinese call Si-bay, that is, the Western Sea; and themselves in their own Language, Koko-Nol or Koko-Nor.

(E) P. de Halde passes slightly over this Part relating to the Destruction of the Power of the Si-fan and Si-hya, which yet is the most curious and interesting to us of all their History, as being connected with that of Jengbiz Khán; had that Jesuit or his Correspondents been fuller on this Head, we might have been able perhaps to have determined the Situation of Kara Katay, which we take to have been the Country possessed by the Emperors of Hya.

(F) It must be observed that the Longitude is always reckon'd from Pe-king, excepting where it is mention'd to be otherwise.

(G) Eluths or Altai: Of whom an Account is given in the 2d Volume.

Their Country is pretty large, extending from North to South above seven Degrees. 'Tis separated from China by Mountains, so high and steep, that they serve almost every where instead of the Great Wall. However, there are some Pieces of it to be seen towards the Openings of the Mountains, especially in those Places which are frequented by the Koko-Nor and other Strangers; for Instance, Tsong-fang-wey, where there are some Battalions under the conduct of a Tsong-ping, who has also other Troops in different Posts, which he disposes of as there is Occasion.

Commodities. The principal Merchandize of Tsong-fang-wey, is a sort of Woolen-stuff named Pu-lu, much like our Frize, but not above one fourth or fifth part of the Breadth. It is made by the Tartars of Koko-Nor and the Si-fan, who know very well how to dye it of all sorts of Colours. In the Country they often make long Habits of it, and at Pe-king they cover Saddles with it.

The Country of these Tartars, which borders on Se-chwen, is not contiguous to the Kingdoms of Pegu and Ava, called by the Chinese Myen (a) and Ya-wa, altho' these lie to the South of it (u); because there are frightful and inaccessible Mountains between, inhabited by Nations almost wholly unknown, and which by report of the Chinese of Yun-nan, their Neighbours, are very savage, being without either Laws or Government.

The most Northern of the Mountains bordering on the Koko-nor Tartars is called Nu-i; and the most Southern bounding Ava, in 25 Degr. 33 Min. Latitude, is named Li-se in that Part towards Yun-chang-fu.

The Entrances of these Mountains, which also make a good part of its western Limits, are fortified no more than those of Se-chwen; but considering the Country, they are sufficient for the Security of the State, and the Trade carry'd on with Ava, by Ten-ye-chew, a middling City, on which depends the guarding the Pass which is nearest, and most frequented by the Merchants.

There was still less Occasion for fortifying the Avenues of the Mountains to the South of Yun-nan and China, along the Confines of the Kingdoms of Laos (called by the Chinese Lau-Sbwa or Lau-se) and Tong-king; for besides that the Air of this Country is fatal to Strangers, it happens that most part of the Year it is uncultivated and wild, full of Rivers and dangerous Torrents; whence it is, that the Chinese traffic so little with either of those Kingdoms. Nevertheless P. Regis found some Traders at Yun-nan-fu, who had travelled as far as the Borders of both Countries; and whose Memoirs and Journals were serviceable to him in determining some Positions in the Southern Part of Yun-nan, proportioning their Stages to the Distances measur'd between the Places, thro' which they pass'd in making the Map of the neighbouring Cities.

The Chinese have extended their Dominions as far as these Tracts of inaccessible Mountains, which in a Course of such prodigious Length are interrupted only by great Rivers, and seem to have been design'd by Nature for the Bounds of some large Kingdom. They little regard the Complaints and Efforts of certain inconsiderable Nations, who remain shut up in this Enclosure, as we have observed of the Si-fan, who have been hemmed in by the Great Wall about Si-ning and Kya-yu-quan. Nevertheless the Conduct of the Chinese has not been the same towards these different Nations, as we are going to inform the Reader.

Of the Nation of the LO - LO.

Government.

THE Nation of the Lo-lo (1) ruled in Yun-nan, and was governed by different Sovereigns. The Chinese, after building some Forts and Cities in the little uncultivated Plains there, and fighting several Battles, resolv'd to gain these People, by conferring on their Lords for ever the Seals and all Honours of Chinese Mandarins, with the Title of Chi-fu and Chi-chew, &c. on condition, that they should acknowledge the Emperor, and be subject to the Governor of the Province in common Affairs, after the same Manner as the Chinese Mandarins of the same Rank: Moreover, that they should receive the Investiture of their Lands from the Emperor, and should not execute any Authority therein without his Consent; the Emperor on his Part obliging himself to invest the next Heir.

Language, Religion.

The Lo-lo are as well shaped as the Chinese, and more inured to Fatigue; they have a different Language, and a sort of Writing which seems to be the same as that of the Bonzas of Pegu and Ava. These have insinuated themselves with the most rich and powerful among the Lo-lo, who inhabit the northern Part of Yun-nan, and have there built huge Temples of different Structure from the Chinese; the Ceremonies, Prayers, and in short the whole religious Worship is the same as practis'd in Pegu.

The Lo-lo Lords are absolute Masters of their Subjects, and have a Right to punish even with Death, without waiting for the Answer of the Vice-Roy, much less that of the Court; so that they are obey'd with an incredible Readiness and Zeal. Any one thinks his Fortune made, if he is admitted to serve in the Palace; which Name those Edifices deserve better than a great many many Chinese Tribunals, as they are called in some Relations, which for the most part are kept in bad Repair and scarce habitable. The Lo-lo, who consider the Hall where they give Audience, and all the other Apartments, as their Estate, take care to beautify and keep them in good Condition.

(a) In the French it is faultily printed Mien.

(u) The Situation given the Koko-nor Tartars here does not agree with that assign'd them in the Map, where they are placed to the West of Shen-fu, and North of the Tu-fan or Si-fan, whose Country borders on Se-chwen.

(1) In the French it is written Lo-lu, but it must be consider'd that the l is added to distinguish the plural Number, the Chinese having no Words ending in s, for which Reason we have left it out to preserve the Propriety of the Name.

Besides the Officers of the Household, and others who serve quarterly, they have Captains, Forces. who command the Militia of the Country; one Part of which consists of Horse, the other of Foot, who are armed with Arrows, Spears, and often with Musquets.

Altho' the Horses of Yun-nan as well as Se-chwen are the least in all China, yet they are not Horses. the less esteemed on that Account; for they are not only of a beautiful Colour and well shaped, but are also strong, lively, and tractable.

The Mountains within their District must needs afford Mines of Iron and Copper, for Mines of Iron and Copper. they make their own Weapons. The Chinese sometimes carry them Arms, and often insinuating into the Houses of those Lords, enrich themselves at the Expence of their Subjects.

In short the Country abounds in all Sorts of Commodities, and affords Mines of Gold and Silver. Gold and Silver. The Habit of the Lo-lo consists in a pair of Drawers, a linnen Vest, that reaches no lower than the Knees, and a Straw Hat, or one of Rattan; they go with their Legs bare, and wear nothing but Sandals; the Lords wear the Tartar Habit, made of Satin or Damask; the Ladies over a long Gown, which reaches down to their Feet, wear a little Cloak which comes no lower than the Waist; it is in this Dress they ride on Horseback, even in performing the Marriage Ceremonies, or in the Visits they make, accompany'd by their Waiting Women on Horseback likewise, and their other Domesticks on Foot.

Concerning the Nation of the MYAU TSE.

THE Myau tse (κ) are dispersed thro' the Provinces of Se-chwen, Quey-chew, Hu-quang, Their Country. Qyang-shi, and along the Borders of Qyang-tong; under this general Name several People are comprehended. Most of them differ only in certain Customs, and a slight Variation of Language; such are the Myau-tse of Se-chwen, those to the West of Hu-quang, and those to the North of Quey-chew; they are more fierce and uncivilized than the Lo-lo, as well as greater Enemies to the Chinese.

To subdue them, or at least to bridle them, the Chinese have built large Forts and Towns, upon very disadvantageous Situations, with incredible Expence; but then by this means they have effectually secured the Quiet of the State, by cutting off all Communication among them, so that the most powerful of these Myau-tse are, as it were, block'd up by those Barriers.

Those of whom we speak are as absolute over their People as the Lo-lo; but as they have not Government. received the Dignity of Chi-fu, Chi-chew, &c. they are considered as subdued, provided they keep quiet: And in case they commit Acts of Hostility, either to be revenged of the Chinese, who are often troublesome Neighbours, or to shew their Bravery, wherein they picque themselves, believing they are better Horsemen than any other Nation, the Chinese are content to drive them back to their Mountains, without attempting to force them from thence. In vain the Vice-Roy of the Provinces cites them to appear even by Proxy, for they do just as they think proper.

One of these Myau-tse Lords, having been invited to a Meeting, where the Vice-Roy of Yunnan, Quey-chew, and Se-chwen, expected him accompany'd with two great Men of Pe-king, sent from Court to examine into the Complaints which one of the Governors had made of his Conduct, obstinately refused to come; whereupon the Grandees thought fit to dissemble, and treat with him by way of Negotiation.

These Lords have not only their Officers, like the Lo-lo, but they have also petty Lords under them; who, tho' Masters of their Vassals, are feudatory, and obliged to attend with their Troops when ordered. The Houses of these Lords are not inferior to the best belonging to the Chinese. Their usual Arms are the Bow and half Pike; their Saddles are well made, and differ from the Chinese, being narrower and higher, with Stirrups of painted Wood.

Their Horses are much esteem'd on account of their Swiftnes in climbing up and galloping Horses. down Mountains, as also for their Agility in leaping very wide Ditches. Those of them that are sold in these Parts cost an excessive Price.

The Great Mandarins receive them often as Presents from the Inferior, who buy them, dear as they are, to procure the Favour of their Protectors, or even of the Myau-tse Lords, when they live in good Understanding with them. The Chinese report surprizing and even incredible Things of these Horses.

One Thing which they tell is not altogether so, viz. That when Officers of the Army are to be chosen, they oblige the Candidates to leap their Horses over a Ditch, of a certain Breadth, with a clear Fire burning in it, and to order the Soldiers to ride full speed down the highest Mountains. In short, they relate many other things of the same Nature, wherein sup- posing posing them to be practicable by a few Heroes among them, the Actors run very dangerous Risks.

The Myau-tse who dwell in the Middle and Southern Part of Quey-chew differ from the former as to their Condition: For without stopping to give an Account of the various Names (1) given them by the Chinese of the Country, (which are the Names of the Colonies come from other Parts, or sent by the Emperors and Conquerors of this Province,) they may be divided into Myau-tse who are not subdued, and Myau-tse who are subdued.

are subdued.

These last are again divided into two Sorts, one obeying the Magistrates of the Empire, and making Part of the Chinese People, from whom they are distinguish'd only by a kind of Head-Dress, which they wear instead of the Bonnet, or Cap, commonly used by the Chinese.

The others have their Hereditary Mandarins, originally inferior Officers, who served in the Chinese Army of Hong-vu, on the Rise of the last Royal Family, and were in recompense made Masters, some of six, others of ten or more Villages conquered from the Myau-tse.

These new Masters were supported by the Garrisons placed in those advantageous Stations, where the Towns of that Province are seen at present. The Myau-tse accustom'd themselves by Degrees to the Yoke, so that now they look on their Mandarins, as if they were of their own Nation, and have conform'd to almost all their Customs. However, they have not yet forgot their Country; they talk of the Provinces and Towns they came from, and how many Generations have settled in the Province of Quey-chew. Most of them reckon 14, some 16; which agrees with the Ara of Hong-vu.

Altho' their Jurisdiction is but small, yet they do not want Riches. Their Houses are large, commodious, and kept in good Repair. They hear the Causes of their Subjects on the first Demand, and have Power to punish them, but not capitally. From their Tribunals, which have the Privilege only of the Cbi-byen, an Appeal lies to that of the Cbi-fu.

The People wrap their Heads in a Piece of Linnen, and wear nothing but a sort of Doublet and Breeches; but their Mandarins and their Domesticks are clothed like the Mandarins and Chinese of the Country, especially when they go to the City, to visit the Cbi-fu, or any other Mandarin.

Myau-tse who
dued.

It was from these Mandarins of the conquered Myau-tse, that the Missionaries, who were at work on the Map of those Provinces, got some Intelligence of the Myau-tse, who are not subdued, and possess above 40 French Leagues in the Province of Quey-chew near Li-ping-fu: For tho' they pass'd along their Country on the North and West Sides, in settling the Positions of the Chinese Towns and Places, where the Soldiers were posted all around, almost in sight of their Borders, yet they never saw one of them appear.

their Houses,

They told them that these unconquered Myau-tse, who are called by the Chinese Sing-Myau-tse or Ye-Myau-tse, that is, Wild Myau-tse, have Houses built of Brick, one Story high, and like those of the conquered Myau-tse. In the Ground-Floor they put their Cattle, as the Oxen, Cows, Sheep, and Hogs, for in those Parts one sees scarce any other Kinds of Animals, not even Horses. Hence it is, that their Houses are dirty and stinking, and that those who are not used to it, can hardly bear to lie in the upper Room. In effect, the Tartars choose rather to lodge in the miserable Cafens of the Soldiers, than in those Houses, which otherwise make a pretty good Appearance.

These Myau-tse are divided into Villages, and live in great Unity, altho' they are only govern'd by the Seniors of each Village. They cultivate their Lands, make Linnen, and a sort of Carpets, which serve them for Coverlets in the Night. This Linnen is not good, being like bad Muslin; but the Carpets are very well woven; some of them are made of Silk of different Colours, red, yellow, and green; others of raw Thread, made of a kind of Hemp, which they likewise dye. Their Habit is only a pair of Drawers, and a sort of Great Coat, which they fold over their Stomach.

The Chinese Merchants find Means, in all likelihood, by the procurement of the conquered Myau-tse Mandarins, to trade with the Wild Myau-tse, and buy the Woods of their Forests, which having cut down, and thrown them into a River that runs through the midst of their Country, the Chinese, who are a little lower on the other Side, receive and make great Floats of it; the Price of the Merchandize remains in the Hands of a Person agreed upon, and usually consists of a certain Number of Cows, Oxen, and Buffaloes; of the Skin of these Animals the Myau-tse make their Cuirasses, which they cover with little Plates of Iron or beaten Copper, which render them heavy, but very strong, and of great Use to these Nations.

Among the conquered Myau-tse there are some who have their Chiefs, but these Chiefs have not Power of judging Causes. They differ however from the Chinese, in that they dwell only in Villages, and never go into the City, unless on some very urgent Occasion.

Mu-lau, or Wood-Rats.

Those whom the Chinese call Mu-lau, that is, Rats of the Wood, and who dwell within 3 or 4 Leagues of the Posts of Yun-nan, throughout the Province of Quey-chew, are best apparell'd of all the Myau-tse in this Country. Their Habit is shaped like a Bag, with Sleeves wide at the Cuffs, and slit in two above the Elbow; underneath there is a Vest of a different Colour; the Seams are cover'd with the smallest Shells that are to be found in the Seas of Yun-nan, or the Lakes of the Country; the Cap and the rest of their Dress are much of a piece. The Cloth is made of coarse Thread twisted from a kind of Hemp and Herbs, unknown to us; they probably make Use of this Thread in working the Carpets already mention'd, which are woven sometimes all plain and of one Colour, sometimes in little Squares of divers Colours.

(1) P. de Halde would have done well to have given us the different Names by which these People are distinguish'd; such Notices are of great Use to Geography; and serve to prevent Mistakes, as to the Identity of a Nation, call'd by different Names in different Authors.

Among their Instruments of Musick, there is one composed of several Pipes inserted in a larger, which has a hole or kind of Reed into which they blow, the Sound whereof is more soft and agreeable than the Chinese Shin, which may be considered as a sort of little Hand-Organ, that must be blown with the Breath. Musical Instruments.

They know how to keep Time in Dancing, and express the gay, melancholy, &c. Airs very naturally; sometimes they play on a sort of Guittar; sometimes they beat an Instrument composed of two little Drums, one set against the other; afterwards they turn it upside down, as if they were going to throw it against the Ground and break it to pieces. Dancing.

These People have no Bonzas of the Religion of Fo among them, so that being free from this unhappy Obstacle, which is considerable with respect to the Chinese and Lo-lo, they may more easily embrace the true Religion; in Case they have not among them still worse Seducers, such as are certain Tartarian Jugglers, tho' we do not know that they entertain any. Religion.

In that Part of Hu-quang, next to the Province of Quang-tong and that of Quang-si, depending on Tung-chew-fu, are Myau-tse, still more uncivilized, altho' they are thought to acknowledge the Jurisdiction of the neighbouring Mandarins, and pay the Tribute, which they carry in what kind and when they please; for in certain Places they permit no Officer of the Chinese Tribunal to enter their Lands, and if he should, he would run the Risk of his Life. Myau-tse of Hu-quang.

They go barefooted, and by the Habit of running on their Mountains, their Feet become so callous that they climb the steepest Rocks, and pass over the most stony Grounds with incredible Swiftnefs, without receiving the least Inconvenience.

The Head Dress of the Women has something in it very odd and whimsical. They put on their Heads a piece of light Board above a Foot long, and five or six Inches broad, which they cover with their Hair, fastening it with Wax, so that they seem to have Hats of Hair; they can neither lean nor lye down but by resting on their Necks, and they are obliged to turn their Heads continually to the Right and Left, on the Roads, which in this Country are full of Woods and Thickets. Whimsical Head Attire.

The Difficulty is still greater when they would comb their Hair, for they must be whole Hours at the Fire to melt the Wax; after having clean'd their Hair, which Trouble they are at 3 or 4 times a Year, they fall to dressing it up again as it was before.

The Myau-tse think this Dress very charming, especially for young Women. The more elderly Sort don't take so much Pains, but content themselves with doing up their Hair on the Crown of the Head into knotted Tresses.

These Myau-tse are also called by the Chinese, Li-jin and Tau-tse. They have several other Names or rather Nick-names, for all the Names already mention'd, and many others, denote Contempt and Raillery, which the Chinese are not sparing of. Li-jin and Tau-tse.

Those whom they call Pa-chay and Lü-chay, the first on the Borders of Quang-tong, the latter on those of Quang-si, are however more fear'd than despised by their Chinese Neighbours of Hu-quang and Quang-tong; the first are so call'd, because the Number of their principal Villages is eight; and the latter, because they have six, which serve them for Intrenchments. Pa-chay and Lü-chay.

The Chinese have erected fortified Towns to the North, East, and West of those Countries, which seem to have been built for no other Purpose, than to hinder the Incursions of these petty Nations, for their Situation is very inconvenient. If to these Towns we add all the Forts that have been rais'd about their Territories, they will amount to more than twenty.

Some of these Forts have been abandon'd since the Accession of the present Family; however above one half of them are still kept on Foot, and pretty well garrison'd. These Myau-tse were wont to fall upon the Chinese; but the latter have at length got them to put one of their principal Men into the Hands of the neighbouring Mandarins, as a Security for their good Behaviour. Moreover they have bound themselves to give the Chinese no Disturbance, either because they intend to come and trade in their Cities, or do not care to leave their Mountains.

The Myau-tse of the Province of Quang-si are on another Footing. They exercise the Jurisdiction of the Chi-fu and Chi-hyen, &c. over their Subjects, by a Right which has been hereditary to them for many Centuries. They are originally Chinese; their Ancestors having followed the two Conquerors of these Countries and Tong-king, named Fu-pau and Ma-yuen. The first was Generalissimo of the Army sent by the Emperor Quang-vu-ti against the Rebels of the South and the Tong-kinese, who, taking advantage of the Troubles of the Empire, had seized on such Territories as they found convenient for them. Myau-tse of Quang-si.

The General Ma-yuen march'd against these last, drove them back within their ancient Bounds, and fill'd them with such Terror, that his Name, after 16 Centuries, is still fear'd among them. He caus'd a Pillar of Bra's to be erected on the Mountain, which serves for a Boundary, with these Chinese Words, Tong chü chi che kyo chi chi nye, which signifies that they should extirpate the Tong-kinese, if they pass'd the Brazen Pillar.

The Tong-kinese at present look upon this Inscription, which is one of the most ancient in China, as a Prophecy that indicates the Duration of their Monarchy, which is not to be destroy'd till the Brazen Pillar shall be quite consumed by Time; for which Cause they take great care to shelter it from the Injuries of the Weather, and inclose it with large Stones to render it more steady, believing, that by preserving it, they fix the Destiny of their Kingdom.

Ma-yuen left his Officers and brave Soldiers towards the Frontiers to secure the Conquests, and made them Masters of whatever he distributed among them. It is thus these Mandarins of the Myau-tse hold from the Beginning their Authority from the Emperor, to whom they are tributary; they have their Soldiers and Officers, nor do they want for Arms, which they either make in their own Mountains, or buy privately of the Chinese.

What is very grievous to these People is, that they are almost continually at War, and destroying one another; Revenge is perpetuated and hereditary among them. The great Grandchild often endeavours to revenge the Death of his great Grandfather, if he thinks it has not been sufficiently revenged before. As the Chinese Mandarins do not care to run any Risk to establish Peace among them, they willingly wink at what they cannot hinder, without hazarding the Lives of the Chinese Soldiers.

Language of the Myau-tse.

The Language of the Myau-tse of Se-chwen, the Western Parts of Hu-quang, and Northern Parts of Quey-chew is the same, or differs only in the Pronunciation and some particular Words; but that of the Myau-tse towards Li-ping-fu is reckon'd a Mixture of the Chinese and the true Myau-tse, for the People of both Nations understand one another very well. They say there are also some Countries between Yang-fu, Hu-quang, and Quey-chew, of which, those that are to the North are not understood by the Myau-tse; this the conquer'd Myau-tse affirm.

Manners.

The Chinese give all the Myau-tse the Character of being an unconstant, perfidious, barbarous People, and above all egregious Thieves; which however did not appear to be fact to P. Regis and the Missionaries who assisted in making the Map of those Countries; on the contrary they found them very faithful in restoring the Cloaths committed to their Trust, attentive, laborious, and obliging. But perhaps the Myau-tse have reason to be dissatisfied with the Chinese, who have taken from them almost all the Lands that were good for any thing in the Country, and continue to seize on whatever they find for their Convenience, unless prevented by the Fear of irritating those, whom they endeavour to dispossess, too far. However it is certain, that the Chinese neither love nor esteem the Myau-tse or the Lo-lo; and that these People have still less Affection for the Chinese: looking on them as severe and troublesome Masters, who keep them shut up by their Garrisons, and as it were coop'd up within a long Wall; which deprives them of all Communication with other Nations, from whom they might procure Assistance.

Iron Bridge.

Whatever Towers, Towns, and Bridges there are in Quey-chew and other Territories, which formerly did or do at present belong to them, they were all built by the Chinese; the Iron Bridge as it is called, which is in Quey-chew upon the great Road to Yun-nan, is the Work of a Chinese General, whose Name is cut in a great Piece of Marble on the other Side of the Pan-bo. This is a Torrent, which is not wide but very deep; on each Bank they have built a great Gate between two huge Piers of Stone, 6 or 7 Foot broad, and 17 or 18 high; from each of the Piers on the East Side hang 4 Chains by huge Rings, which are fasten'd to the Piers on the Western Side, and link'd together by small Chains, which make it look like Network with great Meshes, on this they have laid thick Planks fasten'd one to the other; but as they do not reach within some Paces of the Gate, because of the bending of the Chains, especially when loaded, they have fixt Consoles or Brackets on the same, level with the Gate, which supports a Floor that reaches to the Planks laid on the Chains; on the Sides of these Planks they have set up little Wooden Pilasters, which sustain a small Roof of the same Materials, continued from one Side to the other, the Ends whereof rest on the Piers.

The Chinese have made some other Bridges in imitation of this, which is famous over all the Empire; there is one especially pretty well known, on the River Kin-sha-kyang, in the ancient Country of the Lo-lo of the Province of Yun-nan; and in that of Se-chwen there are 2 or 3 others, which are supported only by thick Ropes, but these tho' small, are tottering and so insecure, that nothing but Necessity could make one venture to cross them.

They have succeeded better in some other Parts, both in the Province of Se-chwen, at the Foot of the Mountains possess'd by the Myau-tse, and in that of Shen-fu, in the District of Han-chong-fu. They have by help of Consoles fasten'd Wooden Poles into the Rocks of the Mountains; on these they have laid thick Planks, and thus made Bridges hanging over the Valleys, which serve for Roads, sometimes for a considerable Way together.

All these are the Works of the ancient Chinese settled in those Provinces, which shews the Superiority of their Genius, not only over the Myau-tse and Lo-lo, but even all the neighbouring Nations, both to the Westward and Southward.

The TRAVELS of several JESUIT MISSIONARIES in CHINA.

The Road taken by P. P. Bouvet, Fontaney, Gerbillon, le Comte, and Visselou, from the Port of Ning-po to Pe-king: with a very exact and particular Description of all the Places which they pass'd through in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, Shan-tong, and Pe-che-li.

WE departed from Ning-po the 26th of November 1687, in order to go to Pe-king, where we were call'd by the Emperor, embarking in the Evening with a Mandarin, who was appointed us by the Governor.

The 27th in the Morning we pass'd by Tu-yau-byen, a City of the third Order, depending on Shau-hing; its Wall incloses a pretty high Mountain, on which there is not a House to be seen,

(1) It appears by a Circumstance among others in the next Journal, that P. Fontaney wrote this, except towards the Foot. A little River separates the City from a Palace, which Li-Ko-lau, after having obtain'd a Permission to retire from Court, caused to be built in the Reign of the Father of the Emperor Van-lye, to perpetuate his Memory in the Place of his Birth. He inclosed with Walls a great Piece of Ground, which was inhabited afterwards and is now Part of the City; there is a Communication between them, by means of a Bridge of 3 Arches, pretty well built, and over-against it are erected 7 or 8 Triumphal Arches, which almost touch one another.

except

That Day in the Evening we pass'd two Dikes, and arrived first at a Passage where they hoist up the Barks in order to convey them into a Canal, which is 9 or 10 Feet higher than the Level of the River; they hoist the Bark on a Slope or Declivity, paved with great Stones, and when it is at the Top they let it slide down another into the Canal. There are several People at this Passage, who wait to be hired for this Work, which they finish in about a quarter of an Hour, by means of two Capstans.

All the Country we saw consists of large, well cultivated Plains, bounded with frightful barren Mountains, tho' some are cover'd with Pines and Cypressess, which are the most common Trees to be seen between Ning-po and Hang-chew. The Tree which produces the Tallow is almost as common, especially towards Ning-po, where scarce any other Trees are to be seen; they were at that Time strip'd of their Leaves, and cover'd with a white Fruit growing in Bunches at the End of the Branches; their Husks being fallen off, they appear'd white, so that at a Distance they seem'd as if cover'd with Flowers.

*Pines.
Cypressess.
Tallow Tree.*

The 28th in the Morning, we cross'd a Sort of Lake, or rather an Arm of the Sea, call'd Tsau-bu, at our own Expence; for the Mandarin declared, that having no Order from the Emperor, he could not oblige the Officers to furnish us with Necessaries beyond the District of Ning-po: for which Reason we were compell'd to hire new Barks, and defray the Mandarin's Expences as far as Hang-chew.

This Day we sail'd on the fine Canal which P. Martini mentions, but he does not give so particular an Account of it as it deserves. This Canal is near 20 Leagues in Length; it is lined on one Side with large flat Stones, 5 or 6 Feet long, 2 in Breadth, and 2 or 3 Inches thick; its Water is pure and very clear, and its Breadth is generally 20 or 30 Geometrical Paces, sometimes 40 or more. In divers Places it runs above a League, sometimes two in a strait Plain. But what is more common, tho' not mention'd by P. Martini, is, that from Beginning to End, at certain Distances, one finds several fine Canals on both Sides, extending along the Plain, where they divide into several others; forming a great Number of Islands, that make it look like a great Labyrinth, as far as the Mountains bounding these beautiful Plains, which are level, and smooth as Glass.

Fine Canal.

In this agreeable Place is the City of Shau-bing, which is cross'd by a great Number of Canals; the Bridges, which are very numerous, and generally of a single Arch, are very high, but the Arches not being of any Thickness towards the Top, are much weaker than ours; so that Carts never pass over them, all Burthens being carry'd by Porters. These Bridges are pass'd by means of Stairs which are flat, and of easy Ascent, the Steps commonly not being above 3 Inches thick.

City Shau-bing.

Some of these Bridges instead of Arches have 3 or 4 great Stones laid on Piles in form of a Floor: We saw some, the Stones whereof were 10, 12, 15, and 18 Feet in Length. There are several of these over the great Canal, very neatly built. The Country which is water'd by it is very pleasant and fertile, offering to the View large Plains cover'd with Rice and Pulse, which afford Sustenance to an immense Number of People; it is also diversify'd with infinite Thickets of Cypress Trees, here and there shading the Tombs.

About Shau-bing, and from thence almost as far as Hang-chew, one sees a continual Series of Houses and Hamlets, which makes the Country look as if it was one City. The Houses in the Country, as well as those of the Villages, are better built and kept in Repair, than those of the common Sort in some Towns: so that the Villages of this Country are prettier and more pleasant than those of Europe generally are.

The 29th we pass'd by Syau-shan, a City of the third Rank. It is supposed to have had its Name on account of a little Mountain, which is in one of its Suburbs. This City also is water'd with many Canals; its Gates, as well as those of Shau-bing, are cover'd with Plates of Iron.

City Syau-shan.

The 30th we went in Chairs within half a League of the Tsien-tang (M), which we pass'd in less than an Hour and an half. The River was in this Place about 4,000 Geometrical Paces in Breadth, but Ships cannot enter because of its Shallows; it has an extraordinary high Tide every Year about the full Moon in October. When we had pass'd the River, we found very neat Calashes ready for us, which the Christians of Hang-chew (N) had brought down to the Water Side; they accompany'd us, as it were, in Triumph to Church, where we found P. Intorcetta, who was grown hoary in the Labour of the Apostolic Life, and no less venerable on account of his Merit and Vertue, than his great Age.

P. Intorcetta.

As we were going to Court we were indispensably obliged both to make and receive several Visits; in the way from our own House to the Palace of the Vice Roy, we pass'd thro' a very strait Street, about 25 or 30 Feet broad, and in Length from our House to the Gate of the Tartars City about a League. The Middle of it is paved with large flat Stones, and the rest like the Streets of

of the European Cities, but without any Descent. All the Houses are one Story high over the Shops, which are open towards the Street; on the back side is the Canal. This Street is as much crowded as the most populous Streets of Paris, yet not a Woman to be seen. It is adorn'd with several Triumphal Arches, placed at certain Distances, which make a very beautiful Appearance. the other Streets, and especially those where the Soldiers and the Tartars live, are very different; the Houses on each Side look like those of the poorest Cottagers, neither are they by far so well peopled as those before mention'd.

Lake Si-bu.

We visited the Burying Place of the Christians; all that Quarter, which is full of Mountains, is scatter'd over with Tombs for the Space of near two Leagues. We went afterwards on the Lake call'd Si-bu, which P. Martini describes as a delightful Place: The Christians had provided us a Dinner in a large Bark, which had a Hall and very commodious Apartments. This Lake, whose Waters are very clear, is above a League and an half in Compass; on the Side of it in some Places there are Houses, which are agreeable enough, but not extraordinary handsome. Without Doubt the Tartars, who have sack'd this great City 2 or 3 Times, have demolish'd most of the Palaces P. Martini speaks of.

The 19th Dec. we took Leave of the Mandarins, and after having sent our Chest on Board the Bark, went to Prayers in the Church where the Christians were assembled; they furnish'd each of us with a Chair, and conducted us as they had done at our Arrival to our Bark.

We pass'd Eastwards thro' a Street, belonging to one of the Suburbs, for about 11 or 1,200 Geometrical Paces; as we did not go to the End of it, I cannot say justly how far it extends. This Street is narrower than that before spoken of, but as straight. The Houses are 2 Story high and very close together; we saw as many People as there are in the most frequented Streets of Paris, but still not a Woman.

Our Bark, tho' it was only of the third Rate, was very large, neat and commodious; being more than 16 Foot in Breadth, and between 60 and 80 in Length; its Sides were 10 or 12 Feet high; it was accommodated with a Hall and 4 very convenient Chambers, without reckoning the Kitchen and the Places where our Domesticks retired, all on the same Deck. The Hall and Chambers were adorn'd on the Inside with carved Work, painted and gilded; the rest was beautifully varnish'd, and the Ceiling consisting of several Pannels, painted after the Chinese Manner. Not only the Emperor, but the Merchants themselves have great Numbers of this Sort of Barks for trading to the several Provinces, by Means of the Rivers and Canals, wherewith the Country is intersected.

Canal.

We have seen some of these Barks which might hold 200 Tun; whole Families lodge in them more conveniently than in their Houses, which are not so neat. There were above 400 in the Canal that we sail'd on. This Canal, which is to the North West of the City, runs more than a great League in a strait Line, and is in Breadth every where above 15 Fathom; it is lined on both Sides with Free Stone, and on the Banks are Rows of Houses as thick set as in the Streets, and as full of People; nor are the Barks less crowded, which lie on each Side of the Canal. We stop'd in our Bark till the 20th, being obliged to wait for the Vice Roy, who design'd to visit us, and give us the Kang-bo, or Order of the Ping-pu, that is, the sovereign Tribunal for the Militia. This Order imported, that whether we travel'd by Land or Water, we should be furnish'd with all sorts of Necessaries till we arrived at Court.

The 21st in the Morning we left Hang-chew, the Canal was every where about 20 or 25 Fathom broad; the Sides which were lined with Free Stone and set thick with great Barks, whereof we reckon'd above 500, and the Banks were ranged with Houses for a Mile and a Quarter. Beyond the Suburbs the Canal is lined with Stone only on one Side; along which there is a paved Way for the Convenience of those who haul the Barks. We found Canals every now and then, and in those Places, where the Banks are low and overflow'd, they have made flat Bridges, with great Stones, each 7 or 8 Foot long, and placed three and three together, which form a sort of Causey.

About 4 Leagues from Hang-chew, we pass'd through a Village call'd Tan-tsi, built on both Sides of the Canal, which to this Place is ordinarily 15, 25, and 50 Paces broad. The two Sides are very well lined with Free Stone and form 2 Quays, each between 4 and 500 Geometrical Paces long, adorned with double Stairs, fronting the Door of every House, for the Convenience of Water.

The Houses which extend along the Quays are better built than those in the City, and more uniform; so that each Row seems to be one continued Pile of the same Building. In the middle of the Village is a handsome Bridge with 7 large Arches, whereof the middlemost is 45 Feet wide; the rest are also very large, diminishing in Proportion to the 2 Descents of the Bridge. We found also 2 or 3 great Bridges of one Arch only, and several Canals with Houses on each Side. Two Leagues from this Village we saw an Island in the middle of the Canal, with a very neat Pagod on it.

The 22d, after we had pass'd several Bridges, we found that the Canal grew narrower; we arrived at a City call'd She-men-byen, 10 Leagues from Hang-chew. Thus far we had advanced almost continually North East, through a very level Country without Hills, full of Canals cover'd with Bridges, and planted with dwarf Mulberry Trees, much like our Vineyards; Houses and Hamlets were also very numerous.

The 23d we arrived at Kya-bing-fu. We saw in our passage on the Side of the Canal a beautiful Pagod, which is call'd San-ko-ta, because of 3 Ta or Towers, several Stories high, which form the Entrance of it; we saw another that was larger, in one of the Suburbs, on the East Side. This City is large, well peopled, and has a very good Trade; its Suburbs are of great Extent. They compare it to Ning-po for Bigness, but it is much handsomer and richer. Road from Ning po to Pe-king Kya-bing-fu.

The 24th we departed early in the Morning, and entered a fine Canal, 25 or 30 Paces broad, the Water of which was very sweet. We cross'd a large Village named Wan-kyang-king, which extends a good way into the Plain. They pass from one Side to the other over a three-arch'd Bridge of very beautiful Architecture; the middlemost Arch is 75 Feet wide and above 20 high. This Work appears very bold, the Stones whereof it is built are more than 5 Feet long.

From within three or 4 Leagues on this Side Hang-chew to this Place, the Country is flat, without Mountains, and sufficiently cover'd with Wood, so that it makes a beautiful Landskip. Not an Inch of Ground lies useless; but Mulberry Trees here begin to be scarce. Between Kya-bing and this Village, at a Point where the Canal divides into 3 Branches, we saw 3 Fortresses or Square Towers built in the Water, and situated in Form of a Triangle. We were told that they served heretofore as Boundaries between Kyang-nan and Che-kyang, when those Provinces belong'd to two different Sovereigns. Province of Kyang-nan.

Twenty Li (*) from the same Village we pass'd by another on the Left, call'd Wan-kyang-kyun-chin, in the Province of Kyang-nan; it is so large that we took it at first Sight to be a City; and is intersected and surrounded with very broad Canals, quite cover'd with Barks. The Plains are well cultivated, and full of Hamlets; the Multitude and Breadth of the Canals, and the Evenness of the Ground, where there is not the least Eminence to be seen, gives room to believe that this Country had been formerly intirely under Water, and that the Chinese, who are extremely laborious, have drain'd it by cutting these Canals, whereby they have render'd it extremely fertile, and very commodious for Trade. Here we counted no less than a dozen Villages, the farthest of which was not above a Mile off, besides those which appear'd at a Distance.

After all, we were told that this Country, as populous as it is, was a Defart, in Comparison of Song-kyang, Nang-king, and the Southern Part of this Province. If China was every where as well peopled as it is between Shau-bing and Su-chew, I should make no Difficulty to believe that it contain'd more Inhabitants than all Europe; but we were assur'd that the Northern Provinces are not near so populous as the Southern.

Having run 10 Li, we arrived at Pin-Vang, which signifies an even Prospect. It is a great Village, which we took at first for a City, on account of the Multitude of its Houses and Inhabitants; it is cut in several Parts by Canals cover'd with well built Bridges and a great Number of Barks. They derive their Waters from a great Lake on the West Side, through which the little Barks pass to shorten their Way in going to Su-chew, and then they don't touch at Kya-bing.

From this Village the Canal extends Northwards out of Sight, and continues in a strait Line, with a Causey lined towards the Water with very fair Free Stone. On the East appears another great Lake, and these 2 Lakes extend as far as U-kyang. We pass'd by this City in the Night, which is like the rest cut with fair Canals. Before we arrived we pass'd under the Arch of a Bridge 48 Feet broad and 25 high. City U-kyang.

A League beyond U-kyang we found that the Causey on the Left Hand or West was 7 Feet high, and very well lined on both Sides with Free Stone, which made a kind of solid Bridge; under which, at certain Distances, there were Arches made for the Water to pass into the Plain, which was sown with Rice, and all overflow'd. This being Christmas Eve we said our Masses in the Hall, which was as steady as if the Bark had been on firm Ground.

The 25th, being Christmas Day, we found ourselves in the Morning at the Foot of the Walls of Su-chew, in a great Canal 35 or 40 Feet broad; it runs North and South along the Side of a Wall, which we discover'd at one View for about a League, almost in a strait Line. Our Bark stop'd over-against a great Arch of a magnificent Bridge, under which is a Passage into a great Canal, that runs Westward, and loses itself in a very long Suburb. City of Su-chew.

On the Edge of the Plain we saw a kind of great Pavilion, or square Building, with a double Roof curling up, cover'd with yellow Tiles, and encompass'd with a Wall, pierced towards the Top, and adorn'd with variety of Figures. This is a Monument erected by the Mandarins, in memory of the Honour which the Emperor Kang-hi did their City when he came thither, without that Pride and Pomp which ordinarily accompanies the Chinese Emperors. There are engraven on a Stone, belonging to this Edifice, the Instructions which the Emperor gave the Vice-Roy for governing the People.

We entered the City betimes in the Morning through the West Gate, and after we had gone the Space of 5 or 6 Li on different Canals, we arrived at our Church, where we found P. Simon Rodriguez, who presides over a numerous and zealous Congregation of Christians. Near the Door thro' which we enter'd, we saw a Polygonal Tower 6 or 7 Stories high, and above a League without the Walls, another Tower of the same Height in one of the Suburbs, which extended beyond the Reach of Eye.

That Day we received a Visit from Hyu Lau-ya, Grandson of Paul Syu, that famous Ko-lan, who was one of the greatest Defenders of the Christian Religion. That Mandarin is retired to Shang-bay with his Family; he had been Vice-Roy, had he not been related to U-san-gbey, who who revolted against the Emperor. He is Han-lin (*), that is, one of the Doctors of the first Rank, who are chosen by his Majesty for their superior Abilities, to compose, print, and to be for the most part in waiting near his Person. This Dignity gives him a considerable Rank; the Billets of Visit which he sends, are written in the same Manner as those of the Vice-Roys.

This illustrious Christian, malgre all our Opposition, fell on his Knees to salute us, and knock'd his Forehead against the Ground, to shew the Respect which he bore to the Preachers of the Gospel. On the 26th we visited the Vice-Roy of the Province, who resides in this City; he received us with much Politeness and Civility, and after a long Conversation reconducted us as far as his Court.

The 28th we left Sü-chew. First we sail'd about 2 Miles Northwards on a great Canal, that runs partly along the Walls of the City, and partly along a large Suburb, which is cut with Canals in divers Places, and very thick set with Houses. We saw for near three Quarters of a Mile together a double and treble Row of Barks, so close that they touch'd one another's Sides. We steer'd afterwards to the West, quitting the Great Canal, which continues its Course Northward, farther than we could see; and advanced along a new Canal, narrower than the former, crossing a Suburb, which is adorn'd with Houses for the Space of a great League, furnish'd with Streets and Canals.

From what I had seen of the Walls of Sü-chew, tho' only on one Side, from the Largeness of its Suburbs, and the Multitude of Barks, where whole Families dwell, I made no difficulty to conclude, that it is more than 4 Leagues in Compass, as they affirm'd it was, and that it contains several Millions of Inhabitants.

At the End of this Suburb, the Canal grows considerably wider, and extends in a direct Line beyond the Reach of Eye, to a great Village, divided by Streets and Canals, where is the Custom-House of Sü-chew; from which City as far as Vü-tse-hyen the Canal runs in a strait Line to the North-West, the Space of 100 Li, which make 10 Leagues; nothing is to be seen but Barks passing, sometimes 50 at once. A League from the Custom-House we found a Bridge of one Arch, 50 Feet wide.

Vü-tse-hyen is a City of the third Rank, depending on Chang-chew. We pass'd thro' the South Suburb, which is half a League long, extending on both Sides of the Canal; we went close by the Walls of the City, and tho' we could see but part of it, we judg'd it was two Miles and an half in Compass. The Walls were more than 25 Feet in height, not strong but very neat, and kept in good Repair. They are surrounded with a great Ditch, which is a sort of Canal. The Space between the Ditch and the Walls is very level, and makes a most agreeable Walk. The Waters that abound in this Place form several Islands in the different Canals, that make a charming Prospect, and produce excellent Tea, which is sent even to Pe-king and all over China.

We pass'd the Night in the City, and next Day continued our Voyage on the Canal, which extends in a strait Line still towards the North-West, with a Causey on the East, very well lined on each Side with Free Stone. The Country is even as Glass, and very well cultivated; one sees a continued Series of Hamlets and Villages, which may be easily distinguish'd in Plains as level as our Gardens. When the View is bounded by some large City, it yields a most delightful Prospect.

Chang-chew-fü.

The 31st of December in the Evening we arrived at Chang-chew-fü, a famous City and of great Trade. We sail'd half a League only in crossing one of its Suburbs; the Canal was so cover'd with Barks, which touch'd one another, that we could scarce see the Water. Here they seized two Thieves, who in the Night had crept into our Bark; one of them found means to escape, and we hinder'd the other from being carry'd before the Mandarin: When he was set free, he made what Haste he could to a little Bark, where there were several of his Accomplices, with whom he disappear'd in an Instant. They affirm that these Robbers burn a kind of Pastil, whose Fumes throw one into a Sleep.

The 30th in the Morning, departing from Chang-chew, we found the Canal very narrow, being scarce 12 Feet in Breadth; the Banks were 17 or 18 Feet high, but perpendicular. Forty nine Li from thence, after we had pass'd the Towns Ping-nyü and Lu-shan, the Canal runs in a strait Line quite out of Sight. These Towns are half ruin'd, altho' there still remain a few Houses, which are very neat. The Canal is lined on both Sides to the Height of 10 or 12 Feet with fine square Pieces of Marble, greyish, and much of the Colour of Slate.

About 2 Leagues on this side Tan-yang we were obliged to quit the Canal, and continue our Journey by Land, because they were making the Canal deeper, that it might carry the Barks which bring the Tribute to the Court. Tho' this Passage had been shut up but for one Day, yet we saw an infinite Number of Barks stop'd, and those who conducted them pursued their Journey by Land Carriages like us.

The Mandarin of Tan-yang, who had Notice of our coming the Day before, sent us Chairs, Horses, and Porters, to conduct us to Ching-kyang-fü; those who carry'd us and our Baggage went at the Rate of a good German League an Hour, so that in less than two Hours we made the two Leagues and an half, which was the Distance we were at from Tan-yang.

Tan-yang.

Before we arrived there, at the End of the Canal we pass'd near a Tower, 7 Stories high, and over three large Marble Bridges with only one Arch. The Suburbs of this Town are also paved paved with Marble; in three Quarters of an Hour we went round it, going along the Walls, which are of Brick, 25 Feet in height, and raised on a Marble Foundation.

(*) At Pe-king there is a Colledge call'd the Colledge of the Han-lin, who have a President;

On the North of this Town is a Lake, 5 or 6 Leagues in Compass, along which we travell'd about a League before we arrived at Ma-lin, a Village 2 Leagues beyond Tau-yang, where we pass'd the Night in a House prepar'd for us by the Christians. Tho' this Village has but one Street, yet they assur'd us it contain'd above 200,000 Inhabitants; it is paved with Marble like the rest of the Villages we pass'd, till we came to Ching-kyang-fu; in one part of the Road we met with Stones of white Marble 6 Feet in height, with several coarse Figures in Relief cut on them.

The 2d of January we arrived at Ching-kyang-fu. We pass'd first thro' a Suburb 13,000 Geometrical Paces in Length, all paved with Marble; the Pieces of Marble wherewith the middle of the Street is paved, are 3 Feet long and near 2 broad. After we had pass'd above a League along the Walls, which are more than 30 Feet high, and in very good Repair, we cross'd over a Marble Bridge into another Suburb, where we found so great a Concourse of People, that we had much ado to make our Way thro' them.

The City of Ching-kyang is none of the largest, for it is but one League in Circumference, but one of the most considerable for Trade, and as it were a Key of the Empire towards the Sea, from whence it is not above 2 short Days Journey; it is also a fortified Place, and has a large Garrison. We saw 18 Iron Cannon, which form'd a Battery even with the Water.

We cross'd only one Street of this second Suburb, where there is a little Mountain, from the Top whereof we had one of the most agreeable Prospects imaginable; on one Side we saw the City of Ching-kyang and its Suburbs, on the other the beautiful Yang-tse-kyang, which the Chinese call the Son of the Sea, or Ta-kyang, the Great River, or simply Kyang, that is, The River, by way of Excellence; in effect, it seems from this Place to be a vast Sea. On the other Side of the River over-against Ching-kyang there appears a great City, named Qua-chew, at least it wants nothing but the great Privilege belonging to Cities; nor is it look'd on in China as more than a Ma-teu, or Place of Trade. At the Foot of this Hill lies the Port, where there is a continual Concourse of People, who make no small Clutter and Noise.

Here we went on Board the Bark again, which the Officers had prepar'd for us; they were small but extremely handsome, and were to serve us only in passing the River to Yang-chew; where we pass'd, the River is above a League in Breadth, and yet it was reckon'd narrow in comparison of what it is both higher up and lower down. About 700 Paces within the River we pass'd by an Island, which look'd like a Place enchanted; hence the Chinese call it Kin-shan, or the Mountain of Gold; it is about 600 Feet in Compass, and cover'd with fair Stones; on the Top stands a Tower several Stories high, surrounded with Pagods and Houses of Bonzas.

On the other Side of the River we enter'd into a Canal, where we were obliged to pass a Cha, which is a kind of Sluice, if I may give it that Name. The Chinese, whom I had talk'd to about our European Sluices, had not the least Notion of them. In this Place they have contracted the Canal between 2 Dikes lined with Free Stone, which approach one another towards the Middle, where the Water runs with great Rapidity: It is likely they restrain it thus, to make its Channel deeper, for otherwise it would spread, and not have Depth enough to carry Barks. At this Passage there are People ready to draw the Barks, who must be very careful not to let them go down with the Stream, for in that Case they would infallibly be broken to Pieces and wreck'd.

We could not see Qua-chew, because it was Night, when we pass'd thro' one of its Suburbs. Next Morning we arrived betimes at Yang-chew-fu, which is a fair City, of great Trade, and very populous; they assur'd me it was 2 Leagues in Compass, and that including the Suburbs it contain'd 2 Millions of Souls.

We departed thence in Litters the 10th of January, at 6 in the Evening, and lay 4 Leagues and an half from it at a great Borough named Sbau-pe; we travell'd a good part of this Way by the side of the Canal on a fair Causey, which is cut thro' in three Places, to let the Water into the Fields.

The 11th, after travelling 7 Leagues without stopping, we arrived at Kau-yew-chew. This Country is flat, and almost all under Water; we advanced along a great Causey about 30 Feet broad and 10 or 12 high, lined in some Places with square pieces of Marble, especially on the Side towards the Canal, which we left on the Right Hand.

Beyond this we discover'd a great Lake, which is parallel to the Canal, and above a League in Breadth. The Plain on the Right Hand is likewise under Water, excepting several Eminences where Rice is sown; and many Hamlets appear whose houses are cover'd with Reeds, and have Walls made of Reeds done over with Clay. The vast Number of Barks under Sail, and rowing over these Fields, as on a large Sea, afforded a pretty diverting Spectacle.

Kau-yew-chew is a great City, as we were inform'd, for we only pass'd about the Space of 12,000 Geometrical Paces by the Side of the Walls, which are about 30 Feet high. In our Way to it we saw, in one of its Suburbs, a Tower 7 Stories high; and in the City itself another square Building of 6 or 7 Stories, which went up tapering like a Pyramid, terminated by a little square Roof of a different Make from that of the Towers; the Suburbs are large, and pretty well built.

The 12th in the Morning we travell'd 6 Leagues on the Causey which runs along the Canal and Lake; this Lake extends out of sight like a vast Sea, where we saw an infinite Number of Barks under Sail. Between the Canal and Lake is another Causey, cover'd very neatly with square Stones in several Places; it is full of wild Fowl, and from time to time we saw Clouds of small Birds which cover'd part of the Sky; the Crows were all black, whereas those we had met with from Ning-po hither, had a kind of white Collar about the Neck.

In the Afternoon we went 6 Leagues farther to Pau-bing-byen along the Canal, which advances continually between 2 great Causeys, with the Lake on the Left Hand; the Country on the Right is flat, and very well cultivated near that City, but one half of it lies under Water.

City of
fa.

The 14th having advanced 8 Leagues we came to lie at Wbay-ngan-fu; this is a considerable City, and seem'd to us more populous, and of greater Trade than Yang-chew. The Grand Master of the Waters, Canals, and Rivers resides there; he then lived in a publick Inn, where those are lodged who are sent for by the Emperor, or dispatch'd from the Court into the Provinces: so that we were obliged to take up with a wretched Inn made of Mats and Reeds, notwithstanding the Cold and Snow, which fell even into the Place where we lay. Three Mandarins lodged with us, who were greatly pleas'd with the Sight of some of our Books, and the Paper Figures they found in them. We made them a Present of one of them, with a French Crown, for which they return'd us the weight in Silver, and invited us to drink Tea in their Apartment, where they regaled us with several Kinds of Fruit.

Marble.

Marble is common in these Parts, but the Chinese don't seem to set any great Value on it; they employ it only for lining Canals, and in some other publick Works; we saw there as well as at Ching-kyang Marble Rowlers, resembling pieces of Pillars, which they draw over the cultivated Lands to make them level.

On the 15th in the Afternoon we went 3 Leagues farther to lodge at Chin-kyang-pu (Q), which lies on the South Bank of the Whang-bo, and Side of the Canal; between Whay-ngan and this Town we found another not far from the Suburbs of that City, this gave Occasion to the Error, which the Dutch Embassadors fell into, who, as appears from their Relation, have taken these two Boroughs for a continuation of the Suburbs of Whay-ngan, making this Suburb above 3 German Leagues long. Indeed we pass'd one running parallel to the Walls of the City, which is a League and an half in Length. The Country is flat, well cultivated, and in some Places half under Water; which renders the Plain, where they sow Rice, fit for tilling. Here we saw abundance of Geese, Wild Ducks, Pheasants, &c.

River

We did not leave this Town till the 17th, which was almost wholly spent in passing the Whang-bo, or Yellow River, because the Ice was to be broken, and the Pieces obstructed the Passage. The River is not more than 450 Fathom broad at this Place, which is 25 Leagues distant from its Mouth; its Channel is pretty strait, the Banks consist of a yellowish Clay, which mixing with the Waters in their Course, makes them yellow, whence it derives its Name. At the Time we pass'd it, there was scarce any Appearance of this Colour in the Water when it was taken up; its Stream was then neither slow nor swift, but when it swells and is rapid, it washes off much Earth, which is naturally light, and so becomes a great deal muddier and yellower. If this River was not restrain'd by Dikes, which are continually repairing, it would make strange Ravages.

We went and lodged in a Village [or Town]; the Road is the most even and handsome that can be seen, as well as the Country, which is flat and open like Beauce, but more beautiful, better cultivated, and full of Hamlets, which are not above 50, 100, or 200 Paces asunder. One League from the Whang-bo we found a great Causey discontinued in one Place, over which there was a kind of Wooden Bridge, supported by Piles of Stones, 8 or 10 Feet high; it is 300 Paces in Length, and paved very neatly with square Stones; afterwards we pass'd a Canal, which runs Northward in a strait Line, parallel to the Yellow River, whereinto it discharges itself; we took notice also of 3 other large Causeys in the Plain, which are the Roads to different Cities.

Cattle.

Hitherto we had not met with any Flocks of Sheep in our Journey; but we saw abundance of white Goats and black Hogs, some Cows and Buffaloes, a great many little Mules, Asses, and sorry Horses, which are commonly used for travelling, but not so much as one tolerably handsome among them.

The People are so numerous, that the Men commonly perform the Office of Beasts of Burthen, both for carrying Luggage and one another; and tho' the Land is very fertile and well cultivated, it does not yield Sustenance sufficient for Men and Beasts. The Houses of the Suburbs and Country Towns, after one leaves Whay-ngan, are made of Reeds and Earth, and cover'd with Straw, the very Inns themselves for lodging the Mandarins (R) being built after the same Manner. From the Whang-bo the Land rises till we come to Pe-king, as is evident from the Course of the Rivers.

The 18th we travell'd 11 Leagues to Su-tsen-byen over a flat Country, cultivated, and furnish'd with several large Causeys, which are so many high Roads, as neat and commodious as one could wish. These Causeys are level, and commonly raised 10 or 12 Feet, being 20 or 30 broad at Top, and the Slopes making 10 or 15 Feet more. All this Day we travell'd by the

(Q) It should be on the Left; for in the Map that City lies to the Right Hand or East of the Whang-bo.

the Side of a small, but very deep and rapid River; it is 7 or 8 Geometrical Paces broad, and bears pretty large Barks. It seems to run parallel to the Whang-bo, which is seldom above 3 or 400 Paces distant, and is probably the same which we took for an artificial Canal the Evening before. The Land hereabouts is all marshy, yet bears abundance of little Trees resembling the Birch.

We arrived at Su-tsen-hyen by a large handsome Causey, the Whang-bo appearing to the Right. This City stands on a rising Ground, its Walls are half in Ruins; it has two Suburbs, either of which is preferable to the Town. Near the Walls we saw a kind of Palace, newly built; this is a Monument in Honour of the Emperor Kang-hi, who pass'd thro' the City in his Way to Su-chew: the principal Part of this Edifice is a sort of oblong-square Salon, open on all Sides, with a double Roof, cover'd with yellow-varnish'd Tiles.

The Causey reaches no farther than Su-tsen, which we left the 19th. Half a League beyond it we found 7 flat Bridges one after another, each about 100 Foot long, supported by Piers or little Walls of Brick, with great Rails on both Sides, and triumphal Arches made of Wood at each End. These Bridges lie in a Line, and cross divers Canals, which form a kind of Labyrinth in this Place. Beyond these there is a ninth still larger, but not so neatly built as the rest. The Country still continues pretty flat, but is not so well cultivated or peopled as we found it the preceding Days. The Land is blackish, hard, and barren; and the Houses built only with Earth and Straw.

The 20th we travell'd but 6 Leagues, to Hong-wa-pu, a large Village. They said it was in Sban-tong, tho' others assured us we did not enter that Province till we had got 2 or 3 Leagues farther. The Country is flat, smoother than that we saw the Day before, and very well cultivated; it is also stored with Hamlets. We had 3 small Bridges to pass of 3 or 4 Arches each, built over the Torrents. We met with a sort of Centry Boxes for Centinels built in the Plains at proper Distances. Here we first beheld a Flock of Sheep: for altho' hitherto we always travell'd in Plains, where we had an unbounded Prospect, yet we neither saw Sheep nor Meadows. The Chinese never let any of their Land lie uncultivated, and they consume whatever it produces.

The 21st we began to see several Orchards planted with Fruit Trees in the open Fields, which in this Respect resemble several of our Provinces of France: But the Lands here are better cultivated, and the Houses and Hamlets much more frequent.

The Road from Yang-chew hither is extremely good and commodious; altho' it was the Depth of Winter, we did not find so much as one bad Step: It is free from Dirt and Stones, and all on a level, so that it looks like a Garden Walk. After Dinner we went 5 or 6 Li farther, the Country flat as usual and well till'd; they sow both Corn and Rice, but most of the former. We had this Day, on the Right Hand towards the East, a little Hill, which extends from North to South in a strait Line: We lay at Li-kye-Shwang. As far as this Town we had seen in the Plain great Numbers of those Stone Rowlers before mention'd; some channell'd, others plain, for levelling the Grounds and the Floors, whereon they thresh the Corn. This Borough lies beside a little River which is very broad, considering its Depth.

The 22d we cross'd the River, and at the End of 4 Leagues came to I-chew; the Plain always flat and even like la-Beauce, but much more populous; the Roads dry and sandy. The City did not appear to be above half a League in Compass; the Walls are of Brick, and in very good Repair: we observed several Salient Angles, and a sort of Bastions, which were either Polygonal or in the Form of a Horse Shoe.

The Governor came to visit us at our Inn, and sent a Messenger before to give Notice of our being on the Road, which was of great Service to us; for otherwise we might have found it difficult to have got a sufficient Number of Porters to carry our Baggage in the Towns of Sban-tong, which are for the most part but small.

We pass'd into one of the Suburbs over a Bridge of five small Arches; this Bridge is of Marble with Rails of the same, adorn'd with Lions very clumsily carved. Without the Suburbs, are a great many Tombs made of Earth in Form of Pyramids, with Inscriptions engraven on Marble Tables. We lodged 4 Leagues beyond I-chew, at a pitiful Town, whose Houses are of Earth cover'd with Stubble. The Country being sandy, the Roads are troublesome to Travellers on Account of the Dust.

Beyond I-chew the Country is not so open, for one begins to see quick set Hedges of a very strong and rugged kind of Thorns. At the Distance of every half League we commonly met with Centry Boxes, where the Centinels make Signals in the Night time, by kindling Fires on the Top, and in the Day time by hanging out a piece of Cloath. These Centry Boxes, which are only made of Sods or Earth, are square, raised with a Slope and 12 Feet high.

The 23d we travell'd 9 or 10 Leagues. In the Morning the Country was uneven, and we march'd now and then over Eminences, whose Descent was sometimes pretty steep; the Soil too was barren in many Places; but in the Evening we came into a fertile Plain, between two Ridges of Mountains, one to the East, the other to the West. These latter were high, steep, and craggy in a thousand Places, cover'd with Snow, and frightful to the Eye, by Reason of the Rocks; those to the East were lower.

The Houses of the Villages which we saw, are built with Stone in a very coarse Manner: the Inhabitants of them are employ'd in spinning or weaving the grey Silk of Sban-tong. It was there we saw the wild Silk Worms, which feed indifferently on all Sorts of Leaves and spin a greyish Silk; of this is made the Stuff call'd Kyen-chew, which washes well, and is sold all over the Empire: Altho' it is not beautiful to the Eye, yet it is commonly worn by Persons of Quality in their Houses.

The 24th we travell'd all Day between barren Mountains, but the Valleys are generally well cultivated, and stored with Towns and Villages. We dined at Mong-in-byen, a little City, whose Walls are but 12 Feet high, and in bad Repair. Altho' the Road was full of Ascents and Descents, yet it was very good and dry, but much incommoded with Dust.

The 25th we went but 8 Leagues. We pass'd thro' one of the Suburbs of the small City Sin-tay-byen. The Country was plain, well cultivated, very populous and cover'd with Fruit Trees. The Road all the Way was up Hill and down Hill; it was nevertheless good, and the Descents scarce perceptible. The Chains of Mountains continue on both Sides: at the Distance of about a League in some Places, they sink into low Hills, beyond which we discover'd Plains which reach'd out of sight.

The 26th, having travell'd about 3 Hours between frightful and desert Mountains, we came into a well cultivated Plain, full of Fruit Trees. After Dinner, we found the Country equally charming, till we came to Tay-ngan-chew, which is at the Foot of a hideous Mountain that covers it from the North Winds.

This City has a very agreeable Situation; its Walls are above 25 Foot high, but the Houses are very despicable within. About a Mile from the Town of Yan-lew-tyen, where we dined, we cross'd a River that was almost dry: there the Mountains open'd into a great Plain, which is very fertile and populous; they seem'd to be discontinued both on the East and West Side, but began soon after, especially on the East Side, and taking a Sweep, drew near again about Tay-ngan.

The 27th we rested, to give our Baggage, which went the Road appointed by the Kang-bo, time to get 3 Days Journey from thence, where we were to overtake it, by nearer Roads.

The 28th we travell'd 9 or 10 Leagues among frightful Mountains, and saw very little cultivated Lands, altho' the Towns were pretty numerous and well peopled. One third of the Inhabitants of this Country have Wens or Swellings in their Throats; a Distemper supposed to proceed from the Well Water they are obliged to make Use of. The Inns are very inconvenient: the Beds are only little brick Forms the Length of a Man; the Entertainment is very bad, altho' one may buy Pheasants cheaper than other Poultry; we have sometimes had 4 for 10 Sols. The Mountains I spoke of, between which we pass'd, are not very high, but generally without any Trees; some of them are cover'd with Earth, and had formerly been cultivated. The Remains of the Terrasses are still visible from Bottom to Top; but all the Way hither from Ning-po, thro' the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, and Shan-tong, I could not perceive the least Sign of the Ravages which the War had made in this vast Empire; nor an Inch of Ground untill'd, excepting on these Mountains.

Any other Kingdom must have been exhausted of Men, after so many Massacres: for it is incredible how many Millions have perish'd by Famine and Sword, since the last Emperor of the Dynasty of Ming; the Declension of that Family began with a Famine that was almost general. The Calamity was favourable to a great Number of Robbers, who resolved to live by Rapine. They enter'd Sword in Hand into the Cities and Towns, and chusing out the young Men, capable of bearing Arms, murder'd the rest of their Family; to the End that having neither Father, nor Mother, nor Homes to go to, Necessity might compell them to be of their Party.

The Chiefs of these Robbers made away with each other by Degrees, till at length there remain'd but two; one of whom aspiring even to the Throne, made himself Master of Pe-king, and obliged the Emperor in despair to hang himself. If we add to these Depopulations of whole Provinces, the War of the Tartars, (who were invited in to extirpate these Banditti) and the last Civil War, it will be easy to conclude, that no Country but China, could undergo such plentiful Bleedings without losing any of its Strength.

The 29th we travell'd about 9 Leagues between Mountains as hideous as the former: we pass'd near one shaped like a Cone, on the Top whereof is a small Pagod, to which they ascend by very narrow and steep Stairs, consisting of about 200 Steps; soon after we enter'd a vast Plain well cultivated, where we travell'd the rest of the Stage, much incommoded with the Dust, altho' the Road was very good. This Day we went in all 9 Leagues. 2 Leagues before we came to our Lodging, we pass'd near the Walls of a little City named Chang-tsin-byen; we were obliged to cross a Bridge built before the Gate of the City, over a Brook, which was then dry: this Bridge has 9 Arches sustain'd by square Piers of Stone very high and large, so that the Arches are but small; it begins by a great Arch and ends with a long sloping, supported by 7 small Arches, separated from the rest by a very thick stone Pier. The Heads of the Posts which support the Stones that serve for Rails, are rudely carved Figures of Animals. The Materials of the whole are a sort of blackish Marble, rough and unpolish'd; the Pavement is great square Flags of the same. We found a large Quantity of this sort of Marble in the two Provinces which we pass'd thro', especially in that of Shan-tong, where we now are; and it is likely, that the Mountains which we saw, almost intirely destitute of Trees, are full of it; because in Places where the Rain had wash'd away the Earth, there appear'd blackish Stones, which much resembled this Marble.

The

The 30th we travell'd the Space of 10 Leagues in a very even Country, well improved, and full of great Hamlets or Villages, which might be taken for Country Towns. The Road being very dry is dusty, which mightily incommodes Travellers. In every Village we saw several Pagods, which are the only brick Buildings, all the rest being of Earth and Straw: the Roofs and Sloping are set off with Ornaments, as Birds, Dragons, and Foliage; and are cover'd with Tiles, varnish'd or japan'd with red and blue.

Road from
Pe-king.

We found from Time to Time in the Plains, Pyramidical Tombs of Earth; there are usually in such Places small Groves of Cypresses, with flat Leaves which appear very pretty. Before Noon we pass'd by Yu-ching-byen, a square City, the Walls whereof are made of temper'd Earth, mix'd with Straw, and in many Places with Bricks baked in the Sun, and rough cast, with Potters Clay. The Inns are the most pitiful we have seen yet.

Besides a great Numbers of Borroughs which the great Road passes through, we frequently found Inns by the Way Side: these are Sheds made of Reeds, or at best sorry Cottages of Earth, where the meaner Sort of People lodge; on most of the Towers here we saw Iron Bells, cast with very little Art.

The 31st our Stage was 12 Leagues, 2 Leagues from the Town where we lodged we had on our Left the City of Pin-yuen-byen, which seem'd to be about 2 Leagues in Compass. In one of its Suburbs thro' which we pass'd we saw infinite Numbers of People, with many Timber-Yards full of Wood, for which there appear'd to be a great Trade.

City Pin-yuen-byen.

Eight Leagues from hence we found Te-chew, a large City, situated on the great Canal of the Court and inclosed with fair Brick Walls: one of its Suburbs, thro' which we pass'd, appear'd like a City, by its extent and the Number of People it contain'd.

City Te-chew.

From Te-chew, the Road, which was before a little hollow, became even with the Plain; and, making Allowance for the Dust, is one of the finest imaginable. The Plain is level as a Garden, full of Villages surrounded with Fruit Trees, and diversify'd with Cypress Groves, planted about the Sepulchres, which afford a very agreeable Prospect. The Ground is a sort of Potter's Clay, but somewhat more soft and gray. The Carts are drawn by Oxen, as they are in Europe by Horses; one serves for a Thiller, and carries a small Saddle. The Houses are mostly of Earth and very low: the Roof makes so obtuse an Angle, or more properly rounds by Degrees in such a Manner, that it appears flat; it is compos'd of Reeds cover'd with Earth, and supported by Mats of small Reeds, which lie upon the Spars and Joists, hence one may judge of their Inns, which are built in the same Manner, but not near so well. They have no Wood for firing, but make Use of Pit Coal, which must be very dear; in the Inns they often burn Reeds or Chaff, of which they have great Plenty.

The Royal Canal, which lies to the North of this City, was frozen up, and on it half a League together, we saw a Row of Barks that seem'd to touch one another. In the Way from Hang-woh-pu we often met with a sort of oblong square Towers or small Brick Platforms of 2 Stories, about 45 Foot high, 50 or 60 long, and 18 or 20 broad; with 7 Pinnacles on one Side, and 3 on the other. Their Villages are for the most Part inclosed with little Mud Walls, with 2 Gates at the End of the Street, and Pagods or little Idol Temples over those Gates.

The 1st of Feb. 4 Leagues from the Place where we lodged, we enter'd the Province of Pe-che-li, passing thro' one End of the Suburbs of King-chew. The Wall of this City seem'd to be of Earth: we saw three Sides of it, which are at right Angles; this makes me believe that it is square, as most of the Chinese Cities are. Within the City we observed an Hexagonal Tower of 12 or 13 Stories, one less than another as they rose, with Windows on each Side of every Story. In the North and South Suburbs there are several of those Towers or little Platforms before mention'd; they are found in most of the Villages, whose Inhabitants make Use of them for securing their Effects in troublesome Times, or when they fear an Irruption from the Robbers. The Houses of these Villages are of Earth mix'd with Straw, and the Roofs almost flat; several of them have a Platform.

City King-chew.

Generally speaking, in all the Road from Ning-po we saw no Buildings worth taking Notice of, except the publick ones, such as Causeys, Dikes, Bridges, Walls of Cities, Triumphal Arches, &c. We lay 5 Leagues from King-chew, at the City Fu-ching-byen, travelling a very dusty Road. There we heard of the Death of the Empress, Mother to the Emperor of Kang-hi, which happen'd the 27th of the last Month; to conform ourselves to the Customs of the Empire, we immediately took off the Tuft of red Silk, that cover'd our Caps, which is a Sign of Mourning; it is a Ceremony observ'd throughout the Empire for at least 27 Days, reckoning from the time they receive the News; the Mandarins publish the Order for it, and if any Person fails to obey, he is liable to be punish'd.

City Fu-ching-byen.

The 2d of February was the Beginning of the Chinese Year, the first Days of which are Days of Rejoycing in China, much like Carnival Time in Europe; they visit, with one another a happy New Year, and give publick Demonstrations of Joy by Illuminations and Fireworks. This Day we dined 7 Leagues from Fu-ching, at a large Village; we pass'd, in leaving it, over a fine Bridge of Marble about 20 Feet in Length. The Rails consist of beautiful Tables of Marble, laid along the Ground, about 20 Inches broad and 5 long (s); adorn'd with with Figures in Basso-relievo, and Pedestals between every two, which support Lions, better cut than any we had seen before.

There is plenty of Marble in this Province. The Country is level, well cultivated and full of Towns and Villages, where we saw a great Number of those Towers or Platforms; so that at a Distance one would take the Villages for so many Fortresses. All the Houses are of Earth, the Roofs flat and cover'd with Straw or Stubble; many of them are flank'd with little square Pavilions. We met on the Road a great Number of Couriers, with little Boxes at their Backs, wrap'd in pieces of yellow Stuff, which is the Imperial Colour: they were carrying without Doubt the News of the Death of the Empress into different Parts of the Empire.

City Hyen-
hyen.

We travell'd 4 or 5 Leagues in the Evening, and having pass'd near Hyen-hyen, a City about a League in Circumference, (the Walls whereof as well as the Houses are built with square Tiles instead of Bricks) we went and lay at Kye-kye-lin.

City Ho-kyen-
fa.

The 3d our Journey was 11 Leagues. After we had advanced about 2 Leagues, we pass'd by the Walls of the City Ho-kyen-fa, which is square and about 2 Leagues in Compass. The Walls and Parapets of Brick are in very good Repair. They are defended by little square Towers at certain Distances, with small square Bastions, which are not above 7 or 8 Fathom in Front.

kyew-hyen.

We took up our Lodging at Jin-kyew-hyen another City. The Country appear'd the same as the preceding Days, equally level, and well improved. The Towns and Villages are very numerous. Some of them are of a great Length, having Gates at both Avenues, which do not differ from Gates of Cities, with Pagods over them.

We met with, in divers Places, Tables of Marble with Inscriptions, placed perpendicularly on the Back of a huge Marble Tortoise; since we left Ning-po we saw neither Wood nor Forests; all the Land was well cultivated, excepting what was under Water, and a few barren Mountains.

The 4th we departed from Jin-kyew-hyen, which is in form of an oblong Square, and seem'd to be about 1400 Paces in Compass. Its Walls and Parapets are of Brick, (with Towers at certain Distances) more than 30 Foot high. The Houses, as well as those of the Villages are likewise of Brick, and the Roofs of them handsome enough.

Five Leagues from this City we pass'd thro' a large Borough of great Trade, in the midst of which is a triumphal Arch, resembling the two we had seen the Evening before at Jin-kyew-hyen. Just without this Place a Causey begins, and a League beyond, Marshes; through which is a Causey for the Space of 500 Paces: having pass'd it we found a large Village where there are 3 Wooden Bridges over so many Canals.

City Hyong-
hyen.

Two Leagues beyond, we pass'd thro' the City Hyong-hyen, whose South East Suburb is cross'd by a Canal. The Street was adorn'd with 4 triumphal Arches, whose Pillars stand on Bases of white Marble 3 Foot high, composed of 4 Stones bound together with Iron Hoops, and fasten'd with Pins of the same Metal; most commonly the Pillar which is of Wood, is fix'd between these 4 Stones, as between the Checks of a Press. These Pedestals instead of an Ogee, have a kind of Chapter of long Leaves, which resemble Flag or Sword Grass.

From Hyong-hyen, where we dined, we travell'd 4 Leagues to Pe-keu-bo a great Borough [or Country Town] with Gates at both Ends, and Pagods over them. The Country as usual was very populous and the Villages grew handsomer; the Houses are almost all cover'd with very thick Tiles placed in form of a Demi-canal.

City Sin-
ching-hyen

The 5th, 2 Leagues from this Town we pass'd several Canals, and a League farther cross'd the City Sin-ching-hyen, which is square and not above 12 or 1300 Paces in Compass; its Walls are 25 Foot high.

City Tsu-
cheu.

After Dinner we cross'd Tsu-cheu thro' the principal Street, which is very broad and lies in a Line. This City is three Miles round, and better peopled than the rest. The Suburbs on the South and North are very long, the Streets handsome and strait, the Houses low and of one or two Stories, after the Chinese Manner. The Prospect we had on passing out of the North Suburb was admirably fine: on the Right was a spacious Plain without the least Eminence, or inequality within the reach of Eye; and on the West, a Chain of Mountains, which in all Appearance encompass the Province of Pe-che-li to the very Sea; we travell'd by the Side of them, till we came to Pe-king.

We presently found a Bridge of 9 Arches supported by square pieces of Stone, which project so as to serve instead of Steps. The whole Work is solid and strong. The Bridge is paved with great square Stones; and the Breast Walls or Rails, which are 2 Feet and an half high, consist of large Pannels of white Marble, not well polish'd, grooved in Posts of the same, which are 62 on each Side and 4 Foot high. The Pannels in the Middle are above six Foot long, but they diminish gradually to the Ends of the Bridge. The two slopings or ascents are very easy; one of them joins a Causey, made of Earth, about 500 Paces long: at the End whereof we found another Bridge like the former, with 34 Posts on each Side. At the Entrance of it we left on the Right a She-pei, that is a large Marble Stone, placed in a great square Room made of Brick; it stands on a Marble Basis, 2 Foot and an half high, and 4 Paces square. We had seen several of the Kind on the Roads; these Monuments at the End of Bridges are erected in Honour of the Person or Persons who have been at Expences to serve the Publick, or done some illustrious Action.

For three Days past the Soil appear'd more hard and grey than usual, and we continued to meet an infinite Number of People going backward and forward. We lay 2 Leagues from Tjo-chew, at a great Borough call'd Lew-li-bo; it has Gates at both ends, and a fort of Suburbs. We travell'd that Day 12 Leagues.

Road from
Pe-king.

The 6th, after we had pass'd the Suburbs, we found a very handsome Bridge about 100 Geometrical Paces in Length, and 20 Feet in Breadth; with 2 great Triumphal Arches at the Ends. The Rails are of large flat Stones, some white, others grey, supported by small Pillars of the same, which very much resembles Marble; these Stones are neatly cut, and adorn'd with variety of Moldings. All along the Rails, there runs a little Bank of Stone in Height 9 or 10 Inches. The Bridge is paved with large handsome flat Stones; after which follows a long Causey above 40 Foot broad and 6 or 700 Paces long, paved in the same Manner; with two little Bridges on it of the same Architecture.

Four Leagues from Lew-li-bo we came to Lyang-byang-byen a pretty large City, but the Walls are in bad Condition. One League from thence we saw a fine Bridge, the Rails or Side Walls of which are of large handsome white Stones, and the Ends sustain'd by four Figures of Elephants. We saw another of them, the great Stones of whose Rails were pierced thro' like Balusters. This Day we travell'd but 3 Leagues, stopping at a Village, 8 Leagues from Pe-king, to wait for News from the Fathers of our Society who were at Court; we there received the melancholy Account of the Death of P. Ferdinand Verbiest, which happen'd the 28th of January. The Emperor spared nothing to preserve the Life of this Missionary, whom he honour'd with his Favour. He sent him one of his Prime Physicians, who waited close on the Empress Dowager, when at the Point of Death; but the Physician, after having seen the Patient, told his Majesty, according to the Chinese Way of speaking, that nine Parts in ten of him were already dead; and in Effect he dyed a few Days after.

City *Lyang-

Death.*

The 7th, the Missionaries at Court sent an Officer of the Tribunal of Mathematics to conduct us to Pe-king; But none of them came in Person as they intended, because they were obliged to observe the Chinese Custom, of mourning for P. Verbiest. We departed about one of the Clock; the Road was near 20 Fathom broad and often more: but there was such a dreadful Clutter, caused by the Multitude of People, Horses, Mules, Asses, Camels, Calashes, Litters, and Carts, that it is difficult to describe it.

We pass'd thro' Lü-kew-kyau, which is 3 Leagues short of Pe-king. It is a little City almost square, 1200 Paces in Circuit. Nothing makes a more delightful Appearance; the Walls are exceeding beautiful, it has 2 double Gates with a Place of Arms, and handsome Rooms over them.

City *Lü-kew-

We enter'd the City by a Bridge, the finest we had yet seen: it is above 170 Geometrical Paces in length; the Arches are small, but the Rails or Side Walls are made of a hard whitish Stone, resembling Marble. These Stones are more than 5 Foot long, 3 high, and 7 or 8 Inches thick, supported at each End by Pilastrs, adorn'd with moldings, and bearing the Figures of Lions. I reckon'd on one Side only, 147 of these Pilastrs. Two little Banks, half a Foot high, and a Foot and an half broad, run along the Rails. The Bridge is paved with great flat Stones, so well joined, that it is as even as a Floor. The Walls of the City are very neatly built, and 40 Feet high. The Rampart, which is not very thick, is lined within after the same Manner. The Bank or raised Way is pretty broad and curiously built, as well as the Parapet, whose Battlements are very near each other. The Gates are double, with a kind of Advance Wall in this Place: they are high, thick, and well arch'd. Over them is a Building of 2 Stories, with a double Roof, to which they ascend on each Side by a large Stair Case, that looks very graceful. The Road from this City to Pe-king appears like one continued Street, it is so throng'd with People.

Four or Five hundred Paces from the Gate of the outward City, we stopp'd at the Custom House, where they let our Baggage pass without searching. Mean Time a Person opening the Window of my Litter, ask'd if we were come to pay Tribute to the Emperor. On this Occasion it may be proper to make some Remarks which are of Moment; but to explain them the better, it will be necessary to repeat, what I have observed elsewhere, that the Chinese supposing the Earth to be square, pretend that China takes up the greater Part of it: so that, to denote their Empire, they use the Word Tyen-hya, that is the under Heaven, this Term is continually in their Mouths; so they say, Tin pü tyen-hya, that is, this is current throughout China; Te hyantyen-hya, he has made himself Master of the Empire.

Prepossess'd with this rare System of Geography, they have placed the rest of Mankind in the Corners of this pretended Square; and considering them as Barbarians, think they do them much Honour in reckoning them among their Tributaries. Hence, whatever comes from foreign Kingdoms, whether Letters, Presents, or Envoys, all pass as Tribute, and a Mark of Submission; and thenceforward such Kingdoms are set down in their History among those that are tributary to China. It would be too tedious to enumerate all the Kingdoms which they reckon tributary to them, wherefore I shall mention only the principal; Korea is the first, next Japan, then come the Moors, in whose dominions they put the Kingdom of Sa-ma-eul-han, which probably is Samarkand (s); Pan-ko-la, which must be Bengal, for they place it to the East of In-tu, or Indistân; lastly Me-te-na; for Mohammed, who found the Way to be honour'd by so many Nations, was not able to keep himself out of the Number of the Tributaries of China.

In the Chinese Geography intitled Yuan-yu, you meet with the following Account; Me-te-na (v) is the first Kingdom of the Moors (w): Its first King named Mo-han-mu-te (x) was a Man of an extraordinary Genius; he reduced all the Kingdoms in the West under his Empire; in the Reign of Min-hiun-te (y) he sent an Ambassador, accompany'd with the People of the Kingdom of Tyen-san, to pay Tribute.

Whence it is evident, the Princes of Europe ought to be cautious how they send Letters or Presents, either by the Missionaries, the Merchants, or any other Way in their own Name; for, the Moment they do, their Kingdoms will be registred among the Tributaries. The Russians had a great Struggle to get this Term changed in their Favour; and altho' it was changed, yet the Embassy was considered as a Tender of Homage. The same Custom prevails in all other Parts of the Indies; where the Person, who carries his Princes Letter, is look'd on as his Ambassador. Not that the Indians really believe them to be such, but they will have it so, to flatter their own Vanity: whence often they take Occasion to despise the Majesty of the Kings of Europe, with whom their Princes cannot compare. City of Pe-
ed.

For a League before we arriv'd at Pe-king, the Country was cover'd with little Groves of pretty tall young Trees, inclos'd with Walls made of Earth, which are so many Burying Places. About 4 of the Clock we enter'd Pe-king, by a Gate, which is double, (as all the rest belonging to this City are,) and cover'd with thin Iron Plates, fasten'd on with several Rows of very large Nails. The Walls are 30 or 35 Feet high, with square Towers at convenient Distances. The Street we enter'd was between 45 and 50 Feet broad, and as strait as a Line. We pass'd along for above half a League, thro' an incredible Number of People, yet we did not see one Woman, altho' they are more numerous here than the Men. Every now and then we met with Jugglers, surrounded by 50 or 60 Men, croud'd upon one another; the Throngs were so great in every Part of this vast and long Street, that one would have concluded they were Fairs or some publick Assemblies.

This Street extended still beyond the Reach of Eye, when we turn'd short into another large straight Street on the Left, almost as broad and croud'd as the former. In both these Streets the Houses are low, consisting only of a Ground Floor, and have nothing to attract the Sight, excepting the Shops of Merchants, which for Neatness, and perhaps Riches, excell most in Europe; the Entrance into these Shops is adorn'd with Gildings, Sculptures, Paintings, and Japannings, in a Manner which charms the Eye.

At the End of this Street we enter'd into the 2d Inclosure, or more properly the 2d City, which is call'd the Tartar City. The Gate at this Place also is double; the Wall is very neat and new built, with square Towers, the Sides of which are above 7 or 8 Fathom in Breadth, and the Front yet broader. The 2d or inner Gate, has a large Edifice built over it with a double Roof, cover'd with japan'd Tiles. It consists of 2 Stories, whereof the lowermost, which juts forward, is embellish'd with Paintings and carved Works. The Part of the advance wall, which answers to the Gate, has likewise an Edifice erected over it, larger than the former; it is four Stories high, with 12 little square Windows in each, which makes a very handsome Appearance at the Entrance of the Street of the first City.

As we had pass'd these 2 Gates, we found on the Right Hand the House of the Portuguese Jesuits, which is over-against and near the Rampart. It has a double Entrance; going in by one of them we pass'd thro' three little Gates pretty neatly made, into a square, regular Court, which leads to the Church; on each Side of the Entrance there is a very handsome square Tower, the Tops of which are made in form of an Observatory; in that on the Right hand there is a very fine Organ, and in the other a Clock with several Bells.

At the Beginning of the Chinese Year, all the Inhabitants of Pe-king croud so to see these Curiosities, that the Court is never empty from Morning till Night. During this Time the Organ plays, and the Clock is set a chiming; and many of those who enter the Church inform themselves about the Mysteries which are there represented by the Paintings, for there is a Cathesist attending all Day long to explain them: so that Curiosity is always the Means of making some Converts to the Faith.

(v) Me-te-na is evidently Medina in Arabia, or, as it is call'd by the Arabs, Medinat al Nabi, that is, the City of the Prophet, meaning Mohammed.

(w) By the Moors must be understood the Mohammedans in general, who are so call'd by a corrupt Use of the Word.

(x) This is the Chinese Way of Spelling, or rather pronouncing, Mohammed.

(y) Orig. Min-hiun-te; others for Hien write Huen and Huen. This seems to be the same with Hien-tung, 6th Emperor of the Dynasty of Tang, who began his Reign in the Year 712 after Christ; but Mohammed had been dead above 80 Years before.

(z) Here, I fear, the European Vanity is stain'd as much as the Indian; for certainly the grandeur of the Oriental Princes, especially the Emperors of China, is not to be equalled by any thing on this Side of the World.

The JOURNEY of P. Fontaney, from Pe-king to Kyang-chew, in the Province of Shan-fi; and from thence to Nan-king in the Province of Kyang-nan.

THE 30th of March 1688, we set out from Pe-king for Kyang-chew, which is 18 easy Days Journey. I hired Mules for 12 Francs each, out of which the Muleteer was obliged to maintain both himself and them; I lay at Tew-tyen, a Country Town, 80 Li (*) from Pe-king.

The 31st I pass'd thro' Tse-chew, where I took the Road of Shan-fi; it is incredible what prodigious Multitudes of People there are on the Road; the Streets of our best Cities in Europe are not so throng'd. We rode 8 Leagues to get to Ting-bing-byen. This City is square, about 500 Paces long from North to South, and 400 broad from East to West; its Walls are of Earth, and the Battlements of Brick.

A little before we came to the Village of Pe-kew, which is 20 Li farther, we cross'd a River over a Wooden Bridge cover'd with Earth; it runs Eastward and rolls along a great Quantity of Sand with its Tide. These Roads, which are always crouded, are very broad, and planted with Trees on both Sides from Pe-king, with Walls to cover and preserve the Country. In less than the Space of a League we met with two or three Villages, not to mention those which appear on all Sides in the Plain; in one of them I saw Puppets, which were made to speak, and differ'd in nothing from those of Europe, but in their Dress.

The 1st of April I went from Pe-kew to Ku-chin-tyen, a great Borough, 30 Li distant to the South-West by West; in the Way we found 3 Villages. Thence to Pay-ta-fu, where there is a great Tower on the Left Hand, 20 Li, with 2 Villages between. 10 Li farther we came to Gan-fu-byen; we pass'd thro' this City, which measures 350 Paces from East to West, and 400 from North to South; its Walls are of Earth, and the Battlements of Brick. At the Entrance of the Suburbs we saw a Stone Bridge, without Rails or Side Walls, over a small Brook.

From Gan-fu to Su-bo are 40 Li. Going out of this Town, we pass'd over a handsome Bridge of 3 Arches, and 20 Posts on each Side, built with rough Marble. Thence to the City Pau-ting-fu, where resides the Governor of the Province of Pe-che-li, 10 Li; it is nearly square, and above 4,000 Paces in Circumference. We left it on the Left Hand, and over-against the Corner of the Wall found a fine Bridge with 3 Arches, of greyish Marble, built over a small River, form'd by 2 little Brooks; one of which comes from the West, and the other from the North. Our Course by Estimation was South-West. The Road is very handsome, planted with Trees like a Garden Walk, and crouded with inconceivable Numbers of People.

The 2d we went directly East about 10 Li to Ta-sye-pu, a Village, leaving on the Right, a little before we came to it, a small Tower in the Plain: 10 Li thence to another Borough named Ta-ki-tyen, where there are 3 small Stone Bridges; and 10 more South-West to another Borough; 10 Li farther to Kin-yan-i; and from thence to Tan-shun-kyau, a great Country Town, in the middle of which there is a handsome Bridge of one Arch, 30 Li; 30 Li farther we pass'd thro' the City King-tu-byen, which is not square, and no more than 1200 Paces in Circuit; the Walls resemble those of other Cities. On leaving it we saw a beautiful Triumphal Arch of white Marble, adorn'd with 4 Lions. Thence to Tsin-fong-tyen a great Borough, where I lay, are 20 Li.

In this Days Journey from Pau-ting I pass'd by 15 or 16 Cities, Boroughs, and Villages, which are full of Inns, for lodging that surprizing Number of People which throngs the Roads. About 10 or 15 Li beyond Pau-ting, the Road is rais'd on both Sides with pretty broad Banks, so that the Space betwixt forms a sort of Canal, which is plashy in some Places. As it is strait, wide, and level, with Trees planted on both Sides, it affords beautiful Avenues to the Villages, that one meets with every Mile and an half. In some Places the Trees are at full Growth, in others but of one or two Years standing; whence it is probable, these Avenues were ruin'd during the Wars, yet they have a fine Effect upon the Eye; besides, very pively, well cultivated Plains presented themselves on all Hands; however, there are so few Trees in this Country, that it appear'd often like a vast Sea. One is also agreeably deceiv'd in the Parts where the Prospect is bounded by Trees, which make the Country look as if it was overflow'd, or some great Lake; the thickness of the Vapours reflecting Light enough to create a Whiteness resembling that of Water at a Distance. But to produce this Phenomenon, the Horizon must be terminated by opaque Bodies, such as Trees, otherwise the faint reflected Light will be overpower'd by that which sheds a greater Lustre; it may also be said, that the Shadows of these Trees appear in the Vapours, which therefore seem to be thick enough to produce the same Effect as a Looking-Glass.

The 3d we advanced 10 Li (1) South-West to a Village, then 10 Li South-West by South to another, after which we cross'd a little River over a Wooden Bridge cover'd with Earth; thence 10 Li South-West to Ting-chew, a City as big at least as Pau-ting; after having pass'd thro' 4 Villages, I came to Min-yue-tyen a great Borough, where I dined, 60 Li from Tsin-fong-

(*) It must be remember'd that 10 Li or Furlongs make a League,

(1) In the French it is 10 Leagues, which must be an Error of the Press or Copy.

tyen, the Course always South-West by South; three Li beyond, our Course was West-South-West, and at the End of 3 or 4 more it changed to South-West by West.

Thirty Li from Ting-chew we came to Sin-lo-byen, a little City almost square, not above 1200 Paces in Compass; we then pass'd 3 wooden Bridges cover'd with Earth, over a small River that runs North East, and which, when the Waters rise, overflows the Country for 3 or 4 Li; after crossing a few Villages and a Stone Bridge with 18 Posts on each Side, we arriv'd at Pu-chin-i, a great Borough, where there is an Imperial Post-House, (as the Word i denotes,) 45 Li distant from Sin-lo.

The great Road lies between two small Canals, whose earthen Walls serve instead of Banks; it is of Gravel, about 100 Foot wide, the finest and most agreeable any where to be met with.

The 4th we travell'd 60 Li South-West by South to Ching-ting-fu, a City near 4000 Paces in Circumference; its Figure is a long Square and the Walls handsome; we pass'd along a Skirt of it at least 3 Li, running South-West; from the Corner to the Gate I reckon'd 17 square Towers.

Six or seven Li thence, we cross'd the Hu-to-Ho, a River 200 Paces broad; it comes from the West, and runs South-East; its Waters are muddy like those of Wbang-bo. Beyond this River the great Road divides, one part leads towards the Provinces of Se-chwen, Yun-nan, Ho-nan, &c. the other to those of Shan-fi and Sben-fi, which last was the Road we took; as it belongs to so many Provinces it is no wonder to find such a prodigious Number of Passengers on it.

I took up my Lodging at Ho-lu-byen, a very populous City, 1400 Paces in Circuit, and about 40 Li from Ching-ting. It lies behind a Hill, which we pass'd before we came to it; from the Top we discover'd the most charming Country imaginable, as smooth as Glass to the Foot of the Mountains, whereon there are neither Trees nor Bushes. The Suburbs of Ho-lu-byen are large in Comparison of the City, where there are Manufactures of Iron and Earthen Ware.

The 5th I enter'd the Mountains, and having gone 40 Li to the West-South-West, din'd at Zhu-chwi-pu (1) a large Borogh on the Eastern Bank of a River, which we cross'd by a Bridge; on the other Side of the Town we found another handsome Bridge of one Arch, over a River that runs here Northwards, which having cross'd, we found 3 more little Stone Bridges over so many Torrents. We travell'd along the River, having it on the Left, and at the End of 15 Li, pass'd it over a Bridge like the former, and 15 Li farther arriv'd at Chin-king-byen.

This City is 1200 Paces in Compass, seated on a little Hill; the Walls, which are of Brick, are fair, excepting the part on the Hill, which is of Earth; the lower part only is inhabited, and the Suburbs are better than the City itself. We left it on the Right, and travelling 25 Li farther, came to lodge at He-taw-tyen, a Town in the Mountains, which are indifferently high. The Road is rugged, so that one is always either ascending, descending, or turning; we saw an astonishing Multitude of Asses and Mules, loaded with Earthen Ware, ground Bark for making Pastils, Cotton, Silks, Skins, and especially wrought Iron, which comes from Liu-ngan-fu, a City of Shan-fi; on the River by which we travell'd, we saw several Mills, for grinding the Bark whereof they make the Pastils.

Thirty Li from Ho-lu, after having pass'd thro' the Borough of Chan-ngan, we cross'd a Hill above 100 Paces in height, on the Top whereof is a Pagod; we advanced on 2 great inclining Plains, pav'd with Stone; nothing is to be seen on all Sides but Hills without Valleys, but they are low and cultivated to the very Top; to prevent the Rains from washing down the Earth, as well as to detain the Water, they are cut into Terrasses, supported by dry Walls, built with the Stones wherewith the Ground was cover'd; we saw whole Families of Chinese, which dwelt in Grotts, for China has its Troglodytes, as well as Egypt; in short, every Place is as populous as can be. We saw neither Trees nor Shrubs on the Mountains; the few Herbs and Briars which they produce are quickly pluck'd up to feed the Cattle, and supply the Lime-Kilns, which are very numerous along the River. Our Course was South-West by West.

The 6th, having gone 40 Li, we came to a Village, where there is a Custom House. I was discharged by sending a Visiting Letter, without having my Baggage search'd. The Province of Pe-che-li ends here, and that of Shan-fi begins. The Village is shut up by 2 great Stone Arches, which cross the Road that lies between steep Hills. Here we saw a Wall, which running over the Mountains as well as Valleys, crosses the Road also; I know not how far it extends, not being able to see either End; it is of Stone, rough-hewn but firmly laid, and is flank'd at proper Distances with square Brick Towers, which seem'd as intire as if newly built. The Wall including the Battlements might be 10 or 12 Foot high, and 3 or 4 thick; some Parts of it are fallen down, some want only the Pinnacles, and others are still entire. The Height is equal throughout, so that when they say it is 100 Feet and more, they include the Hills.

Twenty Li from the Custom House, I came to Pe-chin-i, a great Borough, where I din'd. 5 Li beyond, we enter'd a Road 10 Paces broad, between pretty steep Hills, which are about

(1) Orig. Ju-chwei-pau; the zh in English answers precisely to the French i consonant.

60 Paces in perpendicular. Having travell'd 50 Li, I came to Ping-ting-chew, a City about 2,000 Paces in Circumference. The North part standing on a little Hill is waste, the rest is very populous: the Suburb to the West is large. In crossing the City, we pass'd thro' a Street 300 Geometrical Paces long: I reckon'd 25 Triumphal Arches there, some are of Wood with Stone Bases, others are all of Stone; several of them are very handsome. In the West Suburb we saw 6 more. This City is situated in a Plain amidst the Mountains. Two Leagues before we came to it, the Road began to be very good. The Tops of the Mountains are till'd with Oxen. We saw Villages consisting of Grotts or Caverns, dug on Purpose; being very neat Chambers 20 Feet long, and 10 or 12 broad. I pass'd thro' 14 Villages without reckoning those at the Beginning and End of the Stage; the Course South-West by West.

The 7th leaving Ping-ting, we struck Northwards, ascending gradually for 7 or 8 Li till we came to a Village, after which we found a Descent, which was pretty steep, and at the Foot of it another Village; for 15 Li our Course was North-West. At the End of 23 Li we pass'd a Brook, that runs Eastward; at 25 Li we found a Village where we turn'd West-North-West; at 40 Li another Village, and advanced West-South-West, for 2 Li; afterwards North-West 12 Li, then 6 Li West to Sin-tyen, 60 Li from Ping-ting.

From Sin-tyen where I dined, I rode 4 Li West, then 6 Li West-North-West to a Village: 14 Li farther I pass'd a Brook which comes from the North, and falls into that by the Side whereof I travell'd. 20 Li thence to a Borough, and 4 Li beyond we ascended a very steep Hill. There the Stony Road which was very troublesome to us ends. The Top of this Hill, as well as all those about it, is extremely well cultivated, and cut in Terrasses which are continued to the Bottom, and make a very agreeable Prospect.

From thence we had an easy Descent Westward to the City Shew-yang-hyen, 40 Li from Sin-tyen; one Li before we enter'd the Suburb we saw on the Left a Tower 300 Paces from the great Road beyond the Valley, where the River along which I rode, runs. This District is full of Towns and Hamlets. We left the City to the Right; it is above 1500 Paces in Compass, and its Walls are in very good Repair.

The 8th I advanced 45 Li West-North-West: and at a Village 40 Li farther left the Road leading to Tay-yuen-fu, the Capital of Sban-fu, and took that for Pin-yang-fu, which runs South-West by South. 33 Li from that Division the Hills end, which were always well cultivated, and stored with Hamlets; but full of Precipices, form'd either by the Torrents, carrying away the Mold, or what is more likely, by Earthquakes, which happen pretty frequently in those Parts, for many times I saw large Cavities encompassed in such a Manner that the Water could neither get in nor out.

One Thing extraordinary I remark'd in several Parts of this Province, that there is Earth or Mold for 4 or 500 Feet deep without the least Stone, which contributes not a little to the Fertility of the Soil. I came to lie at Wan-bu-ching, after having travell'd 120 Li over the Hills. In the Morning every thing was frozen and even the smallest River; so that the Cold was very piercing, yet the Evening was exceeding hot. After quitting those Hills, we enter'd into a very fine, even, and populous Plain; here the Mountains form a spacious Hollow, leaving a large Opening between the West and South-West: they are 4 Leagues distant on the West Side, and somewhat less on the South-West.

The 9th, our Course was South-West by West. Advancing 6 or 7 Li, we left on the South to the City Yu-tse-byen; it has 4 Gates and seems to be square. Having gone 12 Li we came to a Borough inclosed with Walls of Earth, where we cross'd a Brook, which runs Westward. At the End of 15 Li we pass'd another Brook running Westward likewise; thence 11 Li to a Village, West-South-West; 10 Li farther to a Brook that runs Northwards; 7 Li beyond, to a Village, after which our Course was West-South-West. Three Li thence, to a River which we cross'd over a Wooden Bridge cover'd with Earth; it runs first to the West, and presently turns Northwards. 6 Li farther, to a Village, and then 8 Li more South West, to Syu-kyu-byen, where I dined after travelling 60 Li that Morning.

This City extends from North to South about 400 Paces, and less than 200 from East to West. The Walls are of Brick and very handsome: those which inclose its Suburbs are of Earth, with Brick Battlements. Having travell'd 45 Li farther and pass'd thro' several Villages, I came to lodge at Kya-lin. These Villages are so many little Cities, and some of them are of more Value than several Hyen: this joined to the Beauty of the Country, which is as level as a Bowling Green, and the Groves of Trees wherewith the Villages are surrounded, makes a most agreeable Landskip. In several Parts of this Plain, within the Compass of a Mile and half round, we saw 12 Villages at once; and taking in those farther off, we could reckon 20, each of which had several pretty high Towers.

The 10th I made 15 Li South-West to Ki-byen, lying on the Left. I pass'd thro' the West Suburb, which is large and inclosed with Walls of Earth; those of the City are of Brick and very fair, with Guard Houses and Towers at convenient Distances. It may be 12 or 1500 Paces in Compass. Travelling afterwards South-West by South we pass'd thro' several Villages; at the End of 42 Li we saw to the Left a very beautiful Temple dedicated to Tu-wan-shan-ti; thence West-South-West to U-li-chwan a large Village or Town where I dined 60 Li from the place whence I set out.

Ten Li farther I pass'd by Pin-yau-byen on the Left Hand, a fair City 1,500 or 2,000 Paces in Circuit. It is square; its Walls which are of Brick, are very fine, and flank'd with Towers at proper Distances; I counted 30, and between every two, 22 Battlements; there are 4 Gates, one in the Middle of each of the 4 Fronts of the Wall.

Our Course afterwards was South-West. Having travell'd 60 Li and pass'd thro' several large Towns, I lay at Chan-tfwen; the Road was croud'd with People who rais'd a dreadful Dust that was extremely troublesome. For these two last Days the Land appear'd more fat, black and tough than usual, and the Villages had fewer Towers; bet to make Amends most of them were inclos'd by Walls of Earth, with Brick Battlements, and often thick double Gates cover'd with Iron Plates fasten'd by great Nails.

River Fwen-bo.

City Ling-she-hyen.

The 11th, at the End of 14 Li we saw a fair Pagod on the Left Hand, our Course West South West; 6 Li farther to Kyay-hyew-hyen, a fair populous City; we pass'd thro' the North Suburb, which is a second City encompass'd with Walls; 10 Li from thence West-South-West, we found a Bridge and Pagod; and 10 farther another Bridge on the Left, with two wall'd Villages, 100 Paces from the Road, which might be taken for Cities. There we turn'd South-West along a small River on the Right Hand, call'd Fwen-bo, which rises in the Territory of Tay-ywen-fu; its Waters are yellow and muddy, like those of the Yellow River. Here the Mountains begin again, I travell'd however thro' a Valley 1,000 or 1,500 Paces broad; 10 Li farther we came to a large Village, and when we left it advanced South-South-West; opposite to it on the Right was a fair Stone Bridge over the Fwen-bo of 12 small Arches; presently after on the Left a Pagod and two Villages built on little Hills. In short, having rode in all 60 Li and pass'd several big Villages, I din'd in a large Burrough; and 20 Li farther arriv'd at Ling-she-hyen. This City takes up almost the whole Breadth of the Valley, altho' it does not exceed 300 Paces in Length from North to South, and 150 in Breadth from East to West; we left it to the Right, being wash'd by the Fwen-bo on the West Side.

Ten Li from the City Southward there is a Village on the Right Hand standing on a rising Ground, at the Foot of which we pass'd; there we quitted the Fwen-bo, which runs Westward into a Valley, and leaving on the South-East the Channel of a Torrent, which is broad and very stony, began to ascend a Hill, that seem'd to be about 100 Paces higher than the Surface of the Fwen-bo; the Way up was rugged, and at Top we found a Hamlet, 20 Li from where we set out: from whence descending 5 Li, we came to a Pagod, where there is a large stone Arch over a Torrent; afterwards we ascended for 5 Li, and then descended to Jin-i where I lay, 40 Li from Ling-she-hyen. We met an infinite Number of People on the Road; the Wind was so high as sometimes to hinder my Mule from advancing, and the Dust so darken'd the Sky, that at Noon we saw no better than if there had been a thick Fog. All the Hills, which are of Earth, are improv'd to the very Top and cut in Terraces; the Cavities and Precipices are equally well cultivated; for the last 30 Li, our Course was South-South-West.

City Cho-chew.

The 12th I rode 3 or 4 Li South-West by West. Afterwards I pass'd a Mountain, advancing South South East; on the Top there is a Village, 15 Li from Jin-i, from whence we descended Southward 10 Li: then our Course was Westward; 23 Li farther at the Foot of the Mountain we found a Pagod; here we enter'd a Valley above 600 Paces wide, wash'd on the Right Side by the Fwen-bo. After having travell'd this Mourning 60 Li I came to dine at Cho-chew on the same River. At the Entrance of the City, which is 200 Paces from East to West, and 400 from North to South, we pass'd a Brook over a little stone Bridge, on the Left of which we saw an Ox cast in Iron. From thence our Course was full South, where we saw a Pagod, then we ascended a Mountain; at the End of 36 Li we saw another Pagod on the Left, and found a charming Plain on the Top of the Mountain, which we descended, after we had gone 5 Li farther, our Course being South-South-West. Then we enter'd into a Valley like the former, where we found the Fwen-bo, which we kept always on our Right.

At length having travell'd 60 Li, I came to lodge at Chau-ching-hyen. The Extent of this City from North to South is 300 Paces and 200 from East to West; it is very populous. I saw there a fine Triumphal Arch of well cut Stone. The Road was always croud'd with People, and the Land extremely well cultivated. In these Mountains, there are Coal Pits, where they are at work continually; the horrible Caverns which we saw were probably form'd by the Ground falling into the exhausted Mines; however from the Top of any of these Mountains there is a charming Prospect over the vast Numbers of others that lye round it, all terrass'd and cover'd in Spring with a beautiful Green; on some of the Precipices there are scarce 3 or 4 Paces left for the Road.

Fair Bridge.

The 13th we advanced Southward; 3 Li from the City we cross'd a little River which falls into the Fwen-bo, after which we pass'd by a Village on the Left. A Li farther, our Course was South West, and 6 Li thence, we came to another Village, where we went up a little Hill; and 8 Li beyond it, to a large Village, where we descended into a fine Plain. At the Bottom of this Descent there is a handsome stone Bridge of 3 Arches over a Brook; 5 Li before we came to it, our Course began South-South-West. After we had pass'd some Villages and a fair Bridge 18 Paces long, always following the Fwen-bo, we arriv'd at Hong-tong-hyen, 12 Li farther. This City is 1800 Paces in Compass; we cross'd it, and at the North-West Angle, found a Pagod with an Obelisk; for 4 Miles together it seems to be one continued Town, lying along the Hill; this Plain, which is 40 Feet lower than the former, is at least a Mile broad to the River.

Departing from the City we cross'd a fine Bridge of 17 Arches, 60 Paces in Length; the Piers are of Free Stone, fasten'd together with large iron Keys; the Buttresses are thick and strong, supporting Figures of different Animals, couchant in projecture, and fasten'd by round Barrs of Iron, 3 Inches thick, among which are some Lions Whelps; it is paved with large square Stones, placed on Beams. At a Village 3 Li from Hong-tong we turn'd to the South-West by West; 10 Li thence we found a great Borough on the Right; 17 farther another, leaving which we saw a fine stone Bridge of 3 Arches, over a large Brook. I pass'd two other Villages, and two Bridges over the Fwen-bo.

Twenty Li beyond I dined at a great Borough, where I saw a fine stone Bridge of 7 Arches, with Rails or Side Walls, consisting of stone Pannels, grooved into the Posts; and adorn'd with Basso-relievo's, Chinese Characters, and 4 great Lions at the Corners; it is about 60 Paces in Length.

Ten Li farther is the City Pin-yang-fu, above 4 Miles in Circumference, where there is a Wooden Bridge over the Fwen-bo. Thence our Course was South-West; after I had rode 20 Li, and pass'd some Villages, I came to Tsyang-leng-byen; at the Entrance of this City, which is very populous, there is a Bridge with Rails or Side Walls cover'd with a Roof, supported by Wooden Pillars.

City *Pin-
yang-fu*.

City *Tsyang-

I travell'd all the Day in very pleasant and even Plains, tho' on different Levels; there is not an Inch of them uncultivated. Every thing here appear'd green, which I had not observed any where else; this no doubt was owing to the Multitude of Brooks, which descend on both Sides of the Hills, whose Waters are so well managed that every Body is supply'd with them.

These Hills afford a very beautiful Landkip, being stored with Corn, Pulse, Trees, and Villages, the Number of which is surprizing. As the Corn is sown in Beds, all this Part of the Country looks like a Garden; here I saw many of those Trees, call'd Tsay-tse (A), its Flower is yellow, and yields an Oyl used for Lamps. After passing the Fwen-bo, we found Rice sow'd on its Sides, which are marshy; the Road was every where crouded with People; and the Plains cover'd with Husbandmen sowing Pulse.

The Tree
Tsay-tse.

The 14 our Course was South-West by South; after we had rode 37 Li, in a Country like the former, I pass'd a Bridge of five handsome stone Arches, over a Torrent that runs between 2 large Villages; there is a wooden Triumphal Arch at each End. Three Li farther we came to a three-arch'd Bridge, and 20 beyond that to the City of Tay-ping-byen; it is small, and not very populous, but has a pretty large Suburb. A little before we got to it, I saw a Bridge cover'd with a Roof, which bears the Name of the flying Rain-Bow; it is a great Lattice of Timber, supported by wooden Arches, placed on a Bank of Stone, built over two stone Arches that are next the Land; the Chinese admire the Contrivance of it, and for that Reason, perhaps, have given it that whimsical Name; it is 7 or 8 Paces long, and was made by a skilful Carpenter.

City *Tay-
ping-byen*.

Remarkable Bridge.

Seven Li from Tay-ping we found another stone Bridge; after which our Course was South West, as far as Kyang-chew, where I lodged. This City is 3254 Paces in Circumference, situate on the right Side of the Fwen-bo; it has but two Gates, because one part of it stands on a rising Ground. From Pe-king hither I made the best Use I could of a good Mariner's Compass, to mark the Bearings.

City *Kyang-
chew*.

At Pin-yang-fu I left the great Road which leads to the Province of Sben-fi. I have said nothing of the Inns that are upon it, because they are like those which I have described in the Journal from Ning-po to Pe-king (B). The Houses design'd for the Reception of the Mandarins, call'd Kong-guan, have nothing remarkable; it is much if on their Journey they find Necessaries, but they have their own Servants, who buy and cook every thing according to their Liking.

The 5th of May I set out from Kyang-chew for Nan-king; that City stands, as I said, on a rising Ground, the River runs below in a fine well cultivated Plain, which bears Corn. I pass'd it over a wooden Bridge, my Litter being carry'd on the Shoulders of Men, (who wait for that Purpose) instead of the Mules, which they took out; perhaps because the Bridge is narrow and weak. The Christians accompany'd me to the River Side, where they had set a Table, with a Collation, according to the Custom of the Country, to take their Farewell of me; I just tasted of their Wine, that they might not think I slighted their Civility.

The Author's Journey to Nan-king.

The 6th I dined at I-chin-byen (c), 50 Li distant, our Course East. I pass'd thro' 5 Villages, some of which were encompass'd with Walls of Earth, but those of the last are of Brick. Going out of it, I pass'd along a hollow Road, where several Carts meeting stopp'd. The Chinese never fall into a Passion on such Occasions, but quietly assist one another. I had the Mountains always on the Right.

I-chin is in the District of Pin-yang-fu; the Walls are of Earth, with brick Parapets; the whole Country is cultivated, and near the City we saw several Sepulchres. We could get no Meat to buy at I-chin, the Mandarin thereof having forbidden the Selling any, in Hopes to obtain Rain, by that Sort of Fast; the Chinese at this time eat nothing but Rice, Pulse, and such things as had not Life; the Mandarins have Poultry in their Houses, which they cause to be dress'd: yet after all, Flesh is sold privately; for at Kyang-chew, where the same Prohibition was publish'd, we had Meat enough, and as cheap as at other times. I continued here the rest of the Day, because there was no Possibility of getting that Night to the Place where we should have lodged, on account of the bad Weather.

The 7th travelling 40 Li East-South-East, I came to dine at a large Village. 3 Quarters of a Mile beyond I-chin, we enter'd the Hills, which are all of good Mold; the Ascent is rugged, every scrap of them is cultivated, and sown, not excepting the very Precipices; beyond them is a cultivated Plain full of Villages and Trees. Here sometimes we beheld Terrasses one above another, consisting of 4 or 5 Feet of till'd Earth; it appear'd that the Chinese had sown Corn even on the Tops of the Hills. We found crouds of People on this Road; and saw Mountains to the West, South and East, which form a Semicircle.

Earthen
Ware.

I went 40 Li farther South-East, to lodge at a Borough named Wan-chay; one League from Lew-bu (D) we had other Hills to pass, which are stony, and the Country uncultivated, excepting in certain Valleys; a League farther we climbed another, the Descent of which was so steep, that I was forced to walk. I met with several Asses and Mules, carrying Earthen Kettles of the Colour of Iron; all this Country is poor, and the Road difficult.

City Tsinshui-hyen.

The 8th I dined at a Hamlet 40 Li distant [from Wan-chay] to the South-East, always advancing in a Valley between Hills, the Way being stony but perfectly even. I pass'd thro' a Hyen, named Tsin-shui (E), it is a small City with brick Walls. Leaving it we found two Towers, one on the right, the other on the left Hand, on the Tops of the two highest Mountains; likewise some Hamlets along the Road; Dinner was served up in Dishes of Earthen Ware, but not near so fine as the Dutch.

At the End of this City we climbed up a Mountain, where we met with some Hamlets. It is an Hours very difficult Journey, Carts can neither ascend nor descend it. In some Places the Road is so narrow, that they run a Risk of falling down the Precipices; these Parts are uncultivated.

Afterwards the Road was even, the Lands were tilled, and we pass'd by 2 or 3 Villages; we were however in a sort of Valley, for on both Sides we beheld the Tops of other Mountains higher than that we were on. I lay at Lew-tfwen, a pretty tolerable Borough; the Houses there were of Brick; our Course was South, the Distance 40 Li.

The 9th I dined at a little Village, the Distance 40 Li, Course South South East. I pass'd 3 Villages and some Hamlets; in one of which, call'd Yi-chin, they make those Iron colour'd Earthen Kettles mention'd before. The Road was even, and thro' a close Valley, whence the Tops of the Mountains appear'd only like Hillocks.

This Valley is stony, yet every where cultivated and planted with shady Trees: a Brook runs thro' the middle of it, among the Flints, sufficient to water both the Cattle and Land. At the End of it the Men and Horses ascend a very rugged Hill, Calashes and Litters continuing their Way in the Valley by the Side of it, above a Mile and an half farther; in which Space we pass'd 2 Villages, in the first whereof abundance of those Earthen Kettles are made. Having pass'd the 2d, I was obliged to clamber up a very steep Road; the Lands on every Side were sown, and the Ways so narrow that Carts cannot pass; on a Point of the Hill we saw the Walls of a ruin'd Castle.

I descended afterwards into a Valley, where is a Bridge, made of Stakes, over a Torrent or Rivulet, whose Water is yellow; then I went up another Hill: after which the Lands are very good and all tilled, the little Hills being cut in Terrasses to the Top, and each Terrass sown; I counted more than 40, one above another, several of them supported by Walls made of Stones, taken out of the Hills themselves. These Terrasses appear on all Sides for 2 or 3 Leagues together; the Country is diversify'd with Trees, Houses and Pagods built on Eminences.

Five or six Leagues on the right Hand I saw Hills much higher than those whereon I was. It is likely the Chinese have with vast Labour levell'd the Tops of most of these, in order to sow them. I lay at Chew-tfwen (F), a pretty Borough, enclosed with brick Walls, the Distance 40 Li, the Course South-South-East.

The 10th travelling 45 Li, I came to dine at the Village of Li-chwen; I judg'd our Course was South-East, for the Sun not appearing I could make no Observation (G). In the Way I cross'd three Mountains, and as many large Villages, besides 3 or 4 which I saw on the right Hand. The Ascent of the first Mountain is not very steep; we found very fine plowed Lands on the Top of it, but the Descent was rugged. The second Mountain is steeper, standing in the midst of little Hills, which are tilled, and cut in Terrasses, whereof in one Hill only I reckon'd more than a hundred; they are commonly 20 or 30 Feet in Breadth; tho' some are but 12, and even less, according to the steepness of the Descent.

Having advanced above a League, seeing nothing but little Hills, sown with Corn, and Thickets of Trees, we went up other stony Hills. The Roads were paved with large Flint Stones, but very uneven. The Terrasses on the Hills are here walled with Stone for a Mile and an half together. These Parts, which are plowed and cultivated with so much Toil, give us a better Idea of the Industry of the Chinese, than the Plains of Kyang-nan, Shan-tong, and Pe-che-li.

(E) In the Map it is writtn Tsin-chui.

(F) In the French it is writtn Tcheu-tfwen; here the ts should seem to have a different Sound from the ts and ts, which he uses in the Word Tsay-tze, (See p. 51. Note A), but as he is not uniform, I make no Scruple to convert it into ts.

(G) The Author in this Part of the Journey seems to have observed the Bearing by the Course of the Sun, and not by the Compass.

Beyond these little Hills, the Mountains began to be barren, excepting towards the Bottom, where the Land is cultivated. I saw some Places where they had begun to make Terrasses; they first gather all the Stones and pile them up to build Walls with, after which they level the Ground and sow it.

The third Mountain is still more rugged than the two former; in descending it I was forced to alight twice; after Rains, these Roads are impassible, the Flints being very slippery; I lay at Tsin-chau-i a large Village. Just beyond the Place where we dined, I ascended a Mountain; the rest of the Country is good and level; there appear on all Sides little plowed Hills, full of Trees, and a great Number of wall'd Terrasses. I pass'd thro' 6 or 7 Villages, some of which are pretty large, and built of Brick; I saw others in the Bottom, at the Foot of the Hills. On the Road we met a good many Mules and Asses loaded with Commodities from the Provinces of Ho-nan and Kyang-nan.

The 11th, I dined at the Town of Chan-pin, having travell'd 40 Li South East, and pass'd 5 or 6 little Towns or Villages; it is in the Province of Ho-nan. At setting out we went up a little Hill, after which we descended all the Way; we found a Road, made among the Rocks, along the Hills in form of a Terrass both lined and paved with Stone; it is 10 or 12 Feet wide, with a great Descent, and in rainy Weather so slippery, that it is impossible to go down it.

There are on this Road two or three little Forts to defend the Passage, one of which has thick Walls, whereon Soldiers might be drawn up. Beyond these little Hills we began to have a Sight of the Plains of Ho-nan. Every Part of the Mountains is improved, excepting where there are Rocks. We found multitudes of People on the Road, and so great a Number of loaded Mules and Asses that they often stopp'd up the Way.

After Dinner, I got rid of the Mountains. For two Leagues and an half the Road is rough and the Descents very steep, occasion'd by the Flints and Stones. Beyond a little Hill we discover'd the Whang-bo; its Course might be traced by the white Vapors, exhaled by the Sun. In the Space of a League and an half thro' the Plain, I pass'd thro' 6 Boroughs or Country Towns, some of which were very large. The Corn was high, and the Ears all form'd, in the Fields, whereas at 5 or 6 Leagues Distance, in the Mountains, it was still in Grass. The Country is charming; we saw Trees every where amidst the Corn and about the Villages: not an Inch of Ground is lost. I lay at Sin-wa-chin, having travell'd 40 Li East-South-East; it is a great Borough in the District of Wbay-king-fu.

The 12th I travell'd 30 Li, to a little Village where there was not a Room to dine in; thence 40 Li, to a Borough named Mu-lang, where I lodged. The Country all the Way was even and cultivated; however I pass'd thro' 9 or 10 pitiful Villages.

The 13th I went 60 Li South-East to Wan-ciuwen, where I both dined and supp'd; it is a Borough depending on Kay-fong-fu. The Country all this Day was charming, with Villages on both Sides of the Road. We saw there little Carts with 4 solid Wheels, and not 3 Foot in Diameter, drawn by Oxen, Asses, Mules, and Horses, all mixt together, 4 or 5 in a breast. I rested in this Borough, because the Place where I was to have lodged was too far off. I saw Corn sown in Lines, like Rice, not above 6 Inches asunder. I saw it also sown the common Way as in Europe, but those Fields are plow'd without leaving Ridges.

The 14th, we advanced 60 Li East-South-East to the Whang-bo; we saw Villages on both Hands, but they were sorry ones; the River was 6 or 7 Li broad in this Place, and it is as much as the Eye can do to reach from one Side to the other. I never beheld a more rapid Stream, but it is not very deep, for being got about a third part over, I observed they reached the Bottom with a Pole; I paid no more than 30 Sols for a Bark which carry'd over all my Baggage. Having pass'd the Whang-bo I rode 20 Li farther to a Town; our Course was about East-South-East, for the Sun did not shine. (H)

The 15th, travelling East by South 70 Li, I arrived at Kay-fong-fu; we found nothing to eat, either on the Road or in the Inns, but Bread not half baked and a little Rice, dress'd after the Chinese Manner; every Body buys and cooks his own Victuals. We lodged in the Suburb without entering the City; for a few Days before, 60 Men having broken into the Mandarin's House, and carry'd off the Tyen-lyang (1), or Tribute Money, Guards were placed at the Gates to hinder any from going in or out, till they were all taken, as several of them had been already. [This is the Metropolis of Ho-nan.]

The 16th, passing along Part of the Walls of the City, I counted the Steps of a Mule Driver, who walk'd before me, and computed that Side of the Town to have been 1000 Geometrical Paces long; the Walls are of Brick, and in good Repair, with little square Bastions at proper Distances. The Country this Day appear'd charming; we saw more Houses and Villages than before, and steer'd our Course South-Eastward. Having travell'd 55 Li, I pass'd thro' Cbing-lyew-byen, a City inclosed by brick Walls, with Bastions. I lay at Han-kang-chin, a great Borough 25 Li farther.

The 17th, advancing 30 Li I came to the City Ki-byen, whose Walls are of Brick, with Towers at certain Intervals; on one Side they seem'd to extend not above 300 Fathom; I left it on the Right. From hence to Tye-fu-tse, the place where I lodged, the Country was full of Villages, whereof I often counted 12 at a time, and pass'd thro' 13 or 14; our Course still East-South-East, and our Stage in all 80 Li. The Road was very finely planted on both Sides with Trees like a Garden Walk, and crouded with People.

Each of these Villages had belonging to it a high House like a small square Tower, which the Inhabitants make Use of for securing their Effects in troublesome Times, or when they fear the Irruptions of Robbers, &c. these are private Houses of rich People, such as Mandarins, Soldiers, &c.

The 18th, I left Tye-fu-tse, the Gates of which are so low, that my Litter was twice in Danger of being broken. The Road continued to be planted with Trees; at the End of 45 Li, I pass'd thro' Hyan-bi-pu, a large, and very long Village; thence 20 Li to Nbing-lu-hyen, where I dined and supp'd, because there were no Inns within 70 Li.

lu-hyen.

This City depends on Quey-te-fu (κ); it appear'd to be large, but waste, and poor within; its Ditches are fill'd with Water; its Walls are of Brick, with Towers at convenient Distances. Our Course was East by South. From Kay-fong hither, I found on the Road from time to time these small Towers or Centry Boxes, with Bells in some of them; this Day I pass'd thro' 8 or 9 Villages.

The 19th, having travell'd 80 Li, I came to Tsay-kya-tau-kew (L), a great Borough, where I dined and lay; the continual Rain hinder'd me from estimating the Course. I left Quey-te-fu on the left Hand, which makes me believe we travell'd South-East, supposing the Account they gave of its Situation to be true; the Country was agreeable all the Way. I pass'd by a handsome burying Place, where we saw Marble Lions, in a very thick Wood.

The 20th, I did not proceed because of the Rain; the Ground was become so soft that there was no sure Footing. The 21st, having travell'd 90 Li, South-East, according to the Report of our Muleteers (for the Sun did not shine), I came to Wbe-tin-tse (M), a great Borough; the Plains were all over fine, and the Roads and Villages beset with Trees.

City Yang-
ching-hyen.

The 22d, I proceeded 90 Li South East, and partly South. I dined at a large Village, just half way, after which I pass'd thro' the City Yang-ching-hyen; it is small within the Walls, but its Suburbs are very large. This Afternoon, I counted 12 Villages, which I saw all at once on my left Hand; almost all of them have little square Towers, by which they are distinguish'd at a Distance, but we saw no more such Numbers of Trees.

Kyang-nan.

The 23d, having advanced 20 Li, I pass'd through Tung-tye-fu-tsu (N), a small Borough, where the Province of Kyang-nan begins. I dined at Pe-kang-i another Village; our Course was South-East in all 40 Li, and advancing South 40 Li farther, lay at the Village of Sang-pu: all these Villages depend on Fong-yang-fu. I had Mountains all Day long to the Eastward, at 5 or 6 Leagues Distance. The Country was almost destitute of Trees, except in the Villages, which are very numerous, and furnish'd with little square Towers. I saw the Chinese thresh their Corn spread on the Ground, by rowling a Cylinder of black unwrought Marble over it; it was 2 Feet in Diameter, about 2 Feet and an half long, and drawn by two Oxen, with Ropes fasten'd to the Axelree of the Rowler.

City Syew-
chew.

Monday the 24th, at the End of 30 Li, I pass'd near Syew-chew; its Walls appear'd in no very good Condition, but its Suburbs are large. I dined at a Village, 45 Li South-South-East from thence; and lay at another named Fan-chang-tse, 35 Li farther, the bad Weather and Rain would not permit me to observe the Bearing.

The Houses of these Villages are very poor; we found nothing to eat in them. At Dinner I saw a parcel of Silk Worms, on a Mat, feeding on Mulberry Leaves. Those which were ready to Spin their Silk were put into Boxes of dry Reeds; the Cods which they make are small; I was told, those of the Province of Che-kyang are twice or thrice as big.

The 25th I travell'd 50 Li, without observing the Bearing, to Lyen-chin-tse, where I dined; this is a great Borough, where there are two Bridges over two Rivulets, or rather Brooks, which the Rains make navigable for Boats, and run no farther than some neighbouring Villages. I lay at Ku-chin, another Borough 30 Li farther. The Soil was marshy, and not so good as that of Ho-nan; these are Pasture Grounds for Cattle, where I saw numerous Flocks of Sheep. The Rain, which fell the two preceding Days, had so spoil'd the Roads, that I was forced to travel continually in puddles of Water.

The 26th, I proceeded 60 Li, to Sang-pu, but by turning out of the Way so often, to avoid the Water, I travell'd above 80 Li. Twenty Li from Sang-pu, is the City Fong-yang-fu; I believe our Course was South. We were obliged to, pass thro' the Water, which in some Places was two or three Feet deep, and in the rainy Season renders travelling very difficult; however, Corn grows there. I took Guides to conduct me thro' the Fields; a Ridge of Mountains appear'd, extending from South-West to South, and even some what Eastward.

The 27th, at the End of 30 Li, I came to a small City, where we cross'd the Wbay-bo, which River is about 70 Geometrical Paces broad; it has a Communication with the Whang- Wbang-bo, and thereby with Nan-king. I lay at Wban-ni-pu, 40 Li farther: all this Country is full of Pasture.

The 28th I dined at Tjen-kyu-pu (o), a large Village, 40 Li, and lay at Che-bo-yi, a great Borough, 30 Li farther; at the Entrance of it is a Bridge, with 30 Posts, over which we cross'd a little River. I believe our whole Course was South somewhat Easterly, through Roads, which were broken by the preceding Days Rains, but throng'd with People, and full of Villages.

The 29th, advancing 50 Li South, I came to Chu-lu-kyau, another Village, where I dined and supped; about half a League from our setting out, I enter'd among Hills, which are neither high, nor the Road rugged, but I saw few cultivated Lands.

The 30th, having travell'd a League, I was forced to climb a very steep Mountain; The Way up is paved with Stones. There are some Houses upon it, and a stone Arch, 40 or 50 Feet long, under which we pass'd; the Descent is easier.

Forty Li farther, we came to Hye-chew; this City is encompass'd with a Fosse, fill'd with Water, 60 Fathom wide; it stands on a rising Ground, and the Country round it is well cover'd with Trees; the Suburb thro' which we pass'd, is very large, where we saw some Triumphal Arches and a Tower.

Thence 20 Li South East, is Tan-tye-kan, a Borough, where I dined. I lay at Tsi-i-kyo (p), another Borough, 40 Li beyond. The Plains were full of Rice. I saw them thresh the Corn with a Flail, as in Europe, also squeeze out the Grain with a Marble Rowler, drawn by a Buffalo.

The 31st I proceeded 50 Li East, to Pu-kew; a League before we came to it, we enter'd among Hills, of a pretty easy Ascent; and descended gradually to this Place, which is a great Borough, encompass'd by Walls, carry'd over a Hill, overlooking the River [Yang-tse-kyang] like a Citadel, only it is too high to command it; it makes a Nook on the East Side, which extends to another Hill where there is a Tower.

The Yang-tse-kyang is almost a League broad in this Place. Nan-king stands 30 Li South by East of Pu-kew. We landed on the other Side, a good League below Pu-kew to the South-South-East, where we enter'd a River, which, two Leagues thence, brought us to the Gate of Nan-king, along whose Walls we went for the Space of a Mile and half. There were on this River a great Number of Imperial Barks, for the Use of the Mandarins.

In crossing over from Pu-kew, we observed the Course of that great River, as far as we could see, was East-North-East: afterwards nearer Nan-king, North-East, as far as a Hill at Pu-kew, where there is a Tower; and from Nan-king to that Tower it runs North, for the Space of 3 Leagues. They told me when I cross'd it, that it was 36 Shang deep, that is, 360 She or Feet.

The Road taken from Pe-king to Kan-ton, by P. Bouvet, when sent by the Emperor Kang-hi into EUROPE, in the Year 1693.

THE Emperor having done me the Honour to nominate me for the Voyage into Europe, was pleas'd that I should travel to Kan-ton, with a Mandarin of the 3d Order, named Tong-Lau-ya, and a Portuguese Jesuit, whom his Majesty sent to Makau to meet P. Grimaldi, who was return'd from Europe, whither he had been dispatch'd by the Emperor's Orders.

The 8th of July 1693, was the Day fix'd for our Departure; and the Mandarin was charg'd to hasten the Dispatches for this Journey, by the Ping-pu, or sovereign Tribunal (Q), of the Soldiers: where it was resolv'd that I should have 8 Horses for myself and Attendants, and might depart next Day, at what Hour I thought fit.

This Patent of the Ping-pu, which is call'd Kang-bo, consists of a large Sheet of Paper, printed in Tartarian and Chinese Characters, and furnish'd with the Seal of the Court: it contains to this Effect, "That the supreme Tribunal of Ping-pu gave me this Kang-bo by the Emperor's Order, who sent me from Court on his own Business, and was willing I should take my Journey by Kan-ton. It order'd all the Heads of the Tribunals of Cities, and "Places where there were Post Houses, to provide without Delay the appointed Number of Horses, with all Necessaries on the Road, for the Subsistence of myself, and Retinue; "to lodge me in the Kong-quan, or public Inns, for the Reception of Officers, dispatch'd from Court; and when I should be oblig'd to proceed by Water, to furnish me with "Barks and all other Necessaries for my Voyage, &c." the Seal impress'd hereon was square, and 3 Inches broad, without any other Figure or Character than the Name of the Tribunal of the Ping-pu, which on one Side was in Tartarian Characters, and on the other in Chinese. The Seals of all the Tribunals are of the same form. At the Bottom of the Patent were the Names of the Tartarian and Chinese Presidents of the Court, with the Date, which was in these Words, "The 6th Day of the 5th Month of the 32d Year of the Reign of Kang-hi."

I departed

Field from Pe-king to Kan-ton.

I departed accordingly from Pe-king the 8th of July, at 6 in the Evening. I sent a Servant before me Post, to acquaint the Mandarin, in whose Company I was to travel, that I would meet him at the Place appointed, as I did, but not without much Difficulty. We were overtaken by the Night, 3 Leagues beyond Pe-king, and we had 4 more to go; but we went astray every Moment, and I wander'd 9 or 10 Hours thro' thick and thin, so that it was Day-break before I arrived at the South Gate of Lyang-byang-byen, where the Mandarin waited for me. I had scarce lighted off my Horse, when I was obliged to mount again to perform that Day's Journey of 140 Li, that is, two Posts of 7 Leagues each; the first as far as Tjo-chew, the other to Sin-ching-byen. (R)

Posts.

In all the Cities on the great Roads there are ordinatily I-ma, or Offices, where more than 100 or 150 Post-Horses are kept, and when they are at too great a Distance, there are Post Houses between. Whoever travels with the Kang-bo, always finds, at the Places where he dines or sups, fresh Horses, with a Lodging prepared by the Mandarin of the Place.

Kong-quan, or Inns for the Mandarins.

These Lodgings, which they call Kong-quan, ought to be accommodated for the Reception of great Lords; but as there are none to be found in several Cities, especially those that were ruin'd by the late Wars, the Mandarin causes the best Inn, which the Place affords, to be prepar'd for that Purpose, and erects it into a Kong-quan, by fastening a Piece of red Silk in form of a Curtain over the Door, and providing a Table and Chair covered with Silk slightly embroider'd; this at present is all the Furniture of most Inns where the Grandeeds lodge in their Journeys. One never finds a Bed in any of them; it being the Custom for Travellers to carry that Conveniency with them, unless they like to lie cool and hard, on a single Mat.

The 10th, our Stage was like the former, that is, of 14 Leagues; 7 Leagues to Hyong-byen, and as many more to Jin-kyew-byen. When we arrived at any City, we commonly found the Mandarins without the Walls, clothed in their Habit of Ceremony, who came to meet us, to do us the more Honour.

We were scarcely got to our Inn, when they came to visit us; besides the Tables, which we found well enough furnish'd, the principal Mandarin seldom fail'd to send each of us another Table full of Meat, boiled and roasted, with which we treated those who accompany'd us: for besides our Servants each of us had 4 or 5 Pey-pau, or Ma-pay, Servants of the Posts, paid by the Emperor. Some of these served us for Guides, and others to carry our Baggage, all mounted on Post Horses; not to mention ten or a dozen Troopers armed, with Bows and Arrows to convoy us, whom we changed every Post. The Ping-pu had regulated it in this Manner, by another Dispatch, different from the Kang-bo, which the Tribunal had put into the Hands of Tong Lau-ya.

The 11th, we rode but one Post of 7 Leagues to Ho-kyen-fu. The 12th, we advanced 3 Posts: the first of 6 Leagues to Hyen-byen; the second of Six Leagues also, to Fu-chwang-i; and the third of 3 Leagues, to Fu-ching-byen.

City to Chew.

The 13th, we travell'd two Posts: the first 6 Leagues, to King-chew; the second 7, to Te-chew, a City in the Province of Shan-tong, situated on the Side of that long and famous Canal, made for conveying the Tribute of Rice from the Southern Provinces to Pe-king: which is performed every Year in the great and magnificent Imperial Barks, called Lyang-chwen.

The Canal in this Place separates the Province of Pe-che-li, from that of Shan-tong. We found at every Mile and half Distance throughout this Road Tsun-tay (s), or Guard Houses: with a little Terrace built in form of a Cavalier, to look out, and make Signals in Case of Tumults or Rebellions.

The 14th we made two Posts of 7 Leagues each; one to Ngen-byen; the second to Kau-tang-chew. One of the two Missionaries who was with me, being disorder'd with riding, was obliged to quit his Horse, and take a Calash, which made us shorten our Journeys for some time. One has the Advantage in having a Kang-bo, of riding as many Posts a Day as he pleases.

The 15th, our Stage was 2 Posts of 6 Leagues each, the first to Tsin-ping-byen, the second to Tong-kyew-ell.

The 16th three Posts: the first of 4 Leagues, the second of 8 to Tong-ping-chew, and the third of 6 Leagues to Wen-chang-byen (T). We arrived there late at Night, because the Stage was long; and notwithstanding the Diligence of the Mandarins, we were stopp'd at two Rivers, where not finding a Bark large enough to carry them, we were obliged to unsaddle our Horses, and swim them over.

From Pe-king to Tong-ngo-byen, thro' which we only pass'd, (excepting the long Chain of Mountains, call'd Si-shan or the Mountains of the West, which we left on the Right, after our second Days Journey,) all the Country is flat and level, nothing appearing to view but a vast Plain; but after we had pass'd Tong-ngo-byen, we travell'd for some Hours between Mountains, and were much incommoded by the Heat.

(R) By the Map Tjo-chew is twice as far from Peking as Sin-ching.

(S) Orig. Tsun-tay. We don't meet with the Word than in the Tables of Terms, nor is there any Word beginning with ts in the Language, it should perhaps be Tsun-tay or Tun-tay.

(T) The first Word of this Name in the French is Yen, which can be no otherwise express'd then by Wen or Fwen.

The 17th our Stage was 2 Posts; one 4 Leagues and a half to Sin-kyai, the other 4 Leagues to Yen-chew-fu. Before we came to this last City, we found for the Space of two Miles and a quarter, the Country laid waste by a frightful multitude of Grass-hoppers, call'd Whang-chong, that is, the Yellow Insect, from their Colour: the Air was full of them, and the Earth cover'd in such a Manner, even in the great Roads, that our Horses could not move without raising Clouds of them at every Step. These Insects had already entirely destroy'd the Hopes of the Harvest in this Country; however, the Mischief did not extend far, for within a League of the Place, where this Havock was made, all was perfectly safe.

The 18th we rode three Posts: the first to Tseu-byen (τ) 5 Leagues, the second to Kyay-bo-i, 5 Leagues and an half, and the third to Teng-byen, 3 Leagues and an half; where the Mandarin, finding no Inn fit to receive us, had us conducted to the Palace of Kong-fu-tse or Confucius. There are the like in all the Cities of China, where the Mandarins and Grandeers assemble at certain Times of the Year, to pay their Respects to the Memory of that Prince of the Chinese Philosophers.

The 19th, two Posts of 8 Leagues each, the first to Ling-ching-i, the second to Li-ko-i, in the Province of Kyang-nan. The extreme Heat of the Season as well as Climate, obliged us to travel Part of the Night.

The 20th, we went but one Post of 7 Leagues to Syu-chew, a City of the second Rank, situate on the Southern Bank of the Whang-bo or Yellow River; so named from the Colour of its troubled Waters, mixt with a yellowish Earth, which is continually wash'd off its Channel by the Rapidity of its Stream. This River, tho' large and deep, is not navigable, because it is almost impossible to sail against the Stream without a strong Wind. It often changes its Bed, and sometimes ruins its Banks in such a Manner, as of a sudden to overflow the Plains and drown whole Villages and Cities; it is 5 or 600 Paces broad over-against Syu-chew, where we cross'd it.

Whang-bo or Yellow River.

At our landing on the other Side, we found the Chi-chew, or Governor of the City, named Kong-Lau-ya, one of Descendants of Confucius, whose Family has continued in a direct Line for above 2000 Years. We received all sorts of Civility from him; he waited for us by the River Side, where he regaled us with Tea and Fruit; afterwards he came to visit us at our Inn, and sent us Tables loaded with Victuals. Coming to know that my Horse had a troublesome Gate, he offer'd me his own, and sent over Night Men belonging to his Tribunal, 5 Leagues from his City, to prepare Dinner for us next Day. I went to visit him, and recommended to his Protection two Churches which we had in this City, formerly erected by P. Couplet.

The 21st, we travell'd three Posts; the first to Tau-shan-i, 5 Leagues, the second to Kya-kew-i, 4 Leagues, and the third to Syew-chew, 6 Leagues. From Tong-ngo-byen hither we had both on the Right and Left a long Chain of desert Mountains; between which we generally found level and well cultivated Plains of vast Extent.

The 22d, we advanced two Stages, one to Ta-lyen-i, 5 Leagues; the other to Ku-ching-i, 7 Leagues.

The 23d, two Stages of 6 Leagues each; the first to Vang-chwang-i, and the second to Hau-lyang-i. As we left Vang-chwang-i we discover'd at a great Distance, towards the South-West, the Mountain In-yu-shan, that is the Mountain of the Agat Seal, because there the Yu-she is found, which is a kind of precious Stone, like Agat, whereof they make Seals of all Sizes. The Imperial Seal is made of this Stone, whence the Mountain has the Name of In-yu-shan.

Agat Mountain.

The 24th, two Stages; one of 4 Leagues and an half to Hong-sin, the other of 6 to Ting-ywen-byen.

The 25th, three Stages; the first to Ghang-kyau-i, 4 Leagues and an half, the second to Fu-ching-i, 6, and the third to Tyen-fu-i, 4 Leagues and a half.

This Day, about a quarter of an Hour before Sun rise, I saw a Phenomenon in the Sky, which I never met with before, or heard of in France, tho' it is very common in the East; especially in Siam and China, where I have observed it above twenty Times, both in the Mornings and Evenings, at Sea and at Land, and even at Pe-king. This Meteor consists of certain Semi-Circles of Light and Shade, which seem to terminate and unite in two opposite Points of the Heavens, namely, in the Center of the Sun, and in the Point diametrically opposite. As all these Semi-Circles terminate in a Point, both in the East and West, that is towards the opposite Points of their Union, and enlarge uniformly towards the middle of the Sky, in Proportion to their Distance from the Horizon; they make a Figure not much unlike the celestial Houses, as they are mark'd on Globes, with only this Difference, that these Zones of Light and Shade are commonly of a very unequal Breadth, and often have Breaks in them, especially when the Phenomenon is not well form'd.

Meteor in the Sky.

As often as I have observed it, (and I saw it four several times during this Journey in less than 15 Days,) I always remark'd that the Weather was extremely hot, the Sky full of Vapours and inclinable to Thunder, and that a great thick Cloud half open stood over-against the Sun. This Meteor seem'd, as to its Figure, very different from those long Streaks of Shade and Light, often seen in the Sky at Morning and Evening, as well in Europe as elsewhere, and which take the Name of Verges (v), or Wands, from their pyramidal Figure.

The Cause of this Phenomenon, appearing rather in Asia than Europe, and in Summer than at other Seasons, seems to me to be owing to the Nature of the Asiatick Lands; which being generally more impregnated with Nitre than those of Europe, fill the Atmosphere, especially in Summer, and when the Sun has greatest Power, with Nitrous Exhalations; which being equally diffused through the Air, render it more fit to reflect the Light, and consequently to form the Meteor.

cheu-fu.

The 26th, we rode two Stages, the first 3 Leagues and an half to Lyu-cheu-fu, the second 6 to Lo-i. The City of Lyu-cheu appear'd to me more populous and better built than any of the Cities I had seen since I left Pe-king. I met with nothing there remarkable, excepting some Triumphal Arches, Towers, and Marble Bridges. There are many Villages on this Road, partly desert and destitute of Houses, which have not been re-built since they were ruin'd by the Tartars, who conquer'd China, and are its present Masters.

Tallow Tree.

The 27th, we made two Stages; one of 6 Leagues and a half to San-kew-i, the other of 2 Leagues to Yu-ching-byen, and 4 more to Mey-jin-i. This Day we first saw in the Plain several of those extraordinary Trees, which bear the Tallow, whereof they make the Candles used in most Provinces of the Empire.

The 28th, two Stages; the first 6 Leagues to Lü-ting-i, the second 2 Leagues to Tong-ching-byen, and then 4 more to Tau-chuen-i. This Day and the four following we travell'd continually between Mountains, infested with Tigers, and thro' very rugged Roads. As the extreme Heat obliged us to set out 2 or 3 Hours before Day, we took Guides who carry'd Torches, that serv'd both to Light us, and scare those fierce Beasts, who are afraid of Fire.

The 29th, we rode two Stages of 6 Leagues each, one to Tsing-kew-i, the other to Syau-che-i.

The 30th, three Stages; the first 6 Leagues to Fong-hyang-i, the second 6 more to Ting-fyen-i, which is in the Province of Hu-quang, as well as the third of 4 Leagues to Whang-mey-byen. Altho' the Country we pass'd thro' these three last Days, and the two following, was frightful and incumber'd with long Chains of barren and uncultivated Mountains, yet the Valleys and Plains which separate them in a thousand Places, are very fertile and well improved; nor was there an Inch of arable Land in all that Space, but what was cover'd with very good Rice. I admir'd here the Industry of the Chinese; for it is astonishing to see how they lay straight all the unequal Ground between those Mountains, that is fit for plowing, and divide, as it were, into Parterres, the Parts that are on a level, and into Terrasses in Form of an Amphitheatre, those which have Rifings and Hollows.

City Kyew-

The 31st we rode three Stages; the first 4 Leagues to Kong-long-i, in the Province of Kyang-shi, the second 6 Leagues to the City Kyew-kyang-fu, on the Side of that great and fine River call'd Kyang, that is to say the River, by Way of Excellence. Over-against Kyew-kyang, where we pass'd it, it is very rapid, and almost a Mile and an half in Breadth. They catch excellent Fish in this Part, and among the rest a kind of Dorado, call'd (w) Whang-yu, or the Yellow Fish, which is very large and of a most delicious Taste. We lodged in a real Kong-quan, or Hotel of the Mandarins; I imagined by the Largeness of its Halls and Apartments, built in form of a Pagod, that it had been design'd at first for an Idol Temple.

City Te-
byen.

As the Roads to Nang-chang-fu, the Capital of the Province, two large Days Journey distant, were very rugged, and the Horses of the Country very bad, we were advis'd to take Chairs, and made that Day a third Stage of 6 Leagues to Tong-yuen-i, travelling great Part of the Night. The two following Day's Journey being long, instead of four Chairmen, they furnish'd each of us with eight, to relieve one another, and three for our Servants; each of them was carry'd by two Men on Poles, made of two great Bambu's join'd together by means of 2 others, laid across them, we had other Men both to carry our Baggage and light us with Torches, with which Assistance we easily travell'd the most difficult Part of all our Road.

August the 1st, we made our Stage in the same Manner to Te-ngan-byen. This Stage is no more than 60 Li, or 6 Leagues, but it seem'd to me to be 7 at least. I perceiv'd for the last 4 or 5 Days, that the Li were longer, than they were at our first setting out, and indeed I had often been told, that there was a Difference between the Li or Furlongs in the North, and those in the South, being shortest about Pe-king.

As there were no Inns in this City, fit for lodging us all, they led me to the Temple of Ching-hobang, that is, the tutelar Spirit of the City. The Bonza, who had the Care of it, immediately spread a Table, and a little Bed in the middle of the Temple. Altho' the Chinese pay Honours to the Guardian Genii of each Place in these Temples, yet they represent them under a human Form.

On asking this Bonza a few Questions, I found he was exceeding ignorant; he did not know whether the Image he adored, represented some Spirit, or great Personage of Antiquity; what Power they ascribed to it, or what they intended by placing it on the Altar. I forbore asking him any more Questions, for Fear of teaching him Errors which he was ignorant ignorant of. I therefore changed the Conversation, and made a long Discourse, concerning the Existence of the Supreme Being, and his principal Attributes; the Creation of the Heavens, Earth and Man; the Incarnation of Jesus Christ; the Obligation we are under, of knowing, loving, and serving this Supreme Being, as our first Principle and ultimate End; to know his Law, and observe it. I shew'd him, that this Law is the Christian Religion, which I was come from the farthest Part of the Earth, to promulge in China; that it is the only one which teaches Man to know himself thoroughly, by giving him to understand, that he is composed of a Body and Soul; the former corruptible and mortal, the latter spiritual and immortal, capable of Joy and Grief, Pleasure and Pain, even after it is separated from the Body by Death; that the Souls of all Men, after their Decease, do, by an irrevocable Decree of their Creator and Judge, receive the Reward of their Merits and good Actions, if they have lived conformable to his Law, by ascending to Heaven, there to live eternally happy, and enjoy the Presence of God himself; that, on the contrary, if they have despised or violated this holy Law, they receive a Punishment in Proportion to the grievousness of their Crimes, by going to Hell, where they suffer everlastingly the Rigour of the Flames, kindled by the Breath of an incensed Deity, &c.

All the while I was speaking, which was near two Hours, the Bonza, who appear'd very attentive and touch'd, did not once interrupt me. I concluded by shewing the Obligation he was under of searching out and following the Truth. I added that, if after what he had heard, he judg'd, this Truth was to be found in the Religion, whose Fundamentals I had explain'd, I counsel'd him, in return for the kind Entertainment he had given me, to allow himself to be instructed; that it was but a Step to Nang-chang-fu, where there was a Temple dedicated to the true God, and where he would find one of my Brothers, who would expound that Doctrine to him, the knowledge whereof is more precious than all the Treasures on Earth.

The Bonza received my Advice, and heard my Instructions, with equal Signs of Joy. However, I dare not flatter myself with having made a Convert of him; his Profession as a Bonza, (without which he must have been in miserable Circumstances) gave him a comfortable Subsistence; and I know by Experience, that this Consideration is commonly a greater Obstacle to the Conversion of this sort of Men, than any Attachment they can possibly have, either to their Religion, which they have scarce any Knowledge of, or to a State of Life, which Necessity alone has obliged them to embrace.

The 2d, we made two Stages in Chairs, 6 Leagues each; the first to Kyen-chang-hyen, the latter to a Village 4 Leagues distant from Nan-chang-fu, the Capital City of Kyang-fu, where we were to embark. As the City is on the other Side of the River, we found on our Arrival one of those imperial Barks as big as Ships, painted and gilded, which was prepar'd for carrying us across.

Imperial
great Barks.

As soon as we had gotten over, the Vice-Roy appeared with other Mandarins, who invited us to land, and conducted us to a very neat Kong-quan, which is by the River; when we came to the middle of the second Court, the Vice-Roy, with the six other Chief Mandarins who accompany'd him, fell on their Knees over-against the great Hall, at the Foot of the great Stair Case, and turning towards us, he ask'd in form concerning the Emperor's Health, which none but Officers of this Rank are privileged to do; Tong Lau-ya made Answer, and inform'd them that his Majesty was perfectly cured.

The Vice-Roy and Mandarins then rising, he caus'd us to enter into the Hall, where they had set two Rows of Arm-Chairs, opposite to each other, as soon as we were seated, they presented us with Dishes of Tea, after the Tartar and Chinese Manner, which we drank with Ceremony; after this, we went altogether to a Dinner prepared at the End of the Hall.

As this Entertainment was partly after the Tartar, and partly after the Chinese Manner, those troublesome Ceremonies used in Chinese Banquets were dispensed with. After Dinner the Vice-Roy and Mandarins conducted us to the River Side, where lighter Barks were got ready, which we demanded for greater Dispatch; there was one for Tong Lau-ya, one for the 2 other Fathers, and a third for myself.

These Barks are very commodious and neat. They are painted, gilded and japanned with their beautiful Varnish without as well as within. We had a Bed Chamber and a great Parlor with two Windows on each Side; not to mention the other Apartments, for our Servants, and those to lodge the Master of the Bark and his Family.

Lighter
Barks.

The 5th, we got at least 10 Leagues to Fong-ching-hyen, where they brought us Provision and Refreshments. On the Road by Water, there are at the End of every League, Tang, or Guard Houses, where there are commonly 8 or 10 Soldiers.

The 6th, we pass'd thro' Fong-ching-hyen, and went to dine 6 Leagues from thence at Chang-shu, a famous Place of Trade, for all sort of Drougs and Medicinal Roots. This Day and the two following we made but little Way, because of the Shallows, which we found almost every Moment. We pass'd thro' some Cities, and arrived at Ki-ngan-fu, 40 Leagues from Nan-chang-fu. I saw nothing during these three Days worth Remark. Our Passage was continually between uninhabited and uncultivated Mountains, which form'd two Ridges running parallel, one on each Side of the River.

that time governed by the Franciscans, and under the Care of P. Gregory Ybañes a Spaniard. I said Mass in his Church, which was very neat.

The 13th, we pass'd thro' Tay-bo-byen, and advanced no more than 10 Leagues.

The 11th, we sail'd 10 Leagues farther to Wan-ngan-byen. The Chi-byen, or Governor, who is a Christian only in Name, tho' his Wife is very vertuous, shew'd us no Marks of Civility.

The 12th, we went 11 Leagues to the Village Lyang-kew.

The 13th, in the Morning we sail'd 3 Leagues to Yew-ching-i, and in the Afternoon 7, passing the Night 3 Leagues short of Kan-cheu-fu.

The 14th, we arrived early in the Morning at Kan-cheu-fu, a great and very populous City. The Tsong-ping, or Commander General of the Militia of this City's whole District, named Cbang Lau-ya, with other Mandarins, came to receive us at the River Side, and invited us to Dinner.

After these Civilities, which we returned the best we could, I went to our Church, where I found P. Gresson, who had labour'd near 40 Years with great Zeal and Success in the Conversion of the Chinese; especially in this City, where he succeeded P. le Faure, who grew old in the Apostolick Labours, and dy'd in the Odour of Sanctity.

As the Tsong-ping was a particular Friend of Tong Lau-ya, our Conductor, and had a great Esteem and Friendship for P. Gresson, we could not refuse the Invitation he gave us to his House, where we had all the Liberty we demanded; only instead of the Comedy, which usually accompanies a Chinese Entertainment, this was interrupted by a Diversion, common among the Tartars, of shooting at a Mark; the Law observed in this Sport is, that he who hits the Mark, obliges the rest to drink his Health in a small Cup of Wine.

This Sport came in Vogue about two Years before, when the Emperor Kang-hi perceiving the Effeminacies and Indolence of the Tartars, who are all obliged to learn the Art of War, resolv'd by his own Example to introduce this Exercise among the Grandees, and Prime Mandarins of his Court. That mighty Prince who shot an Arrow with great Strength and Justness, was pleas'd to spend several Hours every Day in this Recreation. The Mandarins who were obliged to try their Skill at an Exercise which was new to them, diverted the Emperor, and the whole Court at their own Expence. The Confusion they were put into on this Occasion, caus'd them immediately to have their Children, even those under 7 Years of Age, to be taught to handle the Bow.

After our Departure from Nan-chang-fu, we found ourselves from time to time between long Chains of Mountains, which stretch themselves along on both the Banks of the River. These Mountains are sometimes so steep that the Chinese were oblig'd to cut a Path along the Foot of them, in at least a Hundred Places, for the Conveniency of those who draw the Barks. Altho' they consist for the most Part of a sandy Earth, cover'd with Herbs, and that the Sides of them are rugged, we saw now and then a Piece of cultivated Land in the Vallies between, or else at the Foot of them, which could scarce suffice for the Support of the Inhabitants (let them be ever so few) belonging to the neighbouring Hamlets. We found the Land pretty well cultivated for 3 Leagues before we came to Kan-cheu-fu.

The 15th, we advanced not above 8 or 9 Leagues; the Champion Country seem'd to be even and well cultivated.

The 16th, we sail'd 12 Leagues to Nan-kang-byen. This Day the River grew so narrow, that it was scarce 30 Paces broad, but the Stream very rapid. We got 10 Leagues farther in the Evening to Lin-chin.

The 17th, we went 12 Leagues to Nan-ngan-fu. These 2 last Days we sail'd continually between Mountains; the River was much more narrow and rapid than before, so that we were forced to increase the Number of those who drew our Barks.

I went next Morning very early to say Mass in the Church, under the Direction of P. Pinuela a Franciscan, born in Mexico, who informing me of his Design of going with me to Kan-ton, I made him an offer of a Place in the Bark, which they were to prepare for me at Nang-byong-fu, a City of the same Province; for we were obliged to travel 12 Leagues by Land, from Nan-ngan to that City.

We got each of us into a Chair, and having gone 2 Leagues, began to ascend a (v) Mountain by a Road so crooked and so very steep, that they were obliged to cut it in several Places in form of Stairs. They were forced also to cut the Top of it, which is all Rock, to the Depth of 40 Foot, in order to open the Passage to the other Side.

Tho' the Mountains over which we pass'd, are uncultivated and frightful, the Lands between them are till'd and cover'd with as good Rice, as any that grew in the fertile Vallies, spoken of before.

Entering into the City of Nan-byong, I found several Christians, who conducted me to their Church, and thence to the River Side, where our Barks were all ready. We were scarce got on Board, when, besides the Tye-tse, or Billets of Civilities, and the Presents of the Mandarins of the Place, they deliver'd us two others from each of the 4 Mandarins of the Province of Quang-tong, who made us a Present of all sorts of Refreshments.

(v) This is the famous Moy-lin, mention'd before, p. 7 and 8. are carry'd over it, on the Shoulders of Porters.

As we descended the River, we proceeded that Night and the next Day, about 30 Leagues, Road from Lau-ya, where the French Missionaries had a Church, which I visited. Tong-Lau-ya, whose Bark was lighter than mine, had got the Start of me, and I understood on my Arrival, that he waited for me at the Tribunal of his Friend, the Mandarin of the Custom-House. I repaired thither to oblige him, and having civilly refused the Supper they had prepared for us, we return'd to our Barks.

We sail'd that Night and the Day following about 20 Leagues to In-te-hyen, where we arriv'd towards Noon. Pursuing our Voyage still Day and Night, we got to Tsin-ywen-hyen (v), the 20th in the Morning, 20 Leagues farther. The River all the Way was bounded on both Sides by steep and uncultivated Mountains, with very few Habitations at the Foot of them, but a little farther the Country is well peopled and improved. Cities In-te-hyen, and Tsin-ywen-hyen.

From Tsin-ywen-hyen to Quang-chew-fu or Kan-ton, (which, being a Space of 40 Leagues, we sail'd between the 21st in the Morning and the 22d in the Evening) all the Country is pretty flat, well cultivated, and cover'd with the Long-yen and Li-chi, two sorts of Fruit-Trees peculiar to China, and found only in the Province of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen. Fruit Long-yen, and Li-chi.

About 4 Leagues from Quang-chew we pass'd thro' Fo-shan, one of the greatest Boroughs in China, which they pretend, contains above a Million of People. We have a Church there, and a Flock of about 10,000 Souls, under the Care of P. Turcotti, a Milanese Jesuit. Fo-shan, great Town.

From Nan-hyang to Quang-chew, over-against most of the Guard-Houses, by which we pass'd, there were Gallies with their Flaggs and Streamers display'd, and mann'd with Cuirassiers, arm'd with their Lances, Arrows and Muskets, drawn up in Ranks to do us Honour.

Two Leagues from Quang-chew, the Ywen-ywen, or Intendant General of the Province for the Salt, came to meet us; he invited us on Board his Bark, where he had prepar'd a great Entertainment; we return'd him Thanks, excusing ourselves, as being a Fast Day with us. We continued the rest of our Voyage very slowly, and arriv'd about 7 in the Evening at Quang-chew, commonly call'd by the Europeans Kan-ton, which Name comes from that of Quang-tong-feng given to it also, signifying the Capital of the Province of Quang-tong. The Portuguese pronounce it Kantang. City Quang-chew-fu, or Kan-ton.

The Mandarins of the Province expected us on the River Side, to enquire in form after the Emperor's Health. We declined their Invitation to the Supper they had prepar'd for us, by making the same Apology that we had done to the Ywen-ywen.

They carry'd me to a Kong-quan, which was middling, as to Size, but neat and very commodious. It had two Courts and as many principal Buildings, whereof one, which is at the Bottom of the first Court, is a Ting, or great Hall, quite open in Front, for receiving Visits; and the other, which was at the End of the second Court, was divided into three Apartments; the middlemost of them serving for a Hall and Antichamber to the other two, which were large, and furnish'd with Closets. This is usually the Form of the Houses of Persons of any Distinction in China. The Kong-quan.

The ROAD by Land from SIAM to CHINA, extracted from the Memoirs of certain Chinese, who had perform'd the Journey.

TO travel from Siam (z) to China, the Road taken by the Chinese, who communicated their Memoirs, it is necessary to pass thro' the Kingdom of Labos. The principal Cities and Settlements which occur'd in the Way, were Kyang-bay (A), Kyang-feng, Mobang-kemarat (B), Mobang-leng, the Capital City of Labos, Mobang-lé, Mobang-mong, the chief City of another Principality or Province, and Mobang Vinan, which borders on China, or rather belongs to it. Road from Siam to China.

From Kyang-bay, or Mobang-kyay, (for all these suppos'd Cities or Territories assume the Name of Mobang (c), instead of which, to avoid Repetitions, I shall put the Letter M.) to M. Kyang-feng, is reckon'd 7 Days Journey; from M. Kyang-feng to M. Kemarat 7 Days; from M. Kemarat to M. Leng 8 Days; from M. Leng to M. Lé 7 Days; from M. Lé to M. Meng 11 Days; from M. Meng turning Northwards they go to M. Vinan, from whence in a short Space they arrive at China.

(v) In the French, Tsin-ywen-hien.

(z) The true Orthography of this Name is Si-yang; Siam being the Portuguese Way of writing it.

(A) Ibid. Kyang-bay, but a little lower it is written Kyang-bai.

(B) In the French, Kemarat is join'd with Mobang-leng, as making one and the same City, which by the Course of the Journal appear to be two distinct Places; it must also be observ'd that as Kemarat is not spell'd agreeable to the Chinese Language, which wants the r, and has no Words ending with a r, it may be presumed that they are the Names given by the Natives, and accommodated to their Pronunciation by the Missionaries.

(c) It is written Moang afterwards, and is doubtless the same Word with Mang, which we find in the Names of a great Number of Places in the Map of Yen-nan, and seems to signify a Plantation, Colony, or any Body of People. And here it must be observed, that the Names in this Journal are written incorrectly; the Missionary himself supposes the Author of the Memoirs has written Vinan for Yan-nan.

Road from Siam to China.

In the Way from the Confines of the Kingdom of Siam to Mobang-leng, Capital of the Labos, our Chinese met with a great Number of Woods, Rivers and Settlements, but with neither wild Beasts nor Robbers. The greater Part of the Road being unpassable with Waggon, they are oblig'd to make use of Horses.

Mobang-leng, Capital of the Labos.

Mobang-leng, Capital of the Labos, has to the South M. Kemarat, to the East M. Luan and M. Rong-faa, to the North M. Pút, M. Pling, M. Ken, M. Kaam, M. Paa, M. Saa, M. Boónoy, M. Booyay, M. Ning-néba, M. Kaan, M. Ghintay; these Cities all depend on Mobang-leng, which has neither Walls nor Fortresses, being inclosed only with Pallisades; it is in compass about 400 Senes or Cords, (each of which contains 20 Siamese Fathoms.)

Great Forests
of Pabima-pan.

To the West of this Metropolis, is Mobang-ko-fang-pyi (c), and further West still, the great Forest of Pabima-pan. M. Ko-fang-pyi was formerly inhabited by a certain People call'd Tay-yay, who possess'd a Kingdom of so great Extent, that it requir'd 3 Months time to travel round it; But at present it is no more than a vast Forest, contiguous with that of Pabima-pan.

The Kingdom of Tay-yay, and Lassa
the same.

The Siamese have often been heard to say, that to the North of Siam, there was a Nation, which had the same Religion, Customs and Language with themselves, and that they receiv'd their own from them, and even their Name, since the Dominions of that People were call'd the Great Kingdom of SIAM. Now these People, by the Account of the Siamese themselves, are the same, which the Chinese in their Memoirs call Tay-yay (d), and because the Siamese say, their Dominions are govern'd by Priests, it is very likely that the Country which the Chinese name Tay-yay is the Lassa of the Tartars, which belongs to the Supreme Pontif of the Lama's; and that the City of Ko-fang-pi is the same with that of Barantola, where the Grand Lama keeps his Court, and rules with an absolute Sway both in Temporals and Spirituals.

This appears the more probable, because the Religion of the Lama's is exactly the same with that of the Siamese, or rather of their Priests, who are call'd Talapoins. They both worship the same Idols, and their Habit is of the same Fashion and Colour; besides the Situation of Lassa agrees precisely with what the Chinese call Tay-yay, and with the Kingdom from whence the Siamese derive their Religion and Language. Both of them lie to the North of Siam, in a very cold Climate, where it snows in December, January, and February. All the Objection to it is, that the Talapoins are strict and constant Observers of their Laws; whereas the Lama's are more loose and irregular; but this Difference which relates to Manners does not destroy the Conformity of their Religion.

dom of Labos.

Mobang-leng the Capital of the Labos is situate on both Sides of the Menan-tay, or Menan-lay. This River which is full of Rocks, rises out of a Mountain in the North, call'd Pang-yeng, then descending towards Mobang Kemarat it falls into the River Menan-kong, towards Bankiop. The River Siam, has its Source in a Mountain call'd Kyang-daw; and that of Kyang-bay or Kyang-lay discharges itself into the principal River of Siam commonly called Menan.

In the Capital of the Kingdom of Labos, there is great Plenty of Rice, and so very cheap, that for a Fúa, that is, a few half Pence of our Money, one may have 50 or 60 Pounds.

Fish is scarce, but to make amends, the Flesh of Buffaloes, Stags, &c. is very plenty, and sold in the Market. The Months of May, June, and July is the Season for Fruit; whereof all sorts, found in the Kingdom of Siam, may be had there, excepting the Thúrian or Dúrian, and the Mangústan.

Mines of Gold, Silver, and Precious Stones.

Five Days Journey from Mobang-leng Northward, there are Mines of Gold, Silver and Copper, and a kind of red Sulphure, which has a very stinking Smell. Two Hundred Senes or Cords from this City, on the same Side, there is a Pit or Mine of precious Stones, full 100 Senes in Depth, where they get Rubies, some of them as big as a Walnut; also Emeralds or green Stones, and they affirm, the King of Labos has one as large as an Orange. There are Stones likewise of other Colours. A Brook which runs thro' the Mine, carries several down its Stream, which sometimes weigh 2 or 3 Mas, that is, a Quarter or third Part of an Ounce Weight.

As for the Silver Mine, the King draws from it about 360 Catis yearly; they are Chinese who work in it, and give all the Directions. The Merchants of M. Kemarat, M. Lee, M. May, M. Teng Maa, M. Meng, M. Daa, and M. Pan, repair to this Mine, which is inclosed by Mountains 300 Senes in Height, cover'd with Grass, preserved continually fresh and green by the Dew.

Medicinal Roots.
Fruit in the Form of a Duck.

There is found here a Medicinal Root, call'd by the Chinese Tong-quey, and by the Siamese Kot wa bwa; also a kind of Tree, named Vendezbang, which bears Flowers about the Thickness of ones Finger, of a very agreeable Smell. When these Flowers open, they are of divers Colours, as red, yellow, white, and black; and when the Fruit comes to Perfection, it is shap'd like a Duck: There are in the same Parts great Numbers of these Trees, and it is chiefly in the Place where they abound most, that the Dew falls in greatest Quantity.

(c) This Name, by what follows, appears to be Chinese.

(d) This Name, used by the Chinese Authors, must have been taken from the Labos, if Lassa be intended thereby; for the Chinese Name for Lassa or Lasa, is Tjan and Tjan-li, as will be observed hereafter, in the Account of Tiber; but indeed Lassa appears to be too far distant, and lies to the North-West, not to the West of the Labos, with Hawa or Awa, and other Countries between.

The Inhabitants of Mobang Leng traffic with their Neighbours without being at the Trouble of going to them. Their Merchandize consists in precious Stones, Gold, Silver, Tin, Lead, Sulphur, both common and red; Cotton, spun and unspun, Tea, Lack, Sapan or Brasil Wood, and the Medicinal Root Kat wba bwa already mention'd.

Trade and
dities.

The Merchants of Mobang bring them Elephants; The Chinese raw and manufactur'd Silk, Civet, white Hair as fine as Silk. Of this Hair, which is taken from a certain Animal, the great Tufts are made, that adorn the Ears of the Elephant, which the King of Siam rides upon, and hang down to the Ground; as well as the red Tuft, worn by the Chinese on their ordinary Bonnets or Caps. They exchange these Merchandizes for Sapan Wood, Tea, Lack, Cotton, &c.

The Merchants that come from Tay-yay or Pama-bang (E), to the Westward, bring them Iron, yellow and red Sanders, Linnen Cloth, Chints or painted Callico, Venison, a kind of red Medicinal Paste, Opium, and other Commodities of Indústan; which they exchange for Gold, Silver, precious Stones, &c.

Those of M. Kemarat and M. Kyang-bay, come to M. Leng, to barter their Cows and Buffaloes for Silver, Tin, and Sulphur. M. Leng, or more properly speaking Labos, is tributary to Hawa (F) or Pama-bang, and an Ambassador is sent annually from that Metropolis, to pay their Tribute; this does not hinder the Labos from appointing a Successor, when their King dies; but they are obliged to notify it to the King of Hawa.

The King of Labos employs but one Minister of State. They reckon eight Cities or Places in this Kingdom, each containing a Garrison of 1000 Men. Besides the 360 Catis which he receives yearly from the Mine, Northward from M. Leng, he raises 860 more in the rest of the Kingdom.

Mobang Meng, the Capital of a particular Province, has on the West M. Pan and M. Kaa, on the South M. Tse on the East M. Chiong and M. Kú, both depending on M. Vinan. The whole Country is without the Tropic, for they never see the Sun directly over their Heads.

The Province of M. Meng, is 17 Days Journey from North to South, and about 7 from East to West. They reckon 18 Cities which depend on the Capital. A River crosses it, that rises in a Mountain in the North, and falls into the Menam Kong; this last comes from Moang Chaiy, call'd Moang Vinan (G) by the Chinese.

After it has pass'd thro' M. Lé, M. Kyang-feng, and M. Lan-chang; it enters the Kingdom of Kamboya, which it crosses, and falls into the Sea at the Bar of Bonsac (H). This River carries large Barks from M. Kyang-kong and M. Kyang-feng, as far as the Sea. But from M. Lé to M. Vinan it bears none, so that there is a Necessity of travelling by Land.

The Soil of M. Meng produces all Sorts of Fruits, which are found in Siam, excepting the Durion and Mangústan. There are Mines of Kalin or Tin on the West Side; of Silver, Copper and Iron towards the North; and on the South Side there is one of Salt.

The Chinese trade with M. Meng, transporting their Commodities on Horses. In this District they take the Creatures which produce Musk; but more especially about M. Pang, M. Chay-daw, and M. Kong, all three depending on M. Vinan; they find many of them also in the District of M. Tay-yay.

Musk Animal.

This Animal is as large as a young Goat; its Body yields a most agreeable Perfume; it has under its Belly a Purse three or four times as thick as ones Thumb; when it is cut, it seems to be a Piece of Fat, or Bacon; they dry it till it may be reduced to Powder, and then sell it in the Country for its weight in Silver; this Powder is yellowish and of a most excellent Scent. The Natives being prohibited from selling the true Bags to Strangers, they make counterfeit ones of the Animal's Skin, which they fill up with its Blood and other Humours, adding rotten Wood, after which they tie them up and dry them. The Peasants bring great Quantity of them to M. Meng, which they exchange for things of small Value, and those of M. Meng sell them at a pretty dear Rate to Strangers.

Moang Kemarat is, as it were, the Capital of a Province or District of the same Name, which is 400 Senes in Compass, and about 8 Days Journey in Length; it is tributary to Hawa. At the time the Chinese pass'd thro' this Country, the Name of its King was Prachyau Otang; he every Year sends Ambassadors to the King of Hawa with the Tribute, which consists of two small Shrubs, one having its Leaves and Flowers of Gold, and the other of Silver.

City Moang Kemarat.

M. Kemarat has to the East M. Lé, to the North M. Lang, to the South M. Kyang-feng and M. Kyang-bay; to the East M. Vay, M. Rong, M. Ngong, M. Labi, M. Maa, and M. Lúa; to the North M. Hang, M. Kroa, M. Loey, M. Jang, and M. Pen. From M. Hang to M. Kroa is one Days Journey, and another from M. Loey to M. Jang. These eleven Cities, or Colonies are in the Jurisdiction of M. Kemarat. In this Country they have the Use of Fire Arms, great and small Canon, Muskets, Zagayes, [or Darts] and Cross-Bows.

M. Kemarat.

(a) Or the Kingdom of Ava.

(b) Orig. Hawa The same doubtless as Awa, call'd by the Chinese Ya-wa, though written otherwise in this Journal; perhaps more conformable to the Pronunciation of the Labos.

(c) Written twice in the French Vinan; this is judg'd by the Missionaries to be Yen-nan.

(d) In the French, Bajacab.

Conquer'd by the Chinese.

A Medicinal Paste and Wood.

While the Tartars were conquering China, a great Number of Chinese Fugitives out of Yun-nan fell upon the Territories of their Neighbours and subdued them; among the rest the Inhabitants of M. Kemarat, were forced to abandon their City.

Before the Chinese drove those People out, they went duely every Year to trade with them, carrying Velvets and other Silks, Camlets, Carpets, Hair, blew and black Callico, Musk, Quick-silver, Kori Shells, and Chinese Bonnets, [or Hats] Kettles, and other Utensils of Copper, precious Stones of a green Colour, Emeralds, Gold, Silver, and China Ware: instead of which they carry'd back Cotton Thread, Ivory, an Earth or Medicinal Paste, call'd Zhadam; a sort of Medicinal Wood, call'd Ingo by the Portuguese, and Maba ing by the Siamese; Opium, a kind of Medicinal Root, call'd Kotso, and white Linnen Cloth; all these Commodities came from Hawa, and the Chinese went to fetch them in January, February, and March, with an Intent to return the Month following.

Moang Chay or Moang Vinan, belongs to a Province of China and probably to Yun-nan, if it be not that Province itself: for the Chinese Memoirs speak of 4 Rivers which rise in it, whereof the first runs into the Province of Quang-tong; the second passes by M. Chyang-kong and M. Lancbang; the third by M. Motima; and is call'd Menang-kong, and the fourth which goes to M. Hawa, is call'd Menam-kiu; all the four passing out of the Province Yun-nan, at length discharge themselves into the Sea.

INTRODUCTION, to the DESCRIPTION of the PROVINCES.

I HAVE already observed, that most of the Cities of China resemble one another so nearly, that to see one, is almost sufficient to give an Idea of them all. They are for the most Part square, when the Ground will permit, and encompass'd with high Walls, defended by Towers, built as Buttresses at convenient Distances. They have sometimes Ditches, either dry or with Water. There are within the Cities also other Towers, either round, Hexagonal, or Octogonall, and 8 or 9 Stories high: Triumphal Arches in the Streets; tolerably handsome Temples consecrated to Idols, or Monuments erected in Honour of their Heroes, and those who have done some important Service to the State: in short there are certain publick Buildings more remarkable for their vast Extent than their Magnificence.

To this we may add a pretty many large Squares, and long Streets, some very wide, others narrow, with Houses on each Side, having only a Ground Floor, or one Story at most. There one sees Shops adorn'd with China Ware, Silks, and varnish'd or japann'd Goods; before the Door of each, there is placed a Pedestal, on which is erected a Board 7 or 8 Foot high, either painted or gilded, with three large Characters written thereon, such as the Shop-Keeper chuses for his Sign, and to distinguish it from all others; you sometimes find on it the Names of two or three sorts of Goods, which are sold there, and at the Bottom that of the Shop Keeper himself, with these Words, Pá-bá, that is, he will not cheat you. This kind of double Row of Pilasters placed at equal Distances form a Colonnade, which makes an agreeable Prospect enough.

The Beauty of the Chinese Cities, consisting wholly in these Particulars, I thought proper to premise this general Account, that I might not be oblig'd to make useless and tedious Repetitions in speaking of the principal Cities of every Province. For this Reason I shall confine myself to what is most remarkable in them, with respect to their Situation, Trade, or the Fertility of their Soil; and shall enlarge chiefly on those Cities which are of greatest Reputation, and most frequented: Of the rest I shall say what is sufficient to form an Idea of them; and illustrate the whole with the Plans of such places as have any thing singular.

A GEOGRAPHICAL

DESCRIPTION

PROVINCES of CHINA.

PROVINCE I. PE-CHE-LI, CHE-LI, or LI-PA-FU. PROV. I. Pe-che-li.

THIS Province, which is the first and chief of the whole Empire, is bounded on the East by the Sea; on the North by the Great Wall and part of Tartary; on the West by the Province of Shan-si, from which it is separated by Mountains; and on the South by the Provinces of Shan-tong and Ho-nan. Its Figure is triangular. Bounds and Figure.

It is divided into nine different Countries, each of which has a Fu, or principal City of the first Rank, whereon several Cities depend. These Cities are 140 in Number, of which 20 are Che-li, or Cities of the second Rank, and 120 Hyen, or Cities of the third Rank; not to speak of Boroughs and Villages without Number, some as large as Cities, but have not that Name, because they are neither encompass'd with Walls nor Ditches, as the Cities are. Division, and Number of Cities.

The Air of this Province is temperate; notwithstanding, tho' it does not extend beyond the 42d Parallel, the Rivers are frozen during 4 Months of the Year, that is, from towards the End of November to the middle of March. Unless a certain North-Wind blows, they never feel those piercing Colds the Frost produces in Europe, which may be attributed to the nitrous Exhalations that arise from the Earth, and especially to the Clearness of the Sky, the Sun being scarce ever cover'd with Clouds, even in Winter.

The rainy Season is towards the End of July and the beginning of August: At other times it seldom rains, but the Dew that falls every Night moistens the Earth; this Moisture is dry'd up at Sun-rise, and is succeeded by a very fine Dust, which penetrates every thing, even Rooms most closely shut. Tender-eyed People who travel on Horseback, wear a thin Veil for covering their Faces, which, without hindering them to see, defends them from those Whirlwinds of Dust that surround them; or else they take other Precautions, whereof I shall speak hereafter. Weather.

The Soil of Pe-che-li is even, but sandy, and not very fruitful. It produces less Rice than the Southern Provinces, because it has but few Canals; however, besides what is sown along the Rivers, it is sown dry in several Places, and grows very well, but is somewhat harder to boil. All manner of Grain thrives here in abundance, and chiefly Wheat and Millet; here likewise we find all sorts of Cattle, and Pulse, with plenty of Fruit; such as Apples, Pears, Plumbs, Chestnuts, Walnuts, Figs, Peaches, Grapes, &c. Soil and Produce.

Its Rivers are full of Fish, especially excellent Cray-Fish. The Mountains afford a great deal of Pit-Coal: this they burn instead of Wood, which is very scarce; and considering how long these Mines have supply'd the Province, one would think them inexhaustible.

Among the various kinds of Animals, there is a particular sort of Cats, with long Hair, and hanging Ears, which the Chinese Ladies are very fond of, and rear with a great deal of Tenderness. But this Province is render'd much more considerable by being as it were the Rendezvous of all the Riches of the Empire; and because all the Northern and Southern Provinces strive to outvie each other in furnishing it with the most rare and delicious things they produce.

The Inhabitants are neither so polite, nor so much addicted to the Sciences as those of the Southern Parts; but they are much more Robust, Warlike, and able to undergo the Fatigues and Hardships of War. The same may be said of all the Chinese inhabiting the Northern Provinces.

PROV. I.
Pe-che-li.

The First City, Shun-tien-fu, or Pe-king.

*Shun-tien-fu, or Pe-king,
the Capital of the Empire.*

THE first City, which is the Capital of the Province and of the whole Empire, is Shun-tien-fu. It is situated in a very fruitful Plain, 20 Leagues from the Great Wall, and is the ordinary Residence of the Emperors. They call it Pe-king, which signifies, the Court of the North; as the Capital of the Province of Kyang-nan, was named Nan-king, or the Court of the South, when it was the Emperor's Residence. But the Tartars, a restless and warlike People, who made continual Irruptions into the Territories of the Empire, obliged them at length to remove their Court into the Northern Provinces; that they might be near at Hand, to oppose them with the numerous Troops which ordinarily attend the Chinese Monarchs.

This City is almost Square, and divided into two Cities; that where the Emperor's Palace stands is named Sin-ching, or the New City; it is also call'd the Tartar City, because the Houses were distributed among the Tartars, when the present Family was establish'd on the Throne.

The second is call'd Lau-ching, or the Old City; it may be termed the Old Chinese City, because when the Chinese were driven out of the other City, part of them retired into this, while others fled towards the Southern Provinces, being even obliged to quit the Country, because not only the Houses of the New City (built under Yung-lo about 1405, when the Court forsook Nan-king) but also the Lands about it and the Neighbouring Cities, within a certain Distance, were given to the Tartars, with a perpetual Exemption from Taxes and all sorts of Tribute.

In less than fourscore Years the Tartars have multiply'd to such a Degree, that they occupy almost all the New City; the rest is inhabited by Chinese, so that there is not any Part of it empty, as there is in the Old.

Walls.

The Compass of the Walls of both Cities together, exclusive of the Suburbs, has been measur'd, and does not exceed 52 Chinese Li [or Furlongs] so that it is less than Nan-king. But there is a vast difference between the Breadth, Length, and Beauty of the Walls of these two Cities; those of [the New City of] Pe-king are stately, and worthy the Capital of the greatest Empire in the World; but the Walls of Nan-king are narrow, and do not appear to exceed those of the ancient City of Pe-king, which are no better than the Walls of the generality of the Cities of China.

A Horseman may ascend the Walls of the New City, by means of a Ramp, which begins at a great Distance. In several Places there are Houses built for a Corps de Guard; the Towers are within Bow-shot of each other; there are some of them at certain Distances, much larger than the rest, and capable of containing small Bodies of Reserve.

Gates.

The Gates of the City, which are high and well arch'd, support exceeding large Pavillions, nine Stories high. Each Story is furnish'd with Windows and Loop-holes; and the lowest forms a great Hall, where the Soldiers and Officers, who have been on Guard, or come to relieve it, retire. Before each Gate there is an open Area or Parade (κ) of above 360 Feet, (which serves for a Place of Arms) incompass'd by a semicircular Wall of equal Height and Breadth with that of the City. The Entrance of this Parade is never on that Side which faces the great Road into the City: This Road is also commanded by a Pavillion like the former, so that, as the Cannon of the one can play upon the City, the Cannon of the other scours the neighbouring Country. All the Gates, which are nine in Number, have a double Pavillion, built in like Manner on the Platforms of the Walls, and furnish'd with Artillery; nor is there need of any other sort of Citadel, this Artillery being more than sufficient to keep the People in Awe.

Streets.

The Streets of this great City are exceeding strait, almost all laid out with a Line, at least a League in Length, and about 120 Feet wide, with Shops, for the most part, on both Sides. It is a Pity there is so little Proportion between the Streets and the Houses, which make a mean Appearance, and are very low.

Populousness.

It is astonishing to see the infinite Multitudes of People, wherewith these Streets are crowded, without one Woman among them; and the Confusion which is caused by the surprising Number of Horses, Mules, Asses, Camels, Carts, Waggon, and Chairs, without reckoning the various Crowds of Men, 100 or 200 in a Cluster, which one meets with every now and then, gathered about some Fortune-teller, or Players at Cups and Balls; or listening to Ballad Singers, and others who read or repeat certain comical Stories to make Diversion; or else gaping at a sort of Quacks, who distribute their Medicines, and display their admirable Effects with a great deal of Eloquence. People of Distinction would be stopp'd every Moment, if they had not a Horseman to go before and call to the People to make Way.

All the Riches and Commodities of the Empire are continually flowing into this City. People are carried thro' the Streets in Chairs by Men, or more usually on Horseback. Both sorts of Voiture are easily to be met with in many Places: one may sometimes hire a Horse or Mule the whole Day for 6 or 7 Pence; and as all the Streets are crowded with People, the Muleteers often lead their Beasts by the Bridle, in order to make way. These Men are perfectly acquainted with the Streets and Houses, where the great Folks and principal Citizens reside. There are also Books sold, which give an Account of the Wards, Streets, or Places where every Person lives, who has any public Employment.

(κ) There are no Parades in the Plan of Pe-king, but the Reader will find them in that of Cbin-sing-fu, in the same Plate.

The Tartar City is a great league from North to South and [the Chinese City] a little more than half a league. In the two Cities and their Suburbs are computed more than three millions of people. The walls are cased with Brick, Round those of the Chinese City run Canals.

Latitude of the College of the Portuguese Jesuits $39^{\circ} 52' 54''$ North. Latitude of the House of the French Jesuits $39^{\circ} 54' 0''$ And its Longitude more East than Paris $7^{\circ} 37' 23''$ for $114^{\circ} 20' 45''$. But according to the later Observations of P. Gaubil used by M. D'Anville, $7^{\circ} 25' 26''$ or $113^{\circ} 31' 30''$. The I prefer with M. Delisle the Observation which makes it just $7^{\circ} 36' 0''$ or 114° degrees, whence it is East of London $116^{\circ} 25' 7''$. N.B. The words between Hooks were inserted by the Editor.

The Governor of Pe-king, who is a Manchew Tartar of Figure, is call'd Kyú-men ti-tú, or the General of the nine Gates, and has under his Jurisdiction not only the Soldiers but the People, in whatever concerns the civil Government or the Public Safety.

Nothing can exceed the Policy observ'd here: it is amazing to see the perfect Tranquillity that is maintain'd among such an infinite Number of Tartars and Chinese; and for several Years together one shall not hear of a House being broken open, or a Man murder'd; for such is the Order observ'd, that it is almost impossible those Crimes should be committed and the Authors escape unpunish'd.

All the great Streets, which run in a Line from one Gate to another, and are about 120 Feet broad, have Corps de Guard. Day and Night there are Soldiers with Swords by their Sides; and Whips in their Hands, to chastise all, without Distinction, who make any Disturbance; and to confine whoever resists, or creates any Quarrel.

the Streets.

The lesser Streets, which terminate in the greater, have Wooden Cross-barr'd Gates, thro' which those, who walk within, may be seen by the Corps de Guard, placed over-against them in the great Streets. There are also Soldiers on Duty towards the middle of almost all those Streets. The Cross-barr'd Gates are shut every Night by the Guard, and are seldom open'd, except to Persons with a Lanthorn in their Hand, who are known, and have a good Reason for going out, such as to fetch a Physician. As soon as the first Stroke of the Watch is given on a great Bell, one or two Soldiers walk from one Corps de Guard to the other, playing all the Way with a kind of Clapper, to let it be known that they are on the Watch. They suffer none to walk in the Night, and even question those whom the Emperor sends about Business; if their Answer gives the least Suspicion, they put them in Custody of the Corps de Guard; besides, this Guard must answer every Call of the Centinel who is on Duty.

It is by this excellent Order, observ'd with the greatest Exactness, that Peace, Silence and Safety reign thro' the City. It must be added that not only the Governor of the City, who is obliged to go the Rounds, arrives when least expected; but also the Officers, who keep Guard on the Walls and Pavilions over the Gates, (where they beat the Watch on great Brass Drums,) send Subalterns, to examine the Quarters belonging to the Gates where they are posted: the least Neglect is punish'd next Day, and the Officers of the Guard are broken.

This Regulation, which prevents Nocturnal Meetings, will without doubt appear very extraordinary in Europe, and be by no means relish'd by Persons of Quality and Fortune; but, ought not those who are at the Helm in a State, to prefer good Order and the publick Security, to Diversions, which give Occasion to innumerable Attempts on the Effects and Lives of the Citizens? Besides, nothing seems more agreeable to Reason, since the Tartars, a People bred up in Woods, illiterate and unenlighten'd with the true Religion, acting according to these Maxims, root out so many Crimes too common in other States.

The Empire is indeed at great Expence on this Account, for part of the Soldiers I have mention'd, are employ'd for nothing else but to take Care of the Streets; they are all Foot, and their Pay is large: Besides their watching Day and Night, it is their Business to see that every Body cleans the Street before his Door; that it is swept and watered every Morning and Evening in dry Weather; and that the Dirt is taken away after Rain: And as the Streets are very broad, one of their chief Employments is to work themselves, and keep the middle of them always clean for the Publick Conveniency. After they have taken up the Dirt (for the City is not paved) they beat it, or turning it dry it, or else mix it up with other dry Earth; so that within two Hours after the heavy Rains one may walk all over the City without dirtying himself. Those Writers who tell us, that the Streets of Pe-king are commonly nasty, probably speak with Respect to those of the Old City, which are small, and not kept in such good Order as those of the New; where the Soldiers are continually employ'd to keep them clean, even when the Emperor is absent.

Exceeding Neatness of the Houses.

There is a second Wall in the New City, which is low and narrow, but adorn'd with large Gates, where there are Guards; this is call'd Wbang-ching, that is, the Imperial Wall. Its South Gate is that of the Palace itself, about a hundred Fathoms from the principal Gate of the City, which looks Southward also, and is call'd by the People Syen-men; altho' its true Name, which is cut both in Tartarian and Chinese Characters, is Ching-yang-men, that is, the Gate facing the Noon-Day Sun.

This Palace is a prodigious Collection of great Buildings, vast Courts, and Gardens; it is inclosed with a Brick Wall about twelve Chinese Li in Circuit. This Wall has Battlements along the Curtains, and at the Angles is adorn'd with little Pavilions; over each Gate there is a Pavillion more lofty, as well as stronger built, than the former, and surrounded with a Gallery, supported by Pillars resembling our Peristyle: This properly is the Palace, because it contains the Apartments of the Emperor and his Family.

The Space between this Inclosure of the Palace and the first Wall, named Wbang-ching, which is above 15 Li in Compass, is taken up chiefly with Houses, as well of the Officers of the Household, as the Eunuchs, and the several Tribunals; whereof some have the Care of providing Necessaries for the Service of the Prince, and others are to preserve good Order, decide Differences, determine Causes, and punish the Crimes committed by the Domesticks of the Imperial Family. Nevertheless when the Crimes are flagrant, and fully proved, these Tribunals of the Palace, named the Inner Tribunals, transmit the Criminals to the Exterior Tribunals, which are the Grand Tribunals of the Empire.

Altho' the Architecture of the Imperial Palace be wholly different from ours, yet it strikes the Eye by its Vastness, the regular Disposition of the Apartments, and the Structure of the Roofs, which have four Sides rising very high, and adorn'd on the Rest with a Plat-band of Flower-work, and turn'd up at the Ends; the whole is cover'd with varnish'd Tiles of such a beautiful Yellow, that at a Distance they appear as bright as if they were gilded. A second Roof as glittering as the former, rising from the Walls, goes quite around, supported by a Forest of Beams, Joyste and Spars, all japann'd with green Varnish, strew'd with Gold Figures. This second Roof with the Projection of the first makes a kind of Crown to those Buildings, which has a very fine Effect; and perhaps we ought to judge of the Goodness of the Rules observed in any Building, according as we find ourselves affected with the Beauty of it; since those received in Europe are rejected by other Nations, and have appear'd good to us, only because we have discover'd Grace and Beauty in the Works of the Ancients, who seem to have introduced both. Whatever one may think as to the Taste of Architecture, it is certain that these Halls, built in the Chinese Fashion, with their Bas-Courts, surrounded by Galleries, and ranged one after another in regular Order, form altogether one intire Structure, which is very magnificent, perfectly August, and worthy the greatest Empire upon Earth.

The Terrasses. The Terrasses, whereon these Apartments are built, contribute also much to give them that Air of Grandeur which strikes the Eye; they are about 15 Feet high from the Ground, cas'd with white Marble, adorn'd with Ballustrades of pretty good Workmanship, and open only at the Entrance of the Stair Cases, which are placed on the Sides, and in the Middle, and Corners of the Front. The Ascent in the middle is properly no more than a Ramp or Slope, consisting of one or two pieces of Marble, without either Steps or Restings; Nobody is permitted to enter this Way into the Apartments but the Emperor alone, who upon Days of Ceremony is carried thro' in his cover'd Chair.

These Terrasses, which extend from East to West, make before the Doors and Windows of the Apartments, a very broad Platform paved with Marble, projecting seven or eight Foot all the way beyond the Building. This is the Form of the Apartments or Lodgings of the Emperor, and of the Imperial Hall, named Tay-bo-tyen, (as who should say, the Hall of the great Union) which stands more towards the South, and is exposed to the Eyes of all the Mandarins of the Empire.

In the Bas-Court before this Hall the Mandarins range themselves on Days appointed for the Ceremonies prescribed by the Laws of the Empire, to renew their Homage, which Ceremonies are perform'd whether the Emperor be present or not. Nothing is more usual than for them to strike the Ground with their Foreheads, before the Gate of the Palace, or one of the Royal Halls, with the same Formality and Respect, as if he was seated on his Throne.

This Hall is about 130 Feet long, and almost square; the Cieling is all of carved Work, varnish'd with green, and charg'd with gilded Dragons. The Pillars that support the Roof within, are six or seven Feet in Compass at the Bottom, and incrustated with a kind of Paste, japann'd with red Varnish. The Pavement is cover'd partly with very ordinary Carpets, made like those of Turky; the Walls are very well white-wash'd, but without Hangings, Looking-Glasses, Branches, Paintings, or any other sort of Ornament.

The Throne. The Throne, which is in the middle of the Hall, consists of a lofty Alcove, very neat, but neither rich nor magnificent; and without any Inscription but the Word Shing, which the Authors of Relations have render'd Holy; but it is not always used in that Sense, for it is sometimes better explain'd by the Latin Word Eximius, or the English Words Excellent, Perfect, Most Wise. On the Platform or Floor before it, stand very great and thick Vessels of Brass, wherein Perfumes are burnt during the Ceremony, and Candlesticks made in the Form of Birds, large enough to hold Flambeaux. This Platform is continued Northward beyond the Hall, Tay-bo-tyen, and serves as a Foundation to two other lesser Halls, which are hid by the former; one of them is a very pretty Rotundo or circular Room, with Windows on every side, and shining with Varnish of divers Colours; there, they say, the Emperor reposes sometimes, before or after the Ceremony, and changes his Habit.

This round Hall is but a few Paces distant from a second, that is longer than broad, the Door of which faces the North; thro' this Door the Emperor is obliged to pass, when he comes from his Apartment to his Throne, there to receive the Homages of the whole Empire; he is then carried in a Chair, by Chairmen dress'd in long red Vests, embroider'd with Silk, and wearing Caps, adorn'd with Plumes.

The Court which is before the Tay-bo-tyen, is the largest belonging to the Palace; it is at least 300 Feet long, and 250 wide. Over the Gallery that surrounds it, are the Imperial Magazines of Rarities, for the Treasure or Revenues of the Empire are kept in the supreme Tribunal, named Hu-pu. These Magazines are open'd on certain Occasions, as at the Creation of a Prince, who is to inherit the Crown, an Empress, Queen, &c. In one are kept the Vases, and other Works of different Metal; in another vast Quantities of the most beautiful Skins of various kinds; a third contains Habits furr'd with the Skins of gray Squirrels, Foxes, Ermins, and Sables, wherewith the Emperor sometimes rewards his Servants. There is one for precious Stones, curious Marbles, and Pearls which are found in Tartary. The greatest of all, consisting of two low Stories, is full of of Presses, where the Silks are kept, made on purpose for the Use of the Emperor and his Family, at Nan-king, Hang-chew, and Su-chew; these are the best in all the Empire, because they are manufactur'd under the Care and Inspection of a Mandarin, who presides over those Works, and would be punish'd if they were not finish'd in the greatest Perfection.

Magazines.

In the other Store-houses are repositied Arrows, Bows, and Saddles, which have either been made at Pe-king, brought from foreign Countries, or presented by great Princes, and set apart for the Use of the Emperor and his Children; there is one also where they collect the best Tea, of every kind that China produces, with various Simples, and other the most esteemed Druggs.

This Gallery has five Doors, one to the East, another to the West, and three in the South Front. Those in the middle are never open'd but for the Emperor; the Mandarins, who come to perform the Ceremony before the Imperial Hall, entring by the Side Doors.

There is nothing extraordinary in this Front; it has a large Court, into which one descends by a Marble Stair-Case, adorn'd with two great Lions of Copper, and a Balustrade of white Marble; it is made in form of a Horse-shoe, on the Side of a little Serpentine River, which runs thro' the Palace, and has Bridges over it of the same Materials. It would be endless to describe the rest of the Buildings belonging to this vast Palace, but as these are the most magnificent in the Judgment of the Chinese and Tartars, they may suffice to give the Reader an Idea of the whole.

The Palaces of the Emperor's Children and the other Princes of the Blood, are very neat within, vastly large, and built at a great Expence; the same Manner runs thro' the whole, both as to the Body of the Work and Embellishments. It is a Series of Courts, adorn'd on the Sides with Buildings, and in Front with a varnish'd Hall, rais'd on a Platform, three or four Feet high, which is border'd with great square Blocks of hewn Stone, and paved with large square Tiles; the Gates generally open into little Streets not much frequented, and have no other Ornaments than two Lions of Brals or white Stone of very indifferent Workmanship, without any Order of Architecture, or Sculpture in Stone, such as is found in the Triumphal Arches.

Palaces of the Emperor's Children.

I shall enlarge no farther on this superb Edifice, (the only one throughout that great City, which deserves Attention) the rather because I shall speak of it in another Place. What I shall say of it there, with the Description I have already given of it, will suffice to make it tolerably well known to the Reader.

The Tribunals of the supreme Jurisdictions are also vastly large, but ill built, and worse kept in Repair; they are in no wise suitable to the Majesty of the Empire; there are six of them, which I but just mention here, because I shall hereafter speak of them more at large.

the Supreme Tribunals of the Empire.

The first, the Lzhi-pu, proposes the Mandarins who are to govern the People.

The second, Hu-pu, has the Charge of the Tributes.

The third, Li-pu, is for maintaining the Customs and Rites of the Empire.

The fourth, Ping-pu, has Care of the Troops and Posts which are on all the great Roads, and maintain'd at the Emperor's Expence.

The fifth, the Hing-pu, determines Criminal Causes.

The last, Kong-pu, has the Inspection of the publick Works.

All these Tribunals are divided into different Chambers, among which the Business is distributed; their Number is not the same in every Tribunal, some of them having much less to do than others.

Under these six sovereign Courts are also divers other Tribunals, which depend on them; for Instance, the Kin-tyen-ken, or Tribunal of the Mathematics, is subordinate to that of the Li-pu; it is also divided into two Chambers, whereof the principal and most numerous, call'd Li-ko, is solely employ'd about calculating the Motion of the Stars, and Astronomical Affairs; the other named Lü-ko, besides other Business more peculiar to it, is employed to determine the proper Days for Marriages, Burials, and other Civil Affairs; about which they give themselves but little Trouble, copying for the most part an ancient Chinese Book, wherein almost all these things are already settled according to the Year of the Sexagenary Cycle or Chinese Century.

These six supreme Jurisdictions never meddle with Affairs of State, but when remitted to them by the Emperor, with Orders to deliberate thereon; for then standing in need of each other, they are oblig'd to agree together, to the end that the Money, Troops, Officers and Equipages may be ready at the time appointed: Excepting in such Cases, each Court confines itself wholly to the Affairs belonging to it, and certainly has enough to do, in an Empire of such vast Extent as China. If the different Functions, of repairing public Works, the Government of the Forces, the Regulation of the Revenue, the Administration of Justice, and above all the Choice of Magistrates, were all united in one Tribunal, it would without doubt produce great Confusion in the Resolutions, and a Slowness in Proceedings, which would ruin Affairs; for this Reason it was necessary to encrease the Number of Mandarins, both at Court and in the Provinces.

But as in so great a multitude it would be difficult to find out the proper Person with whom one has Business; to remedy this Inconvenience, there is a Book sold, which may be call'd the Present State of China, containing the Names, Surnames and Employments of all the Officers, and distinguishing whether they are Chinese or Tartars, Bachelors or Doctors, &c. It takes particular Notice also of the Changes made with respect to the Officers of the Army, as well those that are in Garrison, as in the Field; and to specify these Changes, without re-printing the Book, they make use of moveable Characters.

All the Tartar Families live in or about Pe-king, and are not permitted to remove from thence without the Emperor's special Order; hence it is, that the Tartar Troops, which compose the

Emperor's Life-Guard.
Emperor's

PROV. I. Emperor's Life Guard, are always in a manner near his Person; here are also found some Chinese Troops, who formerly lifted themselves under the Tartar Banners, and were for that Reason call'd the Tartarized Chinese; they are very well paid, and are always ready to fly on the first Order to extinguish the Flames of Sedition, wherever they break out, with surprizing Secrecy and Expedition.

These Troops are divided into 8 Bodies, each of which has a Banner, distinguish'd either by the Colour, viz. yellow, white, red and blew, or by the Borders, which are all red, excepting that of the red Banner, whose Border is white; green is the Colour belonging to the Troops that are entirely Chinese, which are thence call'd Lü-ki, or the Soldiers of the Green Banner.

Every Tartar Banner has its General, named in the Manchew Language Kisanta, who has under him certain great Officers, called Meyreynchain, who are like our Lieutenant-Generals, and have under them several other Officers subordinate to each other.

As each Body at present is composed of Manchew Tartars, Mongul Tartars, and Tartarized Chinese, the General has under him two General Officers of each Nation, and these Officers have likewise Subalterns of the same Nation. Each Body consists of 10,000 effective Men, divided into 100 Nurds, or Companies, of 100 Soldiers each (8); so that if we reckon the Emperor's Household and those of the Princes, who have their Servants, Pozbo nurd with the Pay of the Officers and Soldiers, the common Opinion may be readily allow'd to be true, viz. that there are always 100,000 Horse at Pe-king.

We may hence form an Idea of the Forces of the Empire; for if to the Cavalry, already spoken of, we add the Infantry which are at Pe-king, those posted along the Great Wall, (in the innumerable Forts built for its Defence, tho' less numerous at present than when the Country was in Danger of Invasions from the Tartars) together with the rest of the Forces dispers'd all over the Empire, it will be found that the Number, agreeable to the common Calculation, amounts to at least 600,000 Men: So that China may be said to keep on Foot in time of the profoundest Peace, an Army able to resist the most formidable Powers, purely to maintain the public Tranquillity, to provide against Seditions, and extinguish the smallest Sparks of Rebellion.

Such a vast Body as China must needs be terribly agitated when once it is in Motion, so that it is the whole Policy of the Chinese Magistrates, to prevent and suppress Insurrections as soon as possible. No Favour is to be expected for a Mandarin whose People revolt; let him be ever so innocent, he is consider'd as a Man of no Capacity, and the smallest Punishment that can befall him is, to be discharg'd from his Employment, by the Tribunal of the Court, to which such Causes are always transmitted by the Vice-Roys and Governors of Provinces; and those Tribunals deliberate on the Informations, and present their Report to the Emperor, who either confirms or rejects it.

These sovereign Courts have no Superior, except the Emperor or the Great Council; when that Prince thinks fit to assemble it on some important Affair, already determined by one of those Courts, they present their Petitions on the Days appointed, and often confer with the Emperor himself, who either approves of or rejects them, by signing them with his own Hand. But if he retains them, they wait some time for his Orders, which is communicated to them by the Great Mandarin, called in Chinese, Ko-lau, and in Tartarian, Aliagata.

Form of Petitions.

The Petitions presented by the Presidents of these supreme Courts, who are call'd in Chinese, Sbang-shu, and in Tartarian, Aliagamba, ought to have the Subject, which it relates to, specify'd in the Title, and to end with the Opinion of the Court, to which the Affair belongs.

The Emperor disposes in the same Manner of all the Employments of the Empire, without being oblig'd to confer them on the Persons proposed by the Tribunals, altho' he generally confirms their Choice, after he has himself examined those to whom the Employments fell by Lot, in the Manner hereafter explained. As to the principal Posts of Tsong-tu, Vice-Roy, &c. they are always nominated by the Emperor himself.

Emperor's Application to Affairs of Government.

It will scarce be believ'd, that the present Emperor condescends to examine himself such Crowds of Mandarins, whereof every Day some are advanc'd to higher Employments, and others are Candidates for them; nevertheless, it is certainly true, and this shews his Care in governing the State: He will see every thing with his own Eyes (9), and he will trust nobody in choosing Magistrates for his People.

Prerogative.

His Authority is absolute, and almost unlimited. A Prince of the Imperial House can neither assume the Titles, nor receive the Honours due to him as such, without the Emperor's Permission. When his Conduct does not answer the Expectation of the Public, he loses his Dignity and Revenues by order of the Emperor, and is no longer distinguish'd, except by the Yellow Girdle, worn by Men and Women of the Imperial Blood, who are allow'd but a moderate Pension out of the Royal Treasury.

Censors of the Empire.

The Laws allow no way of applying against the Abuse of Authority, but by Remonstrance. These Laws have establish'd publick Censors, whose Duty it is to give Information to the Emperor by Petitions, which are dispers'd thro' the Empire, and cannot be rejected by him, without hurting his Reputation; besides, the Chinese having annex'd an Idea of Heroic Bravery to that Employment,

(8) As Tsong-tu is remark'd, to have establish'd the same sort of Order among his Troops, it would be worth enquiry, whether he took it from, or communicated it to the Chinese Tartars.

(9) This may well seem incredible in a Monarch of so vast an Empire, when the petty Princes of Europe are so much taken up with other Affairs, that they have not Leisure to look into those of State.

ployment, should the Emperor treat them ill, he would do them the greatest Honour, and draw on himself odious Names, which the Historians would with great Care transmit to Posterity.

In short, these Censors seldom or never change their Resolution. If the Court or the Great Tribunals seek to elude the Justice of their Complaints, by some Rebuff, they return to the Charge, and make it appear that they have not answer'd conformable to the Laws. Some of them have persever'd two whole Years in accusing a Vice-Roy supported by the Grandeess, and without being discourag'd by Delays and Opposition, or frighted by the most terrifying Menaces, have at length compell'd the Court to degrade him, to avoid disgusting the People, and sullying its own Reputation.

But if in this sort of Combat between the Prince and State, in the Name of which the Censor speaks, the Prince happens to yield, he immediately receives the Praises of the Public in their Addresses, and is loaded with Elogies by the whole Empire; the sovereign Courts of Pe-king return him their Thanks, and what he has done for Justice, is look'd on as a singular Favour.

It is owing to this good Order observ'd at Pe-king, and which influences the other Cities, that the Empire enjoys such a happy Tranquillity and long Peace. This Blessing may also be attributed in some measure to the favourable Situation of China, whose Neighbours consist of Nations not very populous, half Barbarians, and incapable of attempting any thing to the Prejudice of such a mighty State, while its Forces are well united under the Authority of its Sovereign. The Manchews, who conquer'd it, took Advantage of the Troubles of the Realm, which was fill'd with Rebels and Robbers; and were brought in by the faithful Chinese, who were desirous to revenge the Death of their Emperor.

I could not forbear enlarging in my Account of this Capital, because it is, as it were, the Soul of this great Empire, puts it in Motion, and keeps all the Parts of it in Order; but I shall be much briefer in speaking of the other Cities, especially those, which have nothing more than ordinary to recommend them. I shall only add, that besides the general Jurisdiction which Pe-king has over the whole Empire by its six Supreme Courts, it has also, like the other Capitals of Provinces, a particular District, which comprehends 26 Cities, whereof six are of the second, and twenty of the third Rank.

The Second City, Pau-ting-fu.

Pau-ting-fu is the Residence of the Vice-Roy of this Province; it has three Cities of the second Rank, and seventeen of the third, within its District, which is very agreeable and fruitful. In the midst of the City there is a little Lake, famous for the great Quantity of those Flowers, elsewhere described (p), which the Chinese call Lyen-wa.

In travelling from Pe-king into the Province of Sban-si, one is obliged to pass thro' this City; it is one of the most pleasant Journeys imaginable; all the Country is flat, and well cultivated; the Road even, and planted with Trees in several Places, with Walls to cover and defend the Fields; Men, Carts, and Beasts of Burthen are continually passing backwards and forwards. In the Space of a single League you pass thro' two or three Villages, without reckoning those you see on all sides. The Rivers are cover'd with very handsome Bridges of several Arches.

The Third City, Ho-kyen-fu.

THIS City has its Name from its being situated between two Rivers. Its Walls are built in a Line, handsome, high, and in good Repair; it is reckon'd almost four Miles in Compass. On it depend two Cities of the second Order, and fifteen of the third. Its Rivers are stor'd with good Fish, besides the Cray-Fish, which are very plenty, and exceeding delicious.

The Fourth City, Chin-ting-fu.

THIS is a great City, almost four Miles in Compass; its Figure approaches an oblong Square; the Walls are handsome, and flank'd with square Towers at certain Distances; it stands pretty near a fine River, which a few Leagues from thence falls into the Lake Pay-hu.

Its Jurisdiction is very large, comprehending thirty two Cities, five of the second, and twenty seven of the third Rank. To the North of it are Mountains, where the Chinese pretend, abundance of Simples and uncommon medicinal Herbs are found. Certain Monuments or Temples are seen there, built in Honour of their Heroes, and, among others, one consecrated to the Memory of the first Emperor of the Dynasty of the Han.

The Fifth City, Shun-te-fu.

THE District of this City is not very extensive, containing only nine, but they are very famous and populous Cities, of the third Order. The Country is render'd very charming and fertile, by the plenty of Water; the Rivers afford divers sorts of good Fish. A very fine Sand is found (p) See p. 12 and Elsewhere, hereafter.

Prov. I. found there, which is used in polishing precious Stones, and sold all over the Empire; they also Pe-che-li. make China Ware of it, but far short for Beauty of that made at King-te-ching, a Borough in the Province of Kyang-si. Shun-te-fu also produces Touch-Stones for Gold, reckon'd the best in the whole Empire.

The Sixth City, Quang-ping-fu.

Quang-ping-fu. THIS City is situated in the Southern Part of Pe-che-li, between the Provinces of Shan-tong and Ho-nan; it has but nine Cities of the third Rank in its Dependence; its Territory is water'd by several Rivers, which breed very good Fish; the Country is agreeable and fertile: It has otherwise nothing to distinguish it from other Cities.

The Seventh City, Tay-ming-fu.

Tay-ming-fu. THIS City as well as the former, which lies near it, has nothing extraordinary to boast of; but the Country is more fruitfull and agreeable, and the Rivers equally full of Fish; it has under its Jurisdiction only one City of the second Rank, and eighteen of the third.

The Eighth City, Yung-ping-fu.

Yung-ping-fu. THIS City is advantageously situated, but its Jurisdiction not large, extending only over one City of the second, and five of the third Order; it is encompass'd by the Sea, by Rivers, and by Mountains cover'd with very fair Trees; its Soil is not very fertile, but that Defect is supply'd by the neighbouring Bay, which furnishes it with Plenty of all sorts of Necessaries.

Shan-bay Fort. Not far from this City is a Fort named Shan-bay, which is as it were the Key of the Province of Lyau-tong; it stands near the Great Wall, which, before it ascends the Hills, extends from the Bulwark built in the Sea, for the Space of a League, in a plain Country.

The Ninth City, Swen-wha-fu.

Swen-wha-fu. THE Largeness of this City, Number of Inhabitants, Beauty of its Streets, and Triumphal Arches, render it considerable; it is seated amidst Mountains, and not far from the Great Wall; two Cities of the second, and eight of the third Rank are under its Jurisdiction; besides some Places or Forts along the Wall, which are provided with numerous Garrisons for defending the Entrance into China from Tartary. Its Mountains afford fine Crystal, Marble, and Porphyry.

Yellow Rats. Among the Animals which this Country produces, there are abundance of yellow Rats, larger than those of Europe; their Skins are in great Request with the Chinese.

Forts in Pe-che-li along the Great Wall. Besides the Fort of Shan-bay above-mention'd, which defends the Passage from Lyau-tong into Pe-che-li, the Gates of the Great Wall are defended on the Inside with several pretty large Forts, viz. Hi-fong-kew, at $40^{\circ} 26'$ (P), Ku-pe-kew, at $40^{\circ} 43'$ the Emperor usually passes thro' this Gate, when he goes to hunt in Tartary; Tu-she-kew, at $41^{\circ} 19' 20''$; and Chang-kyakew, in $40^{\circ} 51' 15''$ (P); these two last Entrances are famous, because the Roads which the Tartars, (who are in Subjection to the Empire) take to come to Pe-king, lye thro' them. All the Places along the Great Wall in this Province, are built with Earth, and cas'd on both Sides with Brick.

Tyen-tsing-uey. It would be endless and tiresome to give an account of the Cities of the second and third Rank; however I cannot omit one, which, tho' without any Jurisdiction over others, has beyond Comparison a greater Trade, is more populous and rich than most of the Cities before described; it is named Tyen-tsing-uey, rais'd since the Map was made to the Rank of Chew, or Cities of the second Order.

It is seated in the Place where the Royal Canal, which comes from Lin-tsin-chew, joins the River of Pe-king. A great Mandarin, named Yen-ywen-i, resides there, on whom the Officers depend, that superintend the Salt made along the Coasts of the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-tong. All the Ships that fetch Timber from Eastern Tartary for Carpenters Work, after crossing the Gulf of Lyau-tong, named Tyen-tung-uey, come and unload in this Port (Q), which is but 20 Leagues distant from Pe-king.

PROVINCE II. KYANG-NAN.

Prov. II.
Kyang-nan

THIS Province which is one of the most fertile, trading, and consequently wealthy of the Empire, is bounded on the West by that of Ho-nan and Hu-quang, on the South by Che-kyang and Kyang-si, on the East by the Gulf of Nan-king, and on the North by Sban-tong.

The ancient Emperors constantly kept their Courts there, till Reasons of State obliged them to remove nearer Tartary, and choose Pe-king. It is of vast Extent, containing fourteen Cities of the first, and ninety three of the second and third Rank, all the most populous and famous in the Empire, especially for Trade. It is the Resort of all the Great Barks, for the Country is full of Lakes, Rivers, and Canals, either natural or artificial; which have a Communication with the Great River, Yang-tse-kyang, that runs thro' the Province, where there are few Mountains to be seen, except towards the South.

The Silks, varnish'd Works, Ink, Paper, and in general every thing that comes, both from Nan-king and the other Cities of the Province, which carry on an astonishing Trade, is much more esteem'd and dear, than what is brought from other Provinces. In the City Sban-bay only, and the Villages belonging to it, they reckon above 200,000 Weavers of Callico.

The Sea Coast in several Parts abounds with Salt Pits, the Salt whereof is dispersed almost thro' the Empire; a great Quantity of Marble is also found there. In short, this Province is so plentiful and rich, that it yields annually about 32 Millions of Tails (*), exclusive of the Duties arising from every thing either exported or imported, for receiving of which several Offices are establish'd.

The Inhabitants of Kyang-nan are civil and polite; they are exceeding ingenious, and have a more than ordinary Inclination for the Sciences; hence this Province is remarkable for producing a great Number of Doctors, who by their Merit attain to the Offices and Dignities of the Empire.

The Province is divided into two Governments; the Eastern, the Governor whereof resides at Su-cheu-fu; and the Western, whose Governor has his Seat at Ngan-king-fu, each Government has seven Fu or Cities of the first Rank within its Jurisdiction.

The First City, Kyang-ning-fu, or Nan-king, Capital of the Province.

IF we may believe the ancient Chinese, this City was once the finest in the World; when they speak of its Magnitude, they say, that if two Horsemen went out in the Morning by the same Gate, and were ordered to gallop round it different Ways, they would not meet till the Evening. It is certainly the greatest City in China, its Walls are 67 Li in Compass, according to the Measure we took of it when we made the Plan, which amount to near 5 great Leagues and an half and 466 Fathom.

It stands but one League from the great Yang-tse-kyang, from which River Barks come up to it by means of several Canals, that end at the City; one sees on these Canals Numbers of Imperial Barks, almost as large as our middling Ships.

The Figure of Nan-king is irregular, the Hills that are within it, and the Nature of its Soil is such, that it could not be otherwise without great Inconveniencies. It was formerly the Imperial City, whence it has the Name of Nan-king, that is the Southern Court, as Pe-king signifies the Northern Court; but since the six great Tribunals, which then were in both those Cities, are all translated to Pe-king, the Emperor has given it the Name of Kyang-ning: it is still in Dis-course called by its old Name; but it is never suffer'd to be mention'd in the publick Instruments.

This City is much fallen from its ancient Splendor, no Footsteps appear of its Magnificent Palace; its Observatory is now neglected, and almost destroy'd; nothing but the Memory of its Temples, Sepulchres of Emperors, and other superb Monuments remain; being all demolish'd by the Tartars who first invaded the Empire, to gratify their Avarice and hatred to the Dynasty then reigning. About one third of it is quite waste, but the rest very well inhabited; so great a Trade, and such Numbers of People are seen in some Parts of it, that one would scarce believe there is a greater Hurry any where: this would be still more extraordinary, were the Streets as broad as those of Pe-king, which they are not by one half; Nevertheless they are sufficiently handsome, well pav'd, and adorn'd on both Sides with neat Shops richly furnish'd.

In this City one of the great Mandarins resides, named Tsong tsu, before whom are brought important Matters, not only from the Tribunals of both the Governors of the Province, but also from that of the Governor of Kyang-si. The Tartars have also a numerous Garrison here, under a General of their own Nation, and possess one Part of the City, separated from the rest by a single Wall.

The Palaces where both the Tartar and Chinese Mandarins dwell, are neither so spacious nor well built as those of the Capitals of the rest of the Provinces. One sees no publick Buildings there, answering to the Reputation of so famous a City, except its Gates, which are exceeding beautiful, and some Idol Temples : Such is that where stands the famous Porcelain Tower ; it is of an Octogonal Figure, each side being fifteen Feet in Front ; it is twenty Chinese Fathom high, that is two hundred Feet, and divided into nine Stories, by single Floors within, and without by Cornishes at the Rise of Arches, which sustain little Roofs, cover'd with Tiles done over with green varnish. I shall give a Description of it in another Place. This Tower is without Dispute the tallest and most beautiful of all those to be seen in China ; where this sort of Works, named Ta, are so common, that in several Provinces, one meets with them in almost every City, and even in the great Towns.

That which renders also this City famous, is the great Care it takes to cultivate the Sciences : It singly furnishes more Doctors and great Mandarins, than several Cities together ; the Libraries here are more numerous, the Book-sellers Shops better furnish'd, the Printing more beautiful, and the Paper better than any where in the Empire besides.

Artificial Flowers.

Nothing can be more natural than the artificial Flowers made here of the Pith of a Tree call'd Tong-tsau ; this is at present become a particular Manufacture, which has increas'd to that Degree in China, within these few Years, that there is a great Trade driven with them.

The Satins of Nan-king, which are call'd Twan-tse, as well those that are flower'd as not, are the best and most esteem'd at Pe-king, where those of Kanton are much cheaper ; pretty good Woolen Cloath also is made here, which is call'd, from the Name of the Town, Nan-king-shen. That which is to be found in some other Cities is not to be compared to it, as being scarce any thing else than Felt made without weaving.

Ink.

The Ink, call'd the Ink of Nan king, comes all from Whey-chew, in the same Province. Its District is full of great Villages, almost wholly peopled with those who make or sell these Sticks of Ink which are often adorn'd with green, blew or gilded Flowers ; they are of all sorts of Figures, as Books, Joins of Bambu, Lions, &c.

The Breadth and Depth of the Yang-tse-kyang render'd Nan-king formerly an excellent Port : The famous Corsair, who besieg'd it in the late Troubles, pass'd easily up to it ; but at present the great Barks, or rather the Chinese Vessels of Carriage, do not enter the River, either because the Mouth is stopp'd up of itself, or that the Chinese out of Policy make no more use of it, that the Knowledge of it by Deasees may be lost.

Fishery in April and May.

In April and May, abundance of excellent Fish is caught near the City ; during this Season some of them are convey'd to the Court, cover'd with Ice, which keeps them fresh, in Barks appointed solely for that use ; these make such Speed, that in eight or ten Days time, sailing continually Day and Night, they arrive at Pe-king, tho' it be more than two hundred great Leagues distant ; for greater Expedition there are Stages all the Way, where the Men are reliev'd. So long as the Fishing lasts, two Barks depart from Nan-king, twice a Week, loaden with Fish.

Tho' Nan-king is the Capital of the whole Province, it has no more than eight Cities of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction.

The Second City, Su-chew-fu, Capital of I-tong, or the Eastern Part of the Province.

Delightful
Situation.

THIS is one of the most beautiful and pleasant Cities in all China ; the Europeans, who have seen it, compare it to Venice, with this Difference, that Venice stands in the midst of the Sea, and Su-chew in fresh Water. One may pass thro' the Streets here both by Water and Land ; the Branches of the River and Canals are almost all capable of bearing the largest Barks, which may even sail thro' the City, and arrive at the Sea in two Days at most.

Trade with Japan.

It carries on a Trade, not only with all the Provinces of the Empire, but also with Japan ; from which it is separated only by an Arm of the Sea (s), which the little Merchant Ships cross some times in two or three Days.

Its district.

There is no Country that is more charming, in respect of Situation and Climate ; that is more populous and thick set with Towns and Boroughs, which are ever in Sight ; that is better improv'd, there not being an Inch of Ground, but what produces Fruit, Corn or Rice ; and lastly, that more abounds with Rivers, Canals, Lakes, and especially Barks of all Sorts, and Sizes, painted or gilded : some full of Persons of Quality, who are lodg'd in them more decently than in their own Houses ; others loaded with rich Commodities, and several design'd purely for Recreation.

Paradise of China.

This City, like Hang-chew in the Province of Che-kyang, is properly a City of Pleasure ; it wants nothing that can contribute to make Life delightful ; hence we find an ancient Proverb in the Chinese Books, Shang yew tyen tang, Hya yew Su Hang, that is, Above is Paradise, below Su chew and Hang chew ; in Effect it may be said that these two Cities are the Terrestrial Paradise of China.

This City, like Hang-chew, and some others of the Empire, may be reckon'd three Cities : one within the Walls, which are reputed more than four Leagues in Compass ; another in the Suburbs, which extend a great way on both sides of the Canals ; and a third in the Barks, which are so many floating Houses, rang'd on the Water for more than a League together in several Rows, many of these Barks equal our third Rate Ships in Bulk.

(s) The Author is to be understood here of the District of the City, and not of the City itself, which he seems to confound together, as he does in many other Places ; whence it seems that this Description is an Abstract from a more complete one.

The whole together yields a Prospect, which cannot well be describ'd, and must be view'd in order to judge how agreeable it is. This great City has but six Gates to the Landward, and as many towards the Water. To behold the immense Numbers of People that are here continually in Motion, and the Throngs there are in every Place, of those who come to buy and sell, one would imagine that the Inhabitants of all the Provinces came to trade at Sü-chew. The Embroideries and Brocades that are made at this Place, are in Request throughout the whole Empire, because the Work is good and cheap. It is the Seat of the Vice-Roy of the Eastern part of this Province, whose particular Jurisdiction contains eight Cities, whereof one is of the second Order, and seven of the third; they are all very handsome, and a League and an half or two Leagues in Compass each.

PROV. II.

The Third City, Song-kyang-fu.

THIS City is built in the Water, and the Chinese Ships, or rather Vessels of Carriage, enter it on every Side, and so pass to the Sea, which is not far distant. The extraordinary Quantity of Cotton, and lovely Callico's of all sorts, wherewith it furnishes not only the Empire, but also foreign Countries, render it famous, and of very great Resort. These Callico's are so exceeding fine, that when they are dyed, one would take them for the finest Serge.

It has but four Cities under its Jurisdiction, but it is neither the less fertile nor rich on that Score: for, tho' these Cities are of the third Order, they may compare with the best for Magnitude, the extraordinary resort of Merchants from all Parts throughout the Year, and the different sorts of Commerce carry'd on there; such is for instance the City of Shan-hay-byen, where Ships from Fo-kyen are continually entring, and others sailing out to trade with Japan.

Shan-hay-byen.

The Fourth City, Chang-chew-fu. (r)

THIS is a famous City, and of great Trade, situate near the Canal, by which the Barks fail from Sü-chew into the Yang-tse-kyang; it is adorn'd with several Triumphant Arches, and the Sides of the Canal, which lead to it, are lined with hewn Stone. Its District contains only five Cities of the third Order, but most of them are very fair and well peopled. Vü-fu-byen (u) is a good League and an half in Compass, Exclusive of the Suburbs, which are a Mile and an half in Length; it is surrounded with a great Ditch in form of a Canal; the Walls are twenty five Feet high, and kept in very good Order; the Waters wherewith it abounds are very good, especially for Tea, to which it gives a very agreeable Flavour, not to be found elsewhere.

In another City of the same District, China Ware is made, which, according to them, adds an admirable Smell to the Water us'd for Tea; whence it is prefer'd to the best Porcelain of King-te-ching, and brings a considerable Trade to the Town.

Chang-chew-fu.

Vü-fu-byen.

The Fifth City, Chin-kyang-fu.

THIS is none of the largest Cities in the Province, for it is scarce three Miles in Compass; but it is one of the most considerable, on account of its Situation and Trade, being one of the Keys of the Empire towards the Sea, and at the same time a Place of Defence, where there is a Strong Garrison; its Walls in several Places are above thirty Feet in height, and made of Brick, which are at least four or five Inches thick; the Streets of the City and Suburbs are paved with Marble. It stands on the sides of the Ta-kyang (w), which, in this Place, is a Mile and an half broad, and to the East of a Canal, which they have cut as far as the River.

Six Paces from the Bank, in the River, stands a Hill, call'd Kin-shan or Golden Hill, because of its agreeable Situation; on the Top of it is a Tower several Stories high. This Island is at least five hundred Paces round, and has its Shores beset with Idol Temples, and Houses of Bonzas.

Opposite on the other side of the River stands Qua-chew; which, tho' it has not the Denomination of a City, and passes for no more than a Ma-tew, or Place of Trade, yet it is as considerable as the greatest Cities.

The Suburbs of Chin-kyang are a Geometrical Mile in Length, and as populous as the City itself, from which they pass to them over Stone Bridges. There is so great a Throng of People in the Streets, and especially at its Port, that one can scarce squeeze thro' them. There are some very agreeable Hills near the Town. Its Jurisdiction is but small, extending over no more than three Cities of the third Rank.

Chin-kyang-fu.

The Sixth City, Whay-ngan-fu.

THIS City, which is situate in a marshy Place, and is inclosed with a triple Wall, is rich, tho' not very populous; it is in Danger of being drown'd, by the extraordinary Increase of Water, for the Ground it stands on is lower than the Canal, which in several Places is supported only only by Banks of Earth: But two Leagues off, it has a Borough belonging to it, named Tsing-kyang-pá, which is as it were the Port of the River Whang-bo; it is very large, and populous, and the People commonly very busy. There, one of the great Mandarins resides, named Tsong-bo, that is, the Surveyor General of the Rivers, or Grand Master of the Waters. This Mandarin has a great Number of Officers under him, who have each their Divisions, and convenient Stations allotted.

Mohammedans in China.

Beyond the Whang-bo there are certain Towns along the Canal, where the Mohammedans have unsuccessfully endeavour'd to draw a Trade; their Mosques are very high, and not built in the Chinese Taste. Notwithstanding they have been settled there for so many Generations, they are still considered as of foreign Original, and from time to time meet with Insults. A few Years ago at Hang kew in the Province of Hu-quang, the People, provok'd by the indiscreet Behaviour of some of them, destroy'd the Mosques which they had built there, in Spight of all the Magistrates could do.

Marble.

Marble is very common in the District of this City; the Plains produce plenty of Rice and Wheat, and are watered by Rivers and Lakes, where all sorts of Fish are caught. It has eleven subordinate Cities, two of the second, and nine of the third Rank.

The Seventh City, Yang-chew-fu.

Yang-chew-fu.

THE Air of this City is mild and temperate, the Soil agreeable and fertile; it is built on the side of the Royal Canal, which extends from the Ta-kyang, and runs Northward to the Whang-bo or Yellow River. It is a Place of great Trade, especially in all sorts of Chinese Manufactures.

Great Trade in Salt.

That which contributes most to rendering it so populous, is the Sale of Salt, which is made on the Sea Coast in all Parts of its District and Neighbourhood; whence it is convey'd hither by means of Canals made on Purpose, which enter the Great Canal, whereon there is no City as far as Pe-king, comparable to it. This Salt is transported by a great Number of rich Dealers into the Provinces lying in the Heart of the Empire and very far from the Sea.

The City is divided into several Parts by Canals; the People are so numerous, and the Canals cover'd so thick with Barks, that there is free Passage for nothing but absolute Necessaries; there is a Tartar Garrison in the Place.

Over-against the Eastern Part one sees a Bridge and large Suburbs; the Croud is so great at all times, that the Bridge is not large enough to let them pass; this has oblig'd them to settle a Ferry-Boat, thirty Paces farther, which scarce suffices to carry over the People that turn that Way, altho' the Passage is not above twenty Paces over.

Yang-chew, is two Leagues in Circumference, and, including the Suburbs, contains 200,000 Souls. It has only six Cities of the third Rank in its Dependence. The Inhabitants are great Lovers of Pleasure; they educate several young Girls, whom they teach to sing, to play on Instruments of Musick, to paint, and all other Accomplishments that render the Sex agreeable; and afterwards sell them at a great Price to the rich Lords, who place them among their Concubines, that is, their Second-Hand Wives.

The Eighth City, Ngan-king-fu, Capital of the Western Part [I-si.]

Ngan-king-fu.

ITS Situation is charming; it is near the Borders of three Provinces, and tho' it be but five Days Journey from the Capital, yet it has a particular Vice-Roy; this Mandarin keeps a great Garrison, in a Fort that commands the Lake Po-yang, at the Entrance of the Province of Kyang-si and of the River Yang-tse-kyang.

This City is very considerable, on account of its Riches and Trade; whatever is carry'd to Nan-king, passes thro' it; there are but six Cities of the third Rank in its District, which is a very open, agreeable and fertile Country.

The Ninth City, Whey-chew-fu

Whey-chew-fu.

IS the most Southern City in the Province, and one of the wealthiest in the Empire; the Air is wholesome and temperate, tho' it is encompass'd with Mountains. It has within its Jurisdiction no more than six Cities of the third Order. The Inhabitants are reckon'd very expert in Trade; there is not any City, be the Commerce ever so small, without some Dealers from Whey-chew; nor any Bank or Change, in which there are not some of its Inhabitants principally concern'd.

Best Indian Ink made here.

The People there are thrifty and live sparingly; but they are bold and enterprising in Business. In the Mountains there are Mines of Gold, Silver, and Copper; and they say, it is the Country that produces the best Tea. In this City also the best Ink in China is made, wherewith the Shop-keepers of Nan-king are furnish'd. Every body knows this Ink is not liquid like ours, but made up in little Sticks, on which the Makers cut divers Figures of Flowers, Animals, Anticks, &c.

The Art of making Ink, as well as all the other Arts which have a Relation to the Sciences, is honourable in China, where there is no attaining to the Dignities of the Empire, but by the Sciences. They also prefer all the varnish'd Works that are made at Whey-chew, because the Varnish is more beautiful, and they have the Art of laying it on better there than any where else. The Earth whereof they make the China Ware, particularly at King-te-ching, is likewise found in the District of this City, near the Borders of the District of Zbau-chew, in the Province of Kyang-fi.

The Tenth City, Ning-que-fu.

THIS City is situate on a fine River, which falls into the Yang-tse-kyang. The Ground where it stands is uneven and rugged, because surrounded with Hills; but its Hillocks afford an agreeable Prospect, and its Mountains, which are all cover'd with Woods, furnish the Botanists with excellent Medicinal Herbs. There are in this Place a great many Manufacturies for Paper, which is made of a kind of Reeds. It has under its Jurisdiction six Cities of the third Rank.

Ning-que-fu.

The Eleventh City, Chi-chew-fu,

PRESIDES likewise over six Hyen; it stands on the Side of the Yang-tse-kyang (R), and tho' encompass'd with Hills, yet its District is fruitful, and furnishes plenty of all the Necessaries of Life; in case it should want any, it may be supply'd by the Kyang, which is continually carrying on its Waters the Riches of several Provinces.

Chi-chew-fu.

The Twelfth City, Tay-ping-fu.

BY this City's being situate on the Yang-tse-kyang, and by the Rivers wherewith its Plains are water'd, one may readily judge how easy it carries on Trade. It may be taken it in some measure for an Island, for it stands inclos'd by three Branches of Rivers, which fall into the Kyang; its District contains only three Cities, whereof the most considerable for Riches is Vu-bu-byen.

Tay-ping-fu.

The Thirteenth City, Fong-yang-fu.

IT stands on a Mountain, pretty near the Yellow River, and incloses several little Hills within its Walls. Its District is very large, comprehending eighteen Cities, whereof five are of the second Rank, and 13 of the third; besides a great Number of Ma-tew, or Places of Trade, settled on the River for the Conveniency of Merchants, and levying the Duties of the Empire. It is eighty Leagues from East to West, and sixty from North to South; so that it exceeds in Extent our greatest Provinces of Europe.

Fong-yang-fu.

As this was the Birth Place of Hong-wu, first Emperor of the preceding Dynasty, he resolv'd to render it famous, by making it a stately City, and the Capital of the Empire, which he did in 1367. Having driven the Western Tartars out of China, which they had been in Possession of 87 Years, he fix'd his Court at this Place, and named it Fong-yang, that is, the Place of the Splendor of the Eagle. He design'd to have made it the most large and famous in the Empire; but the Unevenness of the Ground, the Want of fresh Water, and most of all, the Neighbourhood of his Father's Tomb, caused him to change his Resolution; and by the unanimous Advice of his principal Officers he transferred his Seat to Nan-king, a more beautiful and commodious City, not above thirty two Leagues distant.

The Imperial
short Space.

As soon as he had determin'd to quit it, a Stop was put to all the Works that were then going forward. The Imperial Palace, which was to have had a triple Inclosure; the Walls that were to have been nine Leagues in Compass, and the Canals which were mark'd out, were all abandon'd. There were but three Monuments finish'd, which are still remaining; the Grandeur and Beauty whereof demonstrate how magnificent that City would have been, had the Emperor pursu'd his first Design.

Magnificent Plan of a City.

The first of these Monuments, the Tomb of the Father of Hong-wu, is adorn'd with every thing the most beautiful in its kind, that the Chinese Genius, and Filial Affection were able to invent; it is call'd Wbang-lin, or the Royal Tomb.

The second is a Tower, built in the midst of the City; it is the Figure of an oblong Square, a hundred Feet in Height, divided into four large Stories, raised on a massive Pile of Brick-work, forty Foot high, a hundred long, and sixty broad; it is, they say, the highest Structure in China, and is seen at a great Distance.

The third is a sumptuous Temple, erected to the Idol Fo; it was at first a little Pagod, where Hong-wu, after having lost his Parents, retired at the Age of seventeen, and served for some Years as Scullion in the Kitchen; being weary of such a slothful Life, he list'd himself a Soldier under one of the Chiefs of the Robbers, who had revolted against the Tartars. (*) According to the Map, this City stands a Mile, or a Mile and an half from the Kyang on the East Side.

Prov. II. soon gave Proofs of his Valour, and the Chief, whose Esteem he had gain'd, gave him his Daughter in Marriage; shortly after he was declared his Successor by the unanimous Consent of the Troops.

Upon this seeing himself at the Head of a considerable Party, he aspired to no less than the Throne; his Reputation had already brought a great Number of brave Men into his Army, at the Head of which he attack'd the Tartars briskly, defeated them, and took Nan-king, with several other neighbouring Cities. He did not stay long there, but never ceased pursuing the Tartars till he had driven them entirely out of China. So many Battles he fought were so many Victories, whence he got the Name of Hong-wu, which signifies, a Prince of Valour, that triumphs over every thing.

Stately
Temple.

As soon as he came to the Throne, more out of Acknowledgment to those who had entertain'd him in his Misery, than any Trust he put in Idols, he caused the sumptuous Temple I have been speaking of, to be built in Favour of the Bonzas; it begins by a Row of five great Piles of Buildings after the Imperial Manner, flank'd with divers Halls and Lodgings for the Bonzas; to whom he assign'd Revenues for maintaining three hundred Persons handsomely, under a Chief of their Sect, whom he constituted a Mandarin, to govern them independant of the Officers of the City.

This Pagod was call'd Long-bing-se, that is, The Temple which the Dragon came out of, because the Emperor bears a Dragon and six Griffins for his Arms; it was kept up so long as the last Dynasty continued, but afterwards, during the Civil Wars, it was almost entirely ruin'd, and nothing remains of it now, but the five main Buildings aforesaid.

The present Dynasty of the Eastern Tartars, who succeeded, have taken no Care to repair this Temple; so that there is not above one in twenty of those Idol Priests remaining, who besides are almost reduced to Beggary.

Except these three Monuments, there is scarce any thing to be seen in Fong-yang worth Notice; it has been so intirely ruin'd by the Wars, that from an Imperial City it is dividnd to a large Village; it is pretty populous, and well built towards the middle, but in all other parts of it, nothing is to be met with but low thatch'd Houses or open Fields, where they plant Tobacco, in which the Riches, and almost the whole Trade of the Country consists.

In the neighbouring Mountains there is found abundance of Talc, and red Wormwood, used by the Physicians. Its Plains are water'd by fine Rivers, and among others, the great Whay-bo (s), which rises in the Mountains of the Province of Ho-nan, runs thro' the whole Country, and after a long Course, passes thro' the Lake Hong-tse, and falls into the Whang-bo, about thirty nine Leagues from its Mouth.

The Fourteenth City, Lyu-chew-fu.

Lyu-chew-fu.

THE Country, where this City stands, is pleasant, and very fertile; the Lake Tsau, in the midst of which there is an Island, furnishes Fish of all Sorts, and waters the Plains so well, that they produce plenty of all sorts of Grain and Fruit, and especially the best Sort of Tea, on which account chiefly the whole District is famous. They make very good Paper here.

Its Mountains, especially those which are in the Neighbourhood of Lü-kyang-byen, are cover'd with very fine Trees; there is a very remarkable Bridge near Lü-ngan-chew. Its Jurisdiction is pretty large, containing eight Cities, two of the second Rank, and six of the third.

The Island of Tsong-ming.

Tsong-ming.

THIS Island, which belongs to the Province of Kyang-nan, is separated from it on the West by an Arm of the Sea, that is not above five or six Leagues over; they pretend it has been form'd by Degrees, of the Earth, which the Yang-tse-kyang brought along with it from the several Provinces that it washes. Wherefore, beside the Name of Tsong-ming, they commonly call it Kyang-she, which signifies The Tongue of the River, either because, being longer than broad, it resembles a Tongue, or that it lies directly at the Mouth of that great River.

How first Peopled.

Anciently it was a desert sandy Country, over-run with Reeds, where the Robbers and Villains, of whom they wanted to purge the Empire, were banish'd. The first who were transported there, were under a Necessity either of perishing by Famine, or getting their Food by cultivating the Earth; the Desire of Living render'd them active and industrious; they clear'd this uncultivated Land, pluck'd up the Weeds, sow'd a few Grains they brought with them, and in a short time reap'd the Fruit of their Labours. Some Chinese Families, who found it difficult to live on the Continent, took it in their Heads to go and settle there, whither they went and divided the arable Ground amongst them.

These new Comers, not being able to improve their respective Shares, invited other Families from the Continent, to whom they made over for ever part of the Lands, on condition they pay'd a yearly Rent, in the Produce of the Country. The Duty, which the first Proprietors reserv'd, is call'd Quo-tew, and still subsists.

The Isle of Tsong-ming is about twenty Leagues long, and five or six broad. There is only one City, on it which is of the third Rank, inclos'd with very high Walls, supported by good Terrasses

(s) In the Text it is Hai ho, instead of Hoai ho, as it is elsewhere written, agreeable to the Map.

N.B. a * at the end of y name Lat. or Long. denotes a Variation in fact respect from the Map.

Terrasses, and surrounded with Ditches full of Water; the Champain is cut into an infinite Number of Canals, edg'd with very high Causeys, to prevent Inundations; for the Land is even, and void of Hills. The Air is wholesome and temperate, and the Country pleasant.

PROV. II.
Kyang-nan.

Every now and then one meets with large Boroughs, well furnish'd with Shops, where all things for necessary Uses, and even Pleasure may be had. Between the Boroughs there are as many Houses scatter'd up and down the Country, as there are Families employ'd in Husbandry. It is true these make no extraordinary Figure, excepting those of the richer sort, which are built with Brick, and cover'd with Tiles; the Walls of all the rest are made of Reeds platted, and the Roofs of Stubble. The Trees that are planted on both sides of the Ditches, which surround the Houses, and are full of running Water, give them an Agreeableness which they want in themselves.

The great Roads are narrow, because the Inhabitants are very sparing of their Land, but lin'd on both sides with little Houses of Shop-keepers, who sell Refreshments to Travellers. One would almost imagine the whole Island, in those Places where it is best cultivated, to be one Village of an immense Extent.

Roads.

The Island affords no Game, but there is plenty of large Geese, wild and tame Ducks, Hens, Hogs, and Buffaloes, which they reserve for the Plough. Fruit is scarce, the Ground producing nothing but large Limons, small four Oranges fit for Sauces; Apricocks, huge Peaches, the Fruit call'd Se-tse, of which I shall speak elsewhere, and large Water-Melons; with all sorts of Herbs and Pulse the whole Year round.

Productions.

There are three different sorts of Soil in this Island; the first lies to the North, and is wholly uncultivated, but the Reeds, which grow there naturally, yield a very considerable Income; as there are no Trees throughout the Island (†), part of those Reeds is employ'd in building Houses about the Country, the other part serves for Fuel, and supply's not only the whole Island, but also part of the neighbouring Coasts on the Continent.

Nature of the Soil.

The second sort of Land is that which extends, from the first, as far as the Sea on the South-side. It affords the Inhabitants two Harvests every Year, one of Grain in general, which always falls in May, the other is either of Rice or Cotton; the first in September, the second soon after. Their Grain is Rice, Wheat, Barley, and a kind of bearded Corn, which, tho' resembling Rice, is yet of a quite different Nature.

There is a third sort of Land, which, tho' barren in Appearance, is yet more profitable than the other two; it consists of a greyish sort of Earth, dispers'd, by Spots of the Bigness of two Acres, over several parts of the Isle on the North-side; it yields so great a Quantity of Salt, that those of the Continent are supply'd with it, as well as the Islanders. It is pretty difficult to account whence it is that certain Portions of Land, scatter'd here and there over the whole Country, should be impregnated with Salt to such a Degree, as not to produce a single Blade of Grass; while at the same time the Lands contiguous to them are very fertile, both in Corn and Cotton. It often happens also that the fertile Lands, in their turn, become full of Salt, and the Saline Lands fit for sowing.

These are some of the Secrets of Nature, which the Mind of Man strives in vain to dive into, and ought to make him admire more and more the Grandeur and Power of the Author of Nature.

PROVINCE III. KYANG-SI.

PROV. III.
Kyang-si.

THIS Province is bounded on the North by that of Kyang-nan, on the West by Hu-quang, on the South by Yang-tong, and on the East by those of Fo-kyen and Che-kyang. The Mountains, which are in the Southern part of it, and unite with those of Yang-tong and Fo-kyen, are almost inaccessible; but having pass'd them, one discovers very fine Valleys and Plains exceeding well improv'd.

Bounds.

However, it is so populous, that notwithstanding its Fertility, it does not yield much more Rice, than is sufficient for the Use of the Inhabitants; they also pass for being great Oeconomists, and their frugality draws on them the Raillery of the neighbouring Provinces; in other respects they are of an excellent Genius, and produce a great Number of able Men, who obtain the Degrees, and are advanc'd to the Magistracy.

Inhabitants.

Kyang-si is water'd with Brooks, Lakes, and Rivers, which abound with all sorts of Fish, particularly Salmon, Trouts and Sturgeon. The Mountains, with which it is encompass'd, are cover'd over with Woods, or famous for their Minerals, Simples, and Medicinal Herbs.

Produce.

This Province, besides abounding in all Necessaries of Life, is very rich in Mines of Gold, Silver, Lead, Iron and Tin. It furnishes very beautiful Silks, and the Rice Wine made here is reckon'd delicious by the Chinese; but what renders it most famous is, that lovely Cbina Ware made at King-te-ching, and the Rice it produces, which is much esteem'd in the Empire, and whereof many Imperial Barks are freighted.

The Flower of Lien-wa, so much valued in China, is found almost every where in this Province; it grows principally in the Lakes, just as the Water-Lilly in Europe springs up in Standing Waters; but is very different from the Water-Lilly, as well in the Root and Blossom, as the Fruit. Nothing is more agreeable than to see whole Lakes all cover'd with its Flowers, which are cultivated every Year, the great Lords keep them in little Ponds, sometimes in great Vases fill'd with Mud and Water, which serve to adorn their Gardens or Courts.

The Lien-wa, or Water-Lilly.

(†) That is Trees for Timber, otherwise those planted about the Houses in the Country must be excepted.

PROV. III.
Kyang-fu.

This Flower, which shoots up above the Top of the Water, the Height of a Yard, or Yard and an half, pretty nearly resembles our Tulip; it consists of a little Ball, supported by a small Filament, much like that which is found in the Lilly; its Colour is either Violet, or White, or partly Red and partly White; the Smell is very agreeable; its Fruit is of the Size of a Hazel-Nut, the Kernel whereof is white and well tasted. The Physicians prize it, being of Opinion that it nourishes and strengthens, for which Reason they prescribe it for those who are weak, or after a severe Sickness do not easily recover their Strength; the Leaves are long, and float on the Water, they are fasten'd to the Root by long Strings; the Gardeners make use of them to wrap their Ware in. The Root is knotty like that of Reeds; its Pith and Substance is very white; it is esteem'd and much used, especially in Summer, because it is very refreshing; there is nothing in this Plant but what is of use, for they even make Meal of it, which serves for several Occasions.

The River Kan-kyang divides this Province into two Parts, which contains thirteen Cities of the first Rank, and seventy eight of the second and third Rank.

The First City, Nan-chang-fu, the Capital.

Nan-chang-fu.

THIS is one of the finest Cities that are situate on the Banks of their charming Rivers. It was formerly ruin'd by the Tartars, whose Yoke it refusing to submit to, they set it on Fire, and nothing remain'd of it excepting the Walls; but it has been since re-built.

The Compass of its Walls is not great, and along the Port the River (v) is pretty deep; that which renders it a Place of so great Trade, is the Canals and Rivers, by which it may be enter'd on every side. It is not far off the Lake Po-yang, into which the River discharges itself, after it has collected almost all the Waters of the Province, from the Southern End whereof it comes.

China Ware.

The China Ware, which is made in the District of Zbau-chew-fu, standing on the Eastern side of the same Lake, is the Commodity wherein all its Trade consists; and indeed it draws a great Number of Dealers from the rest of the Provinces, for the Sort that is made at Kanton, in the Province of Po-kyen, and some other Places, is not so much esteem'd in China, as Earthen Ware is in Europe; Strangers cannot mistake it, for it is white as Snow, does not Shine, and is without any Mixture of Colours.

It seems that the Water of the Place where the China is made, contributes to its Beauty and Goodness, for they do not make so good elsewhere, altho' they employ the same Materials; these Materials are not only found on the Borders of this Province, but also in one Place on those of Kyang-nan; what this Earth is, and how it must be order'd, will be shown hereafter; and as one cannot from a bare Description form an exact Notion of the Nature of the kinds of Stones and Earths, that are employ'd in this Manufacture, I have procur'd Samples of them from China, and put them into the Hands of Mr. de Reaumur, one of the Members of the Academy of Sciences, who is capable of discovering whether there are any of the same Kind in the Provinces of France.

Eight Cities depend on Nan-chang, whereof seven are of the third, and only one of the second Rank. Its Plains are so well cultivated, that it is hard to find Places for Cattle to graze in; it has always produced a great Number of Literati, and is full of Persons of Distinction. The Vice-Roy keeps his Court in this City, where there are considerable Officers and Magistrates. Under the preceding Dynasty, several Families of Princes of the Imperial House dwelt there, whose Fortune was somewhat capricious, but not inglorious. At present all the Princes remain at Court, and are not suffer'd to leave it.

The Second City, Zhau-chew-fu.

Zbau-chew-fu.

THIS City, which has within its District seven others of the third Order, has a very beautiful and pleasant Situation, being built on the North-side of the Lake Po-yang, and encompass'd with Rivers that fall into the Lake.

King-te-ching.
Famous for China Ware.

All the Country is flat, and render'd extraordinary fruitful by the Rivers that water it, but it is chiefly famous for the beautiful China Ware made at King-te-ching, which is in its District.

This Borough, where the true Artificers for Porcelain are to be found, is as well peopled as the greatest City in China, and wants nothing but Walls to merit the Name. These Places call'd Ching, which are of great Resort and Trade, are not enclos'd. They reckon in this Borough more than a Million of Inhabitants, who consume every Day above ten thousand Loads of Rice, and one thousand Hogs, exclusive of other Animals, whose Flesh they eat. The Houses of the Merchants take up a great Deal of Room, and contain a prodigious Multitude of Workmen.

King-te-ching extends a League and an half along a fine River, and is not a Heap of Houses as might be imagin'd, but the Streets are very long, and intersect each other at certain Distances;

(v) The Kan-kyang before-mention'd.

Distances, without a Scrap of waste Ground to spare in it. The Houses themselves are rather too close, and the Streets too narrow; in passing thro' them one would think himself in the middle of a Fair, and they ring with the Cries of Porters, who are clearing way.

It is considerably dearer living here than at Zhou-chew, because whatever is consum'd must be brought from other Places, even to the Wood for supplying the Furnaces with Fuel, which at present comes from near three hundred Miles Distance; but notwithstanding the Dearness of Provisions, it is the Refuge of an infinite Number of poor Families, who have no Means of subsisting in the neighbouring Towns. They find Employment here for Youths and weakly Persons; there are none, even to the Lame and Blind, but what get their living here by grinding Colours. Anciently they reckon'd no more than three hundred Porcelain Furnaces at this Place, but at present they amount to about five hundred.

King-te-ching stands in a Plain, surrounded with high Mountains; that on the East-side, against which it is built, forms, without, a kind of Semicircle. The Mountains on the Sides give Passage to two Rivers, one of them is small, the other very large; which unite and make an handsome Port, within a League of the Place, in a vast Basin, where it loses a good Deal of its Rapidity. One sees sometimes two or three Rows of Barks, following one another the whole Length of this Space; this is the Prospect that presents itself on entering, thro' one of the Straights, into the Port. The Clouds of Flame and Smoke, which ascend in different Parts of it, shew at once the Length, Breadth, and Circumference of King-te-ching; at Night one would think he saw a great City all on Fire, or a vast Furnace with a great many Vent-holes.

Strangers are not suffer'd to be at King-te-ching: whoever has not Acquaintances in the Place to answer for his Behaviour, must lodge at Night in his Barks. This Regulation, join'd to that which is observ'd Day and Night in the Borough itself, the same as in the Cities, keeps all in good Order; and establishes perfect Security in a Place, whose Riches would otherwise make it liable to the Attempts of an infinite Number of Robbers.

The Third City, Quang-sin-fu.

ALTHO' this City is situated in the midst of Mountains, which are for the most part very high and of great Extent, it must not be thought that the Country is less cultivated and inhabited. A great Number of these Hills are divided into plough'd Lands, which are no way inferior to the most fertile Plains, and abound with Boroughs and Villages: Some of them are cover'd with great Forests, and others produce good Crystal. There is very good Paper made at this Place, and the best Candles in all the Empire.

This Country borders on the Provinces of Po-kyen and Che-kyang. The Conveniency of escaping easily to the Mountains, gave Robbers Opportunities formerly of doing Mischief with Impunity, and the Emperor kept a pretty good Garrison in the City, in order to pursue them. As the Roads, leading into the Province on this Side, are narrow, and like Straights between the Mountains, it is very easy to defend the Passage of them, and in case of an Insurrection in the neighbouring Provinces, to prevent Invasions. The Jurisdiction of Quang-sin-fu extends over seven Cities of the third Rank.

The Fourth City, Nan-kang-fu,

HAS in its District no more than four others of the third Rank, and stands on the side of the famous Lake Po-yang, which is about four Leagues long, and thirty broad; it affords all sorts of excellent Fish, and divides this Part of the Province in two. The Plains produce plenty of Rice, Wheat, Fruits, and Pulse; the Mountains are partly cultivated, and partly cover'd with thick Woods, some of which are five Leagues in Length. A kind of Hemp grows about the Town, whereof they make good Summer-Cloaths.

The Fifth City, Kyew-kyang-fu,

IS a large City of great Trade, situate on the South-side of the Tang-tse-kyang, pretty near the Place where the Lake Po-yang communicates with that River; thus being environ'd with Water on the North and East-sides (x), it becomes the Rendezvous of all the Barks, that go and come from the other Cities of this Province, as well as those of Kyang-nan and Hu-quang. Altho' it is near a hundred Leagues from the Sea, they catch Salmon, Dolphins, and Sturgeon in the River which washes its Walls, the Water whereof ebbs and flows at the New and Full Moon; it runs so slowly from this City to the Sea, that its Course is almost imperceptible.

The Sixth City, Kyen-chang-fu.

THIS City is situate on the Borders of the Province of Po-kyen, in a pleasant and fruitful Country. Five Cities of the third Order depend on it; it is famous still, but was much more so formerly. The Rice Wine made here is pretty good, but the Rice itself is not; so that Persons of Fortune have it brought from some neighbouring Town. However the Land produces a sort of red Rice that is well tasted, and very wholesome. They make a kind of Linnen here of Hemp, which is esteem'd, and worn during the Summer Heats.

(x) Rather on the North and West Sides, which are wash'd by Rivers, the Lake being 3 or 4 Miles from it at least.

PROV. III.
Kyang-fi.

The Seventh City, Vu-chew-fu, or Fu-chew fu,

Vu-chew-fu, or Fu-chew-fu.

STANDS on the side of a River in a great Plain, sufficiently fertile; the Compass of its Walls is greater than that of any City in France, excepting Paris; its Government may extend twenty or twenty five Leagues, and contains six Cities of the third Rank.

To judge of its ancient Beauty by what still remains, it must have been one of the most flourishing Cities of the Empire, before the last Wars; but since it was sack'd by the Tartars, it is become a Heap of Ruins and Rubbish; in the midst whereof every now and then one sees certain Houses, which are repair'd, and form, as it were, Hamlets, Villages, and Boroughs in the City itself; excepting the East-side, which is well built, and contains almost all the Tribunals of the Mandarins.

They reckon but 40, or 50,000 Inhabitants in the City and Suburbs; the Country, to make amends, is very populous and well improv'd. In several Places they have two Harvests of Rice every Year; and it is out of the District of this City, that most part of the Rice is taken, which the Province is oblig'd to furnish yearly to the Emperor: it is very good, and so white that it dazzles the Eyes.

The Air is very pure and wholesome. Nothing can be more agreeable than its Mountains, from whence descend Brooks and Rivers, which water and fertilize the whole Country, and this makes such plenty of Provisions here. Figs thrive very well; and a Missionary, having planted Vines in his Garden, they produc'd very good Grapes, whereof he made some Wine; but as to other sorts of Fruit they do not ripen kindly, probably because the Soil is too moist.

The Eighth City, Lin-kyang-fu.

Lin-kyang-fu.

IN the District of this City, and three Leagues distant on the side of the great River Kan-kyang, stands a Cbing, or Borough, where there is a great Trade for Drugs and Simples, because it is a celebrated Port, where Barks arrive from all the Southern Parts, loaden with Medicinal Herbs, whereof Remedies are compos'd, and where they come from the other Provinces in quest of them. As to the City it is not populous, and has but little Trade; the Inhabitants live very saving, whence they say, by way of sneer, that one Hog serves the City two Days. Its District contains no more than four Cities of the third Order.

It is situated two Leagues and an half from the Kan-kyang, on the side of the River Yu-bo; its Soil is good, and Air wholesome; it produces excellent Oranges, which are sent into the neighbouring Provinces, and indeed almost all its Trade consists in them; the Mountains surrounding it are cover'd with great Trees, or cultivated by way of Terrasses.

The Ninth City, Ki-ngan-fu.

Ki-ngan-fu.
Dangerous
p. 83.

NINE Cities of the third Rank depend on this City, which is situate on the side of the Kan-kyang. It is here that one perceives the Danger there is in descending that River; the Stream runs with extreme Impetuosity among several Rocks, which are even with the Surface of the Water, so that one runs a great Risk of perishing, unless he has a skilful Pilot. Hence all Barks that want Pilots are us'd to provide themselves in this City, or at least hire Men to help to steer, till they have past these dangerous Places: for there are eighteen Currents, which require both Strength and Skill, either to ascend or descend them. They call this Sbe-pa-tan. Tho' the Country is uneven, the Plains in it are not less agreeable or fertile. They say that there are Mines of Gold and Silver in the Mountains.

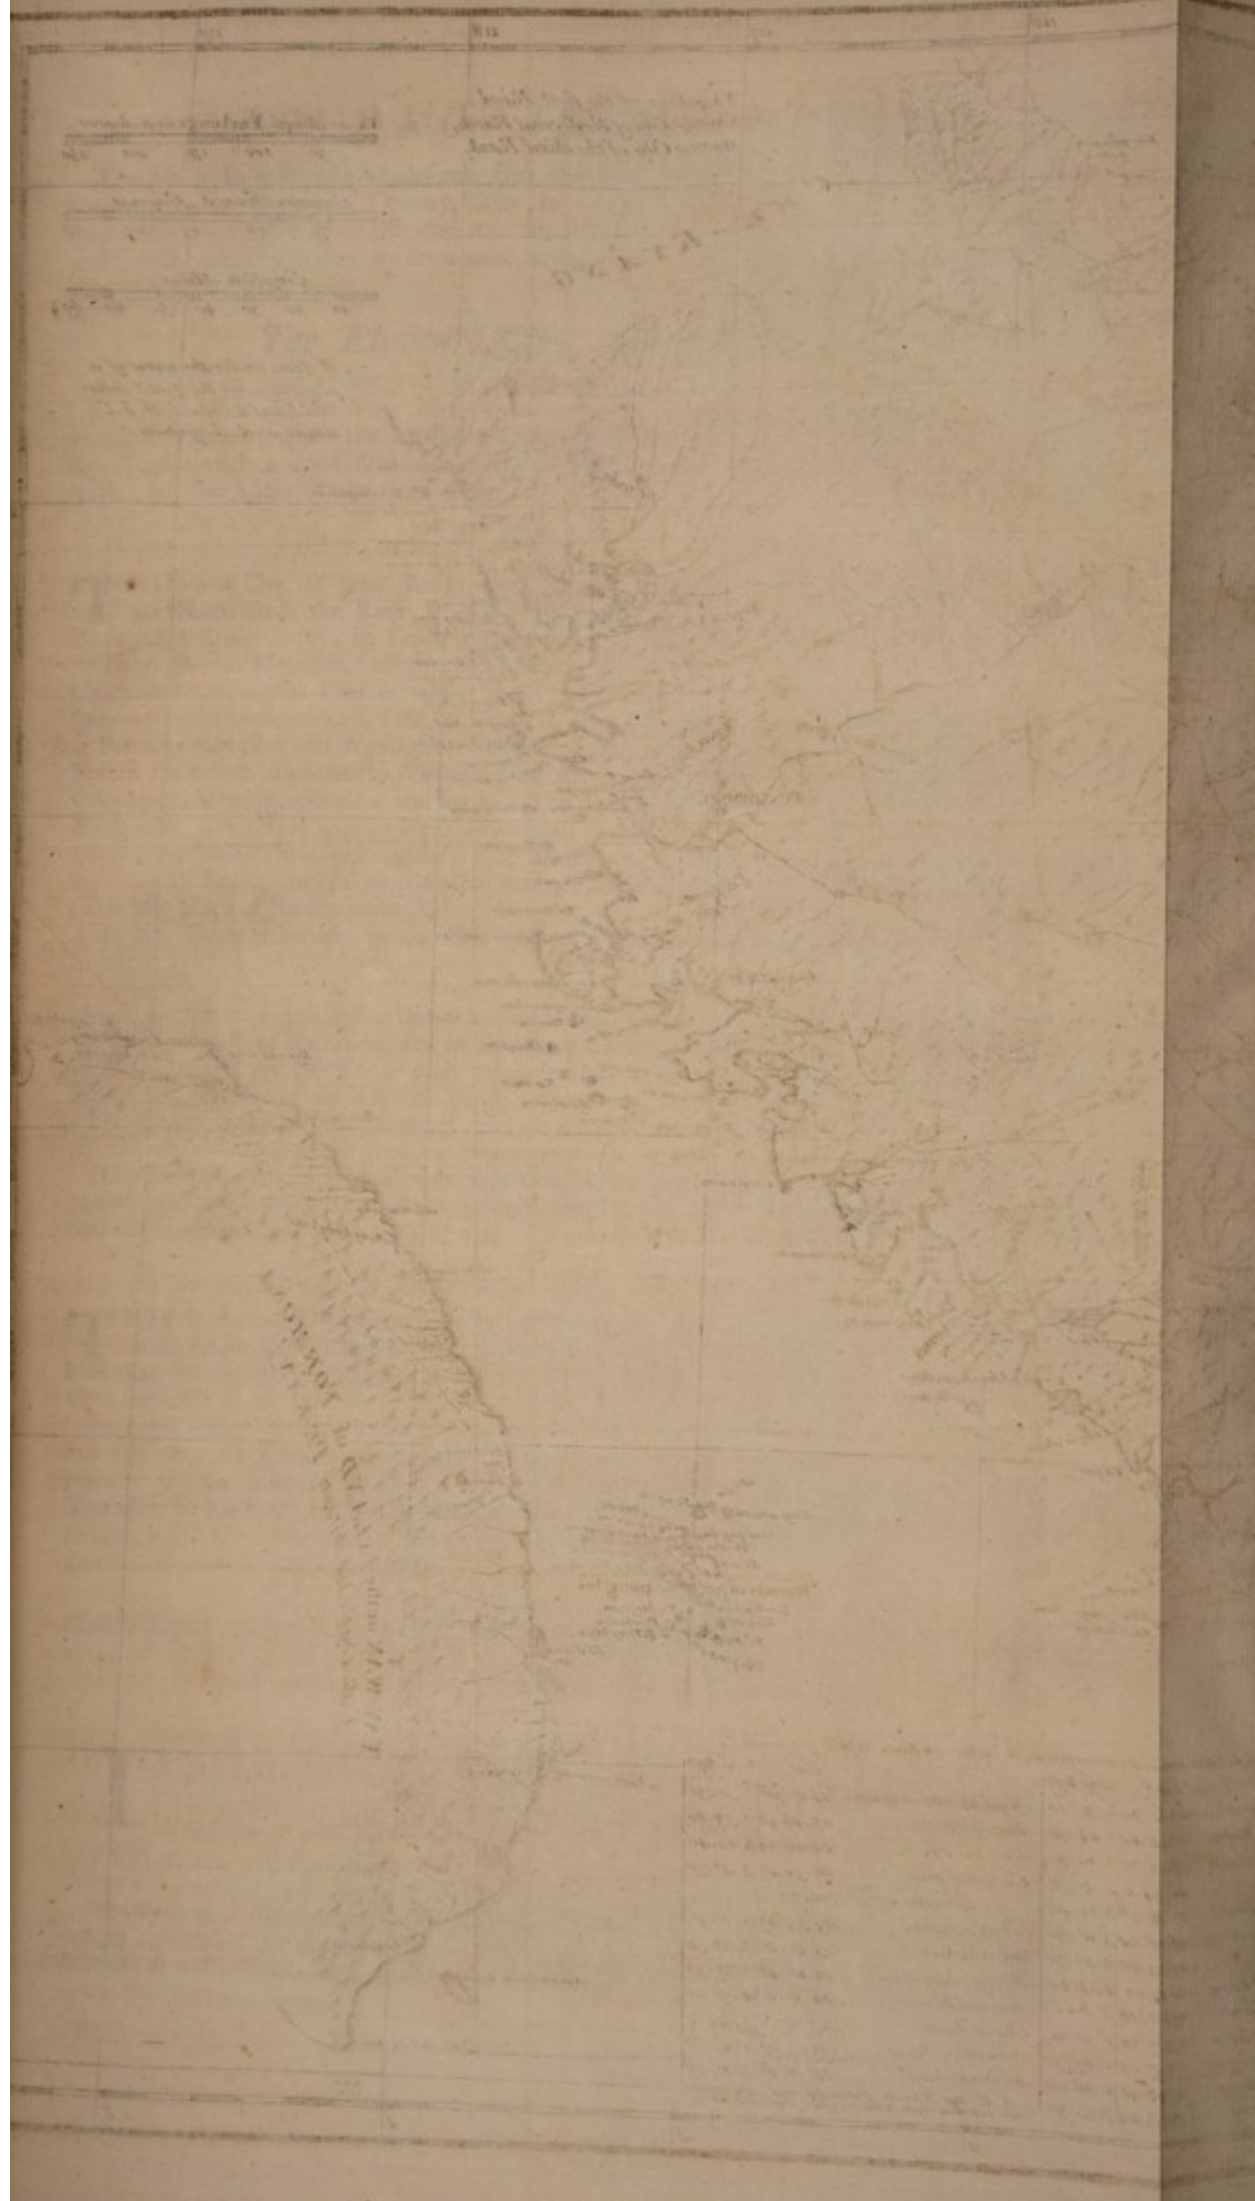

The Tenth City, Shwi-chew-fu.

Shwi-chew-fu.

THIS City stands on the side of one of the Branches of the Kan-kyang; as it is divided by a River in two Parts, each of which is encompass'd by a Wall, it seems to be two Cities. This River bears great Barks at all times, but especially from February to August, when it is swell'd by the Rains.

These two Parts of the City are join'd together by two Bridges, one of Stone with upwards of ten Arches well built; and the other of Boats, which rises and falls according as the Water increases and diminishes.

In one of these Enclosures, call'd the North City, dwell all the Mandarins, both great and small; viz. the Mandarins of the People, the Mandarins of War, and the Mandarins of Literature; whence it is also call'd the Mandarin City. The other part, call'd the South City, contains almost all the considerable Families, the Burghers, and the common People, without so much as one Mandarin among them. As the Gates of both these Divisions are shut, during the Night, in case any Disturbance should happen in the latter, the Mandarin would find it difficult sometimes to suppress it as speedily as might be required.

The Air is so mild and wholesome, that they have given it the Name of the Happy. In the Brooks that water the Country, there are found Gold and Silver Sand; its Fields are very fertile, and suffice to furnish its part of the Rice, which is sent to Court; the Mountains and Forests, wherewith they are surrounded, afford a very agreeable Prospect; in these Mountains they get the Lapis Armenus.

Prov. III.
Kyang-fu.
Lapis Armenus.

The Eleventh City, Ywen-chew-fu,

YIELDS to none of the rest in fertility of Soil, and plenty of every thing. It is situate on the side of the River Yu-bo; and has in its Neighbourhood a little Lake beset with Houses of Pleasure, where the Inhabitants often go to divert themselves. It furnishes the rest of the Empire with a good deal of Vitriol and Alum; but its District is inconsiderable, as containing but four Cities of the third Order.

The Twelfth City, Kan-chew-few.

THIS is a City of great Resort, and may be compared to Rouen for Bigness; it takes its Name from the River whereon it is situate (v), altho' it receives another in that Place call'd Chang-bo (z); its Trade is not inferior to that of the Capital.

They say its Mountains afford extraordinary Plenty of Medicinal Herbs, as well as those of Qyang-jin-fu, at the Foot of which the Chief [Priest] of the Bonzas of the Sect of Tau-tse, (who assumes the magnificent Title of Tyen-se or Heavenly Master) has his Residence.

Between Kan-chew and Nan-ngan, whereof I shall speak by and by, there are nothing but Desarts; but from Kan-chew to Nan-chang for the Space of sixty Leagues along the River, the Country is charming, populous and fertile. The rapid Current spoken of in the Description of Ki ngan fu, is a Days Journey from Kan-chew; it is near twenty Leagues in Length, and when once Vessels have past it, they find themselves in a fine River, six times broader than the Seine at Rouen; and so cover'd with Barks, that at any time of the Day one may reckon above fifty Ships of Burden under Sail.

As this Country borders on the Provinces of Hu-quang, Fo-kyen, and Qyang-tong, and was formerly infested with Robbers, who easily escap'd out of one Province into another, a Tau-ye was establish'd here, who is Governor of two Cities of the first Rank; there is also a Custom-House erected for receiving the Duties laid on Goods that pass up and down the two Rivers.

Near the Walls of Kan-chew, and in the Place where these two Rivers meet, there is a Bridge of Boats, which are fasten'd to each other by Iron Chains. Near this Bridge is the Office, where the Receiver of the Custom-House comes every Day, to see the Barks search'd, and examine if they have paid the Duty; one of these Boats is so order'd as to open and shut, for the Barks to pass, after they have been examin'd.

The District of this City is very extensive, containing twelve Cities of the third Rank; and abounds with those Trees from whence the Varnish distills, which is some of the best that China affords.

Dangerous Passage.

The Thirteenth City, Nan-ngan-fu.

THIS is the most Southern City in the Province; it is as big as Orleans, very handsome and populous, of great Trade, and much frequented; for here all the Merchandizes must land that go to, or come from the Province of Qyang-tong. The Suburbs are larger than the City, which has no more than four Cities of the third Order under its Jurisdiction.

In going from Nan-ngan to Nan-hyong, the first City of the Province of Qyang-tong on that side, one must travel ten Leagues by Land; at the End of the first two Leagues you come to a Mountain, so steep, that in some Places they have cut it in form of Stairs; the Top of it is Rock to the Depth of forty Feet, which they have been oblig'd to cut in order to open a Passage. Altho' these Mountains are uncultivated, the Spaces between them are improv'd, and as well cover'd with Rice as the most fertile Valleys.

PROVINCE IV. FO-KYEN.

THIS is one of the least yet richest Provinces of the Empire; its Situation is advantageous for Navigation and Commerce, and the Climate hot, but at the same time the Air pure and wholesome; as part of it is wash'd by the Sea, they catch abundance of Fishes on the Coast, which being dry'd and salted, are sent into the inland Provinces. Along its Shores, which are very irregular, occasion'd by the many Bays of different Sorts, they have built a great Number of Forts for their Defence.

It contains nine Fu, or Cities of the first Rank, and sixty Hyen, or Towns of the third Rank; among these nine Fu they reckon Tay-wan, Capital of the Island of Formosa, which I shall describe, as well as Hya-men, or Emoy, a Port of this Province, and the Isles of Pong-bu, lying between that Port and Formosa.

Prov. IV.
Fo-kyen.
Situation.

Division;

(v) This is the Kan-tyang.

(z) The Chang bo does not fall into the Kan-tyang at the Town.

PRDV. IV. Fo-kyen is bounded by Che-kyang on the North, Kyang-fi on the West, Quang-tong on the South, and on the East by the Sea of China.

Fo-kyen
Bounds.
Soil.

Its Mountains, by the Industry of the Inhabitants, are almost all form'd into a sort of Amphitheatres and Terraces, plac'd one over another, and sow'd with Rice; its Plains are water'd by great Rivers, Torrents and Springs that descend from the Mountains, and are dextrously convey'd by the Husbandmen to supply the Rice, which never grows but in Water. They have the Art of raising the Water to the Top of the highest Mountains, and convey it from one to the other, by Pipes of Bambú, with which this Province abounds.

Commodities

Besides, Fo-kyen producing whatever grows in most of the other Provinces of the Empire, it is render'd exceeding rich by the Trade which its Inhabitants drive with Japan, the Philippine Islands, Formosa, Java, Kamboya, Siam, &c. The Commodities found here are, Musk, precious Stones, Quick-silver, Silk, Hempen-Cloth and Callico, Steel, and all sorts of Utensils, made to great Perfection; and they bring from foreign Countries Cloves, Cinnamon, Pepper, Sandal-Wood or Sanders, Amber, Coral, and many other such Goods. Its Mountains are cover'd with Forests, full of Trees fit for building Ships, and contain Mines of Tin and Iron; they say also that they yield some of Gold and Silver, but it is forbidden to open them under Pain of Death.

Fruit.

Among the Fruits that it produces, there are excellent Oranges, bigger than those known in Europe, having both the Taste and Smell of Muscadine Grapes; the peel comes off very easily, is thick, and of a bright yellow; they candy them with Sugar, and transport them into other Provinces. Here also are found those beautiful red Oranges, which we have describ'd elsewhere.

In this Province also, as well as in Quang-tong, there grow two sorts of Fruit peculiar to China, that are much esteem'd, and not to be found elsewhere, viz. Li-chi and Long-ywen, spoken of at the Beginning of this Work. I shall only add, that there is scarce any Fruit in the World so delicious as the Li-chi, especially that kind which has the little Stone. The Plant call'd Tyen-scha, which grows here, and is used by the Dyers in dying Blue, is in far greater Esteem than that which grows in the other Provinces.

Language.

They speak a different Language in most of the Cities of this Province, each of which has a Dialect of its own; Passengers find this very inconvenient; the Mandarin Language, which is the only one generally spoken throughout China, is understood by very few People of this Province. The Inhabitants are ingenious, and fond of Learning the Chinese Sciences; hence this Province produces a great Number of Literati, who attain to the great Employments of the Empire.

The First City, Fu-chew-fu, Capital of the Province,

Fu-chew-fu.

PRESIDES over nine Cities of the third Order. Besides the Vice-Roy, the Tjong-tá, who is the Intendant - General both of this Province and that of Che-kyang, resides here. It is famous for the Advantage of its Situation, the Greatness of its Trade, Multitude of its Literati, Fertility of its Soil, Beauty of its Rivers, which carry the largest Barks in the Empire up to the Walls; and lastly for its admirable Bridge of above a hundred Arches, built with fair white Stone, across the Bay. All its little Hills are full of Cedars, Orange and Limon-Trees.

Surprising
Bridge.

They make an exceeding white Sugar, throughout its District, where grow abundance of those Trees that bear the Fruits Li-chi and Long-ywen; the first is so agreeable, that one is never tired of eating it; the second is very good, but less esteem'd than the Li-chi. They dry these Fruits, and carry them into all parts of the Empire; but then they are not half so pleasant as when they are newly gather'd, tho' they are very wholesome, and often given to sick Folks.

The Second City, Tswen-chew-fu.

Tswen-chew-fu.

THE Situation of this City is most agreeable, and renders it a Place of great Trade. It is built on a Cape, and almost encompass'd with Water; the greatest Barks or Chinese Vessels of Carriage enter within its Walls. It has within its District seven Cities of the third Rank.

All these Cities are very populous, and carry on a great Trade; their Houses are uniformly neat, their Streets are pav'd with Bricks, which inclose two Rows of square Stones, and adorn'd with Triumphal Arches.

Temple.

Among the Temples there is one that deserves Notice, on account of its two Towers, built with Stone and Marble, seven Stories high each; one may walk round each Story by means of Galleries on the Outside.

Remarkable
Bridge.

Not far from the City is a Bridge, remarkable for its Largeness as well as Beauty; it is built with blackish Stone, has no Arches, but is sustain'd by above three hundred Stone Pillars, which end on both sides in acute Angles, to break more easily the Swiftness and Force of the Stream. This Bridge was built by a Governor of the City, who was griev'd to see such an infinite Number of Barks perish continually by the Violence of the Tides; they affirm that this Work cost him 1,400,000 Ducats. A prodigious Number of Ships, bound for foreign Parts, are every Hour setting out from this City and others in its District.

The Third City, Kyen-ning-fu.

EIGHT Cities of the third Order depend on this City, which stands on the side of the River Min-bo; it has a pretty good Trade, as lying in the way of all Ships that pass up and down the River. Kyen-ning-fu.

As it ceases to be navigable about the City Pu-ching-byen, thirty Leagues from Kyen-ning, the Goods are landed here, and carry'd by Porters beyond the Mountains as far as a Borough near Kyang-chan in the Province of Che-kyang, where they are embark'd on another River. There are eight or ten thousand Porters attending the Barks, who get their Livelihood by going continually backwards and forwards across these Mountains, which are very steep, and the Valleys, which are very deep. several small

They have made this Road, as even as the Nature of the Ground will permit; it is pav'd with square Stones, and furnish'd with Boroughs full of Inns, for lodging Travellers. At Pu-ching-byen there is an Office where all Merchandizes pay a Duty, which is apply'd towards repairing the Road.

While the Tartars were conquering China, Kyen-ning underwent two Sieges, and persisted in refusing to submit to their Dominion; but after the second Siege had lasted a long time, the Tartars took it, burnt it entirely, and put all the Inhabitants to the Sword; most of the Houses have been rebuilt since, but not so sumptuously as before.

Not far from Kyen-ning is Fu-ning-chew, a City of the second Rank, remarkable for having Jurisdiction over two Cities of the third Order, viz. Fu-ngan-byen and Ning-te-byen. The Country where they are situated is of a vast Extent, but almost wholly over-run with Mountains, of which those to the North are of difficult Ascent; however it is in want of nothing, the neighbouring Sea furnishing it with plenty of every thing. Fu-ning-chew;

The Fourth City, Yen-ping-fu, (A)

STANDS on the Descent of a Hill, at the Foot of which runs the River Minbo; by means of so agreeable a Situation, it appears like a kind of Amphitheatre to all that are upon the Water, who have a full View of the whole. Tho' not very large, it is reckon'd one of the finest Cities in the Empire, and is fortify'd naturally by the inaccessible Mountains which cover it. There is scarce any City besides this, that can boast of having the Water, which descends from the Mountains, convey'd by Canals into every House; and, what is another singularity belonging to it, the Mandarin Language, which is that of the Learned, is commonly spoken by the Inhabitants, whence it may be infer'd that it was first peopled by a Colony from the Province of Kyang-nan. All the Barks of the Province pass by the Foot of its Wall. Yen-ping-fu;

Ska-byen, which is one of the seven Cities under its Jurisdiction, is commonly call'd the Silver City, on account of the Plenty and Fertility of its Lands, nor are those belonging to the other Cities less fruitful. Ska-byen.

The Fifth City, Ting-chew-fu.

THIS City lies among the Mountains which separate the Province of Fo-kyen from that of Kyang-fi; of these Mountains some are cover'd with Flowers, especially in Spring, which makes a delightful Prospect; others, if they were allow'd to be dug, would afford Mines of Gold; others again are so prodigious high, as to be almost inaccessible; however the Country furnishes plenty of all sorts of Necessaries. The Air indeed is not very healthful, nor the Trade considerable. Seven Cities of the third Rank depend upon it. Ting-chew-fu.

The Sixth City, Hing-wha-fu.

THE Name given this City, signifies a growing Flower, and it must be allow'd to be situated in the most delightful and fertile Country of the whole Province, on the Sea Coast. Tho' it has no more than two Towns of the third Rank in its District, yet it pays the most considerable Tribute in Rice of all the Cities. Hing-wha-fu.

Its District contains so great a Quantity of Boroughs and Villages, that one would take it for one continued City. Some of these Boroughs also might for their Largeness and Beauty be put in the Rank of Cities. Numbers of rich Merchants live there, who trade all over the Empire.

The Roads are very handsome, broad, and almost all pav'd with square Stones. The City is adorn'd with several Triumphal Arches. The Fruit Li-chi is better here than in any other Part of the Province. They catch very good Fish of all sorts at Hing-wha-fu, and the Country furnishes Silk.

(A) In the Map Yen pin fu, but in the Tables of Division, p. 5. and of Longitude and Latitude at the End of the Work, it is Yen ping fu, as well as here.

PROV. IV.
Fo-kyen.

The Seventh City, Shau-u-fu.

Shau-u-fu.

THIS City, which is, as it were, one of the Keys of the Province, was not very considerable formerly; it is however become so of late, and its Situation renders it very strong and commodious; it is encompass'd with several Forts or Military Places, which do not differ from the ordinary Cities, except that Troops are there in Garrison.

Hemp Linnen.

In the District of this City, there are Manufactories of very fine Linnen, made of a kind of Hemp, which is much in Request in the Empire, because it is cool in Summer, and when one sweats never sticks to the Back. It has no more than four Cities of the third Order under its Jurisdiction.

The Eighth City, Chang-chew-fu.

Chang-chew-fu.

THIS City, which is the most Southern of all those in the Province, has ten Cities of the third Rank in its District. It stands on a River that ebbs and flows, over which to the South of the Town is a very fair Bridge of thirty six very high Arches; it is so broad, as to admit Shops on both Sides, where all things of Value, that either the Empire or foreign Countries afford, are sold: for it is not far from Emoy, which is a Place of very great Trade, and Merchandizes are continually passing up the River that washes the Walls of Chang-chew, which Advantages have render'd it very populous and famous. Its Mountains produce the finest Crystal imaginable, whereof they make Buttons, Seals, Figures of Animals, &c.

Excellent Crystal.

Large Orange.

The Inhabitants, who are very ingenious and industrious, have a great Talent for Business. Its Territory abounds with Orange-Trees, the Fruit of which is much larger than the European, and has both the Taste and Smell of the Muscadine Grape; they candy them together with the Peel, and transport them into foreign Countries as well as all over the Empire. Some Footsteps of Christianity are found in this City, altho' it is not known whether they are of ancient or modern Original: but it is certain that P. Martini saw in the Hands of one of the Literati an old Parchment Book in Gothic Characters, which contain'd most of the Scripture in Latin; he offer'd a Sum of Money for it, but the Owner would not part with it, tho' he had no Knowledge of the Christian Religion, because it had been long in the Family, and his Ancestors had look'd on it as a great Rarity.

Hya-men, or the Port of A-mwy.

Hya-men, or the Port of
A-mwy.

THIS is a famous Port call'd A-mwy (a), from the Name of the Island to which it belongs, for it is properly no more than a Road, that makes one of the best Harbours in the World; it is inclos'd on one side by the firm Land, and several very high Islands, which defend it against all Winds, and is of so great Extent as to receive many thousand Ships. The Sea is so deep that the biggest Vessels may ride as near the Shore as they please, without the least Danger; and there are continually in the Port a great Number of Chinese Transports, that trade to foreign Countries, not very remote from China. About twenty Years ago, it was much frequented by European Ships, but at present very few are bound hither, the Trade being carry'd to Kanton. The Emperor keeps a Garrison of six or seven thousand Men here, under the Command of a Chinese General.

At entering the Road, you double a Rock, which, rising several Foot above the Water, seems to divide the Road in two Parts, in the same manner that the Mingant divides that of Bress. Three Leagues from thence there is a little Isle, having a Hole from one Side to the other, thro' which one may see the Light; for this Reason it is call'd the Pierced Island.

The Island of Pong-hu.

The Island of Pong-hu.

THE Island of Pong-hu forms a little Archipelago, between the Port of A-mwy and the Island of Formosa, which is inhabited only by the Chinese Garrison. However a Literary Mandarin resides there, to watch the Ships that are almost continually passing and re-passing between China and Formosa, which brings in a considerable Revenue to the State.

As these Isles are nothing but Sands or Rocks, all sorts of Necessaries must be brought thither from Hya-men or Formosa, to the very Wood for firing. They afford neither Bushes, nor Briars, nor any Trees except one, which is their sole Ornament. The Port is good and secure against all sorts of Winds. Its Ground is sandy, and the Water from twenty to twenty five Fathom deep.

When the Dutch were Masters of the Port of Formosa, they had built a sort of Fort at the End of the great Isle of Pong-hu, to defend the Entrance; but at present nothing remains of it, except the Name of Hong-mau-chay, that is, the Fort of the Red-Hairs, for so the Chinese call'd the Dutch. This Port, altho' it is in an uncultivated and uninhabited Country, is absolutely necessary for the Preservation of Formosa, which at present has no Port for Ships, that draw above eight Feet of Water.

(a) In the French it is written Emoy, which in our Characters should be E-mwy or A-mwy; the English call it A-mwy, and have a Factory there; some write Ey-mwy.

Tay-wan (c), or the Island of Formosa.

PROV. IV.
Fo-kyen.

Tay-wan, or the Island of Formosa.

AS this Island has been long unknown, even to the Chinese themselves, who, tho' it be just at their Doors, did not begin to get footing in it till the Reign of the late Emperor Kang-bi; and as the Government, Manners, and Customs of the Islanders, (very different from those of the Chinese;) as well as the means by which they were subdued, deserve a particular Relation, I shall be more large in my Account of it.

The whole Island is not under the Dominion of the Chinese. It is divided, as it were, in two Parts, by a Chain of Mountains, which begins in the South Part of Sba-ma-ki-tew, and ends at the North Coast. Only that part lying to the West of the Mountains belongs to the Chinese, contain'd between $22^{\circ} 8'$, and $25^{\circ} 20'$ of North Latitude.

The Eastern Part, if you will believe the Chinese, is inhabited by Barbarians; the Country mountainous, uncultivated and wild. The Character they give of them, differs little from that of the Savages of America; they paint them less brutish than the Iroquois, more chaste than the Indians, and of a mild and peaceable Disposition. They love and assist one another, are not covetous or selfish, making no Account of Gold and Silver, whereof they say they have several Mines; but they are exceeding Revengeful, without Law or Government, living only on Fish and the Flesh of Animals, and in short without Worship or Religion.

the Natives.

This is the Account the Chinese give of these People, who inhabit the Eastern part of the Island; but as the Chinese are not always to be credited, when they speak of Foreigners, I will not vouch for the Truth of it, and the rather, because there is no Correspondence, but a continual War, between the Chinese and them.

The Chinese, who knew there were Gold Mines in Formosa, before they subdu'd it, went in Search of them, as soon as they got Possession; but as they found none in the Part whereof they were Masters, they resolv'd to examine the Eastern Part, where they were assur'd they lay. Accordingly they equip'd a small Ship, that they might go by Sea, being unwilling to venture their Lives in crossing unknown Mountains. The Inhabitants receiv'd them very kindly, and generously offer'd them their Houses, Provisions, and all sorts of Assistance. But all the Endeavours of the Chinese, during the eight Days they continued there, to discover the Mines, prov'd fruitless; either by the Fault of the Interpreter, who might apprise the People of their Design, or else thro' a Politic Fear, being unwilling to give Suspicion to a Nation, which had Reason to be jealous of the Chinese Power; however that be, of all the Gold they came in quest of, they found none but a few Ingots, lying in the Cottages, whereof those poor People made no Account.

Gold Mines.

The Chinese, to whom this was a dangerous Temptation, vext at the bad Success of their Voyage, and impatient to get possession of those Ingots, resolv'd on a most barbarous Stratagem; having equip'd their Ship by the Assistance of these good People, who furnish'd them with all things necessary for their Return, they invited their Benefactors to a great Entertainment, as it were, by way of Acknowledgment, and having made them all drunk, cut their Throats when they were asleep, and sail'd off with the Ingots.

Chinese Cruelty.

This cruel Action was not long unreveng'd, but the Punishment fell on the Innocent; the News was no sooner spread thro' the Eastern Part of the Isle, than the Islanders enter'd the North Part belonging to China, where they put Man, Woman, and Child to the Sword, without Mercy, and fired some Chinese Habitations. Ever since that time, one Part of the Isle has been continually at War with the other.

That Part of Formosa, possess'd by the Chinese, certainly deserves the Name it bears. It is a fine Country, the Air is pure, and always serene; It produces plenty of all sorts of Grain, especially Corn, Rice, &c. and is water'd by many Rivers, which descend from the afore-mention'd Mountains. Most of the Fruits that grow in the Indies are found here, as, Oranges, Bananas, Ananas, Goyavas, Papayas, Cocos, &c. and there is Room to believe, that if European Fruit-Trees were planted here, they would thrive; since one meets with Peach-Trees, Apricocks, Figs, Grapes, Chestnuts, and Pomegranates. They cultivate a sort of Water-Melons, as they call them, which are much larger than those of Europe, and of an oblong Figure, tho' sometimes they are round; they consist of either a white or red Pulp, and are full of a cool luscious Juice, very grateful to the Chinese. Tobacco and Sugar grow here exceeding well. All those Trees are so agreeably rang'd, that when the Rice is transplanted in Lines and Squares as usual, the whole Southern Part looks more like a vast Garden, carefully cultivated, than a great Plain.

Air and Soil.

As the Country, till of late, has been inhabited by a barbarous unciviliz'd People, Horses, Sheep, and Goats are very scarce; Hogs themselves, so common in China, are pretty dear there; but one meets with abundance of Pullets, Ducks, and tame Geese; as also of Oxen, which serve to ride on instead of Horses, Mules, and Asses. They break them betimes, and bring them to go as well and swift as Horses; they are furnish'd with a Bridle, Saddle and Crupper, which often cost very dear.

You see there Apes and Stags in Herds, but Fallow Deer are very rarely to be met with; and if there are any Bears, Boars, Wolves, Tigers, and Leopards, as in China, it is on the Mountains of the Eastern Part, for there are none in those belonging to the Western.

Very few Birds also are to be seen in this Part of the Island; the most common Sort are Pheasants, which the Fowlers will not suffer to encrease. Was the Water of the Rivers as good

to

Prov. IV. to drink as they are serviceable in fertilizing the Soil, the Island would want nothing that was necessary within itself.

Fo-kyen.
Division into Hyen.

The Chinese divide the Lands they possess in Formosa into three Hyen, or subordinate Governments, which depend on the Capital of the Island; each of these Governments has its particular Officers, who are immediately subject to the Governor of that Capital, and he to the Vice-Roy of the Province of Fo-kyen, whereof Tay-wan or Formosa makes a Part.

Tay-wan fū.

The Capital, named Tay-wan-fū, is very populous, much frequented, and of great Trade, being equal to most Cities of China, for Goodness, and the Number of Inhabitants. There one finds every thing that either the Island produces, or is brought from other Countries, as Rice, Sugar, Sugar-Candy, Tobacco, Salt, cur'd Venison, which is much esteemed by the Chinese, all kinds of Fruit, Linnen of divers Sorts, Wool, Cotton, Hemp, the Bark of certain Trees, and Plants resembling Nettles, abundance of Medicinal Herbs, for the most Part unknown in Europe; these are the native Commodities, the foreign are Chinese, and Indian Calicoes, Silks, Varnish, China Ware, several things made in Europe, &c. there are very few Mulberry-Trees in the Island, and consequently few Silks of the Country, or Manufactories.

If the Chinese had Liberty to settle in Formosa, several Families would gladly transplant themselves thither; but in order thereto they must obtain Passports from the Mandarins of China, who grant them with Difficulty, and not without taking Security.

The Mandarins are very careful to examine all that pass into or out of the Island, and some of them extort Money under-hand. This extraordinary Precaution is the Effect of good Policy, especially as the Tartars are Masters of China; for Formosa is a Place of great Importance, and if a Chinese should seize it, he might raise great Troubles in the Empire: so that the Emperor keeps a Garrison there of ten thousand Men, commanded by a Tsong-ping, or Lieutenant-General, two Fú-tszyang, or Major-Generals, and several inferior Officers; who are chang'd duely every three Years, or oftner, if there be Occasion.

The Streets of Tay-wan-fū are all strait as a Line, and cover'd during seven or eight Months in the Year, to keep off the Heat of the Sun. They are not above thirty or forty Feet broad, but some of them are near a League in Length; all the Houses on each side belong to Dealers, whose Shops are adorn'd with Silks, China Ware, Varnish, and other Goods, rang'd to admirable Advantage, in which Art the Chinese excel.

These Streets look like charming Galleries, and it would be a Pleasure to walk in them, if they were less croud'd with People, and better pav'd; the Houses are cover'd with Straw, and built for the most Part only of Clay and Bambú; the Tents wherewith the Streets are cover'd, hide all that is disagreeable, letting nothing be seen but the Shops.

Tay-wan-fū has neither Fortifications nor Walls; the Tartars don't care to confine either their Forces or Courage within Ramparts; they love to scour the Country on Horseback. The Port is pretty good, and shelter'd from all Winds, but the Entrance becomes more difficult every Day.

The Port.

Heretofore it had two Entrances, the one call'd Ta-kyang, where the greatest Ships ride with Ease; and the other Lo-ulb-men, where the Bottom is Rock, and there is not above nine or ten Feet Water, at the highest Tides. The first Passage is impracticable at present, for in some Places they find but five Feet Water, and the most it rises to is seven or eight; besides, it is every Day choak'd up more and more by the Sea rolling in the Sands.

The Dutch formerly enter'd the Port by this Ta-kyang, and to keep foreign Ships out, at the Point of the Isle, to the South of the Ta-kyang, they built a Citadel, which would be an excellent one, was it not founded on the Sand; however, it is very fit to defend them from the Enemies they had most to fear, that is, the Chinese and Japonnese.

Inhabitants of Chinese Formosa.

The Part of Formosa which is subject to the Chinese, is inhabited by two different Nations, the Natives, and Chinese, who, drawn by Gain, flock from several Provinces of China. Tay-wan-fū, Fong-shan-byen, and Chu-lo-byen, are inhabited only by Chinese, for the third Hyen, of the three abovementioned, is included in the Capital. As to the Natives, there are none but what are the Servants, or rather the Slaves of the Chinese.

Fort Ngan-
ping-ching.

Besides these three Cities the Chinese have several Villages, but they have no considerable Fort excepting Ngan-ping-ching; it is at the Foot of the Castle of Zeland, which is the Name given by the Dutch to the Citadel spoken of before. There may be four or five hundred Families at Ngan-ping-ching, with a Garrison of two thousand Men, commanded by a Fú-tszyang, or Major-General.

Customs of
the Natives.

The Chinese in Formosa are the same as to Government and Manners, as in China; so that I shall only here give an Account of the Genius and form of Government among the Natives.

The People of Formosa, who are subject to the Chinese, are divided into forty five Boroughs or Habitations, call'd Shè, thirty six in the Northern, and nine in the Southern Part; the Northern Boroughs are populous enough, and the Houses very like those of the Chinese: but those of the South are no more than a Parcel of Cottages made of Earth and Bambú, cover'd with Straw, raised on a kind of Terra's, three or four Foot high, built in form of a Tunnel inverted, and fifteen, twenty, thirty, or forty Feet in Diameter; some of them are divided by Partition-Walls.

There are in these Huts neither Chairs, Benches, Tables, Beds, nor any Moveable. In the middle is a kind of Chimney or Stove, rais'd above two Feet from the Ground, where they dress their Victuals; their ordinary Diet is Rice, small Grain, and Game, which they take either by running or with Arms; their Swiftne's is surprising, and they have been seen to out-run Horses in their full Speed.

The Chinese alledge as the Cause of their Swiftneſs, that till the Age of fourteen or fifteen their Knees and Loins are bound exceeding tight. Their Arms are a ſort of Dart, which they throw the Space of ſeventy or eighty Paces with the greateſt Dexterity; and tho' nothing is more ſimple than their Bows and Arrows, yet they kill Pheafants flying with as much certainty, as do Europeans with a Gun. They are very ſlovenly in their Diet, having neither Diſhes, Plates, Spoons, nor Chop-ſticks; whatever they have dreſſ'd, is put on a piece of Wood or Mat, and they feed themſelves with their Fingers like Apes; they eat their Fleſh half raw, and think it exceeding delicious if it be but ſhewn to the Fire. For a Bed they are content with the Leaves of a certain Tree, very common in the Country, which they ſpread on the Earth or Floor of their Cottages, and ſo lay themſelves down to ſleep. Their whole Apparel is a ſingle Cloth, wherewith they are cover'd from the Waſt down to the Knees.

Pride, which is rooted in the Heart of Man, finds means to ſubſiſt amidſt ſo much Poverty; they even pay dearer for it than the moſt polite People, who pique themſelves more on Luxury and Magnificence. Theſe latter borrow Hair from Animals, and Silk from Worms, which they embroider with Gold and Silver; but our Iſlanders make uſe of their own Skin, whereon they imprint ſeveral groteſque Figures of Trees, Animals, Flowers, &c. which puts them to ſuch violent Pain, that the Operation would kill them, was the whole to be perform'd at once. They therefore employ ſeveral Months about it, and ſometimes a whole Year, during which time, they muſt put themſelves every Day to a ſort of Torture, and all to gratify the Ambition they have to diſtinguiſh themſelves from the Croud; for it is not every one that is allow'd to bear thoſe Marks of Magnificence, the Privilege being granted only to ſuch, as in the Judgment of the moſt conſiderable Men of the Borough, have excell'd the reſt in running or hunting.

Nevertheleſs, all Perſons are at Liberty to blacken their Teeth, wear Bobs in their Ears, and Dreſſ; Bracelets above their Elbows and Wrifts, Necklaces and Coronets, conſiſting of ſeveral Rows of ſmall Grains of different Colours; theſe Coronets end with a kind of Plume made of Feathers of Cocks or Pheafants, which they pick up with a great deal of Care. Whoever repreſents to his Imagination theſe fantaſtical Ornaments on the Body of a Man of an eaſy and ſlender Shape, olive Complexion, with ſleek Hair hanging negligently over his Shoulders, arm'd with a Bow and Dart, all his Cleaths a piece of Linnen two or three Feet long, which goes round him from the Waſt to the Knees, will have the true Picture of a Native of the Southern Part of Formoſa.

In the North-Part of the Iſland, as the Climate is ſomewhat colder, they cover themſelves with the Skins of Stags, kill'd in hunting, whereof they make a ſort of Coat, without Sleeves, ſhap'd much like a Dalmatic (a). They wear a Bonnet in form of a Cylinder, made of the Leaves of Bananas, which they adorn with ſeveral Coronets, plac'd one over another, and faſten'd with very narrow Bands, or little Locks of Hair, of different Colours; on the Top of the Bonnet they place a Tuft or Plume of Cocks or Pheafants Feathers, like thoſe in the South.

Their Marriages have nothing barbarous in them, they do not buy their Wives, as they do in China; neither have they any Regard to the Fortune of one or the other Party, as is practiſed in Europe, the Fathers and Mothers having ſcarce any Hand in them at all.

When a young Man has a Mind to marry, and meets with a Laſs to his liking, he goes ſeveral Days together with Muſick to her Door; if the young Woman is ſatisfy'd with her Sparks, ſhe goes out to him, where they ſettle Terms between themſelves, after which they acquaint their Parents with the Matter, who prepare the Marriage Feaſt. This is made at the Houſe of the Bride's Father, where the Bridegroom continues, looking on it as his own, and himſelf as the Support of it, without ever returning to ſtay at his Father's Houſe; which thenceforth he has no more Regard to, than the Brides in Europe have for the Houſes of their Parents, when they quit them to live with their Spouſes; hence they place their good Fortune not in having Boys but Girls, who procure them Sons-in-Law, that are the Props of their old Age.

Altho' the Iſlanders in this Division are intirely ſubject to the Chinese, yet they ſtill preſerve ſome Remains of their ancient Government; each Borough chooſes three or four of the moſt ancient, who are in greateſt Repute for Integrity, to be the chief Judges over them; theſe determine all Differences abſolutely, and if any one refuſes to ſubmit to their Deciſion, he is driven that Inſtant out of the Borough, without Hopes of ever being admitted there again, nor dares any other receive him.

They pay their Tribute to the Chinese in Grain, the Tails or Skins of Stags, or in other Things of that Nature, which are eaſily procur'd in the Iſland. To regulate what concerns this Tribute, there is in every Borough a Chinese, who learns the Language, to ſerve as an Interpreter to the Mandarins. Theſe Interpreters, inſtead of procuring Eaſe to theſe poor People, and preventing their being over burthen'd, are ſo many petty Tyrants, who tire out the Patience not only of them, but the Mandarins themſelves, who are forc'd to let them continue in their Employments, to avoid greater Inconveniencies.

However, of the twelve Boroughs that were ſubject to the Chinese in the South, there remain but nine. Three of them having revolted, they drove out their Interpreters, and united themselves with those of the Eastern Part of the Island, paying no longer Tribute to China; under the present Emperor a great Number of Boroughs have submitted, and they hope, by little and little, that the rest will follow their Example. Tho' these People are reckon'd Barbarians by the Chinese, yet they seem to have truer Notions of Wisdom, than many of the Philosophers of China. One finds among them, by the Confession of the Chinese themselves, no cheating, thieving, quarrelling, nor any Law-Suits, except against their Interpreters, and they practise all the Duties of Equity and mutual Benevolence; whatever is given to any of them must not be touch'd by him, till those who shar'd the Labour partake of the Wages.

Religion.

There appear to have been Christians among these Islanders, when the Hollanders were Masters of the Port; we found several of them who understood Dutch, read their Books, and made use of their Characters in writing; we also saw in their Hands some Fragments of Scripture in the same Tongue.

These People adore no Images (p), and even abhor whatever tends that Way; they perform no religious Worship, nor say any Prayers, yet we have seen some who had Knowledge of one God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, in three Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; that the first Man was call'd Adam, and the first Woman Eve, and that they had by their Disobedience brought down the Anger of God on themselves and their Posterity; and that it is necessary to have recourse to Baptism, to wash out that Stain. They are acquainted also with the Form of Baptism, nevertheless we could not tell certainly whether they were baptized or not.

Taywan.

Altho' Formosa is not far from China, yet the Chinese, according to their History, had no Knowledge of it, before the Reign of the Emperor Swen-ti of the Dynasty of the Ming, about the Year 1430, when the Eunuch Wan-san-pau, returning from the West, was driven thither by a Tempest.

This Eunuch finding himself in a strange Land, whose Inhabitants appear'd to him as barbarous as their Country was beautiful, made some Stay there, in order to get the best Intelligence he could of it, to carry to his Master; but the greatest Advantage he reap'd by his Enquiries, were a few Plants and Medicinal Herbs, which are to this Day employ'd in China with good Success.

In the forty second Year of the Emperor Kya-tsing, and of Christ 1564, Yu-ta-yew, Chief of a Squadron, cruising in the Eastern Sea of China, met a Corsair, named Lin-tau-kyen, who had seiz'd the Isles of Pong-bu, where he had left Part of his Men. He was a proud Man, and ambitious of every Occasion to distinguish himself; as soon as he saw Yu-ta-yew, he sail'd up to him, attack'd him briskly, and had infallibly defeated the Chinese Squadron, if he who commanded it had not had an equal Share both of Courage and Conduct.

Yu-ta-yew receiv'd the first Fire with unconcern, after which he attack'd his Enemy in his Turn; the Fight lasted more than five Hours, when Night coming on, Lin-tau-kyen fled towards the Isles of Pong-bu, with an Intention, after he had refresh'd his Troops, and taken all the rest of his Soldiers on Board, to return and face the Enemy; But Yu-ta-yew, like an experienced Captain, pursued him so closely, that at break of Day Lin-tau-kyen found the Entrance of the Port block'd up by Part of the Enemy's Squadron. His Troops being much diminish'd in the Fight, and intimidated by their Losses, judg'd it dangerous to attempt entering the Port, wherefore he resolv'd to continue his Course, and put into Formosa.

Yu-ta-yew pursu'd him thither, but as he found the Sea shallow, and besides had no Knowledge of the Entrance of the Port, he was unwilling to expose his Ships, and return'd to the Isles of Pong-bu, whereof he made himself Master. He made the Soldiers he found there Prisoners, and after he had left a good Garrison in the Place return'd victorious to China, where he gave an Account of his Discoveries and Expedition. The Court receiv'd the News with Joy, and sent a Literary Mandarin to govern those Isles.

Formosa, says the Chinese Historian, was then an uncultivated Country, inhabited only by Barbarians. Lin-tau-kyen, who had great things in View, not thinking this Island fit for his Purpose in his present Circumstances, cut the Throats of all the Inhabitants that fell into his Hands, and by an unparallel'd Piece of Inhumanity making use of the Blood of those unhappy Mortals to caulk his Ships, put to Sea as soon as he could for the Province of Quang-tong, where he dy'd miserably.

*Japanese seize Formosa.

Towards the End of the Year 1620, which was the first of the Emperor Tyen-ki, a Japanese Squadron landed on Formosa; the Officer who commanded it, finding the Country, wild as it was, fit for receiving a Colony, resolv'd to subdue it; for which End he left part of his People there, with Orders to get such Information concerning it, as was necessary for the Execution of his Design.

Dutch arrive
there.

About the same time a Dutch Ship, in its Course to or from Japan, was driven by Storm on the Isle, where they found the Japanese in no Condition to oppose them. The Country, according to the Chinese Historian, appear'd charming to the Dutch, and commodious for their Trade; wherefore under Pretence of staying for Provisions and other Necessaries, some of them took the Opportunity to examine the Island.

On their Return on board, they refitted their Ship, after which they intreated the Japanese

(p) It is Idols, in the Original; but tho' P. du Halde makes a well known to every body, yet Protestants make no Difference. Distinction between the Worship of Idols and Images, for Reasons

ness, with whom they were unwilling to embroil themselves, for Fear of hurting their Trade, to let them build a House on the Shore, at one of the Entrances of the Port, which might be of some Benefit to them in trading with Japan. The Japanese at first rejected their Proposal, but the Dutch pressing their Instances, and assuring them that they would take no more Ground than what an Ox-Hide would inclose, they at last consented. (F)

The Dutch immediately went to work, and cutting the Hide into very narrow Thongs, join'd the Ends together, and therewith measur'd out their Ground. The Japanese were at first a little angry at this piece of Fraud; but on farther Reflections pleas'd with the Stratagem, they were pacify'd, and allow'd the Dutch to make use of the Land; accordingly they in that Place built the Fort I have already spoken of, on the Gate whereof are still to be seen these Words: CASTEL ZELANDA, 1634.

The Building this Fort render'd the Dutch Masters of the Port, and the only Passage by which large Ships could enter; perhaps the Japanese saw the Importance of it too late. However that be, whether they took Umbrage at the new Fort, or did not find their Account in the Island, which continued still unimprov'd, they soon after abandon'd it, and return'd home.

The Dutch seeing themselves now sole Masters of Formosa, for the Islanders were in no Condition to oppose them, the better to secure the Port, built on the other Side of it, opposite to Fort Zeland, a House fortify'd with four Semi-Bastions, whereof I have also spoken before.

At this time China was all in a Combustion, partly by the Civil War, which laid waste so many fine Provinces, and partly by the War with the Tartars, who at length subdued it, and founded the present Dynasty. One of those who most strenuously oppos'd the latter, was a Person of Condition in the Province of Fo-kyen, call'd Ching-chi-long (G), who from an ordinary Trader was become one of the greatest Merchants in China; This Person fitted out a Fleet at his own Expence, against the Tartars, and was soon follow'd by an innumerable multitude of Chinese Vessels, whereby he became Head of one of the most formidable Fleets that ever appear'd in those Seas; the Tartar offer'd him the Dignity of King, provided he would acknowledge his Sovereignty, which Offer he refused, but did not long enjoy his good Fortune. Happy had his Zeal for Religion (for he was a Christian) equall'd his Fidelity to his Prince and Country, now ready to fall under a foreign Power.

His Son Ching-ching-kong (H), who succeeded him in the Command of this numerous Armada, more zealous still for his Country than his Father, undertook divers Exploits; he besieged several considerable Cities, as Hay-ching in the Province of Fo-kyen, which he took after cutting in Pieces the Tartar Army sent to relieve it; also Wen-chew in Che-kyang, Nan-king in Kyang-nan, &c. But his Success did not continue long, for he was at length vanquish'd by the Tartars, and driven quite out of China; he then directed his Views towards Formosa, resolving to expel the Dutch, and establish a new Kingdom there.

In the Year 1661, and the seventeenth of the Reign of Shun-kei, Father of the Emperor Kang-bi, Ching-ching-kong left China, and in his Way to Formosa took the Isles of Pong-bu. The Dutch, who without doubt thought themselves secure on the Side of China, which was still in Trouble, had taken no Care to furnish Pong-bu and Tay-wan with Forces; so that Ching-ching-kong no sooner appear'd, but they fell into his Hands; he left there an hundred of his Ships to guard them, and continued his Course to Formosa.

In the Garrison left to defend the Fort and Port of Formosa, there were but eleven Dutchmen, the rest consisted of Indian Blacks and Islanders; notwithstanding which Inequality the Hollanders resolv'd to defend themselves bravely, which they did.

Ching-ching-kong enter'd the Port with his Fleet, consisting of nine hundred Sail, by the Passage of Lo-ul-men, a great League beyond the Fort of Zeland, and landed Part of his Men, in order to attack the same, both by Sea and Land; the Siege lasted four Months, during which time the Dutch defended themselves by their Cannon, with an unexpected Success. Ching-ching-kong was in Despair to meet with such a Resistance and Courage in a Handful of Europeans, against an Army so numerous as his own. As the Chinese wanted Guns, they had no Hopes of reducing the Dutch otherwise than by Famine, which Method as it required much Time, would give them an Opportunity of procuring Assistance from their Ships at Batavia, or those that trade to Japan.

Ching-ching-kong was fully appriz'd of the Difficulty of his Enterprize; but seeing no Hopes of ever returning to China, while the Tartars govern'd, on whom he had made War, and that if he was shut out of Formosa, he knew not where to retire to, he resolv'd to make a last Effort against the Dutch; these had four Ships in the Port, on board each of which they had put one of their Men with Indians to guard them, the other seven Dutchmen were block'd up in the Citadel or Fort of Zeland.

(F) It is remarkable that the same Stratagem, related here of the Dutch, was used by the Phenicians in Building Byrsa, afterwards Carthage, and there is a Resemblance in the Characters as well as Adventures of the two People.

(G) He is named Chin chi long in the Dutch Embassies, where it is observed, that he was called by Foreigners Iqua, or Iloa and Eguas; there also we are told, that he aspired to the Empire; was made General of the Chinese Forces, betray'd the Emperor to the Tartars, and was after all cast in Prison by them, at Pe-king, where he dy'd.

(H) This must be the famous Coxinga in the Dutch Embassies, for it is there said, that his Son Coxinga and Brothers being (about 1657) informed of his Father's Imprisonment, betook themselves again to the Fleet, and kept the Tartars on the Coast in continual Alarm, till being at length driven out of the Islands Ay, Qu-my, &c. by the Tartars, assisted by the Dutch; he in Revenge, in 1660, sailed with all his Forces to Tay-wan and Formosa, both which Islands, with Castle Zeland, he took in March 1661, after a Siege of 10 Months, treating the Dutch with great Rigour, contrary to Agreement.†

PROV. VI. These Ships the Chinese Captain purposed to burn, to this end putting a Quantity of Fire-works on Board some of his own Vessels, and being favour'd by a North-East Wind, he sent them driving against those of the Hollanders, whereof he burnt three; on this unexpected Success he immediately summon'd the Dutch, who were inclosed in the Port, to surrender, declaring he would suffer them to retire with all their Effects, but if they persisted to hold out, he would give them no Quarter. The Dutch, who had only one Ship left, readily accepted of the Offer, and having put their Goods on Board their Vessel, deliver'd up the Place into the Hands of the Chinese, and sail'd away.

driven out.

Ching-ching-kong having no body now to oppose his Designs, distributed part of his Troops in that Part of Formosa, which is at present possess'd by the Chinese. He plac'd a Garrison at Ki-long-chay, an abandon'd Fortress formerly built by the Spaniards, and built one himself at Tan-shwi-ching, at the Mouth of the River Tan-shwi, where the Chinese Vessels might lie at Anchor. He pitch'd on the Ground where Cbu-lo-yen and Fong-shan-byen stand at present, and founded two Cities thereon, to which he gave the Names of Tyen-bing-byen and Wan-nyen-byen. He erected the Capital of his new Dominions in the Place where Tay-wan-fu now is, and gave it the Name of Shing-tyen-fu; he establish'd his Palace and Court at Fort Zeland, giving it the Name of Ngan-ping-fu, which it still retains.

It was then Formosa began to take a new Form, where he establish'd the same Laws, Customs, and Government as in China; but he did not long enjoy his new Conquest, dying within a Year and some Months, after he had taken Possession of the Island. He was succeeded by his Son Ching-king-may, who having been bred up to Study, took little or no Care to cultivate the Lands his Father had acquired with so much Pains and Fatigue, which much diminish'd the Courage of his Troops, and their Zeal for his Service.

Ching-king-may.

In the Year 1673, and the twelfth of the Reign of Kang-bi, the Kings of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen revolting, Ching-king-may, being willing to revive the Martial Spirit of his Troops, resolv'd to join the latter against the Tartar; accordingly he fitted out his Ships, and sail'd to the Coasts of that Province, but as he would be treated on the Foot of a sovereign Prince, and the King of Fo-kyen pretended to have the Precedency of him, he was so highly incensed thereat, that he forthwith declar'd War against him.

They fought on both Sides with much Resolution and Courage, but as the Troops of Ching-king-may consisted of Veterans, the Victory always fell to him; so that the King of Fo-kyen was at length oblig'd to cause himself to be shav'd a second time, and lie at the Mercy of the Tartars. Ching-king-may return'd to Formosa, where he dy'd soon after, leaving for Successor his Son Ching-ke-san, who was very young, under the Conduct of Lyew-que-kan and Fong-si-san, two Officers firmly attach'd to his Interest.

Ching-ke-san.

The Rebellion of Fo-kyen being intirely suppress'd by the Tartars, they abolish'd the Title of King; and in the Year 1682, which was the twenty first of the Reign of Kang-bi, they establish'd a Tsong-tu to govern both this Province and that of Che-kyang, which is a Dignity superior to that of Vice-Roy.

The first of their Appointment was Tsong-tu yau, who was dexterous, polite, and of an engaging Behaviour; no sooner was he in the Post, than he publish'd a general Amnesty, which extended to Formosa, for all who submitted themselves to the Dominion of the Tartars; with Promise to procure them the same Employments, Honours, and Privileges, which they possess'd under their respective Chiefs. This Declaration had the desired Effect; for most of those who, having follow'd Ching-ching-kong, had abandon'd their Country, Wives, and Children, seeing themselves in a foreign, uncultivated, and almost uninhabited Land, without Hopes of drawing any considerable Advantage from it, were rejoic'd to find so good an Opportunity of returning home. Some therefore without any farther Delay left Ching-ke-san to go into Fo-kyen, where the Tsong-tu yau receiv'd them with so much Courtesy, and so well provided for them, that they were quickly follow'd by a great many more. The Tsong-tu yau thought this a proper time to subdue Formosa, and accordingly sent out of hand a formidable Fleet under the Command of a Ti-tu, or Lieutenant General, to seize on the Isles of Pong-bu. The Ti-tu found more Resistance there than he expected, the Soldiers defending themselves vigorously with the Assistance of the Dutch Cannon; but at length they were oblig'd to submit to Number and Force.

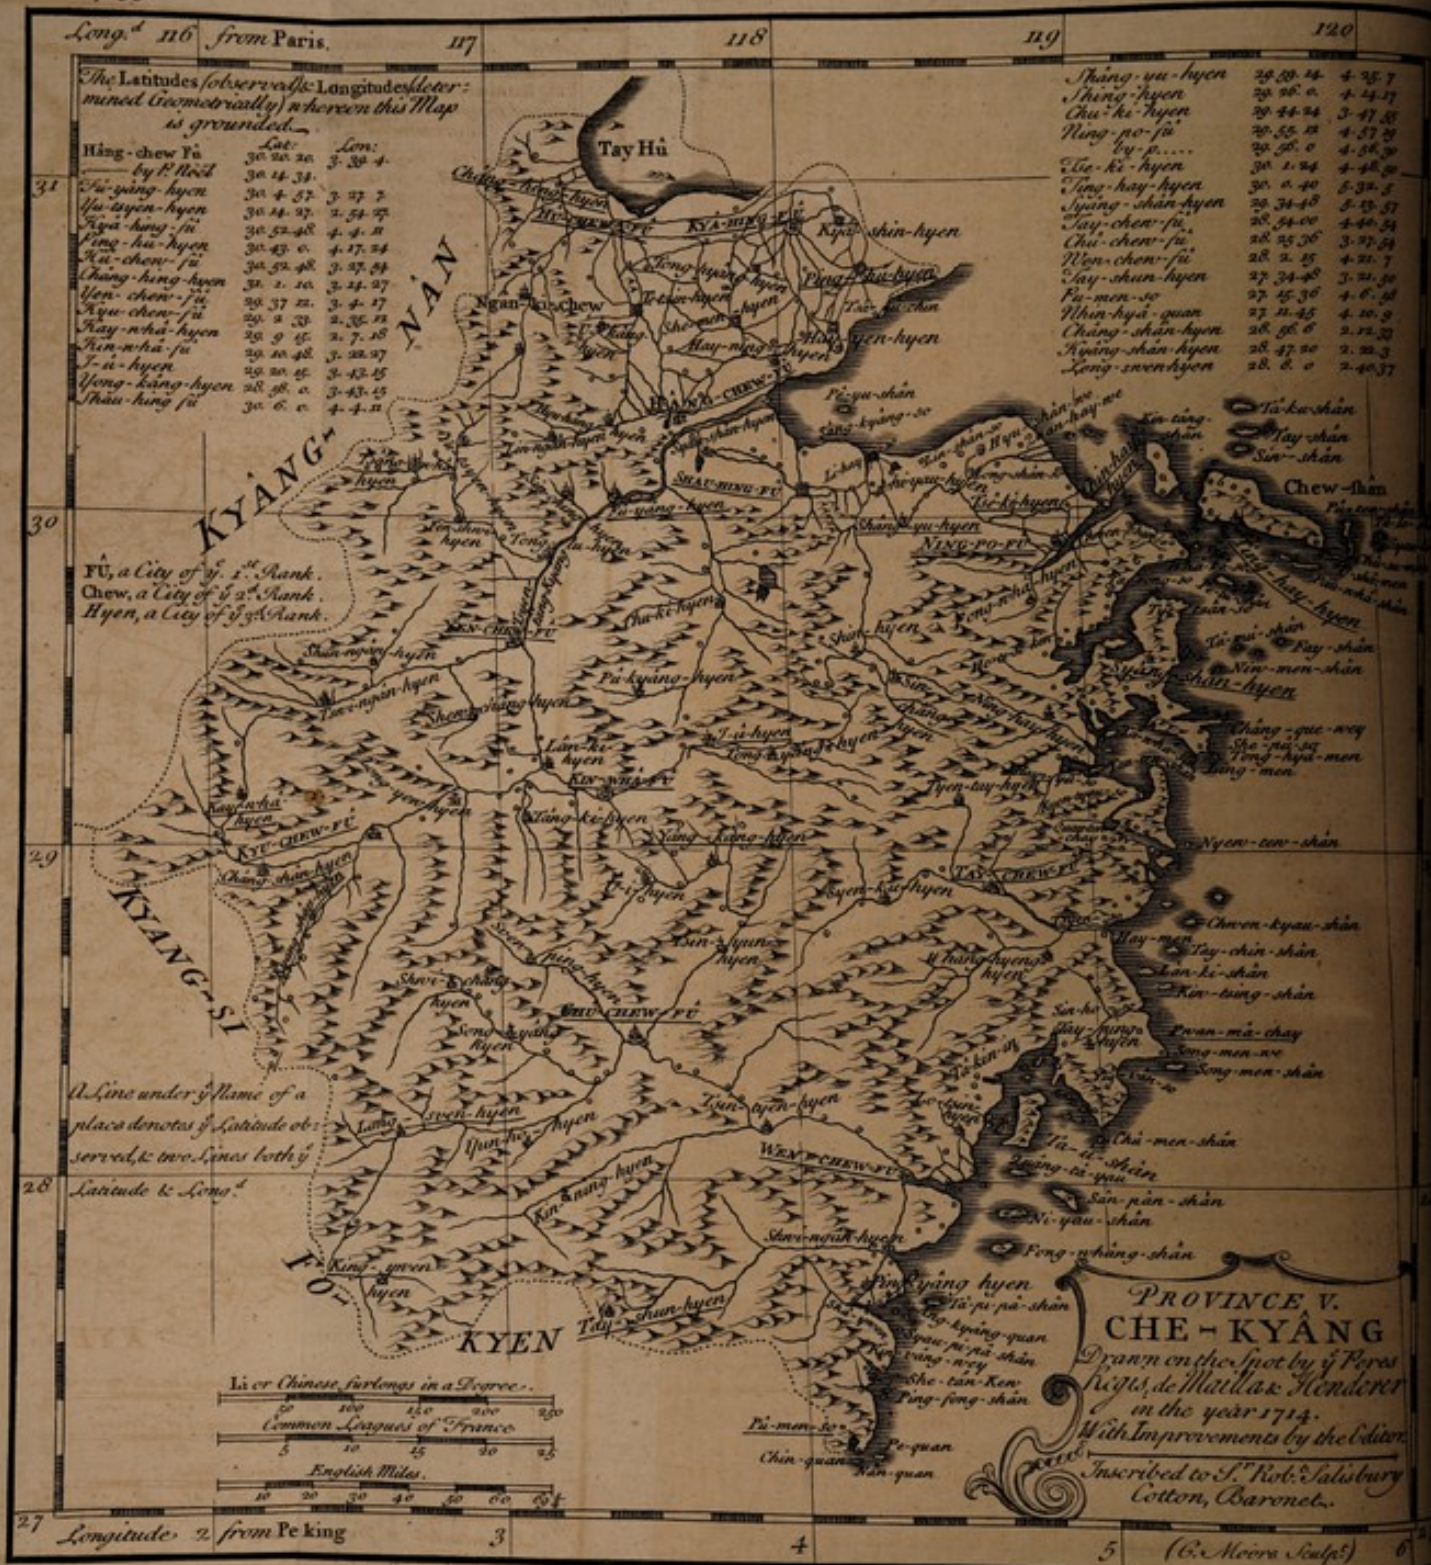

Submits to
of China.

The Isle of Pong-bu being taken, the young Prince's Council judg'd it would be difficult, considering the Temper the Troops were then in, to preserve Formosa; and without waiting for the Ti-tu to come and attack them in form, they dispatch'd a Ship to carry a Petition to the Emperor, in the Name of the young Prince, by which he submitted himself to his Majesty. This Petition, faithfully translated from the Chinese, is as follows:

The King of Yen-ping, General of the Army, Ching-ke-san, presents this Petition to the Emperor.

"WHEN humbling myself at the Feet of your Majesty, I consider the Grandeur of " China, which from time immemorial has always supported itself with so much " Glory, and where an infinite Number of Kings have succeeded each other; I cannot help
" confessing

" confessing that it is the Effect of a particular Providence of Tyen (M), who has chosen your illustrious House to govern the nine Earths (*). Tyen has not made this Change but in order to render the five Virtues perfect (+), as appears evidently from the good Order and Success of all your Majesty's Undertakings.

Prov. IV.
Fo-kyen.

" When I think with Humility of my Ancestors, I perceive they were firmly attach'd to the Interest of their Sovereigns, whereby they endeavour'd to make an Acknowledgment for the Favour they receiv'd from the preceding Dynasty, at a time when my Family had received none from your illustrious House. It was this Principal of Loyalty to his Prince, which oblig'd my Grandfather Cbing-ching-kong to leave Cbina, and go to grub up the uncultivated Lands of the East. My Father Cbing-ching-may was a studious Man, who durst not venture himself on the Side of a Precipice; like the Kings of Ye-lang, he was wholly employ'd in governing and instructing his People, confining himself to this Corner of the Earth, lying in the midst of the Sea, without having other Views.

History of Tay-uan or Formosa.

" Hitherto I have enjoy'd Benefits derived from my Ancestors; I their Grandson, never cease to testify my Acknowledgments, by continually calling to mind the Favours they have receiv'd from Heaven, without aiming to aggrandize myself on Earth. But now that I see your Majesty, like the Heavens (N), which by their Height and Extension cover all Things, and the Earth, which by its Solidity supports them, always inclin'd to do good, and allay the Effects of your Justice; the Foundation whereon your Majesty governs Cbina: Now that I see your Majesty, like the rising Sun, whose Light spreads itself in an instant over the whole Earth, as soon as it appears on the Horizon; and dispels in a Moment the slender Mists, which it meets with, on the Surface of the Earth; how dare I think of any thing else but applying my self to my Perfection? which I, a Foreigner, deem the only Means of acquiring Contentment.

" Should I think of sending my Ships to cross over to the West (O), I confess I should commit a Fault: But alas! What remains of that Race which came into the East? Is it not like a feeble Dew, that falls in the Morning, and dissipates when the Sun appears? How durst I then undertake any thing against your Majesty? My Heart is intirely devoted to you; This Petition discloses its sincere Sentiments to your Majesty, who will see the Effects of them.

" I know at present that I am not in the right Way, and for the future, I shall be ambitious to walk in the Garden of Charity, and in the Retinue of Ki-ling. I ardently wish to see Heaven and Earth united in one; the poor People of this Island do not want to intoxicate themselves with Liquor, or to surfeit themselves with Victuals; if they are treated with Mildness, they will be more inclin'd to Submission. It is the Nature of Fish to retire where the Water is deepest, they have never too much of it, and can live a long time amidst the Waves of the Sea. To confirm with an Oath all that I lay before your Majesty in this Petition, may I never see the Light of the Sun, if these are not the Sentiments of my Heart."

The Emperor's Answer to this Petition was, that Cbing-ke-san should leave Formosa, and come to Pe-king. But Cbing-ke-san fearing to go to Pe-king, by a second Petition, (wherewith he sent his Seals, and those of the Principal Officers) represented to the Emperor, that having been born in the Southern Parts, and being likewise very unhealthy, he dreaded the Cold of the North; wherefore he intreated his Majesty to permit him to retire into the Province of Fo-kyen, from whence his Ancestors came.

This last Petition was of no Effect, so that this unhappy Prince, who saw himself almost wholly deserted, was oblig'd to surrender Formosa into the Hands of the Tartars, and go to Pe-king, where on his Arrival at the Court, the Title of Count was conferr'd on him, in the twenty second Year of Kang-bi, and 1683 of Christ.

PROVINCE V. CHE-KYANG.

THIS Province is one of the most fertile and flourishing as to Trade, in the whole Empire. It is bounded on the East by the Sea; on the South by Fo-kyen; on the North and West by Kyang-nan and Kyang-si, with which it is surrounded. They reckon in it eleven Cities of the first Rank, whose Jurisdictions are like so many Provinces, and seventy seven of the second and third Rank, besides an infinite Number of very populous Boroughs and Villages.

Prov. V.
Che-kyang.
Bounds and Division.

(M) Here Tyen, which signifies both God and Heaven, stands for God.

(*) That is the whole inhabited World. The Chinese divide the Earth into 9 Sorts: 1. Mountains of good Land, 2. Stony Mountains, 3. Land and Hills, 4. Black and dry Lands, 5. Moist Lands, 6. Sandy Lands, 7. Clay Lands, 8. Yellow Lands, and 9. Red Lands.

(+) Charity, Justice, Civility, or the Ceremonies, Prudence, Fidelity, or Honesty.

(N) Here doubtless, in the Original Chinese, the Word Tyen is used, but the Properties of Height and Extension requires it to be taken for Heaven, as the Attribute of Providence in the Place above required it should be translated God.

(O) By the West is to be understood Cbina, and by the East, Formosa.

PROV. V. The whole Country, which consists of well cultivated Mountains, and equally fertile Fields, is cut with Rivers and Canals: which last are broad, deep, and lin'd on both sides with hewn stone; they are cover'd also with Bridges at certain Distances, which join the Plains on both sides together, so that one may travel all over the Province by Water as well as Land. The running Springs and Lakes, wherewith it abounds, contribute farther to its Fertility.

Soil.

Silk.

Its Inhabitants are very mild, ingenious and polite. The Silks which they make, embroidered with Gold and Silver, are the best in all China, and so cheap that a Suit of good Silk costs less than one of the most ordinary Cloth in Europe. Hence one sees a great Number of Fields, full of dwarf Mulberry Trees, which they hinder to grow, planting and cutting them almost like Vines; the Chinese being convinc'd by long Experience that the Leaves of the smallest Mulberry-Trees produce the best Silk.

They breed so great a Quantity of Silk-Worms in this Province, that we may almost say it is in a Condition of itself to furnish Japan, the Philippine Islands, and Europe with Silk of all sorts, at an easy Price.

All sorts of Necessaries are very plentiful. The Mountains in the South and West Part are cultivated; in other Parts where they are interspers'd with Rocks, they afford Timber for building Ships and Houses.

Golden Fish. In the Lakes of this Province the Golden Fish are found, which I have described before; it affords also abundance of excellent Cray-Fish. In certain Places there grows an infinite Number of Mushrooms, which are carry'd all over the Empire. After having salted, they dry and keep them the Year round. When they want to make use of them, by only letting them lye a while in Water, they become as good and fresh as if they had been just gather'd.

Gammons.

Tallow Tree.

The best Hams come from this Province, where also that extraordinary Tree grows, call'd U-kyew-mu, which produces the Tallow; likewise those Shrubs that bear a very white Flower resembling the Jasmin, excepting that it has a greater Number of Leaves as well as a more agreeable Smell; a single Flower is sufficient to perfume a whole House, so that they are in such Esteem with the Chinese, that they take the same Care to preserve those little Shrubs, as is employ'd in Europe to defend the Orange-Trees from the Rigour of Weather.

Fruit Pe-fo.

Altho' the Fruit call'd Pe-fo is found elsewhere, yet it is much more common in this Province; it grows in marshy Water, and is as big as a Chestnut; its Kernel is cover'd with a very thin Skin; the Pulp is White, and full of an agreeable Juice, it is firm and somewhat sour.

Some pretend that if one puts a Piece of Copper Coin with this Fruit in his Mouth, he may break it with his Teeth, as easy as the Fruit itself; this P. Martini affirms, but other Missionaries who made the Trial found it not so.

Bamboo Canes.

The Canes or Reeds, call'd by the Portuguese Bambú, are found throughout the Empire, but Che-kyang yields more than any other Province, having whole Forests of them; these Bambú's are of infinite use in China; they are very large and hard; and tho' they are hollow within, and divided into Joints, they are very strong, and bear the greatest Burthens; their Leaves are long, and folded in towards the Ends. Notwithstanding their Hardness, they are easily slit into very thin Slips, wherewith they make their Matts, Boxes, Combs, &c. As they are by Nature bor'd thro', they are very proper for Pipes to convey Water from one Place to another; or for Telescopes, to serve either as a Tube, a Case, or a Rest.

The First City, Hang-chew-fu, Capital of the Province.

Hang-chew-fu.

THIS is one of the richest and largest Cities of the Empire. It is considerable, especially on account of its most advantageous Situation, prodigious Number of Inhabitants, the Conveniency of its Canals, and its Trade for the best Silk in the World.

If you will believe the Chinese Proverb, it is the Terrestrial Paradise. Its Figure is almost round, it is forty Li, or four Leagues, in Compass, exclusive of the Suburbs; these Li must be three hundred and sixty Paces each, from the Eastern Gate to the Northern they reckon ten Li. One of our Missionaries, by counting the Steps of the Chair-Men, judg'd that the Li might well be of that Length.

Number of the Inhabitants.

As to the Number of Inhabitants they amount to a Million. A Christian Bachelor assur'd a Missionary who resided there, that within the Walls only, without reckoning the Suburbs which are immense, the Officers who gather the Tax, had on their Rolls about three hundred thousand Hu or Families; or, as the Chinese express it, San-she-wan (p), which signifies thirty times ten thousand.

The Walls of Hang-chew are fair, very high and thick. The Water of the Canal within the City is not good. There are on the Canals of the Suburbs a prodigious Quantity of Barks, inhabited by intire Families, the same as at Kan-ton. The Streets are pretty narrow, but the Shops very neat, and the Dealers very rich.

These Streets are all adorn'd with Triumphal Arches, which one meets with, especially in Places of great Resort, being Monuments rais'd in Honour of the Mandarins, who have distinguish'd themselves in the Discharge of their Office, or have attain'd the chief Dignities of the Empire. There are besides in Hang-chew four great Towers, several Stories high. The Garrison consists of

of seven thousand Men, under the Tjjang-kyun or Tartar General, and three thousand under the Fu-ywen or Vice-Roy. Prov. V.
Che-kyang.

Tho' there are large Gardens in the City, and the Houses are of one Story, it is astonishing to think how populous it is. The great Streets are throng'd with People like those of Paris, with this Difference, that there are no Women among them. The Tartar Troops have a Fortrefs here, separated from the City by a Wall. The River, call'd Tjyen-tang-kyang, runs near its Walls, where it is a great League in Breadth.

It may be said without exaggerating, that Hang-chew is properly the Country of Silk, because the chief Manufactures are there. They say there are sixty thousand Workmen within its Walls, and if that be so, there must needs be several hundred thousand in the neighbouring Country, and the Places depending on Kya-hing-fu and Hu-chew-fu; since there is scarce a Village, howsoever small, but the Silk-Works are going forward in it. The chief for Silk.

Certain flower'd Taffeties and satins, named Lin-tse, and others all plain, but compact and even, call'd Lau-fang-se, which are made in this City, are reckon'd the best in the whole Empire, and in exceeding great Request.

But that which renders this Place delightful, is a little Lake, nam'd Si-bu, which is close to it, and two Leagues in Compass. The Water of it is good, and clear as Crystal, so that the smallest Stones may be seen at the Bottom; on the side where the Water is low, it is cover'd over with the Flowers of the Lyen-wa. They have rais'd there on Wooden Stakes open Halls, sustain'd by Pillars, and pav'd with great square Stones, for the Convenience of those who would walk on Foot. They have also made Causeys lined with Free-Stone, and over the Openings left for Boats to pass, built pretty handsome Bridges. Charming Lake.

In the midst of the Lake there are two little Islands, whither they usually repair, after having taken the Pleasure of the Barks; and where they have built a Temple and Houses fit for diverting themselves. The sides of the Lake are likewise adorn'd with Temples, huge Monasteries of the Bonzas, and pretty handsome Houses; among which is a little Palace for the Use of the Emperor, who lodg'd there, when he travell'd into the Southern Provinces.

The Second City, Kya-hing-fu.

ALL this Country is water'd by Lakes and Canals, made by the Industry of the Cbinese. Kya-hing-fu. The City is great, very populous, and of considerable Trade. Its Suburbs are of very great Extent, its Canals and Ditches cover'd with many handsome Bridges, and every House in it rears Silk Worms.

They have brought Canals, whose Sides are lin'd with fine Free-stone, into every Part of the City. In all the Streets there are handsome Piazzas, under which one may walk out of the Rain. Triumphal Arches are common enough, both within the City and without. There are fifteen Marble Towers, on the sides of the Canal, to the West of the City, thro' which all the Barks pass.

The Fruit, call'd Pe-tsi, spoken of before, grows in all the standing and marshy Waters. Fruit Pe-tsi. In Autumn they catch certain little Birds, which are preserv'd in Wine made of Rice, and sold all the Year round. Very good Cray-Fish are also taken here.

In the Neighbourhood of the City Hav-yen-byen, which stands on the Sea Coast, there are Salt-Pits, which yield plenty of Salt. One sees on all sides Silk Manufactures. The whole Country is flat, without so much as one Hill. The City contains seven others of the third Rank within its District.

The Third City, Hu-chew-fu.

THIS City takes its Name from the great Lake on the side whereof it stands, Hu signifying a Lake; and is one of the greatest and most considerable in Cbina, on account of its Riches, Trade, Fertility of its Lands, and Beauty of its Waters and Hills. Hu-chew-fu.

It is inconceivable what a Quantity of Silk is made there. The Tribute pay'd therein by Te-tsin-byen, one of the Cities depending on it, amounts to five hundred thousand Taels or Ounces of Silver. It is also the Place in Cbina, where the best Pencils for writing with are made. It yields abundance of Tea, and has in its District one City of the second Rank, and six of the third. Best Pencils made.

The Fourth City, Ning-po-fu.

NING-PO-FU, which Europeans (r) have call'd Liam-po, is a very good Port on the Eastern Sea of Cbina, over-against Japan, and has four Cities of the third Order under its Jurisdiction. It stands on the Confluence of two small Rivers, which form the Canal from thence to the Sea. This Canal is capable of bearing Transports or Cbinese Vessels of two hundred Tuns. One of these Rivers nam'd Kin, comes from the South, the other call'd Tau, from the West-North-West. Ning-po-fu.

(r) By Europeans are to be understood chiefly the Portuguese. Liam po in English Characters should be Lyang-po.

PROV. V. These Rivers water a Plain encompass'd almost on every side with Hills, which form a kind of Oval Basin, whose Diameter from East to West passing thro' the City, may be ten or twelve thousand Chinese Fathom, which, as I have said, are of ten Feet each. The Length from South to North is much greater.

Ning-po.

The Plain, which resembles a Garden, as being so level and well improv'd, is full of Villages, and Hamlets. It is cut by a great Number of Canals, form'd by the Waters, that fall from the Hills. The Canal on which part of the Eastern Suburb stands, extends to the very Foot of the Mountains, and divides into three Branches. It may be about five or six thousand Fathoms long, and six or seven broad.

In this Space there are sixty six Canals on both sides of the principal Canal, several of which are broader than it. This great abundance of Water, manag'd with Art, renders the Plain exceeding fruitful, and makes it yield two Harvests of Rice; besides which Grain they sow Cotton and Pulse. Tallow-Trees are very numerous here.

or yellow Fish.

The Air is generally pure and wholesome, and the Country pleasant and open. The Sea furnishes plenty of Fish, with all sorts of Shell-Fish, and especially good Cray-Fish; among the rest in the beginning of the Summer, they catch the Fish call'd W'ang, that is, Yellow, which are much in Request, being very savory and delicious; but as they will not keep long out of Water, they put them in Glasses, and so transport them into all Parts of the Empire.

City Walls.

The Walls of Ning-po are five thousand and seventy four Geometrical Paces in Compass. In passing from the Western to the Eastern Gate, we reckon two thousand five hundred and seventy four great Paces. Its Walls are built of Free-Stone, in good Repair, and able to withstand any Force, but that of Cannon.

It has five Gates, whereof two look towards the East, because the Port is on that side; not to mention two Water-Gates, as the Chinese call them, which are great Arches, made in the Wall, to let the Barks in and out of the City, for there are many Canals in the South-West part of it. There is not one Building worth taking notice of in the whole Place. Indeed one meets with a Brick Tower, several Stories high; and before the most Southern of the two Gates there is a Bridge over the River Kin, of sixteen flat-bottomed Barks, fasten'd with Iron forty Fathom long.

The most tolerable Pieces of Architecture to be found here, are the Pay-lew or Pay-fan, which we call Triumphal Arches. The Streets, which are narrow, are still more contracted by the Pent-houses over the Shops, so that two of our large Coaches would have much ado to pass. This City was plunder'd and sack'd in the last Wars, but of late Years it has recover'd again. It is provided with a large Garrison.

The Entrance of Ning-po is difficult, especially for great Vessels, there not being above fifteen Feet of Water at the Bar in the Spring Tides. In entering the River, you leave on the left Hand the City of Tin-bay-byen (s), which depends on it.

Tin-bay-byen.

This last City, which is an oblong Square, 1000 Toises in Compass, is commanded by a Citadel built on a very high Rock, at the Foot of which Ships must necessarily pass within the Distance of half Pistol-Shot. One Tide brings them up along a very fine River, at least a hundred and fifty Fathom broad, and every where seven or eight deep, with Salt-Houses on both Sides, between which and the Mountains one has a Prospect of Villages and cultivated Plains.

The Chinese Merchants of Siam and Batavia come to Ning-po every Year, to buy Silks, which they know to be the fairest in the Empire. Those of Po-kyen and other Provinces resort thither continually. The City has also a great Trade with Japan, Nangazaki being only two Days sailing from hence. The Chinese carry thither Silk, raw and manufactur'd, Sugar, Drugs and Wine; and bring back Copper, Gold and Silver.

Island Cheu-shan.

Eighteen or twenty Leagues from Ning-po in the Sea, is the Island Cheu-shan. The Port is very good, but not commodious for Trade. The English at their first Arrival put in there by Accident, not being able to find out the Way to Ning-po, among so many Islands as are upon the Coast.

The Fifth City, Shau-hing-fu.

Shau-hing-fu.

THIS City is situated in one of the finest Plains in the World; it is full of Canals, nor is there any Place, which has a greater Resemblance of Venice, but it has the Advantage of it in this, that the Canals here are fill'd with clear and running-Water.

One may come from all the Places in the neighbourhood to any Part of the City in a Boat. There is no Street without a Canal, so that Shau-hing abounds with Bridges, which are very high, and almost all of one Arch.

On both Sides of each Canal there are very handsome large Streets, paved with great white Stones, for the most Part six or seven Feet long. The City is adorn'd with a Number of handsome Triumphal Arches, and reckon'd at least four Leagues in Compass; for which Reason it is divided into two Hyen or subordinate Jurisdictions, that have their distinct Governors, one of which is call'd Sban-in, the other Quey-ki.

Several of the Houses are built with exceeding white Free-Stone, which is scarce ever seen in the other Cities of Cbina. These Stones are dug out of an almost inexhaustible Quarry in the Mountain Nyau-men-shan, two Leagues from the City. Its Walls are encompass'd with 2 Ditches, the one within the other without the City, both full of Water as good and as clear as that in the Canals. Prov. V.

Hyen, and this last stands on the right Hand, in respect of those who enter the River.

Chiekyang.

Shau-bing is in some sort a City of Literati, for its Inhabitants are the most noted in all China, for the Chicane of the Law; tho' otherwise they are good Lawyers, and there is no Vice-Roy or Mandarin, but what has an Inhabitant of this City for his Syang-kong or Secretary. It contains within its District eight Cities of the third Rank.

The Wine, whereof a good Quantity is made here, is much esteem'd, and transported throughout the Empire. Half a League from the City is a Tomb, which the Chinese say is that of the great Yu, who advanc'd himself to the Throne, by the Service which he did his Country at the beginning of the Monarchy, in causing the Sea, which had overflow'd part of the Empire to retire; on one Side of this Tomb they have rais'd a stately Edifice by orders of the late Emperor Kang-bi, who, in the twenty eighth Year of his Reign, went to shew his Respect to the Memory of that great Man. Tomb of the Great Yu.

There is near it also a remarkable Hill, call'd Hew-shan, or the Mountain of the Ape, because it has some small Resemblance in Figure; it is a Place of Recreation, where the People go to regale themselves. They have built a pretty Room here for that Purpose, at the Foot of which there is a very deep Pond, wherein they keep Fish of an extraordinary Size; which are accusom'd to appear on the Top of the Water, while those within the Hall throw them little Loaves out of the Window, which they swallow whole.

The Sixth City, Tay-chew-fu.

THIS City, which has six others under it, stands on the side of a River, in a Country quite over-run with Mountains. Altho' it is not by far so rich and considerable as the Cities already described, yet the Neighbourhood of the Sea supplies it with all Necessaries. Tay-chew-fu.

What it is remarkable for, is a kind of Ray or Thorn-back caught there, whose Skin serves for several uses, and especially in making Scabbards for Hangers. They drive a great Trade with it in the Country, and transport it to Japan, as well as thro' the whole Empire.

The Seventh City, Kin-wha-fu.

THIS City stands in the middle of the Province, and on the Side of a pretty handsome River, whereinto several others fall. It was formerly very great, and famous for the Beauty of its Buildings; but its Inhabitants, who are warlike, having long withstood the whole Power of the Tartars, were at length subdued. One part of the City was burnt, which they have since rebuilt, as well as a great Bridge on the West Side, and another Bridge of Boats, which is near the City of Lan-ki-byen, and much handsomer than that burnt by the Tartars. Kin-wha-fu.

Kin-wha has eight Cities of the third Rank depending on it; they are situate partly in the open Fields, partly in Countries surrounded with Hills. Rice grows here plentifully, and the Wine made of it is much esteem'd in the Country.

A great Trade is carry'd on here, with large dry'd Plumbs and Hams, which are in such Request, that they send them into all the Provinces of the Empire. Those little Shrubs, whose white Flower resembles the Jasmin, are found almost every where in the District, as well as the Trees producing the Tallow, whereof they make very white Candles, which neither stick to the Fingers, nor have an offensive Smell when put out. Tallow Tree.

The Eighth City, Kyu-chew-fu.

THE Situation of this City is agreeable enough; it is built on a fine River, and between two other smaller ones that fall into it. It is the most Southern City in the Province, and borders on the Provinces of Kyang-fu and Po-kyen; but the Road leading into this latter Province, which is three Days Journey distant, is very difficult to travel, because of the Mountains which must be pass'd. Kyu-chew-fu.

This Road begins about the City of Kyang-shan-byen, and continues over pretty steep Mountains for near thirty Leagues together. On one of them they have made Stairs, consisting of more than three hundred steps, of flat Stones, which go winding round it, to render the Ascent more easy. There are Inns all the Way at certain Distances. There is nothing else very remarkable in this Country, where there are five Cities more of the third Order under Kyu-chew. Difficult Road.

The Ninth City, Yen-chew-fu, or Nyen-chew fu.

ALTHO' this City is situate on the side of a River which runs hard by its Walls, and near another into which it is discharg'd, and bears pretty large Barks, yet it is not to be compar'd to the rest of the Cities of the Province, either for Bigness or the Number and Wealth of the Inhabitants. The Hills and Mountains, wherewith its Territory is incumber'd, render it very uneven. Yen-chew-fu, or Nyen-chew fu.

PROV. V. Chekyang. Mines of Copper are found there; one meets also with the Trees that distil the Varnish, which give a Value to the Chests and Cabinets that are done over with it, and makes them so much esteem'd in Europe. When this Varnish is once dry, it never melts, nor suffers by containing the most boiling hot Liquor. The Paper made here is equally esteem'd, and has a very great Vent. Six Cities of the third Rank are under its Jurisdiction.

Copper-Mines, and Varnish-Paper.

The Tenth City, Wen-chew-fu.

Wen-chew-fu

THE Situation of this City is in a marshy Soil, very near the Sea, and the Beauty of its Buildings have gotten it the Name of little Hang-chew. The Tide comes up to its very Walls, where a great Number of Barks and Chinese Transports find a safe and commodious Harbour.

The whole Country is divided betwixt very fertile Plains and Mountains, some of which are frightful to look at, especially those towards the Province of Fo-kyen. It has under it five Cities of the third Rank.

The Eleventh City, Chu-chew-fu.

Chu-chew-fu

ALL this Country is environ'd with vast Mountains; the Valleys are fruitful, and the Rice cheap, because of the Difficulty of transporting it into other Parts. The City is situate on a fine River which is navigable to the Sea. The Mountains are cover'd with fair Trees, among which are Pines of an extraordinary Thickness; there are some of them, as affirm, the Hollow of whose Trunk would hold above thirty Men; they use them for building Houses and Ships.

Woods of Bambú.

The Sides of the Brooks are cover'd with whole Forests of Reeds or Canes, which the Europeans have nam'd Bambú (r); some of them are more than twenty Feet high, and the smallest not less than ten. If these Canes are burnt when they are green and fresh cut, there runs a Water from them, which the Physicians reckon very wholesome, and give those to drink, whose Blood has been coagulated through a Bruise or Fall, pretending this Liquor frees the Body from the corrupted Blood. Ten Cities of the third Order are subject to Chu-chew.

PROVINCE VI. HU-QUANG.

PROV. VI. Hu-quang. Bounds, and Division.

THIS great Province lies in the middle of the Empire, between those of Ho-nan, Kyang-nan, Kyang-si, Qyang-tong, Qyang-si, Quey-chew, Se-chwen, and Shen-si. The great River Yang-tse-kyang crossing it from West to East, divides it into two Parts, the Northern and Southern.

The Northern Part contains eight Fú, or Cities of the first Rank, and sixty of the second and third Rank. The Southern Part comprises seven Fú, and fifty four Chew and Hyen, besides Boroughs, Villages, and fortify'd Towns.

The greater Part of this Province is a plain Country, consisting of open Fields, water'd on all Sides by Brooks, Lakes, and Rivers; wherein infinite Quantities of all sorts of Fish are caught, and on the Lakes a great Number of Wild Fowl.

Oranges and Limons. Mines of Crystal. Simples.

The Plains afford Pasture for incredible Numbers of Cattle, and produce all sorts of Grain and Fruit, especially Oranges, and several kinds of Citrons. Its Mountains are very fertile, some in Crystal, and others in Simples and Medicinal Herbs; from some of them they dig Talc, and many others are cover'd with old Pines, fit for making those great Pillars, which the Chinese Architects employ in their finest Buildings. Gold is found in the Sand of the Rivers, and Torrents which descend from the Mountains; and there are Mines abounding with Iron, Tin, Tottenague, and such like Metals.

A good deal of Paper is made of the Bambús growing here; and in the Plains one sees store of those little Worms, which produce Wax in the same manner as Bees make Honey. In short it affords such plenty of all things that it is commonly call'd the Granary of the Empire; and it is a Proverb among the Chinese, "That the Province of Kyang-si might furnish a Breakfast for China, but that Hu-quang has of itself wherewithall to feed the whole Country."

There were formerly in this Province a great Number of Princes descended from the Imperial Family of Hong-wú; but that numerous Race has been intirely extirpated by the Tartars.

The Northern Part of the Province.

The First City, Vu-chang-fu, Capital of the whole.

Vu-chang-fu

THIS is both the Capital City of the whole Province and of the Northern Division call'd Hu-pe, where the Tsong-tá of both Parts resides. It has under its Jurisdiction one City of the second Rank, and nine of the third.

(r) This Word seems to be a Corruption of the Indian Name for this sort of Reed, viz. Mambú.

Vu-chang is as it were the Center of the whole Empire, and the Place from whence it is easiest to keep a Communication with the rest of the Provinces. This City in conjunction with Han-yang (which is separated from it only by the River Yang-tse-kyang and the little River Han) forms the most populous and frequented Place in all Cina. Prov. VI.
Hu-quang.

The City itself may be compar'd for Size to Paris; Han-yang (one of whose Suburbs extends to the Point where the Rivers Han and Yang-tse-kyang meet) is not inferior to the most populous Cities in France, such for Instance as Lyon or Rouen; add to this an incredible Number of great and small Barks, part of which are spread along the Kyang, and part along the Han for above two Leagues together. There are never reckon'd less than eight or ten thousand Vessels in this Place, some hundred of which are as long and high in the sides, as most of those that lie at Nantes. Han-yang.

Certainly was one only to consider this Forest of Masts rang'd along the Yang-tse-kyang, which in this Place, tho' at least a hundred and fifty Leagues from the Sea, is three Miles broad, and deep enough to carry the biggest Ships, he would have Reason enough to be surprized; but should he from an Eminence view that vast Extent of Ground, cover'd over with Houses, he would either not believe his Eyes, or own that he saw the finest Prospect of the Kind in the World.

By the Number of Rivers and Lakes wherewith this Province is water'd, one may judge of its Fertility, and what Wealth must accrue to it from the easy Means which the Yang-tse-kyang affords it of trading with the whole Empire.

That which it is farther remarkable for, is the fair Crystal found in its Mountains, plenty of the best Tea, and the prodigious Demand for the Bambu Paper made here.

The Second City, Han-yang-fu.

THIS City, which is only separated from the Capital by the Yang-tse-kyang, and is wash'd also by the River Han, whence it takes its Name, has both within and without its Walls several Lakes abounding with Fish and Wild Fowl. Its Situation, and Store of all sorts of Commodities that the Empire affords, render the Inhabitants exceeding rich. Han-yang-fu.

Several kinds of Oranges and Citrons grow here, but never come to perfect Maturity. It is remarkable for a very high Tower, built formerly in Honour of a young Maiden, whose Innocence and Virtue were justify'd, as they say, by a very extraordinary Prodigy. Hanchwen-hyen is the only City under its Jurisdiction, and is entirely surrounded with Lakes and Rivers.

The Third City, Ngan-lo-fu.

THIS City is built on the River Han in a vast Plain equally agreeable and fertile. Its Trade with the famous City, before spoken of, contributes much to the Riches and Prosperity of its Inhabitants. In other Respects it has nothing to distinguish it. It presides over two of the second and five Cities of the third Rank. Ngan-lo-fu.

The Fourth City, Syang-yang-fu.

THIS City stands on the same River Han, and has the same Advantage as the former, with respect to Trade, and all the Conveniences of Life. They gather abundance of Gold out of the Sand of its Rivers, and it is likely its Mountains afford rich Mines of it, was it permitted to open them. Syang-yang-fu.

However the Lapis Armenus Vitriol, and a green Stone of great use in Painting, are dug out of them. They are also stor'd with old Pines, whereof the Pillars are made, that support the Timber-Work in the larger sort of Buildings. The Mountains, wherewith one part of its Territory is incumber'd, render the Country rugged, and the Roads difficult. They produce plenty of House-Leek, and Simples, which the Physicians employ with Success. One City of the second, and six of the third Rank depend on it.

The Fifth City, Ywen-yang-fu.

THIS is the most Northern City in the Province, and nearest that of Sben-shi. It stands on the River Han, and in a pretty large Plain, encompass'd with Mountains, whereof the Hills, having a gentle Descent, form a kind of Inclosure, which renders the Country very agreeable. Ywen-yang-fu.

These Mountains produce several sorts of Medicinal Herbs, and abundance of very good Tin. The Soil is fertile every where; a remarkable Shrub grows here, which has no small Resemblance of the Ivy, in that it climbs and fastens about Trees; it bears Flowers of a very pale Yellow, and the Extremities of its Branches are as fine as Threads of Silk.

PROV. VI. This City has six others of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction ; one of them named Chá-shan-byen lies on the River that falls into the Han : the Water of which is proper for taking Spots out of Silk, and sharpening Iron Tools, a Virtue doubtless owing to its being impregnated with certain Salts.

The Sixth City, Te-ngan-fu.

Te-ngan-fu. THIS City, which is not far from the Yang-tse-kyang, is built on a River that falls into it, and by several Branches has a Communication with divers Lakes in the Neighbourhood.

The whole Country, which is inclos'd on the North by Mountains, and on the South by Rivers that water it, is exceeding fertile. That which it is most remarkable for, is a kind of white Wax, made by little white Worms, which are not rear'd in Houses like Bees, but found in the Fields. They make Candles of this Matter, that are whiter than Wax, and give a clearer Light, as well as a more agreeable Smell.

The Seventh City, Kin-chew-fu.

Kin-chew-fu. THE District of this City is considerable, including thirteen subordinate Cities, two of the second, and eleven of the third Rank. It is handsome enough ; several Lakes that surround it, contribute not a little to render the Soil fertile and pleasant. It is besides of great Trade, scarce inferior to the Capital for Numbers of People, and divided by a single Wall in two Parts, one whereof is possess'd by the Chinese, the other by Tartars, who compose the Garrison.

Oranges are plentiful here, but they are all somewhat sour. The several Lakes, great and small, the sides of which afford a fine Prospect, abound with all sorts of Fish. The Reason why the Tartars have built a Citadel here is, because it is a Rule with them to be Masters of a City whose Situation renders it of Importance. It is a common Saying, that when one is possess'd of Kin-chew, he has the Key of China in his Hands.

The Eighth City, Whang-chew-few.

Whang-chew-fu. THE Situation of this City on the Yang-tse-kyang, its small Distance from the Capital, and the Number of Lakes wherewith it is surrounded, renders it a delightful Habitation. Hence it is exceeding populous, and yields to few of the other Cities for Trade. A surprising Number of Barks arrive here every Day, loaden with all sorts of Merchandizes.

Its whole Territory is admirably well improv'd, and agreeably diversify'd, as well by the Rivers and Brooks that water it, as the Mountains that are to the North : some of which latter are cover'd with Trees and Forests, that are very beneficial to the Inhabitants ; they also afford Springs, whose Water gives the Tea a delicious Taste.

Spring. There are caught in the River about this City a great Number of Tortoises, some very large, others very small, which the Lords keep for their Diversion in their Gardens and Houses of Pleasure. They make excellent Spirits there, which are very strong, take Fire in an Instant, and have no bad Smell. There are also very good and large Chestnuts. Its District contains nine Cities, one of the second, and eight of the third Rank.

The Southern Part of the Province.

The First City, Chang-cha-fu, the Capital.

Chang-cha-fu, Capital of the Southern Part of the Province. THIS is the chief City of the Southern Part of Hu-quang, which the Chinese call Hu-nan. It stands on a large River, that has a Communication with the great Lake Tong-ting-bu. The Lakes and Rivers wherewith the Country is water'd, and the Ease with which the Husbandmen convey the Water into the Lands by Machines of their own Invention, whereof I speak elsewhere, renders its Soil rich and fertile, so that they need never fear Scarcety, even in time of the greatest Drought. They catch abundance of Fish in its Rivers, and especially very good Lampreys in some of them.

Vermillion, and Talc. The Country is partly plain, partly mountainous. The Hills yield very fine Cinnabar or Vermillion, and abundance of Talc, which the Physicians reduce to a Lime, and mix with Wine ; they say it is a wonderful Remedy for preserving Health. This Capital has in its District one City of the second Rank, and eleven of the third.

Great Festival. The Inhabitants of one of these Cities have given Occasion to a great Festival, which in the fifth Month is celebrated throughout the Empire, with much Joy and Pomp. A certain Mandarin, Governor of this City, whose Probity and Virtue had endear'd him to the People, happening to be drown'd in the River, they instituted a Festival in Honour of him ; which they celebrated with Games, Feasts, and Combats on the Water, as if they meant to search for that Mandarin, the Object at once of their Love and Grief. This Festival, which at first was peculiar to the City, was observ'd afterwards all over the Empire.

They

They prepare against that Day certain little Barks, long and narrow, which are gilded all over, and carry at one End the Figure of a Dragon, whence they are call'd Long-chew; in these they formerly fought upon the Water, and Premiums were regulated for the Victors; but as this Sort of Diversion was dangerous, and often attended with fatal Accidents, the Mandarins have prohibited it almost every where.

The Second City, Yo-chew-fu.

THE Situation of the City is admirable, being built on the Side both of the Tang-tse Yo-chew-fu. kyang, and the great Lake Tong-ting.

This Lake, which resembles a Sea, is remarkable for the Greatness of its Circumference, (being more than fourscore Leagues) for the abundance of its Waters, especially at certain Seasons, (when two of the greatest Rivers of the Province swell'd with Rain discharge themselves into it, passing out of it afterwards without any sensible Diminution) and for the astonishing Quantity of good Fish that is caught therein.

The great Number of Barks, and Variety of Commodities that resort to this City, render it one of the wealthiest in the Empire.

Its Territory, which is divided by the great Lake just now mention'd, contains one of the second, and seven of the third Rank; some on the East-side of the Lake, and others on the West. It is exceeding fertile every where, and stored with different Kinds of Orange and Limon-Trees.

Many of its Mountains are covered with Forests, chiefly of Pine-Trees; in some of them they find the Lapis Armenus, and Green Stone, which reduced to Powder makes a very beautiful Colour for Painting. Out of others they dig Tale, and little black Stones, the impalpable Powder of which is made use of by Physicians as an effectual Remedy against Diseases of the Throat, and especially the Squincy.

The Third City, Pau-king-fu.

THIS City is built on the River Lo-kyang, whose Waters fall into the Heng-kyang, Pau-king-fu. which has a Communication with the Lake Tong-ting. Its Territory, which consists of fertile Valleys, and very fine Plains, excepting towards the Province of Quang-si, where it is mountainous, contains only one City of the second, and four of the third Rank.

To the North of one of these Cities, nam'd U-kang-chew, the River is render'd very dangerous for sailing, by Rocks, down which it falls with astonishing Rapidness. They have erected a brazen Pillar here, to which the Bark is fastened, till the necessary Measures are taken for ascending the River with Safety.

The Fourth City, Heng-chew-fu.

THE District of this City is pretty extensive; one Town of the second, and nine of the third Rank, are under its Jurisdiction. It is situate at the Confluence of two Rivers, which inclose part of its Territory. Its Mountains are very agreeable, and well cultivated, or cover'd with Trees always green. The Country produces all the Necessaries of Life; it furnishes much Game, and contains several Mines of Gold and Silver, but they are not suffer'd to be open'd. Very good Paper is made here; in short, every thing is plenty, nor is it one of the least Cities in the Province.

The Fifth City, Chang-te-fu.

THIS is a large City, built on the River Twen-kyang, not far from the great Lake Tong-ting, Chang-te-fu. where that River discharges itself. Its District is of no great Extent, comprising only four Cities of the third Rank; but the Country is the most fertile in all the Province, and its River, which is navigable almost from the Beginning to the End, causes Trade to flourish. Every thing grows here in great plenty.

It is remarkable for a peculiar sort of Orange-Trees, which bear no Fruit till the Season for others is past; whence they are call'd by the Chinese Winter Orange-Trees, but its Fruit has a delicious Taste.

Its Mountains are full of Fallow Deer, and bear Cedars, whose Fruit is not good to eat; but they hang it up in their Chambers, which are perfumed with the sweet Smell that issues from it. Store also of Lapis Armenus, and even some Manna is found there.

The Sixth City, Ching-chew-fu.

THIS City is situate on an Angle made by two Rivers; and the Country is water'd by a multitude of Brooks, which render the Valleys very fertile. Its Mountains, which are numerous, yield abundance of Quicksilver, Lapis Armenus, and Green Stones fit for Painters; nor are they destitute of Gold and Silver Mines. The People who inhabit these Mountains want the Politeness of the Chinese Commonalty, being of a rude and savage Disposition, so that they are look'd on as Barbarians. The District of this Fu comprizes ten other Cities, whereof one is of the second, and nine of the third Rank.

PROV. VI.
Hu-quang

The Seventh City, Yong-chew-fu.

Yong-chew-fu.
Bambus,
Lyen-wu.

THIS is the most Southerly City in the Province. It stands amidst Mountains, whose Verdure yields a very agreeable Prospect, and on a River, which a little way from thence falls into the Syang-kyang. The Water of this River is so clear and pure, that in the deepest Places you may count the Flints and smallest Pebbles at the Bottom.

Store of Bambus grow in some parts of this Territory, and in others the Lyen-wu, with yellow Flowers; of which Colour it is rare to find any elsewhere. There are eight Cities within its Jurisdiction, whereof one is of the second Rank, and the other seven of the third.

Cities Tsin-chew
Ching-chew.

Besides these principal Cities there are two more of the second Order, which do not depend on any Fu, or Cities of the first Rank, but have a Jurisdiction over other Cities. The first is Tsin-chew, on the Borders of Yuey-chew, which has under it three Cities of the third Rank; the second Ching-chew, a great and very populous City, standing between two Rivers, whereon depend five Cities of the third Rank, all on the Borders of the Province of Quang-tong. Altho' this Country is full of Mountains, yet it is well cultivated.

Serpents.

THE Mildness of the Climate, and the Fertility of the Lands, render this Province a delightful Country; for which Reason it is named by the Chinese, Chong-wu, or the Flower of the Middle, because it is situate almost in the middle of China.

It is bounded on the North by the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Shan-si; on the West by Shen-si; on the South by Hu-quang, and on the East by Shan-tong. It is likewise water'd by the Whang-ho, [or Yellow River.]

Besides the Forts, Castles and Garrison Towns, it contains eight Fu, or Cities of the first Rank, and a hundred and two of the second and third.

The Chinese say that Fo-hi, the Founder of their Monarchy, fix'd his Court in this Province; and according to some Authors began his Reign about the Year 2952 before Christ, which if true confirms the Chronology of the Septuagint.

The ancient Emperors invited by the Beauty and Fruitfulness of the Country fix'd their Seats here, and indeed the Air is temperate, and very healthful. Here every thing that one can wish is to be found, as Wheat, Rice, Pasture, a great number of Cattle, Oranges of all sorts, Pomegranates, and all kinds of Fruit that grow in Europe, in such abundance, that they cost a Trifle; insomuch that one shall have three Pounds of Meal for a Penny.

The whole Province is plain, excepting on the West-Side, where there are Mountains cover'd with Forests; but on the East-Side the Land is cultivated with so great Industry, that one seems to travel thro' a vast Garden. Hence the Chinese commonly call it the Garden of China, as we call Touraine the Garden of France.

It is moreover so well water'd with Brooks, Springs and Rivers, that for Delightfulness no Country can compare with it. The Quantity of Corn, Rice, Silk and Cloth, which it furnishes by way of Tribute, is astonishing.

It is farther remarkable for a Lake, which draws to it a great number of those concerned in manufacturing the Silk, because its Water gives it an inimitable Lustre.

In one of its Cities, nam'd Nan-yang, there is a kind of Serpent, whose Skin is speckled with little white Spots; this Skin the Chinese Physicians steep in a Vial full of Wine, which they make use of as a good Remedy against the Palsy.

The First City, Kay-fong-fu, Capital of the Province.

Kay-fong-fu.

Destroy'd by an Inundation of the River.

THIS is a great, rich and populous City, standing in a fine Country, in the middle of a large and well cultivated Plain, four Miles and an half from the Whang-ho; there is one Defect however in its Situation, as lying very low, so that the Water of the River is higher than the City.

To guard against Inundations, they have built great Banks or Dykes for the Space of above thirty Leagues. But in 1642, this City having been besieged by the Rebels, after the Inhabitants had held out vigorously for six Months against more than a hundred thousand Men; the Commander of the Troops, which came to its Assistance, judg'd the only Expedient left for its Relief was, to break down the Banks of the Whang-ho, in order to lay the Plain under Water. But the Inundation was so sudden and violent, that the City itself was overflow'd, and three hundred thousand of its Inhabitants drowned.

P. Roderic de Figueiredo, a Portuguese, who had founded the Church at Kay-fong, and govern'd it for twenty Years with great Zeal, would never quit his Flock in the midst of Danger; but constantly refusing the Offers of the Mandarins, who press'd him to retire in their Barks out of the Place, sacrific'd his Life to the spiritual Welfare and Consolation of the Christians, whom he confess'd, and exhorted to die a holy Death.

Kay-fong appears to have been three Leagues in Compass before that Misfortune; and has been since rebuilt, but not so well as to hold its Place among the handsomest Cities of China. Its District is very extensive, and contains four Cities of the second, and thirty of the third Rank. Prov. VII.
Ho-nan.

The Second City, Que-te-fu. (B)

THIS City stands in a vast Plain, and in the middle between two fine Rivers. It has under its Jurisdiction one City of the second, and six of the third Rank; all rich and very populous. The Country is flat, without any Hills, and well improv'd; the Air very pure, and Soil fertile in all sorts of Grain and Fruit, among the rest Orange and Pomegranates are very plenty. Que-te-fu.

The Third City, Chang-te-fu.

IT lies in the most Northern Part of the Province, which is there much streighten'd by the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Sban-fi. This Country, which is of no great Extent, is watered by many Rivers, that render its Soil rich and fruitful, and also afford divers kinds of Fish: among which one resembles the Crocodil, and has this remarkable, that if the Fat of it be once set on Fire, it is scarce possible to extinguish it till the whole is consum'd. Chang-te-fu.

Its Mountains, which are not very high, yield Loadstones, and divers kinds of Wormwood. One of these Hills is so steep and difficult of Ascent that in time of War the Inhabitants retire thither, and are in perfect Safety. There is on the Top a Plain of large Extent, where they may dwell, as long as they will, secure from the Avarice and Violence of the Soldiers. This City has within its District one of the second, and six of the third Rank. Load-Stones.

The Fourth City, We-kyun-fu. (C)

THIS City stands on a River in a sandy Country, whose Soil is less productive than the rest of the Province. It has only six Cities of the third Rank within its District, which is small, being like the former contracted by the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Sban-fi. On the side next this last there are some Mountains, the rest is a plain Country, and pretty well improved. We-kyun-fu.

The Fifth City, Whay-king-fu.

THE Territory of this City is of very small Extent. It is bounded on the North by Mountains, which separate it from the Province of Sban-fi, and on the South by the great River Whang-bo, containing only six Towns of the third Rank, under the Jurisdiction of Whay-king. Whay-king-fu.

The Air is mild and very healthful, and the Soil no less fertile produces all the Necessaries of Life in abundance. Simples and Medicinal Herbs are found here in such Plenty, as to supply the whole Province.

The Sixth City, Ho-nan-fu.

THIS City, which bears the Name of the Province, stands in the midst of Mountains, between three Rivers. The Chinese formerly believ'd it was in the Center of the Earth, because it is in the middle of their Empire. Tho' it is surrounded with Mountains, yet its Soil is very fruitful. It is very large and populous; its District also is of great Extent, comprizing one City of the second Rank, and thirteen of the third. Ho-nan-fu.
the Center of

One of these Towns nam'd Teng-fong-byen is famous for the Tower built there by the celebrated Chew-kong, where he us'd to observe the Stars. There is still an Instrument to be seen which he employ'd to find the Meridian Shadow, in order to discover the Height of the Pole, and make other Astronomical Observations. He liv'd more than a thousand Years before Christ, and the Chinese pretend he invented the Mariners-Compass. Teng-fong-byen

The Seventh City, Nan-yang-fu.

THE Country about this City which is situate on a small River, is very fine; tho' it is of very great Extent, it is notwithstanding surprizingly fertile. Provisions are so plenty that they are exceeding cheap, and numerous Armies have quartered here a considerable time, without incommoding the Inhabitants in the Article of Provision. Nan-yang-fu.

The City is neither large, rich, nor populous. It is encompass'd with Mountains some of which produce the Lapis Armenus and breed those Serpents already spoken of, which are mark'd with white Spots, and used as a Remedy against the Palsy. Its Jurisdiction is very large, extending over two Cities of the second, and six of the third Rank. Spotted Yu-ning-fu.

The Eighth City, Yu-ning-fu. (D)

THIS City is built on the River Yu-bo. Its District, which is very extensive, is partly plain, and partly mountainous, especially towards the North and South; but at the same time it is water'd by several Rivers, which produces plenty of all sorts of Grain and Fruit. Two Cities of the second Rank, and twelve of the third depend on it.

PROVINCE VIII. SHAN-TONG.

Prov. VIII.

Shan-tong.

Bounds, and Division.

THIS is one of the most fertile Provinces of the Empire. It is bounded on the West by Pe-che-li and part of Ho-nan; on the South by Kyang-nan; the Gulf of Kyang-nan washes it on the East, and that of Pe-che-li on the North. It is divided into six Countries, containing as many Cities of the first-Rank, which have under them one hundred and fourteen of the second and third Rank.

Among these are not included above fifteen Ports, built at the Entrances of all Ports and Rivers along the Coast; neither do we reckon several Islands scatter'd over the Gulf, which are equally populous, and afford some of them very commodious Harbours for the Chinese Transports, that have an easy Passage from thence to Korea and Lyau-tong.

Great Imperial Canal.

The great Imperial Canal crosses part of this Province, by which all the Barks from the South Parts arrive at Pe-king. They carry so many sorts of Commodities, and in such great Quantities, that the Duties arising merely therefrom amount to more than ten Millions.

When one considers the Length of this Canal, the Thickness and Height of the Banks, which are all of Hewn-Stone, very solid, and ornamented at proper Distances, he cannot help admiring the Industry of the Chinese.

The Numbers of Lakes, Brooks and Rivers, which, besides the great Canal, water the Province, contribute much towards rendering it one of the most plentiful parts of the Empire; nor is this extraordinary Plenty to be interrupted, except by too great a Drought, for it seldom rains here, or by the Havock that is sometimes made by Locusts.

Produce.

The Soil produces Rice, Millet, Wheat, Barley, Beans, with all sorts of Grain and Fruit. Fowl, Eggs, fat Capons, Pheasants, Partridge, Quails, and Hares are exceeding cheap; they catch a prodigious quantity of Fish in the Lakes and Sea, of which you may have several Pounds for a Penny.

Great Plenty of Fish.

Fruit-Trees of all kinds grow here, especially excellent Pears, Chestnuts, fine wholesome Peaches, divers sorts of Nuts, and abundance of Plumbs. They dry the Plumbs and Pears for transporting into the other Provinces; but the Fruit which grows in most plenty, is that sort called by the Portuguese Figs, and the Chinese Se-tse; which are to be found no where but in China, nor in any Province thereof in so great abundance as in this of Shan-tong. This Fruit, which I speak of elsewhere, does not ripen till the Beginning of Autumn; they commonly dry them as they do Figs in Europe, and sell them all over the Empire; being dry'd, they commonly grow mealy, and are cover'd by degrees with a Crust of Sugar; they have an excellent Taste, so that one would imagine he was eating some of our best dry'd Figs; such also is the smaller sort that grows in Shan-si. There is likewise another kind of green Figs, which continue hard, even when ripe, and are cut with a Knife like our Apples in Europe. The Trees that bear them, need no cultivating; but we conceive that if they assisted Nature, by being at the pains to graft them, the Fruit would be truly delicious.

The Fruit Se-tse, or Chinese
Figs.Wild Silk-Worms.

In the Fields certain Worms, resembling Caterpillars, produce a white Silk, which is fasten'd to the Shrubs and Bushes, whereof they make Silks, coarser indeed but more compact and strong than those made of the Silk produced by the Worms that are rear'd in the Houses.

The First City, Tsi-nan-fu, Capital of the Province.

Tsi-nan-fu.

ALTHO' this City is not on the Grand Canal, yet by means thereof principally is its Trade carry'd on; a little more than a League from it is the Village Lai-keu, standing on the side of the Tsing-bo, by which River Goods are convey'd to the Canal; those which are most common and peculiar to the Country are, viz.

1. The Stuff nam'd Kyen-chew, made of Silk, inclining to a greyish Colour, which is produced only by the wild Worms, resembling Caterpillars. These Worms spin their Webs on Shrubs, and Bushes, and furnish as great Quantities as the domestick Worms. This Silk is the more estimable, as it costs in a manner nothing, and is so strong, that the Goods made of it are very lasting, and have a tolerable Vent every where. It must however be confess'd that the Colour is sometimes neither agreeable nor uniform, and often various; so that one may say, the Piece is divided into grey, yellow, and white Spaces. One that would have those which are very genteel, must take his Choice and pay a Price for them accordingly.

(D) Or Zhu-ning-fu, being elsewhere written Ju-ning-fu in the French.

Prov. VIII.
Shan-tong.

2. Another kind of Commodity that turns to great Account consists in Works of Lew-li, or Chinese Glass, which are made at Yen-ching, a great Borough in the District of this Capital; this sort of Glass is more brittle than that of Europe; breaking when exposed to too sharp an Air.

Tsi-nan is a very great and populous City. The Lakes within its Walls which supply Canals throughout the City, together with the beautiful Buildings, render it very famous. Its Jurisdiction is large, extending over four Cities of the second, and twenty six of the third Rank.

This whole Country, which extends to the Sea, abounds with all sorts of Grain, and nourishes numerous Herds of Cattle. Some of its Mountains have Iron Mines. The Lakes scatter'd over its Territory are stored with Fish, and adorn'd with abundance of those Flowers, named Lyen-taba, so often mention'd before.

The Second City, Yen-chew-fu.

THE Territory depending on this City is shut up, as it were, between two famous Rivers, viz. Ta-chin-bo to the North, and the Wbang-bo to the South; besides several other Rivers and some Lakes, which abound with Fish, and render the whole Country exceeding fertile. Here nothing is to be seen but cultivated Plains or woody Mountains. The Air is mild and temperate, which renders living here very agreeable.

Its Jurisdiction is of great Extent, consisting of twenty seven Cities, four of the second and twenty three of the third Rank. One of these nam'd Tsi-ning-chew, is not inferior to Yen-chew, either for Bigness, multitude of Inhabitants, or richness of its Trade. Its Situation, which is towards the (A) Middle of the great Canal, renders it one of the greatest Marts in the Empire.

Another City, nam'd Kyo-few-byen, is famous for being the Birth Place of Confucius, the chief Doctor of the Nation. Here the Chinese have erected several Monuments, as so many public Testimonies of their Gratitude towards that great Man.

Birth Place of Confucius.

They affirm that in the Neighbourhood of another little City, call'd Kin-kyang-byen (B), they formerly gather'd much Gold, whence it had its Name, which signifies Earth of Gold. There are also divers Parts, especially towards Tong-ping-chew, so intermixt with Woods and Fields, that they afford the most gay and agreeable Prospect imaginable.

Kin-kyang-
byen.

The Third City, Tong-chang-fu.

THIS City, which is situate on the great Canal, is equally famous for its Riches and Trade. The whole Country, that depends on it is level, and produces plenty of Grain and Fruits of all kinds; which procure in Return whatever other Parts contribute towards the Support and Pleasure of Life. Three Cities of the second and fifteen of the third Rank are under its Jurisdiction.

Tong-chang-
fu.

Among these Cities there is a very considerable one, call'd Lin-tsin-chew, where the great Canal joins the River Wey-bo (C); it is the Rendezvous of all the Vessels, and in some sort the general Magazin of all kinds of Merchandizes one can wish for.

Few Cities in the Empire are more populous and of better Trade. It is no less famous for its Buildings, especially a beautiful Tower of eight Stories, rais'd without the Walls. The Outside which is of Porcelain, is adorn'd with divers Figures; within it is lin'd with finely polish'd Marble of several Colours. By a Stair-case made in the Wall, one goes up to all the Stories, and from thence to very fine Galleries of Marble, embellish'd with gilded Iron Rails, which encompass the Tower; at the Corner of these Galleries hang little Bells, which, when mov'd by the Wind, make an agreeable Tinkling. Not far from this Tower are certain curious Idol-Temples, whose Manner would not be disagreeable to the Taste of the best European Architects.

Porcelain
Tower.

The Fourth City, Tsiing-chew-fu. (D)

THE Territory belonging to this City is partly water'd by Rivers, and partly cover'd with Hills. Besides the Fertility of its Soil, the Neighbourhood of the Sea supplies it plentifully with Necessaries. So great a Quantity of Fish is caught here, that they are exceeding cheap, and their Skin alone yields a considerable Profit.

Tsiing-chew-fu

In this Country there grows in the Bellies of the Cows a yellow Stone, call'd by the Chinese, Nyew-zhang; it is as big sometimes as a Goose-Egg, but not more solid than the softest Crayon (E). The Physicians of China prefer it to the Bezoar, and say, that, when pulveriz'd and taken in hot Water, it is an immediate Cure for Defluxions and Rheums; in the same manner as the Stone that grows in the Gall of an Ox, cures the Jaundice. This City has in its District one City of the second, and thirteen of the third Rank.

(A) At the Distance of 22 Miles to the East.

(B) Rather, I presume, Kin-pang, for I find no Kin-kyang in the Map. Besides Kyang signifies a River, but Tang a perfect Matter.

(C) In the French, Ori-bo.

(D) In the French Tsin-tcheu-fu, but in the Map and Tables Tsiing-chew-fu.

(E) A Crayon is a soft Mineral, of which Pencils are made for Drawing, call'd Crayons.

Prov VIII.
Shan-tong.

The Fifth City, Ten-chew-fu, (F)

Ten-chew-fu.

IS situate on the Sea, where it has a very commodious Harbour. It has a very strong Garrison and several Ships of War to guard the Coast. Eight Cities depend on it; one of the second, and seven of the third Rank.

Square Bam-bú.

Part of these Cities are within Land, the rest are very convenient Sea Ports, where they catch abundance of good Oysters, which are serv'd as Dainties at the Tables of the Lords. Altho' the Country be mountainous, yet it is water'd by Rivers that contribute much to its Fertility. The Nyew-whang Stone is found in this City as well as the former. The Bambú's, or Reeds, are here square, contrary to what is usual, for every where else they are round.

The Sixth City, Lay-chew-fu.

Lay-chew-fu.

THIS City, which is situate on a Promontory, is encompass'd on one side by the Sea, and on the other by Mountains. Two Cities of the second Rank, and five of the third, are subordinate to it. Some of which are also wash'd by the Sea; for Instance, Kyau-chee, which is very strong by its Situation. All this Country is render'd fertile by the Rivers that water it. It is intermixt with Plains and Mountains, especially toward the Sea Coasts.

PROVINCE IX. SHAN-SI.

Prov. IX.
Shan-si.

THIS Province which is one of the least in China, is bounded on the East by the Province of Pe-che-li; on the South by that of Ho-nan; on the West by Sben-fi; and on the North it is separated from Tartary by the Great Wall. It contains five Cities of the first Rank, and eighty five [of the second and third,] without reckoning a great Number of Forts built at certain Distances, to defend the Great Wall, and render the Roads secure. Some of these fortify'd Places are larger and better peopled than many of the Cities.

First Inhabited.

The first Inhabitants of China, as the History relates, settled in this Province, whose Climate is healthful and agreeable. Tho' some of its numerous Mountains, are frightful and uncultivated, yet most of them are well improv'd, being cut into Terrasses from Bottom to Top and quite cover'd with Corn.

Produce.

In several Parts of these Mountains they find four or five Feet Depth of Earth, without the least Stone; and the Mountains themselves have very fair Plains on their Tops. They are farther remarkable for inexhaustible Mines of Coal, which is used (either in Lumps, or ground and made into Cakes) instead of Wood, whereof there is not enough in the Province for Fewel.

Excepting Rice, which grows there with more Difficulty than elsewhere, because the Canals are not so numerous; it abounds in all other Grain, especially Wheat and Millet, which are carry'd into the other Provinces. Its Vines produce good Grapes, whereof the Chinese might make Wine if they would, but they content themselves to dry them, and so sell them all over the Empire.

This Province furnishes abundance of Musk, Porphyry, Marble, and Jasper of divers Colours. The Lapis Armenus is very common, as well as Iron Mines, which afford great Store of that Metal; whereof they make all sorts of Utensils for the Kitchen, which are sent into the rest of the Provinces. One meets also with Lakes of salt Water, which yield Salt; with many hot and boiling Springs.

The First City, Tay-ywen-fu, the Capital.

Tay-ywen-fu.

THIS was formerly a very fine City full of beautiful Palaces, where dwelt the Princes of the Blood of the last Imperial Family Tay-ming (c). But at present it is partly uninhabited; for those grand Edifices have fallen to Decay by Degrees, and at length, been quite destroy'd; nor dare any body re-build them, altho' the Place is healthful and agreeable.

Carpets.

Besides divers sorts of Silks wrought here, as in other Places, there is a particular Manufactory for Carpets, after the Turkish Fashion, which they make of any Dimension required. As the Mountains yield abundance of excellent Iron, there is a great Trade driven here in Iron Works.

This City, which is ancient and very populous, measures about three Leagues in Compass, and is inclos'd with strong Walls. It stands on the River Fuen-bo and has a very large Jurisdiction, extending over five Cities of the second Rank, and twenty of the third. Its verdant Hills and Mountains cover'd with Woods, afford an agreeable Prospect.

(r) Here the Name agrees with the Map; in the Table of Longitude and Latitude it is Teng-chew-fu, as in the Table of Divisions, p. 6.

(c) In the Orig. Tai-ming tchoe; but I have left out the last Syllable tchoe, or chao, which is only a Chronological Term, that does not belong to the Name, and only serves to breed Confusion, since the Author has not tack'd it to the Names of other Families, or even of this in other Places.

HO-NAN

Yü a City of the first Rank
 Chew a City of 4. Rank
 Hyen a City of 4. Rank

On the neighbouring Mountains are to be seen very handsome Sepulchres, which take up a great deal of Ground, and are all either of Marble or Hewn-stone. At convenient Distances are plac'd Triumphal Arches, Statues of Heroes, with Figures of Lions, Horses, and other Animals, in different Attitudes and very natural. The whole is encompass'd with a kind of Forest of ancient Cypress, planted checker-wise.

The Fwen-bo, whose Name is found in the most ancient Chinese Books, is neither broad nor deep; yet it contributes to the Ornament and Conveniency of the City, in the same Manner as the River Wey does to the City Si-ngan-fu; for tho' neither of them is comparable to the great Rivers, which run by several Capitals, yet as after a pretty long Course they fall into the yellow River, they by that Means have a Communication with the Provinces of Ho-nan and Kyang-nan.

There is at Tay-yuen a small Tartar Garrison, under an Officer nam'd Ho-long-ta. The Manchews who are at present Masters of China, have few Garrisons of their own Nation, and indeed it would be difficult, and almost impossible to furnish so many Cities, which are either at the Passages of great Rivers, on the Frontiers, or on the Sea Coast, with Garrisons. So that they are content to garrison some of the principal Cities of the Empire, partly to support the Chinese Soldiers, who are on the Coasts, partly to dispute the Passage of the Great River Tang-tse-kyang, which crosses thro' the middle of China; and partly to have a watchful Eye upon the Militia of the Provinces of Shan-fi and Shen-fi, employ'd for Defence of the great Wall; altho' the Emperor being a Tartar, there is at present no great Number of the latter. (D)

The Second City, Ping-yang-fu.

ALTHO' Ping-yang is no more than the second City of the Province, yet it is not inferior to the Capital, either for Antiquity, Fertility of Soil, Extent of its District, or Number of Cities under its Jurisdiction, which amount to thirty four, viz. six of the second and twenty eight of the third Rank, whereof several are very considerable; without reckoning an infinite Number of very populous Boroughs and Villages. It is situate on the River Fwen-bo, and is more than four Miles in Compass.

The Country which depends on it, is partly plain, partly mountainous; all the Lands are cultivated and very fertile, except in the Neighbourhood of some Mountains, which are unimprov'd and perfectly frightful. Two Rivers which divide this Territory do not contribute a little to keep up the plenty that reigns there. On the West and South Sides it is water'd by the River Whang-bo. Near Ngan-i-byen there is a Lake whose Water is as salt as the Sea, whereof they make abundance of Salt.

The Third City, Lu-ngan-fu.

THE Territory of this City is not large, for it has under its Jurisdiction no more than eight Cities of the third Rank; but it is agreeably situated, almost at the Head of the River Tse-kyang-bo. Altho' the Country is pretty full of Hills, yet the Lands produce all the necessaries of Life. The whole District is spread over with Boroughs and Villages.

The Fourth City, Fwen-chew-fu. (E)

THIS City lies almost at an equal Distance between the Capital and Ping-yang. It takes its Name from the River Fwen-bo, on the West side whereof it stands (F) in a Place very commodious for Trade. Its District is not large, for it contains only one City of the second Rank, and seven of the third, almost all of which lie between the great River Whang and the Fwen.

Altho' the Country is hilly enough, it is not the less improv'd on that Account. One meets with Fields, abounding with all sorts of Grain, thick Forests and good Pastures. They make a Drink here of Rice call'd Yang-tsyu, wherein they steep Mutton after a particular manner. They prize this Liquor highly, it is nourishing, strong, and very delicious to Chinese Palates. In this Tract one meets with a great Number of Baths and Springs almost boiling hot, whose Waters differ both in Colour and Taste.

The Fifth City, Tay-tong fu.

THIS City is neither so antient nor large as the other Cities of the Province. That which renders it of Importance is its being situated in the midst of Mountains, (wherewith indeed the whole Country is cover'd) and in the only Spot which lies expos'd to the IncurSIONS of the

(D) This is a Reason grounded on a Falshy in Fact; for neither the Manchews who govern China, nor the Mongols and other Nations surrounding China, are Tartars; nor is the Name Tartar, or rather Tatar, known to those People, in the extended Sense it is used by Europeans; it being peculiar to a particular Tribe, which at present seems to be extinct, at least as to the Name; the Reason therefore, why so few Guards are employ'd now about the Walls, is, probably, because the Power of the Mongols being weaken'd, they have submitted or put themselves under the Protection of the Manchews; whom formerly they expell'd out of China, under the famous Jenghis Khan.

(E) In the two Tables mentioned p. 106. Note 1, is written Fwen-chew-fu, but faultily.

(F) It stands above two Miles from the River Fwen, according to the Map; and indeed the Author is not very accurate as to the Situations.

PROV. IX. the Tartars; hence it is one of the best fortify'd Places after the Chinese manner, and furnish'd with a numerous Garrison. Its Territory is surrounded with the great Wall, along which there are Forts built from Space to Space, provided with Forces for its Defence. Its Jurisdiction which is very large, extends over four Cities of the second Rank, and seven of the third. In its Mountains are found excellent Lapis Armenus, with abundance of Simples and Medicinal Herbs, which the Botanists come in search of from all Parts. Some of them produce a Stone to red, that being steep'd in Water it is used instead of Vermilion, for taking the Impression of Seals; others furnish the Azure, resembling that which is brought into Europe; and a particular kind of Jasper nam'd Tu-shu, which is very transparent, and as white as Agat. In short, there is plenty of Marble and Jasper of all Colours; and a great Trade is driven in all Sorts of Skins dress'd here.

PROVINCE X. SHEN-SI.

PROV. X.
Shen-si.

THIS Province is divided into two Parts, the Eastern and Western, which contain eight Cities of the first and one hundred and six others of the third Rank; besides a great Number of Forts built from Space to Space along the great Wall.

Of these fortify'd Places Kan-chew and Su-chew are very considerable. In the first a Vice-Roy resides, and several Mandarins, the principal among whom receive their Orders from none but the Court. The second is of equal Strength, and its Governor very powerful. It is divided into two Parts, whereof one is inhabited by the Chinese, and the other by Strangers, who come to trade here.

Gold-Mines,
and Gold-Sand.

The Air is temperate, the People mild, civil, obliging, and better affected to Strangers, than the Chinese, who live more towards the North, are. The overflowing of Torrents and Rivers render the Soil very fruitful. This Province yields rich Gold Mines, the opening of which is prohibited; so great a Quantity of that Metal is found in the Rivers and Brooks, that an infinite Number of Persons subsist by the Profit that arises by washing the Sand and separating the Gold from it.

Soil and Produce.

This Country is subject to be infested with Locusts, which eat up the Grass, and sometimes destroy the most plentiful Harvests. It produces little Rice, but abounds with Wheat, and Millet; which grows here so fast, that during Winter, the Husbandmen suffer their Sheep to browse on it, knowing by Experience that thus it will thrive the better in Spring.

Besides Grain, this Province furnishes abundance of Drugs, especially Rubarb, Honey, Wax, Musk, Red-Lead, perfum'd Wood which resembles Sanders, and Pit-Coal, whereof there are inexhaustible Mines.

Minerals.

A great Number of Quarries afford a soft Stone, or Mineral, call'd Hyung-sobang, out of which they cut Vessels of several kinds. The Physicians look on it as a sovereign Remedy against all sorts of Poison, malignant Fevers, and the contagious Heats during the Dog Days. They infuse this Mineral in Wine before they make use of it; it is of a red Colour inclining to yellow, and speckled with little black Spots; it has a great resemblance of the Crayon.

Little blew Stones are also found there, inclining to black, and interspers'd with small white Veins; the Chinese say, that being ground and reduc'd to a very fine Powder, they make an excellent Remedy, and even prolong Life.

Animals.

Stags and Deer range the Country in Herds; here are also abundance of Bears, wild Bulls, and other Creatures resembling Tigers, whose Skins are in much request; a kind of Goats, from whence they take the Musk, and of Sheep with very long and thick Tails, whose Flesh is very well tasted; not to mention a singular species of Bats as big as Hens, which the Chinese prefer to the nicest Pullets.

Of Wool and Goat-Hair mixt, they make a very pretty Stuff much in request; the Hair they use, is that which grows in the Winter, as being more fine, because not so long. The Birds, call'd the Golden Hens, much esteem'd for their Beauty, are also found in this Province.

All sorts of Flowers grow here, particularly one much esteem'd by the Curious, call'd the Queen of Flowers, resembling the Rose, but is more beautiful, and has larger Leaves, altho' The Smell is not so pleasant; the Stalk is without Prickles; its Colour is a mixture of White and Red; yet there are some of them red and yellow. The Shrub it grows on is like the Elder-Tree, and to be seen in all the Gardens of the Lords; but Care must be taken in the hot Climates to shelter it from the Sun.

The Eastern Part of the Country, call'd I-TONG. The First City, Si-ngan-fu, the Capital.

Si-ngan-fu
the Capital.

NEXT to Pe-king this is one of the largest and fairest Cities in China. It stands in a great Plain, and is the Residence of the Tsong-tu of Shen-si and Se-chew, as well as of the Governor of this Eastern Part of Shen-si. Its Jurisdiction extends over six Cities of the second, and thirty one of the third Rank.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY
WASHINGTON, D.C.

This City was for several Ages the Court of the Chinese Emperors, and is still very populous, and of great Trade; especially for Mules, which the Inhabitants breed and train so dexterously, that many of them are seen trotting after Horses at Pe-king, where they sell for five or six hundred Livres apiece: It being the Custom for all Persons of Distinction to have a Servant ride before them well mounted. PROV. X.

Mules.

The Walls of Si-ngan are very broad, and high, flank'd with Towers at the Distance of a Bow-shot from one another, and encompass'd with a good Ditch. They are almost an equilateral Square, but not above four Leagues in Compass, tho' commonly said to equal those of Pe-king in that Respect. Some of its Gates are very magnificent, and remarkable for their Height.

There is still to be seen a Palace where dwelt the antient Kings of the Province, whom the great Extent of Country they possess'd, and the Valour of their Subjects render'd very powerful; the rest of the Buildings are no better than those of other Cities, the Houses being according to the Chinese Fashion very low and ill enough built; nor is the Furniture so neat as in the Southern Provinces, the Varnish being coarser, China Ware scarcer, and the Workmen not so skillful. Palace of the ancient Kings

The Principal Forces of the Tartars design'd for the Defence of the North of China, are in Garrison here, under a Tsian-kyun, or General of their Nation, who with his Soldiers inhabit one part of the City, separated from the rest by a Wall. The chief Mandarins of the Province, who are here in great Numbers, are mostly Tartars.

The People of the Country are more robust, brave, better able to undergo Fatigue, and even taller than elsewhere; which renders its Militia more formidable than those of almost all the other Provinces.

The Mountains of the Territory of Si-ngan-fu, are very agreeable, and abound with Bucks, Does, Hares, and other Game; as well as that sort of Bats as big as Pullets, spoken of before. They also afford a kind of Earth, which is white, and highly valued by the Ladies, who infusing it in Water, make use of it to whiten the Complexion.

The Second City, Yen-ngan-fu.

THIS City is situate in an agreeable Plain, on the River Yen-ho. Three Cities of the second, and sixteen of the third Rank, depend on it. It has within its Walls a pretty high Hill, remarkable for the fine Buildings that are upon it. Its Mountains distil a bituminous Liquor, which they call Oyl of Stone, and use for Lamps. Yen-ngan-fu.
Oyl of Stone.

The Country is very rich in Martins, Sables, and other choise Furs. It abounds likewise with all sorts of fine Marble; and produces almost every where those Shrubs, already described, which produce the Flowers rear'd, with so much Care, in the Gardens of the Grandees.

The Third City, Fong-tsyang-fu.

A Fabulous Bird, which the Chinese describe with Variety of admirable Colours, and paint sometimes on their Cloaths and Furniture, gives Name to this Place, which has under its Jurisdiction one City of the second, and seven of the third Rank. It is very large and the Buildings handsome enough. The Air is temperate and healthful; the whole Country is well cultivated, and rendered fertile by the Torrents, Brooks and Rivers. Fong-tsyang-fu.

The Fourth City, Han-chong-fu.

THE whole Country of this District, containing two Cities of the second, and fourteen of the third Rank, is water'd by several Branches of the River Han, whereon Han-chong, which is large and populous, is situate. The high Mountains and Forests, wherewith it is encompass'd, render it very strong, and serve for Bulwarks. The Valleys are pleasant, and furnish plenty of Necessaries, as well as Honey, Wax, Musk, and red-Lead; fallow Beasts are very numerous, especially Deer, Stags, and Bears; the Feet of these last, especially the fore-feet, are delicious Morfels with the Chinese. Han-chong-fu.

The Road made formerly over the Mountains, leading to the Capital, has something surprising in it; upwards of a hundred thousand Men were employ'd in the Work, which was executed with incredible Dispatch. They level'd Hills, and made Arches from one Mountain to another, supporting them by Pillars, when the intervening Valley was too wide. These Bridges, which form part of the Road, are in some Places so high, that one cannot behold the Precipice without Horror; four Horsemen may ride abreast over them, and for more Security they have Rails on each Side. At certain Distances, there are Villages and Inns for the Convenience of Travellers. Surprising Road.

It is only in the District of this City, and some particular parts of Tartary, that a very rare Bird of Prey, call'd Hay-tsing, is found. It may be compar'd to our best Falcons for Sprightliness and Courage; as soon as any of these Birds are caught, they are immediately sent to the Emperor's Falconry.

Prov. X.

Shen-si.

The Western Part of the Province, call'd I-SI.

The Fifth City, Ping-lyang-fu.

Ping-lyang-fu.

THIS City stands on a Branch of the River Kin-bo, and abounds with every thing. The Climate is very mild, and the agreeable Prospect of Mountains surrounding it, together with the Rivers which water the Country, render it a charming Habitation. It has within its District three Cities of the second, and seven of the third Rank.

The Sixth City, Kong-chang-fu.

Kong-chang-fu.

THIS is a City of Trade, and very populous, situate on the River Whey. The almost inaccessible Mountains which encompass it, render'd it formerly a Place of Importance to the Security of the Empire, when they stood in fear of Invasions from the Tartars. They shew a Sepulchre here, which the Chinese say is that of Fo-bi, which, if so, must be the most ancient Monument in the World.

Fo-bi's Tomb.

Counter-Poison.
Speckled Stones.

It affords plenty of Musk, and almost all its Mountains, yield the Mineral Hyung-wbang; which, as I observ'd before, is a kind of Orpiment, used in Physic, when very transparent, especially against the Bites of venomous Insects; and in malignant and epidemical Diseases, either as a Remedy or an Antidote. Here is also found the dark blue Stone, streak'd with white, which, being reduc'd to Powder, according to the Chinese, preserves Health. This City has in its District three more of the second, and seven of the third Rank.

The Seventh City, Ling-tau-fu.

Ling-tau-fu.

THIS City stands on a River that falls into the Whang-bo or Yellow River. It is famous for the great Quantity of Gold found in the Sand of the neighbouring Rivers and Torrents. The Country is full of Mountains, which abound with wild Bulls, and certain Animals resembling Tigers, whose Skins are in great Request, and used for Winter Cloathing.

The Valleys are cover'd with Corn, excepting those near Rivers which are stock'd with Cattle, especially Sheep, whose Tails are very long, and Flesh delicious. In short the whole Territory is sufficiently fruitfull. It comprizes two Cities of the second, and three of the third Rank.

The Eighth City, Kin-yang-fu. (A)

Kin-yang-fu.

THIS has always been look'd on as a Barrier against the Incurfions of the Tartars. The Ditches encompassing it are very deep, and the Walls strong. The River, that almost surrounds it, and the several Forts built from Space to Space, join'd to the Mountains and Rivers, by which it is as it were inclos'd, render it a very strong Place, according to the Chinese manner of Fortifying.

The Country is very fruitful, being water'd by numerous Springs and Rivers. It produces a certain Herb nam'd Kin se, that is, gilded Silk, which is consider'd as an excellent Remedy; also a kind of Bean, affirm'd to be an admirable Specific against all sorts of Poison. This City has under it only one of the second, and four of the third Rank.

Lan-chew, a famous City of the second Rank, [and Capital of the Western Part of Shen-si.]

Lan-chew.

ALTHO' Lan-chew is only of the second Rank, and depends on the former, yet it is of eminent Note in the Province, being the best City to be met with on the Yellow River. It cannot indeed be call'd large, however it is the Capital of the Western part of this Province, and the Seat of the Governor; because being near the Great Wall, and principal Gates in the West, Succours are easily sent from hence to the Soldiers who defend the Entrance.

The Trade of this City consists principally in Skins, which come from Tartary by way of Sining and To-pa, thro' which they must necessarily pass; as also in Woolen Stuffs of several sorts, whereof a kind of fine Serge, nam'd Ku-zhong, is the most esteem'd; it is almost as dear as the common Satin, but is easily spoil'd, because it is difficult to preserve it from being Moth-eaten; the coarser sort is call'd Ko-be. There is another Stuff call'd Pe-zhong, made of short teas'd Hair, which is subject to the same Inconvenience, and likewise dear. The Myew-zhong is made of Cows-Hair, it is coarse, and almost as thick as Kersey. They make Cloaths of it, proper for snowy Weather, having nothing better for the Purpose in this Country.

Lastly, there is a Stuff call'd Tye-be-myen, made of Thread and Worsted; which might be compar'd to our Linsley-Woolsey, if it was as substantial and close woven. But notwithstanding its Trade in these Commodities, Lan-chew is not reckon'd a rich City in China.

(A) In the Map Here, it is Kin-yang-fu, in the Table of Divisions p. 6. Hing-yang-fu, and in the Table of Longitude and Latitude at end of the Work Kin-yang-fu.

PROVINCE XI. SE-CHWEN.

SE-CHWEN is hardly inferior to any of the other Provinces, either for Extent or Plenty. Prov. XI.
Se-chwen.
It is bounded on the North by that of Sben-fi; on the East by Hu-quang; on the South by Hu-quang and Yun-nan; and on the West by the Kingdom of Tibet, and certain neighbouring People. It is divided into ten Districts, comprizing ten Cities of the first Rank, and eighty eight of the second and third, besides a great Number of fortify'd Towns and Forts.

The great River Yang-tse-kyang runs thro' the Province, which is very rich, not only by reason of the great Quantity of Silk it produces, but also in Iron, Tin, and Lead, in Amber, Sugar-Canes, excellent Loadstones, and Lapis Armenus; which last is of a very beautiful Blue. It abounds also in Musk; Orange and Citron-Trees are very numerous. The Horses are very much esteem'd, because they are little, very pretty and exceeding swift. Here are likewise plenty of Stags, Deer, Partridges, Parrots, and a sort of Hen with Wool like that of Sheep, instead of Feathers; they are very small, have short Feet, and are highly esteem'd by the Chinese Ladies, who keep them for their Amusement. From this Province comes the best Rubarb, and the true Root of Fu-lin; which has under its Bark a kind of white spongy Substance, somewhat clammy, which the Physicians prescribe in almost all Cases. There is found a wild sort in the other Provinces; but it is neither so large nor good as this. Se-chwen produces also another Root, named Fen-se, which bears a great Price, and consequently is not so commonly used.

The best Rubarb, and true Root of Fu-lin.

As this Province is far from the Sea, it would be difficult to bring Salt hither; to supply that Defect, they dig Wells in the Mountains from whence they get salt Water, which being evaporated by Fire, leaves a Salt behind; but it is not so good for seasoning as that of the Sea.

The First City, Ching-tu-fu, the Capital of the Province.

THIS was heretofore one of the finest Cities in the Empire; but having been ruined as well the as whole Province in 1646, by the Civil Wars preceding the Change in the Monarchy, it retains nothing of its former Splendor: however it is still very populous, and of great Trade. Its District, which is very large, comprizing six Cities of the second, and twenty five of the third Rank, is interspers'd with navigable Canals, lin'd with hewn-Stone.

Ching-tu-fu, the Capital.

The Territory of Ching-tu is the only one that is plain in all the Province; it is water'd by Canals, cut from the Ta-kyang, which there is very gentle, and rather slow than swift; but when (after these Branches are re-united into one Channel, and augmented by the River Hin-sha-kyang) that River passes out of Se-chwen into Hu-quang, it becomes very dangerous; as well on account of the Rapidity of its Stream, as its being incumber'd with Rocks, which the Country is full of. The Ta-kyang cannot truly be said to be the broadest, deepest and most navigable River of China, till it has pass'd Kin-chew. The Breadth of its Mouth in the Oriental Ocean is almost seven Leagues; but at Ching-kyang-fu itself, the nearest City to the Sea, built on purpose to defend the Entrance of it, its Channel is scarce half a League broad: as it was found on measuring it with Instruments, from the famous Mountain Kin-shan, which stands in the middle of the River, by observing the Points whose Situations had been before determin'd. This shows how little Regard is to be had to computed Distances; for altho' that Part of the River is much frequented, the Chinese have err'd very much in their Estimation, on the side of Excess.

The Ta-kyang or Yang-tse-kyang.

The Second City, Pau-ning-fu.

THE Situation of this City between two Rivers, tho' small, renders it agreeable, and of pretty good Trade. Its Houses are well built. The Country depending on it, which abounds with Musk, is as it were cover'd with Mountains; which are stor'd with Stags and Deer, and for the most part afford no disagreeable Prospect, especially those that are cultivated and cover'd with Forests. It has ten Cities under its Jurisdiction, two of the second, and eight of the third Rank.

Pau ning-fu.

The Third City, Shun-king-fu.

THIS City, which stands on a fair River, has in its District two Cities of the second, and seven of the third Rank. It is surrounded with Mountains, whereof some are cover'd over with Orange-Trees; and affords more arable Lands than the Territory of the preceding City.

Shun-king-fu.

This Country yields abundance of Silk, Oranges of all sorts, the Root Scorzonera, and a kind of well tasted Chestnuts; but is remarkable for nothing else.

The

PROV. XI.
Se-chwen.

The Fourth City, Su-chew-fu. (A)

Su-chew-fu.

THE Situation of this City on the Banks of the Yang-tse-kyang renders it a Place of great Trade as well as Note; and opens a Communication with several other Cities of the Province, besides the Capital. The Country tho' mountainous is very fertile, wanting nothing that may contribute to the Pleasures or Conveniencies of Life.

The Canes, called by us Bambú, which the Chinese put to so many different uses, grow almost every where in the Territory of this City, which has ten Cities of the third Rank within its Jurisdiction.

The Fifth City, Chong-king-fu.

Chong-king-fu.

THIS is one of the handsomest and most trading Cities in the Province; reckoning within its District three Cities of the second, and eleven of the third Rank. It stands at the Confluence of two remarkable Rivers, which facilitate its Commerce with the whole Province; one of them is call'd Kin-sha-kyang or [the River of] Golden Sand, which in its Way from the Province of Yun-nan collects all the Waters of the Mountains on the side of Tartary; the other, which rises still further beyond the Borders of China, is properly the Ta-kyang, tho' it goes by divers Names according to the Place thro' which it passes; but after it has left Yo-chew-fu, it constantly retains the Name of Ta-kyang, or Yang-tse-kyang.

The Great Kyang.

Chong-king is built on a Mountain, where the Houses seem to rise one above another, in form of an Amphitheatre. The Country depending on it, which is of vast Extent, is intermixt with Plains and Mountains. The Air is healthful and temperate; they make very pretty Trunks here of Canes twisted and painted with divers Colours. The Rivers afford exceeding good Fish, whereof the Tortoises, especially, are much esteem'd.

The Sixth City, Quey-chew-fu. (B)

Quey-chew-fu.

AS this City, which stands on the great Yang-tse-kyang, appears as soon as ever we enter the Province, they have establish'd a Custom-House for receiving the Duties on Goods brought hither. Its Trade renders it very rich. Ten Cities are under its Jurisdiction, viz. one of the second, and nine of the third Rank. Altho' the Country is full of Mountains, yet the Industry of the Husbandman has made it very fertile, there not being so much as an Inch of Land uncultivated. It produces abundance of Musk, and of those Pits from whence they procure Salt; Orange and Limon-Trees are common. In the most Northerly Parts, the Mountains, which are very rugged, and difficult of Ascent, are inhabited by a very clownish sort of People, if compared with the Chinese Commonalty.

The Seventh City, Ma-hu-fu.

Ma-hu-fu.

THIS City, which is seated on the Kin-sha-kyang, has no more than one City of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction. Its Territory, tho' very small, is well watered, and very fruitful. Some of its Mountains are full of Stags, and its Situation procures it the Advantages of Trade.

The Eighth City, Long-ngan-fu.

Long-ngan-fu.

ALTHO' this City has only three of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction, yet it has always been look'd on as one of the most important Places in the Province, whereof it is, as it were, the Key: Hence it commands over several Forts, which were of greater use formerly than they are at present, to defend the Province from Invasions of the Tartars. The Country is intermixt with steep Mountains and fertile Valleys.

The Ninth City, Tfun-i-fu.

Tfun-i-fu.

THIS City is considerable for nothing, but because it lies on the Borders of the Province of Quey-chew, and may defend the Entrance of it on that side. It has in its District two Cities of the second, and four of the third Rank. The whole Country is very mountainous; notwithstanding which it is well watered, and fertile enough in several Parts.

The Tenth City, Tong-chwen-fu.

Tong-chwen-fu.

THIS is a military Place, as well as the Cities U-mong-tu-fu and Cbin-hyung-tu-fu; which are so call'd, because the Inhabitants are old Soldiers, who from Father to Son have been bred up to Arms. Besides their Pay, they have Lands assign'd them near the Cities they inhabit. These Troops are disbanded in time of Peace, but to make them amends, they are distributed into all the Frontier Garrisons of the Empire.

(A) In the Table of Latitude and Longitude it is Sui-chew-fu, but elsewhere as in this Place.

(B) In the Map, as here, Quey-chew-fu, but in the 1st Table mention'd p. 10. Note A, it is Wey-chew-fu, and in the 2^d Table Que-chew-fu. Besides Besides these Cities of the first Rank there are some others, which, tho' only of the second Rank, have peculiar Jurisdiction over certain Cities of the third Rank, and many Forts or Places of War, such as these following, viz.

Tong-chwen-chew, whose District is very fruitful, being watered by several Rivers. The Air is very healthful, and the Mountains as well as Plains well cultivated. The Country produces abundance of Canes, which yield exceeding good Sugar; and very populous Boroughs are seen in great Number.

Kya-ting-chew, whose Territory is watered by many Rivers, furnishes plenty of Rice and Musk.

Ya-chew lies nearest Tibet, and commands several Forts, built on the Borders of the Province.

PROVINCE XII. QUANG-TONG.

THIS is the most considerable of all the Southern Provinces. It is bounded on the North-East by that of Fo-kyen; on the North by Kyang-si, on the West by Quang-si and the Kingdom of Tong-king; the rest is wash'd by the Sea, where are a good Number of commodious Ports. It is divided into ten Countries, containing ten Cities of the first, and eighty four of the second and third Rank; exclusive of several Forts or military places, together with the City of Ma-kau, and Isle of San-çian; of both which I shall speak, because they are become famous in Europe.

The Country is partly plain, partly mountainous, and so fertile as to produce two Crops of Corn yearly. Whatever can contribute to the Pleasures of Life abounds here; it also furnishes Gold, precious Stones, Silk, Pearls, Pewter, Quicksilver, Sugar, Copper, Iron, Steel, Saltpeter, Ebony, Eagle-wood, and several sorts of Odoriferous Wood. There is likewise plenty of all sorts of Fruits, as Pomegranates, Grapes, Pears, Plumbs, Chestnuts, and Peaches; which tho' they do not ripen without Difficulty, would make pretty good Sweetmeats. There are others that are excellent in their kind, viz, Bananas, Ananas, Li-chi, Long-yuen, Oranges, and Limons of all sorts.

There is a particular sort of Limon, which grows on Trees, full as thorny as the Citron-Tree, but much larger; it bears white Flowers of an exquisite Odour, from which they distil a very pleasant Liquor. The Fruit is almost as big as a Man's Head; its Rind resembles that of other Oranges, but the Substance within is either white or reddish, and has a Taste between sweet and sower.

There is another sort of Fruit, the largest any where to be seen, which grows not on the Branches, but out of the Body of the Tree; its Rind is very hard, and within it has a great Number of little Cells, containing a yellow Pulp, which is very sweet and agreeable when the Fruit is full ripe.

Fish of all sorts are caught on the Coasts, besides Oysters, Lobsters, and very well tasted Crabs, and Tortoises of an extraordinary Size; the Chinese make an infinite Number of pretty Curiosities of their Shells. This Province abounds with wild and tame Peacocks, which are carry'd into the other Parts of the Empire; also a prodigious multitude of tame Ducks, which the Inhabitants breed with Care. They hatch their Eggs in Ovens or in Dung, and then carry them in little Boats to the Sea-Side, at low Water, to feed on Oysters, Cockles, and several Sea-Insects. As a great Number of Boats go together, consequently many Flocks of them are intermixt on the Shore; but as soon as the Owners strike on a Basin, every Flock returns to its own Boat, as Pidgeons do to their Houses.

Another Rarity of this Province is the Tree, which the Portuguese call Iron-Wood; and indeed it resembles Iron in Colour as well as Hardness and Weight, which last hinders it from swimming on the Water. There is also another particular Wood, which they call Rose-Wood, whereof the Chinese Joiners make Tables, Chairs and other Moveables: Its Colour is black, inclining to red, it is speckled with Veins, and painted naturally.

On the Coasts and in a Lake of the Island Hay-nan they catch Crabs, which, as they affirm, as soon as they are taken out of the Water, become as hard as Flints; and prove, as they say, a good Remedy against burning Fevers.

There grows also on the Mountains a prodigious Quantity of a wonderful kind of Oziers or Willows, no thicker than one's Finger. It creeps along the Ground, and shoots forth very long Sprigs resembling twisted Cords, which so embarrass the Way, that the Stags themselves know not how to extricate themselves.

This Ozier, which is very pliable and tough, serves for making Cables and Ropes for Shipping; they divide them into very thin Slips, whereof they make Baskets, Paniers, Hurdles, Chairs, and very commodious Mats, which the Chinese generally lie on in Summer, because they are cool.

Quang-tong.
Natives good at imitating.

As Quang-tong is a Maritime Province, and most remote from the Court, its Government is one of the most considerable in the Empire. He who is Tsong-tu of it, is also Tsong-tu of Quang-si; and for that Reason resides at Chau-king, to be the nearer at Hand for giving his Orders relating to that Province.

The First City, Quang-chew-fu, Capital of the Province.

Quang-chew-fu.

THE City which the Chinese name Quang-chew, is the same which Europeans call Kan-ton (A). It is one of the most populous and opulent in China; and perhaps deserves the first Place in this respect, since to the Trade of the neighbouring Nations it hath added that of Europe. Besides it stands on one of the finest Rivers in the Empire, which they have Reason to name Ta-bo, [or the great River] especially at Kan-ton; because in its way from the Province of Quang-si, it receives another River deep enough to bring up large Vessels from the Sea to the Town, and by means of Canals extends its Waters into divers Provinces. Its Mouth is large, and more terrible for its Name Hu-men, that is, the Tiger's Gate, than its Forts, which are built only to keep off the Chinese Pirates. The sides of this River, the neighbouring Plains, even the little Hills themselves are well cultivated, and stor'd with Rice, or a kind of Trees, which are always green.

The great Quantity of Money, which is brought hither from the most distant Countries, draws the Merchants of the several Provinces to this Port, where almost every thing that is curious and rare in the Empire may be found. The Inhabitants are besides very laborious, ingenious, and above all exceeding skilful in imitating any Pattern, as has been already observed, and embellishing their Manufactures: which however are not much esteem'd at Pe-king, because the Workmen there undervalue them, as being neither substantial nor well wrought; for generally the Materials they are made of, are too scanty or ill chosen, or else the Workmanship within is too slight.

Silks.

Nevertheless the Silks made at Kan-ton, call'd Sba, are reckon'd at Pe-king the best of that kind; especially the flower'd sorts, which are wrought open like Lace, and very much worn in Summer, because they are cheap and genteel.

Fo-shan.

Tho' the Number of Artificers in this City is almost incredible, yet not being sufficient for its Trade, they have establish'd a great many Manufactories at Fo-shan, which has render'd it famous thro' the whole Province. During the Troubles wherein Kan-ton was involv'd, the Trade was carry'd to this Borough, which is within four Leagues of it; it is at least three Leagues in Compass, is a Place of great Resort, and in short not inferior to Kan-ton, either for Wealth or Number of Inhabitants; tho' that City taken altogether is reported to contain upwards of a Million of Souls: which is the more credible, considering its great Extent, and vast Concourse of People continually in the Streets, altho' one scarce ever sees a Woman among them.

The Vice-Roy resides at Kan-ton, which has under its Jurisdiction seventeen Cities, one of the second, and sixteen of the third Rank.

There can hardly be a more charming Landkip than what offers itself on entering the River that leads to the Town. It is various, animated and gay; on one side Meadows of a most lovely Green extend out of Sight, on the other Groves appear, or little Hills which rise in form of Amphitheatres, and are ascended by Steps made of green Sods. Sometimes Rocks are seen cover'd with Moss; at other times Villages are discover'd among the Copses; sometimes Canals present themselves, which form Islands, or losing themselves in the Earth expose to view their beautiful Banks; in short the whole Prospect is enchanting.

Kan-ton is very large, and, as it were, three Cities united in one; which are separated by fair high Walls, but so contiguous that the same Gate serves to pass from one to the other. The whole forms a Figure almost square, and is not much less in Compass than Paris; those who live at a Distance from the Center, are sometimes a whole Hour going to make a Visit in a Chair, and yet there are no very large Gardens or waste Grounds in the City; only there are some pretty good Squares, which are agreeable enough.

The Streets are long and straight, paved with very hard hewn-Stone, and extremely neat, but all narrow, excepting a few, which are adorn'd with Triumphal Arches at certain Distances. They are wholly taken up with Shops, and as some of them are cover'd, the best Shops are there. The Streets are full of People, especially Porters, who commonly go bare-footed and bare-headed; or else wear a Straw Hat, of a vast Circumference, and an odd Figure, to defend them from the Sun or Rain. Most of them are seen loaden with Burdens, for they have no Conveniency here for carrying Goods but the Shoulders of Men. Persons of Condition are carry'd in Chairs.

The Houses, tho' very neat, are far from being stately; almost all of them consist of a Ground-Floor, and are built of Earth, ornamented with Bricks, and cover'd with Tiles. Yet

Kan-ton

(A) Kan-ton is a Corruption of Quang-tong, the Name of the Province. P. Bouvet, p. 61, shews how it came in use. It is one great Fault of this Relation, that the proper Names and Terms are seldom explained; for the Table of Terms is far from taking in all.

Kan-ton is not destitute of handsome Buildings. The Idol Temples, surrounded with Cells of the Bonzas, have something singular in them: And the Hall of Confucius, as well as the Academy where the Literati assemble to compose their Exercises, are curious Structures. The Ta-men or Palaces of the Mandarins, are also beautiful and grand; tho' in a different Respect from what we term so in Europe.

Prov. XII.
Quang-tong.

The River is crowded on both sides with a prodigious Number of Barks in several Rows, which contain an infinite Quantity of People, and make a kind of floating City. These Barks lying close together form Streets; each Bark contains a whole Family, and like Houses is divided into different Apartments; the common People who inhabit them, go out betimes in the Morning, either to fish, or work at the Rice, which yields two Crops every Year. At the End of each Street there is a Barrier, which is shut every Evening soon after the Gates of the City; so that every Body is obliged to be at home by the time it grows dark. This Regulation prevents many Disorders in China, where the greatest Cities are as quiet in the Night-time as if they consisted but of single Families.

The Second City, Shau-chew-fu.

THIS City is situate between two navigable Rivers, which meet at the Place where it is built; one of them comes from Nan-byong, and the other from the Province of Hu-fu. The Bank of the River on the West-Side is joined to the City by a Bridge of Boats, and well inhabited. The whole Country, which is scattered over with Boroughs, produces abundance of Rice, Herbage, Fruits, Cattle and Fish; but the Air is not healthful, so that often from the middle of October to December a great Number of the Inhabitants are carry'd off by the Distempers that reign there. Six Cities of the third Rank are dependant on it; near one of which there grow black Reeds, which look like Ebony, whereof they make various Musical Instruments.

Three Miles from Shau-chew there is a celebrated Monastery of the Bonzas, which formerly, they affirm, contained a thousand of them; nothing can be more charming than its Situation. In the middle of a great Mountain, where it stands, call'd Nan-wha, one discovers an agreeable Defart, which extends along a vast Plain, intirely encompass'd with little Hills; on the Tops of which they have planted Rows of Fruit-Trees, and from Space to Space Thickets, of Evergreens. The Country round about belongs to this Monastery, which they say was founded eight or nine hundred Years ago.

The Devil, who is the Imitator of God's Works, has his Penitents as well as his Virgins and Martyrs. They pretend that the Founder of this Monastery, whose Body is worship'd here, spent his Life in the most dreadful Mortification; and that Worms having bred in the Sores, made in his Flesh by an Iron Chain which he wore about him, he took so much Care to improve his Sufferings, that he gather'd them up as fast as they drop'd off his Body, and put them in their Place again, saying, That there was still something to feed on.

The Bonzas his Successors follow his Example, but very ill; for tho' they make Profession of Chastity, it is said they are given to all sorts of Debaucheries. Formerly great Complaints were made by the People, who came hither in Pilgrimage, that they robbed and plundered them; but at present Care is taken to prevent the like.

The Third City, Nan-hyong-fu. (A)

THIS is a large trading City, and one of the most frequented in the Empire. It stands at the Foot of a Mountain, (separating the Provinces of Quang-tong and Kyang-fi) from which two large Rivers descend, whereof one runs Southward, the other Northward; this last is divided into so many Branches that none of its Waters are lost, which are continually swell'd with the Streams that fall from the Mountains. This City has only two Cities of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction.

Between Nan-byong, which is the last City of the Province of Quang-tong, and Nan-ngan the first City of Kyang-fi, ten Leagues distant, lies a great Mountain, call'd Mey-lin; over which there is a remarkable Road, above three Miles in length, with Precipices on each side; but as the Way is pretty wide, Travellers are in no Danger from Accidents.

On the Top of the Mountain, from whence one may see a great Way into both Provinces, there is a sort of Temple built in Honour and to the Memory of the Mandarin who caused this admirable Road to be made, which is the most famous throughout China; because whatever comes either from the East or South, must pass that Way; whence it is almost continually throng'd with People, as much as the Streets of great Cities. The Merchants of the several Provinces have very lately caused a Stone Monument to be erected here, at their own Expence; whereon is inscribed the Elogy of the Vice-Roy, who had the Care of the Custom-Houses of the Province of Quang-tong, and caused the Duties to be considerably lessen'd.

(A) In the Map, Nan-jong, and in the Table of Divisions, p. 6. Work, nor is it easy to determine which is the true Orthography. Differences of these kinds are very common in this Prov. XII.

Quangtong.Whey-chew-fu.The Fourth City, Whey-chew-fu.

THIS City is almost furrounded with Water; and the Lands about it, which are the best in the Province, are irrigated by abundance of Springs. It has under its Jurisdiction one City of the second Rank, and ten of the third.

The whole Country, which lies near the Sea, abounds with Fish, Oysters, Lobsters, very well tasted Crabs, besides extraordinary large Tortoises, of whose Shells the Chinese make all sorts of Toys. There are two remarkable Bridges at Whey-chew, one of forty Arches, which covers the two Rivers that meet on the East-side; the other is to the West, built over a little Lake, that washes the Walls of the City. This Lake which is but three Miles in Compass, is lined with Stone quite round; and the sides of it are embellish'd with Gardens, and stately Trees. There are two Islands in it which are adorn'd with Pleasure-Houses, and joined by a fine Stone Bridge.

In a Mountain of this District they catch Butterflies, remarkable for their Beauty and Size; which are sent to Court, and employ'd in certain Ornaments of the Palace, described elsewhere.

*The Fifth City, Chau-chew-fu.*Chau-chew-
fu.

THIS City stands near the Mouth of the River Han-kyang, the Sea flowing up to its Walls. It has a magnificent Bridge on the East-side, which is very long, and proportionably wide. Its District contains eleven Cities of the third Rank.

This Country is separated by Mountains from the Province of Fo-kyen, and so well water'd, that the Soil is every where very fertile; excepting in some Places, where it is stony and incapable of Tillage.

The Sixth City, Chau-king-fu.

Chau-king-fu.

IN this City, which, according to those who are Judges, is the best built and handsomest in the whole Province, the Tsong-tu of the Provinces of Quang-tong and Yuan-si resides. It is situate by the River Ta-bo, on whose East-side appears a beautiful Tower, nine Stories high. The Port is very spacious, lying at the Confluence of three Rivers, or great Streams, one of which goes to Kan-ton. This Stream is so restrain'd between two Hills, that often in the time of Rain it overflows.

From Chau-king to Kan-ton, both sides of the River are beset with large Villages, so near each other, that they seem to make but one. Among the rest there is one upon the left Hand, of an extraordinary Length, containing near two hundred Houses; which appear like square Towers, and serve the Inhabitants to retire to with their Effects, in time of Rebellion, or the sudden Attack of Robbers. Afterwards you come to the Village Fo-shan, said to contain a Million of People.

Village Fo-shan contains 1,000,000
Souls.

There are, upon the River only, upwards of five thousand Barks, each as long as our midling Ships, and containing an intire Family; without reckoning an infinite Number of Fishing-Boats, and Canoes for crossing from one side to the other; there being no Bridges over these great Rivers.

This Country abounds with wild and tame Peacocks, which are rarely seen in the other Provinces, unless they be brought thither; also with Eagle-Wood and the Pao de Rosa, or Rose-Wood, as the Portuguese call it, of which the Chinese make divers very curious Moveables. The Mountains likewise produce large Trees, which they call Iron-Wood, on account of its Hardness and Weight.

Chau-king has under its Jurisdiction one City of the second, and five of the third Rank.

The Seventh City, Kau-chew-fu.

Kau-chew-fu.

THE Tide comes up as far as this City, so that the Chinese Ships of Burthen may sail up to it; which Conveniency, with the Fertility of its Land, causes great Plenty. It presides over one City of the second, and five of the third Rank.

This District is inclosed partly by the Sea, and partly by Mountains, which are as Walls to it. Here are abundance of excellent Birds of Prey; also a sort of Stone nearly resembling Marble, which naturally represents Water, Mountains, and Landships. The Chinese cut it into Leaves, whereof they make Tables and other Furniture.

Petrefying
Crabs.

The Sea produces a kind of Crab, much like the common sort, which have this extraordinary Quality, that when they are out the Water, they petrefy, without losing their natural Form. The Chinese Physicians use them as an excellent Remedy against burning Fevers.

The

The Eighth City, Lyen-chew-fu.

Prov. XII.
Quangtong.

THIS City stands near the Sea, which there forms a very commodious Port for Barks, and Ships of Burden. Its District is but of small Extent, comprizing only one City of the second, and two of the third Rank.

The Country borders on the Kingdom of Tong-king, from which it is separated by inaccessible Mountains. It affords plenty of Peacocks; they fish here for Pearls, and make several pretty Works of Tortoise-Shell.

The Ninth City, Lwi-chew-fu.

THE Territory belonging to this City, is the most agreeable and plentiful in all the Western Part of the Province. It is almost surrounded by the Sea, being separated from the Island of Hay-nan, only by a small Streight; where, it is said, there was formerly a Pearl-Fishery.

It abounds with Boroughs, whose Inhabitants subsist by fishing on the Coasts, which afford plenty of all sorts of Fish. The creeping Ozier, consisting of long Shoots, resembling twisted Cords, whereof the Chinese make an infinite Number of pretty Works*, grows every where in the District of this City; which has subordinate to it three Cities of the third Rank.

* See before, P. 113.

The Tenth City, Kyun-chew-fu (A), Capital of the Island of Hay-nan.

HAY-NAN, which signifies South of the Sea, is a great Island, having to the North, the Province of Quang-tong (B), whereto it belongs, which may be seen distinctly when the Sky is clear; on the South, the Channel form'd by the Bank of Paracel, with the Eastern Coast of Cochin china; on the West, part of the same Kingdom, and that of Tong-king; and on the East, the Sea of China.

Its greatest Length from East to West is between sixty and seventy Leagues, and its Breadth from North to South, between forty and fifty; so that it is near a hundred and sixty Leagues in Circumference.

On the North side, the Country is plain for fifteen Leagues from the Coast; but on the South and East side, it is covered with very high Mountains. It is only between these Mountains, and those which possess the middle part of the Isle, that one meets with cultivated Plains; and even these Plains, altho' they contain but a very small Portion of the Land, are also in many Places sandy and uncultivated. However the great Number of Rivers, and frequent Rains that follow the Change of Seasons, render the Rice Fields fertile enough; and as they have often two Harvests a Year, the Produce suffices for the Inhabitants, tho' pretty numerous.

The Climate of the Southern part is very unwholesome, especially on account of the Water, which according to the Chinese is noxious; wherefore they take Care to boil every Morning a Quantity that may serve for the whole Day.

Air unwholesome.

Kyun-chew-fu, the Capital of Hay-nan, is situate on a Promontory; and Ships come to Anchor under its very Walls. Two sorts of Mandarins command here, as in all other Parts of China, viz. Literary Mandarins, and Military Mandarins, or Officers of War. It has under its Jurisdiction three Cities of the second, and ten of the third Rank, which are almost all on the Sea Coast.

Kyun-chew-fu.

The greater Part of the Island is subject to the Emperor of China; none but the Country in the middle, named Li-mu-shan or Chi-shan being independent. It is inhabited by a free People, who have never yet been conquered, or acknowledged the Authority of the Mandarins; being obliged to abandon the plain Country to the Chinese, they have retreated to the Mountains in the Center of the Island, where they are shelter'd from all their Insults.

Li-mu-shan, or Chi-shan, inhabited by an independent People.

These People had formerly an open Correspondence with the Chinese: Twice a Year they exposed to Sale the Gold, which they dug out of their Mines, and their Eagle and Calamba Wood, so much esteem'd by all the Eastern People. One deputed by them was sent to examine the Chinese Linens and Wares on the Frontiers, while the Principal among the Chinese Merchants repair'd to the Mountains to view their Commodities; the Bargain being made, the Chinese Goods were first carried thither, after which they faithfully deliver'd them the Things they had agreed for; by this Traffic the Chinese made an immense Gain, whereof the Governor had the greater part.

The Emperor Kang-bi, being informed of the prodigious Quantity of Gold which his Mandarins acquired by this Commerce, for that and other Reasons, forbid all his Subjects, under Pain of Death, to have any Correspondence with these People. However, some secret Emissaries of the neighbouring Governors, still find means of getting to them by Stealth; but the Profits arising from this clandestine Trade, for these thirty Years past, are very inconsiderable to what they used to be.

(A) In the Geographical Table as well as the Text, it is written Kian; but in the Map, King, which according to our way of spelling will be Kyun-chew-fu.

Prov. XII.
Quang-
tong.

These Islanders therefore scarce ever appear, unless when they are moved, either by Caprice, or the Remembrance of their ancient Liberty, to invade the neighbouring Chinese Villages. They have now and then attempted to surprize some of them; but are such Cowards, and so badly disciplined, that fifty Chinese, tho' far from being good Soldiers, would defeat 1000 of them, their very Looks being enough to put them to flight. Nevertheless there are other Islanders more tractable, who, paying Tribute to the Emperor, are suffered to possess several entire Villages in the Plains, because they hold no Correspondence with those of the Mountains. Many others put themselves into the Service of the Chinese, keep their Sheep, till their Lands, and are subject to the common Days-Work, appointed by the Governors of the different Places; these are dispersed thro' the Plain in the East and South part of the Island; and generally speaking are very deform'd, short, and of a reddish Colour.

Habit.

Both Men and Women wear their Hair in a Ring on the Forehead, and on their Heads a Hat made of Straw or Rattan, tied under the Chin with two Strings. Their Habit consists of a Piece of Callico, either black, or of a deep Blew, which covers them from the Waist to the Knees. The Women wear a kind of Waist-Coat of the same, and are farther distinguish'd by blue Streaks on their Faces, made with Indigo, from their Eyes downwards. Both Sexes wear Gold and Silver Ear-Rings, shap'd like a Pear, and very well made.

Arms.

Their Arms are Bows and Arrows, which they are not very expert at; and a kind of Hanger, which they carry in a little Basket, fasten'd to their Girdle behind. This is all the Tools they have for doing their Carpenters Work; and to cut Wood and Bushes, when they cross Forests.

Mines.

Besides the Mines of Gold in the Heart of the Island, there are others in the North part, of the Lapis Armenus, which they carry to Kan-ton, and is used in painting all the blue Porcelain. The best Wood, both for Scent and Carving, comes from the Mountains of Hay-nan; from whence the present Emperor caused a Quantity to be brought, at a vast Expence, sufficient to build a Palace design'd for his Burying-Place.

Sweet Woods.

The most precious of these Woods, next to the Eagle-Wood, is the Wha-li, call'd by Europeans, Rose or Violet Wood, on account of its Scent. There is also a yellow Wood, which is very beautiful and incorruptible; whereof Pillars of a certain Thickness, are of an immense Price, and reserved as well as the Wha-li for the Emperors Service.

Produce.

This Island, besides the several kinds of Fruits found in China, produces much Sugar, Tobacco, and Cotton. Indigo is common here; to which if we add the Harvest of the Arca-Nut, the Crop of Rattan, with the different sorts of Fish taken on the Coasts, which are dry'd and salted for Exportation; nobody need wonder that twenty or thirty thousand pretty large Jonks should arrive here every Year from Kan-ton, or scruple to to rank Hay-nan among the most considerable Islands of Asia, on account of its Situation, Magnitude, and Riches.

Ports.

The Port, where almost all the Barks of Kan-ton come, is in the North-side of the Island, and form'd by a pretty large River, whose Mouth is defended by two small Forts; but as it has not above ten or twelve Feet Water, Vessels, made after a different Manner from the Chinese, would find it difficult to enter. Trade brings thither all the Merchants in the Island, who have their Factors in other Parts. The Capital City stands about two Leagues from this Port; between them is a great Plain, full of beautiful Chinese Sepulchres, among which there is one with a Cross on it, where lies interred an Italian Jesuit, the first Missionary who landed on this Island.

On the Southern Coast, where the Company's Ships have put in, there is one of the best Ports to be met with, at the Bottom of a great Bay; where Vessels ride at Anchor in twenty Feet Water, within Pistol-shot of the Shore, and six Ships may continue, during both the Monsoons, in the greatest Security.

On the Shores of this Port grow several Maritime Plants and Mandrepores (c) of all kinds; also some Trees which yield Dragons Blood, and several others of different sorts; from which, an Incision being made, there distills a white Juice, that as it hardens, turns red; but is not of a Consistence like Gum or Rosin. This Matter cast into a Perfume Pot, burns slowly, and diffuses a Scent less strong, and more agreeable, than Incense.

There is found among the Rocks, at no great Depth of Water, a certain little blue Fish, which resembles the Dolphin more than the Dorado, and is in greater Esteem with the Chinese than the Golden Fish; but, unluckily, they live only a few Days out of their Element.

Tho' we cannot absolutely deny what is reported in Travellers, of a Lake in this Island, having the Virtue of petrifying whatever is thrown into it; yet there is great Reason to doubt it, because the Islanders know nothing of the Matter; that which may have given Occasion to this Opinion, is those counterfeit Petrifications, which the Chinese make to Perfection, and are very common at Kan-ton. They tell us also, that Pearls are found no where in such Abundance as on the Northern Coasts of this Island; but however true this might have been formerly, it is certain, that at present there is no such thing: Indeed some very small ones are gotten on the Coast of Quang-si, which are very dear; but the Pearls one meets with in China, come from the Indies.

Apes.

Among the Animals, this Island breeds a curious kind of great black Apes, whose Physiognomy very nearly resembles the Human, so distinct are the Features; but this Species is scarce. There are others of a grey Colour, which are very ugly and common.

(c) The Mandrepore is a Sea Plant resembling White Coral.

Hay-nan abounds with Game; indeed the Partridges, Quails, and Hares are inferior to those of Europe, but Snipes, Teal, and all sorts of Water-Fowl are very good. There is a kind of Wood-Hen of an excellent Relish. Turtle-Doves are in great plenty, as well as two sorts of Wood-Pigeons. Stags, and Maron-Hogs, which are a kind of wild Boars, are very common.

Prov. XII.
Quang-tong.

Here are also several sorts of curious Birds, as Ravens with white Rings about their Necks, like Cravats; Starlings, which have a little Moon on their Bills; Black-Birds of a deep blue Colour, with yellow Ears, half an Inch long, which speak and whistle in Perfection; little Birds, the Bigness of a Linnet, whose Feathers are of a most beautiful Red, and others of a very bright Gold Colour; which two sorts of Birds, tho' of different kinds are always together.

Considering the Islanders travel both by Day and Night thro' the Plains and thick Woods, without Arms, and almost always bare-foot, the Reptiles of Hay-nan cannot be dangerous; and tho' it breeds Serpents and Snakes of a monstrous size, yet they are so timorous, that the least Noise frights them away.

The Port of Ma-kau.

THIS Port is famous for the great Trade carry'd on by the Portuguese (who have been in Possession of it above a Century) when they were Masters of a considerable Part of the Indies; but now they have only a Fortress with a very small Garrison, being in no Condition to maintain many Soldiers.

The Port of Ma-kau.

The City is built on a little Peninsula, or, if you will, a small Island, because it is separated from the Land by a River, which is enlarged by the Tides. It is join'd to the rest of the Island by a very narrow Isthmus, across which they have built a Wall.

Those who are at Anchor without, see nothing on all hands but Isles, which form a great Circle; with two or three Fortresses on the Eminences, and some Houses at the end of the Town. These Houses and Fortresses seem to be built on a very high Land, bounding the View on that side; but between this Land, (which indeed is a pretty large Island) and Ma-kau, there is a safe and commodious Port, along whose Shores the City extends.

The Houses are built after the European Fashion, but somewhat low. The Chinese are more numerous than the Portuguese, who are almost all Mongrels, born in the Indies or at Ma-kau, and not being very rich, are in no Esteem with the Chinese.

The Fortifications belonging to Ma-kau are pretty good, and well provided with Cannon; but the Garrison is very weak, and as the Chinese supply it with all Necessaries, they are at no Pains to become Masters of it.

There is in the Place a Portuguese Governor, and a Chinese Mandarin, on whom the whole Country depends; his Palace stands in the middle of the City, and whatever he would have done, the Portuguese must obey, especially where the Interest of the Chinese is concern'd.

The Portuguese obtain'd this Settlement in the following Manner: During the Reign of Hong-chi the Europeans traded either at Kan-ton, or Ning-po, in the Province of Che-kyang; but in the time of Kya-tsing, a Pirate named Chang-si-lau, who infested the Seas of Kan-ton, having seiz'd Ma-kau, and besieg'd the Capital of the Province; the Mandarins desir'd the Assistance of the Europeans on Board the Merchantmen, who oblig'd the Pirate to raise the Siege, and pursuing him to Makau, slew him there. The Emperor being inform'd of this Victory, by the Tsong-tu, publish'd a Decree, whereby he gave Ma-kau to those European Merchants, in order to settle there.

The Island of Shang-chwen-shan, or Sançian.

THE Death of S. Francis Xavier, the Apostle of the Indies, and his Tomb, which is still to be seen in this Island, have render'd it remarkable. The Tomb stands on an Eminence at the Foot of a Hill; beside it is a little Plain, cover'd on one side with Trees, and adorn'd on the other with several Gardens.

The Island of Shang-chwen-shan, or Sançian.

The Island is not desert, as is reported; for there are five Villages in it, inhabited by poor Fishermen, who live on the Fish they take, and a little Rice which they sow. Here is a Chappel built by the Portuguese Jesuits, about thirty Years ago; it is only of Plaister, but looks very pretty, the Chinese having japan'd it over with red and blue Varnish.

PROVINCE XIII. QUANG-SI.

THIS Province is situate between those of Quang-tong, Quoy-chew, Yun-nan, and the Kingdom of Tong-king. It contains twelve Cities of the first Rank, and four-score of the second and third. It produces such plenty of Rice, that for six Months of the Year it furnishes the Province of Quang-tong, which otherwise would not be able to support its numerous Inhabitants.

Mines of

Plant produ-

Insects that make white Wax.

Notwithstanding which it is not to be compared to most of the other Provinces, either for Extent, Beauty, or Trade. Altho' it is water'd by many Rivers, yet only the Parts towards the East and South, are well improv'd, being a flat Country and the Air mild; almost every where else, especially towards the North, it is incumber'd with Mountains cover'd with thick Forests.

There are in this Province Mines of all sorts of Metals, especially Gold and Silver; which the Chinese out of Policy have always prohibited to be open'd, for fear of occasioning Disturbances. A certain Chain of Mountains having been known, for a long time past, to contain Mines of Gold, Silver, Tin, Copper, and Lead; some Years ago the Governor of a City of the first Rank, in whose District they are, presented a Memorial to the Emperor, wherein he shew'd how to prevent Inconveniencies. Among the rest, he observ'd that the Inhabitants offer'd to open them at their own Expence; and propos'd that none, either of this or the neighbouring Provinces, should be permitted to work at them, without a Patent from his Mandarin, besides four Persons Security for his Conduct.

The Emperor having sent this Memorial to be examin'd by the Hu-pu, that Court, which superintends the Revenues, approv'd of it, conditionally that, according to what is practis'd on like Occasions, the Undertakers should give forty per Cent to the Emperor, and five per Cent to the Officers and Soldiers, who presided over the Work. Afterwards the Emperor reserv'd the Gold Mine wholly to himself, and work'd it at his own Expence. There is in this Province a pretty extraordinary Tree, which instead of Pith contains a soft Substance, that serves for Meal, and does not taste amiss. Here are abundance of those Insects, spoken of before, which produce the white Wax. The Cinnamon that grows here, diffuses a more agreeable Odour, than that of the Island of Ceylan (v), and the Silks that are made, bear a good Price; in short, this Country breeds Parrots, Porcupines, and Rhinoceroses.

The First City, Quey-ling-fu, Capital of the Province.

Quey-ling-fu.

THIS City stands on a River (g) that falls into the Ta-bo; and runs with such Rapidity thro' the narrow Valleys, that, tho' it is large, it is not navigable, or of any use for Trade.

The City is remarkable for being built partly after the Manner of our antient Fortifications; but is much inferior to most of the other Capitals.

Etymol. of Quey-ling.

Quey-ling signifies the Forest of the Flowers of Quey; because the Flower call'd Quey, tho' pretty common throughout China, is more plenty in this Province, and especially in the Territory of this City, than elsewhere.

The Flower
Quey.

The Tree which produces it, is very large, with Leaves resembling those of the Lawrel; it is little, yellow, and grows in Bunches; it does not remain long on the Tree, and when it falls, another comes in its Place. In Autumn the Tree is cover'd over with these Flowers, whose agreeable Smell perfumes the whole Country.

Best Stones for making Ink.

In this District are found the best Stones which the Literati use to make their Ink of; and Birds whose Feathers are variegated with very bright Colours, and woven in their Silks.

Quey-ling has under its Jurisdiction only two Cities of the second, and seven of the third Rank. It is almost wholly encompassed with savage and barbarous People, who are settled in the Mountains. I have already given an account of them, distinguishing those who are subject to the Chinese Mandarins, from those who live in a State of Independency.

The Second City, Lyew-chew-fu.

Lyew-chew-fu.

THE Territory of this City is of great Extent, and well water'd, but full of Mountains, which however abound with Simples, much used by the Physicians. Two Cities of the second, and ten of the third Rank depend on it.

Vu-fwen-byen.

Among these latter, Vu-fwen-byen is famous on account of the lively and subtil Wit of its Inhabitants. There is scarce an Examination at Pe-king for the Degree of Doctor, but several Literati of this City obtain it, who are afterwards employ'd in some of the Governments or Magistracies.

The Third City, Kin-ywen-fu. (F)

Kin-ywen-fu.

THO' this City is built on a large River, yet it is not the more agreeable; for besides being encompassed with frightful Mountains, those of Quey-chew, which are inaccessible, and inhabited by People who are half Savage, are in its Neighbourhood.

The Valleys lying between these frightful Mountains are interspersed with Villages and Forts. Gold is gather'd out of its Rivers, and the Areka is found every where. Two Cities of the second, and five of the third Rank depend on its Jurisdiction.

(v) More properly Seylan, or Selan with an S.

(g) According to the Map, it stands on a sort of Lake.

(F) Here the Name agrees with the Map, but in both the Tables it is spelled, King-ywen-fu.

The Fourth City, Se-nghen-fu.

Prov XIII.
Quang-fu.
Se-nghen-fu.

THE District of this City is of no great Extent, containing only one City of the second Rank, and two of the third. It is encompassed with Mountains, whose Inhabitants, who were formerly rude, and half Barbarians, but have become civiliz'd by Degrees, since they were incorporated with the Empire.

The Fifth City, Ping-lo-fu.

THIS City stands on a River, which, tho' large, is hardly navigable. It runs among very narrow Valleys, interspersed with Rocks, which makes it full of Water-Falls. Its Jurisdiction contains one City of the second, and seven of the third Rank.

All these Cities are environ'd with Mountains, which render the Country disagreeable; some of them however are cover'd with Orange-Trees; abundance of that white Wax, made by certain Insects, is found here, whereof I have spoken more than once already.

The Sixth City, U-chew-fu.

ALL the Rivers of the Province meet near this City, which borders on Quang-tong; whence it is look'd on as the most considerable for Trade, and of greatest Importance, because it is the Key of that Province. Its District comprizes one City of the second, and nine of the third Rank.

The Country is partly plain, and partly mountainous. It produces Red Lead, and a remarkable Tree, nam'd Quang-lang; which instead of Pith contains a soft Substance, employ'd to the same Use as Meal, and of no disagreeable Taste.

Besides the common Animals of China, one meets here with the Rhinoceros; and a kind of Apes, with yellow Hair, which by their Shape, and Shrieks of their Yell, have a great Resemblance of Dogs.

The Seventh City, Sin-chew-fu. (A)

THIS City stands at the Confluence of two Rivers, in an agreeable Country, if compar'd with the rest of the Province. The Forests and Mountains, wherewith it is encompassed, have something inexpressibly gay and smiling, especially to such as come from those steep Mountains, on the Spot which strike the Eye with nothing but what is frightful and melancholy.

The Country produces a sort of Cinnamon, much inferior to that of Ceylan, in Goodness and Smell; also those Trees, whose Wood is so hard that it has the Name of Iron-Wood. They make Cloth of a certain Grass, which sometimes bears a greater Price, than the common Silks. A kind of yellow Earth is found here, which they say is a sovereign Remedy against all sorts of Poison. The District of this City is not considerable, containing no more than three Cities of the third Rank.

The Eighth City, Nan-ning-fu.

THE Place where this City stands, is almost surrounded with Rivers, and little Lakes. Four Cities of the second, and three of the third Rank are within its District, which is intermixt with Plains and Mountains.

Great Parrots are found here, that are easily taught to speak; also a kind of Powl, which discharges out of its Mouth Threads of Cotton; and very large Porcupines, which dart very long and sharp Quills at those who approach them. Some of its Mountains produce Iron Mines.

The Ninth City, Tay-ping-fu.

THIS City is situate in an Elbow made by a large River, by which it is inclosed on three sides, and fortify'd on the fourth by a Wall running from one Branch of that River to the other.

The Country depending on it is the best in the whole Province. The Soil is fertile, very populous, and well cultivated. It contains a great Number of Forts, as bordering on the Kingdom of Tong-king.

The Inhabitants are look'd on as Barbarians by the Chinese, because they have not much Politeness, and shew a Roughness in their Behaviour, very different from the Chinese Affability. The District of this City contains twelve Cities of the second, and two of the third Rank.

(A) In the Table Page 6. Tsin cheu fu.

PROV. XIII.
Quang-fu.
Se-ming-fu.

The Tenth City, Se-ming-fu. (B)

STANDS also near the Borders of Tong-king, in a mountainous Country, and not far from the Pillar, which the Tong-kingese have erected to serve for the Limits of their Kingdom, as I have elsewhere remark'd. Its Mountains furnish abundance of Wood, and its District contains only four Cities of the second Rank.

The Country produces all the Necessaries of Life, but the Inhabitants are not near so polite as those of other Parts of the Empire.

The Eleventh City, Chin-ngan-fu.

Chin-ngan-fu.

AS great Part of the District of this City depends on Tong-king, it contains only one City of the second Rank. It was formerly no more than a pitiful Borough, which was afterwards enlarg'd, and inclosed with Walls, in order to make it a City of the first Rank.

The Manners of its Inhabitants does not differ much from those of the Chinese. The Country produces all the Necessaries of Life, and among the rest much Honey and Wax.

The Twelfth City, Se-chin-fu. (c)

Se-chin-fu.

THE District of this City is inconsiderable, containing only two Cities of the second Rank. It is situate almost at the Spring of two little Rivers, which meet near its Walls. The Country is partly plain, partly mountainous. It borders on Yun-nan, and is full of populous Boroughs.

PROVINCE XIV. YUN-NAN.

PROV. XIV.
Yun-nan.
Bounds.

THIS Province, being one of the richest of the Empire, is bounded on one side by the Provinces of Se-chuen, Quey-chew, and Quang-fu; and on the other by Tibet, some savage Nations little known, and the Kingdoms of Ava, Pegu, Laos, and Tong-king. It contains twenty one Cities of the first Rank, and fifty five of the second and third. It is water'd every where by Rivers, whereof several take their Rise from considerable Lakes, which are in the Province, and render it very fruitful.

Gold Sand.

All sorts of Necessaries are very cheap here. The Gold alone that is gathered out of the Sand of the Rivers and Torrents, which descend from the Mountains situate in the Western part of the Province, amounts to a considerable Sum; whence it may be judged that those Mountains contain Gold-Mines, which would produce immense Riches, were they suffer'd to be open'd.

Mines of white Copper

Red Amber, precious Stones, Frankincense and Marble.

Besides the Mines of common Copper, found also in some other Provinces, there are some of a singular kind, named Pe-tong, which is white, both within and without. It produces red Amber, but no yellow; in a word, Rubies, Saphirs, Agats, Pearls, precious Stones, Musk, Silk, Benjamin, a sort of Frankincense, which is much esteem'd, Lapis Armenus, and very beautiful Marble. Some of this Marble, which is of divers Colours, naturally represents Mountains, Flowers, Trees and Rivers, whereof they make Tables and other Ornaments; some think that the Rubies, and other precious Stones, are brought hither from the Kingdom of Ava.

Among the Animals, one meets with excellent Horses, most of them low but strong and vigorous; Stags of a peculiar kind, which are neither taller nor thicker than our ordinary Dogs. The Lords keep them in their Gardens for their Diversion. The Birds, call'd Kin-ki or Golden-Hens, are also found here, which I have described elsewhere.

The People are very strong and courageous; besides they are of a mild affable Temper, and fit for the Study of the Sciences.

The First City, Yun-nan-fu, the Capital of the Province.

Yun-nan-fu.

THIS City has no navigable River, but is built on the side of a large and deep Lake, or to speak in the Language of the Country, on the Coast of the South Sea. It is not many Years since it was remarkable for its Beauty. Within its Walls, which are three Miles in Compass, it was full of handsome Buildings, and without, adorn'd with pleasant Gardens, two or three of which are still to be seen.

YUN-NAN

of Chirk Castle in the County

Parliament for the said Town.

KYO-CHI-QUE, or KINGDOM of TONG-KING.

LAU-CHWA, or Kingdom of LAU.

A Chinese Prince formerly kept his Court here; the Tartars becoming Masters of China they gave him the Investiture thereof with the Title of King; but that Prince (D) being weary of the Yoke, and having taken up Arms against the Emperor, in 1679, his Family was ruin'd, and dying a while after of old Age, his Troops were of a sudden dispersed.

The Trade for Metals is greater here than in any other Province. They make a particular sort of Silk, named Tong-hay-twan-tse, that is, the Satin of the Eastern Sea, without knowing the Occasion of this Name. It is made of twisted Silk, is not flower'd, and without any Gloss. They dye it of all sorts of Colours, as they do the Twan-tse, or common Satin; but it appears neither bright nor lively; they also make very good Carpets.

After all, Yun-nan, at present, has more Reputation than Wealth; the Shops are but indifferently furnish'd, the Dealers poor, the Buildings mean, and the Concourse of People not very great, if compared with what is seen in most of the other Capitals of Provinces.

In this City the Tsong-thi, or Governor-General of the Provinces of Yun-nan and Quey-chew, resides, as also the Vice-Roy of the Province. Its District contains four Cities of the second, and seven of the third Rank.

The whole Country is agreeable and fertile, consisting partly in little Hills, and partly in large Plains. The Waters are very good, the Climate temperate, and the Canals give an easy Admittance to Vessels.

The Inhabitants are indued with Wit and Courage, and have always been addicted to Arms, or Agriculture. The Horses that are bred there are small, but hardy and strong. It produces Lapis Armenus and fine Marble. The Trees call'd Rose-Wood, are also found here.

The Second City, Ta-li-fu.

THIS City, like the Capital, stands on a Lake, which is very long, and abounds with all sorts of Fish. It is large, and very populous; the Climate is mild, and the Soil fertile, so that it is a very pleasant Place to live in.

It is here principally those fair Tables and other Ornaments are made of that most beautiful Marble, dug out of the Mountain Tyen-fung; and which is naturally variegated with so many different Colours, that one would think the Mountains, Flowers, Trees, and Rivers represented thereon were drawn by a skillful Painter.

Ta-li has under its Jurisdiction, four Cities of the second, and three of the third Rank.

The Third City, Ling-ngan-fu. (E)

THE whole Country, that belongs to this City, containing four Cities of the second Rank, and five of the third, consists either of Plains, little Hills, and Mountains, which afford no disagreeable Prospect; it is water'd by pretty large Lakes, and several Rivers, that render it fertile, especially in Rice and Wheat. It produces also plenty of Honey and Wax, as well as most of the Fruits found in the Indies.

The Fourth City, Chu-hyung-fu. (F)

THIS City stands in the Heart of the Province, and a very beautiful Country, water'd with several Rivers, and inclosed on all sides with fine Mountains, which serve instead of Bulwarks. The Air is healthful, and the Soil produces plenty of all sorts of Grain. It abounds also with good Pastures.

The Mountains yield the Lapis Armenus, and a fine green Stone; so do some of them Silver Mines in Case they were open'd. It has but two Cities of the second Rank under its Jurisdiction.

The Fifth City, Chin-kyang-fu.

NOTHING can be more agreeable than the Situation of this City. It stands on the side of a great Lake which lies to the South, and in a Plain encompassed with Mountains, which are at a proper Distance to render the Prospect agreeable. Its District is of no great Extent, containing no more than two Cities of the second, and two of the third Rank; but it is water'd by Lakes and Rivers that make it fertile, and abound with excellent Fish. The Inhabitants make Cotton Carpets, which are much esteem'd.

The Sixth City, King-tong-fu.

THE Country, where this City stands, is full of very high Mountains, which they say contain Silver Mines. It abounds with Rice, and its Valleys are well water'd with Brooks and Rivers. Altho' it enjoys the Rank of Fu, there is no other City in its District.

(D) This was the famous U-fan-ghey, who call'd in the Tartars to suppress the Rebels.

(E) In the Map Ling-ngan-fu, but in the Tables as here.

(F) In the Map as here, but Chu-hyung-fu, in the first Table, and Chu-hyung-fu in the second.

PROV. XIV. On the West of it is one of those Bridges, which I have described elsewhere, supported by Iron Chains. The Sight of the Precipices, and Agitation of the Bridge, when many Passengers are on it at once, never fail to terrify those who have not passed it before.

Yun-nan.

The Seventh City, Quan-nan-fu.

Quan-nan-fu.

THIS City, as well as the former, has no other within its District. It stands on the Borders of the Province of Quey-chew, and is separated, as it were, from the rest of the Province by frightful Mountains. Its Soil is fertile, but the Inhabitants are consider'd by the Chinese as Barbarians, on account of the Rudeness of their Behaviour.

The Eighth City, Quang-si-fu.

Quang-si-fu.

THIS City stands in a little Plain, and on the Side of a Lake. It is quite surrounded with Mountains, and has under it only two Cities of the third Rank, without any thing farther, worthy Remark.

The Ninth City, Shun-ning-fu.

Shun-ning-fu.

IS a very small City, not above a Mile and an half in Compass, surrounded with Mountains, so that the Avenues to it are thro' very narrow Valleys. The Soil is almost every where barren, and the Genius as well as Manners of the Natives as rude as the Climate they inhabit.

The Tenth City, Ku-tsing-fu. (G)

Ku-tsing-fu.

ALTHO' this City is surrounded with Mountains, yet the Country about it is fruitful enough. It commands over five Cities of the second, and two of the third Rank. Their Inhabitants are very laborious, and do not leave an Inch of Land unimprov'd; but they are so litigious, that they spend the best Part of their Effects at Law.

The Eleventh City, Yau-ngan-fu. (H)

Yau-ngan-fu.

THE Territory of this City is sufficiently large, altho' it has but two Cities, one of the second, and the other of the third Rank under its Jurisdiction. It is intermixt with fertile Valleys and Mountains, cover'd with fine Forests. It furnishes abundance of Musk.

Near the City is a Well of salt Water, whereof they make very white Salt. The People of this Country are of a strong Constitution, and naturally warlike.

The Twelfth City, Ko-king-fu.

Ko-king-fu.

THIS City, which is encompassed with Mountains, has no more than one City of the second Rank in its District, which is situate on a Lake, six Leagues in Compass. Its Inhabitants are courageous and brave. They usually go arm'd with Bows and Arrows.

The Country produces Musk and Pine-Apples. Very beautiful Carpets are made here. It is said there are Gold Mines in its Mountains, bordering on the Country of the Si-san, or Territories of the Lamas.

The Thirteenth City, Vu-ting-fu. (I)

Vu-ting-fu.

THIS City is situate on the Borders of the Province of Se-chwen, in a rich and fertile Soil, water'd with Brooks and Rivers that produce great plenty. It has a pretty large Garrison to defend the Country against any Incurfions of the neighbouring Mountaineers.

The Land is well cultivated, and its Pastures are stock'd with numerous Flocks. A great deal of Musk also comes from hence. Some of its Mountains are rugged and steep, and the Passages over them so narrow, that only one Man at a time can clamber up. In time of War the Inhabitants retire to them as inaccessible Holds. It has in its District only two Cities of the second Rank, and one of the third.

The Fourteenth City, Li-kyang-tu-fu. (K)

Li-kyang-tu-fu.

IT is said the Inhabitants of this City and the Territory belonging to it, are descended from the ancient Colonies of the Chinese, who came and settled here. It has no City depending on it, and is surrounded by Mountains, which separate it from the Dominions of the Lamas, wherein no doubt are Gold Mines. The whole Country is well water'd and fertile, yielding Amber and Pine-Apples.

(G) This City is call'd in Table 1. and the Map, Ku cheu fu.

(H) In the Map, Yau-gan fu.

(I) In both Tables U-ting fu; but in the Map as here.

(K) In the Map as here; but in the Tables Li-kyang fu.

PROVINCE XV QUEY-CHEW

drawn on the Spot by the Pères

D. Shaw M.D. & F.R.S.

The Fifteenth City, Ywen-kyang-fu

Prov. xiv.
Yun-nan.
Ywen-kyang-fu.

STANDS on a pretty large River, call'd Ho-li-kyang, and has no City under its Jurisdiction. The Country consists of Mountains, and Plains water'd by several Rivers. It furnishes Abundance of Silk; produces plenty of Ebony, Palm-Trees, and Areka, which the Inhabitants chew with Betel Leaf. Peacocks are very numerous here.

The Sixteenth City, Mong-wha-fu.

THIS is one of those Cities which has no Jurisdiction over others; it is surrounded with high Mountains, and is remarkable in that there is no Country in the whole Empire, which furnishes so great a Quantity of Musk.

The Seventeenth City, Yung-chang-fu. (A)

THIS City is pretty large and populous, built like the former, in the midst of Mountains, near an Extremity of the Province, and in the Neighbourhood of People, who are savage, and little known; the Disposition and Manners of the Inhabitants partake of those of their Neighbours. The Country furnishes Gold, Honey, Wax, Amber, and abundance of good Silk. One City of the second, and two of the third Rank are under its Jurisdiction.

The Eighteenth City, Yungning-tu-fu.

THIS City is situate at the end of the Province, almost touching the Dominions of the Lamas. There is a fine Lake on the East-side of it, with four little Isles in it, which appear above Water in pretty Eminencies. It has no other City under its Jurisdiction.

Here, as well as in Tibet, Numbers of that sort of Cows are to be met with, whose Tails serve for several Uses. They make Stuffs of them, that are Proof against Rain, and Carpets much esteem'd. The Chinese Officers employ them also in adorning their Standards and Helmets.

The Nineteenth City, Yung-pe fu.

ALTHO' this City stands amidst Mountains, its Territory is not the less fertile; having large Plains, watered partly by a fine Lake, partly by divers Brooks and pretty big Rivers, but has no City depending on it.

The Twentieth City, Kay-wha-fu. (B)

THIS City is considerable for nothing but that it borders on Tong-king, and is one of the Keys of the Province on that side. It stands in a Country, intermixt with fertile Valleys and high Mountains. It has no Jurisdiction or City depending on it.

The Twenty First City, San ta-fu. (C)

THIS last City, which stands on the Borders of the Kingdom of Ava, is properly a Fortress to defend the Frontiers. The whole Country is full of Mountains, which serve it for a Bulwark; and the Valleys are water'd with Rivers, that render the Soil fertile.

PROVINCE XV. QUEY-CHEW.

THIS Province, which is one of the smallest in the Empire, is situated between those of Hu-quang, Se-chuen, Yun-nan, and Quang-si. It contains ten Cities of the first Rank, and thirty eight of the second and third.

It is full of inaccessible Mountains, whence one Part of it is inhabited by People, who never were subdued, but are perfectly independant, as I have shewn at the Beginning of this Work. [p. 32]

Prov. XV.
Quey-chew.
Bonds, and Situation.

(A) The first Syllable in the Name of this City, and the following, is spell'd Yung in the second Table of Latitude and Longitude at the End of the Work.

(B) In the same Table it is Que-wha-fu.

(C) This City, as well as Yung-ning-tu-fu, is omitted in the first Table, p. 6.

PROV. XV The Emperors, in order to people this Province, have often sent Colonies hither, and even sometimes Governors with their whole Families.

It contains abundance of Forts, and Military Places, where numerous Garrisons are kept; but the Tribute which the Province pays, not being sufficient to maintain them, the Court is oblig'd to make up that Defect by sending them Supplies every Year.

The Mountains afford Mines of Gold, Silver, and Mercury; also part of the Copper, whereof the small Money, current thro' the Empire, is made, comes from hence.

Among these Mountains one meets with agreeable and fertile Valleys, especially near the Rivers. Provisions are cheap, but not in such Plenty as elsewhere, or as they might be, if the Land was better cultivated.

They have no Manufactures for Silks in this Province, but they make Stuffs of a certain Herb, which resembles Hemp, very fit for Summer-wear.

The Inhabitants breed a great Number of Cows, Hogs, and the best Horses in all China; the wild Fowl, whereof one meets with infinite Quantities, have an excellent Taste.

The First City, Quey-yang-fu, (D) Capital of the Province.

Quey-yang-fu. THIS City, which is one of the smallest in China, is not three Miles in Compass. Its Houses are built partly of Earth and partly of Brick, like those belonging to the Tribunals. The River whereon it stands, bears no Boats, whence it has but little Trade. But its Jurisdiction extends over three Cities of the second, and four of the third Rank, besides abundance of Forts, wherewith it is, as it were, surrounded. The Country is plain in some parts, and in others full of Mountains, some of which are very steep.

The Second City, Se-chew-fu. (E)

Se-chew-fu. SE-CHEW, situate at the Extremity of the Province towards Hu-quang, has only some Forts under its Jurisdiction. The Country is full of Mountains, and furnishes Red-Lead, Quicksilver, and divers other Metals.

Its Inhabitants, tho' more civilized than the rest of the People of the same Province, are perfectly ignorant of the Chinese Sciences. They go ordinarily barefooted, and are so inured to Fatigue that they travel over the Rocks with a surprizing Swiftness.

The Third City, Se-nan-fu.

Se-nan-fu. THIS City, which stands on a fine River, and in a long Plain, has in its District three Cities of the third Rank, and several Forts. It is bounded on both sides by Mountains, some whereof are inaccessible, there being but one narrow Way to get up any of them.

In time of War, the Inhabitants retire to these Mountains with their Effects, to prevent being plunder'd by the Soldiers, who pass thro' their Country. There also a savage People hide themselves, who have scarce any Correspondence with the Chinese.

The Fourth City, Chin-ywen-fu. (F)

Chin-ywen-fu. THE District of this City is very small, comprising only some Forts, and two Cities of the third Rank; but produces Pomegranates, Oranges, and the beautifullest Flowers in all China.

Some of its Mountains are inhabited by People, who having little Communication with the Chinese, are Boorish, and next to Barbarians.

The Fifth City, She-tfyen-fu (G)

She-tfyen-fu. IS situate between the two former Cities, and has but a very small Jurisdiction, comprising a few Forts, and one Town of the third Rank. The People who inhabit the Mountains are of a Disposition and Character very different from that of the Chinese; both Men and Women go bare-footed, and retain other Customs very foreign to the Chinese Politeness. The Country yields abundance of Quick-silver.

(d) In the Second Table Que-yang-fu.
(e) Se-chew-fu, in the same Table.

(f) In the Map Chin-ywen-fu.
(g) In the first Table, She-tfyen-fu.

The Sixth City, Tong-jin-fu.

PROV. XV.
Queu-
chew.
Tong-jin-fu.

THIS is one of the Frontier Cities towards the Province of Hu-quang. It has only one City (A) and a few Forts under its Jurisdiction. Much Gold is gathered here, nor are there wanting Mines of Copper. Converging with the Chinese has in some Measure civilized the People, who were formerly cruel and savage.

The Seventh City, Ngan-lhan-fu. (B)

THE Country which belongs to this City is full of Mountains, and contains three Cities of the second Order, with five of the third Rank; besides several garrison'd Forts to keep the People of the Neighbourhood in Awe, who live in a State of Independance in their Mountains. The Rivers that water the Valleys and Plains, would render the Country fruitful enough, were the People more industrious.

The Eighth City, Tu-yun-fu. (C)

THE Jurisdiction of this City is of very small Extent, containing only two Cities of the second Rank, and as many of the third. It lies next the Mountains, inhabited by the Seng-myau-tse, People, whom the Chinese were never able to reduce, and who have a Government of their own, as I have already related; it is separated from them only by a River, and certain very steep Mountains.

The Ninth City, Ping-ywen-fu. (D)

THE Country belonging to this City is, like the former, in the Neighbourhood of those wild independent People, who inhabit inaccessible Mountains. It comprizes no more than five Cities, one of the second, and two (E) of the third Rank. The Soil produces excellent Tea, and Oranges of all sorts. They make Cloth of a kind of raw Hemp, very different from that which grows in Europe.

The Tenth City, Wey-ning-fu. (F)

THIS City stands on a fine Lake, and in the middle of a Plain, encompassed with high Mountains. It has under its Jurisdiction three Cities of the second Rank, and as many of the third, with several Forts, where there are Garrisons kept, for the Defence of the Country.

(A) By the First Table, p. 6 it appears, that this City is a Hyeu, or of the third Rank.

(B) In the Second Table Ngan-Shan-fu.

(C) In the Map and full Table as here, but in the second Table Tu-yuen-fu.

(D) In the first Table, Ping-yuen-fu.

(E) Here is a manifest Mistake, for the particular Numbers do not agree with the general; and the First Table makes four Hyeu.

(F) In the Second Table Wey-ning-fu.

ANNALS OF THE CHINESE MONARCHS; OR, A compendious HISTORY, CONTAINING

The most remarkable Events under each REIGN, according to Chronological Order.

The INTRODUCTION.

HAVE already observ'd, it is the common Opinion of those who have endeavour'd to trace the Origin of this Empire, that the Posterity of the Sons of Noab, spreading themselves over the Eastern Parts of Asia, arriv'd in China about two hundred Years after the Deluge, and settled in Shen-si. This Province, being thus peopled by the Heads of many considerable Families, who multiply'd greatly, new Colonies were sent into those of Ho-nan, Pe-che-li, and Shan-tong; which in time were united under one Sovereign, whose Dominion extended no farther Southward than the River Yang-tse-kyang.

In the Reign of the Emperor Yu, new Discoveries were made Southward, whereof Maps were drawn by that Prince's Order. Those Regions were then but thinly inhabited, nor did the People acknowledge the Emperor of China; but the succeeding Monarchs settling the Crown on their eldest Sons, gave those Countries to their other Children, who went and planted them.

Thus several petty Kingdoms came to be establish'd; and these new Inhabitants, being reduc'd insensibly to Obedience by sage and able Sovereigns, learned by Degrees the most useful Arts and apply'd themselves particularly to Agriculture; afterwards the Provinces, being united by the Policy or Force of the Emperors, form'd at length this vast Empire.

Hence we learn the Origin of those Principalities, or little Kingdoms, (so often mention'd in the Annals) whose Sovereigns were always either the Sons or the Nephews of the Emperors. It was customary for the eldest, who was invested with the supreme Authority, to give a Province or Country to his younger Brothers, with Liberty of raising Taxes, in order to support a Grandeur suitable to their Birth. In after-times certain Persons were rais'd to the same Dignity, either on account of their extraordinary Merit, or for having done important Services. This Partition of the sovereign Power, altho' dependant on that of the Emperor, has under weak Princes been the Source of infinite Divisions and civil Wars, that have rent the Empire in Pieces.

All the best Chinese Historians agree, that the Monarchy was founded by Fo-bi; so that whatever some Authors advance, who have endeavour'd to carry the Origin higher up, is manifestly groundless and fabulous. They agree also as to the Successors of Fo-bi down to the Emperor Yau, which are six in Number, viz, Shin-nong, Whang-ti, &c. but as to the Time of Fo-bi, and the Duration of the Reigns of those six Emperors, they confess it to be very uncertain

"uncertain, and their Chronology in that part defective. "Some also doubt whether the Emperors, plac'd between Sbin-nong and Whang-ti, succeeded one another; because they might possibly have been no more than tributary Princes, or great Officers, who were contemporary." (A)

However from the Reign of Yau, which began 2357 Years before Christ, their History is very exact; there we find the Names of the Emperors, with the Length of their Reigns, and an account of the Troubles, Revolutions, and Interregnums that have happen'd, all set down very particularly, and with great Fidelity.

"Indeed there are Criticks who dispute about the Duration of some of the Reigns and Dynasties, even since the Time of Yau. But I was not willing to enter into Discussions of this Nature, which would have been tedious, and only served to darken and confound the History; I have therefore, as to this Point, followed the Opinion of our ancient Missionaries (B), who were best versed in the Chinese Learning, and most of those who are still living; several of whom give Place to none, either for diligently studying, or well understanding the Books of that Nation. This in general may be said in Behalf of the Chinese Historians, that they appear to be sincere, and regard nothing but the Truth; that they do not seem to think the Glory of a Nation consists in its Antiquity; and that they have no Reasons, like other Nations, on account of Interest, or Jealousy of their Neighbours, to alter or falsify their History; which is no more than a simple Recital of the principal Events, proper for the Instruction and Imitation of Posterity. It will be said perhaps, that the Shu-king, which contains the History of those early Times, and the other Canonical Books were destroy'd in the Reign of Sbi-uehang-ti, who ordered them to be burnt, under pain of Death; and that consequently the Loss of those Monuments must render the History very uncertain. This would be a strong Objection, in case those Books, which are in the highest Esteem with the Chinese, had been all brought together, and burnt at one time; but they were dispersed thro' the Empire, and in the Hands of all the Learned. neither were all sorts of Books proscrib'd; among the rest those that treated of Physic were excepted, and in picking them out, means was found of preserving several Copies of the rest. The Zeal of the Learned saved a good Number of them; Caves, Tombs, and Walls became Places of Refuge against the Persecution. By degrees those precious Monuments of Antiquity were brought to light again; and at length restor'd without any Danger under the Emperor Ven-ti, that is, about 54 Years after."

Chinese History certain from the Time of Yau.

Sincerity of the Chinese Historians.

Objection to the Certainty of the Chinese History.

All the learned Historians of China are so unanimously agreed (as to the Authority and Exactness of their Chronology, since the Time of Yau) that he who should attempt to place the Origin of that Empire nearer our times, would be liable to be severely punish'd, as the Broacher of an erroneous Doctrine. And indeed the Chinese Chronology, as thus settled, deserves intire Credit for the following Reasons, viz.

Chinese Chronology vindicated.

I. It is very coherent and circumstantial.

II. It has not the Air of a Fiction, like that of the Greeks and Romans in the Beginning of their Histories.

III. It is supported by several Observations of Eclipses, which occur in the Course of the History, and have been found to agree with the Calculations of several learned Astronomers of these Times. Nor needs there any other Proof than the Verification of the famous Eclipse, which happen'd under the Emperor Chong-kang, who reign'd above two thousand Years before Christ.

IV. All the Parts of the ancient Chinese History have been written by Authors, who were contemporary with the Emperors, whose Lives they have given us.

V. Confucius, whose Authority ought to be of very great Weight on account of his Probity and extraordinary Merit, never calls this Chronology in Question; but on the contrary always supposes it to be true.

VI. Mencius, the most famous of the Chinese Philosophers after Confucius, and who liv'd about four hundred Years before the Christian Era, affirms; that from Sbun, whom Yau associated in the Empire, to the Emperor Ven-vang, there pass'd a thousand Years. This Authority of Mencius is unexceptionable among the Chinese. Now from Ven-vang to the time of Christ, there are eleven hundred and odd Years, as it appears by the History; the Certainty of which is confirm'd in proportion as it advances nearer the present Times.

VII. According to this Chronology, the Lives of the first Emperors of China correspond, in respect to Length, with those given by Scripture to Mankind in the same Ages.

It is true this Chronology appears too long to the Learned of Europe, who have an Interest in making it shorter; but how can they pretend to retrench the Times that incommode and weaken their System, without alledging plausible Reasons? And what Reasons can they produce, sufficient to persuade the Chinese to reject one part more than another of their History; which runs on in an uninterrupted Series, and is no way inconsistent with itself from Beginning to End?

Besides tho' it seems difficult to reconcile it with the Vulgate, it agrees very well with the Septuagint Version; which having been admitted in the Church for more than six Centuries, was approved of in the fifth [General] Council, in the same Manner as the Vulgate was approv'd in the Council of Trent. It is certain, that neither of these famous Assemblies have pretended to establish either one or other Chronology; on the other hand some learned Authors of late have adhered to that of the Septuagint, and found a way of reconciling it with the Vulgate, in respect to the Years that passed between the Deluge and the time of Christ. Thus we see that the Points of Chronology, that are or ought to be most certain, are contested every Day by the ablest Men; and this Difference of Opinion, together with the Liberty that is allow'd of saying what one will within certain Bounds, has sometimes embarrassed the Missionaries in answering Questions put to them on this Subject. The late Emperor Kang-hi, perceiving this Diversity in reading the Religious Books, written by different Missionaries, some of whom followed the Septuagint, others the Vulgate; How comes it, said he, that your King are not clear? don't you affirm, that they contain nothing but what is sure and indubitable? They did not want solid Answers sufficient to satisfy an European; but what Effect could such have on a Prince, who was but little acquainted with our Religion, and could not conceive how its Doctrines could be true, and its Chronology (b) false?

It is easy to demonstrate, that the Chinese Chronology agrees exactly with that of the Septuagint: for according to the Septuagint there are 3258 Years from the Deluge to Christ, and the Chinese fix the Reign of Yau 2357 Years before Christ; whence it follows that from the Deluge to Yau there were above nine hundred Years. So that, supposing the Posterity of Noah did not arrive in China for two or even three hundred Years after the Flood, there will remain Time more than sufficient for the Reigns of Fo-hi, and the six Emperors who preceded Yau: for altho' the Chinese consider them as the Founders of their Empire, they acknowledge that they can fix neither the Times nor Duration of their Reigns; and that the Succession of their Emperors, with the Length of their Reigns, is to be prov'd unexceptionably only since the Time of Yau.

It was not without good Reason that I said it only seem'd difficult to reconcile the Chinese Chronology with the Vulgate, since a late Writer of Note (c) has found the Interval between the Deluge and Christ to contain 3234 Years. And in thus reconciling the Vulgate with the Septuagint, he has of Course also reconcil'd it with the Chinese Chronology; for when by adding an hundred Years to the Life of each of Shem's Descendants, he follows the Samaritan Text and Septuagint Version, he changes nothing in the Hebrew; since he only supplies what the sacred Penman seems to have omitted designedly. (d)

The Place in Question is the 11 Chap. of Genesis. HEM, says MOSES, v. 10. was an hundred Years old, and begot ARPHAXAD, two Years after the Flood; v. 11. and HEM lived after he begot ARPHAXAD, five hundred Years, and begot Sons and Daughters; v. 12. and ARPHAXAD lived thirty five Years and begot SALAH.

As a Hundred is a Capital Number, and not accompany'd with an inferior one, when Moses speaks of Shem's Age at the Time he begot Arphaxad, nothing more can possibly be understood; but it is not so in the twelfth and following Verses, where he speaks of the Age of Arphaxad and his Posterity, for there the inferior Numbers suppose the capital Numbers (which it was not necessary to repeat) to be understood; and this way of speaking is customary. Thus when a Man after talking of one Event, which happen'd for Instance in the Year 1710, passes to another, and says it fell out in seven hundred and twenty or seven hundred and twenty two; every Body knows the capital Number thousand is to be understood. In like manner, tho' according to the Strictness of the Letter, Arphaxad was but thirty five Years old, when he begot Salah, yet according to the Sense of the Vulgate (e) he became a Father at the Age of one hundred and thirty five.

We have no Reason to suppose the same Omission in the fifth Chapter of Genesis, because there the sacred Text is clear, (f) and will not admit the same Conjecture, which the eleventh Chapter offers us, and serves admirably well, to reconcile sacred with profane History, as well as the Hebrew Text with the two others: one of which is venerable in primitive Christianity, and the other cannot be suspected of being alter'd. (g)

(a) This is the true Sense of the Original, which literally render'd, is, And know not how to separate the Truth of its Doctrines from that of its Chronology.

(b) P. Tournemine.

(c) Doubtless the Years were either put originally as they are to denote the precise Years of the Patriarchs Ages, when they begot Children; or else were altered by the Jews, to serve some Turn; for what Design could the Penman have in omitting these Years, if they were necessary? Was it to confound and raise Scruples in his Readers? I don't wonder the Chinese Emperor should not be satisfy'd with such quibbling, stupid Answers, however sufficient they might be to satisfy the Majority of Europeans.

(d) This is not a parallel Case, nor indeed is it possible to find one that is. When we speak of Events in a Chronological Series, the two Capital Numbers, which stand for thousands and hundreds may be omitted; so we say the Year forty, sixty six, eighty eight; having first mention'd the Century, and so on till we begin a new Century. This is done commonly, even in Writing; nor is it liable to any Mistake, because those smaller Numbers of Years, or Divisions of the Century have a necessary Reference to the Capital Numbers. But it is very different in speaking of Actions refer'd to the Ages of Men, which are independent one of another, and unconnected with the Course of Time. Besides, in speaking of the Years of the Century, it is allow'd, that the Century itself must be previously mention'd; but here is no previous mention of the Age of Arphaxad, only that he was begotten by Shem, when he was a hundred Years old. Which hundred Years of Shem have no Relation to the Years of Salah's Age; and therefore can in no wise stand as part of them, or as a Number connectible with them.

(e) How is the sacred Text more clear in one Place than the other? And why will not the fifth Chapter admit of the same way of Reasoning? For may it not as well be inferr'd, that Enos begot Cainan, not at ninety Years of Age, as is in the Text, but at one hundred and ninety; because Seth being one Hundred and five, when he begot Enos, the Capital Number, Hundred, has Reference to the Ages of all his Descendants, which are designated by inferior Numbers.

(f) There being an Opposition between the two, if the one cannot be suspected of being alter'd, the other must be a Corruption (supposing the Hebrew to be genuine) however venerable it was in Primitive Times.

If we stick to the Letter, we shall run into almost inextricable Difficulties; for the Ages at which the Patriarchs had Children, were proportionable to the Length of their Lives. Is it credible that the first seven Patriarchs, next after the Deluge, who liv'd three or four hundred Years each, had Children at thirty Years of Age; and yet that the succeeding Patriarchs, who did not live half so long, had not theirs till they were sixty or thereabout, Terah at 70, Abraham at 87, Isaac at 60, Jacob at 84, &c. Did Noah live to see nine Generations succeeding one another after the Flood? (F)

Besides, if this Omission be not allow'd in the Vulgar, there will be no more than 200 Years between the Deluge and the Building of Babel; whence it will follow that Noah, who according to the sacred Text lived three hundred and fifty Years after the Flood, must have been Witness of so rash an Attempt. Now is it likely that Noah and Shem, those holy Patriarchs, for whom their Descendants had so great Veneration, would have suffer'd such a presumptuous and impious Enterprize? (G) Would not so exact a Writer as Moses have told us what was become of Noah, and mention'd the Land where he lived at the time of the Dispersion of Mankind?

When therefore we read in the twelfth and following Verses that Arphaxad was thirty five Years old at the Birth of Salab, that Salab was thirty at the Birth of Heber, &c. it is reasonable to believe the Sense must be, that Arphaxad lived before the Birth of Salab thirty five Years more than Shem lived before the Birth of Arphaxad, which make one hundred and thirty five Years; and that the like must be understood with respect to the Ages of the succeeding Patriarchs, at the Birth of their first Child. (H)

The Author of this System supports his Dissertation (I), (which has been approv'd of by Men of Learning in France (*), Italy (†), and England (‡),) by Authority and solid Reasons, which it is not my Business to repeat here; it being sufficient for my Purpose to shew, that in the Judgment of the learned Moderns, the Chinese Chronology, and the Monuments produced in Confirmation of it, ought not to be rejected, as they have been by some, a little too rashly. (K)

"I am sensible that a few Years ago a Chronological Table was publish'd (L), which began no higher than the Reign of Lye Vang, that is, four hundred and twenty four Years before Christ. It was compos'd by a Chinese Lord who is still living, and was Vice-Roy of Kan-ton (M), when the Missionaries were banish'd thither; but that Lord, to my certain Knowledge, never had or assum'd the Character of an Historian, nor had he a Thought of entering into the Question about the Chinese Antiquity, much less of fixing the Epoch of it at the Period where his Table commences. So far from that, he would be highly offended, to be suspected of having retrenched the Reigns preceding that of Lye Vang, or even intending any such thing; neither durst any Chinese publish an Opinion so contrary to that receiv'd from Reign to Reign throughout China. That Chronological Table, publish'd by him, was copy'd from a Book intitled KANG-MU; and he had no farther Hand in it, than to adapt the Sexagenary Cycle, which he has done in a neat and commodious Manner.

"The Author of the Kang-mu is Chu-bi, who in the Chronology follows Se-ma-wen-kong: but neither of these eminent Writers had the least Thought of re-trenching the three first Families, or even of insinuating, that the Emperors, whose Names are inserted in the Shu-king are only fictitious and imaginary Persons. Should any one in China offer to impute such an Opinion to them, he would be look'd on as a Visionary, and might pay dear for his Temerity. Both of them begin their Histories with Fo-bi; and we have the Commentaries of Chu-bi upon the Shu-king (N) and Shi-king, where he always speaks as one who takes the Reigns and Princes therein mention'd to be real.

"Confucius, well known as to the Age he lived in, speaks in express Terms of the three first Dynasties, named Hya, Shang, and Chew; and affirms that he practiced the Rites prescribed by the last. This single Testimony would suffice in China, to cause any Person to lose his Head, who dared to say that those three Imperial Families ought to be struck

(F) Some will perhaps object here, that it would be of dangerous Consequence to deny what is positively affirm'd by the Scripture, without some Criteria, by which (if it seem to contradict) it may be reconcil'd to Reason.

(G) See this Argument confuted, Univ. Hist. Vol. 1. p. 143.

(H) This way of Reasoning we have already shewn to be unnatural and absurd; we shall only observe farther, with regard to the inconsistent and partial Conduct of a certain Set of Men; that let the Literal Sense of any Text be ever so absurd in itself, or injurious to the very Attributes of God, yet if it favours their own Schemes, how hotly will they stickle for the Letter against common Sense and Reason, nay and call the Opposers of it Infidels and Atheists? On the contrary, if the Literal Sense does not serve their Turn, how ready are they to oppose it themselves, and endeavour, like our Author, to demonstrate, that it is absurd and incredible?

(K) Upon the whole, notwithstanding all P. de Haldé's Pains to establish the Veracity of the Chinese History as well as Chronology, at least from the time of Yau; it may yet be question'd from several Circumstances, which we shall take Notice of in our Notes as we go along. We shall only observe here, that Consistency, Connexion, and Simplicity are not infallible Tokens of a genuine History. In a Word, many of the first Reigns seem to be fictitious, and to be written by the early Chinese Historians; partly to give their Nation the Reputation above all others, for Antiquity, Wisdom, Politeness, wholesome Laws, and other Advantages; and partly to form Models and Characters for the Imitation of Princes. It seems very strange, that not only all their Sciences, but all their Arts and Utensils, even to those of the Plough and the Kitchen, should be invented by their first Emperors; as if there were no Men else of Genius or Capacity among them in those early Times.

(M) Faouet gives it as the Work of a young Tartar Lord, named Nyen, very well versed in the Chinese History, who was living in 1720, when he left China.

(N) In the Original Chu-bi.

The Chronological Table lately publish'd consider'd.

"out of the Chinese History (R). I do not even believe that any one durst advance such a "Doctrine in Europe; for either he must deny that Confucius himself ever existed, or said the "Things ascribed to him; or else must acknowledge that we have in him an undeniable
 "Testimony (s) of the reality of the three first Dynasties, which compose the Schu-king. For "this Reason we ought not to believe that Se-ma-wen-kong, and after him Chu-bi reduce the "Epoch of the Chinese History, to the Reign of Lye-Vang, or exclude the preceding Reigns;
 "they have indeed in the History taken Notice, that the Chronology before Lye-Vang ap"pear'd to them not sufficiently certain (T); at least so far as concerns the Beginning and
 "End of Reigns, and the Succession of Years compared with the Kya-tse, or Chinese Cycles.
 "And this their pointing out what is uncertain in their Antiquities, is a Proof of their great "Exactness and Fidelity.

"Other Critics, less scrupulous, affirm that the Beginning of the Years of each Reign may be "mark'd distinctly from the twelfth Emperor of the Dynasty of the Chew. Now from that Pe"riod to the Emperor Lye-Van, where the Chronological Table in Question, commences, they "reckon seventeen Emperors.

"Whatever these different Opinions of the Critics may be, the Chronology of the Chinese "History may be deduced with Certainty from the time of Yau, to the present; so far as "relates to the Succession of the Emperors, and most remarkable Events during their Reigns.
 "This will appear more evidently still, from the Discourses of the Emperors themselves, and "the most illustrious Chinese of those Times, inserted in this Work."

Why no Eclipse mentioned before
 Chong-kang.

As the Eclipse, which happen'd in the Reign of Chong-kang, and has been verifi'd by our Astronomers, is one of the most remarkable Proofs of the Extent of the Chinese Chronology, it may be asked, how comes it that the History mentions no Eclipse earlier than the Reign of that Prince?

The Answer made by the learned Chinese, who were consulted on this Occasion, was, that it was the Custom in those early times to insert the Eclipses; and that the only End of their History then was to instruct Posterity, by recording the most essential Matters relating to the Government: such as the Laws; the Progress of Arts and Sciences; the frequent Revolutions and Intrigues by which they were carry'd on; the great Instances of Virtue; the Advice given to the Emperors; the good or bad Actions of those Princes, that their Descendants might learn, by their Examples, what they ought to practise or avoid.

It is also very likely, that if Hi and Ho had done their Duty, by informing the Emperor when that Eclipse was to happen, the History had spoken of it no more than former Eclipses.
 As the Silence of those two famous Astronomers was not owing so much to Ignorance as Malice, and the Design they had of favouring the Treason of a Minister, who forc'd the Emperor to retreat

(s) This sort of Argument, which he makes use of so often, is very frivolous, and only proves how zealous the Chinese are for their Antiquities, not how genuine those Antiquities are.

(t) Confucius's mentioning those Dynasties, is far from being an undeniable Testimony of their Existence; it only proves at most, that the History of them was extant in his Time, and that it was commonly believed they had existed.

(r) Most of the Missionaries are of the same Sentiments; which are probably grounded on the Authority of these Authors, who are the Founders of the Kang-no or great Chinese Annals, and most esteem'd of all their Historiographers. P. Fou-quet, Bishop of Euboeopolis before mention'd, accounts it one of the prime Uses of the Table he publish'd, That it fixes the Era of the Chinese History, so far as is genuine, about four hundred Years before Christ; and says, there are some who think, not without strong Reasons, that it might be brought lower still. He allows the Chinese Nation to be almost as old as the Deluge, but denies their History deserves much Credit, if you ascend more than four hundred Years before Christ; and this, says Mr. Four-mont, is an Opinion at present pretty common among the Jesuit Missionaries. [Fourm. Refl. Critiq. sur Hist. Anc. Peupl. Tom.
2. p. 402.]

Mr. Maugret, Bishop of Kams, does not believe the Chinese Cycle very ancient; he says it is without Grounds ascribed to Whang-ti; and that the Author of the Annals above mention'd first apply'd it to Years and Ages, it having been used before only to number the Days. He allows indeed of the Existence of the three first Races, and even of Schu, Yau, Fe-hi, and Schu-wang: But denies the Chronology of ancient times to be certain, and supposes the Annalist has adjust'd both the Years and Eclipses according to his Fancy. Ibid.

P. Premare, in his Letter against the Abbé Renaudet (in the Lettres Edifiantes, Tom. 19. p. 457) distinguishes the Chronology of China into fabulous, uncertain, and sure. This Remark, he says, he takes from the most celebrated Chinese Historians, who are Enemies to Partiality, and reckon the Times betwixt Fe-hi and Ghey-ye wang, uncertain, (that is, not to be ranged according to an exact Chronological Series) and that all preceding Fe-hi is fabulous; yet he allows that China was peopled above 2155 Years before Christ; whereof he reckons the Eclipse of the Sun, which happen'd that Year [and is inserted in the Chinese History] as a Demonstration. [Ibid. p. 403.]

As these Missionaries only give their Opinion on the Chinese Chronology, without producing their particular Reasons and Proofs, they only serve to create Doubts in their Readers, without affording them any Satisfaction. They are accused indeed with raising these Objections on a religious account; imagining if the Chinese Chronology be admitted, it will overthrow the Verity of the Scripture Chronology, as being much more extended than the Hebrew. And this is very likely to be a Cause of their objecting to it, but it is a very bad one; especially as they have their Choice of the Septuagint or Samaritan, the last of which is as least as authentic if not more so than the Hebrew.

This is the Opinion of most of the Learned of late, and among the rest M. Fourmont; who vindicates the Certainty of the Chinese Chronology as well as History against the Objections of the Jesuits. He argues (1) that Confucius living in the time of Ling wang one hundred and forty one Years before Ghey-ye wang, and writing himself the Chun tseu, containing the Annals of two hundred Years; the Chronology is fix'd for eight hundred eighty five Years before Christ, that is, to the time of Li-wang, or higher. [Ibid. p. 404.] (2) That the Chinese having fix'd E-pochas and Observations of Eclipses, the Historians could not mistake in ranging the Times; which would be a good Argument were those Observations frequent enough in early times, as they are not, (3) He asks, why the Times before Ghey-ye wang should not be more certain and exact than the Chronology of the Greek, Latin, and even French Annals? But the Chronology of these Nations goes but a small Way back in comparison of the Chinese; and yet in that small Space of Time is confess'd to be very uncertain towards the earliest Periods of it. [Ibid. p. 405.]

Mr. Fourmont makes use of other Arguments, by way of Inference, in behalf of the Chinese Chronology; but he judiciously observes, that without a diligent Examination of that Variety of Books which he mentions relating to the Chinese History, a Critic will never be able to judge absolutely of the Truth, either of any Event, or its Date. [Ibid. p. 411.]

With regard to the Commencement of the Cycle, Mr. Four-mont takes Notice, that there is some Difference among the Chinese Authors; since Messrs. des Missions Etrangères begin the first Cycle at the eighth Year of Whang-ti, and P. Couplet at his first Year, agreeable to a Chinese Work composed on the Cycle; [Ibid. p. 424] which he believes to be the Result of the first Attempt of the Chinese to calculate the Motions of the Heavens.
 [Ibid. p. 405.] He also affirms, that nothing is to be found in profane History, so consistent and probable, as what occurs in the Chinese Annals after Whang-ti: between whom and Fe-hi things appear somewhat uncertain, and before Fe-hi, all is confessedly fabulous. [Ibid. p. 405, 406.]

retreat for Safety Southwards, they were justly punish'd with Death; and as their Treachery was discover'd by means of the Eclipse, that gave Occasion to its being mention'd in the History.

To prevent the Reader's falling into any Error by augmenting or diminishing the Years of each Reign, it is necessary to inform him, that the Year wherein any Emperor dies, is reckon'd among those of his Reign; and let his Death happen in what Month it will, tho' his Successor be already proclaim'd, yet the deceased Prince has the Honour of having all Affairs dispatch'd in his Name. The new Emperor scarce ever does any thing in his own, till the Year following, unless when the Crown passes into a new Family; for then the Year of his Reign begins the same Day that he ascends the Throne.

The Uncertainty, with regard to the Length of the first seven Reigns, has induced me not to commence the Sexagenary Cycles before the Reign of Yau; altho' the Invention of those Cycles, which is a Period of sixty Years, (as our Century is a Revolution of an hundred) is commonly ascribed to Whang-ti (v). Nevertheless, I ought not to omit what the Chinese Authors report either of Fo-bi, whom they consider as the Founder of their Monarchy; or of the six Emperors, who succeeded him, and govern'd the Empire till the time of the great Yau. (x)

(v) We must observe here that P. du Halde, by commencing the Cycles in the Reign of Yau, seems to have made a considerable Alteration in the Chinese Chronology; first we are told the Chinese begin their Cycles from the first Year of Whang-ti, on account of his being the Inventor, or rather Perfectioner of them; [vid. P. Mart. Sinic. Hist. p. 25, 26. & P. Couplet ad Sinic. Chronol. Praef. p. 12] and P. Gaubil expressly tells us that the Year 1723 wherein he wrote, is the fortieth of the seventy fourth Chinese Cycle: [P. Gaubil de Cycle Sinic. ap. P. Soucier. Obs. Math. p. 28, 29] whence it follows that the first Year of the Cycle will fall in the Year 2697 before Christ, coincident with the first Year of the same Emperor, according to the Chinese Historians. In Beginning therefore the Chinese Cycles at the Reign of Yau, P. du Halde has retrenched six Cycles from the Chinese Account of Time; and so falls into the same Fault of curtailing the Chinese Chronology, which he has condemn'd so much in others.

Thus the Year 1723 does not fall according to him in the seventy fourth Cycle, as it ought to do, but in the sixty eighth, which begins with him in the Year 1684. It is true P. Couplet tells us, that most of the Chinese Historiographers do not use the Computation of Cycles before the Reign of Yau; And Mr. Fourmont particularly observes, that in the Tsu chi tung kya, or Kang-mo, that is, the Great Annals of Su ma quang (the same doubtless with P. du Halde's Se ma wen kong) tho' much is spoken of the Cycle in the Reign of Whang-ti, and afterwards, yet that it does not begin to be apply'd regularly to the Reign of each Prince before Yau. [Vide Fourmont. Regl. Critiq. sur Hist. Anc. Peupl. Tom. 2. p. 424.] But neither of them says that the Cycle which is first to apply'd by the Chinese Historians, is the first Cycle; or that they begin to reckon their Cycles from that wherein the Reign of Yau falls. Instead of that, the Words of the latter seem to imply the contrary; and it has been prov'd from the Passage of P. Gaubil before-mention'd, that the Era of Whang-ti is that, which is in common use with the Chinese; nor is it likely they have two sorts of Eras. It is probable therefore, that those Historians who do not compute by Cycles before Yau, connect his Reign with the 6th or 7th Cycle, and not with the first; and this ought to be the Case, the rather, if all or some of the Actions of the Emperors preceding Yau, are in the ancient Books connected with the Years of the Cycle commencing with Whang-ti. But indeed the Authors above mention'd are silent in this, and other Particulars, relating to the Cycle; which yet it is necessary to know before we can judge of the Accuracy of the Chinese Chronology, and how high their Account of Time may be traced with any Certainty.

It is true the Reason P. du Halde assigns for this Alteration (for he produces no Chinese Author to give him a Sanction) is the Uncertainty with regard to the length of the Reigns of the first six Emperors. But on the other hand P. Couplet assures us that the Chinese Historians agree almost unanimously therein, notwithstanding their varying in applying the Cycles. [P. Couplet ubi Supr.] and was it true that they did not, the Reason P. du Halde alledges is insufficient; since the Cycles have no Dependence on the Reigns, as the Reigns have on them, and the first of them is fix'd by the Chinese to the Reign of Whang-ti.

In Effect, this Innovation seems to have been made for no other End than to make the Chinese Chronology more consistent with that of the Bible; which is the thing P. du Halde has been labouring at so much, thro' his Preface; but who would not strain a Point, even farther than this, to serve so good a Turn?

However it is easy to reduce P. du Halde's Chronology to the current Account of Time in China, or to the Era of Whang-ti, by adding six Cycles to that used by our Author.

P. du Halde seems to have committed still a greater Innovation; and to begin the Cycles with the first Year of Yau's Reign; but on Examination that proves to be an Error, which affects only his first Cycle, as we shall observe when we come to the Reign of that Emperor.

(x) As P. du Halde does not inform us whence he had his History, we cannot say precisely whether it is a Translation of, or an Extract from, a Chinese Author. It contains several things, omitted by PP. Martini and Couplet; tho' for the most part it is the same in Substance, with what those Authors have already publish'd on the same Subject. But it is neither so copious as the Sinica Historia of the former, nor so strictly Fasti or Annals as the Monarchie Sinica Chronologica Tabula of the latter; the Cycle not being so commodiously apply'd, nor the Facts so regularly dated, and ranged in Chronological Order.

FO - HI, the First Emperor.

Fo-hi, first
Emperor.

E was born in the Province of Sben-fi (G), and chosen on account of his Superior Merit to govern his Countrymen, who call'd him Tyen-tse, that is, the Son of Heaven; thereby to denote that he was more favour'd by Heaven than the rest of Mankind, since it was from thence that he received those exalted, and extraordinary Qualities, which rais'd him to the Throne.

In these early times, says a certain Author, Men differ'd little from Beasts; they knew their Mothers, but not their Fathers; they were unciviliz'd and rude; they never eat but when press'd

(c) The Word in the Chingfi is Chau, which signifies neither Dynasty, Race, Family nor Succession, but a certain Number of Years; the whole Time which any Race possess'd the Dominion, being call'd the Chau of such a Race. For Instance, the Hya Chau, that is, the Chau of the Hya, or the Space of Time, during which the Hya reign'd; so they say the Shang-Chau, or the Chau of the Shang, &c. [Voy. Fourm. Refl. Critiq. sur Hist. Anc. Peupl. Tom. 2. p. 377.]

(v) Voy. Fourmont Refl. Crit. sur Hist. Anc. Peupl. Vol. 2. p. 441 & seq. from whom I have added this.

(z) In the Original by Mistake 236.

(r) In the Original this Number and the following are transposed by some Mistake.

(o) He removed his Seat from Sben-fi to Chin-chew, a City of Honan. [P. Couplet Pref. ad Sinic. Chronol. p. 20.] press'd by Hunger, and when that was satisfy'd they threw away what was left; they swallow'd the Hair, drank their Blood, and clothed themselves with the Skins of Animals.

Fo-bi taught them how to make Fishing-Nets, and Snares for Birds; also to rear Domestic Animals, as well for Food as for Sacrifices (H), whereby he provided for the Subsistence of his People. This Prince perceiving afterwards that the knotted Cords, which serv'd instead of Characters, and to instruct their Children, were unfit for publishing his Laws, and transmitting his Documents to Posterity; he invented the eight Qua, consisting of three Lines each, which, differently combin'd, make sixty four, to serve as Symbols for expressing whatever he had a mind.

These eight Qua or Symbols, whose Lines are either whole or broken, signify certain general Things, on which depend the Corruption and Generation of particular Things; one represents Heaven, another the Earth, the third Thunder and Lightning, the fourth Mountains, the fifth Fire, the sixth the Clouds, the seventh Water, and the eighth the Wind. He taught them how to make use of these famous Symbols; and to give the greater Credit to his new Laws, pretended that he had seen them inscrib'd on the Back of a Dragon-Horse, which rose from the Bottom of a Lake; he call'd it a Dragon-Horse, because it was shap'd like a Horse, with the Scales and Wings of a Dragon.

He took Occasion, from this Prodigy having gain'd him Reputation among the People, to create Officers, or Mandarins, under the Name of the Dragon. He call'd one the flying Dragon, and his Employment was to compose Books; he call'd another the Dragon that hides himself, whose Business it was to make the Kalender; a third was nam'd the Dragon who inhabits, and he had the Inspection of the Buildings; a fourth, call'd the Dragon Protector, had the Charge of relieving the People, and preventing their Miseries; a fifth, under the Name of the Terrestrial Dragon, had the Care of the Lands; a sixth was call'd the Dragon of the Waters, whose Office it was to procure the Growth of Trees and Plants, as also a Communication between Springs.

He establish'd a Prime Minister, and divided the Government of his Realm among four Mandarins; one of whom he sent to the North, another to the South, the third to the East, and the fourth to the West; in this Manner he gave Strength to his Laws. The two Sexes were not then distinguish'd by different Habits, but mix'd together, lived without Shame, and in perfect Ignorance of the connubial Laws. Fo-bi, to reform this Abuse, ordained that Women should go clothed in a different Manner from Men; and made Laws for conjugal Society, by one of which no Man could marry a Woman of the same Name, whether related or not, which Custom continues to this Day; for Instance, those of the Name of Yong, Li, &c. can not marry Wives of the same Name, altho' remov'd twenty Generations, or of different Families.

To mitigate the natural Fierceness of his new Subjects, and calm wild and turbulent Spirits, he invented Music, with the Instrument Kin (1); the upper part of which was convex, to represent the Heavens, and the under part flat, to represent the Earth. If the Harmony invented by Fo-bi was no better than what the Chinese make at present, we cannot conceive how it could have any Effect on the Mind; for this they apologize by saying, That the Music of Fo-bi was all divine, but that it is a Treasure they have irrecoverably lost.

Fo-bi dying (K), was buried in a Place called Chin, and was succeeded by Shin-nong. A certain Chinese Historian places fifteen Princes before Shin-nong, but others following the common Opinion affirm, that these fifteen Princes were no more than Lords of tributary Provinces, much like the Chu hou in after times.

SHIN-NONG, the second Emperor.

THE People being exceedingly multiply'd, the Plants and Animals were not sufficient to prevent Famine. Shin-nong, touch'd with the Misery of his Subjects, study'd to render the Earth fruitful, and inventing the Implements proper for Tillage, taught the People to sow five sorts of Grain. Hence he got the Name of Shin-nong, or Celestial Husbandman; he taught them also how to make Salt of Sea-Water.

The People becoming subject to many Diseases, for which they knew not the proper Remedies, Shin-nong made Trial on himself of the Virtues of Simples, and discover'd their good and bad Qualities; he consider'd, says the Chinese Historian, their Nature whether hot, cold or temperate, and made use of them accordingly, as a good King does of his Subjects. In one Day he discover'd seventy (L) poisonous Herbs, and had the Art of making them useful, that is, he found out the Counterpoison: After which he compos'd Books of Medicine, and taught the way to restore sick Folks to their Health; whence he is look'd on as the Author and Prince of Physic.

The Simplicity of Manners kept out the Spirit of Contention. Every one had enough to live on; the Laws were few, and there was no Occasion to multiply them, but the Government was majestic and severe. Shin-nong introduc'd Commerce, and appointed publick Markets, where the People resorted about Noon, and having furnish'd themselves with what they wanted, return'd quietly home.

(H) Which he offer'd to the Spirit of Heaven and Earth. [P. Compleat Pref. ad Sinic. Chronol. p. 20.]

(I) He invented two Instruments, one of twenty seven, and the other of thirty eight Strings. Ibid.

(K) He is reported to have begun his Reign 2952 Years before the Christian Era, and to have sat one hundred and fifteen Years on the Throne. [Ibid. & P. Martini Sinic. Hist. L. 1. p. 21. Art. Fo-him.]

(L) Martini agrees with our Author in this Point; but Compleat says only twelve Poisonous Herbs.

While this Emperor was wholly employ'd about the Good of his Subjects, a tributary Prince, named So-sha, revolted, and refused to obey his Orders. But his Disobedience was punish'd by his own Subjects, who put him to Death; after which every one return'd to his Duty. Nor was there one throughout the Empire, who did not willingly submit to the mild and just Government of Shin-nong.

His Death.

He dy'd at Cba-byang, a Place depending on Cbang-cha. A certain Chinese Author says, that Cba-byang is the City call'd at present Cba-lin-chew; which is under the Jurisdiction of Cbang-cha-fu, the Capital of the Southern part of the Province of Hu-quang. (M)

Successors uncertain.

Some Historians place seven Emperors between Shin-nong and Wbang-ti, viz. Lin-que, Cbeng, Ming, I, Lay, Li, and Yu-wang; this last was deposed, and perhaps the rest were no more than tributary Princes. However, it is certain that the Chinese Historians place only Fo-bi, Shin-nong, and Wbang-ti among the first Emperors to whom Arts and Sciences owe their Rise and Progress.

W H A N G - T I ^(N), the Third Emperor.

Wbang-ti, 3d. Emp.

THE History relates that Yu-wang was a Prince of a passionate and violent Temper; that the People groan'd under the Oppression of his Government; that the tributary Princes revolting, one of them, nam'd Cbi-yew, first appear'd in Arms against him; that the Emperor was deposed, and Wbang-ti, who was but twelve Years of Age, placed by the Princes on the Throne; that the Mother of Shin-nong had a younger Brother, who was hereditary Sovereign of the Principality of Shau-tyen; and that the Wife of the Regulo thereof, in the Reign of Yu-wang, was nam'd Fu-pau, who being much frighten'd with a Noise of Thunder, brought forth Wbang-ti, on a Mountain call'd Swen ywen. He was according to the History a wonderful Child; he spoke almost as soon as he was wean'd from the Breast. In his Infancy he discover'd a great deal of Wit and Address; in his Youth an exceeding good Nature and Sweetness of Temper; and in his Manhood an extraordinary Depth of Judgment and Sagacity.

Invents the Compass.

Cbi-yew, above-mention'd, was a Prince whose restless Temper and unbounded Ambition occasion'd great Disturbances. Wbang-ti attack'd and fought three Battles with him; when perceiving that the thickness of the Fogs hinder'd him from pursuing his Enemy, and that the Soldiers stray'd from following the right Course; he contriv'd a Card, which shew'd them the South and the other three Cardinal Points; by which means, at length, overtaking Cbi-yew, he seiz'd and put him to Death. Some say that on the Card were engraven the Characters of the Rat and the Horse, and Underneath a Needle to point out the four Quarters of the World. We see here the use of the Compass, or something like it, of great Antiquity, and expressly recorded; it is pity they have not explain'd the Method of it, but the Expositors knowing only the bare Fact, durst not venture on any Conjectures of their own. (O)

Makes Roads thro' his Dominions.

Creates 6 Ko-lau.Invents the Kya-tse or Cycle of 60 Years.

A Sphere and the Kalendar.

Having regulated the most important Affairs of the Empire, Wbang-ti employ'd his whole Care to make his People happy, by procuring them all sorts of Conveniences: he cut thro' and levell'd Mountains, made great Roads to facilitate Commerce, and enlarg'd the Bounds of his Empire; extending it Eastward as far as the Ocean, Northward to ancient Tartary, and Southward to the River Kyang, which serv'd as a Barrier to his Dominions. He created six Ko-lau, or Prime Ministers, to assist him in governing the Empire, and made Tsang-kyay, the Mandarin for composing the History. Ta-nau had the Charge of making the Kya-tse, or Cycle of sixty Years (P). This Cycle is compos'd on one side of ten Characters, nam'd Tyen-kan, and on the other of twelve, call'd Ti-chi. These Characters signify nothing (Q), but serve instead of Numbers and Signs; the first ten are call'd the ten Roots, and the others the twelve Branches. Every Year is mark'd by two of them, that is one of each sort, which are so combin'd, that the same two Signs never come together till the Cycle is out. (R)

Yong-cheng was order'd to make a Sphere and Kalendar; he discover'd the Pole-Star and the others that are about it. But what Figure the Sphere was of which he invented, representing the celestial Orbs, is not known. In short, by means of several Experiments he could foretell the Changes of the Weather and Air.

Li-chew's Office was to regulate Numbers and Measures. The Method he invented to cast up any Sum, and which is still in use, consists of a little Box, divided in two Parts, cross'd with several Iron Wires, thro' which pass little Balls. On every Wire in the upper Division there

(M) He translated the Imperial Seat from Ho-nan to Yu-chew in Shan-ting. He is said to have dy'd in his Progress thro' Hu-quang, after he had reign'd one hundred and forty Years, and to have been interr'd in the City Tsing. [Couplet, ibid.]

(N) Wbang-ti signifies the Yellow Emperor.

(O) As P. de Halde does not produce his Authors, to warrant the Antiquity of this Fact, it may have been inserted into their History of late Ages, to do Honour to the Founders of their Monarchy. Indeed as the thing is related it has the Air of a Fiction; nothing can be more absurd than to suppose a Compass invented to direct an Army in pursuit of a vanquish'd Enemy; if they were in View, as it should seem they were, being just defeated, the Victors had no Occasion for a Compass to direct them; if they were not in View, of what use was a Compass to find them out? Could they divine on what Point of the Card the Enemy was fled, and yet not know how to find that Point out? In short, was not Wbang-ti himself sufficient to shew them the Way? However that be, it is not likely, if so useful a Secret had once been discover'd, that it ever would have been lost.

(P) These Chinese call this Cycle Lo-shi-ueh-lyu, that is, the Construction of sixty Conversions. [Couplet Præf. ib. p. 14.]

(Q) These Characters are the Names of Animals.

(R) P. Noel has given a Scheme of this Cycle, [Noel Obs. Math. & Phys. p. 39.] Ought bright treats of it at large, [de Epichis Celestibus, Cap. 6. p. 42.] but his Translator Grauert has committed many Mistakes in writing the Names of the Characters, as Dr. Hyde has justly remark'd. [Hyde de Mens. & Pand. Sinic. p. 30.]

there are only two Balls, each standing for five; but every Wire of the lower Division, which is much larger, has five Balls, each of which stands for one. When they reckon from right to left, the Numbers multiply the same as in Cyphering with us; which Method of casting Accounts is more ready and sure than ours with the Pen.

With regard to Measures, he took a Grain of Millet to determine the Dimension of a Line, reckoning ten Lines to an Inch, ten Inches to a Foot, &c. The various ways of ranging these Grains, which are of an Oval Figure, have occasion'd a Diversity in the Measures under different Dynasties.

Under the present Dynasty there are three sorts of Measures, 1. the Foot of the Palace, which is to the Paris Foot as ninety seven and an half to a hundred. 2. The Foot of the Tribunal of Publick Works, call'd Kong-pu, used by Workmen, is shorter by one Line than the Paris Foot. 3. The Taylors Foot, made use of also by the Mercers, is seven Lines larger than the Kong-pu.

To Ling-lun was given the Care of improving Music, and to explain the Order and Arrangement of the different Tones. Lastly Yong-yuen had Orders to make twelve Copper Bells, which represented the twelve Months of the Year.

W'hang-ti afterwards invented the Bonnet or Cap, call'd Myen, to serve him for a Diadem. This Bonnet dip'd a little before and rose behind, it was seven Inches broad and one Foot two Inches high. He also made Habits and Ornaments, proper for his Dignity; his Robe was blew and yellow, to imitate the Colours of the Sky and Earth. After having maturely consider'd the Feathers of the Pheasant, and various Colours of Birds and Flowers, he found out the Art of Dying, and order'd that the Stuffs, wherewith the Rich and Poor were clothed, should be of different Colours. He caus'd several useful Instruments to be made, as Machines to pound Rice, Kitchen-Stoves, Cauldrons, &c. and the People began to eat their Rice dress'd after different Manners, sometimes thicker, sometimes thinner. He caus'd Bridges to be built over Rivers, and Coffins to be made for the Dead. He taught the way of making Bows and Arrows; also Wind Instruments, as Flutes, Fifes, and Organs; Trumpets that imitated the Voice of the Dragon, and Drums that made the Noise of Thunder. Observing hollow Trees to swim, he caus'd Barks to be made, to which he added Oars. He likewise invented Waggon, and order'd Oxen and Horses to be train'd to draw them. His Subjects dwelling at that time in miserable Hutts, he drew Models for Building, and caus'd a Palace to be erected, nam'd Ho-kong, where he sacrific'd to the sovereign Lord of Heaven. To facilitate Trade, he coin'd Money, which he call'd Kin-tau, because it had the Figure of a Knife-Blade; and regulated the Expences of the Empire so well, that its Riches grew immense.

Mankind being tormented, from without by the Rigour of the Seasons, and within by their Passions, dy'd before their Time; therefore W'hang-ti having attentively consider'd the five Elements, the Seasons of the Year, and the Nature of Man, order'd three Doctors, nam'd Ki-pe, Yu-fu, and Ley-keng, to examine the Blood-Vessels, after which he appointed the Remedies proper for every Disease, so that Men lived as long as they ought to do, according to the Course of Nature. He order'd the Empress to teach the People the Manner of rearing Silk-Worms, to spin their Webs, and make Cloaths thereof (A). This Prince enjoy'd not a Moments Repose, and tho' he had taught his Subjects to build Houses, and had a Palace built for himself, yet he had no fix'd Abode, but encamp'd with his Soldiers in the Field.

He caus'd the Country to be measur'd, and divided it into Cheu; he establish'd several Principalities, consisting of a hundred Li each, wherein he built Cities. According to his Appointment, two hundred and forty Paces in length, and one in breadth, made a Mu, and a hundred Mu one King; so that the Pace consisting of five Feet, every Mu of Land contain'd six thousand square Feet, and the King six hundred thousand. He appointed also, that nine King should be call'd Tsing, and that a Tsing should be allotted to eight Families, each to have one King or a hundred Mu; the King which remain'd in the Middle to belong to the Emperor, and to be cultivated in common by the eight Families. He caus'd four Roads to be made to every Tsing, and farther ordain'd that three Tsing should be call'd Ho-ki; three Ho-ki one Street; five Streets a Town; ten Towns a Tu; ten Tu a She; and ten She a Cheu.

W'hang-ti dy'd on the Mountain King-shan, and was interr'd in the Province of Shan-tong. The Chinese Historians bestow on him the highest Praises: The Virtue and Endowments of this Prince, say they, equal Heaven and Earth; his Government was admirable, his Laws firm, and his Conduct unchangeable; he scatter'd his Benefits all over the Earth, and we still feel the Effects of his Liberality, insomuch that tho' he be dead, he may be said to be yet living. He had twenty five Children, whereof Shau-kau succeeded him in the Empire. (B)

(A) She also taught them the Art of Dying. [Couplet.]

(B) His Seat was at Che-chow, in the Province of Pe-cheli. He appropriated the yellow Colour to the Emperors, as their Livery, forbidding others to wear it. He invented Astronomy, Music, and Musical Instruments; also Arms, the Bow, Nets, Chariots, Barks, the Art of Building, making Earthen-Ware, Measures, and Weights; wrote several Books on the Method of discovering Diseases by the Pulse. Eighty-five Emperors of three Imperial Families, which continu'd 2457 Years, derive their Pedigree from W'hang-ti. He dy'd in the fortieth Year of the second Cycle, aged one hundred and eleven Years, whereof he reign'd a hundred. [Vid. Couplet Tab. Chron. Musar. Sinic. p. 1, 2.]

SHAU-HAU, the Fourth Emperor.

Shau-hau, 4th
Emperor.

THIS Prince gain'd the Esteem and Love of his People by the Mildness and Goodness of his Disposition. It is reported that the Feng-wbang (c) appear'd at his coming to the Crown, which was look'd on as a happy Omen; because the Chinese say this Bird never appears but when good Kings are upon the Throne.

The Feng-wbang, or Phoenix.

This Feng-wbang is a very extraordinary, or rather fabulous Bird, much like our Phoenix; according to the Chinese way of painting it, it resembles an Eagle, but differs a great deal from it, in the wonderful Variety of its Colours.

The Orders of Mandarins distinguish'd by Birds.

From the pretended Appearance of this Bird, the Emperor took the Hint to distinguish his Officers by the Figure of divers Birds, which they wore on their Cloaths; a Custom that is still observ'd. Those of the Literary Mandarins are embroider'd with Birds in Gold, as a Mark of their Dignity; those of the Mandarins of War are adorn'd with Animals, such as the Dragon, Lyon, Tiger, &c. by which Marks the People know the Rank which the several Officers bear in the nine prime Orders of the State.

Kyew, or preaching
Mandarins.

Among the Mandarins of the new Creation, some of them, call'd Kyew, were oblig'd to assemble the People; it was the Business of others to govern the five sorts of Artificers, while others had an Eye to the Tillage, and the Manners of the People.

This Prince govern'd his Dominions with much Equity. The Chinese Authors say, he was an exact Imitator of Fo-li; he reform'd the Measures for Grain, and had a Drum made to beat the Watches; he clear'd the Channels of Rivers, and smoothed the Roads over the Mountains; in short he invented a new sort of Music, that united Spirits with Mortals, and reconcil'd the high with the low; whence he is call'd Ta-ywen.

This Emperor dy'd very old, and left five Sons, whereof four were Men of Merit; but perceiving greater Talents in his Nephew Chwen-tyo, who was Wbang-ti's Grandson, he prefer'd him before his own Children to be his Successor in the Empire. (D)

CHWEN-HYO, the Fifth Emperor,

Chwen-tyo,
5th Emp.

WAS so far from distrusting those whose Station he fill'd, that as soon as he was on the Throne, he conferr'd considerable Employments on them, suitable to their respective Capacities. As these Princes had a perfect Knowledge of the Nature of Metals, Waters, Trees, &c. he made one Governor of the Mines, another Master of the Waters, Forests, &c. and being assur'd of their Fidelity, rais'd them afterwards to the most honourable and important Posts.

Unites the Priesthood with the Imperial Digi-
nity.

Towards the End of the Reign of Shau-hau the People began to intrude into the sacred Ministry, each Family affecting to have Sacrificers among them; which Abuse Chwen-tyo reform'd, by uniting the Priesthood to the Crown, and ordaining that none but the Emperor should offer solemn Sacrifices to the Lord of Heaven. This Law has always been and still is observ'd; for the Emperor alone is the Pontif, and has a right to offer Sacrifices in the Temple of Heaven, from which if he be hinder'd by Age or Sickness, he deposes a Prince or some Great Man to perform that Duty in his stead.

Improves
Astronomy.

As this Emperor was an able Astronomer, he chang'd the Method of calculating and observing the Celestial Motions; which being to be view'd only at a Distance, he invented an Instrument to give a clearer Notion of them, and shew the Equations, Ascensions, &c.

Regulates the Kalendar

The Interpreters say nothing about the Construction and Figure of this Instrument, which it is probable they were ignorant of. They speak only of the Conjunction of the five Planets in the Constellation Sbe, that happen'd in this Emperor's Reign; but as an able Chinese Astronomer remarks, it is an hypothetical Conjunction, not a real one. (*)

Chwen-tyo regulated the Kalendar also, ordering that the Year should begin the first Day of the Month, wherein the Conjunction of the Sun and Moon should fall nearest the fifteenth Degree

(c) It appear'd before in the time of Wbang-ti. (1)

(D) He built Cities for Men to dwell in; caus'd Chariots to be drawn by Oxen. Kyew li, or the 9 Regulo's, disturb the Order of Sacrifices, terrifying the People with Spectres and Goblins, which gave Rise to Superstitions, that brought the Empire in Danger. Shau-hau was born, reign'd, and bury'd in Kyew-fu in the Province of Sban-tung. (2) Martini makes Kyew-li a single Impostor. (3)

(*) As the Conjunctions of the Planets have always been look'd on as good Omens; these false Conjunctions often occur in the History, especially at the Change of Dynasties. To find one, we need go no farther back than the second Year of the present Emperor, when the Conjunction of 4 Planets was thought sufficient Reason for making 5 of them, in Favour of the new Monarch. The Emperor seem'd rejoic'd at it, and receiv'd the Compliments of the whole Court on that Occasion; every one found his account in it, especially the Tribunal of the Mathematics, which did not err thro' Ignorance. A certain Situation of other Planets in respect of those in Conjunction, was sufficient Ground with them to form an Aspect, which flatter'd the Emperor, and was of Benefit to themselves. This false Conjunction, which is set down in the Registers, may possibly cause Disputes and Objections hereafter. What if 2 or 3,000 Years hence, on calculating this Conjunction of Planets in Europe, they should not find Saturn among them; would that be a sufficient Reason to doubt of the other Facts recorded in the Reign of Yang-ching? It would certainly be none to the Chinese, who being accusom'd to these Flatteries to their Emperors, know how to make Allowance for them.

[This Apology, which in the Original is inserted in the Text, does not free the Chinese History, as it is design'd to do, from a Suspicion of being corrupted in other Respects; on the contrary it shews it is liable to be corrupted, and if in Matters which flatter the Emperors, why not in those which flatter the Antiquity, &c. of the Empire and Nation?]

gree of Aquarius; whence he is call'd the Author and Father of the Ephemerides. He pitch'd on the Time when the Sun was in the middle of the Sign; because then the Earth is adorn'd with Flowers and Plants, the Trees resume their Verdure, and every thing in Nature revives and seems to be produc'd anew.

This Prince, who dy'd very aged, was interr'd at Pu-yang, and succeeded by Ti-ko, or Kau-sin, the Emperor Shau-bau's Grandson. To the Descendants of Chwen-hyo, who were very numerous, were afterwards given (E) several little Dominions, whereof they were Kings or tributary Princes. (F)

TI-KO, or KAU-SIN, the Sixth Emperor.

THIS King is greatly extoll'd by the Chinese Writers; they say he had a penetrating Judgment, and saw into every thing; that he examin'd all things himself, and entered into the minutest Particulars. He was popular without losing his Majesty, lov'd his Subjects, distributed his Bounty every where, reform'd himself, and was a religious Worshipper of the sovereign Lord of Heaven, whom he serv'd respectfully. His grand and august Air drew Veneration; his Virtue was eminent; he did nothing amiss, and kept a just Medium in all things. In short there was no Nation, enlighten'd by the Sun, and water'd by Rain, but what took Pleasure to obey his Orders. He establish'd Masters to teach the People Virtue, and invented Vocal Music; Hyen-bo was the first, who made Songs by his Order. He appointed others to make different sorts of Instruments, as Flutes, both direct and transverse, a Drum, a Bell, a King, (which is a thin flat Plate, beaten with a Wooden Mallet). He caus'd that Music to be play'd, which he nam'd Lü-ing, that is, the Beauty of Heaven, Earth, and the four Seasons.

Ti-ko, 6th Emperor.

Invents Vocal Music.

He set the first Example of Polygamy, by marrying four Wives. He had by the first a Son, nam'd Ki, whose Descendants founded the Dynasty of Chew; by the second, Sze, whose Posterity founded that of Shang; by the third he had Yau; and the fourth brought him Cbi, which last was so hopeful a Prince, that the Emperor chose him his Successor before the rest. (G)

Introduces Polygamy.

CHI, the Seventh Emperor.

THIS Prince did not answer the Opinion at first conceiv'd of his Merit, making use of his Authority only to serve his brutal Pleasures. The tributary Princes, who were accustomed to obey wise Emperors, unable to bear his excessive Riots, made him several Remonstrances on his Conduct; which having no Effect, they dethron'd and banish'd him, setting his Brother Yau on his Throne. (H)

Cbi, 7th Emperor.

There is no applying the Sexagenary Cycle before the Reign of Yau, for tho' invented by Wbang-ti, the Duration of these first Reigns is very uncertain. On the contrary, from Yau to Christ the Chronology is perfectly well deduc'd; the Chinese Authors having set down the particular Transactions of every Year, even to the Divisions that have disturb'd the Empire, and the Interregnums, with the Time of their Continuance; which Reasons have led me to begin the Cycle with that Emperor. (I)

YAU, the Eighth Emperor, reign'd alone seventy two Years, and twenty eight with SHUN, whom he associated in the Empire.

THIS Prince ascended the Throne in the forty first Year of the preceding Cycle (K). He is consider'd as the first Legislator of the Nation, and the Model of the Sovereigns. All the Emperors who were jealous of their Reputation, endeavour'd to imitate him and his Successor; and it is at present the greatest Praise that can be given to a Chinese Monarch, to say that he is like Yau, Shun, &c.

Yau, 8th Emperor.

Cycle I. Years before Christ 2337.

(E) It is the Emperor always who grants these Estates to the Princes, either as being his Relations, or on account of their Merit. They hold of the Empire much like the Dukes and Counts of Europe; and if the Emperor is engag'd in War, they are oblig'd to attend him with a certain Number of Troops.

(F) His Seat was at the Town of Wu, in the Province of Shan-tsi.

(G) His Seat was at Yen-fu, a City of Ho-nan. Peace all his Reign. He created his Brothers and their Sons Regulo's in the Province of Se-chuen. He dy'd in the thirty second Year of the sixth Cycle, ag'd 105. (2)

(H) He reign'd eight Years, being deposed the fortieth Year of the sixth Cycle; and is not reckon'd among the Emperors. (3)

(I) We have already shewn, p. 135. that this seems to be an Innovation in the Chinese Chronology.

(K) There are two or three considerable Mistakes in the Original in this Place; for P. du Halde by connecting as he does the first Year of the Cycle with the Year 2357 before Christ, which coincides with the first Year of Yau's Reign, not only contradicts himself, and commits a great Anachronism (in telling us at the same time that Yau began his Reign the forty first Year of the former Cycle,) but makes the Cycle commence twenty Years earlier than the Chinese Historians. When I first met with this Passage, I concluded P. du Halde had determin'd to overturn the whole Chinese Chronology, by altering the Beginnings of the Cycles (and consequently misplacing the Dates of all Events) as well as retrenching their Number; but on Examination I found the Error went no farther, for his second Cycle (and generally all the rest of the Cycles) is collated with the right Year before Christ. However by referring the Beginning of Yau's Reign to a Cycle preceding the first Cycle, he seems not only to commit a Solecism, no less absurd than to refer to an Olympiad before the first Olympiad; but tacitly confesses, that he hath retrench'd Cycles from the Chinese Era. To have express'd himself therefore consistently with his new Chronology, he should have said Yau began his Reign twenty Years before the first Cycle.

CYCLE I.
Christ 2337.
Great Character.

The Historians tell us, that Virtue was natural to him; he was active, laborious, vigilant, and of such Penetration and Understanding that he foresaw every thing. His Moderation and Equity kept the Laws in Force, and at the same time made them esteem'd. He never employ'd his Authority, but for the Good of his Subjects. His Modesty was equal to his Dignity, and was remarkable even when he receiv'd Homages. His Frugality in his Diet was such, that he contented himself with the coarsest Meats; he used no magnificent Furniture; his Palace was without any Ornaments, and his Cloaths were of Woolen Stuffs during Summer, and of Deer-Skins in Winter. If any publick Calamity happen'd, or one of his Subjects committed a Crime, he imputed the Misfortune to his own Want of Virtue, or as a Punishment of Heaven, for his neglecting to instruct them. He never visited his Dominions, without having first offer'd Sacrifices to the sovereign Master of Heaven, and his Subjects long'd with as much Impatience for the Happiness of seeing him, as the parch'd Fields thirst for Rain. In short his Reign was so mild and amiable, that his Subjects scarce perceiv'd they had a Master. The Chinese Philosophers are wont to enforce their Maxims of Morality from their Uniformity with the Conduct and Actions of this Emperor and his two Successors; which Conformity, once prov'd, give them an undisputable Authority.

Astronomy cultivated.

Yau, who delighted mightily in observing the Heavens, order'd two able Mathematicians, call'd Hi and Ho, carefully to examine the Motions of the Moon and Stars, and make proper Instruments for observing them; by their Assistance he regulated the twelve Lunar Months, and re-establish'd the intercalated ones, which return'd seven times in nineteen Years.

The Empress had the Care of breeding Silk-Worms, and teaching Women how to make better Silk Manufactures than had been made before; for the first Essays were very coarse, as is always the Case, especially in Arts which require much Time and Experience to bring them to Perfection.

The six supreme Tribunals established.

Chinese Inundation.

This Prince introduc'd a new Regulation in the Administration of Affairs, by establishing six Supreme Tribunals, which still subsist. His Reputation for Virtue and wise Government drew several neighbouring Nations into his Dominions; but his Subjects had increas'd to such a Degree that there was not Room for so many Strangers as came to settle in the Provinces; chiefly because the Low Lands were overflow'd; which Inundation was either the Remains of the Universal Deluge, as many believe, or occasion'd by the Rivers meeting with some Obstruction in their Course. To recover these drown'd Lands, and render them of use, he order'd an Officer, nam'd Yuen, to drain the Plains by opening a Passage for the Waters to the Sea. This Officer, either thro' Negligence or Ignorance, spent nine Years to no Purpose about this Work, for which he was put to Death. His Son Yu, repairing his Father's Fault, after thirteen Years indefatigable Labour, levell'd Mountains, turn'd the great Rivers into their natural Channels, drain'd the Lakes and Marshes, confin'd several rapid Torrents between Banks, and divided the lesser Rivers into different Canals, which ended in the Sea; by this means he enlarg'd the Provinces, and render'd them more fertile; nor was so important a Piece of Service unrequited, as we shall see hereafter.

Care in choosing a Successor.

In the mean time Yau thought of choosing a Successor; wherein he was govern'd, not by the Dictates of Paternal Affection, but the Welfare of his People. Discovering his Design one Day to the Lords of his Court, one of them said, His eldest Son was as worthy of the Throne as of being his Son; and that the People would be sure to find hereditary Virtue in his Race, to which Yau reply'd: I detest those who love the Wicked as much as those who blame the Good. I know what my Son is; under the specious Appearance of Virtue, he conceals real Vices. Which Answer stop'd the Mouths of all the Courtiers.

Great Self-denial in a Minister of State.

Some time after Yau sent for one of his Ministers, whom he most confided in for his Prudence and Integrity, in order to resign the Crown to him. But that wise Minister refus'd the Honour, alledging that the Burden was too heavy for his Shoulders; and at the same time propos'd a Husbandman, nam'd Sbun, whose Virtue, Probity, and Patience under the severest Trials, join'd to the Confidence which all good Men had in him, and an infinite Number of other excellent Qualities, rendred him worthy of the Throne.

Yau hereon sent for Sbun, and to make Trial of his Abilities, rais'd him to be Governor of a Province; where he got so great Reputation for Wisdom, Prudence, Moderation and Equity, that at the End of three Years, Yau made him his Associate in the Empire, and gave him both his Daughters in Marriage.

Christ 2277.

The Emperor liv'd twenty eight Years in great Harmony with his new Colleague; and at length perceiving himself near his End, he exhorted Sbun to govern his Subjects like a true Father, and remember that he was made more for the People, than the People for him; and that an Emperor is exalted above the rest of Mankind, to no other End but to procure their Advantage, and prevent their Necessities. Having spoken these Words, he departed in the hundred and eighteenth Year of his Age, leaving nine Children behind him; the People, who found in this Prince the Love and Tendernefs of a Father and Mother, mourn'd for him the Space of three Years.

for a Parent.

YAU dying in the twentieth Year of this Cycle, Shun began the Year following to reign alone, and is reckon'd one of the Chinese Lawgivers, as well as his Predecessor. Soon after Shun trusted the Government to his Ministers, and shut himself up for three Years in Yau's Tomb, the more freely to vent his Grief for the loss of a Prince, whom he consider'd as his Father; whence the Custom arose of mourning three Years for one's Parents.

The Chinese Historians attribute the Advancement of Shun to the Submission and Obedience he always shew'd to his Parents. Tho' he receiv'd nothing but bad Usage from them, and his Life was often in Danger, he mildly bore all their ill Treatment, so that by degrees his Respect and Patience wrought a Change in their Hearts, and made them virtuous. From hence the Chinese Philosophers deduce two great Principles of Morality; first, That however wicked Fathers and Mothers may be, the Children are not the less bound to pay them Respect and Obedience. Secondly, That there is no Man so bad, but may be reclaim'd at last by good Offices.

Shun having discharged his Duty of Piety and Gratitude towards Yau, took Possession of the Imperial Palace, and receiv'd the Homage of all the Tributary Princes. Finding abundance of Gold and Jewels in the Palace, he caus'd a Sphere to be made, exhibiting the Seven Planets; each of which was represented by the Precious Stone most suitable to it. He made new Laws for governing the Realm, and appointed inferior Officers to assist in the six Tribunals establish'd by his Predecessor. He always honour'd Philosophers and Men of Learning with his Favour and Protection. He visit'd the Provinces every Year; and in his Progress rewarded or punish'd the Tributary Princes with so much Justice, that he gain'd the Esteem and Admiration of the People.

A Sphere of Jewels.

One of his principal Cares was to procure Plenty and to make Agriculture flourish; for which end he forbade the Governors, under severe Penalties, to exact Days-work from the Husbandman, as a thing that was a Hardship, and tended to flaken their Ardor for tilling the Lands.

He was equally careful, not to trust Governments to any but Persons of Merit and Capacity. In a word, he made several other Ordinances, the Wisdom and Justice of which have in all times caus'd him to be look'd on, as one of the greatest Heroes China ever produc'd. One of these Ordinances may appear somewhat extraordinary, as it permits any of his Subjects to set forth on a Table, expos'd to publick View, whatever he found blameable in his Conduct. He admitted twelve Lords into his Council, six whereof were descended from Chwen-bo, and six from Ti-ko. The Shu-king contains Discourses made by some of these Lords to the Emperor, concerning the Maxims of a wise Government.

The fifty fourth Year of this Cycle he chose a Successor; in which Choice he wholly consult'd the Good of his People, preferring Yu to his own Children, on account of his Capacity and Merit, as well as in some measure to reward the Service he had done the Empire, by draining the Lands that were overflow'd. He lived seventeen Years after he had rais'd Yu to the Throne, and the Union was so great between these two Princes, that the Authority never seem'd to be divided.

THE eleventh Year of the same Cycle, which answers to that of 2207 before Christ (M), Yu or Ta-yu, that is, Yu the Great, ruled alone, and kept his Court in the Province of Shen-si. One of the Sons of Shun, vex'd to see a Stranger on his Father's Throne, had a mind to revolt; but being abandon'd both by the Grandees and the common People, his Attempt only serv'd to fix the Crown more firmly on the Head of Yu, whose great Genius and Virtue had endear'd him exceedingly to the whole Nation.

The Knowledge he had acquir'd of the Nature of Lands, by draining off the Waters, qualify'd him for composing an excellent Piece upon Agriculture; treating of the Method of Tilling and Sowing, and manuring Lands with the different kinds of Dung. Afterwards he caus'd the sloping and rising Grounds to be levell'd, that the Waters might run towards those Places which had most need of it.

He divid'd his whole Dominions into nine Provinces, and caus'd as many great Brazen Vessels to be made, with the Map of a Province engraven on each. In after-times these Vessels became very precious, inasmuch that it was believ'd the Security of the State depended on their Preservation; and whoever could get Possession of them thought himself secure of the Crown. The Empire became hereditary under this Prince, as well as the Priesthood, which had been before united to the Crown, as it has continued inviolably ever since; it being Death by the Law for any Person but the Emperor to offer Sacrifice.

To give the Emperor Tu Advice as to his Conduct, was the way for a Man to gain his Favour; and he thought no Employment more worthy of a Sovereign, than that of rendering Justice to the People. For this End he was accessible at all times; and to make the Admittance more easy, he caus'd a Bell, a Drum, and three Tables, one of Iron, the second of Stone, and the third of Lead, to be fasten'd to the Gates of his Palace; on which was an Order fix'd, enjoining all those who wanted to speak to him, to strike on the Instruments or Tables, according to the Nature of their Business. The Ringing of the Bell distinguish'd Civil Affairs, the Drum was to be beaten for Business relating to the Laws and Religion; the Leaden Table for Matters concerning the Ministry and Government; the Stone Table to denote a Complaint against the Injustice of some Magistrate; and striking on the Table of Iron was to express very severe Treatment.

He always receiv'd graciously, and even with a sort of Acknowledgement, those who came either to give him Advice, or implore his Justice; it is reported, that one Day he rose from Table twice at the Sound of the Bell, and another Day left the Bath three times to hear the Complaints of People. We find in the Shu-king the Instructions he gave the Princes for governing their Dominions, and the Rules he prescribed with regard to bestowing Employments and raising Taxes.

His Sayings.

He us'd to say, that a Sovereign ought to be as cautious of his Conduct, as if he walk'd on Ice; that nothing is more difficult than to reign; that Dangers spring up under a Monarch's Feet; that he has every thing to fear, if he gives himself wholly up to Pleasures; that he ought to avoid Idleness, chuse good Ministers, and follow their Counsels; in short, that when he had once made a wise Resolution, he ought to execute it without the least Delay.

Wine prohibited, and the Inventor banished.

In this Reign I-tse invented the Chinese Wine, a Drink made of Rice; as soon as the Emperor tasted it, he shew'd his Displeasure at it, saying, This Liquor will cause the greatest Troubles in the Empire. He banish'd the Inventor, and forbid the making of it for the future under grievous Penalties. But the Art being preserv'd, the Law prov'd useless, and it is at present one of the greatest Delicacies at the Tables of the Chinese.

TI - KI, the Second Emperor, reign'd Nine Years.

Ti-Ki, second Emperor.

One of the tributary Princes rebels.

ALL the Chinese rejoic'd at so worthy a Successor, and finding in the Son the same Qualities which they admir'd in the Father, were more easily comforted for their Loss. The Beginning of his Reign was disturb'd by a War, declar'd against him by one of the Tributary Princes, who had treated his Subjects rigorously, and design'd to make himself independent; the Emperor therefore put himself at the Head of his Army, and with the Assistance of six other Tributary Princes so reduc'd the Rebel, that it was not in his Power to create new Troubles.

The People did not long enjoy the Happiness they began to taste under the Government of so wise a Prince, for he dy'd in the twenty ninth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Tay-kang.

TAY - KANG, the Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty nine Years.

Tay-kang, third Emperor erects several Principalities.

HE began his Reign by erecting several Territories into Principalities, which he divided among his five Brothers, in order to diminish the Jealousy they might entertain on seeing him prefer'd; but this was the only wise thing he did during his Reign.

Very different from his Predecessors, who were employ'd in governing the State, he abandon'd the Care of it, to give himself up to Wine and Women, with whom his Palace swarm'd. He spent intire Days in the Woods, hunting wild Beasts; his Horses and Dogs laid waste the Plains, and destroy'd the Harvests. The People in general complain'd heavily of this Tyranny; but Cries and Remonstrances proving ineffectual, they were at length driven to Despair, and revolted.

Is deposed by I.

One of his principal Officers, nam'd I, who was General, and had the entire Confidence of the Army, undertook to depose him; accordingly, in concert with the Grandees of the Empire, he seiz'd the Prince in the Woods, where he had been an Inhabitant for three Months, and sending him into Exile, set his youngest Brother nam'd Chong-kang on the Throne. This Revolution, which happen'd in the forty seventh Year of the Cycle, was brought about without the least Disturbance, not one appearing in behalf of the deposed Monarch.

THE Years that pass'd from the Deposition to the Death of Tay-kang are not reckon'd to the Reign of Chong-kang, because he constantly refus'd to take the Title of Emperor during his Brother's Life. This Conduct was no less prudent than modest; he was afraid that I, who had Power and Credit enough to dethrone his Brother, would one day serve him in the same Manner. Nevertheless, as he was beholden to him for the Crown, he found means of providing for his own Security, without being wanting in point of Gratitude. He declar'd that he could not be without the Counsel of so able a Minister as I, and desir'd to have him near his Person. I was caught in the Snare, not doubting but soon to get the Ascendant over the Prince, and govern the Empire in his Name. The Command of the Army being incompatible with this Employment, Chong-kang gave it to Cheu, an able Officer, of approv'd Fidelity.

I, soon perceiving that he had no Share either in the Emperor's Favour, or Confidence, vow'd in Revenge to destroy the Imperial Family; yet he conceal'd his Resentment: But finding he could not execute his Design while Cheu was at the Head of the Troops, and that he had no Hopes of corrupting so faithful a Subject, he attempted several times to make the Prince jealous of him, but in vain; nor did he succeed any better in his Contrivance to destroy him. His last Shift was to gain the Grandees by his Bounty; and he had the Address artfully to insinuate himself into the Confidence and Favour of the Prince who was to inherit the Crown, till he had an Opportunity of effecting his Plot without Hazard. In the mean time Tay-kang dy'd the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle, when Chong-kang assum'd the Title of Emperor.

The second Year, or, according to others, the sixth of this Cycle, there happen'd a remarkable Eclipse of the Sun, at the Time of its Conjunction with the Constellation Fang (♋). Two Astronomers, nam'd Hi and Ho (†), who presided in the Tribunal of the Mathematics, were put to Death, because being overcome with Wine they had not foretold this Eclipse; and that by a like Neglect to calculate and observe the Motions of the Stars, they had disturb'd the Order of the Kalendar, entrusted by the Emperor to their Care, which is a capital Crime. It is the Opinion of some that these Mathematicians secretly favour'd the Treason of I, and suffer'd partly on that account.

Chong-kang dy'd the thirteenth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Ti-syang, the Year following.

TI-SYANG, the Fifth Emperor, reign'd Twenty seven Years.

THE Imprudence of this Prince was the Cause of the Ruin of himself, and almost of his whole Family. Instead of following his Father's Example, by keeping I out of all considerable Employments, Ti-syang put his whole Confidence in him; nay, was so blind, as to deprive the faithful Cheu of his Command of the Army, and give it the Traitor, who by cringing and and flattering was become his Favourite.

Ti-syang, fifth
Emperor.

I, seeing himself restor'd to this important Post, which Chong-kang had depriv'd him of, began to think of executing his long-conceal'd Design. He first gain'd the Affections of the Soldiers; by degrees he accusom'd them to pay more Regard to his Orders than the Emperor's, and thus drew them over to his Interest. In short, he set on Foot so many Intrigues and Conspiracies, that the Emperor was forc'd to fly for Refuge to the Courts of two Tributary Princes his Relations.

I forces the Emperor to fly.

I, during the Time he was in Favour, made a World of Creatures, whom he rais'd to the chief Posts in the Empire; yet fearing lest the other tributary Princes should join the Emperor, he durst not so soon declare his Revolt: but having Recourse to his usual Stratagems and Artifices, he wrote the Emperor a very submissive Letter, full of Protestations of Fidelity, intreating him to return to his Palace, and assur'd him he would soon be convinc'd by Experience, that he had not a Subject more devoted than himself to his Interest and Service. He added that they were his Majesty's greatest Enemies who had given him such ill-grounded Suspicions; in effect, he accus'd them falsely of several Crimes, for which they were either banish'd or condemn'd to die, and their Places fill'd with Creatures of his own.

He thought that he was upon the Point of enjoying the Fruit of his detestable Crimes, when he perish'd himself by a like piece of Treachery. Among his Creatures there was one Han-tso, a dissembling, artful Man, whom he most confided in, and to whom he had given full Power over the Army. This ambitious Villain imagin'd he should mount the Throne himself, if he could destroy both his Benefactor, and his Sovereign, at the same time; and had laid his Plot in such a Manner, that he thought he could not fail of Success; for having order'd some Soldiers, who were intirely devoted to him, to assassinate I, as he was hunting, hunting, he gave out that it was done by the Emperor's Orders; and the Death of I was look'd on as a just Punishment due to a rebellious Subject.

To dispatch the Emperor, he made use of the following Contrivance: He sent for Kyau, the eldest Son of I, who was an active, violent young Man; and exciting him to revenge his Father's Death, furnish'd him secretly with a Body of his Troops for that Purpose. Kyau, marching towards the Emperor, who had not time to gather many Forces, defeated his Army entirely, kill'd him with his own Hand, and afterwards extirpated his whole Family.

The Empress alone escap'd his Fury, who being pregnant, with much Difficulty got to the Mountains. Han-tso immediately seiz'd the Crown, and to reward him who had so well serv'd his ambitious Views, erected certain Lands into a Principality, which he conferr'd on him.

Han-tso, an

THE Empress, who took refuge among the Shepherds in the Mountains, was there deliver'd of a Son, whom she nam'd Sbau-kang, and brought up unknown to any body; so that the Birth of this Prince was a Secret for several Years, and he arriv'd to an Age of Maturity before the Usurper heard of it, who immediately caus'd a strict Search to be made for him; but the Prince being inform'd of it, retir'd, and became a Domestic at the Court of one of the Tributary Princes, where he pass'd for a Shepherd's Son. But his Master perceiving something grand and noble in his Air and Behaviour, beyond what could be expected from a low Birth and Country Education, he sent for him one Day; and in private ask'd him several Questions, concerning his Family, in so very kind a Manner, that Sbau-kang, judging he ought not to dissemble the Matter, told him ingenuously all the Misfortunes of his House, as he had heard them related by his Mother. The Prince, who was acquainted with them himself, embrac'd him tenderly, and gave him his Daughter in Marriage, with part of his Principality for a Portion. Sbau-kang having now a better Opportunity of shewing his excellent Qualities, made it appear, that he was worthy of the Throne.

His Father in Law without Delay wrote to all the Ministers and Nobles, who were in the Interest of the late Emperor; and being sure of having the People on his Side, who abhor'd the Tyrant, and wish'd for their lawful Sovereign, he rais'd an Army, and the eighteenth Year of the Cycle attack'd Han-tso, who making no great Resistance, was defeated, taken Prisoner, and put to an infamous Death. At the same Time Sbau-kang ascended the Throne of his Ancestors with general Acclamations.

By the Death of these Rebels, Tranquillity was establish'd in the Empire, the Laws re-assum'd their former Vigour, and the Emperor frequently assembled the Tributary Princes to reform the Abuses that had crept into the several parts of the Government. His Orders were exactly obey'd, and the People liv'd with Satisfaction under so wise an Administration. His Reputation drew Embassies from foreign Princes, and his Reign was as glorious as peaceable. THIS Reign was much like the former; the Prince was not indeed so addicted to Pleasure as his Father, but his Life was equally indolent and idle; all that he did worth Notice, was removing his Court towards the Yellow River, and visiting some of the Maritime Parts of his Dominions. He dy'd in the fortieth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Ti-sye, who began his Reign the Year following.

THIS Prince was commendable for his Love of Justice, as well as his Care to prevent Disturbances, and maintain Peace in the Empire. The petty Sovereigns of the neighbouring Nations, who were become his Tributaries, came in Person to do him Homage, and put themselves under his Protection; to reward their Fidelity, he honour'd them with certain Titles of Dignity and Distinction. He dy'd the fifty seventh Year of the Cycle, leaving the Crown to his Son Ti-pu-kyang.

TIPU-KYANG, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Fifty nine Years.

IT is surprising, that during so long a Reign, nothing should happen worthy a Place in the Chinese History; which only applauds the Equity of this Emperor, and the Tranquillity of his State.

Ti-pu-kyang,
11th Emp.

He dy'd in the fifty-sixth Year of the Cycle. His Son Kong-kye, whom he had nominated his Successor, gave Way to the Power of his Uncle Ti-kyang, who forcing him out, usurp'd the Throne; but at the end of forty three Years he recover'd the Possession.

THE Usurpation continued as long under the Son as the Father, but his Debauches rendering him contemptible and odious to the People, some of the feudatory Princes studied to depose him. Nevertheless, he possess'd the Throne till his Death, which happen'd in the thirty-eighth Year of the Cycle; but he could not secure it to his Son, it being restor'd to the Prince, who had been dispossest'd by his Uncle.

Ti-kin, 13th

KONG-KYA, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty one Years.

THIS Prince, who was the lawful Heir of the Throne, did not answer the People's Expectation. More than forty Years of Adversities should have taught him to govern his Passions; instead of that, as soon as he got the Power in his Hands, he gave himself wholly up to them, and became the most lewd and effeminate Prince that ever reign'd.

Kong-kye, 14th
Emperor.

He left the Government of the State to his Ministers, of whom he made a bad Choice, bestowing the most important Places on Flatterers rather than Persons of Merit; and to applaud his Extravagancies was sufficient to entitle a Man to the principal Employments of the Empire.

His Conduct brought him in such Contempt, that the tributary Princes refus'd to pay him Homage, and a voluptuous Course of Life had effeminated him to that Degree, that he durst not use his Authority, to bring them to their Duty.

KYA, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Fifty two Years.

Kya, 17th
Emperor
the Nero
of China.

THE Cruelty and infamous Actions of this Emperor have caus'd him to be look'd on as a Monster. His Name is still as odious in China, as that of Nero is in Europe; and one cannot give a bad Prince a worse Character than to say, He is another Kya. He was indeed born with good Qualities, and endow'd with extraordinary Strength; but these Advantages were totally obscur'd by the Vices to which he abandon'd himself.

He had a Wife still more wicked and cruel than himself, whose Orders he blindly obey'd. He made nothing of shedding the Blood of his Subjects every Day, to please the Humour of this barbarous Princess; and both of them carry'd their Brutality to shameful Excesses. Kya caus'd a pretty large Space of Ground to be dug, resembling a Lake, and filling it with Wine, order'd three thousand of his Subjects to jump into it. There was a private Apartment in the Palace, where, by the Order, and in the Presence of the Emperor and Empress, the most abominable Vices were committed.

These scandalous Proceedings turning the Hearts of the whole Empire against them, the Princes, Great Men, and People were on the Point of taking up Arms, but were restrain'd by the chief Ministers; who having still some Remains of Tendernefs for his Person, represented in an humble Manner, the imminent Danger which his licentious Tyranny expos'd him to. But these Remonstrances only made him more furious; one of the Ministers, who spoke to him, being condemn'd and executed in his Presence. However the Rage of the Emperor did not abate the Zeal of these wise Ministers; they address'd a Memorial to him, wherein they boldly reproach'd him with his Murders, his Cruelty, and the horrid Actions of his Life. He had scarce read it, when transported with Fury, he resolv'd to put the Authors to Death.

Ching-tang, one of the tributary Princes, who was most esteem'd for his Wisdom and Virtue, and descended from Whang-ti, having join'd his Remonstrances to those above-mention'd, was for his Zeal cast into Prison, the twenty first Year of the Cycle; but he did not long remain confin'd.

His Army was soon completed, each of the Princes furnishing him with Troops. The Emperor on his Side began to raise Forces; but the Disaffection was so general that he could only bring together a handful of Men. Nor had he better Success, for all his fair Promises, with the Tartars, by whom he was equally abhorr'd.

Seeing himself thus abandon'd by every body, he had Recourse to Dissimulation; he acknowledged his Crimes, and seem'd to repent, desiring no other Favour than that they would grant him his Life.

Ching-tang hereon relented, and believing this Change to be sincere, not only spared his Life, but restor'd him the Crown; then quitting the Command of the Army, he return'd into his own little State, setting an Example of Moderation and Disinterestedness, which was admir'd by the whole Empire.

The Emperor was scarce re-settled on the Throne, but he fell again to his old Vices; nay, raising Forces in haste, he march'd against Ching-tang, whom he treated as a Traitor and Rebel. But when the two Armies met, the Emperor's Soldiers deserted to Ching-tang, who had put himself in a Posture of Defence, and throwing their Arms at his Feet, acknowledg'd him for their Sovereign.

His Modesty, Gentleness, Justice and Application to Affairs, had already gain'd him the Admiration of the People, and he was acknowledg'd Emperor by all the Provinces, with universal Applause. He alone thought himself incapable of sustaining so weighty a Burden, and assembled his Ministers, and the Grandees of his Court, no less than three times, in order to resign a Crown, which, he say'd, any other would wear more worthily than himself. He added, that it was sufficient for him, that he had deliver'd his Country from the Persecution of the Tyrant; that he was contented with the small State which Heaven had allotted him; and that it was a great Grief to him to sit on the Throne to which he was not the lawful Heir.

Ching-tang,
1st Emperor.

his Modesty,
and

The Grandees of the Empire persisted in remonstrating to him, that he sat on it by the particular Direction of Heaven; that Heaven, touch'd with the Misfortunes of the People, had chosen him to be the Deliverer of his Country; and that this appear'd visible enough from the unanimous Concurrence of all the Orders of the State, who would have no other Sovereign but him.

Ching-tang, whose Conduct was sincere, yielded at length to the pressing Instances of the Nobles, and govern'd the Empire with the same Modesty as had induc'd him to refuse it. He immediately abrogated the cruel Laws of his Predecessor, and establish'd others full of Wisdom and Equity. A Minister nam'd I-in, whose Merit, Prudence, and Fidelity were perfectly well known to him, being honour'd with his Confidence, was plac'd at the Head of his Council, and assign'd the Command of his Armies. The Soldiers, who before had been us'd to plunder, were brought under the strictest Discipline, and in a short time Order and Tranquillity reign'd throughout the Provinces. Every Place rung with the Benedictions which the People heap'd upon a Prince so studious to make them happy. He caus'd to be engraven on all the Vessels, which were for the Use of the Palace, the most eminent Maxims of Morality; that both himself and his Officers might have continually before their Eyes those Principles by which they ought to square their Conduct.

He gave a very signal Proof of his Tendernefs towards his Subjects, in the Time of a universal Drought, (which lasted seven Years, without one Drop of Rain, and perhaps is the same mention'd in Genesis (v)) attributing such a Calamity to his own Faults, he devoted himself a Victim for the Welfare of his People; after that he had observ'd a rigorous Fast, he laid aside the Ornaments of his Dignity, had his Hair cut off, which then was worn very long, and being bare-footed, in the Posture of a Criminal, lifted up his Hands towards Heaven, and entreated the Lord to spare his Subjects, and let the whole Weight of his Wrath fall on him alone. History relates, that at the End of his Prayer the Sky became cover'd with Clouds, and a general Rain follow'd, which render'd the Earth fruitful, and restored Plenty. The Death of this Prince, which happen'd the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, put the whole Empire in Mourning, and every one lamented for him as if he had lost his Father.

for his Subjects.

His eldest Son Tay-ting dying before him, the Crown devolv'd to his Grandson nam'd Tay-kyä.

TAY-KYA, Second Emperor, reign'd Thirty three Years.

THE Beginning of the Reign of this Prince made all afraid of his Administration; far from treading in the Steps of his Grandfather, his Conduct was directly opposite, and such as was likely to draw on him the Contempt and Aversion of his Subjects. I-in, that wise Minister, already mention'd, in whom Ching-tang placed his whole Confidence, made use of his Authority, which was very great, to remonstrate to the new Emperor the Abuses that he made of a Power, which Heaven had intrusted him with, solely for the Good of his People. He related to him the Examples of Divine Wrath, on vicious Princes, and endeavour'd to inspire him with the Love of Virtues proper for a Sovereign.

As the young Prince gave no Attention to the wholesome Advice of so wise a Minister, this latter bethought himself of an Expedient; the Rashness of which could hardly be excus'd, if his Integrity and the Uprightness of his Intentions had not been well known. He caus'd a House to be built near the Tomb of the late Emperor, and there shut up Tay-kye, that he might have Time to reflect on his ill Conduct; and form himself, over the Ashes of his Grandfather, to those Virtues of which he was so perfect a Pattern. At the same time he declared himself Guardian both of the Prince and the Empire. The Emperor, who had been blinded by the Splendor of his high Fortune, profited by his Disgrace, and for three Years together made wholesome Reflections on the Misfortunes which his Misconduct had plung'd him into, and on the Virtues requisite for governing a great Empire. When the Sincerity of his Change could be no longer doubted of, the Minister himself went to him; and conducting him to the Throne, from whence he had made him descend, proclaim'd him Emperor a second time, and caus'd him to be acknowledg'd by all the People: who unanimously loaded with Praises both the Docility of the Prince and the Moderation of the Minister.

Tay-kye took the severe Behaviour of his Minister to him very kindly, always respected him, as if he had been his Father, and followed his Counsels in every thing. Thus he govern'd the Empire with much Wisdom. The tributary Princes, who had begun to revolt, return'd with Joy to their Duty; and all the Orders of the State were perfectly submissive, while this Prince liv'd. He dy'd the seventeenth Year of the Cycle; his Successor was Vo-ting, another Grandson of the Founder of this Dynasty.

VO-TING, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty nine Years.

THIS Prince, who descended from Ching-tang, did not disgrace the Blood from whence he sprung, but was Heir to his Virtues, as well as to his Crown. Like him, he plac'd all his Confidence in Tin, but this wise Minister dy'd in the eighth Year of his Reign, and the twenty-fifth of the Cycle; when the Emperor, to testify his Gratitude and Esteem for so great a Person, honour'd his Memory by pompous Obsequies, which were worthy the Imperial Majesty. The loss of the Father was repair'd by his Son I-pu, who was endow'd with the same great Qualities, and equally merited the Confidence of the following Emperors. Vo-ting dy'd in the forty-seventh Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Brother Tay-keng.

ALL we know of this Emperor is, that he reign'd peaceably like his Father, assisted by the same Minister, whose Counsels he follow'd, and dy'd the twenty-eighth Year of the Cycle. He was succeeded by his Brother Yong-ki.

YONG-KI, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Twelve Years.

Yong-ki, 6th

THIS Prince was the Son of Vo-ting, but not by the same Mother as the two preceding Emperors. Some Disturbances began in his Reign, by certain tributary Kings, or petty Princes, refusing to come, according to Custom, to the Assembly, which the Emperors held from time to time. He dy'd the fortieth Year of the Cycle, the Crown descending to his Brother Tay-vu.

Wise Answer
of a Minister.

HE was Son of the same Mother as Yong-ki. It is reported that at his Accession to the Crown, a Mulberry-Tree in the Palace was cover'd with Leaves in seven Days, and three Days after became wither'd. The Prince was terrify'd at this Accident, which he look'd upon as foreboding some Revolution or great Misfortune. He therefore consult'd I-pu, and desir'd to know what he thought of it; that Minister answer'd, "that Virtue directs Omens, and renders them good or bad. Govern your Subjects with Justice, continued he, and nothing will be able to disturb your Repose."

The Emperor receiv'd Advantage by this Lesson. His Zeal and Application to administer Justice to his People were so great, that he gave Audience daily betimes in the Morning, and did not end it till he had heard all the Parties who appear'd. His Love of Justice made him ador'd by the People, who reckon'd him equal to the greatest of his Predecessors. The tributary Princes never absented themselves from the Assemblies convoked by him, and his Orders were always punctually observ'd.

Among the Laws, which he either establish'd or reviv'd, one was, that in every Town a certain Number of old People should be maintain'd out of the publick Treasure, which Custom is still kept up. After he had reign'd in Peace seventy five Years, he dy'd in the fifty-fifth Year of the Cycle, in the Province of Ho-nan, whither he had remov'd his Court, and was succeeded by his Son Chong-ting.

THE frequent Inundations of the Whang-bo, or Yellow River, oblig'd this Emperor to abandon the City in the Province of Sben-fu, where he kept his Court, and to remove it, first into the Province of Ho-nan, and afterwards into that of Pe-che-li. His Reign was disturb'd by the Inhabitants to the South of the River Yang-tse-kyang, who made Irruptions into his Provinces, and committed all sorts of Rapines. He immediately sent Forces, who cut these Banditti in Pieces, and by that means prevented the like Inroads for the future. This Expedition re-establish'd Peace in the Empire; but the Emperor did not long enjoy the Fruits of his Victory, for Death seiz'd him the eighth Year of this Cycle, and his Brother Vay-jin ascended the Throne.

VAY-JIN, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Fifteen Years.

AT this Time began the Civil Wars between the Brothers and Children of the deceased Emperors, for the Right of Succession. These Wars lasted near two hundred Years, but History mentions no Particulars about them. All that we find concerning this Emperor, is, that he was respected and belov'd of his Subjects; that he dy'd in the twenty-third Year of the Cycle, and Ho-tan-kyä his Brother succeeded him.

Vay-jin, 9th

HO-TAN-KYA, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Nine Years.

HE fix'd his Court in a City of the Province of Ho-nan, situated on an Eminence, which prevented its being overflow'd by the Inundation of the Whang-bo. There is nothing remarkable related of this Prince, who dy'd in the thirty-third Year of the Cycle, and left the Crown to his Son Tsu-ye, who was very worthy of succeeding him.

TSU-YE, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Nineteen Years.

THIS Emperor had had a very prudent and able Ko-lau, or Prime Minister, call'd Yen; by following whose Counsels he preserv'd the Empire in profound Peace, and kept the Tributary Princes in perfect Submission. Tho' the Emperor never gives Principalities or little States to any but the Sons or Nephews of Emperors, yet he did to this Minister; on Condition however, that he should always remain in the Palace near his Person, for the Advantage of consulting him whenever he would; nor was he suffer'd to govern in Person his little Dominion, till after the Death of this Emperor, which happen'd the fifty-first Year of the Cycle, his Son Tsu-sin succeeding him.

Tsu-ye, 11th

TSU-SIN, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Sixteen Years.

THE Brothers of the [late] Emperor would have usurp'd the Crown, to the Prejudice of the lawful Heir, under Pretence of being of an Age more proper for the Government than their Nephew. They had already begun to make Parties, and would have created great Disturbances by dividing the Grandees of the Empire, if the Ko-lau, Yen, had not by his Authority and Skill put an End to the Contest. These were but the Seeds of Ambition, which afterwards will appear more flagrant; when, without regard to either Justice or the Right of Blood, we shall see the Princes usurping the Inheritance of their Nephews. The Death of the Emperor happen'd in the seventh Year of the Cycle, and his Brother Vo-kyä succeeded him.

Tsu-sin, 12th

VO-KYA, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

TSU-TING, Son of the late Emperor, was not able to resist his Uncle, who usurp'd the Crown, and enjoy'd it more fortunately than he deserv'd. The Usurper's Design was to transfer it to his Son; but his Measures were disconcerted by the Address of the lawful Heir, who ascended the Throne immediately after the Death of Vo-kyä, which happen'd in the thirty-second Year of the Cycle.

He took his Measures with so much Wisdom and Secrecy, that he ascended the Throne without the least Violence, excluding his Cousin, the Usurper's Son. He govern'd the Empire with equal Wisdom, and before his Death gave a great Example of his Modesty; by leaving the Choice of a Successor to his Ministers, in case they judg'd his Son had not Virtue and Merit enough to govern his Subjects. Accordingly they chose Nan-keng, the Son of Vo-kye, who had been banish'd out of the Empire. Tsu-ting dy'd the fourth Year of this new Cycle, and Nan-keng succeeded him.

THE Divisions in the Imperial Family caus'd great Troubles in the Empire. The Tributary Princes began to withdraw their Obedience from their Sovereign, openly refusing to pay the Tribute; and were on the Point of rendring their little Governments independant, which would have endanger'd the Overthrow of the Monarchy, when the Emperor dy'd, in the thirty-sixth Year of the Cycle; and was succeeded by Pwan-keng, his Brother, who usurp'd the Throne, to the Prejudice of his Nephew.

PWAN-KENG, (2) *Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty eight Years.*Pwan-keng,

THIS Prince, altho' an Usurper, was the Restorer of the Empire, by his Merit, and Application to Government. He kept his Court in the Province Sban-fi, and began his Reign with reviving the ancient Laws of Cbing-tang, which had been in a manner abolish'd, thro' the Negligence of his Predecessors. He took that great Emperor for his Pattern, and endeavour'd to imitate him. He made it a Rule, never to intrust the important Charges, either of his Court, or Empire, to any but those of his Subjects who had most Capacity and Merit. He punish'd with Severity the least Tendency to Rebellion. In short he establish'd so good Order throughout the State, that the Tributary Princes all return'd to their Obedience, paid him the usual Tribute, and renewed their Homage. Being sensible that the Usurpation of the Brothers of the Emperors was the Cause of the late Troubles, he resolv'd to remedy an Evil which he was guilty of himself, and made an Order to secure the Crown to their Children. However, this Decree, so wise, and proper to prevent new Disturbances, was of no use, with respect to himself; for in as much as he dy'd without Issue, in the fourth Year of the Cycle, his Brother Syau-sin succeeded him.

He trusted the Government of the Empire with his Prime Minister, during his three Years Mourning, and shut himself up in a House near his Father's Tomb, in order to lament his Death, and to beg of Heaven to assist him in acquiring the Virtues suitable to his Station. The Time of his Mourning being expir'd, he return'd to his Palace; where he saw in a Dream a Man, presented him by Heaven, to be his Prime Minister; and as he beheld him attentively, the Features of his Face were so strongly imprinted in his Fancy, that he drew an exact Portrait of him, when he awoke. Then he assembled his Ministers, and having related to them his Dream, and shew'd the Picture to them, sent some trusty People, to seek for the Person whose Picture they had seen. They found him in a Village among a Company of Artificers; his Name was Fu-ywe, a Mason by Trade. They carry'd him immediately to Court, where a great many Questions being propos'd to him, relating to Politics, the Virtues proper for a Sovereign, and the reciprocal Duties of Princes and Subjects, the different Charges of the Empire; &c. he made himself admir'd by every one, by the Justness, the Propriety and Eloquence of his Answers.

Then the Emperor address'd himself to the poor Mechanic, It is you, dear FU-YWE, said he, whom Heaven has chosen to assist me with your wise Lessons. Neither flatter me, nor spare my Faults, that by the Instruction of you and my Ministers I may acquire the Virtues of my Grandfather CHING-TANG; and restore in these unfortunate Times, the Moderation, Equity, and Mildness of his Government.

Fu-ywe prostrated himself according to Custom before the Emperor, whom he found always very ready to receive his Instructions. These may be seen in the Sku-king, whereof I have given an Abstract; and by following them Vu-ting not only became a Pattern for good Princes, but his Reputation, extending to the most distant Nations, induc'd them to come and submit themselves to him.

This Prince dy'd in the fifty-second Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son, call'd Tsu-keng.

TSU-KENG, Twenty first Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

TSU-KYA, Twenty second Emperor, reign'd Thirty four Years.

THE great Virtues of Vu-ting, whose Loss was still regretted, render'd the Vices of Tsu-kyu more odious. AS short as this Reign was, it appear'd too long to the Chinese. They speak of Vu-ye as an impious and wicked Prince, who could not fail to draw on himself the Vengeance of Heaven. He was kill'd by Thunder, as he was hunting, the third Year of the Cycle, his Son Tay-ting succeeding him.

About this time some Islands to the Eastward were peopled by Chinese Colonies; and there are some who say Japan began then to be inhabited.

THIS Emperor began his Reign by declaring War against a Tributary Prince, whose little State was call'd Yen. It is in the Province of Pe-che-li; and Pe-king, which is at present the Metropolis of the Empire, was one of the Cities belonging to it. His Death, which happen'd the sixth Year of the Cycle, hinder'd him from finishing the War; which was continued by his Son, who succeeded him.

TI-YE, Twenty seventh Emperor, reign'd Thirty seven Years.

Ti-ye, 27th

THIS Emperor continuing the War, which his Father had begun, against the Prince of Yen; he gave the Command of his Forces to a General, call'd Ki-lyé, who defeated that little Sovereign, and having driven him out of his Territories, reduc'd him to the Condition of a private Man. The Emperor was so well pleas'd with the Conquest, that he gave that Principality to his General, and made it hereditary to his Family. Ki-lyé govern'd it seven Years, and at his Death his Son Ven-vang succeeded him, who afterwards founded the third Dynasty.

Ti-ye had three Children, two of which were by a Wife of the second Order, who were born before their Mother had the Title of Queen. The third, who was by the Empress, was lawful Heir to the Crown; but being very young, and of no promising Talents, his Father was induc'd to prefer the elder of the two others. The Empress herself to please him came into his Measures: But this Choice was oppos'd by the Ministers, who declar'd it to be contrary to the Imperial Laws, and that they would acknowledge none for their Lord, but the Son of the Empress, nam'd Che-w. They had Cause to repent it afterwards, for Che-w was a cruel Tyrant; whereas the Prince whom the Emperor had chosen, was indow'd with all the good Qualities requisite for a Sovereign. Ta-kye.

PRIDE, Luxury, Debauchery, Tyranny, and Cruelty, mounted the Throne with this Prince. He marry'd a Woman nam'd Ta-kye, who was the most beautiful, but at the same time the most barbarous and wicked Person in the whole Empire. She would have all things directed according to her Caprice and imperious Humour; and if the Ministers fail'd to conform to her Opinion, in either their Representations or Counsels, they were immediately driven from the Palace, or condemn'd to Death. To disapprove what was done by her Orders, was accounted Rebellion; and she perswaded her Husband that he could not be absolute Master of his Subjects, unless he made himself dreaded by them. For that Purpose she invented a kind of Punishment, terrible to think of: She caus'd a brazen Pillar to be erected, which being made red hot, by means of a great Fire, the condemn'd Person was forc'd to embrace it, till such time as his Flesh was consum'd to the Bone. It was an agreeable Diversion to her, to see the unhappy Victims of her Fury suffer, and to hear the dreadful Shrieks, caused by the Exquiteness of the Torture.

One of the Ministers of Che-w, in order to insinuate himself into his Favour, and merit his Confidence, made him a Present of his Daughter, who was a great Beauty, but at the same time very virtuous. The Daughter, who detested this Action of her Father, resisted with an an heroic Courage, the criminal Addresses of the Emperor; whose Love thereat changing of a sudden into Fury, he slew the young Virgin with his own Hands, and cutting her Body in Pieces, caus'd it to be served up at her Father's Table. Another Minister was so astonish'd at this Barbarity, that, not being able to contain his Indignation, he took an Opportunity to represent the Horror of the Action to the Emperor, who rewarded his Zeal with present Death.

These cruel Executions did not intimidate the wise Ven-vang, who had the Courage vigorously to oppose such Inhumanities. The Tyrant, who still respected his Virtue, did not treat him with the same Rigour, as he had done others, but sent him to Prison, to punish his Rashness, as he call'd it. The principal Subjects of Ven-vang's little State, quite dismay'd at his Imprisonment, assembled themselves; and believing that they might easily obtain their Prince's Liberty by Presents, that would flatter the Emperor's debauch'd Inclinations, among other things sent him a young Girl of very great Beauty. Che-w, as they had surmis'd, was so taken with her Charms, that he immediately order'd Ven-vang to be releas'd; whose Joy was doubled, to see himself both freed from his Confinement, and remov'd from so corrupt a Court. This Prince was dearly belov'd by his People; and tho' his Dominions were but small, yet he was as much respected throughout the Empire, as Che-w was hated.

Ven-vang was eminent for his Sweetness of Temper; his Love of Justice; the Care he took in having young Men brought up according to the purest Maxims of Morality; the good Reception he gave wise Men and Philosophers, which brought a great Number of them to his Court; the Pleasure he took in hearing their Discourses; his preferring Persons of Virtue and Merit to Employments; the Respect he shew'd to those of his Family, who were his Seniors; in short all these excellent Qualities join'd to his Modesty, Frugality, and Application to publick Affairs, gain'd him so great Reputation among the Princes, who were his Equals, that several of them made him the Arbiter of their Differences.

It is related, that two petty Kings [or Regulo's] who were always in War about the Limits of their States, having agreed to refer their Pretensions to his Decision: As soon as they enter'd his Territories, they observ'd that his Subjects strove to outdo one another, by reciprocal Proofs of Friendship and Kindness; that none durst even take up any thing which happen'd to be drop'd on the Roads, every one saying it did not belong to him; and that those who had Lands, gave a part of them to their reduc'd Friends for their Subsistence. When they arriv'd at Court, they were surpriz'd at the Unanimity and good Understanding, which they found among the Grandees, who were Strangers to Artifice, Dissimulation and Intrigue.

On seeing such great Order in the State, What Business have we here? say'd one of them, What will VEN-VANG think of our Disputes? What Notion will he have of us? They therefore without proceeding any further in the Business, instantly accommodated the Difference between themselves; and instead of insisting on their Rights and Pretensions, strove who should yield up most Lands to the other.

The Reputation of Ven-vang became so great, that forty Tributary Princes chose him for their Sovereign; perceiving that he alone could remedy the Evils which afflicted the Empire. But he dy'd soon after he had obtain'd that Dignity, leaving his Principality and his Riches to Vu-vang his second Son, whom he prefer'd to his eldest, because he would not enter into his Views of dethroning the Emperor. The eldest discovered a peculiar Greatness of Soul on this Occasion; for he did not make the least Complaint of any Injustice done him: and that he might not dishonour the Memory of his Father, he retired beyond the River Yang-tse-kyang towards the Borders of Se-chuen, where he founded the two Kingdoms of Tue and Hu.

In the mean time Che-w grew more cruel every Day, as well thro' Habit as the Influence of Ta-kyu, who was in effect Sovereign; the Emperor always confirming whatever Laws she propos'd. It is said to be owing to her, that little Feet is accounted one of the greatest Ornaments of the Sex; her own being very small, she bound them tight with Fillets, affecting to make that pass for a Beauty which was really a Deformity. However the Women will follow her Example; and this ridiculous Custom is so thoroughly establish'd, that to have Feet of the natural Size is enough to render them contemptible.

It is likewise said, that the great Number of Candles, which she caus'd to be lighted up in the Palace every Night; to supply, as it were, the Absence of the Sun, and continue the Day, gave rise to the Feast of Lanterns, which is annually celebrated on the fifteenth of the first Month.

Che-w became daily more hateful to his Subjects, who groan'd under his tyrannical Government. His nearest Relations seeing him running headlong to his Ruin, thought it their Duty to lay before him his ill Conduct. He would have put one of his Uncles to Death, who took that Liberty, if he had not counterfeited Madness. However, he imprison'd him to discover whether it was real or pretended; but he acted his part so well, that he deceiv'd the Tyrant. Another of them, thinking he ought to run any Risque to reclaim his Nephew, went to the Palace with surprising Intrepidity, prepar'd for the worst that could happen, and was immediately strangled by the Emperor's Orders; who afterwards caus'd his Heart to be pluck'd out, and had the Barbarity to view it for some time, not so much to satisfy his Curiosity, as to satiate his Revenge.

So great Inhumanities, carry'd to such a Length, provok'd at last the whole Empire to revolt. The Princes and Grandees intreated Vu-vang to put himself at the Head of an Army, and and give the Tyrant Battle, promising to furnish him with what Forces should be necessary. Vu-vang desir'd Time to consult what was the Will of Heaven; and in the mean time continued the Preparations for War, which had been put in great Forwardness by his Father. As soon as he found himself in a Condition to declare his Intentions, as if he had the Orders of Heaven, he march'd against Cheu, who, at the Head of a more numerous Army, advanc'd to meet him. As soon as the Signal was given for Battle, the greater part of the Imperial Troops went over to Vu-vang.

Cheu seeing himself betray'd, fled in Despair to his Capital, and entering into his Apartment, set it on Fire, that he might not fall into the Hands of a rebellious Subject; this happen'd the sixteenth Year of the Cycle. Notwithstanding all the Care that was taken to extinguish the Flames, half of the Palace was burnt to Ashes, and Vu-vang enter'd it as a Conqueror, where the first Object which appear'd to him, was the Empress, Ta-kye, whom he slew at one Stroke with his Sword. Hereupon the Tributary Princes, and the Grantees of the Empire, unanimously elected him Emperor, and he became the first Founder of the third Dynasty, call'd CHEW. *

THIS new Emperor fix'd the Imperial Seat in the Metropolis of the Province of Sben-fi, call'd at present Si-ngan. He began his Reign, as usual, with offering Sacrifices to the Lord of Heaven, and re-establishing the Laws and Customs which his Predecessor had in some measure abolish'd.

I. He made strict Enquiry into all the Acts of Injustice that had been committed in the preceding Reign, and apply'd himself to redress them.

II. He set at Liberty many Persons of Merit, who had been imprison'd.

III. He sent for to Court, Ki-tsu, the Uncle of the Tyrant, who, to save his Life had feign'd himself mad; and frequently consulted him in Astronomy, Politics, and the Science of Government. His Instructions are to be seen in the Shu-king, a Book hereafter spoken of. The Emperor rewarded this learned Man, by giving him and his Posterity the Kingdom of Korea, and made it in a manner independant; for they were only oblig'd to come every new Reign to desire the Consent and Protection of the Emperor.

IV. He restor'd several illustrious Families, which had been almost wholly unnobilitated; and gave the Descendants of the Emperor little Sovereignties to support their Rank with Decency.

One Prince of the Family of Shin-nong was settled in the Province of Sben-fi; another of the Family of Whang-ti had for his Share a Country in the Province of Hu-quang, that was call'd The Kingdom of Tsu; a third, descended from Yau, had some Territories about Pe-king, which was nam'd the Kingdom of Su; another, who was of the Race of Shun, obtain'd Lands in the Province of Ho-nan, under the Title of the Principality of Chin.

V. He erected fifteen other Principalities, which he gave to fifteen of his Relations; not foreseeing that so many Sovereignties, tho' holding of the Crown, would in time become a Source of unhappy Wars. He also rewarded several of his Ministers with Estates not much inferior to the former, and rais'd others to the chief Dignities of the Empire.

The Fame of his Wisdom and Generosity reach'd the most distant Countries; and several foreign Princes, who refus'd doing homage to Cheu, came presently to pay Vu-vang the ancient Tribute, and put themselves under his Protection.

Vu-vang having in the second Year of his Reign been attack'd with a dangerous Distemper, which it was fear'd would prove fatal, all the Court was alarm'd. Cheu-kong, his Prime Minister caus'd Sacrifices to be offer'd in the Palace for the Emperor's Recovery; in the midst of the Ceremony, lifting up his Hands towards Heaven, and praying with a loud Voice, he offer'd his own Life in Sacrifice, to save that of a Prince which was of such Importance to the State. The History informs us that the Emperor grew better next Day, and in a little time recover'd.

This Action of the Prime Minister was greatly applauded; and the Emperor was so affected with it, that he insert'd it with his own Hand in the Secret Registers, which are kept in the Palace in Coffers of Gold. He govern'd with the Tenderness of a Father, and was indefatigable in public Affairs to the Day of his Death; which happen'd the twenty third Year of the Cycle. He was succeeded by his Son Ching-vang.

Ching-vang,
2d Emperor.

DURING the tender Years of this Prince, which render'd him incapable of Governing, his Uncle Che-w-kong, who was Prime Minister, and whose Virtues were generally acknowledged, took upon him the Care both of the Empire, and the Education of the Emperor: over whom he plac'd an able Governor, capable of instructing him in the Royal Virtues; and shew'd so much Disinterestedness in the Administration of Affairs, that the Tributary Princes very readily paid him the customary Homage.

Nevertheless his Virtues could not screen him from the Malice of his Enemies; who persuaded the Emperor, that he abus'd his Authority, by making a great many Creatures, and design'd to usurp the Imperial Dignity. These Calumnies, which were whisper'd about, coming to the Minister's Ears, he took a Resolution of retiring from Court; which was an Affliction to all People, who were convinc'd of his Probity, and Zeal for his Nephew's Interest. On the contrary, the young Emperor was overjoy'd to be from under the Tuition of his Uncle, and took upon him the Government of Affairs with great Alacrity. But he quickly experienc'd the Weight of the Burthen which he had on him; and the ill Success which constantly attended him, having made him sensible of his own Incapacity, he sent for the Secret Records of the Empire, to consult them, and find out a way to free himself from the Difficulties he was plung'd in. In running them over, he met the Place where his Father had minuted down the generous Action of Che-w-kong, who had devoted himself to Death, to save the Emperor's Life. Being sensibly affected with such an extraordinary Instance of Love in a Subject to his Prince, he grew ashamed of his Distrust; and perceiving how much he stood in need of so great a Man, he went himself that instant to the Place where Che-w-kong had retir'd, and with Tears entreated him not to forsake him, but to assist him with his Counsel. Che-w-kong was thus re-instrated in his former Honours and Dignities, wherein he gave continual Proofs of his Zeal for the Glory of his Prince, and the Good of his State.

It is reported of this Emperor, that in the fifth Year of his Reign, growing fond of the Recreations which he had us'd in his Childhood, one Day in play with his youngest Brother, by way of Joke, he gave him the Patents of a small Sovereignty. On which the Ko-lau, Su ya, his Governor say'd, that the Present, tho' made in jest, became a serious Matter, as soon as it went out of the Hands of the Sovereign; that a Prince was dishonour'd by breaking his Word; and that the Law, which oblig'd him not to enter too rashly into any Engagements, oblig'd him also to keep his Promise. Thus, at the same time, he both did his Brother Favour, and receiv'd solid Instruction, which was of advantage to him.

The Emperor following the Instructions of his first Minister, govern'd his Dominions with great Wisdom; by which means he acquir'd such high Reputation, that the King of Cochin-China sent Ambassadors with Presents, to congratulate him on having a Subject of so extraordinary Merit as Che-w-kong; and they were receiv'd with the highest Marks of Esteem and Friendship. After they had their Audience of Leave to return into their own Country, Che-w-kong gave them an Instrument, which on one side pointed towards the North, and on the opposite side towards the South, to direct them better on their Way home, than they had been directed in coming to China. This Instrument was call'd Cbi-nan, which is the same Name the Chinese now give to the Sea-Compass; whence it is believ'd that Che-w-kong was the Inventor of the Compass. (x)

pass invented.

This great Minister, who was so greatly admir'd both at home and abroad, dy'd the thirty third Year of the Cycle, in the hundredth Year of his Age; and the Emperor, to shew his Gratitude to him by some remarkable Token, caus'd him to be bury'd near his Father's Tomb, with the same funeral Rites as were customary at the Interments of the Emperors. Sometime after the Emperor assembl'd the States of the Empire, where he order'd that every Prince should forbid the immoderate Use of Wine in his Dominions, as being the Source of infinite Misfortunes, and the Destruction of Families. This Prince dy'd the fiftieth Year of the Cycle, and left his Crown to his Son, call'd Kang-vang.

KANG-VANG, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty six Years.

THIS Emperor being remarkable for maintaining Peace both at home and abroad, he took the Opportunity of this Tranquillity to apply himself to govern his People with Gentleness, and endeavour to make them happy.

One of his Maxims was, That the Joy of a Prince depended on that which reign'd among his Subjects; and that he ought not to take any Pleasure when his Subjects were in Distress. He assembled the States frequently, and from time to time visited the Provinces of his Empire.

He was principally attentive to promote Agriculture, the Care of which he trusted to one of his Ministers, nam'd Chau-kong. He us'd to decide the Disputes that arose among the Husbandmen, sitting under an old Willow-Tree; which was preserv'd from being cut down, out of Respect, and became famous in the Poetry of the Chinese.

ONE single Passion, to which this Prince was intirely devoted, eclips'd all his Virtues, and caus'd him to neglect the Care of his Empire. He was so given to Hunting, that he minded nothing else; the Havock which his Horses and Dogs made in the Fields, drove the People to Despair, who were continually lamenting to see their first Harvests ruin'd by an Army of Hunters, which perpetually follow'd him.

Cyc. XXIII.

Christ 1017.

This ill Conduct drew on him the universal Hatred of his Subjects, who seeing no end of their Sufferings, at length conspir'd his Death, and invented the following Stratagem, to prevent their being discover'd. Knowing that the Emperor, in his return from Hunting, was oblig'd to cross a River, which was pretty broad, and that Barks were order'd to attend his Passage, they prepar'd one so built as to fall in Pieces presently. The Emperor went into it with some of his Nobles, but they had scarce got to the middle of the River, before the Planks separated at once, and the Vessel sunk to the Bottom. Thus perish'd this Prince, the sixteenth Year of this Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Mo-vang.

It is said that in the sixteenth Year of his Reign, and forty first of the former Cycle, Po was born in India; who was the Author of the abominable Sect of the Bonzas, and of the Doctrine of Metempsychosis: which was first introduc'd into this Empire, the sixty fifth Year after Christ, under the Protection of the Emperor, as will be related in its proper Place.

MO-VANG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Fifty five Years.

Mo-vang, 5th

THE excellent Qualities of this Prince, and his Zeal for Justice, soon gain'd him the Hearts of his Subjects, and made them the more easily forget one remarkable Failing he had, which was an extreme Fondness for Horses. When he visited the Provinces, he had great Numbers in his Train, and always rode on Horseback, or in a Chariot drawn by Horses, most magnificently equipp'd; his Pleasure lay in making a pompous Appearance.

Marches a-
Tartars.

Some of the Barbarians of the Southern Parts having revolted, he sent an Army against them, commanded by Kau-fu, who intirely defeated them; for which piece of Service the Emperor rewarded him; with the Principality of Chau, in the Province of Sban-fi. This Success encourag'd him to turn his victorious Arms against the Tartars, from which his Son-in-Law endeavour'd to dissuade him: representing to him that Wars ought never to be undertaken, unless there was an absolute Necessity for it; that they were often more prejudicial to the Conquerors than the Conquer'd; that the Desolation of one's own Country, and the Exhausting of the Revenues were the ordinary Consequences of them; and that in short a virtuous Prince was more inclin'd to Peace than War.

His Maxims.

These Remonstrances proving ineffectual, Mo-vang advanc'd at the Head of a very powerful Army to the Borders of Tartary. The Tartars hearing of his March, made the best of their Way into the Heart of their Country, with their Tents and Cattle; so that the Emperor finding no Enemies to fight with, was oblig'd to return, after having fatigu'd and impair'd his Army with long and troublesome Marches. He then repented that he had not taken his Son-in-Law's Advice, and promis'd him never to form an Undertaking of the Kind, without his Approbation. This Prince's Maxim was, That a Sovereign ought always to guard against Deceit and Flattery; and that he will be esteem'd only in Proportion as those who art about him are virtuous.

THIS Prince began his Reign with an Action so cruel, that it would have been a perpetual Blot upon him, if he had not made Amends for it, by his future Conduct, which was full of Equity and Justice. He often us'd to walk by the Side of a Lake, in a Country call'd Mye, where the most beautiful Maidens at those times made their Appearance, with three of whom he fell desperately in Love; but they perceiving the Danger they were in, absented themselves from the Walk. This so enrag'd the Emperor, that in the first Transports of his Fury, he commanded all the Inhabitants of Mye to be massacred. He repented this most unjust and barbarous Action all the Days of his Life; and by a continual Course of Equity and Moderation, which took off the Odium, he merited to be rank'd among the best of Princes. He dy'd the twenty third Year of the Cycle, and left the Crown to his Son Ye-vang.

He us'd to ride them in the Emperor's Presence, who one Day was so delighted with his extraordinary Address, that he gave him a Principality in the Province of Sben-fi; one of whose Descendants founding the following Dynasty, destroy'd the Family to which he ow'd his Advancement.

THE disorderly Conduct of this Prince and his want of Merit render'd him very contemptible to all his Subjects; he had no Talents, and was so timorous that he could neither make any Answer to his Ministers, when they came to him for Orders, or to give an account of their Administration. He could never bring himself to give Audience to foreign Ambassadors, or receive in Public the Homage of the Tributary Princes. He dy'd the nineteenth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded the Year following by his Son Li-vang.

LI-VANG, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Fifty one Years.

THIS Prince was proud, self-conceited, prodigal, and cruel. The Wealth which he drew from his Subjects by Exactions, could scarcely satisfy his Passion for Riches, which he spent lavishly and without Judgment; the Misery of his People was extreme, and nothing was heard every where but Complaints and Lamentations. Several Manifestos were publish'd, representing the cruel Inhumanity of the Emperor, in menacing Terms.

Li-vang, 10th

a Tyrant.

These Clamours and Repinings of an oppress'd People only increas'd his Fury; and he caus'd Search to be made after those whom he suspected to be at the Head of the Malecontents, in order to punish them with the utmost Severity. As he was conscious how odious he had made himself to his Subjects, he suspected that all their Discourse was on his ill Conduct, and therefore he forbid them, on Pain of Death, to converse together, or even whisper to one another; so that you might see all the Inhabitants of the Metropolis, walking the Streets with Eyes cast down in mournful Silence, and shunning each other. Chau-kong, one of his most faithful Ministers, having often in vain remonstrated to him on the Severity of his Government, ventur'd at length so far as to represent, that he was not plac'd on the Throne to make his People miserable; that it was much easier to stop an impetuous Torrent, than restrain the Tongue; that the Methods us'd for that Purpose only increas'd the Violence of it; and that the forc'd Silence, which he had impos'd on his Subjects, seem'd to forebode something more dangerous and terrible, than the Liberty which they had of complaining.

The Prediction of this Wise Minister prov'd but too true; for the fifty second Year of the Cycle the People quite driven to despair, like a Torrent which has broken down its Banks, rush'd of a sudden into the Palace, in order to assassinate the Tyrant, who having fled at the first Noise of the Tumult, escap'd their Fury. But they murder'd all his Family, excepting his youngest Son, whom Chau-kong had secretly convey'd home, in order to conceal him from the Rage of the Multitude; but they coming to hear of it, besieg'd the House, and demanded the young Prince with Threats. Being ready to force their way in, Chau-kong, after a severe Conflict betwixt his Loyalty and Paternal Affection, at last deliver'd them his own Son instead of him; whose Throat they inhumanly cut before the Father's Face.

As he was still very young, Chau-kong and another no less faithful Minister, were appointed to be his Tutors, and to take Care of his Education. They acquitted themselves of this important Employ with great Zeal, and their Royal Pupil was equally observant of their Instructions. Extravagant-Concubine.

THIS Prince had very great Faults, without any of the good Qualities so much admir'd in his Father, which made him contemptible. Among others he suffer'd himself to be enslav'd by a Passion, which was the Cause of his Ruin, as well as of great Troubles in the Empire. He was so desperately in Love with a Concubine, nam'd Pau-tse, that for the Sake of her and her Son, he put away the Empress, and disinherited the lawful Heir to the Crown. The Prince with the Empress his Mother retir'd to his Uncle, who had a Principality in the Province of Shen-fu.

Notwithstanding all this Tenderness for Pau-tse, Yew-vang had no great Pleasure in the Enjoyment of her, because she was naturally of a splenetick and melancholy Temper; to remove which he had recourse to all sorts of Instruments, that might inspire her with Gaiety and Mirth.

His mean

He was then at War with the Western Tartars, and had given Orders that when the Soldiers saw Fires lighted, they should immediately take their Arms, and attend his Person. This Signal, which ought never to be us'd but in Case of Necessity, he often order'd to be given without any real Occasion, looking on it as a proper Diversion for the Object of his Love; who was highly delighted to see the Hurry that the Soldiers were in to run to the Emperor, in order as they thought to fight in his Defense, and then to see how much surpriz'd and astonish'd they look'd at having had so many fatiguing Alarms to no Purpose.

She took great Pleasure also in the Noise made by the Tearing of Silks, and the Emperor to humour her in this odd Fancy, debas'd himself so far as to be tearing them continually in her Presence.

Nevertheless the Emperor was displeas'd that his Son had abandon'd him, and sent an Order to his Brother to bring him to him immediately. His Brother answer'd, that he would not obey his Orders, till the young Prince should be declar'd lawful Heir to the Empire; which so provok'd Yew-vang, that he instantly declar'd War against him. This Prince, not being in a Condition to oppose the Emperor's Forces, join'd the Tartars, and in the Night-time attack'd the Imperial Camp. The Fires were immediately lighted, but the Soldiers, who had been deceiv'd by this Signal so often before, disregarded it, looking on it as the usual Game to divert Pau-tse; in the mean time the Camp was forc'd, and the Emperor slain. This happen'd the seventh Year of the Cycle, and Ping-vang his Son succeeded to the Empire.

PING-

PING-VANG, Thirteenth Emperor, Fifty one Years.

THE Tartars, who were introduc'd into the Empire, taking Advantage of the Confusion which the Emperor's Death had caus'd among the Chinese Troops, plunder'd wherever they came, and made divers Conquests. The Tributary Princes being alarm'd at it, united their Forces to oppose this Torrent, which threaten'd to overwhelm them.

Among these Confederate Princes, the Kings of Tsin and of Wey distinguish'd themselves for their Valour, drove back the Tartars, and recover'd the Lands they had conquer'd. This Success put an End to a foreign War, but gave Rise to civil Commotions, still more dangerous. These two Kings kept Possession of the Lands which they had taken from the Tartars, in Right of Conquest, and looking on themselves as independent, refus'd to pay Homage to the Emperor, under Colour that he had lent them no Assistance. This Example produc'd fatal Consequences, which the Emperor brought on himself, by removing his Court from the Province of Shen-si to that of Ho-nan. This Caution was imputed to the Fear wherewith the melancholy Fate of his Father had inspir'd him; and it was more for the Security of his own Person than that of the Empire. Several Tributary Princes, seeing themselves abandon'd, follow'd the Example of the Kings of Tsin and Wey, and made themselves independant. There were three especially, who signaliz'd themselves by their Usurpations, and founded three considerable Kingdoms. The King of Tsi seiz'd the Southern Part of the Province of Shan-tong; the King of Tsu took the Provinces of Hu-quang and Kyang-fi; and the King of Tsin usurp'd the greatest Part of the Province of Shen-si.

These three Princes no longer acknowledging any Superior, follow'd the Dictates of their Ambition; and seeking only to enlarge their Dominions by the Spoil of their Neighbours, made War against each other. The Emperor endeavour'd to put a Stop to their Proceedings, and enjoin'd them to live in Peace, but they despis'd his Authority. These Wars lasted several Ages, and were not at an end in the Life-time of the celebrated Philosopher Confucius, whose History begins here, which he has intitul'd Chun Tsyu. Ping-vang dy'd the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by Whan-vang his Brother's Son.

WHAN-VANG, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

WHAN-VANG ascending the Throne at this difficult Juncture, endeavour'd to bring the Tributary Princes to their Obedience by gentle means; but these proving ineffectual he had Recourse to Arms, wherein he was not more successful. His Army being defeated, and himself wounded, he gave up all Hopes of re-establishing his Authority in the revolted Provinces, and was content to preserve those which remain'd to him. He dy'd the twenty first Year of the Cycle, and his Son Chwang-vang succeeded him.

CHWANG-VANG, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Fifteen Years.

THIS Prince came to the Crown contrary to the Will of several of the Ministers, as well as of his Father, who nam'd for his Successor the Son of one of his Concubines, call'd Kew. But one of the Grandees, who had great Authority at Court, having represented to the rest of the Grandees and Ministers that this Injustice done to the lawful Heir, would necessarily occasion a civil War, and give a fatal Blow to the Imperial Authority, which totter'd but too much already, most of them approv'd of his Reasons, and acknowledg'd Chwang-vang.

Notwithstanding this, Kew had a Party, which form'd a Plot to assassinate the Emperor. The Chief of the Conspirators (who were three Years before their Design was discover'd) being one of the Council, and a Person of great Credit; the Minister, who had taken so much Pains to place Chwang-vang on the Throne, counsel'd him to seem not to know any thing of the Conspiracy, but to send for the Traitor as if he wanted his Advice on some important Affair. The Conspirator coming to Court was stabb'd by a Soldier, who had Orders for that Purpose; and Kew on this fled to the King of Yen. His Flight and the Death of the chief Plot secur'd the Emperor on the Throne; but the revolted Princes constantly maintain'd their Independency: and even the King of Tsi, by governing according to the Advice of his Ko-lau, or Prime Minister, call'd Yuen-chu, got so great an Ascendant over them, that they seem'd as if they had depended entirely upon him; and durst undertake no Affair of Moment without his Approbation. The Emperor dying in the thirty sixth Year of the Cycle, the same Ko-lau had such Influence in the State, as to procure almost all the Suffrages of the Ministers and Grandees in Favour of Li-vang; who was a Relation of the

THE Crown, by natural Right, descended to one of the Nephews of the late Emperor, but he was excluded from it by the Election of Li-vang, who was supported by the King of Tsi, his Relation. This Tributary Prince enlarg'd his Power to the great Prejudice of the Imperial Authority, and usurp'd the Title of Pa, that is to say, the Chief of other Princes, the greater Part of whom acknowledg'd him in that Quality. But this Title, which others also assum'd after his Example, lasted but one hundred Years, and then was abolish'd. Li-vang dy'd the forty first Year of the Cycle, and his Son Whey-vang succeeded him.

Cyc. XXIX.

Christ 657.

THE first six Years of this Reign were Peaceable, but this Tranquillity was afterwards disturb'd by the Tartars who inhabit to the North of the Province of Shan-si; against whom the Emperor sent an Army, commanded by the King of Tsi. This Army attacking them while they were besieging Tay-tong-fu, forc'd their Camp, put them to the Rout, and oblig'd them to retreat with Speed into their own Country. This Victory, and the Trust Whey-vang repos'd in the King of Tsi, gave him such Authority, that he wanted nothing of being Emperor but the Title; and his Ambition, which was still greater, would have put him upon dethroning his Master, if he had not apprehended that the other Princes, who were his Equals, would have oppos'd his Advancement to the Throne.

It is positively affirm'd, that Japan began to be govern'd by Kings in the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle, and the sixteenth of this Emperor's Reign.

The Emperor dy'd the sixth Year of this Cycle, and was succeeded by his eldest Son, call'd Syang-vang.

Defeats the ambitious Designs of the King of Tsi by a Stratagem.

SYANG-VANG, altho' very young; observ'd in his Father's Time, that the King of Tsi's Ambition was without Bounds, that his Authority increas'd daily, and that he aim'd at making himself Master of the Empire: Therefore as soon as he was on the Throne, he resolv'd to restrain his ambitious Designs; but as he could not effect it by open Force, he made use of a Stratagem, which prov'd successful.

The King of Tsi had found means through the Intrigues of his Prime Minister to assemble all the little Sovereigns that were dependant on the Imperial Crown. This was a kind of Convocation of the States, which none but the Emperor had a Right to summon. His Design was to engage these Princes to acknowledge him for their Sovereign; when the Emperor made use of the same Occasion to cause the rest of the Princes to be jealous of him. To this Purpose he sent a skilful Ambassador with Letters to the Assembly. The Order of the Ceremony is, that when a Letter comes from the Emperor, it should be plac'd on a Table magnificently adorn'd; and that the same Honours should be paid to it, as to the Emperor himself, before it was open'd.

The Ceremony was perform'd by all the Tributary Princes, except the King of Tsi; who seem'd to be at a stand, and had even refus'd to comply, if his Prime Minister had not made him sensible on one side, that his Conduct would give Distrust to the Princes assembled, who were in Reality his Equals; and on the other expose his own Orders to be treated with no more Regard by his Subjects, than he had treated the Emperor's. This Prince follow'd such wise Counsel against his Will, and put off the Execution of his Design to a more favourable Opportunity. In the mean time this public Proof of his Submission had great Influence on the other Princes, and help'd not a little to confirm them in a due Submission and Dependance on the Emperor; which restor'd the Government to its ancient Form.

His Son Sbo-tay retires to the King of Tsi, who soon after dies.

Syang-vang was beginning to enjoy the Pleasures of Peace, when it was disturb'd by the Discontent of his Son, Sbo-tay; who left his Court the fifteenth Year of the Cycle, and put himself under the Protection of the King of Tsi. At the same time a Tributary Prince of the Province of Shen-si openly revolted; but the Emperor soon defeated him with the Help of an Army of Tartars, whom he had brought over to his Interest by marrying the Daughter of their Chief. He was soon after deliver'd from his Fears of the King of Tsi, who dy'd of old Age; and the Wars which arose among his five Sons, who disputed the sovereign Power, together with the Division which ensu'd thereon in that Kingdom, seem'd to promise the Emperor lasting lasting Ease. As therefore he thought he had nothing more to fear, he divorc'd his Tartar Spouse (whom he had marry'd for political Reasons) under Pretence that she was a Stranger.

The Chief of the Tartars being highly provok'd at this Affront, resolv'd to be reveng'd. He sent therefore for Sbo-tay, who was quite destitute of Help, and promis'd to make him Emperor, if he would join with him, which he did; and they both march'd to the Capital of the Empire, from which the Emperor was oblig'd to fly. Sbo-tay caus'd himself to be proclaim'd, while his Father wander'd about like a Fugitive, imploring Assistance of the Tributary Princes. But having receiv'd from them the Succours he expected, with which he form'd two Armies, one of them besieg'd the Metropolis, enter'd it in Triumph, and punish'd with Death the rebellious Prince; the other Army defeated the Tartars, and re-establish'd Syang-vang upon the Throne. This Event happen'd the seventeenth Year of the Cycle, when the Empire was restor'd to its former Splendour, and the Emperor enjoy'd it peaceably to his Death; which happen'd the thirty ninth Year of the Cycle, and his Son King-vang succeeded him.

THIS Reign was equally short, and applauded by the People as the preceding. Quang-vang had inherited all the good Qualities of his Father, and the new King of Tsi was not in a Capacity to cause any Disturbance, being hated by his Subjects, because of his Cruelties, and want of Application to Government. A Prince, who was his Kinsman, having given him Advice with regard to his Conduct, he was so provok'd at it, that he sent a Ruffian, who had neither Fear nor Remorse, to assassinate him. The Villain, who was to pretend some Business from the King of Tsi, to make surer of his Blow, went betimes in the Morning to the Palace: where, finding the Prince seated on his Throne, receiving Petitions, and administering Justice, he became seiz'd with Horror at the Thought of staining his Hands in the Blood of so good a Sovereign; and not daring to return to his Master without having executed his Orders, slew himself at the Door of the Palace.

On the fourteenth Day of the ninth Month, in the fifty fourth Year of the Cycle, Lau-kyun was born in the Province of Hu-quang; who is the Founder of one of the two principal Sects, which have infected the Empire, and whereof I shall speak hereafter. He taught, that the Soul died with the Body; that the Happiness of a Man consisted in Voluptuousness; and confining all Felicity to this Life, he pretended to have found out a way to prolong it beyond its natural Term; hence this Sect was call'd the Sect of Immortals. It easily found Admittance among the Grandees, who flatter'd themselves that by embracing it they should prolong their Days. However there is Reason to believe, that the Founder of this impious Sect confess'd a Supreme Being, which he call'd Tau; for he says in one of his Treatises, "That this Tau has no Name that is suitable to him; that he created the Heaven and the Earth, without being corporeal; and that, tho' he is himself immovable, he gives Motion to all things." This has occasion'd some to think, that his Doctrines, where they are very bad have been much corrupted by his Disciples. the two Philosophers who broach'd them, were Yang and Me; the former held, that all Men were to be lov'd alike, as well Strangers as those of the nearest Kin; the latter would have every Man to mind his own Affair, without having the least Concern about the rest of Mankind, or even the Emperor himself.

THE Chinese History relates, that this Prince was born with Hair on his Head, and a Beard on his Chin. He is chiefly prais'd for his Wisdom and Prudence, in having preserv'd his Authority, and the Peace of the Empire, tho' all the Tributary Princes were continually at War among themselves.

The forty seventh Year of this Cycle, was remarkable for the Birth of Kong-fu-tse or Confucius, so often mention'd, whom the Chinese account the greatest Philosopher of their Nation; He was born in the Province of Shan-tong, the fourth Day of the eleventh Month. When he was but three Years old, he lost his Father Sho-lyang-bo, who was Prime Minister in the Principality of Tsu.

Great Instance of Modesty and Self-denial.

The Death of the King of U gave Rise to a Dispute between his two Sons, which is without Example; for the eldest, to whom the Crown belong'd, resolving to resign it to his younger Brother, who refus'd it, plac'd him on the Throne as it were by Force, put on him the Royal Ornaments, and saluted him as his Sovereign: But the latter left the Palace secretly, and hid himself in the Desarts, so that the elder was at last oblig'd to wear a Crown, for which he had such a noble Contempt.

THIS Emperor is blam'd for his Negligence in the Affairs of Government, and his Indolence, with Respect to what pass'd in the Empire. For which Reason the King of U alter'd his Design, of submitting himself to the Empire and its Laws: so that instead of sending Ambassadors to the Imperial Court, he sent them to that of the King of Lü, who was of the Family of the Cheu, and govern'd his Subjects according to the Laws establish'd by the Emperors of this Dynasty.

The Wars, which had continu'd so long among the Tributary Princes, having caus'd great Confusion in the Government of their respective States; the King of Cbing, who reign'd in the Province of Shen-si, began to think of restoring Order in his own. His Prime Minister, a Person of known Ability and Merit, to whom he had committed this Trust, entering into his Masters Views, began with reforming the Abuses which long Use had establish'd in the Court. He renew'd the ancient Laws that had been made by the best Princes, divided the Lands equally, and shew'd so much Wisdom therein, that the Rich did not complain of what had been taken from them to supply the Wants of the Poor. His Regulations on this Head were these; viz.

I. That the Lands should be divided into nine equal Parts, whereof the ninth Part should be the Domain, and cultivated at the common Expence.

II. That all People indifferently should be permitted to fish in the Lakes and Ponds.

III. That the Magistrates should have an Eye particularly to all Widows, old Men and Women, who have no Children, and to Orphans, in order to assist them in their Necessities.

Confucius marries and divorces his Wife.

Confucius marry'd at the Age of nineteen Years, contenting himself with one Wife, by whom he had one Son. A while after he divorc'd her upon some Pretence; but the true Reason was, that being freed from the Cares of a Family, he might pursue his Studies with greater Application; in effect, he made such a Progress in various kinds of Knowledge, that in a few Years he became the most learned Doctor of this Empire.

The Emperor dy'd the eighteenth Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son, call'd Meng-vang. This Prince reign'd but a few Months, in which time he had a Son born, whose Birth gave Rise to two powerful Factions in the Empire. The principal Courtiers declar'd this Infant Emperor, and nam'd Guardians to govern the Empire in his Minority; while some of the Governors of the Provinces, alledging in their Excuse his tender Age, and the Uncertainty of his Life, proclaimed the [second] Brother of Meng-vang. Both Parties proceeded to Arms, but this last Faction being the strongest, took the Metropolis, and plac'd King-vang on the Throne; whose Name tho' the same [in Sound] as his Father's (s), yet it is written in different Characters, and has a different Signification.

CONFUCIUS had already acquir'd such great Reputation, that he was follow'd by three thousand Disciples, of which seventy two were distinguish'd by their Learning; and in this last Number there were ten, who were so accomplish'd in all sorts of Knowledge, that they were call'd by way of Excellence, The Ten Philosophers.

The thirty eighth Year of the Cycle Confucius was prefer'd for his great Merit to be Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Lu, his native Country. Thro' his wife Counsel the Face of Affairs was soon chang'd throughout the Land; he reform'd the Abuses that had crept into it, and restor'd Honesty in dealing; he taught young Men to respect the old, and honour their Parents, even after their Decease; he inspir'd the fair Sex with Mildness and Chastity; and caus'd Sincerity, Uprightness, and all other civil Virtues to prevail among the People. The Love of Justice became so universal, that if any thing happen'd to be drop'd on the high Roads, nobody durst meddle with it, but the Person it belong'd to; in short he establish'd such perfect Order and Union in all Parts of this State, that it seem'd like a well govern'd Family.

About this time the King of Tsi was assassinated by his Prime Minister, who seiz'd the Crown. This Usurper suspecting the Fidelity of his new Subjects, and fearing the Power of the King of Lu, courted his Friendship, and at the same time laid a dangerous Snare for his Virtue. He restor'd the Lands conquer'd by his Predecessors, and made him a Present of a young Maiden, who besides being exceeding pretty, had a charming Voice; she was order'd to employ all her Charms, and the usual Arts of her Sex, to inspire the King of Lu with Love.

Confucius employ'd all his Eloquence to dissuade his Prince from receiving such a pernicious Present; but Love was stronger than Reason, and what the Philosopher foresaw came to pass; for the Prince minding nothing but his Mistress, and the Diversions he made for her, neglected the Care of the State, ceas'd to administer Justice, and despis'd the Counsels of the Wise Men who were at his Court. Confucius finding that he could no longer maintain the prudent Maxims which he had establish'd, laid down his Place of Prime Minister, and retir'd out of the Kingdom. Mean time most of the Tributary Princes were still at War together, wherein the King of U perish'd miserably in Battle against the King of Ywe, which is at present the Province of Che-kyang.

The fifty second Year of the Cycle, the Family of Tsau, which had twenty five Kings in the Space of six hundred and thirty six Years, was entirely extinguish'd by the King of Song.

Confucius ends about this Time the History of the Wars of the Tributary Princes, which had lasted two hundred Years; and dy'd the fifty ninth Year of the Cycle, in the seventy third Year of his Age, and the forty first of this Reign. The Chinese pay the greatest Veneration to the Memory of this Philosopher. He is look'd on as the Master and Doctor of the Empire. His Works have so great Authority, that to make the least Alteration in them would be punish'd as a Crime. Whenever any Disorder arises in Point of Doctrine, a Quotation out of his Works decides it at once; so that the most obstinate among the Learned are oblig'd to submit. His Posterity are still in being, and enjoy the greatest Privileges; which have always subsisted, whatever Revolutions have happen'd in the Empire.

On this the Emperor caus'd him to be proserib'd as a Rebel, which is the first Instance we find of that sort of Punishment. The Prime Minister of that Prince being discontented, came to the Emperor, who gave him the Command of the Army; with which he fought several Battles, conquer'd almost the whole Province, and sent Ambassadors with Presents to the Emperor, desiring the Investiture of that Principality; which was granted him, on Condition that he pay'd the ordinary Homage and Tributes. THIS Prince found the Empire almost restor'd to its ancient Splendour, and maintain'd the Dignity of it, by his wise Conduct. The Empress dying, he liv'd in Celibacy; being an admirable, tho' rare Example of Continency, whence he was surnam'd the Chaste. The thirty first Year of the Cycle, the King of Tsi, put an end to the Principality of Tsay, which had continu'd six hundred and seventy six Years under twenty five Princes.

This Emperor dy'd the thirty seventh Year of the Cycle, leaving three Sons, who were old enough to reign. The eldest, call'd Ngan, succeeded him, but he only reign'd three Months, and was murder'd by his Brother Sâ; who enjoy'd the Fruits of his Crime no longer than five Months; being assassinated, under Pretence of revenging the Parricide, by his youngest Brother, Kau-vang, who ascended the Throne without the least Opposition.

ALTHO' this Prince usurp'd the Crown without Opposition, yet the barbarous Action, by which he made his way to it, disgrac'd him throughout the Empire; and furnish'd most of the Tributary Princes with a Pretence to refuse paying him the usual Homage, or to acknowledge him for their Sovereign. He had a Brother, call'd Whan-kong, whom he remov'd, out of Policy, from Court, by giving him a Principality in the Province of Ho-nan; one of whose Descendants was the last Emperor of this Dynasty.

In the Kingdom of Tsi, a very numerous Family, call'd Tsen, having become exceeding powerful by their great Credit and Riches; they made themselves popular by their Liberality, and growing proud of the Authority they had acquir'd, caus'd the People to rebel, who secretly made away with their King. But to remove the Suspicion of their having been the Rigidists, they plac'd his eldest Son on the Throne, and made the youngest Prime Minister; however, as they had divided all the great Posts and Governments among themselves, they left the Prince nothing but an empty Title, and kept all the Power in their own Hands.

Miserable
State of the Empire.

The Wars begin again among the Tributary
Princes.

ABOUT this time the cruel Wars between the Tributary Princes began again, and lasted near three hundred Years. The Historians call these times Chen-que, or the warlike Ages. Each Prince aim'd at the Empire, and endeavour'd to destroy his Rival. The Emperors had scarcely any thing left them except their Dignity; and had the Affliction to see both their Authority and their Provinces taken from them by Degrees. The History tells us, that the nine Brazen Vessels, which Yu, the Founder of the first Dynasty, caus'd to be made, representing the Provinces of the Empire, shook of their own accord; which was look'd on as a Presage of the Evils that threaten'd the State.

The Kingdom of Tsin was divided among four Princes, who had conquer'd it. One of them, who was become famous by gaining several Battles, form'd the Design of seizing the other three Parts, but was prevented by Death. However his Son Chi-fyang, who succeeded him, being equally unquiet, and ambitious to enlarge his Territories, pick'd a Quarrel with the Kings of Han and Gbey; who chose rather to deliver up the Places, which he unjustly demanded by his Ambassador under Pretence of making Satisfaction for Injuries receiv'd, than engage their Subjects in a bloody War.

Chi-fyang, who breathed nothing but Hostilities, thought to have made the King of Chau, another of his Neighbours, truckle in the same manner; but that Prince not only dismiss'd his Ambassador without giving him any Answer, but engaging the injur'd Kings of Han and Gbey to join him with their Forces, the Army of Chi-fyang was intirely defeated, and himself slain. The King of Chau having subdued the Dominions of his Enemy, enter'd them in Triumph, and put all his Family to Death. Not content with this Vengeance, he caus'd the Corps of Chi-fyang to be brought before him; and cutting off his Head made a Cup of his Skull, out of which he us'd to drink, being varnish'd over for the Purpose. One of the Officers most firmly attach'd to Chi-fyang, was so enrag'd at this Affront done to the Memory of his Master, that he attempted several times to slip into the Palace of the King of Chau, and murder him; but being discover'd, he was put to death.

There was another War between the King of Lü and the King of Tsi. The former gave the Command of his Army to a brave General, nam'd U-ki, who entering the Kingdom of Tsi, gain'd a great Victory, took five important Places, and would have push'd his Conquests farther, if a Peace had not ensu'd between the two Kings. This Officer was as sober as he was valiant; he liv'd like one of the common Soldiers, and equally shar'd with them the Fatigue as well as the Gain; whereby he inspir'd his Troops with that Vigour to which he ow'd his Success rather than to his Valour.

The Emperor dy'd the Sixteenth Year of the Cycle, and his Son Ngan-vang succeeded him.

NGAN-VANG, Thirtieth Emperor, reign'd Twenty six Years.

HISTORY relates nothing concerning this Emperor, excepting the Year of his Reign; and only gives an account of the Wars among the Tributary Princes.

The King of Ghey had engag'd in his Interest the famous General U-ki, just now mention'd, of whose Wisdom he had conceiv'd as high an Idea as of his Valour. One Day discoursing familiarly with him, concerning his Wealth, and the Strength of his Kingdom, which Nature had fortify'd with inaccessible Rocks: U-ki made Answer, that he deceiv'd himself much, if he plac'd his Security in steep Rocks; and that the Power and Grandeur of a State consisted in the Virtue and Application of the Person who govern'd.

This Answer encreas'd his Esteem with the Prince, who having declar'd War against the King of Tsin, gave U-ki the Command of his Army; with which he attack'd the Enemy, entirely defeated them, and forc'd the King to sue for Peace. These and other no less glorious Actions gain'd the General the Affection of the Prince, who to recompense him, made him his Prime Minister. The Grandees displeas'd hereat, endeavour'd to render his Fidelity suspected; and suggested to the King that it was not prudent to put a Stranger into the most important Post in the State. U-ki, being inform'd of the ill Offices they were doing him, left the Kingdom secretly, and retired to the Court of the King of Tsi; where his Merit being soon known he was plac'd at the Head of the Army, and having gain'd several Battles, against different Princes, oblig'd them to seek the Amity and Alliance of his Master. The Great Men envying his Prosperity, they endeavour'd to ruin him with the King; but not succeeding in their Design, they conspir'd against their Sovereign as well as his Favorite; who discovering the Plot, all those concern'd in it were either banish'd the Kingdom or put to Death. U-ki after this changed the Form of the Government, by limiting the Authority of the Grandees and Ministers, and lodging the Power solely in the King. This Reform in the State render'd it so flourishing that it became formidable to the neighbouring Princes; who conspir'd with the Governors and Magistrates of the Kingdom, to destroy a Man, who had render'd his Master so much their Superiour in Power and Authority. Accordingly he was found murder'd in his own House.

The Emperor dy'd the forty second Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Lye-vang.

LYE-VANG, Thirty first Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

THE Empire decay'd daily, and the Imperial Family was on the Brink of Ruin. All the Tributary Princes maintain'd their Independency, excepting the King of Tsi, who was the only one who renew'd his Homage on Lye-vang's Accession to the Throne. The same Year that he took Possession of the Empire, the Kingdom of Ching, which had twenty three Princes in the Space of four hundred and thirty two Years, was destroy'd by the King of Han.

The forty second Year of this Cycle was remarkable for the Birth of the Philosopher Meng-tse, commonly known by the Name of Mencius, who is esteem'd most of all the Chinese Sages after Confucius. Lye-vang dy'd without Issue in the forty ninth Year of the Cycle, and his younger Brother Hyen-vang, succeeded him.

HYEN-VANG, Thirty second Emperor, reign'd Forty eight Years.

THIS Prince had scarcely any thing else but the Title of Emperor; the Imperial Authority being so little respected that the Tributary Princes not only refus'd to acknowledge him for their Sovereign, but also threaten'd to declare War against him if he oppos'd their Designs, or blam'd their Conduct. They being prepossess'd with an Opinion, that the Crown belong'd to the Possessor of the nine Vases of Copper, which the great Yu had caus'd to be made; each of them strove to get the Possession of them, in order to usurp the Authority over the rest. The Emperor, to defeat their Designs, was oblig'd to have them thrown into a deep Lake, from which it was impossible to get them out.

Mencius, who was but thirty six Years old, then flourish'd in the highest Reputation, and had seventeen Disciples that follow'd him. He travell'd over several Kingdoms, especially those of Ghey and Tsi, instructing Princes how to govern their Subjects, and the Subjects in their Duty towards their Princes; as well as in the Virtues that they ought to practise, both in the private and active Scenes of Life.

Hyen-vang dy'd the thirty seventh Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Shin-tsin-vang.

of the King of Tsin,who defeats

Tributary.

IF this Prince had possess'd Strength and Courage enough to have taken Advantage of the Divisions and Wars, which reign'd among the Tributary Princes, doubtless he would have restor'd the Empire to its former Grandeur: but his Cowardice and Sloth, in which he exceeded his Predecessor, contributed more than any thing to the abasement of his Dignity, and the extinction of his Authority; while the King of Tsin encreas'd to such a Degree that he kept the other Princes in Subjection to him, and had the Imperial Authority, tho' not the Dignity. Five Kings, viz. of Tsu, Cbau, Han, Ghey, and Yen, joined their Forces to oppose his formidable Power; but the King of Tsin defeated their Army, and might have deprived them of their Kingdoms, if a more important Concern had not call'd him elsewhere. Two Princes of the Western Part of the Province of Se-chwen, who were independant of the Empire, were at War together, and each demanded Aid from the King of Tsin; who believing it was easy to take Advantage of their Difference, and join those vast Countries to his own, marched to the Assistance of one of these Princes, and defeated the Army of the other, who was found dead in the Field of Battle; in short he oblig'd the Prince, whom he had assisted, to pay him Homage, and an annual Tribute.

At the same time the King of Ghey, one of the Confederates, having no Hopes of living either easy, or secure in his Dominions, while he had so powerful a Prince for his Enemy, became his Tributary, and pay'd him the same Respect and Submission as if he had been Emperor. The King of Tsin granted him his Friendship and Protection the more willingly, as by the Kingdom of Ghey, he could more easily enter and subdue the Territories of the other Princes of the East.

The Emperor, who had been an idle Spectator of all the Victories of the King of Tsin, dy'd the forty third Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Ngan-vang.

NGAN - VANG, *Thirty fourth Emperor, reign'd Fifty nine Years.*Ngan-vang,

THIS Prince's Reign was not more happy for being so long; when he came to the Throne, the Imperial Authority was almost annihilated; and tho' he wanted neither Parts nor Virtue, yet the State was too weak to undertake any thing that might give the least umbrage to such a powerful Prince as the King of Tsin.

At this time a Ko-lau of the King of Tsin, nam'd Kiu-yen, who had gain'd the Hearts of all, by his Probity and Uprightness, fell a Sacrifice to Envy, and was unworthily depriv'd of his Honours; not being able to survive his Misfortune, he threw himself into the River and was drown'd. The People were so sensibly afflicted at his Loss, that they preserve the Memory of it by a Feast; which is still celebrated annually on the fifth Day of the fifth Month, when they sail about the Rivers in ornamented Barks, as if they were in search of that virtuous Mandarin, in order to bring him to life again.

Mencius dy'd the ninth Year of this Cycle, in the eighty fourth Year of his Age, and is look'd upon as the greatest Philosopher of the Empire, except Confucius. His Works are held in high Veneration, and his Descendants enjoy great Privileges. Mean time the King of Tsin followed closely his ambitious Designs, and insensibly clear'd the way to the Empire, by underhand supporting the War among the Tributary Princes; each of whom ask'd Succours from him, which he readily furnish'd them with, that they might destroy one another, and lessen the Number of the petty Sovereigns. Thus the Kingdom of Song, which had subsisted three hundred eighty one Years, under thirty two Princes, was destroy'd by the Kings of Tsi and Tsu; and the Principality of Li, which had been govern'd by thirty four Sovereigns, was subdu'd by the King of Tsin. This last also invaded the Territories of Ghey, who became tributary to him.

After this Cbau-syang King of Tsin, no longer concealing his Design upon the Imperial Crown, offer'd to the Sovereign Lord of Heaven a Sacrifice, with the same Ceremonies which none but the Emperors were allow'd to perform, by which publick Act he openly declared his Pretension to that sovereign Dignity. At that time there was no Prince powerful enough to dispute it with him, except the King of Tsi; but Cbau-syang gained a compleat Victory over him, and immediately sent part of his Troops to dethrone the Emperor, whose Army was so small, that it was defeated at the first Attack; and this unfortunate Prince was forced to implore the Clemency of the Conqueror, to acknowledge him for his Sovereign, and yield up to him the few Cities that remained in his Hands. This Submission saved him his Life, which he ended the Year following in the Province of Sban-si, whither he retired.

As soon as the Emperor's Misfortune was publickly known, several of the Princes, particularly the King of Han, hasten'd to pay Homage to the King of Tsin. Nevertheless, as he he was not acknowledg'd by the whole Empire, and there were still some Princes, who adher'd to the Family of Cbew, they elected Cbew-kyun, one of the Grand-sons of the Brother of Kau-vang, the twenty eighth Emperor of this Race.

IF the Confederacy form'd by the six Kings, above mention'd, for their common Defense, had continu'd, they might easily have maintained their Ground against the Forces of Shi-whang-ti; but their Ambition soon disuniting them, they made War on one another, and so weaken'd themselves by the Destruction of their Armies, that by little and little they became a Prey to Shi-whang-ti; who having subdu'd them one after another, put them to death with all the Males of their Families, excepting the King of Tsi, whom he reserv'd for a more lingering and cruel Punishment; for he shut him up in a Park, planted with Pine-Trees, where he allow'd him only just as much Food as was necessary to support Nature. This unfortunate Prince, by these means grown desperate, refus'd to eat any of the Provisions which they brought him, and starv'd himself to Death.

more effectually in that Design, he told him that one of the Islands produc'd a sovereign Remedy against all sorts of Diseases, and even Death itself.

The Emperor, fond of living long to enjoy his Conquests, was caught with this Bait, and sent him back with Ships, Soldiers, and three hundred young Men, with as many marriageable Maidens. The Admiral arriving at an Island, built a City, of which he declar'd himself Sovereign; in a short time the Country was peopled, and the Inhabitants are proud of deriving their Original from the Chinese.

Sbi-wbang-ti having observ'd in visiting his Empire that the Northern Provinces, especially Pe-che-li, Shan-shi, and Shen-shi, were much expos'd to the sudden Incurfions of the Tartars; he sent a formidable Army, which having driven them back a great way beyond the Frontiers of the Empire, he immediately put in Execution the Scheme he had form'd to secure his Country against such dangerous Neighbours, by building a Wall from the Sea to the Extremities of the Province of Shen-shi. In the forty second Year of the Cycle, he caus'd Ships loaded with Iron, to be sunk into the Sea, to secure the Foundation; one third part of the Men in the Empire, who were of a certain Age, were employ'd in the Work; and the Architect was oblig'd under Pain of Death to join the Stones so well with Mortar, that not a Nail could be driven between.

There were large Arches built for the Passage of Rivers, as also Forts along the Wall, at proper Distances for Garrisons, and Gates in the most convenient Places, to facilitate Commerce, and invade Tartary on Occasion. It was so thick that seven or eight Horsemen could ride abreast on it, and so solid that it is almost all standing to this Day; but, what is more surprising, is, that the whole was finish'd in five Years time.

This stupendous Work was enough to immortalize the Founder; but not satisfy'd with having Comparisons made between him and his Predecessors, much to his Advantage, he pretended he had eclipsed all their Glory, and that Posterity might have none to talk of but himself, he endeavour'd to destroy the very Remembrance of them. For this end he publish'd a Decree, commanding his Subjects on pain of Death to burn the Books call'd King, and all the Works of Confucius, which transmitted the Virtues and Actions of those great Emperors; he only excepted those that treated of Architecture and Medicine. To counteract these destructive Orders, he fram'd several Pretences: These Books, said he, were useful when the Empire was divided among various Sovereigns, that the People might be govern'd by the same Laws; but now that it is under one Monarch, it is the same Spirit which governs and animates the whole. These Sciences, added he, to which an infinite Number of Men apply themselves, serve only to encourage Idleness, while Agriculture, which is the Source of Happiness to the People, is neglected. In short, according to him, these Books contain'd the Seeds of Rebellion, and those who made them their Study went so far in their Pretence to reform the State, that if the wise Commands of the Prince, which must vary according to the several Occasions, were not conformable to the ancient Laws of the Empire, they took the Liberty rashly to condemn his Conduct, and with their seditious Discourses kindled a Spirit of Disobedience and Rebellion.

This Decree was executed by the Governors with the utmost Severity; they made the strictest Search for these valuable Books, and the Men of Learning, who were found with any of them in their Custody, were put to Death; however, some Copies of them were sav'd, as I have mention'd in another Place. This Decree of the Emperor, and the Severity with which it was put in Execution, have made his Name odious to Posterity, and the Loss of these ancient Monuments is much bewail'd by the Chinese, at this Day. A profound Peace succeeding after a twenty five Years War, the Emperor made several new Laws, and alter'd others. As he had several Children, some of his Ministers advis'd him to create the Younger, Sovereigns of certain Provinces; but the Emperor putting them in mind of the Troubles which the erecting such Principalities had caus'd under the preceding Dynasties, rejected that Method; and instead thereof order'd Palaces to be built for them in several Cities, where they should be maintain'd at the Emperor's Expence, and treated with the Respect due to their Birth, but have no Authority over the People. This Custom has been observ'd almost ever since, and in latter Reigns they have been oblig'd to reside in the Metropolis, and to follow the Court.

Sbi-wbang-ti, who was not us'd to be at rest, resolv'd to make a second Progress, through the Eastern Provinces of the Empire, and took his second Son with him; but falling dangerously ill on the Road, he dy'd in the thirty seventh Year of the Cycle.

Finding himself drawing near his End, he wrote a Letter to his eldest Son, declaring him Emperor, and deliver'd it together with the Seals of the Empire to his second Son, in order to send them to his Brother; but as soon as the Emperor was dead, the young Prince resolv'd to place the Crown on his own Head. The only way to succeed in this Affair, was to engage Li-tse, the Prime Minister, in his Party, who had great Authority in the Empire; he indeed rejected the first Proposal, but on new Solicitation, his own Interest and the Merit of the young Prince at length prevail'd with him; and being in great Esteem, his own Example drew almost all the Suffrages over to the young Prince. The eldest Son, who had got together some Forces, in order to maintain his Right, finding that most of the Provinces had already acknowledg'd his Brother Emperor, was oblig'd to submit; but the Steps he had taken, being look'd upon as Crimes of high Treason, he was order'd to kill himself.

Emperor,
misled by the Advice of a perfidious Minister.

THIS Prince, who was both an Usurper and a Murderer of his Brother, during the short time that he reign'd, shew'd how unworthy he was of the Crown. He chose the greatest Enemy of the Family of Tsin for his Ko-lau, or Prime Minister, who affected a great Zeal for his Person, tho' secretly he was endeavouring to extirpate all his Race; and indeed the Emperor's Inclinations too well seconded the Views of the Traitor.

This Prince had told him several times, that, Life being short, he would pass it as pleasantly as possible, and indulge himself in an unbounded Looze of Pleasure.

The Ko-lau upon this advised him to remove all the Ministers and Governors appointed by his Father, who, he said, would be continually disturbing his Pleasures with their Remonstrances, and Threatnings, and put in their Places such as he was sure would have a regard to his Quiet. The Emperor follow'd this pernicious Counsel, and all Employments were fill'd with Creatures of the Ko-lau.

The Complaints and Murmurs which ensued in all the Provinces upon this Change, made the People, (who were burthen'd with Taxes to supply the Emperor's Expences in building Palaces, Parks, and fine Gardens,) ready to revolt. Add to this, that the smallest Faults were punish'd in the severest manner; and that often the Governors gratify'd their private Resentments, under Pretence of pleasing the Emperor, and executing his Orders.

One of the Generals of the Army, who had been sent into the Eastern Provinces, to quell some Troubles, was the first that revolted; and engag'd the Troops to proclaim for Emperor the Lawful Heir, who was Son of the eldest Brother, and to dethrone the Usurper, who had murder'd him.

One of his
volts.

At this Juncture there appear'd a Freebooter, call'd Lyew-pang, who from a private Soldier was become Captain of a Troop of Vagabonds. He was endow'd with great Qualities, being courageous, mild, and moderate; tho' a strict Observer of the Laws of Military Discipline among his Companions. He was also naturally eloquent and persuasive, especially when he declaimed against the Luxury and Indolence of the Emperor. A great Physiognomist meeting him on the Road, threw himself at his Feet: By the Lines of your Face, which, says he, I have carefully examin'd, I know you will be Emperor, and I render you beforehand the Respects, which a Subject owes to his Sovereign. I have a Daughter, who has not her Equal for Beauty and Wisdom in the Empire; her I offer you in marriage, so sure I am, that my Prediction will one Day come to pass. Lyew-pang charm'd with this Discourse accepted the Offer, and was instantly marry'd.

The Rise of Lyew-pang.

Mean time the revolted General form'd a Design to make himself King of Tsu; and marching towards one of the Places of that Kingdom, which he hop'd to take in a short time, the Governor seeing the Danger he was in, begg'd Assistance of Lyew-pang: who by his Presence and the Terror of his Name caus'd the Enemy to retreat, and thus deliver'd the City. But the Governor, instead of acknowledging the Service, shut the Gates against his Deliverer.

Lyew-pang, being inform'd by a Letter fasten'd to an Arrow, which was shot into his Camp, that the Governor's Ingratitude had caus'd a Sedition in the City, immediately besieg'd, and scaling the Walls, took it. The Governor having been slain at the first Attack, the Inhabitants declar'd for the Conqueror, who enter'd with his Army in Triumph; and thus from being Captain of the Vagabonds, he became of a sudden General of a great Army, as well as Master of a rich Booty. Hereupon he caus'd red Ensigns to be made, and began to entertain Hopes of fulfilling the Prediction of the Fortune-Teller.

In the mean time, tho' the Emperor's Throne shook under him, yet it could not rouse him out of that dead Lethargy, into which the Love of Pleasure had thrown him; and the perfidious Ko-lau, instead of endeavouring to recover him, precipitated his Ruin, by his pernicious Advice; he falsely accused of Crimes the Ministers and Governors, who were best affected to the reigning Family, and had them immediately put to Death. Such a Career of Covetousness and Cruelty making the People desperate, many Cities, and even whole Provinces, received those who came to take Possession of them, looking on them as the Avengers of publick Liberty. So that in the second Year of Eul-shi, several Provinces revolting, chose their own Sovereigns; and thus all the Kingdoms rose again, which had been destroy'd by the Dexterity of Shi-wang-ti, particularly those of Tsi, Yen, Chau, Ghey, and Tsu.

Thus perish'd miserably a Prince, who pay'd his Way to a Throne by the Murder of his Brother.

Mean while the Ko-lau, who had shut himself in his Palace, pretending to be sick, came out in haste, as if he wanted to discover the Regicide and his Accomplices, and the better to make this Shew of his Fidelity pass unsuspected, he plac'd Ing-vang, who was Grand Nephew to the Emperor, on the Throne.

But as it was hazardous to punish so powerful a Minister openly, he pretended to be sick, and commanded his Son to stab the Traytor, when he came alone, according to the Privilege of his Place, to speak with him in private. This was put in Execution, and the Empire thereby deliver'd from a Monster, who dispos'd of all Employments, and arbitrarily deprived the Ministers and Governors, both of their Substance and Life. Afterwards they put to Death all his kindred to the third Generation.

The Emperor finding himself forsaken by his Subjects, and fearing Death more than the Loss of his Crown, threw himself at the Conqueror's Feet, and deliver'd him the Seals and other Marks of the Imperial Dignity. Lyew-pang entred the City in Triumph, which he gave Leave to his Soldiers to plunder, excepting the Palace, where he found immense Riches; forbidding them under the severest Penalties to use any of the Inhabitants ill.

LYEW-PANG was the Founder and first Emperor of this Dynasty, under the Name of Kau-tsu. At first he only assumed the Title of King of Tsin; because he had taken the Capital of the Empire, in the Name of the King of Tsin, who had promis'd to give him that Kingdom.

Hyang-byu (A), the other General, who as hath been observed had also been sent to dethrone the Emperor, was vex'd to find that Lyew-pang, through his Expedition and Address, had depriv'd him of the Glory and Principality to which he aspir'd; and as he was brutish and cruel, and at the Head of a numerous and well disciplin'd Army, it was fortunate for Lyew-pang, that he prevented its coming to an open Rupture. This was effected by means of an Interview, procur'd by the Father of Hyang-byu, at which the Generals being reconcil'd, they afterwards entred the Metropolis together.

Hyang-byu, not pleas'd with the Clemency and Mildness of Lyew-pang, and to shew his hatred to the Princes of Tsin, set the City and the Imperial Palace on Fire; had the Tombs of the Princes of Tsin search'd, and their Bones thrown into unknown Places; and with his own Hands murder'd the dethron'd Prince, whom Lyew-pang had treated with great Respect ever since his Misfortune.

A great number of the late Emperor's Soldiers, who were among his Troops, having murmur'd at his Cruelty, he caus'd their Arms to be taken from them by Stratagem; after which they were surrounded by his Army, who cut all their Throats without Mercy, by his Orders.

Orders. So many barbarous Actions render'd him abhorr'd by the Soldiers, as well as the People; and serv'd as a Foil to set off the Justice, Clemency, and Moderation of Lyew-pang.

As Hyang-byu had made himself absolute in the State of Han, and plac'd Garrisons in most of the Cities, he next resolv'd to murder his Master, to whom he owed his present Fortune; whereby he propos'd both to attain the Empire, to which he had long aspired, and be revenged on him for having preferr'd Lyew-pang before him, in giving him the Principality of Tsin. With this Design he set toward the City of Kyew-kyang, in the Province of Kyang-shi, where the King of Tsu was. This Prince to honour his General, came himself to meet him, and was immediately assassinated. Lyew-pang being griev'd at the Misfortune of this Prince, who was his Benefactor, order'd the most magnificent Obsequies possible for him; which gain'd him still more the Affection of the People, who join'd with him to revenge the Death of their Sovereign. The two Generals, who from this time were at War together for the Imperial Crown, having fought seventeen Battles, with various Success, at last Lyew-pang entirely defeated his Antagonist's Army, who slew himself to avoid falling into his Enemy's Hands.

A Soldier, who found his Body on the Ground, cut off his Head, and carry'd it to Lyew-pang, after which it was fix'd on a Spear, and shew'd to all the Inhabitants of Tsu. The Conqueror us'd his Victory with Moderation; he order'd a magnificent Funeral for Hyang-byu, to shew the Esteem he had for his Valour, and gave his Father the Sovereignty of a Province.

This War being ended, he conven'd a General Assembly of the Estates of the Empire; wherein he was declared Emperor, under the Name of Kau-tsu, by all the Tributary Princes, Grandees, and Governors of the Provinces. He kept his Court at first in the Province of Sben-shi, but afterwards remov'd it into that of Ho-nan, where it continued one hundred ninety six Years, under twelve Emperors.

At a great Feast which he gave to his Officers and Soldiers, with whom he talk'd very familiarly, he ask'd them, to what they attributed his Advancement to the Empire; they making Answer in flattering Terms, ascribed it to his Merit, Valour, and other great Qualities; You are mistaken, reply'd the Emperor, it is owing to this, that I knew how to distinguish the different Talents of those whom I honour'd with my Confidence, and to give them such Employments as they were most fit for.

Kau-tsu falling sick, nam'd his Son Whey-ti for his Successor, appointing him Ministers in whom he might confide; he dy'd the forty third Year of the Cycle. The Chinese History bestows on him the highest Elogies.

WHEY-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

THE Empire expected great things from this Prince, he being endow'd with Abundance of Meekness, and Moderation, as well as great Courage. But these Virtues were defac'd by much greater Faults; his immoderate Love for Women ruin'd his Health, and his Complaisance for his Mother induced him to intrust her with the Care of the Empire.

This Princess assum'd the whole Authority to herself, and was generally hated for her Cruelty and other Crimes. She removed the Ministers and Governors, according to her Fancy, and dispos'd of their Places to her Creatures. The ordinary Instrument of her Revenge was Poison, which she caus'd to be given secretly to those she wanted to get rid of.

The King of Tsu, who was the Emperor's eldest Brother, coming to visit him, when he was sick, had been dispatch'd in the same manner, if the Emperor himself had not taken the fatal Cup, which she had presented him, out of his Hand.

Whey-ti dy'd the fiftieth Year of the Cycle, being oppress'd with Infirmities, which his loose Life had brought upon him. Lyu-bew, his Mother, fearing that they intended to set one of the Emperor's Brothers on the Throne, pretended to have a Child, which she bought of a Countrywoman and declared herself his Guardian; but considering that the Cheat was in Danger of being discover'd, while the Mother lived, she caus'd her to be strangled.

LYU-HEW, the Usurper, reign'd Eight Years.

THIS Princess was not satisfy'd to have rais'd her Family out of the Dust to the highest Dignities of the Empire, but she wanted the Tributary Crowns at her Disposal; and put to Death one of her Ministers who had the Courage to tell her, that those Dominions belong'd of Right to the Princes of the Family of Han, and that her Husband had sworn all the Governors to maintain that Right even by Force of Arms, if Necessity required it. However, she thought herself powerful enough to fear nothing; and in effect gave the Sovereignty of some Provinces to her own Relations, on Condition of paying her Homage.

After this she murder'd the young Child, to which she was Guardian, and by so doing discover'd the Secret of the Artifice which her Ambition had prompted her to. Her Relations also abusing their good Fortune, behav'd themselves with so much Arrogance and Pride, that the Nobles combin'd together to reduce them to their former despicable Condition, when this wicked Princess was taken away by a sudden Death, in the fifty eighth Year of the Cycle.

Her Memory was so odious, that nobody would take the Part of her Family; so that all her Relations were massacred throughout the Empire.

Restores the Empire to its former Lustre.

UNDER the Reign of this Prince the Empire recover'd its ancient Splendor; and his Virtues gain'd him in a little time the Love of the Nobles as well as the People.

In the Sacrifices which he offer'd, according to Custom, to the Lord of Heaven, he first pray'd for the Happiness and Prosperity of his Subjects, then for the Preservation of his Person. He was so frugal, that he would not suffer the least Alteration to be made in the Furniture of his Palace, nor to be served in Gold or Silver Plate; and prohibited his Wives, even the Empress herself, to wear Silks, that were either embroider'd or of various Colours. He testify'd his Tenderness for the People, by remitting the Duty on Salt, and one half of the ordinary Taxes; also by ordering all the poor old Men in every Province, after they were arrived to the Age of fourscore, to be maintain'd at his own Expence.

Wholesome Regulations.

There being a Mint for Copper Money no where but in the Metropolis, whereby the Imperial Treasure found an Advantage, but the Public suffer'd in Proportion to the Distance of Places; he permitted the Coinage of them all over the Empire, ordering, that this sort of Money should be made round, with a square Hole in the middle for the Conveniency of carrying it. The preceding Wars having laid waste the Country and ruin'd Agriculture, which is one of the principal Supports of the State, he cultivated the Earth with his Royal Hands, in some sort to enoble that laborious Profession. He caus'd Mulberry-Trees to be planted, and Silk-Worms to be bred in his Palace, in order to induce the Grandees to follow his Example; obliging the Empress and his other Wives to employ themselves in Needlework, that they might set a Pattern of Industry to the Chinese Ladies. He protect'd Learning, and gave leave for the Books, which had been sav'd from the Fire, to be produc'd. In his Reign the Art of making Paper was also first discover'd, by grinding Bambû in Mills made on Purpose; every thing before being written on Leaves, or the Bark of Trees, with an Iron Pencil; instead of which they invent'd likewise Pencils made of Hair, and Ink which is dissolv'd in Water on a Piece of Marble. While this Prince was thus employ'd in making his People happy, the Tartars made several Inroads into the Empire, but were repuls'd with Loss, and driven a great Distance from the Frontiers. The most distant Nations were so affected with the Fame of his Virtue, and Wisdom of his Government, that the Provinces of Quang-tong and Quang-si voluntarily offer'd to submit to his Laws, and pay'd him Tribute; on which he sent Ambassadors to receive their Homages. The only Fault which this Prince is accus'd of, is his Weakness in giving credit to a certain Impostor, who presented him with a very costly Liquor, assuring him that, if he drank it, it would make him immortal.

THIS Prince was remarkable for his Mildness and Clemency. One of his first Acts was to mollify the Rigour of Punishments which were then inflict'd on Criminals; but he re-establish'd the Taxes, which his Father had reduc'd to one half, alledging as a Reason, that since Agriculture was restored, the Imperial Treasure ought to be put in a Condition to support the Occasions of the State.

The great Indulgence of those who had the Care of the Education of the young Princes, occasion'd great Disorders in his Reign. As it was the Custom for the Children of the Tributary Princes to be educated with those of the Emperor, the eldest Son of King-ti made a Feast for one of them, whom he had taken a particular Affection for, above the rest; in which he carry'd the Debauch to such Excess, that having quarrell'd with his Favorite, he stabb'd him dead with a Knife. The Father hearing of his Son's Death, swore to revenge it, and engag'd in his Quarrel six other Tributary Princes, who join'd Forces with him. The Emperor, to prevent their Designs, sent an able General with an Army against them; who had the Policy to draw the Enemy into a Province, where they had Difficulty to meet with Provisions, while himself, fortify'd in his Camp, had plenty of all things necessary for the Subsistence of his Army.

The Confederates perceiving they should soon be afflicted with Famine, resolv'd to divide their Forces, and attack the Camp on all sides at once. But being repuls'd with very great Loss, they fell into a disorderly Flight, on which the Imperialists made a dreadful Slaughter; and the six Princes were either kill'd by the Emperor's Soldiers, or kill'd themselves to prevent falling into the Enemy's Hands.

VU-TI, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Fifty four Years.

THE Prudence, Moderation, and Valour of this Prince, his Application to Government, his Love for the Sciences, and particular Regard for learned Men, made him esteem'd as one of the greatest Emperors that ever reign'd in China. As soon as he had perform'd his Father's Obsequies, he sent for all the chief Philosophers in the Empire to his Court, to consult them upon the Measures of his Government. And as he was naturally inclin'd to War, he thought they would have encourag'd his Inclination, by advising him to attempt the Conquest of some neighbouring Countries, that he might establish Order and Tranquillity therein; but he was mightily surpris'd to find these Wise Men persuading him to maintain Peace, and avoid the most just Wars, which sooner or later prove fatal to a State.

This made him give over the Thought of such Projects, however fond he was of them, and apply himself to the Cares of Government, which he reliev'd with Hunting, the only Recreation he delighted in. He had for that Purpose a Park, enclosed with Walls of vast Extent, where all sorts of Game and Fallow Beasts were kept; but reflecting that so much Land lying uncultivated was a Loss to his People, he chose rather to deprive himself of that innocent Pleasure, than give them Cause to complain, and thenceforth contented himself with the ancient Parks belonging to his Predecessors.

He made several Laws, very conducive to the Peace of the Empire. The Extent of Land, given in Sovereignty to any Prince, was not to exceed one hundred Li square; But some of them had so encreased their Quantity, that they possess'd above a thousand Li. He remedy'd this Abuse, by ordaining that, whenever a Prince should die, his Estate should be equally divided among his legitimate Children; not thinking it just that only one should be enrich'd, while the rest, thro' Indigence, were unable, with Decency to perform the Honours indispensably due to their Father's Memory. He order'd withall, that for want of lawful Heirs, those Sovereignties should revert to the Crown.

His Laws.

In order to promote the Sciences he commanded the learned Men, whom his Liberalities had drawn to his Court, to put in Order those ancient and precious Books which had escap'd the general Destruction; causing them to be taught publicly; as also the Moral Maxims of Confucius and Mencius. These Books were Manuscripts, Printing not having been invented till within fifty Years before the Christian Æra.

The good Qualities of this Prince were tarnish'd by his Weakness, in giving Ear to Impostors, who promised him an Elixir, which should render him immortal; once, when one of these Chemists brought him this Liquor of Immortality, and setting it on the Table earnestly intreated him to drink it for an Experiment; one of his Ministers, who had endeavour'd in vain to cure him of his Credulity, took up the Cup suddenly and drank it himself. The Emperor being incens'd that his Minister had deprived him of Immortality, resolv'd to punish him with death; to which the Minister reply'd with a Smile, If this Drink, Sir, hath made me Immortal, how can you put me to Death? But if you can, how doth this frivolous Theft deserve it? This Answer soften'd the Emperor, who, tho' he applauded the Wisdom of his Minister, was not thoroughly cured of his Weakness.

quor of Im-

Some time after a Magician appear'd at Court, who undertook to shew the Emperor one of his Wives of the second Order, who was dead, and had been tenderly beloved by him. The Impostor pretended she inhabited the Moon, where she enjoy'd the Effects of drinking the Liquor which render'd People immortal; and having order'd a Tower to be built, affirm'd that by his Power over Spirits, he would cause her to descend therein as often as the Emperor pleas'd. The Emperor assist'd at the conjuring Ceremonies, but the Immortal was deaf to the Voice of the Magician, who fearing to be punish'd, had recourse to this Artifice. Having on a piece of Silk written the Reasons, which hinder'd the Concubine from descending from the Moon, he caus'd a Cow to swallow it; after which pointing to the Beast, I know not, says he to the Emperor, in a fearful Tone, what Crime we have committed, but I see in the Belly of this Creature things that surprize me; command it, O Prince! to be open'd in your Presence. The Cow was accordingly open'd, and the piece of Silk found in its Belly. But after examining the Writing, they discover'd it to be the Impostor's own Hand, who not able to deny it was put to Death. This History serves for a Subject to several Comedies.

He built several Cities there, and honour'd the two Generals with the Title of King. educated at his Court. The Emperor was greatly pleased with this young Prince, who, beside a graceful Shape, had a very lofty Air, mixt with a surprizing Sweetness; and being charm'd with his Dexterity in managing Horses, made him first his Master of the Horse, and afterward General of his Army: honouring him with the Name of Kin (u), to distinguish him from the Tartars, as if he had been a Native of China.

When Vu-ti drew near his End, he declar'd the Son of one of his Concubines his Successor. This young Prince, whom he loved better than any of his Children, was no more than eight Years of Age; but he appointed him for Guardian one of his Ministers, in whom he had an entire Confidence. And fearing that the Mother of the young Emperor should stir up Troubles in the State, as Lyu-bew had done, he resolv'd to put her to Death, for the many Crimes she was accus'd of; allowing her the Favour however of choosing what Death she would die.

THIS Prince, tho' very young, discover'd good Dispositions, and a Prudence far above his Years; being very tractable to the Instructions which he receiv'd from the wise Guardian which his Father had appointed him. He began his Reign by rewarding the Officers who had serv'd the State well; by sending just and able Magistrates secretly into the Provinces, to enquire if the People were oppress'd; and by providing for the Poor in a time of Dearth, when he ordain'd that the rich People, who had more Corn than was necessary for their Subsistence, should furnish the poor with as much as they wanted, and be oblig'd to sow enough to supply them. To make them Amends, he remitted the Taxes on all sort of Grain; by which wise Regulation he sav'd the Lives of infinite Numbers of indigent People.

Equally careful of the Repose and Happiness of his Subjects, he concluded an honourable Peace with the Tartars; but did not long survive it, dying without Male Issue, in the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, before he was quite twenty two Years old, mightily lamented by the Empire, on account of his excellent Qualities.

Hyau-ti his Uncle succeeded him, with the Consent of the whole Nation, who soon repented their Choice; for he was negligent of the Government, had no Tenderness for the People, spent both Day and Night in Debauches, and despis'd all good Counsels, which oblig'd the Ministers and Nobility to depose him.

They went to the Palace, and seiz'd the Seals, and other Ensigns of the Imperial Dignity, declaring he had forfeited his Authority; and then sent him to the little State, whereof he had been Sovereign before; not one of his Subjects or Domestics finding Fault with what was done, so odious and contemptible he had render'd himself. They chose in his Place Swen-ti, who was Grand-Son of the Emperor Vu-ti.

THE Misfortunes which this Prince suffer'd in his Youth, did not a little contribute to those Virtues which render'd him worthy of the Empire. He had been educated in a Prison, where the Princess his Mother was shut up by the Command of the Emperor; who suspected her, tho' falsely, of destroying the Princes and Princesses of the Royal Blood, by Witchcraft and Sorcery. The Keeper of the Prison was very careful of him, and Swen-ti, as soon as he was Emperor, rewarded him with a Principality.

This Prince was of easy Access, of a very mild compassionate Nature to the Unfortunate, and very constant in his Application to State-Affairs.

As he resolv'd to govern alone, he re-establish'd an Officer, suppress'd by his Predecessors, whose Business it was to put the Emperor in mind of his Faults, and to exhort him to reform his Conduct, when he departed from his Duty.

He caus'd exact Information to be given him of the Behaviour of the Governors and Magistrates of the People; gave Audience often, especially to Widows, Orphans, and poor Folks. He permitted all his Subjects to present him Memorials; because in that Form they could better explain, and he give more Attention to their Case, than in Audiences.

He reduc'd the multitude of Laws to a certain Number of Articles, and disannull'd the rest, which serv'd only to perplex the clearest Matters, and to perpetuate Suits.

Having been inform'd that the Kingdoms in India, which were conquer'd by his Grandfather, had thrown off the Yoke, he was preparing to go and chastise the Rebels; but was dissuaded

(a) The History is related confusedly in this Place. The Father of this Prince, who is called the Tartar King, seems to be one of the two Chinese Generals, mention'd just before, who were settled in the Parts of India, to the South of China; and if so, those Countries seem to be confounded with Eastern dissuaded from it by his Ministers, who told him, that the Blood of his Subjects ought to be dearer to him than Conquests so distant; and that those who resisted his Wisdom and Virtue did not deserve to taste the Sweets of his Government.

In the forty eighth Year of the Cycle there were dreadful Earthquakes, which separated Mountains, and fill'd up Valleys; and as such Accidents were not common, they struck the greater Terror among the People, who look'd on them as a Sign of the Anger of Heaven, and the Fore-runner of some greater Calamity. Tan-yu, a King of the Tartars, sent Ambassadors to pay the Emperor Homage, and to acknowledge himself his Tributary. As it was suspected that their Intentions were not sincere, and that they came only to discover the Strength of the Empire, and prevent War being declar'd against their Nation before they had recruited themselves, it was resolv'd at first not to admit them to Audience; but perceiving by the fine Furs which they brought, that this Step was taken solely for the Advantage of having free Liberty of Trade they were graciously receiv'd, and treated as Envoys of an Ally.

Swen-ti, who ascended the Throne at the Age of eighteen, was but forty three Years old, in the ninth Year of the Cycle, when he dy'd, leaving his Crown to his Son Ywen-ti.

THE singular Taste this Prince had for Learning, and his Respect for learned Men, whom he invited to his Court, and often convers'd with, made him indeed a great Scholar, but not a Great Prince, tho' he did not want several good Qualities. He is prais'd particularly for his Moderation, his Love to his People, and the Frugality he discover'd after he was Emperor, being us'd to say, That He who could be contented with little, would want nothing. He regulated his House by this Maxim; he lessen'd the Number of his Domestics, and retrench'd all Superfluities in his Diet, Furniture, Stables, and Equipage; retaining only just as much of every thing as was purely necessary.

But these good Qualities, and many more, were quite obscur'd by the bad Choice of his Servants having regard neither to their Capacities nor Experience; to express themselves politely and eloquently, was with him the highest Merit, and all that he required in his greatest Ministers. Hence having no other Views than their own Promotion, they fill'd the Court with Factions and Cabals, endeavouring to destroy one another, and get the Ascendant over the Prince; who by his Credulity and Weakness suffer'd himself to be led into all their Measures. So that by Degrees they turn'd all Persons of Merit and Experience out of the Management of Affairs, and put their own Friends and Relations into their Places.

Notwithstanding the Peace which had been concluded with the Tartars, the Troops that were posted along the Walls took two of their Princes Prisoners; who trusting to the former Treaty, were hunting in the Mountains, and beheaded them both.

The Emperor, instead of punishing the Commander of those Troops for this piece of Treachery, rewarded him for it; but hearing that the Successor of one of those Princes, was levying numerous Forces, to revenge that infamous Breach of Peace; in order to appease him, and prevent the War, he was oblig'd to give him a Princess of the Imperial Family in Marriage, with a considerable Dowry. A Civil War was ready to break out in the Empire, among the numerous Parties form'd by the Ministers; when the Emperor dy'd in the twenty sixth Year of the Cycle, and the forty third Year of his Age. CHING-TI, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty six Years.

THIS Prince's Fondness for Women and Wine, plung'd him into all manner of Vice, and infamous Pleasures. Out of that blind Respect which he had for the Empress his Mother, who was of the Family of Lyang, he conferr'd the most important Places of the Empire on her Relations, without considering the Prejudice he was doing to himself and his own Family. A Nobleman, who had the greatest Share of the Government in the former Reign, not thinking it for his Honour to remain at Court, ask'd Leave to retire, which was granted; but he was murder'd on the Way to one of his Country Seats, by order, as was believed, of the Emperor.

He fell so violently in Love with an Actress, as she sang in his Presence, that he drove his lawful Wife out of the Palace, to make Room for her, whom he declar'd Empress; and that the Meanness of her Father's Extraction might be overlook'd, he gave him a Principality. But his Ministers having in several Petitions reproach'd him with so shameful an Alliance, he order'd them all to be put to Death; and yet these are but a small part of his brutal Crimes.

A sudden Death deliver'd the Empire from this Monster, in the fifty first Year of the Cycle. He left no Issue, but was succeeded by his Nephew Hyau-ngay-ti.

THO' this Prince was but eighteen Years old when he came to the Crown, yet they conceiv'd great Hopes from his Mildness and Moderation; as well as the Resolution he took immediately to restore Order in the Empire, and comfort the People.

He began by displacing several Governors, whom he thought unworthy of their Employments; and deposed the Prime Minister, whose Family was grown so exceedingly in Power and Credit, that it even seem'd to counter-balance the Sovereign Authority. He made several other Regulations, which were very necessary, and gave great Expectations of a most happy Reign, had his Life been prolong'd.

In the fifth Year of his Reign, Tan-yu, King of the Tartars, having obtain'd Leave to come in Person to pay Homage to him, was receiv'd in a very magnificent Manner, and a firm Peace was establish'd between the two Nations.

THE Empress, Grandmother to the young Emperor, very imprudently trusted the Government, during his Minority, in the Hands of one Vang-mang, whom she made Kaulau, or Prime Minister. This Man join'd an unbounded Ambition to Deceit and Art; and made no Scruple to commit the most cruel Actions, to gratify the secret Desire he had of usurping the Sovereign Authority.

His first Step towards it, was to get rid of his Associate in the Ministry, who was a Man of Merit; and having thus made himself absolute, his whole Care was to strengthen his Party. He erected several new Principalities, and bestow'd them on those who were most devoted to his Interest. He even dared to offer Sacrifice to the Lord of Heaven; and tho' he did it in the Emperor's Name, his Design was to accustom the People to see him perform those Functions, which belong'd solely to the Imperial Dignity. In short he spread sham Reports of Prodigies, by means of his Creatures; who took much Pains to persuade the People that by those Signs Heaven declared that Vang-mang was sent for the Relief of the Empire.

The Traitor, who pretended to be pierced with Grief at the Danger the young Prince was in, made the Palace resound with his Cries, offering Vows continually to Heaven, for his Recovery, and even devoting his own Life as a Sacrifice for the Emperor's; by which means he avoided the Suspicion of his Crime.

However, he did not think it proper, at this Juncture, to usurp the Crown, but placed it for the present on the Head of a young Infant of two Years old, call'd Zbu-tse-ing, who descended from Swen-ti, the seventh Emperor of this Dynasty.

He divided the Empire into nine Provinces, and each Province into several Districts, over which he set Governors in whom he could confide; he also created several new Principalities, to increase the Number of his Dependants. After taking these and some other Precautions, the Tyrant began to think his Authority so well fix'd, that it was not in the Power of any thing to shake it; but he soon found himself mistaken. The Empire was presently in a Flame, several numerous Armies appearing, some of which were commanded by the confederate Lords; who were call'd Che-mu-i, because the Soldiers had painted their Eyebrows, red, to distinguish themselves from their Enemies. The other Armies were commanded by two Brothers, of the Family of Han, whose Names were Lyew-syew and Lyew-ing. These Wars lasted a long time, and were very bloody. The nineteenth Year of the Cycle, the Country was pester'd with such multitudes of Grasshoppers, that they devour'd the Harvest, and caus'd almost a general Famine, which occasion'd abundance of Insurrections and Robberies.

In the twentieth Year, the Usurper's Army was entirely defeated, his Palace plunder'd and burnt to the Ground, his own Throat cut, his Body cut in pieces, and his Head put on a Pitchfork and publicly expos'd, for the Mob, to make Sport with. THE loose and effeminate Life, which this new Emperor led, induced the Army who had set the Crown on his Head to take it from him again, as being unworthy to wear it. They gave it first to Vang-lang, who was an Impostor, pretending himself to be the Son of Ching-ti, the ninth Emperor. But the Cheat being soon discover'd, they cut off his Head, and elected in his Place Lyew-syew; who assum'd the Name of Quang-vu-ti, and was descended from the tenth Son of King-ti, the fourth Emperor of this Dynasty.

Whay-yang-vang, 13th Emperor.

QUANG-VU-TI, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty three Years.

THIS Prince removed his Court from the Province of Sben-fi to that of Ho-nan, and made himself famous by his Politics, and warlike Achievements. The homely Education which he had at first in the Country, where he shar'd the Labour and Wants with the meanest Peasants, made him sensible of the Miseries of the People. Besides he was mild, affable, liberal, and very fond of learned Men; whom he sent for to Court from all Parts, and gave them honourable Employments.

Quang-vu-ti, 14th Emp.

At a time when he pass'd thro' the Country, where he was born, in visiting the Provinces, he sent for several Husbandmen, who were his Countrymen, and admitted them to his Table. Being inform'd, that one of his old Friends, call'd Nyen-quang, a Fisherman, was living, he sent for him, received him honourably, and pass'd the whole Night in Discourse with him, about their past Adventures.

Instances of his Affability

He was twelve Years employ'd in subduing the Rebels, and settling the Peace of the Empire. Mean time the Army, the Soldiers of which had painted their Eyebrows red, chose an Emperor of the Family of Han, call'd Pwan-tse, who being defeated, went to the Emperor, threw himself at his Feet, and intreated his Clemency. The Emperor using his Victory with Moderation, granted him not only his Life, but gave him a Principality. The Chinese Annals say, that in the twenty eighth Year of the Cycle, the last Day of the seventh Moon, there was a total Eclipse of the Sun, which happen'd sooner than it ought to have done by the Calculation. I leave it to Astronomers to examine, if this Eclipse is the same which happen'd at the Death of Christ.

MING-TI, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Eighteen Years.

THIS Prince is extoll'd by the Historians for his Prudence, Clemency, and Judgment. He establish'd an Academy of Sciences in his Palace, for the Education of young Noblemen of the Empire; Strangers were also admitted into it, and he was often present himself at their Exercises.

Ming-ti, 15th Emperor, Establishes an Academy in his Palace.

He caus'd the Pictures of the most eminent Men, both in time of Peace and War, to be painted, with which he adorn'd one of his Halls. He was mightily applauded for his choice of the Daughter of one of his best Generals for Empress; this Lady, who was a Pattern of Discretion and Modesty, never wearing any Cloaths that were embroider'd.

The Whang-bo, or Yellow River, having often overflow'd the neighbouring Country, whereby Cities and Fields receiv'd considerable Damage; the Emperor, to prevent these Inundations, caus'd a Bank to be rais'd, which was ten Leagues long, and employ'd one hundred thousand Men at Work.

Having dreamt in the second Year of the Cycle, that a Man of Gigantick Size appear'd to him, it brought to his Mind an Expression often in the Mouth of Confucius, viz. that the Holy one was in the West, with which he was so deeply affected, that he sent immediately Embassadors to India, in Quest of the true Religion.

CHANG-TI, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

Chang-ti,
16th Emp.

THE Reign of this Prince was very pacifick, being neither disturb'd by Wars, or any Commotions: which is attributed to the Fame of his Wisdom and Prudence; to his Affection for his People, whose Taxes he lessen'd; to the Protection he granted to Men of Learning; and to his Aversion to Luxury and superfluous Expence. He often reminded his Subjects of the wise Oeconomy of the Ancients; and setting it as an Example to the Nobility and Magistrates, forbid all Magnificence in their Tables, Habit and Furniture of their Houses. He dy'd the twenty fifth Year of the Cycle, in the thirty first Year of his Age; and his Son Ho-ti, who was but ten Years old, succeeded him.

AS this Prince was very young, the Empress, his Mother, became his Guardian. His Power was extended to very remote Countries, by the Valour and Conduct of one of his Generals, call'd Pan-chau; who oblig'd a great number of Sovereigns to pay Homage to the Emperor, and to crave his Protection. It is said that he advanced as far as Judea, which the Chinese call Ta-tsin, spending several Years in these Expeditions.

The Emperor having thro' Jealousy divorced his Wife, who soon after dy'd with Grief, he made Empress in her stead, the Grand-Daughter of one of his Generals. She was a Princess of extraordinary Merit, and what is rare in Persons of her Sex, well skill'd in all the Chinese Learning; which Accomplishments still receiv'd greater Lustre from her Modesty. When those who came according to Custom to felicitate her Advancement, offer'd her Presents; she would accept of nothing but a few Pencils, and a sort of Paper, which had been newly invented.

AS this Prince was but thirteen Years of Age, the Empress, his Mother, was vested with the Sovereign Authority; which she was so well pleas'd with, that she prolong'd her Regency much beyond the Term prescrib'd by the Laws.

In a time of great Scarcety, she visited the Prisons herself, and gave the People all the Relief she was able. Apprehending, that a Dominion of such vast Extent as the Empire, could not be durable; she releas'd great Numbers of foreign Nations, and sovereign Princes, who had submitted to the Emperor, from the Obligation of Homage, and reduced the Empire within narrower Bounds.

About this time there was a famous Pyrate, call'd Chang-pe-lu, who after infesting the Seas of China for five Years, was taken and beheaded.

THE Beginning of the Reign of this Prince was signalized by several Victories, which he obtain'd over the Barbarians.

The Empress, who had poison'd the Concubine, Mother of Shun-ti, did not long outlive her Crime; and the Emperor being inform'd of it, in Revenge forbid she should have the funeral Honours, which were due to her Dignity.

In the fourth Year of his Reign he made a Law, whereby no one could be admitted into the Magistracy, before he was forty Years old, unless he had some extraordinary Merit to supply the Want of Age.

In the ninth Year of the Cycle a great Number of Vagabonds uniting, form'd a considerable Army under the Command of one Ma-myen; who, being flush'd with Success in plundering several Cities of the Southern Provinces, began to aspire even to the Empire; but he was slain before he could accomplish his bold Design.

CHE-TI, Twenty second Emperor, reign'd One Year.

ALTHO' he was but eight Years old, when he succeeded to the Crown, yet he discover'd a Genius far above his Years, which gave the Nation mighty Hopes of him. However, he being so young, Lyang-ki, the Brother of the Empress, did not pay him the Respects due to him, but abusing his Sister's Authority, spoke and acted as if he had been Sovereign. Nor could he forbear shewing his Pride and Insolence at a public Assembly, where the Emperor himself was present; who offended at his Behavior, and looking at him with a threatening Countenance, said in a low Voice, yet loud enough to be heard, That is an arrogant Person.

These Words cost the Prince dear; for Lyang-ki finding that he had Reason one Day to fear this Emperor's Resentment for his ill Conduct, took care to get him poison'd; so that this young Prince reign'd but one Year, and his eldest Brother Whan-ti succeeded him.

WHAN-TI, Twenty third Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

UNDER the Reign of this Emperor the Magistracy became Venal. He was a great Patron of the Sect of Liau-kyun, and Eunuchs were his Chief Favorites, which made all the learned Men retire from his Palace; nor could the Emperor either by Invitation or rich Presents bring them back again: they preferring the Tranquillity of their Solitude to the Folly of a Court, where the whole Authority was in the Hands of Eunuchs.

Whan-ti,
23d Emp.

However Lyang-ki, the Murderer of the late Emperor, was raised to the highest Employments of the Empire; and his Wife was honour'd with the Title of Heroine, besides a Yearly Revenue of five hundred thousand Taels. These Smiles of Fortune made him excessive haughty, so that he thought he might do whatever he pleas'd. At the beginning of the Chinese Year, when all the Grandees pay their Duty to the Emperor, he had the Confidence to enter the Palace with his Sword by his Side, contrary to the Laws. Upon this, he was immediately disarm'd, and acknowledging his Crime, ask'd the Emperor's Pardon, which was granted him; but having made himself odious to every body, by his Insolence and Pride, he was shortly after, as it were, besieged by a Troop of Eunuchs, and finding he could not escape their Vengeance, he slew both his Wife and himself. His Relations and Friends were stript of all the important Places to which he had prefer'd them, and his Riches, which were immense, confiscated.

LING-TI, Twenty fourth Emperor, reign'd Twenty two Years.

THIS Prince, among other bad Qualities, is chiefly blam'd for his exceeding Fondness for Eunuchs, to whom he gave more Power than his Predecessors had done; his Aversion to those who were able to give him good Counsel; his insatiable Avarice, and sharp Satirical Humour. He took a Fancy to establish a Fair in his Palace, for selling all sorts of Curiosities, where his Pleasure was to see his Concubines outbid, wrangle, and abuse one another.

One of his ordinary Diversions, which was no less fantastical, was to take the Air in his Gardens in a Chariot drawn by Asses; whence, in imitation of the Court, Asses came to be prefer'd every where to Horses.

The only good Action for which this Emperor is extoll'd, was the Care that he took to have the wise Instructions of the ancient Emperors, contained in the five Classical Books, engraven on Marble Tables, and publicly expos'd at the Entrance of the Academy.

Gives exorbitant Power to Eunuchs.

The Power of the Eunuchs became so very great, that they caus'd a great Number of the Nobility, who had conspired their Ruin, to be put to Death. This Neglect or Abasement of the Imperial Authority naturally produced Revolts. In a little time several great Armies appear'd in the Field, who stil'd themselves Yellow Caps, under the Command of three Brothers call'd Chang, of the Sect of Lyau-kyun, who plunder'd divers Provinces; but at last they were defeated one after another, and slain.

Rebellion of the Yellow Caps.

The Barbarians, (for so the Chinese call all Strangers) endeavour'd several times to make Conquests in the Empire, but were always defeated by an able Chinese General, named Twan-kyong; who, as the Report goes, for ten Years that the War lasted, never went to Bed.

Murder'd by his General.

China was divided first into three, and afterwards into four Parts, and had as many Sovereigns. The Eastern Part first conspir'd against Tong-cho, General of the Imperial Army, who murder'd the Emperor and his eldest Brother; and having burnt the Palace, and open'd the Sepulchres of the Emperors, where he found immense Riches, he removed his Court into the Province of Shen-si. But his Crimes did not long go unpunish'd, for the next Year he was murder'd, and his Body hung on a Fork in the publick Market Place, and his Treasures confiscated. In the mean time the Yellow Caps took Advantage of these Disorders to increase the Number of Rebels; but they were gradually destroy'd by Tsau-sau, who usurp'd the sovereign Authority: of which he was strip'd the thirty seventh Year of the Cycle, by his own Son, Tsau-poy, and banish'd to a Principality, which he gave him, where he dy'd fourteen Years after, generally despis'd.

CHAN-LYE-VANG, First Emperor, reign'd Three Years.

Chan-Lye-vang,
1st Emperor.

CHAU-LYE-VANG was call'd before Lyew-pi, and was descended from King-ti, the fourth Emperor of the preceding Dynasty. This Prince was very tall, and had an Air of Grandeur and Majesty, which commanded Respect. His Courage corresponded to his Aspect; he spoke but little, and in all Events, whether good or bad, was still of an even Temper.

His last sayings.

When he drew near his End, he spoke to those that were about him in the following Manner: When once a Man has attained to the Age of Fifty Years, he has no Reason to complain of the Shortness of his Life; why then should I complain, who am more than sixty Years of Age?

Afterwards

Afterwards he sent for his Son, whom he had appointed his Successor, and his first Minister call'd Ko-lyang; If, said he to the latter, my Son should refuse to pay that Regard to your wife Counsel, which he ought, dethrone him, and reign in his stead. Then turning to his Son, he said, How light soever a Fault may seem to you, beware of committing it; and how small soever a virtuous Action may appear, neglect not to do it. Virtue alone deserves our Attention, and Pursuit; I have had too little to serve you for an Example; but follow the Advice of Ko-lyang, and you will find in him a second Father.

This Prince dy'd in the sixty third Year of his Age, and the fortieth of the Cycle, after he had nam'd his Son Hew-ti for his Successor.

HEW-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Forty one Years.

WHILST the Prime Minister liv'd, Hew-ti trod in the Steps of his Father; he kept his Court at Cbing-ai, the Metropolis of the Province of Se-chuen. There were then in the Northern Provinces three Sovereigns of the Family of Gbey, and in the Southern Provinces the Family of U kept their Court at Nan-king. The Family of Gbey, which was the most powerful of the three, lasted but forty six Years; it was destroy'd by one of its Generals, whose Son became the Founder of the following Dynasty. The Family of U had four Kings in the Space of fifty nine Years.

These different Principalities necessarily occasion'd Wars; in one of which the Emperor lost two famous Generals, call'd Cbang-fi and Quang-yu. This latter is number'd among their Idols, and honour'd as the Mars of China.

The famous Ko-lyang, who still remain'd, had divers Encounters with the King of Gbey, but was often overcome. He was admired for his extraordinary Skill in making a Retreat in presence of the Enemy; which always prov'd no less to his Glory and Honour than if he had gain'd the Victory.

The King of Gbey, being now grown so powerful, that he thought himself able to conquer the Kings both of Han and U, who were leagu'd together. In order to put his Design in Execution, march'd with a formidable Army to the side of the great River Yang-tse-kyang, which he intended to have cross'd; but seeing the Waves very rough and boisterous, Doubtless, say'd he, these are the Bounds which Heaven hath put to the Ambition of Mortals, and immediately turn'd back.

Song-chau, who was General to the King of Gbey, being puffed up with his Victories, and observing the Credit he had obtained in the Army, rebell'd against his Master, whom he overcame, and thereupon resolv'd to make his Way to the Throne. The Son of Hew-ti seeing things in a desperate State, went to his Father; There is no Room to deliberate, says he, this Moment must decide your Fate, either to vanquish or die, with this Sword in your Hand, and Crown on your Head. But the Emperor wanting Courage refus'd to give his Enemy Battle; at which the young Prince was so griev'd, that retiring into the Hall of his deceased Ancestors, he desperately slew his Wife, and then himself.

In the fortieth Year of the Cycle, the Imperial Army was cut in pieces, and the Palace plunder'd. The cowardly Emperor went and deliver'd himself into the Hands of the Conqueror, who gave him a small Principality; where he lived seven Years an obscure and contemptible Life, and dy'd in the sixty fifth Year of his Age.

The Seventh DYNASTY, call'd TSIN, which had Fifteen Emperors in the Space of One hundred and Fifty five Years.

SHI-TSU-VU-TI, First Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

THIS Name was assum'd by the Son of the General Song-chau, Founder of this Dynasty of the Tsin; which Denomination seems to be the same with that of the fourth, yet it is quite different, both as to the Character wherein it is written, and the Pronunciation. This new Emperor, who kept his Court in the Province of Ho-nan, was a magnanimous Prince, and of a quick Apprehension, and penetrating Judgment; his Integrity was so great, that he could not endure the least Dissimulation.

His Reign was very much disturb'd by the warlike Preparations of many petty Sovereigns, who aspir'd to the Crown. But those of the South were often overcome by those of the North who, besides being more inured to the Fatigues of the Camp, were assisted by the Tartars, with whom they were in League.

This Woman, who had the Title of Second Queen, got the Empress remov'd from Court, poison'd her only Son, and procur'd all the Nobles who were of her Party to be put to Death.

These barbarous Actions occasion'd several Battles, and a great deal of Blood-shed; the Second Queen was slain in her turn, with all that were of her Party, and the Emperor himself oblig'd to fly in order to save his Life.

Another Prince of the Family of Han, who reign'd in the Northern Provinces, and had taken Arms, met with the same Fate. At that time there sprang up a new Sect, (which was only a Branch of that of Lau-kyun) call'd Vu-gbey-kyau, that is to say, The Doctrine of the Void, and of Nothing. These Sectaries taught the way how to attain to a certain Degree of Tranquillity, which bound up all the Faculties of the Soul, and suspended the Functions of Sense, in which they made Perfection to consist.

However, his Son Lyew-tsong, following the same Design with Success, got Possession of the Palace; which he plunder'd, slew the Emperor's Son, and after forcing the Emperor himself to wait on him at Table, in the Habit of a Slave, put him to Death, in the tenth Year of the Cycle, and the thirtieth Year of his Age. VU-TI, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Twenty four Years.

VU-TI ascended the Throne the tenth Year of the Cycle. Fú-kyen, who was Emperor in the North, resolving to attack the Emperor, and conquer his Provinces, his Ministers endeavour'd to dissuade him from such a dangerous Enterprize; by observing to him that the Family of the Tsin had been placed on the Throne by the Direction of Heaven, and that as yet they had neither incurred its Wrath, nor done any thing to render them unworthy of its Protection.

the North.

These Remonstrances proving ineffectual, Fú-kyen, who rely'd on the Number and Bravery of his Soldiers, march'd Southward with a formidable Army; which Vú-ti being inform'd of, hasten'd with a small but select Body of his Troops, and without giving his Enemy time to bring all his Forces together, attack'd him in his Camp, with such Courage and Resolution, that he intirely defeated him. The Generals of Fó-kyen's Army being driven to Despair, seiz'd him in the Rout, and conducting him to a Temple, there strangled him.

Regulo's to revolt.

Notwithstanding this great Success of Vú-ti, so fatal to the Empire of the North, several of the smaller Sovereigns revolted; whom he might have easily subdued, had he made good Use of his Victory, and march'd with his Forces into the Northern Provinces; but he return'd to his Court, and gave himself up to all manner of Voluptuousness and Sensualities. This Hero at last dy'd by the Hands of a Woman; for having by way of Raillery call'd the Second Queen an old Woman, who was but thirty Years of Age; this Princess being highly exasperated with such an ill-grounded Reproach, immediately revenged herself upon him, for the Emperor was found stifled in his Bed. Ngan-ti his Son succeeded him.

Revolts and Wars among the Regulo's.

THE little Merit found in this Prince, his Indolence, and Want of Application, gave but small Hopes of his restoring the Tranquillity of the Empire; and indeed we meet with nothing but Revolts and Wars among the Regulo's, during his Reign. A Grandson of the King of Tay, the only remaining Branch of that Family, intirely defeated the King of Ten, with whom he was at War, and took his Principality from him; whereby he founded a Dominion, which was govern'd by thirteen Monarchs of his Family, in the Space of one hundred forty nine Years.

About this time there was a Man of mean Birth, call'd Lyew-hú, who got his Living at first by selling Shoes about the Country; but afterwards turning Soldier, he came to be General of a great Army, signaliz'd himself by several Exploits, and was so powerful as to usurp the Imperial Throne, being the Founder of the following Dynasty. He murder'd the Emperor at the Age of thirty seven, and Kong-ti, his Brother by the same Mother, succeeded him.

THIS Prince ascended the Throne in the fifty sixth Year of the Cycle, and in the second Year of his Reign was stifled or choak'd by Lyew-yú, who ascended the Throne, and took the Name of Kau-tsú-vú-ti. Thus was the Dynasty of Tsin extinguish'd, to make room for that of Song.

His Air, his Gate, his Size, in short his whole outward Deportment had something in them inexpressibly Noble and Majestick; to a great natural Courage he join'd equal Moderation, which appear'd principally in his Cloaths, Train, and Drefs, being in all of them remarkably frugal.

Bloody War with the Emperor of the North.

THIS Prince was esteem'd on Account of his good Nature, Moderation, Justice, and great Integrity; he was blam'd only for having too great an Affection for the Bonzas, whose Protector he openly declar'd himself. He ordain'd that no Magistrates should continue in the same Post above six Years: and after some other Regulations of this sort, for the good of his People, he declar'd War against the Emperor of the North, whose Power daily increased, having already sixteen Regulo's in intire Subjection to him. Ven-ti lost the first Battle, but afterwards obtain'd many Victories, by the Conduct and Bravery of Tan-tau-tsi, his Prime Minister, who by this extraordinary Success gain'd no little Credit and Authority; but that Credit render'd his Fidelity suspected to the Emperor, who fearing too powerful a Subject, procur'd him to be put to Death, which was the Reward of his Services.

The News of this great General's Death being spread abroad, the Northern Men took Courage, and boldly entred the Southern Provinces, renewing the War with more Fury than ever. Ven-ti's Troops, no longer commanded by that able General, were defeated in several Battles; but in the twenty sixth Year of his Reign there was such a horrible Slaughter on both sides, that the Fields were overflow'd with Chinese Blood.

Tay-vu-ti, the Emperor of the North caused a General Massacre of the Bonzas, throughout his Dominions, and burnt all their Temples and Idols. Ven-ti was murder'd at the Age of thirty five, by his eldest Son, and the Parricide was kill'd in his turn, by his second Brother, who immediately revenged his Father's Death.

VOU-TI, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Eleven Years.

THIS Prince was much addicted to the Chinese Sciences, and had the Reputation of being learn'd: he was likewise exceeding skilful in managing a Horse, and drawing the Bow, which gave him a more than ordinary Inclination to Hunting. He is censur'd for Prodigality, and bestowing Favours without Reason or Distinction. He treated those about his Person with a Roughness little suitable to their Rank, for having no Command over his Tongue he often us'd sharp and reviling Language.

He dy'd in the thirty fifth Year of his Age, and forty first of the Cycle, Fi-ti his eldest Son succeeding him.

FI-TI, Fifth Emperor, reign'd One Year.

HE was no sooner on the Throne but he discover'd a cruel and bloody Disposition; many innocent Persons were put to Death by his Orders, and he was slain himself in the first Year of his Reign.

Fi-ti,
5th Emperor.

His Successor was Ming-ti, the eleventh Son of Ven-ti, the third Emperor of this Dynasty.

MING-TI, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Eight Years.

THIS Prince was as barbarous and cruel as his Predecessor. He put to Death thirteen young Princes of the Imperial Blood, who were his Nephews; and as he had no Children of his own, he introduc'd Men among his Wives, with a Design to have a Male Child, then to kill the Mother, and give it to the Empress, who was barren. He prefer'd Syau-tau-ching to the highest Dignity of the Empire, a Man exceeding ambitious, and who afterwards murder'd two Emperors to make way to the Throne. Ming-ti dy'd the forty ninth Year of the Cycle, being only thirty four Years old, and was succeeded by Tsang-ngu-wang his eldest Son.

HE began his Reign with publishing a Law, that the Mandarins should not hold their Employments longer than three Years; and revived an ancient Statute, which prohibited the Intermariages of Families of the same Name.

At this time there appear'd a pretended Philosopher, whose Name was Fan-chin, who taught most pernicious Tenets, hitherto unheard of, viz. "That all Events in this World are the Effects of pure Chance; that after this Life the State of Mankind is the same with that of Beasts; and that the Soul dies with the Body," which impious Doctrines were quickly oppos'd by several able Men, and learnedly refuted by them in their Writings.

Syau-ywen, famous for his Skill in Politicks and Military Affairs, was rais'd to the Dignity of Ko-lau; we shall see him presently tread in the Steps of his Predecessor, and shedding the Blood of his Masters to usurp their Crown.

THE Debaucheries and Cruelty of this Prince, his Aversion to those who were capable of giving him wise Counsels, and the Credit into which he brought the Eunuchs, were so many Pretences for Syau-ywen under which to cloak his Passion for Reigning. He join'd the King of the Principality of Lyang, and having made himself Master of the Palace, set it on Fire, and after built another more magnificent. The Emperor was dethroned, and at nineteen Years old kill'd by the Hands of this traitorous Prime Minister, who plac'd Ho-ti the Brother of that unfortunate Prince on the Throne.

He dispatch'd all his Affairs, which always pass thro' his own Hands, with surprising Readiness; was skilful in almost all the Sciences, particularly the Military Art; was austere in whatever concern'd his own Person, and so saving, that the same Cap served him three Years; but at last his Fondness for the Bonzas carry'd him so far, that he neglected intirely the Business of the State, and in effect became a Bonza himself. He put out an Edict forbidding to kill Oxen or Sheep, even for Sacrifices, appointing ground Corn to be offer'd instead of those Animals.

In the fifteenth Year of his Reign he laid Siege to the City of Shew-yang in the Province of Shen-si, which lasted ten Years; losing before it an incredible Numer of Men either by Water, Sword or Famine.

At this time happen'd the entire Ruin of the Empire of the North, call'd Ghey. This vast Dominion was divided between two Sovereigns, one of the Eastern, the other of the Western Part, but at length was united under the King of Tsi and Cheu. The Empress of the North, nam'd Hu, built a Monastery large enough to lodge a thousand Bonzas, and gave it the Name of Fong-ching, that is, Perpetual Peace.

For twenty six Years the Emperor govern'd with Success, till the Fancy took him to leave the Court, and dwell in a Temple of the Bonzas, where he had his Head shaved, wore a coarse Garment, and liv'd upon Herbs and Rice; and tho' the Grandees of the Empire brought him back against his Will, from the Place of his Retirement to his Palace, yet he obstinately continued to live after the Manner of the Bonzas. According to their Doctrine of the Transmigration of Souls, he durst not condemn any, even the greatest Criminal, to Death; which open'd the Door to Licentiousness, and occasion'd infinite Murders and Robberies.

There were great Encomiums made at this time on the filial Piety of a young Man fifteen Years of Age, call'd Kye-fwen; whose Father being condemn'd to lose his Head for several Offences committed by him, during his Magistracy, Kye-fwen, as soon as he was inform'd thereof, went and threw himself at the Feet of the Prince, intreating him, with Tears, that he might be allow'd to suffer in his Father's Stead. for his want of Learning, while his admirable Temperance and Love of his Subjects gain'd him their Esteem and Confidence. He reform'd the ancient Music, and commanded the Learned to make use of nothing but sound Reasoning in their Compositions, avoiding all Rhetorical Flourishes and vain Ornaments, as fit only to please the Ear, and enervate Eloquence; he caused also publick Granaries to be built in all Cities; and ordained that each Family, in proportion to its Substance, should furnish every Year a certain Quantity of Rice and Corn, for the Support of the Poor in time of Famine. Yang-ti, THO' this Prince had valuable Qualities, yet he is generally blamed for his Luxury and Prodigality. Having removed his Court from the Province of Sben-fi to that of Ho-nan, he caused two vastly large public Granaries to be built, and a Park to be made, fifteen Leagues in Compass, with stately Palaces and magnificent Gardens; where he took the Air on Horseback, accompany'd by a Great number of his Wives, who perform'd Concerts of Vocal and Instrumental Music. His Fame drew several foreign Princes to his Court, in order to put themselves under his Protection. He forbid his Subjects to carry Arms, a piece of Policy still in Force. He also repaired the great Wall dividing China from Tartary, in which Work it is said a Million of Men were employ'd. He was so intent upon the Advancement and Progress of the Sciences, that he commission'd a hundred of the most learned Men to revise and re-print, after the Manner of those Days, all Books treating of War, Politics, Physic, and Agriculture. He establish'd the Degrees of Doctor, to qualify both Literary and Military Men for their respective Employments. He attack'd the Koreans both by Sea and Land; and tho' his first Attempt was without Success, yet in a second Expedition he forced them, in Quality of Vassals, to send Ambassadors to implore his Clemency.

THIS Prince was enthron'd and deposed the same Year, by Li-ywen, whose second Son, at the Head of an Army rais'd by his Father, made himself Master of the Palace. It is reported, that while he was viewing its Magnificence and Riches, he fetch'd a deep Sigh, and said, "No, such a stately Edifice must not be suffer'd to stand any longer, being good for nothing but to soften the Spirit of a Prince, and cherish his vicious Inclinations," and so order'd it immediately to be burnt down. Thus ended the Dynasty nam'd Sui, the last of five petty ones. Li-ywen was the Founder of the following Race, and reign'd by the Name of Shin-yau-ti.

In the sixteenth Year of the Cycle, he reduc'd all the Rebels, and thereby became the peaceable Possessor of this vast Monarchy. It was he who ordain'd that one Ounce of Copper should be coined into ten Pieces of Money, with these Words, TONG PAU, impress'd on them. This was the only Money current in China, and is in use at this time. By the Advice of his Ko-lau, call'd Fu-yue, he enjoin'd one hundred thousand Bonzas to marry, in order to propagate Soldiers for his Army. In the twenty third Year of the Cycle he abdicated the Crown in favour of his second Son call'd Tay-tsong, and dy'd nine Years after in the seventieth Year of his Age.

TAY-TSONG, Second Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years:

THIS Prince, who began his Reign in the twenty fourth Year of the Cycle, is accounted by the Chinese one of their greatest Emperors; whom they praise especially for his Wisdom, and the favorable Reception all those met with, who were capable of giving him prudent Counsels, or had Courage enough to tell him of his Faults. So great was his Temperance and Frugality, that he never suffer'd more than eight Dishes of Meat to be served up to his Table; and drove almost all the Concubines out of his Palace. In his Reign the Christian Religion gained Footing in his Empire, as will be observ'd hereafter. He caused the best Books to be brought from all Parts; and became in some respect the Restorer of the Sciences, by the Care he took to re-establish in his Palace an Academy for Literature, wherein were reckon'd eight thousand Scholars, many of them Sons of foreign Princes; whom he provided with able Masters, appointing eighteen of the most eminent, call'd She-pa-byo-tse, to superintend their Studies. He founded likewise a Military Academy for Archery, where he often assisted himself. This was not at all agreeable to the Ministers, who represented to him the Indecency, as well as the Danger that might accrue to his Person, by frequenting this Academy; to which Tay-tsong answer'd, "I look upon myself in my Empire as a Father in his Family, and I carry my Subjects in my Bosom, as if they were my Children; What have I then to fear?"

This Affection for his Subjects made him say, "That he wish'd his People to have Plenty of the common Necessaries of Life;" adding, "That the Welfare of the Empire depends on the People; an Emperor who fleeces his People to enrich himself, is like a Man who cuts his own Flesh in pieces, to supply his Stomach, which is fill'd, it is true, but in a short time his Body must perish. How many Emperors have ow'd their Ruin to their Luxury! What Expences were they at to support it? and what heavy Taxes did the poor People groan under to supply those Expences? When the People are rack'd and oppress'd, what becomes of the Empire? Is it not then on the Brink of Destruction? And if the Empire perish, what Condition must the Emperor be in? These are the Reflections, continued he, that serve as a Curb to my Desires."

His strong Reasons against Luxury and oppres-sing the Subject.

He forbid the Magistrates, under pain of Death, to receive Presents; and that he might be satisfy'd whether his Orders were obey'd, he made a Trial upon a Mandarin, by suborning a Man to make him a Present, which the Mandarin receiving, the Emperor condemn'd him to Death. Upon this the Prime Minister addressing him, "Great Prince, said he, your Sentence is just, and the Mandarin deserves to die; but are you who laid the Snare for him, to fall into the Crime which he has committed, altogether innocent? and do you not partake of his Fault?" This Remonstrance had its Effect, and the Emperor pardon'd the Offender.

In the Year following one of the great Mandarins of War, having in like manner received a silk Suit as a Present, the Emperor, who was inform'd of it, sent him immediately a Quantity of Silks; upon which the Courtiers could not suppress their Repentment, but cry'd out, "This Mandarin deserves the Punishment inflicted by the Law, and not a Reward." To which the Emperor answer'd, "The Confusion wherewith he will be struck, will give him a more sensible Pain than the severest Punishment; for these Silks, which I send him, instead of redounding to his Honour, will continually reproach him with his Fault." Whenever the Country was threaten'd with Scarcity, Drought, or immoderate Rains, after the Examples of the ancient Emperors, he publish'd an Edict, by which he order'd his Failings to be laid before him, that by reforming them he might appease the Wrath of Heaven. He gave no Credit to Soothsayers; for one Day as the Storks were building their Nests in his Presence, they stood and clapped their Wings, whereat his Courtiers testify'd their Joy, as portending him some unexpected good Luck; upon which the Emperor smil'd, and said, "Sbwi tsay te byen," which signifies "A happy Preface for me is to have wise Men about me," and immediately order'd the Nest to be destroy'd.

In the second Year of his Reign the Fields were cover'd with Locusts, which by the Havock they made threatened a terrible Famine. "Mischievous Insects," cry'd the Emperor with a deep Sigh, "in ruining the Harvest, you destroy the Lives of my poor People. Alas! I had much rather you would devour my own Bowels," and at these Words he swallow'd a Locust alive. In reading the Book of Physic, compos'd by the Emperor Whang-ti, he found that the Vital Parts are injur'd by a Blow or Bruise upon the Shoulder: from that time he made a Law, that none should be bastinado'd upon the Back, but upon the Lower Parts, after the Manner that it is now practis'd throughout the Empire. He us'd to say, "That an Emperor is like an Architect. "once it is well establish'd, and govern'd by wise Laws, great Care must be taken not to introduce any Innovation. It is a common Proverb," said he another time, "that an Emperor is fear'd by every body, and has nothing to be afraid of himself. This is not my Sentiment, I perpetually stand in Fear, both of the Providence of Heaven, whom nothing escapes, and of the Eyes of my Subjects, which are continually fix'd upon me. It is for this that I watch every Moment over my own Actions, that I may do nothing but what is agreeable to the Will of God, and to the Desires of my People.

To comfort his Subjects in a time of Drought, he released the Prisoners, and granted a general Pardon; declaring nevertheless, that this was an Indulgence which a Prince ought to use very cautiously, for fear the Impunity of the Wicked might turn to the Prejudice of the Good; and that the Tares ought to be rooted out, lest they should damage the good Corn. In the seventh Year of his Reign, he went in Person to the publick Prison, in which were three hundred and ninety capital Offenders, whom he order'd to be let out, with an Injunction to return thither after Harvest, which they all did to a Man. The Emperor was so delighted as well as surpris'd at their Punctuality in keeping their Word, that he granted them both their Lives and Liberties.

The Chinese Annals report, that in the eighth Year of his Reign there came Ambassadors from foreign Nations, whose Air, Form, and Habit were altogether new to the Chinese; and the Emperor himself rejoiced that in his time Men with fair Hair and blue Eyes arriv'd in the Empire. It is certain that these Strangers were those, whose Names we read upon the Stone Monument, found in 1625, at Si-ngan-fu, in the Province of Sben-si; on which is the Figure of the Cross, and an Abstract of the Christian Law, together with the Names of its Preachers, engraven in Syriac Characters; and a Date, specifying the eighth Year of the Reign of Tay-tsung. In the French King's Library is preserved an old Arabic Manuscript; wherein we read, that at this very time the Catholic Patriarch of the Indies sent Preachers of the Gospel into China, who were honourably received in the Imperial City, where they were introduced by Pan-hien-ling, Ko-lau of the Empire.

About the same time the Emperor chose out thirteen Persons, the most eminent for their Merit and Integrity, to visit all Parts of his Empire; giving them full Power to execute Justice, and to punish severely the Governors of Cities and Vice-Roys of Provinces, whose Conduct was blameable. In the tenth Year of his Reign he was deeply affected for the Loss of the Empress Chang-sun, who was a Princess endow'd with great Prudence, and a Capacity not common among her Sex. It was observed, as a Circumstance scarce to be parallell'd, that while she lived, not one of the great Number of Officers, who serve, in the Palace, suffer'd any severe Punishment. The Emperor, tired with the frequent Admonitions of his Ko-lau, Gbey-ching, having forbid him his Presence, the Empress, who was inform'd of it, immediately dress'd herself in her richest Apparel and went to her Husband, to whom she said, "Prince, I have often heard that when an Emperor is endow'd with Wisdom and Penetration, his Subjects are endow'd with Honesty, and fear not to speak the Truth. You have an honest Ko-lau, who is of an upright Mind and who knows not how to dissemble; this is a Proof to me of your Wisdom, and how much it deserves to be applauded, therefore I am come to wish you Joy, and to express my Satisfaction." This Compliment appeased the Emperor, and restor'd the Minister to favour. The same Princess composed a Book divided into thirty Chapters, concerning the Manner of Behaving in the inner Apartments of the Women. The Emperor holding this Book in his Hand, and melting in Tears, "See, says he, the Rules that ought to be observ'd in all Ages. I know, added he, that my Affliction comes from Heaven, and cannot be remedy'd; but when I reflect upon the Loss of so faithful and accomplish'd a Companion, and that I am for ever deprived of her wise Counsels, how is it possible for me to refrain from Tears?" Intending to leave a lasting Monument of his Grief, he caused a stately Tomb to be rais'd, far more magnificent than that which he had or-der'd for his Father, who dy'd the Year before. One Day being with his Ko-lau, [or Prime Minister] upon an Eminence, in View of this Tomb, which he was desirous to have him take notice of, the Ko-lau pretending not to understand him, said, "Prince, I thought you would shew me the Sepulchre of your Father, as for that of your Spouse, I saw it long ago." At this Discourse the Prince burst into Tears; and stung with the secret Reproach of his Minister, order'd the Mausoleum to be demolish'd.

In the eleventh Year of his Reign he admitted into his Palace a young Girl of fourteen, endow'd with extraordinary Beauty, heighten'd by an agreeable Wit, named Vu-foi; who in the next Reign usurp'd the Sovereign Power, and tyrannised over the Empire. In the twelfth Year the Emperor permitted the Christian Law to be preach'd in his Dominions, and even granted a piece of Ground in the Imperial City for building a Temple to the true God.

Gbey-ching, Ko-lau of the Empire, dy'd in the seventeenth, extremely regretted by the Emperor, who wrote his Encomium, and caused it to be engraven on his Tomb. After which turning to his Courtiers, he said, "We have three sorts of Mirrors: one is of Steel, which serves the Ladies for dressing their Heads, and adjusting their Cloaths; the second is the Ancient Books, treating of the Rise, Progress and Fall of Empires; the third are Men themselves, by a little Observation of whose Actions we see what to shun, and what to practise. I had this last Mirror in the Person of my Ko-lau, whom to my Misfortune I have lost without Hopes of finding such another."

Another Time discoursing with his Courtiers, he spoke thus, "A Prince has but one Heart, and this Heart is continually besieged by those about him; some attack him by the Love of vain Glory, which they endeavour to inspire into him; others by Luxury and Pleasure; some by Careless and Flattery; others have recourse to Artifice and Falshood, in order to impose on him; and all these Engines are set at work, solely with a View to insinuate themselves into the good Graces of the Prince, whereby they may be advanced to the high Offices and Dignities of the Empire; for if a Prince ceases but for a Moment to watch over his Heart, what has he not to fear?" At the Age of twenty one he marry'd the Daughter of his Ko-lau, call'd Sin-whey, and gave her the Title of Wife. This Princess was celebrated for her fine Genius, and Skill in the Chinese Sciences: it is said that when four Months old, she began to speak; that in her fourth Year she had learn'd the Books of Confucius by Heart; and in her eighth she made learned Compositions upon all sorts of Subjects; this at least is certain, that she employ'd almost all her Time in Reading.

Great Character of the Empress Sin W'ey.

The Emperor had Thoughts of sending a formidable Army to reduce the Koreans, who had revolted; but his Death intervening put a stop to that Expedition for the present.

The Koreans revolt.

It is scarcely credible how intent and careful this Prince was in the Education of his Children, every Object furnishing matter for his Instructions; if, for Instance, he was eating Rice, he made them sensible how much Toil and Sweat this Rice had cost the poor Husbandmen. One Day as he was taking the Air with them on the Water, he said, "You see, my Children, that this Bark is supported by the Water, which at the same time can overwhelm it; consider that the People resemble the Water, and the Emperor the Bark."

Emperor's Care in educating his Children.

Influence.

The Year before his Death he gave his Son, whom he had declar'd his Heir, the following Advice, consisting of twelve Maxims, which were express'd in twenty four Characters. "Get the Command over your Heart and all its Inclinations; promote none to Places and Dignities but Persons of Merit; invite wise Men to your Court; watch over the Conduct of Magistrates; drive Slanderers from your Presence; be an Enemy to Pomp; keep good Oeconomy; let your Rewards and Punishments be proportion'd to the Merit and Crimes of Persons; take a particular Care to make Agriculture, the Military Art, Laws and Sciences flourish; search among the ancient Emperors for the Models of your Government, for I do not deserve your Notice, having committed too many Mistakes in my Administration; have an Eye always to that which is most perfect, otherwise you will never attain to that just Medium, wherein Virtue consists; lastly, take Care not to be puffed up with the Splendor of your Rank, nor to enervate yourself by the Pleasures of a voluptuous Life, for if you do not, you will ruin both the Empire and yourself."

Fine Maxims of Government given to his Heir.

Tay-tsung dy'd in the forty sixth Year of the Cycle, and the fifty third of his Age; and the Year following his Son Kau-tsung was acknowledg'd Emperor.

KAU-TSUNG, Third Emperor, reigned thirty-four Years.

WHEN he had reigned five Years he fell passionately in Love with Vu-shi, the young Girl mentioned before, whom Tay-tsung had placed in the Rank of his Wives; and who was now retired to a Monastery of *Bonze*s, whither the Emperor went himself to fetch her out, and conduct her to his Palace. A little after, under Pretence that he had no male Issue, he put away the Empress and one of the Queens, malgre the Remonstrances and the strongest Opposition of his Ministers. Vu-shi was then placed upon the Throne; but perceiving that the Emperor did not forget the divorced Princesses, she in a Rage caused their Hands and Feet to be cut off, and a few Days after their Heads. She had scarce committed these horrid Cruelties, when she fancied herself pursued Day and Night by the Ghosts of these Princesses, who were as so many Furies ready to fall upon her: And the Fright it put her in made her shift her Place continually. Nevertheless the Emperor grew more and more enamoured with this Wretch; and was even infatuated to such a Degree, that he put the Government of the Empire into her Hands, giving her the Name of Tyen-bew, i. e. The Queen of Heaven; a Title of Honour till then unheard of in China.

Her horrid Cruelty.

This Monster was no sooner invested with Sovereign Power, but the first Use she made of it was to poison her eldest Son; that so the Crown falling to her Brother's Children, her paternal Family might be settled on the Throne: However she did not obtain that Satisfaction.

Poisons her eldest Son.

In the sixth Year of the new Cycle, the Koreans returned to their Obedience, and did Homage in the accustomed manner. This Emperor favoured the Christian Religion, as appears by the Stone Monument mention'd before. Churches were built for the Worship of the true God, and the Faith was preached in the Provinces: One of the Missionaries, whose Name was O lo pwen, had a Title of Honour conferred upon him. Kau-tsung died at the Age of Fifty-six, and in the twentieth Year of the Cycle, when the cruel Vu-bew seized on the Throne.

verignty in the Province of Hà-quang; placing in his Room her third Son, who being very young had only the Name of Emperor. The first thing she did was to get rid of all those she suspected not to be in her Interest, and in one Day put to Death a great many Lords of the chief Families of the Empire.

In the fifteenth Year of her Reign, a Persecution was raised against the Christians, which lasted about fifteen Years. In the same Year the Ko-lau, Tye, had the Courage to make vigorous Remonstrances to her in Behalf of her Son, the rightful Heir, now banish'd fourteen Years. He urged as a Reason, that it would be a thing unprecedented to place in the Hall of Ancestors a Name which did not belong to the Family, and which besides Posterity would never acknowledge. Hereupon the Prince was recall'd from Exile, and lived seven Years in the Eastern Palace till the Death of Vù-bew in the eighty first Year of her Age; after which he ascended the Throne, in the forty first Year of the Cycle.

CHUNG-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Five Years.

Chung-tsong,
4th Emperor.

THIS Prince little deserved the Crown, which he ow'd to his Birth, the Tendernefs of his Father Kau-tsong, and the Courage of the Prime Minister. He gave himself up to Indolence and Debauchery; and that he might have nothing to think of but his Pleasures, resign'd his whole Authority into the Hands of the Empress Ghey, who had been the faithful Companion of his Exile. This Princess, by the Advice of San-se, Governor of the Palace, intended to place her Son Sbang upon the Throne; but the Princes and petty Kings on all sides took up Arms to oppose it.

Poisoned.

Chung-tsong however dying of Poison in the fifty fifth Year of his Age, Sbang was immediately proclaim'd Emperor. But his Uncle who possess'd a Principality, at the same time seiz'd the Palace, where the Empress was kill'd together with her Daughter; and young Sbang saved his Life by surrendering himself to the Mercy of his Uncle Zbwi-tsong, the deceased Emperor's Brother, into whose Hands he deliver'd his Crown.

ZHWI-TSONG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

Zbwi-tsong, or Jew-tsong, an Usurper.

THE Shortnefs of this Prince's Reign ranks him amongst those of whom we find nothing farther than that he took Possession of the Empire in the forty seventh Year of the Cycle, and dy'd in the forty eighth, aged fifty five. Hivn-tsong, his third Son, was declar'd his Successor.

HIVN-TSONG, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Forty four Years.

Hivn-tsong, or Hivn-tsong,
6th Emperor.

THE good Nature of this Prince, his Moderation, singular Temperance, and Zeal for the Publick Good, gave presently great Hopes of the Happiness of his Reign. He was the Restorer of his Family, then upon the Brink of Ruin; but he committed one almost irreparable Fault, in promoting an Eunuch, call'd Kau-lye-se, to be Master of the Palace: without doubt because he did not foresee the Misfortunes which the Power of the Eunuchs would one Day bring upon him and his Successors.

The Christian Religion began to recover and flourish under this and the three succeeding Emperors.

Endeavours to suppress Luxury.

Hivn-tsong, looking on Luxury as the Bane of good Morals, declar'd open War against it, and publish'd an Edict forbidding to fish for Pearls. One Day he caused all his Gold and Silver Vessels, and all his Cloaths embroider'd with Gold, to be burnt before the Palace Gate; in order to restrain by his own Example the Extravagance of his People, who ruin'd themselves by such costly Superfluities.

He caused the ancient Books, which treated of the Military Science, to be sought out, and new ones compos'd for the training up Soldiers. He one Day visited the House where Confucius was born, and honour'd that great Man with the Title of the King of Learning. It could have been wish'd, that this Prince had shew'd more regard to the Counsels of Ywen-chau, his Prime Minister; who in a Memorial advis'd him, among other things, to confer no publick Employment upon the Eunuchs, to grant no Power to his Relations, to abolish the Idolatrous Sects of Po and Tan, &c. but he gave no Ear to these wise Admonitions. This Emperor was the first who honour'd with the Title of petty Kings or Sovereigns the Generals of his Armies, who had most distinguish'd themselves by doing the greatest Service to the State, tho' not of Imperial Blood. He caused the Statue of Lau-kyun, Author of one of the Sects which are found in China, to be placed with great Solemnity in his Palace. The Disciples of this Sectary, as well as the Bonzas, used to burn silk Stuffs and Ingots of Silver at Funerals; but this Custom the Emperor alter'd by Advice of his Brother Van-yu, commanding that for the future none but Stuffs or Cloaths made of Paper, should be burnt; which Law is still observed among the Bonzas. The Empire had enjoy'd a profound Peace almost thirty Years, when it was disturb'd by fresh Insurrections, and the Imperial Army entirely defeated, with the Loss of seventy thousand Men; while the Emperor himself knew nothing of the matter, because all the Avenues to his Throne were kept shut by the Eunuchs. The Chief of the Rebels was a foreign Prince, named Ngan-lo-shan, whom the Emperor against the Advice of his Ministers had rais'd to the highest Employments, and even entrusted with the Command of his Army. This Traitor, imbolden'd by Success, and seeing himself Master of a great Part of the North, had the Insolence to assume the Title of Emperor. Mean time the Palace itself was in a Combustion, for the Emperor divorc'd his Wife, put three of his Children to Death without any just Cause, and marry'd his Daughter-in-Law. As one Misfortune often draws on another, these Disasters encouraged a Company of Robbers to attack the Imperial Army, which having routed, with the Slaughter of forty thousand Men, the Emperor was oblig'd to fly into the Province of Se-chwen.

SO-TSONG, Seventh Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

TOWARDS the end of the thirty third Year of the Cycle, Hien-tsong made his shameful Retreat, and So-tsong took Possession of the Government, tho' his Father was still living; being a warlike Prince, he with the help of his Ko-lau, Ko-tsu-i, destroy'd the Army of the Robbers and dispers'd them. The publick Tranquillity was no sooner settled, but he brought back his Father from the Province of Se-chwen, and conducted him into the Palace with all the Honours due to his Rank; but he did not long enjoy the Repose which his Son had procur'd him, for he dy'd the thirty eighth Year of the Cycle, and the seventy eighth of his Age. In the mean time Ngan-lo-shan had plunder'd the Palace of Chang-ngan, and along with the Riches, carry'd into the Province of Ho-nan an hundred Elephants and Horses; which had been taught to dance to the Sound of Instruments, and to present the Emperor a Cup with their Mouths.

Ngan-lo-shan wanted to have the same Diversion, but as if these Beasts had refused to acknowledge him Emperor, they could never be brought to do what he desired, which so enraged him, that he order'd them to be kill'd on the Spot. The Treachery of this Wretch, who made use of his Master's Favours to destroy him, was not long unpunish'd, he being murder'd in Bed by his own Son. The Parricide was assassinated in his turn by Se-mong, General of the Army, who intending to make his youngest Son his Heir was likewise killed by his eldest Son. So-tsong dy'd in the Ninth Year of the Cycle, and left the Crown to his Son Tay-tsong.

TAY-TSONG, Eighth Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

THE beginning of this Reign was tolerably prosperous, thro' the Care of able Ministers, in whom the Emperor confided; the Rebels were forced to return to their Obedience, and Peace was restored in the Empire. But it did not continue long, for five of the most powerful Kings shook off the Yoke; and refusing to acknowledge the Emperor as their Master pretended to reign in an absolute Independency.

A Mandarin, named Fu-bu-tsen, finding himself at the Point of Death, order'd his Head to be shav'd, and his Corpse to be interr'd after the Manner of the Bonzas, whose Protector he was; which Example, we shall see, was afterwards follow'd by many Grandees in the nineteenth Dynasty.

In the eighth Year of this Reign, more than two hundred thousand Tartars made an Irruption into the Empire, and forced the Emperor to fly; they plunder'd his Palace, and loaded with immense Treasures retired into their own Country.

Irruption of the Tartars.

The Emperor return'd to his Palace with the Assistance of the famous General Ko-tsu-i, whose Elogy is to be seen upon the Stone Monument, which I have spoken of more than once. There his Liberality is applauded, and it is not to be doubted but that he employ'd both his Credit and Substance in erecting Temples to the true God; some even conjecture that he imbraced Christianity. The same Monument relates, that on Christmas Day the Emperor sent rich Perfumes to the Church, and Fruits from his own Table to the Ministers of the Gospel.

Tay-tsong dy'd in the fifty third Year of his Age, and fifty first of the Cycle, Te-tsong his eldest Son succeeding him.

TE-TSONG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

THE Empire found no great Support from this Prince, for he minded nothing but Trifles, was of a timorous Nature, extremely mistrustful, and ready to give ear to Flatterers. However he deserves Applause for refusing Presents from Strangers, which was esteem'd a happy Omen; "The best Augury I can have, says he, is to see Wise Men about me." He shew'd one Sign of Disinterestedness, which gain'd him great Encomiums; for a very considerable Sum of Money being presented him, instead of receiving it he order'd it to be distributed among his Soldiers.

In the third Year of his Reign the famous Ko-tsü-i, who had render'd such important Service to the Empire, dy'd in the eighty fifth Year of his Age; he had been Prime Minister under four Emperors, and got such mighty Reputation for his Probity, that it was generally allow'd there had not been his Equal for many Ages. Such Confidence was placed in this Minister, that it may with truth be affirm'd that the Fate of the reigning Family was in his Hands. Tho' he attained to the highest Honours, and had acquired immense Riches, yet he was respected by Envy itself, whose Strokes he never felt; and notwithstanding the Splendor he lived in, yet still his Liberality exceeded his Magnificence. He left eight Children, who all acquired lasting Glory in the different Magistracies to which their Merit raised them. China mourned three Years for this great Man, whom she bewailed as her Father.

The Power of the Eunuchs became so formidable, and their Insolence grew to such a Pitch, that there was nothing to be heard of but Insurrections; this oblig'd the Emperor to augment his Army by a great Number of fresh Troops, to maintain which he was constrained to double the Taxes. There was even a Duty laid on Tea itself, which is the common Drink of the Chinese. These extraordinary Impositions exasperated all Persons, and the extreme Misery of the People occasion'd infinite Thefts and Robberies. By good Fortune the Imperial Arms were victorious every where, and the Rebels being destroy'd, Peace was re-establish'd, and the People relieved. The Emperor on a time attributing the Wars and Calamities to his own Destiny, added, "That this had been in part foretold him by the Astrologers," on which Li-myé his Ko-lau reply'd, "Prince, leave this kind of Talk to the Ignorant, and Vulgar, such Language does not become either you or me. It is ourselves who render our Destiny happy or unhappy, according as we govern the State well or ill." This Prince dy'd at the Age of sixty four, in the twenty first Year of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his Son Shun-tsung.

THIS Prince was endow'd with wonderful Penetration and Dexterity in disentangling as well as dispatching the most intricate Affairs; he had also a Firmness of Mind, in pursuing the thing he had once resolved on, which no Consideration could shake. He gave solid Proofs of his Affection for his People in a time of Famine, by opening his Treasures and the publick Granaries in favour of the afflicted Provinces; at the same time sending the great Lords of his Court to inquire into the Peoples Distress, and to relieve them in proportion to their Indigence.

In the thirty sixth Year of the Cycle, he order'd a Finger-bone of the Idol Fo to be brought with great Solemnity from the Province of Sben-shi. The Chief Tribunal of Rites strongly oppos'd this sottish Resolution of the Emperor, boldly alledging that the execrable Reliques of this Idol [or Impostor] ought to be burnt. As they firmly persisted in their Determination, without regarding the Displeasure of the Emperor, several of them were degraded; which is a Punishment pretty commonly inflict'd on great Mandarins. He fell into another Piece of Folly, which cost him his Life; for having sent every where in Quest of the pretended Liquor of Immortality, promised by the Sect of Tau, to which he was greatly devoted; it was at length brought him by the Eunuchs, who it is not doubted mix'd it with Poison; for this unhappy Prince, after he had taken it, dy'd suddenly, at the Age of forty three, and his Son Mo-tsung succeeded him.

MO-TSUNG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

Mo-tsung,
12th Emp.

THE Choice which the last Emperor made of his Son Mo-tsung, to succeed him, was at first thwarted by certain Lords, who had a Design to place another Prince on the Throne; but their Projects miscarrying they were put to Death. Seeing himself in quiet Possession of the Crown, he granted as usual a General Amnesty, and was so ill advised as to disband Part of his Troops; who being thereby reduced to great Straits went and took Refuge among the Robbers, whose Number they increased.

The Family of the Tang begins to decline.

It was under this Prince that the Imperial Family of the Tang began to decline from that State of Splendor which it had till then maintained, and the following Princes completed its Ruin. He dy'd at the Age of thirty, after he had taken a Medicine that had been prepared for him. His Son King-tsung succeeded him the Year following, which was the forty second of the Cycle.

KING-TSONG Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

IT was by the Eunuchs, who were now become Masters, that King-tsong was elected to the Throne; and by the same usurped Authority, they deprived him of the Government not long after, in order to confer it on the Empress-Mother. The childish Behaviour of this young Prince, and his Irregularities, were Reasons to them for dispossessing him, and leaving him nothing but the Title of Emperor, in the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, and eighteenth of his Age.

This Prince returning from Hunting, went into his Apartment to change his Cloaths; when the Candles being suddenly put out, he was murdered by the Eunuchs, who placed his Brother Ven-tsong in his room.

VEN-TSONG, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Fourteen Years.

THIS Prince, who had a great Affection for the wise and learned Men of his Empire, being impatient at the Power of the Eunuchs, in the ninth Year of his Reign took Measures secretly to destroy them; but perceiving the Snares that were laid for them, they fell on a sudden with so much Fury on the Ministers, and Guards of the Palace, that they slew above a thousand of them, and many Families were entirely destroy'd. These Misfortunes, in Conjunction with others still greater, which the Emperor foresaw, so overwhelmed him with Grief; that, tho' he often endeavoured to divert it or drown it in Wine yet, it prey'd upon his Spirits, to such a Degree, that he wasted away insensibly, and at last died of a Consumption, in the fifty seventh Year of the Cycle. The Eunuchs, who now took upon them to nominate the Emperors, never thought of the Son of the Deceased, but chose his Brother Vu-tsong, who was the fifth Son of the twelfth Emperor of this Dynasty.

VU-TSONG, the Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd six Years.

THE superior Qualifications of this Prince justified the Preference he met with, being of a warlike Inclination, and dreading neither Danger nor Fatigue. He drove the Tartars out of the Province of Sben-fu, where they had fortify'd themselves; and cleared several other Provinces of the Robbers, who march'd in Troops, and made great Havock. His Judgment was so excellent, that he was never deceived in his Choice of Ministers. He established, or rather revived a Law, still observed, which is a Check upon the Mandarins of the Imperial City, (upon whom depend the Mandarins of the Provinces) enjoining, that every five, or at least every seven Years, the Conduct of the Chief Officers of the Empire should be strictly enquired into; and these Mandarins are obliged to commit to Writing, a sincere and particular Account of all their Miscarriages, and intreat the Emperor's Pardon; and if in this humble Confession, they offer either to excuse, disguise, or extenuate their Faults, they have then no Favour to expect, and are inevitably deprived of their Employments.

SWEN-TSONG, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

IT is probable, that the little Genius which this Prince discovered in his Infancy, induced the Eunuchs to prefer him to all others; rightly judging that nothing established their Authority so much as the Incapacity of the Emperor. However they were deceived; for Swen-tsong was no sooner upon the Throne but he appeared another Man, and was eminent for all the Qualities which constitute a great Prince. His Wisdom, Judgment, Moderation, Equity, Application and Love for the Welfare of his People, made them consider him as another Tay-tsong, the second Emperor of this Dynasty, whose Memory was still revered thro'out the Empire: But notwithstanding all this Prince's Merit, he could not reduce the Power of the Eunuchs. Hu-tau, his Prime Minister, in a Memorial advised him to be inexorable to the Eunuchs who should commit any Fault, and not to supply the Places of those who died; that their Number lessening by Degrees, it might be more easy to destroy them. sioned a mortal Enmity between them and the Minister, so that the Troubles grew greater than ever.

The Chinese Historians blame this Prince for inviting to his Court the Sectaries of Tau, in order to procure by their Means the pretended Drink which renders People immortal. On this Occasion one of his Ministers represented to him, that the best way to procure himself a long and happy Life, was to get the Mastery over his own Heart, to subdue his Passions, and practise Virtue: "Most of the Emperors who preceded you, added he, would have arrived to extreme old Age, if they had followed the Counsel which I give you." He had no sooner taken the Drink which the Sectaries gave him, but he saw himself devoured by Worms, that swarm'd in his Body; and a few Days after he died, at the Age of fifty Years, being succeeded by his Son I-tsung, who was elected by the Eunuchs.

THE Haughtiness, Pride, Prodigality, Luxury and excessive Debaucheries of this Prince made him universally detested. In the fourteenth Year of his Reign he caused a Bone of the Idol Fo to be brought with Pomp into his Palace, and three Months after dy'd, at the Age of thirty one Years. The Chinese Writers attribute both his Death, and the Troubles which ensued, to his stupid Devotion for the said Idol. The Eunuchs placed his Son Hi-tsung in his room.

THE Eunuchs, who were absolute Masters, settled this Prince upon the Throne, being but twelve Years old. He spent his Time wholly in Play and Music, in Riding and Shooting with the Bow; at the same time that there was nothing to be seen on all Sides, especially in the Northern Provinces, but Tumults and Revolts. The Taxes wherewith the People were over loaded, the Famine caused by the over-flowing of Rivers, and by the Locusts which destroyed the Corn, encreased the Number of the Rebels. Whan-tyau, a Native of the Province of Sben-tong, being at the Head of them, went and laid Siege to the Imperial City; and having driven his Sovereign from thence caused himself to be proclaimed Emperor, and gave to his Family the Name of Tsi.

A young Man call'd Li-ke-yong, who was but twenty eight Years of Age, and having but one Eye, was nick-named To-yen-long, commanded the Imperial Troops, and attack'd the Captain of the Rebels. At first he was repulsed, but rallying his Soldiers, he renew'd the Battle with such Vigour, that he obtained a compleat Victory, and brought the Emperor back in Triumph to his Palace. For these Services he was rewarded with the Principality of Tsin, and his Son became the Founder of the fifteenth Dynasty.

The Emperor did not enjoy the Fruit of this Victory above three Months, for he dy'd in the forty fifth Year of the Cycle, at the Age of twenty seven, and the Eunuchs set the Imperial Crown on the Head of Chau-tsung, who was the sixth Son of the last Emperor.

THIS Prince, who wanted neither Parts nor Courage, shew'd great Marks of Esteem for Men of Learning, and for his Principal Ministers; proposing by their Assistance to retrieve in time the Affairs of the Empire, which the usurp'd Authority of the Eunuchs, and the rebellious Disposition of the People had thrown into great Disorder. To effect this Change, he judg'd it necessary to begin with the Destruction of the Eunuchs; but while he was considering of the Means, they suspecting his Design, came suddenly upon him with their Soldiers, and seizing his Person, confined him in a remote Apartment, under a secure Guard, leaving only a Hole in the Wall, for conveying him Food. But the Ko-lau, Tsu-yu, having discover'd the Place, sent thither a number of resolute Fellows, well armed, who slew the Guards, released the Emperor, and brought him back to his Palace.

Chü-ven, Captain of the Robbers, invited by the Ko-lau to come to the Emperor's Assistance against the Eunuchs, arriv'd just at the Time that this Prince publish'd an Edict for extirpating them all, excepting thirty of the youngest to be reserved for the most servile Offices of the Palace; and executed this Commission with such Zeal, that many hundreds of Eunuchs were put to the Sword. Chü-ven, who hitherto had appear'd loyal, being soon after seized with a Spirit of Ambition, caused the Ko-lau, who had been so faithful to his Prince, to be slain; and obliged the Emperor to remove his Court from the Province of Sben-si to that of Ho-nan. Which he had no sooner done, but the Traitor put him to Death, in the thirty eighth Year of his Age, and first of the Cycle; placing the Imperial Crown on the Head of Chau-swen-tsung, Son of the murdered Emperor, till he could take it himself with Safety.

CHAU-SWEN-TSONG, Twentieth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

THIS young Prince was scarce two Years upon the Throne, when seeing plainly that he should be sacrific'd, as well as his Father, to the Ambition of the pertidious Chü-ven, chose voluntarily to resign the Crown to him, to prevent his committing a fresh Crime, and to save his own Life. The Usurper, who took the Name of Tay-tsu, gave him a Principality, which he possess'd no longer than three Years, being slain at the Age of seventeen; and with him ended the Family of Tang.

The five following Successions are call'd by the Chinese, Hew-ü-tay, that is, the Five latter Dynasties, being accounted Petty Races, as well as the five which precede that of the Tang. They resemble them also in Wars, Revolts, and Parricides, which so often stained the Throne with Blood; but they differ from each other in the Number of Princes, and in the Time of their Duration. The five former reckon twenty four Emperors, in the Space of one hundred and ninety eight Years, whereas these latter continued not one Cycle, and reckon no more than thirteen Emperors. The warlike Nation of the Sye-tan, inhabiting the Country now call'd Lyau-tong, being exceedingly increased by many Colonies, that came from Korea, gave much Uneasiness to the following Emperors.

Towards the thirteenth Year the Barbarians above-mention'd, changing their Name from that of Sye-tan to Lyau, laid the Foundation of their Government, which in the Space of two hundred and nine Years reckon'd a Succession of nine Princes.

Chwang-tsong, Son of the famous Warrior Li-ke-yong before-mention'd, who had done such Service to the State under the eighteenth Emperor [of the Tang], took Advantage of these Troubles to gain a Crown, which he was more worthy to wear, than the Usurper; he commanded an Army accusom'd to conquer, and having taken several Cities, engaged and defeated Mo-ti's Forces, who in Despair slew himself, and with him his Family became extinct.

THE Father of the late Emperor had adopted Ming-tsung, tho' he was not born in the Empire. This Prince had acquired a general Esteem, and proved himself perfectly worthy of the Choice that had been made of him. He is chiefly praised for his Liberality, Moderation, Love of Peace, and a particular Affection for his Subjects. Tho' he was illiterate, he gave frequent Marks of his Esteem for Learned Men. The Art of Printing was invented in his Reign.

The Chinese Historians also praise his Piety and Modesty, affirming that every Night he burnt Perfumes in Honour of the Lord of Heaven, and implored his Assistance in these Words, "I was born a Barbarian, and in a Country of Barbarians, yet in the midst of the Troubles that afflicted this Empire, they have chosen me to govern it. I make but one Request, which is, that the Heavenly Majesty would condescend to watch over my Conduct, and send me wise and experienced Men, whose Counsel may aid me to govern this State without falling into Mistakes." Indeed he had always in his Palace a great Number of able Men, by whose Counsel he made many excellent Regulations, and among others one excluding Eunuchs from all Public Employments. The Birth of that illustrious Person, who was afterwards the Founder of the nineteenth Dynasty; the Profound Peace the Nation enjoy'd, all the while he was on the Throne, and the Plenty which reign'd throughout the Empire, are attributed by the same Writers to the Piety of this Prince.

Among the many great Men who were about this Prince, a Ko-lau, named Fong-tau, is highly praised for his extraordinary Understanding and Integrity; he used to say, "That a State is to be govern'd with the same Care and Circumspection that is required in riding a Horse. I have often, said he, travell'd in very rough and mountainous Countries, and never got any Hurt, because I always took Care to keep a stiff Rein; whereas in the smoothest Plains, thinking the same Care needless, and giving my Horse the Bridle, I have fallen; and been in Danger of hurting myself. It is just the same with the Government of a State; when it is in the most flourishing Condition, a Prince ought not to abate any thing of his usual Vigilance and Attention."

Ming-tsung dy'd in the sixty seventh Year of his Age, and thirtieth of the Cycle, leaving the Crown to his Son Min-tsung.

TSI-VANG, Second Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

THE barbarous People of Lyau-tong, soon breaking the Treaty made with Kau-tsü, invaded the Empire when least expected. Tsi-vang opposed them with an Army sufficient to have given them a Repulse, under the Command of Lyew-chi-ywen; but this General concealing a violent Ambition under an Appearance of Zeal, made short Marches, and by affected Delays gave the Barbarians time to make the Emperor Prisoner; who, being dethron'd, was contented to accept of a small Sovereignty, where he ended his Days.

Lyew-chi-ywen took Possession of the Crown by the Name of Kau-tsü, and founded the following Dynasty.

THE Army of Lyau-tong finding no Resistance, ravag'd all the Northern Provinces, after which they march'd into the Southern, but were stopp'd by considerable Bodies of Troops, that opposed their Passage; which occasion'd the General of the Barbarians to say, "He could not have believed the Conquest of China would have prov'd so difficult;" wherefore contenting himself with a rich Booty, he retired to his own Country. During these Transactions, Kau-tsü dy'd at the Age of fifty four, and the next Year, which was the forty sixth of the Cycle, his Son In-ti succeeded him.

IN-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

THE Youth of this Prince gave Opportunity to the Eunuchs to raise Commotions, in order to regain their Authority; especially as the Army was employ'd at a Distance from the Court, in opposing the Invasions of the Tartars of Lyau-tong.

This Army was commanded by Ko-gbey, who fought several successful Battles with the Barbarians, and thereby restored Peace to the Northern Provinces; but at the same time the Palace was in Confusion, the Intrigues of the Eunuchs having raised a Sedition, in which the Emperor was slain at the Age of twenty Years.

The Empress placed his Brother on the Throne, but he was scarcely seated before Ko-gbey returning with Triumph from his glorious Expedition, the Army cover'd him with the Banners of the Empire, and proclaim'd him Emperor; which the Empress seeing, she abandon'd the Prince she had set up, and submitted to the General as her Sovereign, who in acknowledgment always respected her as his Mother. He took the Name of Tay-tsü.

THE Love of the Sciences, and the Proofs which this Prince had given of his Bravery and Skill in the Art of War, were the Steps by which he ascended the Throne; but in the height of his Grandeur he was always so modest, as to keep a Plough and a Loom in his Palace, to remind him of the Station and hard Labour of his Ancestors.

In a time of Scarcity he order'd the publick Granaries to be open'd, and the Rice to be sold at a very low Rate, which the People were to pay when they were able; but the Surveyors of the Provisions representing, that the Poor would never be in a Condition to pay it; "How, says the Emperor, don't you know that they are my Children, and that I am their Father? Was a Father ever known to let his Son perish for Hunger, because he saw no Prospect of ever being repay'd what he lent him?" At the same time he caused all the Statues of Idols to be melted down, and coin'd into Money, which was become very scarce.

Several Petty Sovereigns, who had for a long time shaken off their Dependence on the Emperor, were so charm'd with the Fame of this Prince's Virtue, that they voluntarily submitted to his Authority, and return'd to their Allegiance. A Memorial was presented him, proposing Methods for recovering the Provinces and Principalities, which the Empire had lost during the late Troubles; but while he was considering how to put it in Execution, Death interrupted him in the fifty sixth Year of the Cycle, and the thirty ninth of his Age; and his Son Kong-ti, who was but seven Years old, succeeded him.

They went therefore to his Palace, and finding him in Bed, saluted him Emperor, and clothed him in a yellow Habit, which is the Imperial Colour, giving a Principality to the young Prince; and thus ended this Dynasty. Chau-quang-yu took the Name of Tay-tsü, and accepted the Crown, on Condition that his Mother should take Place of him on all Occasions.

TAY-TSU, First Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

Tay-tsü, 1st
Emperor.

The Empire
recovers itself.

NINE Emperors of this Dynasty kept their Court for one hundred and sixty Years in the Northern Provinces of China, the other nine resided one hundred fifty two Years in the Southern Provinces.

Under this Dynasty the Empire began to take Breath, after the many Commotions, Wars, and other Misfortunes, which afflicted it. These continual Storms were succeeded by a long Calm; and the Blessing which usually accompanies Peace had been more lasting, had all the Princes of this Family been as much addicted to Arms as Learning.

Tay-tsü was endow'd with all the Qualities which the Chinese require in their Emperors; being a Prince of solid Judgment, attentive to the Affairs of State, wise, prudent, liberal, and tender of his People; modest, frugal, exceeding good-natur'd, and naturally inclin'd to Clemency; which appear'd from the moderate Punishments he inflict'd on Criminals, as well as by his mild and affable Behaviour to the Vanquish'd. He order'd the four Gates of his Palace, which fronted the four Quarters of the World, to be left always open, being willing, he said, "That his House should be as his Heart, open to all his Subjects." By this Character of Goodness and Condescension he regained the Obedience of ten Petty Sovereigns, and establish'd Peace, which seem'd by their continual continual Wars to have been banish'd for ever from their Dominions. Intending to root Luxury out of the Empire, he began by reforming himself and the Court; to which end he always appear'd in a plain and modest Habit, and forbad his Daughters to wear Pearls and precious Stones.

To honour the Memory of his Ancestors, he gave the Title of Emperor to his Father, Grand-Father, and Great-Grand-Father's Father; and made his Mother (who was reckon'd a Pattern of Prudence and Modesty) an Empress. When the Nobles came to congratulate her on the Advancement of her Son, she did not shew the least Sign of Joy; at which they being surprized, she said, "I have been told that the Art of ruling well is very difficult; if my Son governs his Subjects with Wisdom, I shall receive your Compliments with Pleasure; if not, I shall contentedly resign these Honours to finish my Days in my former Condition."

A Year before her Death she conjur'd the Emperor not to be sway'd by Affection for his Children, in the Choice of an Heir, but rather to nominate his Brother; "for in short, added she, remember, my Son, that you are beholden for the Throne you sit on, much less to your own Merit, than to the Infancy of the Prince of the preceding Family."

The Emperor, during a severe Winter, reflecting on the Hardship his Army, (which was opposing the Tartars of Lyau-tong in the Northern Provinces) was like to suffer from the Rigour of the Season; pull'd off his Garment, lin'd with Furrs, and sent it to the General, telling him, "That he wish'd it was in his Power to do the like to each of his Soldiers." It is incredible what a vast effect this generous Act of the Emperor had upon the Courage and Ardour of his Troops.

This Prince ordained an Examination for the Military Men like that for the Literati, which those who aspire to Posts in the Army are oblig'd to pass; nor can they rise to the Chief Employments till they have given Proofs of their Capacity, by their writing on the Art of War, as well as by their Skill in Horsemanship and Archery.

Among the illustrious Men who flourish'd during his Reign, two are particularly distinguish'd, one in the Magistracy, the other in the Army; the first was call'd Chau-pu, the second Kau-pin.

Chau-pu, who was of the Emperor's Council, was continually presenting some Petition or Memorial to put him in mind of his Duty, or other Matters relating to the publick Welfare. The Emperor being tir'd with so many Remonstrances, one Day took his Petition and tore it before him; Chau-pu, without being concern'd, gather'd up the Pieces, and having on his Return home join'd them together in the best Manner he could, the very next Day appear'd before the Emperor in the most respectful Posture, and presented him the same Petition; who far from being angry with his Minister, admir'd his Constancy and Resolution, and to reward such uncommon Virtue made him Chief Ko-lau.

He gave on another Occasion an extraordinary Proof of his Tendernefs for his People; the Town of Nan-king being besieged by Kau-pin, and reduced to the last Extremity, the Emperor, who foresaw the Slaughter which would happen on the taking this Place, feign'd himself sick; whereat the great Officers were alarm'd, and surrounding his Bed, every one was proposing some Remedy: "The most effectual Remedy, reply'd the Emperor, and from which I expect a Cure, depends only on you; assure me by your Oath, that you will not shed the Blood of the Citizens." They all swore accordingly, and the Emperor immediately appear'd to be well. The Generals took such wise Precautions to restrain the Soldiers, that very few of the Inhabitants were slain; yet even this drew Tears from the Emperor: "Alas! said he, what a dreadful thing is War, which cannot be carry'd on without destroying innocent Persons!" And as the City had suffer'd by Famine, during a long Siege, the instant it was taken he sent one hundred thousand Measures of Rice to be distributed among the People.

To excite Emulation and a greater Inclination for Learning, he visited the Birth Place of the celebrated Confucius, and compos'd a Panegyric on him. He also conferr'd on one of his Descendants a Title of Honour, which rais'd him to a considerable Rank in the Empire. Tay-tsu dy'd the thirteenth Year of the Cycle, having nam'd for his Successor his Brother Tay-tsung, pursuant to the Recommendation of his Mother on her Death-Bed.

TAY-TSONG, Second Emperor, reign'd Twenty one Years.

THIS Prince was endow'd with great Moderation, and was a famous Protector of Learned Men. Being learned himself, he employ'd part of the Day in Reading, and erected a very rich Library, which contain'd, as they affirm, eighty thousand Volumes.

In an Expedition which he undertook, to reduce one of the petty Kingdoms, and make it a Province of the Empire, while he besieg'd the principal City, there happen'd one Night a great Tumult in the Camp, which was commanded by Chau the Emperor's Brother; occasion'd, as was reported the next Day, by a Design of the Soldiers to set that General on the Throne. The Emperor concealing his Resentment, employ'd himself wholly to reduce the Town; but a few Days after it was taken, his Brother discoursing familiarly with him, intimated his Surprize that he had so long deferr'd to reward those who had distinguish'd themselves in the Siege. "I expected, answer'd the Emperor, that you would have rewarded them." Chau was so stung at this Answer, that he kill'd himself before Night; but when the Emperor heard of his Death, he fainted, and shed a Flood of Tears, often embraced his Corps, and caused the greatest Honours to be render'd him at his Funeral.

He passionately wish'd to recover the Cities which his Ancestors had yielded to the Tartars of Lyau-tong; but Chang-tsi-hyen, the General of his Army, always dissuaded him from that Undertaking. "Because, said he, it is more proper first to settle the Empire in Peace, and when that is well establish'd, we shall have more Leisure and less Difficulty to reduce those Barbarians." The Emperor being of a different Opinion, several Battles were fought, in which sometimes the Chinese and sometimes the Tartars were victorious.

The General Chang-tsi-hyen made use of a remarkable Stratagem, to raise the Siege of a City: he detach'd three hundred Soldiers, carrying each a lighted Torch, with orders to approach as near as possible the Enemy's Camp; who being surpris'd at such a Number of Lights, and imagining that the whole Chinese Army was coming upon them, immediately fled, and falling into the Ambuscades, which the General had placed in all the Passages, very few of them escaped Slaughter.

This Prince dy'd in the thirty fourth Year of the Cycle, at the Age of fifty nine, and was succeeded by his third Son Ching-tsong.

CHING-TSONG, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty five Years.

Ching-tsong,
3d Emperor.
Good Effects of a Comet.

THE manner in which this Prince began his Reign prognosticated a happy Government. Upon the Appearance of a Comet, which was deemed the Fore-runner of some Calamity, he published an Edict, enjoying his Subjects to let him know his Faults, that he might amend them, in order to avert the Evils which threatened the Empire; and at the same time remitted ten Millions of the Taxes, and set thirteen thousand Prisoners at Liberty. As he had an Heir born at this Juncture, he own'd his Obligation to the Lord of Heaven, whom he had long importun'd for that Blessing.

He makes the Lyau fly,

The Tartars of Lyau-tong having besieged a City in the Province of Pe-che-li, the Emperor came upon them suddenly with his Army, which so terrified the Barbarians, that they instantly rais'd the Siege. He was advis'd to take Advantage of their Consternation, to recover the Country which had been yielded to them; and is blam'd not only for neglecting to pursue his Victory, but also for making a Treaty, after their shameful Flight, as disadvantageous as if he had been defeated himself: for he bought the Peace at the Price of an hundred thousand Tael and two hundred thousand Pieces of Silk, to be paid annually.

and then

His Simple Credulity.

He is blamed also for his Credulity, whereby Magic, and many other Superstitions gained Ground during his Reign. In the eleventh Year of the Cycle, being told that a choice Book had fallen from Heaven, near one of the Gates of the Imperial City, he immediately took it in his Head to go in Person, to receive this Celestial Gift. The Ko-lau's, to prevent his taking such an imprudent Step, endeavouring to convince him, that it was only an Imposture of some Flatterers and idle People, and that the Book ought to be burnt, he remain'd a while in Suspense, but at last resolv'd to follow his first Design, because, as he said, "a Spirit had appeared to him" in a Dream, about a Year before, and promised him this wonderful Book." He set out immediately on Foot, with several of his Courtiers, to receive this miraculous Book with the more profound Respect; and even built a Temple on the Place where it fell. Upon Examination it appeared full of Sorcery, and to contain all the Principles of the abominable Sect of Tau; concerning which an Interpreter, named Hu-sin-ngan, observes, that from this fatal Time the Respect due to the Sovereign Lord of Heaven much decreased amongst great Numbers of the Chinese.

Van-tan, one of the Ko-lau's of the Empire, being at the Point of Death, call'd his Children, and spake to them in this manner: "My Conscience does not reproach me with having done any thing against the Interest of the Emperor or the Good of the State; but there is one thing for which I cannot forgive my self, and that is my not having counselled his Majesty to burn that pernicious Book which he received with so much Respect. For this Neglect I desire to be punished after my Death; wherefore, my Children, I command you as soon as I am dead to shave my Head and Face, and bury me without either Cap or Girdle, as if I was a wretched Bonza."

Ancient Books reprinted.

The Emperor having re-printed the ancient Books, to disperse them through the Empire, died the fifty ninth Year of the Cycle, aged fifty five; and was succeeded by Jin-tsong, his sixth Son by his second Queen.

JIN-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd Forty one Years.

Jin-tsong,
4th Emp.

JIN-TSONG was but thirteen Years old when he was proclaimed Emperor. The Empress took the Government in her Hands during his Minority, and held it till her Death; which happened eleven Years after the Accession of this Prince, who always paid her the same Respect as if she had been his own Mother. As soon he began to govern by himself, his whole Em-

Employment was to preserve Tranquillity in his Dominions, and to make his Subjects taste the Sweets of it. This pacifick Disposition revived the Courage and Ambition of the Tartars of Lyau-tong, who had renewed the War, if the Emperor had not bought a Peace on most shameful Terms.

The best thing he did, was banishing all the Images with their Worshippers out of the Palace, and commanding that none should offer him any Present which came from foreign Countries. In the twenty sixth Year of his Reign the Empire was afflicted with a great Drought; but abundance of Rain succeeding caused a general Rejoycing, when all the great Officers being assembled on this Occasion to congratulate the Emperor, "All the Time, said this Prince, that my People suffered by the Scarcity, I never failed to burn Incense, and lift up my Hands to Heaven. Hearing the Noise of Thunder in the Night, I rose hastily out of Bed and went into my Garden; and, as soon as I saw the Rain fall, prostrated my self on the Earth, to return Thanks to the Lord of Heaven. The Favour I ask of you is to tell me, without Reserve, what you have observed amiss in my Conduct. Perhaps I have only the empty Title of Emperor, and am blind to my own Defects, being dazzled by the Splendor of my Greatness. I am sensible of what Importance it is for one to address his Prayers to Heaven Morning and Evening, with a pure Heart".

His extreme Desire of having a Son led him to put away the Empress, whereby he suffered somewhat in his Reputation; for tho' some approved this Conduct, the greater Number blamed it. But he was universally applauded for the Succour he sent his Subjects, by the Counsel and Care of one of his Ko-lau's named Fu-pyê; which sav'd the Lives of 500,000 People, who were ready to perish with Hunger and Distress. About the same time he had another Vexation; Hyen-tsong, seventh King of the Lyau-tong Tartars, having sent Embassadors to demand the Restitution of ten Cities in the Province of Pe-che-li, which had been re-taken by the Founder of the eighteenth Dynasty; the Emperor, who loved Peace, dispatched Ku-pyê to the Tartar Prince, and engaged to pay him yearly 200,000 Taels, and 300,000 Pieces of Silk, instead of those Cities; and, what was most shameful of all, made Use of the Character Na in the Treaty, which signifies a Pension by way of Tribute.

After he had divorced the Empress, he married the Grand-Daughter of Kau-pin, the famous Chinese General spoken of before, but had no Heirs by this Princess: So that being near his End, he was obliged to name Ing-tsong the thirteenth Son of his Brother, for his Successor; he died at the Age of fifty four, in the fortieth Year of the Cycle.

ING-TSONG, Fifth Emperor, reigned Four Years.

IN the first Year of his Reign he was so vexed at some Misunderstanding which happened between him and the Empress, who had a Share in the Government, that it threw him into a Fit of Sickness: But upon his Recovery, his Ko-lau, Han-ki, managed it so that he paid her a Visit.

This wise Minister, having shew'd them the Misfortunes which such a Dissension might produce, exhorted the Emperor in particular to pay the Empress the Respects and Duty of a Son, tho' she was not his Mother, and gave frequent Instances of a disagreeable Temper. He represented to him, that Virtue was easily practis'd where Love and Complaisance engage our Affections, but that it does not deserve that Name till it has been tried, and stood the Shock of Opposition; that he should have always before his Eyes the Example of Shun, that ancient Emperor, who had been revered for so many Ages, because his Respect and Obedience could never be diminished, either by the harsh Usage of a barbarous Father, or a cruel Step-Mother. By the Care of this Minister so perfect a Reconciliation was wrought between the Emperor and Empress, that shortly after she entirely resigned her Part of the Government.

The Ko-lau, Su-ma-quang, one of their best Historians, flourish'd about this Time. He is the Author of Annals, compiled from above two thousand Volumes, beginning with Whang-ti, the third Emperor of China.

Ing-tsong died the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, aged thirty six, and was succeeded by his Son Shin-tsong.

SHIN-TSONG, Sixth Emperor, reign'd Eighteen Years.

THIS Prince had more Courage and Magnanimity than Wisdom and Conduct. He passionately desired to deliver the Northern Provinces from the Yoke of the Barbarians; but was diverted from it, by calling to mind the Counsel his Mother gave him at her Death, to sacrifice every thing to preserve Peace.

Learned Men had a great Share in his Favour; and he gave the Title of Duke to Mençius, who is reckoned the greatest Philosopher after Confucius his Master, who had been declared a King by a former Emperor.

In his Reign flourish'd several Authors of a New Philosophy, who undertook to explain the ancient Books; their Names were Chew, Ching, Chang, Shau, &c. The Emperor distinguish'd them by Titles of Honour, both while they lived, and after their Death. Van-ngan-she, a Disciple ciple of the New Philosophy, which now began to degenerate into Atheism, observing that the Emperor appeared sad in a time of Drought, and endeavoured to appease the Anger of Heaven by Fasting and Prayer; "To what Purpose do you afflict yourself thus, says he, and what have you to fear from Heaven? Know, O Prince, that whatever happens is the Effect of Chance, and that you torment yourself in vain". Fu-pye, one of the most eminent Ko-lau's, not able to bear such Language, "How dare you teach such Doctrine?" says he in a resolute Tone; "if an Emperor should once come to lose all Respect and Fear of Heaven, what Crimes would he not be capable of committing?"

The same Van-ngan-she strove to introduce many other Novelties; but the celebrated Su-ma-quang, who was in the highest Esteem, vigorously opposed all the Attempts of this rash and subtle Genius.

bold Saying
of a Minister.

CHE-TSONG being but ten Years old when he ascended the Throne, the Empress his Grand-mother governed the State with great Prudence during the eight Years that she lived. A few Moments before her Death she sent for the Ko-lau's, and ordered them to clear the Palace of that great Number of Ministers, who were of no Use but to corrupt the Inclinations of the young Prince; but as she ought to have done this herself when the Power was in her own Hands, her Orders were now too late. Lyu-kong-chu, being raised to the Dignity of Ko-lau, presented a Memorial to the Emperor, which contained the ten following Instructions, expressed in twenty Characters. 1. Fear Heaven. 2. Love your Subjects. 3. Labour to be perfect. 4. Apply yourself to the Sciences. 5. Bestow Employments on Persons of Merit. 6. Be ready to hear Advice. 7. Lessen the Taxes. 8. Mitigate the Severity of Punishments. 9. Shun Prodigality. 10. Detest Debauchery.

The Emperor having divorced his Wife, one of the Ministers presented a Petition containing Remonstrances on that Occasion; the Prince told him he had followed the Example of some of his Ancestors: You had better (reply'd the Minister) imitate their Virtues than their Faults. The Emperor was so stung with this Reply, that he threw down the Petition, trampled upon it, and deprived him, who gave him that Counsel, of his Dignity.

Che-tsung was but twenty five years of Age when he died, in the seventeenth Year of the Cycle. He was succeeded by Whey-tsung, the eleventh Son of Shin-tsung, who was the sixth Emperor of that Dynasty.

THIS Prince divided his Authority with the Empress his Grand-mother, and was more addicted to the Luxury and Pleasures of his Palace, than to the Business of the State; yet he loved Literature, and had made a considerable Progress in it.

In one thing he is inexcusable; that tho' he could not be ignorant of the Troubles occasioned in former Times by the Authority of the Eunuchs, yet he honoured them with his Favour and Protection, so far as to bestow Sovereignities on some of them; a Honour never granted to any but Princes of the Imperial Family, or (which was seldom practised) to Great Men who had done signal Services to the Empire. His Reputation suffered still more by his Folly, in adhering to the abominable Superstitions of the Sect of Tau; for he carefully collected all the Books which contained their Doctrine, and was so infatuated, as to give the Title of Ssang-ti, or Supreme Lord, to a famous Disciple among them, named Chang-i, who lived under the Dynasty of the Han; nay, he went farther, for he declar'd himself Head of this impious Sect.

The Authors of this Time cannot forbear inveighing against his Conduct, and make no Difficulty to ascribe all the succeeding Misfortunes, and even the Destruction of the Empire to a Blasphemy so dishonourable to the true Sovereign of Heaven.

The Emperor, contrary to the Advice of the King of Korea and most of his Ministers, joined Forces with the Nyu-che or Eastern Tartars, whom he called in to destroy the Kingdom of Lyau-tong. The Nyu-che joyfully entered into this Confederacy, and several Battles were fought, in which the Army of Lyau-tong was always defeated, and reduced at last to such Extremity, that those who remained were obliged to quit their Country, and fly for Safety to the Mountains in the West (A). Thus ended the Kingdom of Lyau, which had stood for the Space of two hundred dred and nine Years, under nine Princes. The Tartar grew so elated with this Conquest, that he determin'd to found an Empire, and give it the Name of Kin.<sup>(B)</sup> Soon after extending his Views of aggrandizing himself, he openly broke his Treaties with the Emperor of China, and invading the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Sben-fi, made himself Master of them, more by the Treachery of some Chinese Malecontents, than by Force of Arms. The Emperor, in Danger of losing the greater Part of his Dominions, made several advantageous Proposals to the Tartar, who invited Wbey-tsung to come in Person, and settle the Limits of the two Empires; which he did, and new Articles of Peace were agreed on between them. But on the Emperor's Return to his Capital City, his Ministers made him change his Mind, telling him, that the Treaty could not subsist, and that the most cruel War was preferable to so shameful a Peace. The Tartar, who was inform'd of this Resolution, had immediately recourse to Arms, and taking several Towns, entered the Province of Sben-fi in Triumph, where he invited the Emperor once more to come and settle their Limits. This unhappy Prince, who dreaded nothing so much as War, was weak enough to go a second time to his Enemy; who presently after his Arrival seized his Person, and having stript him of all the Marks of his Dignity kept him Prisoner. A faithful Minister, nam'd Li-fa-shin, who accompany'd the Emperor, enraged at such Treachery, cry'd out with a deep Sigh, "Heaven cannot have two Suns, nor can I obey two Masters." The Endeavours of the Tartars to appease him only enraged him the more, and in the height of his Fury he cut off his Lips and his Tongue, and then kill'd himself.

Wbey-tsung dy'd in the Desert of Sba-mo, where he was confin'd under a strong Guard, the forty second Year of the Cycle, and fifty fourth of his Age; having before his Death named Kin-tsung, his eldest Son, to succeed him.

KIN-TSONG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd One Year.

KIN-TSONG began his Reign by executing the Orders of his Father, which enjoin'd him to put to Death six of his Ministers, who had basely betray'd him to the Tartars. In the mean time they pursued their Conquests, invading the Province of Ho-nan, and passing the Yellow River without Opposition; which made them wonder at the Indolence of the Chinese, who with a Handful of Men could have prevented it. Then they marched directly to the Imperial City, which they took and plunder'd, carrying away the Emperor and his Queen Prisoners; but the Principal Lords and several of the Ministers, preferring Death before so ignominious a Bondage, slew themselves. The Tartars being informed by the Empress Meng, that she had been divorced, and had no Hand in the Management of Affairs, they left that Princess behind; who preserved the Empire by her Wisdom and Conduct, in getting the Crown placed on the Head of Kau-tsung, Brother of the late Emperor, and ninth Son of Wbey-tsung by his divorced Empress.

KAU-TSONG fix'd his Court first at Nan-king, but shortly after was oblig'd to remove it to Hang-chew, Capital of the Province of Che-kyang. Tho' he was of a peaceable Disposition, and a Lover of Learning, yet he gain'd some Victories, both over the Tartars, and certain Chiefs of the Rebels; who took Advantage of the present Troubles to enrich themselves by plundering the Provinces. Kang-ye, who commanded his Army, had several times repulsed the Tartars, but to no great Purpose, since none of the conquer'd Countries were recover'd from them.

10th Emp.

This Prince is blamed for two things: first, for slighting his Ministers of greatest Experience and Integrity, and placing his whole Confidence in two or three Parasites, who had neither Honesty nor Honour. Secondly for being so much devoted to the Sect of the Bonzas, as to abandon the Government to his adopted Son, that he might have the more Time to spare for his superstitious Contemplations.

Hi-tsung, the Tartar King, to gain the Love of his new Subjects, gave public Proofs of his Esteem for Learning and learned Men; he also visited the Hall of Confucius, and in imitation of the Chinese paid him regal Honours. The Courtiers being displeased that a Man, who was far from being Noble by Birth, should receive such Honours, discover'd their Surprise to the King, who reply'd: "If he does not merit those Honours by his Birth, he merits them for the excellent Doctrine he has taught." He fell afterwards on the Town of Nan-king, from whence the Emperor was retired, and took it.

The Fidelity of a Chinese General, named Yang-pang, is highly commended. Having been taken Prisoner by the Tartars, he was greatly importuned to side with them; but he not only refused the most advantageous Offers, but wrote with his Blood on his Robe, "That he had rather die, and meet again the Spirit of the Imperial Family of Song, than live to serve Barbarians." Which resolute Behaviour cost him his Life, for he was kill'd that Instant.

(B) The Dominion founded by this Nation was the famous Empire of Katay, which Name came to us from the Mongol or Mogul (1). It contain'd, as appears from this History, the Northern Provinces of China, with part of Tartary, particularly the Country of the Manchows, whose Progenitors, these Kin were. Kin signifies Gold; whence the Emperor of Katay, in the Histories of Jenghis-khan, is called Aitai-khan, or the Golden King.

The Emperor by a shameful Peace makes himself the Subject and Tributary of the Kin.

The King of Kin breaks the Peace, is kill'd by his own Soldiers.

The Emperor abdicates the Crown.

Mean time Yo-shi, another Chinese General, was advancing by long Marches to relieve the City of Nan-king; of which the Tartars having Intelligence, they set Fire to the Palace, and retir'd towards the North. However Yo-shi arriv'd time enough to fall upon their Rear-Guard, which suffer'd very much, and from that time they never durst cross the Kyang.

A few Years after the Emperor made Peace with the Tartar King on very dishonourable Conditions; for in signing this Treaty he made no Scruple to use the Word Chin, that is Subject, and Kong, which signifies Tributary. The Tartar, in Consideration of these submissive Terms, engag'd to send the Emperor the Bodies of eight of his Relations, who had died within eight Years. When these Bodies arriv'd at the Imperial City, they were received with great Demonstrations of Joy; the Prison Doors were set open, and a general Pardon granted thro' the whole Empire. The Chinese Authors, far from blaming this Action of the Emperor, highly praise it as a rare Example of Filial Piety.

In the thirteenth Year of his Reign the Tartar King broke the Peace, and at the Head of a very formidable Army invaded the Southern Provinces, and took Yang-cheu. Afterwards approaching the Yang-tse-kyang, which is not far from that City, he order'd his Troops to pass over near the Mouth of the River, where it is widest and most rapid; upon which the whole Army mutinied, and the King being kill'd in the beginning of the Tumult, they immediately retir'd towards the North, where several Disturbances and Insurrections began to appear.

In the Nineteenth Year of the Cycle, Kau-tsong resign'd his Crown to his adopted Son Hyaу-tsong, but liv'd twenty five Years longer, and dy'd without Children at the Age of eighty four.

HYAU-TSONG, Eleventh Emperor, reign'd Twenty seven Years.

THIS Prince, who was descended from the Founder of this Dynasty, enjoy'd a peaceful Reign; because the Tartar King, named Shu-tsong, very different from his Predecessor, was of a mild and pacifick Temper.

Chu-bi flourish'd.

Chu-bi, one of the most celebrated Interpreters of the ancient Books, flourish'd at this time, and discharg'd with Honour the highest Functions in the State under four Emperors.

QUANG-TSONG, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Five Years.

Quang-tsong,
12th Emp.

THIS Prince was taken suddenly with an Apoplexy, in the fifty first Year of the Cycle; and in Spight of all Remedies dy'd a few Days after, at the Age of fifty four, his third Son Ning-tsong succeeding him.

NING-TSONG, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Thirty Years.

Ning-tsong,
13th Emp.

THIS Prince was with Difficulty persuaded to accept of the Crown. He was sober, and of a gentle Disposition, but withal of such a slender Capacity, that his Courtiers govern'd him as they pleas'd; or rather continually abus'd his Credulity and Confidence. He publish'd an Edict, which forbid all private Persons to print or even to write Annals of the Empire, without an exprefs Licence.

Chu-bi created Prince of Literature.

About this time dy'd the famous Chu-bi, who was honour'd after his Death with the Title of Ven-kong, which signifies Prince of Literature, and his Tablett was order'd to be placed in the Hall of Confucius, in the Rank of his Disciples. It is an establish'd Custom in China that when any Person has remarkably distinguish'd himself by his Virtue, or Knowledge in the Art of Government, the Emperors rank him among the Disciples of Confucius; that he may partake of the Honours which the Mandarins and learned Men pay to that Philosopher on certain Days in the Year.

The Palace having been set on Fire, continued burning four Days before it could be extinguish'd. And some Years after a Fire happen'd in the Imperial City, which was Hang-cheu, whereby five hundred and thirty thousand Houses were consum'd.

The Empire of the Western Tartars founded by Jenghis-khan.

The Twelfth Year of this Reign the (*) Chief of the Western Tartars laid the Foundation of his Empire, and gave his Family the Name of Yuen. These Tartars possess'd the Country which extends from the Province of Sben-fi to Tibet and Samarkand. Ever since the time that they had been intirely defeated by the fifth Emperor of the Dynasty named Han, about a hundred Years before Christ, they never made any Attempt against the Chinese; either because the Western People of Asia found them Employment, or their Forces being divided among many Petty Sovereigns, they were disabled by their frequent Quarrels with each other.

They relate, what has much the Air of Fiction, viz. that these Tartars, having destroy'd the the Kingdom of Matena (c), and push'd their Conquests to the Indies and Samarkand, advanced to Tyê-muen (d), that is, the Iron Gate, which was the Name of a Citadel; that in this Place their General was stop't by a Monster resembling a Stag, he was cover'd with green Hair, had a Horn in the middle of his Forehead, and a Tail like a Horse; that this Monster spoke to the Prince of the Tartars, and ask'd him, if he was not satisfy'd with so many horrid Slaughters, and if he would set no Bounds to his Fury? That this so frighted the Tartar, that without proceeding farther he return'd to his own Country, and sometime afterwards invaded China.

Mean time the Eastern Tartars, named Kin, broke the Peace, and invading the Chinese Territories afresh, the Emperor enter'd into a League with the Prince of the Western Tartars, to destroy them; in order to rid himself of an Enemy, who made a Jest of the Faith of Treaties, and continually gave him Disturbance. The Eastern Tartars, in a great Consternation, immediately sued for Peace, and made very advantageous Proposals; but the Emperor, incensed by their Breach of so many solemn Treaties, and depending more on the Integrity of the Western Tartars, rejected these Conditions with Scorn (e). Ning-tsong dy'd without Issue, the twenty first Year of the Cycle, and fifty seventh of his Age. He was succeeded by Li-tsong, who descended from the Founder of this Dynasty.

LI-TSONG, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Forty Years.

THE present Juncture required a warlike Prince, but Li-tsong was wholly addicted to the Sciences, and very much attach'd to the idle Whimsies of the Sect of Tau. In the second Year of his Reign he gave the Title of Duke in Perpetuity to the eldest Son of the Family of Confucius, which is the only Family in the Empire exempted from paying Tribute.

Mean time the War was carry'd on vigorously against the Tartars; who, being attack'd on one side by the Chinese, and on the other by the Western Tartars, commanded by an able General nam'd Pe-yen, were defeated in several Battles. The City of Ho-nan was taken, where the King of the Eastern Tartars kept his Court; and tho' the Capital of the Province of Shan-tong held out a long time (the Besieged defending the Place so obstinately, that they were driven for want of other Victuals to feed on human Flesh) yet at length Ngai-ti, the Tartar Prince, despairing of Relief, hang'd himself: whose Death put an end to the Empire of the Eastern Tartars, which continued under nine Princes in the Space of one hundred and seventeen Years. Nevertheless the small Remains of these People, who were almost intirely destroy'd, gave Rise to the Family, which at present possesses the Empire of China, and governs it with so much Glory, as we shall see in the sequel.

Whilst Li-tsong had only the Southern Provinces of China under his Dominion, the Western Tartars possessed the Empire of the North. Their King Ho-pi-lyé (f), who was skill'd in the Sciences, gain'd the Good Will of his Subjects by the Esteem he shew'd for learned Men, and by the Honour he did to the Memory of Confucius.

Li-tsong dy'd without Issue, the first Year of the Cycle, aged sixty two, and Tu-tsong his Nephew succeeded him.

TU-TSONG, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd Ten Years.

THE vicious Counsels which this Prince fell into, prov'd fatal to himself and the Empire. He had the Misfortune to be encouraged in his Excesses by a treacherous Ko-lau, [nam'd Hya-fu-tau] who was equally a Slave to the most infamous Passions. The Ministers presented Memorials to disengage the Emperor from this Monster, but without Success; so that many of them, seeing no Remedy for the Misfortunes, which were ready to fall on the Imperial Family, retired to the Western Tartars, who were pursuing their Conquests (g). Their Army having overrun the Provinces of Tun-nan, Se-chwen, and Sben-fi, enter'd that of Hu-quang; most of whose Cities open'd their Gates to the Conqueror, whilst the wretched Tu-tsong, drown'd in Pleasures, was stripp'd of his Dominions by Degrees without knowing any thing of the Matter (*).

Tu-tsong dy'd the eleventh Year of the Cycle, at the Age of twenty five, leaving three young Children, who were born to be the Sports of Fortune. Kong-tsong, his second Son, was placed on the tottering Throne.

(c) Here the Chinese Historians speak very confusedly. Matena, which, as we observ'd before, p. 46, seems to be the City of Medina, is in this place supposed to be a Country lying between Samarkand and China.

(d) This seems to be Darbend in the Province of Shirvan in Persia, call'd by the Turks (whose Language is the same originally with that of the Mongols) Demir kapı, or Iron Gate.

(e) When their Refusal of Peace was told the Emperor of Kin, "To Day, said he, the Western Tartar will take my Empire from me; to Morrow he will take yours from you (1)," meaning Ning-tsong; which accordingly came to pass.

KONG-TSONG, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

THE Empress, who govern'd the Empire for her Son, who was but an Infant, sent Ambassadors to the Tartar King, to demand Peace, offering to submit to the most hard and abject Terms; but (n) that inexorable Monarch answer'd, "Your Family owes its Rise to the Infancy of the last Prince of the preceding Dynasty; It is therefore but just that the remaining Princes of the Family of Song, who are Infants also, should give Place to another Family."

Mean time Pe-yen advanced with a numerous Army of Tartars, subduing all before him. This General is highly praised, both for his Prudence in conducting two hundred thousand Men with as much Ease as a single Soldier; and for his Modesty, which was so extraordinary, that in the midst of all his Victories he never dropt the least Word in his own Praise. The thirteenth Year of the Cycle he took the Emperor Prisoner, who dy'd in the Desert of Tartary, nam'd Ko-bi, or [as the Chinese call it] Sba-mo; and was succeeded by his eldest Brother Twan-tsong, in his Misfortunes as well as his Throne.

TWAN-TSONG, Seventeenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

Twan-tsong,

17th Emp.

THE victorious March of the Tartars, who met with no Resistance, obliged the Emperor to go on Board his Fleet, with the Lords of his Court, and one hundred and thirty thousand Soldiers, which remain'd with him, designing to have retired to the Province of Ho-kyen; but being closely pursued by the Tartars, both by Sea and Land, he was oblig'd to fly to the Coast of Quang-tong, the most Southern Province of China, where he dy'd of a Disease, aged eleven Years. His younger Brother Ti-ping, the only Remains of the Family of Song, succeeded him.

TI-PING, Eighteenth Emperor, reign'd Two Years.

THE Chinese Fleet, being overtaken by that of the Tartars, could not avoid an Engagement, which was very bloody, and decisive in Favour of the Tartars, who gain'd a complete Victory. The Ko-lau, Lo-syeu-se, to whose Care the Emperor had been intrusted, seeing his Ship surrounded by the Tartarian Vessels, took the young Prince, who was but eight Years of Age, in his Arms, and threw himself into the Sea. The rest of the Lords and Ministers follow'd his Example. The Empress, quite distracted, with dreadful Shrieks threw herself also in. This terrible Catastrophe happen'd near an Island dependant on Quang-chew-fu, Capital of the Province of Quang-tong. Another General, who commanded a part of the Chinese Fleet, having forced his Way thro' the Enemy, and escaped their Fury with some of his Vessels, endeavour'd to make to Shore, but was driven off by a strong Wind, which blew from the Land; and a violent Storm arising at the same time, he was sunk at once with all his Followers. It is affirm'd that above one hundred thousand Chinese perish'd in this Fight, either by the Sword or the Water, into which the greater part threw themselves in Despair.

Thus ended the Dynasty of the Song, and with it the Dominion of the Chinese; for Shi-tsu, before call'd Ho-pi-lye, (the fourth Son of Tay-tsu, [or Jengbi-z Khán] who founded the Empire of the Western Tartars,) took Possession of his Conquest, and was the First Emperor of this new Dynasty.

THE Chinese Nation, which for so many Ages had been govern'd by its Natural Princes, now first became subject to a Foreign Power; if indeed this Emperor ought to be call'd a Foreigner, who in his Manners was more of a Chinese than a Tartar. At his coming to the Crown, he made no Alteration, either in the Ministry or in the Laws and Customs; he was so conformable to the Humour of his Subjects, and won them so much by his sincere Conduct, by his Equity, by the Protection he gave to Men of Letters, and by his tender Affection

(n) P. Couplet reports this as spoken by the famous Pe-yen, the Tartar General above mention'd. (i)

(1) Shi-tsu, or Ho-pi-lye, that is Koplay or Kublay Khán, was the fifth Mongol or Mogol Emperor, who reign'd in Katay, which included the Northern Provinces of China; but the first who made a Conquest of the whole. It is to be wish'd the Missionary, who made this Extract, had given us the Mongol Names of the Successors of Koplay in China, to compare with those of his Successors in Tartary, as given us by the Oriental Authors.

Affection for the People, that, even at present, the Administration of this Tartar Family is call'd The wise Government.

He first establish'd his Court at Tay-yuen-fu, Capital of the Province of Shan-shi, and afterwards remov'd it to Pe-king (*). He caus'd it to be publish'd that all Persons should continue in the Employments and Dignities which they possess'd in the preceding Reign; but many refused that Bounty, and prefer'd a voluntary Death to an Honourable Servitude. Among the rest was a Ko-lau, named Ven-tyen-syan, who had been taken Prisoner in the Sea-Bight; in vain was he told, that there were no Hopes of restoring the Family of Song, which was extinct; that a wise Man ought to comply with the Times, especially when there was no Remedy; that the Emperor knew his Merit, and that he might be assur'd of his Esteem and Confidence. "A faithful Minister, reply'd he, is attach'd to his Prince as a Son to his Father; if his Father is sick he employs all sorts of Remedies to cure him; if the Strength of the Disease prevails over the Remedy, yet he does not cease to continue his Endeavours to give him Ease, because he ought never to cease discharging the Duties of Filial Piety, and is withal sensible that Heaven is the Sovereign Arbitrer of Life and Death." This was all the Answer they could get from his invincible Obstinacy.

After his Death these two Sentences were found written by himself on his Girdle; the first is from Confucius, "Let the Body perish, provided Filial Piety is brought to Perfection." The other from Mencius, "The Loss of Life is a Trifle, when in the support of Justice." This Ko-lau dy'd, being forty seven Years of Age, greatly lamented.

The Emperor, in the third Year of his Reign, form'd a Design against Japan, and sent one hundred thousand Men to invade it. But the Expedition prov'd very unfortunate; not above three or four Persons returning home with the News; all the rest were either shipwreck'd, or perish'd in the neighbouring Islands.

The same Year he caus'd all the Books of the Sect of Tau to be burnt; and ordain'd that there should be but one Kalendar for the whole Empire, which should be made at Court, and publish'd every Year: forbidding all private Persons under pain of Death to undertake any Work of this kind. Four Years after, his only Son, whom he had nam'd his Heir, dy'd, and tho' he left Children, yet the Emperor was inconsolable for his Loss. Some Mohammedans having offer'd the Emperor a precious Stone of great Value, he forbid it to be bought, "Because, said he, the Money that it would cost, might be much more usefully employ'd, in relieving the Necessities of the Poor."

Being inform'd, that the Barks which brought to Court the Tribute of the Southern Provinces, or carry'd on the Trade of the Empire, were oblig'd to come by Sea, and often suffer'd Shipwreck; he caus'd the Great Canal to be made, which is at present one of the Wonders of China. It is three hundred Leagues in Length, and forms a great Road of Water; by which above nine thousand Imperial Barks transport with Ease, and at a small Expence, the Tribute of Grain, Stuffs, &c. which is annually paid to the Emperor.

Had this been the only Advantage this Prince procur'd for China, he would have been worthy of the high Praises which the Chinese give him (x). He dy'd at the Age of eighty, and in the thirty first Year of the Cycle, succeeded by his Grandson Ching-tsung.

CHING-TSONG, Second Emperor, reign'd Thirteen Years.

THIS Prince is praised for his Clemency and Love to his Subjects. He mitigated the Severity of Punishments, and lessen'd the Taxes with which several of the Petty Sovereigns began to burthen the People; but his ill State of Health, and almost continual Disorders, hinder'd his applying himself as diligently as he inclin'd to the Affairs of Government.

He dy'd at the Age of forty two, in the forty fourth Year of the Cycle, and Vu-tsung his Nephew succeeded him.

VU-TSONG, Third Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

THE People thought the Reign of this Emperor too short, being charm'd with the Affection he bore them, and the great Inclination he shew'd to make them happy. He was naturally liberal, but bestow'd his Bounties only on those who did some real Service to the State, on which Occasions he rewarded them with a Generosity truly Royal.

To give a Lustre to Learning, and excite Emulation among the Literati, he gave to Confucius, who is look'd on as the Master of the Empire, the same Titles with which the Regulo's

(*) This City is call'd Kambalu, instead of Hampalu, by Marco Polo; for in the Tartar Language Ham signifies King, and Pala a Court or Seat of the Emperor. It is easy for a Stranger to mistake the Pronunciation of Words, which is not readily attained, and hence it is that Author has vary'd the Names of several other Chinese Cities. (But this Etymology may be question'd, for not Ham but Han, or perhaps rather Khan signifies King in the Mongol Language, which is originally the same with the Turkish; so possibly Pala is a Mistake for Balik or Baluk, which in the same Language signifies a City.)

(x) We are told by another Jesuit Missionary, who has given us a very curious Abstract from the Chinese History of the five first Mongol Emperors, (which I have prepared for the Press, with Notes,) that the Chinese Historians exaggerate the Faults of Hu-shi-hsi, but say nothing of his Virtues. They reproach him particularly for his Fondness for the Superstitions of the Lama's. (1)

He publish'd an Edict, forbidding all the Princes and Petty Sovereigns to hunt, from the fifth Month of the Year to the tenth, for fear of doing Damage to the Country. He used to say that the Mohammedans were extremely fond of Jewels; but that he set a much greater Value on wise Men, and that he always endeavour'd to have them near his Person; for in short said he, if by their Advice I can procure my People Tranquillity, and the Conveniencies of Life, what Riches can be comparable to this Happiness?

Being inform'd that five Brethren were guilty of Crimes, for which they were condemn'd to die, "Let one at least be pardoned, said the Emperor, that their unfortunate Parents may have somebody to feed and comfort them." In the time of a great Drought, when the Harvest was in Danger of being destroyed for want of Rain, 'Tis I, cry'd he sighing, 'tis I who bring this Calamity upon my People: and repeating often these Words, he offered Incense, and implor'd the Assistance of Heaven; and it was observ'd that next Day abundance of Rain fell, which revived the parch'd and languishing Fields.

This Prince died the fifty seventh Year of the Cycle, aged thirty six, and was succeeded by his Son Ing-tsong.

AS all the Virtues of the Father were possessed by the Son, his Subjects expected the Continuation of their happy Government, when he was assassinated, (in the last Year of the Cycle, as he was entering his Tent with one of his most faithful Ko-lau's,) by some wicked Villains; who were conscious of having committed the most enormous Crimes, and dreaded the Punishment they deserved.

This Prince lived but thirty Years, and had for his Successor Tay-ting, eldest Son of King Hyen-tsung.

A Month after Tay-ting ascended the Throne he condemned the Murderers of his Predecessor to the most tormenting Death; and extirpated their Families, by executing their Children and Grand-Children.

In this Reign, as in the former, China was afflicted with various Calamities, as Earthquakes, falling of Mountains, overflowing of Rivers, Droughts, Conflagrations, and many other Misfortunes; on which Occasion both Emperors gave Proofs of their Love for their Subjects, by the Care they took to succour them.

Tay-ting ordered that the Entrance into his Dominions should be denied to the Bonzas of Tibet, called Lamas; who used to come in Swarms to China, and wandering from House to House were very burdensome to the People.

This Prince dying the fifth Year of the Cycle, aged thirty six Years, the States assembled and elected his second Son; but he refused to accept a Crown, which he said belonged of Right to his eldest Brother Ming-tsong, who thereupon was sent for out of Tartary where he then was, and proclaimed Emperor.

THIS Prince seemed to deserve the Crown by shewing so much Indifferency for it; and indeed the Care he took to choose good Ministers, and his readiness to follow their Counsels, are worthy of Praise. He is blamed only for one thing, and that is, for receiving the Great Lama, who is chief of the Bonzas of Tibet, into his Palace, with the most distinguishing Honours, and commanding his Courtiers to pay him the profoundest Respect.

The Great Lords were seen to salute this Bonza on their Knees, and present him Wine in this humble Posture; whilst he did not offer in the least to stir from his Seat, nor shew any Token of Civility. Whereupon one of the principal Courtiers being extremely piqu'd at this Haughtiness, "Honest Man (says he) I know that you are the Disciple of Fo, and Master of the Bonzas; but perhaps you are ignorant that I am a Disciple of Confucius, and one of the chief among the Literati in the Empire; it's fit you should be acquainted with it, therefore let us lay aside all Ceremony". And at the same time standing up he offered him the Cup, when the great Lama rising from his Seat, took it with a Smile and drank it.

Ven-tsong died the ninth Year of the Cycle, aged twenty nine Years; and Ning-tsong, who was the Son of the seventh Emperor succeeded him. But as he lived only two Months, he is not reckoned among the Emperors: His eldest Brother Shun-ti, was fetch'd from the Province of Syang-fi, and placed on the Throne, being thirteen Years old.

SHUN-TI, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Thirty five Years.

SHUN-TI was the last of this Tartar Dynasty who govern'd China. These Princes, enervated by the Pleasures of so fine and fruitful a Climate, by degrees degenerated from the Courage and Bravery of their Ancestors; while the Chinese whom they subdued, growing a war-like People, deprived them of the Fruits of their Conquest, and drove them for ever out of the Empire.

Shun-ti, tho' a Prince of great Parts, drew on himself this Disgrace by his effeminate Indolence and love of Pleasure, which made him wholly neglect the Affairs of the State; leaving the Government to his Ko-lau, Pe-yew-ha-ma, who was become absolute Master, and had all Favours at his Disposal.

To complete his Misfortunes he sent for the Lama's of Tartary, who introduced Idolatry and Magic; and as they study'd only to indulge his vicious Inclinations, they settled in the Palace a Company of young Female Dancers, who intirely enervated the little Courage that remained in him.

In the twenty third Year of the Cycle, a Chinese named Chü; who had been a Servant in a Monastery of Bonzas, taking Part with a numerous Company of Revolters, became their Leader, and made a surprizing Advantage of the present Juncture of Affairs; for after seizing by degrees several Cities, he made himself Master of some Provinces, and in a celebrated Battle defeated the Emperor's Troops sent to oppose his victorious March. These great Successes soon encreas'd his Army, and the Chinese flocking to him from all Parts, Chü having cross'd the Yellow River, and finding no Resistance, easily got Possession of all the Cities in his way; when at length meeting the Imperial Army, he immediately fought and cut it to Pieces. The Emperor, who had nothing to do but to fly, retired towards the North, where he died two Years after; and with him ended the Tartar Family of Ywen, which was succeeded by the Dynasty of the Ming, founded by Chü, who was called before Hong-vü, and afterwards took the Name of Tay-tsu.

- I. That those who possessed Sovereignities should not extend their Power beyond their respective Territories, nor meddle with publick Affairs.
- II. That the Eunuchs should not enjoy any Employments civil or military.
- III. That Women should never be suffered to become Bonzesses, nor Men to put themselves into a Monastery in order to commence Bonzas before the Age of forty Years.
- IV. That the ancient and modern Laws should be reduced into a Body of three hundred Volumes. It was a whole Age before this Work appeared.
- V. That the twenty seven Months of Mourning for the Death of Parents should be reduced to twenty seven Days.

His Court was soon crouded with Ambassadors from all Parts, who came to congratulate him on his Accession to the Crown. Among other Presents made him, one was a Lyon, which was the first that the Chinese had ever seen. Korea, Japan, the Island of Formosa, the Kingdom of Siam, and the Southern Isles distinguished themselves by celebrated Embassies.

The Joy which reigned at the Court of this Prince was very much allay'd by the Death of the Emperor's Wife, named Ma; who ascended the Throne with him, and whom he highly esteemed, openly declaring that he ow'd the Crown to her wife Counsels. His Grief for the Loss of her was so great, that he could never think of creating another Empress.

Some of his Sayings.

As it was one of his chief Cares to encourage Learning, he granted extraordinary Privileges to the Imperial College, and us'd to be present himself at the Examinations for attaining the Degree of Doctor. However he would not suffer Confucius to be honoured like a King, as some of his Predecessors had done, but only in quality of Syen-tse, that is, Master of the Empire.

Among the various Sayings reported of this Prince, there are two which were very familiar to him: "When there are any Commotions and Disturbances in the Empire, said he, never act precipitately." And again, "If every thing is quiet, beware of treating your People with too much Severity, and of insisting upon Niceties." He used to say also, "That as Heaven and Earth produce all things necessary for the Support of Men, so a wise Emperor should only study how to provide for the Want of his People; and tho' with this View he should lessen the Taxes, and moderate publick Expences, yet he ought always to fear his Subjects might want Necessaries".

Mourns in a time of Drought. Fine Lesson to his eldest Son.

In a time of great Drought he put on Mourning, and going up a high Mountain, staid there three Days, to implore the Clemency of Heaven; and the abundance of Rain which ensued, was deemed the Effect of his Prayers.

When he visited the Provinces of the Empire, accompanied by his eldest Son, one Day he stopp'd his Chariot in the midst of the Fields, and turning to him, said, "I took you with me, that you might be an Eye-Witness of the Sweat and Labour of the poor Husbandmen; and that the Compassion which so toilsome a Condition must excite in your Heart, might hinder you from overloading them with Taxes." The unexpected Death of this Son, which happen'd soon after, overwhelm'd the Emperor with Grief; he mourn'd for three Years, contrary to the Custom, [rather to his own Law] and named his Grandson Heir to the Throne.

Great Instance of filial Piety and conjugal Fidelity.

A young Man named Sui, travelling with his Father and his Wife, fell unfortunately into the Hands of Robbers; who going to murder the good old Man, his Son step'd between, and beseeched them with Tears to kill him instead of his Father. As they offer'd Violence to his Wife, Can you be guilty, says she, of such an infamous Action while my Husband is living? Whereupon they took and threw the young Man into a great Fire that was hard by; but the Wife cast herself instantly into the Flames, and closely embracing her Husband they were both burnt to Ashes. To preserve the Memory of their Piety and Fidelity, the Emperor caused a fine Monument to be erected in their Honour; but at the same time he severely punished another young Man, who had sacrificed his Son to an Idol, in hopes of recovering the Health of his dying Mother.

This Prince dyed the fifteenth Year of the Cycle, aged seventy one, and his Grandson Kyen-ven-ti, who was but thirteen Years old, succeeded him.

KYEN-VEN-TI, Second Emperor, reign'd Four Years.

Kyen-ven-ti, 2d Emperor.

THIS Prince, tho' so young, began his Reign with an Action of Clemency, for which he had the Blessing of his Subjects, by remitting the third Part of the Imposts; and gave other Marks of his good Nature, and Compassion for the Unfortunate, which promised one of the most happy Reigns. But it was disturbed from the Beginning by the ambitious Pretensions of his Uncles, who were the late Emperor's Sons, and could not bear to see a Child prefer'd to so many Princes of riper Years, and capable of governing by themselves. They attributed their Father's Choice to the secret Management of the Ko-lau's, whose Intrigues they had partly discovered. Yong-lo, King of Pe-king, (the fourth Son of Tay-tsu), appeared the most incensed, and took up Arms Opposed by his Uncle Yong-lo.

Arms to punish the Authors of this Injustice, as he called it. The Court having sent a great Army to oppose his Designs, a Battle ensued, which was long and bloody, and produced Officers of Peace; but Yong-lo would hearken to no Accommodation, unless the Emperor's Ministers were first delivered to him. Which being refused, he continued his March to the Imperial City, the Gates of which being open'd to him by a Traytor, named Li-king-long, a great Slaughter was made in the Town, and the Imperial Palace reduced to Ashes. The Body of the young Emperor, half consumed by the Flames, being brought before the Conqueror, he could not refrain from Tears at the Sight, and gave Orders for his Obsequies suitable to his Dignity. But the Conqueror's Fury fell chiefly on the Ministers, Numbers of whom were put to cruel Deaths; many prevented the Torments to which they were doomed by killing themselves, while others shaved their Heads, and escaped his Vengeance in the Habit of Bonzas.

Thus perished the Emperor in the seventeenth Year of his Age, the fourth of his Reign, and the twentieth of the Cycle. When Yong-lo, who took the Name of Ching-tsu, seized on his Nephew's Throne and Yong-lo succeeds.

CHING-TSU, or YONG-LO, Third Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

THIS Prince was endued with a great Soul and uncommon Wisdom; but he made himself dreaded at first by the cruel Examples he gave of his Severity. He restored his Brothers to their Dignities, and continued them in Possession of their Revenues; rewarding with the same Liberality all those who had assisted him to ascend the Throne, except the Traitor Li-king-long.

This Miscreant committed a fresh Crime, and being condemned to die, insolently reproach'd Ching-tsu with Ingratitude to the Man to whom he owed his Crown: "Would you be now reigning, says he, if I had not opened you the Gates of the City? Traitor, reply'd the Emperor, I owe the Crown to my own good Fortune, and not to your Treachery: Would not you have opened the Gates to any other Person who had appeared with the same Forces?"

A great Number of young Men having been consecrated Bonzas before the Age of forty, against the Law made by his Father, he obliged them all to quit their Monasteries; and burn'd all the Books of Chemistry which treated of the pretended Art to become immortal.

The seventh Year of his Reign he removed his Court to Pe-king from Nan-king, where he left his Son and Heir with several Tribunals and Mandarins, like those established at Pe-king. One Day some precious Stones, which were found in a Mine discovered in the Province of Sban-si, having been presented to him, he gave immediate Orders to shut the Mine: Because he would not, he said, fatigue his People with a fruitless Toil, in regard those Stones, however valuable they might be thought, could neither feed nor cloath his People in a time of Scarcity. He caused five Bells of Brass to be cast, each of which weighed 120,000 Pounds.

The thirtieth Year of the Cycle he appointed forty two Doctors of the Court, called Han-lin, to explain more fully the ancient Classical Books, and therein confine themselves to the Opinions of the two Authors, named Ching-tse and Chu-tse; who had interpreted them in their own Way about three hundred Years before, under the Dynasty of the Song. These Doctors composed another Work, intitled, Sing-li-ta-tseuen, which signifies Natural Philosophy; wherein, seeming not to deviate from the ancient Doctrine, they endeavour to reconcile it with the Fictions of an empty System, which intirely overthrow it.

As this Work was printed by the Emperor's Authority, and the Authors held a considerable Rank in the State; as there are also some who are fond of every thing that has the Air of Novelty, it is not surprising that some of the Literati have embraced a Doctrine, whose Principles are as inconsistent with Reason as dangerous to Morality.

JIN-TSONG, Fourth Emperor, reign'd a few Months.

AT his coming to the Crown he gave a signal Instance of his great Affection for his Subjects; for the Province of Sban-tong being afflicted with a general Famine he resolved to send thither the Ko-lau, Yang-tse-kye. But the Ko-lau representing that it would be proper to consult the Tribunals about the Means of relieving such numbers of People, "Let me not have so many Consultations, reply'd the Emperor; when my People are distressed, we must fly to their Succour with as much Speed and Readiness, as if it was to extinguish a Fire, or stop a sudden Inundation." Some others remonstrating, That a Distinction ought to be made between those who stood more or less in need of Assistance: "With all my Heart, reply'd the Prince, but let them be very careful not to be too nice in their Scrutiny, nor be afraid of exceeding my Intentions by being too liberal."

He gave much Credit to Astrology; having spent a whole Night observing the Stars, and perceiving some Change in the Heavens, he sent for two of his Ko-lau's, to whom he said: "My Life is at an End. You have been Witnesses of all I have suffer'd from my Enemies during the Speaking these Words, he gave each of them a Seal, on which were engraven these two Characters, Chong-ehing, which signifies Faithful and upright Minister; they received this Mark of Distinction, with Tears in their Eyes, and ever after sealed their Dispatches with this Seal. From that time the Emperor languish'd continually, and a Courier was dispatch'd in haste to his Son Swen-tsong, who kept his Court at Nan-king, with an Account of it; but he had not the Comfort to hear the last Words of his Father, who dy'd before his Arrival. This Prince dy'd at the Age of forty eight, in the forty second Year of the Cycle. This Year is reckon'd to the Reign of his Son, contrary to the Custom of China, which includes that of the Emperor's Death in the Years of his Reign.

SWEN-TSONG, Fifth Emperor, reign'd Ten Years.

Swen-tsong,
5th Emperor,
Defeats the Tartars who invade the Empire.

SWEN-TSONG publish'd an Edict in the beginning of his Reign, forbidding to confer the Degree of Licentiate on any of the Literati, who had not attained the Age of twenty five Years. Soon after, his Uncle revolted, and being taken Prisoner in an Engagement, he condemn'd him to perpetual Imprisonment. The Tartars were also punish'd for invading the Empire; for Swen-tsong at the Head of his Army gave them Battle, and intirely defeated them. The King of Cochin-china, who had been nominated by the Emperor, being slain three Years after by a Company of Rebels, they immediately sent Embassadors to beg Pardon, and to implore the Emperor's Clemency. The Emperor was inclinable enough to punish this Treason; but since it would have oblig'd him to send an Army into a distant Country, which could not be done without great Inconveniency to his Subjects, he alter'd his Resolution, and even sent back the Ambassadors with Titles of Honour.

The Palace
burnt.

About this time the Palace took Fire, which continued several Days; whereby a prodigious Quantity of Copper, Gold and Pewter being melted together, form'd a Mass of mixt Metal, of which a great Number of Vessels were made, that are still much esteem'd in China, and bear a very great Price. (A)

In the mean time the Tartars, taking Advantage of the Emperor's Youth, made continual Irruptions into the Provinces of China which lay nearest their Country, and committed all sorts of Rapine; against whom the young Emperor in the sixth Year of the Cycle, and fourteenth of his Reign, march'd beyond the Great Wall, at the Head of a numerous Army. But his Troops being weaken'd by want of Provisions, and unable to stand the Shock of the Enemy were intirely defeated; the Emperor himself being taken Prisoner, and carry'd into the remotest Part of Tartary. This News putting the Court in a Consternation, they placed his Son, an Infant of two Years old, on the Throne, under the Guardianship of King-ti (the eldest Brother of the Captive Emperor) who soon usurp'd the Imperial Title and Authority.

Mean while the Empress sending a great Quantity of Gold, Silver, and Silks for the Emperor's Ransom, the Tartar King received the Presents, and conducted his Prisoner to the Borders of China, as if he intended to release him; but there reflecting that the Ransom was too small for so great a Prince, he in a few Days carry'd him back into Tartary.

King-ti, 7th
Emperor.
Ing-tsong is renounces the Empire.

THE seventh Year of the Cycle, King-ti took Possession of his Brother's Throne; nevertheless, a new Agreement being made for the Release of the captive Prince, some of the Grandees were sent to receive him. But the Tartar thought they were not of a Rank considerable enough to accompany so mighty an Emperor, and that all the Chief Men of the Empire ought to have come out to meet him with the greatest Pomp. He was conducted by a numerous Retinue to the Frontiers of China, near the Mountain Tang-kye-lin; from which Place he wrote to acquaint the Court that he renounc'd the Empire, intending to pass the rest of his Days in an easy Solitude, and that therefore no Preparation should be made for his Reception; moreover, to avoid all Ceremony he entred the City by a private Gate. The two Brothers met, and and after they had tenderly embraced each other with Tears in their Eyes, King-ti, follow'd by all his Courtiers, conducted his Brother to the South Palace, which he had chosen for his Retirement.

King-ti therefore continuing to govern, intended also to declare his Son Heir to the Empire, and had fix'd the Birth-Day of the young Prince for that Ceremony. Mean time, conversing one Day with his Ko-lau, he said, "The Birth-Day of the Prince, my Heir, happens the second Day of the seventh Moon;" Give me Leave to tell you, (reply'd the Ko-lau) that it is the "first Day of the eleventh Moon." Intimating thereby the Birth Day of Ing-tsong, who was the lawful Emperor. These Words silenced King-ti, and there was no more Talk of declaring his Son Heir, who lived but a Year; and King-ti himself being seized with a mortal Distemper, Ing-tsong was brought out of the Southern Palace, and re-ascended the Throne a Year before the Death of King-ti.

Ing-tsong, 8th

HYEN-TSONG, Ninth Emperor, reign'd Twenty three Years.

HYEN-TSONG, who was the Son of the second Queen, ow'd the Crown to the Empress's being barren. All that is related of him is that he was greatly attach'd to the Sect of the Bonzas; that the twenty third Year of the Cycle he defeated an Army of Rebels in the Province of Hu-quang; that he cut in Pieces the Army of the Tartars, who from time to time came and plunder'd the Provinces; and that the next Year the King of Korea having proposed a more short and easy Way of paying his Homage, than by an Embassy, he would never consent to it.

He dy'd at the Age of forty one Years, the forty fourth of the Cycle, and was succeeded by his eldest Son, Hyau-tsong, who was before call'd Hong-chi.

Hyen-tsong,
9th Emperor, added to the Bonzas.

HYAU-TSONG, or HONG-CHI, Tenth Emperor, reign'd Eighteen Years.

IN the fifth Year of his Reign Hyau-tsong declar'd the Prince, whom he had chosen Heir to the Crown, with great Solemnity. He is blam'd for his Attachment to the ridiculous Superstitions of the Bonzas, his Infatuation for Chemistry, and for the Love of Flattery. The fifty second Year of the Cycle, the most considerable among the Bonzas, having been the Ring-Leader of a Rebellion, was taken Prisoner in an Engagement, brought to Court, and beheaded, notwithstanding his Function.

China was afflicted in his Reign with many Calamities; the Famine was so great in the Western Provinces, that Fathers were known to eat their own Children. The Plague, which is an Evil scarce heard of in China, laid waste the Eastern part of the Southern Provinces; and there happen'd such terrible Earthquakes, that several thousands of People were buried alive.

The first Year of this Cycle was remarkable for the Grief caused by the Death of the Empress, for the Irruptions of the Tartars, and the great Booty they carry'd away. The next Year was still more remarkable for the Death of the Emperor himself, who was succeeded by his Son Vu-tsong.

Several Forces were sent against them, which only put a stop to their Attempts, and stifled their Rebellion for a Time, for it appear'd again upon the first favourable Opportunity.

The fifteenth Year of the Cycle Vu-tsung having form'd a Design of marching against the Tartars incognito, in Quality of Generalissimo; his Ministers earnestly represented to him, that such a Disguise could not but greatly endanger his Person, and occasion Revolts. These Remonstrances so enrag'd him, that he drew his Sword to strike those who oppos'd his Resolution; at the same Instant, one of his Ko-lau's offer'd his Head to receive the Stroke, which resolute Behaviour appeas'd the Prince's Fury, and made him change his Design.

The next Yearas, he was preparing to retire into the Southern Provinces, that is, either Kyang-nan, or Che-kyang, his Ko-lau's presented fresh Memorials; wherein they observ'd, that as the Tartars would certainly look upon this Journey as a shameful Flight, they would grow more haughty and insolent, and that his Absence would expose the Northern Provinces to their Irruptions. These prudent Counsels only incens'd him the more; and to punish their Rashness, he left them exposed to the Weather five whole Days, on their Knees, before the Gate of his Palace, and imprison'd some of them. But a sudden Inundation at this time, which he took for a bad Omen, having appeas'd him, he sent home his Ministers, and laid aside all Thoughts of going into the Provinces of the South. This Prince finding himself very ill the eighteenth Year of the Cycle, sent for the Grandees of his Court; and in their Presence appointed the Empress Guardian of his second Son, who was thirteen Years old, and whom he had nominated his Successor. He dy'd at the Age of thirty one Years.

SHI-TSONG, or KYA-TSING, Twelfth Emperor, reign'd Forty five Years.

THE Conduct of this Prince at first seem'd to promise a wise Government; but the End was not suitable to such hopeful Beginnings. He examin'd himself the Petitions which were presented to him; and in a time of Scarcity, was willing to be told of the Failings he was subject to, and gave large Sums out of the Imperial Treasury for Relief of his People. He repair'd the Great Wall, which separates China from Tartary; and renew'd the Law, made by the Founder of this Dynasty, that only the Title of Syen-tse, or Master of the Empire, should be given to Confucius. Two young Maids, who perceived that their Father's Indigence inclin'd him to sell them for Prostitutes, having, to escape that Disgrace, drown'd themselves, Shi-tsung erected a fine Monument to their Memory, with this Inscription: The two illustrious Virgins.

This Prince is blam'd for his Passion for Poetry; for his Credulity in believing the Superstitions of the Bonzas; and for the diligent Search which he caus'd to be made thro' the Empire for the Liquor of Immortality, promised by the Sect of Tau.

The eighteenth Year of his Reign he had thoughts of resigning the Crown to his Son, but was dissuaded by the Grandees of the Court; who in several Memorials press'd him, but in vain, to extirpate the Sect of Fo and Lau-kyun.

The forty seventh Year of the Cycle the Tartars drew near Pe-king with an Army of sixty thousand Men; but it was intirely cut to pieces by the Chinese, and above two hundred Officers taken Prisoners. The next Year the Tartar King sent an Ambassador to the Court, to ask the Emperor Pardon, with Leave for his Subjects to come into his Dominions to sell Horses. The Emperor readily consented; but finding afterwards that this Permission was the Ground of continual Quarrels between the Mandarins and the Merchants, and often occasion'd Revolts, he absolutely prohibited this Trade. (*)

The fiftieth Year of the Cycle some Pirates, commanded by one Whang-che, infested the Coast of China with a Fleet of a Hundred Barks and Chinese Vessels of Burden. And in the fifty second Year the Japanese, who before us'd to bring Presents as Vassals of the Empire, began to shake off the Yoke, waged open War with the Chinese, and made a Descent, to the Number of four thousand, upon the Coast of the Province of Che-kyang. But they were received so very roughly, that eighteen hundred of them were kill'd, and the rest, flying to their Ships, perish'd in the Sea. The next Year returning ten thousand strong, Kau-ling, a Chinese Captain, at the Head only of nine hundred Men, gave them a notable Repulse; by which, Time being gained for the Army to come to his Assistance, the Japanese were furrounded, and not a Man escap'd to carry home the News of their Defeat. These Losses did not abate the Eagerness of the Japanese, who some Years after made a Descent with fresh Forces on the Coast of Fo-kyen, but with small Success; for the Chinese Commander, nam'd Tsyé, fell upon them unexpectedly, and made a great Slaughter.

(*) In the 49th Year of the Cycle, and 31st of this Reign, in the Year of Christ 1552, dy'd St. Francis Xavier, Apostle of the East, the 2d of December, in the Island Shang-chuen-shan, commonly call'd Sanjian, aged 46.] See Vol. II. p. 4.

At the same time, Lyew-ban, General of the Chinese Army, marching beyond the Great Wall; the Tartars, upon the Report of his Arrival in their Territories, fled, and hid themselves in their Forests: so that there were but twenty eight Tartars kill'd in this Expedition, and the whole Booty was only one hundred and seventy Camels.

The third Year of this Cycle, a Memorial was presented to the Emperor, in which he was counsell'd to be more watchful over his Conduct, and the Public Affairs. It represented that for above twenty Years past the Laws had insensibly lost their Authority, and that the Empire was going to Ruin; that he seldom conversed with the Prince his Heir; that his most faithful and honest Vassals were either despised or ill used without Cause, and on the slightest Suspicions; that he spent his Time in Pleasure and Idleness, amidst a Company of Concubines, despising the Empress, his lawful Spouse; that he gave the Command of his Army to Men who were unskill'd in the Art of War, and fonder of Gold and Silver than of Honour and Glory; that the Treasury was daily exhausted by his ridiculous Expences, either in building Palaces, or making Gardens, or in defraying the Charges of the extravagant Ceremonies of the Bonzas, and seeking after the Liquor of Immortality, which those Impostors pretended came down from Heaven: as if, since the happy Times of the Emperors Tau and Shun, any Person whatever had been exempted from the fatal Necessity of dying. The Emperor, on reading this Memorial, unable to restrain his Rage, threw it on the Ground; but soon took it up again, and discover'd Signs of a sincere Repentance. However, he had not time to reap the Benefit of it, for a few Days after he fell sick; and had no sooner drank the pretended Liquor of Immortality, but he expir'd, at the Age of fifty eight, and was succeeded by his Son, nam'd Mo-tsong.

MO-TSONG, Thirteenth Emperor, reign'd Six Years.

MO-TSONG began his Reign with Acts of Clemency, releasing those whom his Father had imprison'd upon slight Grounds; and conferring Titles of Honour on others, who had been put to Death, by way of Consolation to their Families. For the rest, he could never bear the Advice of his Ministers; and some of them having taken this Liberty, were degraded to an inferior Rank.

As the Laws of China forbid that any Person should possess an Employment in the Magistracy of his native Province, the Emperor qualify'd this Law; and at the request of a Ko-lau permitted the inferior Mandarins, such as the Officers who have Inspection over Literature, and over those who collect the Taxes, to enjoy these Employments in their native Country.

The ninth Year of the Cycle this Prince falling sick, declar'd his Son, who was but ten Years old, Heir to the Crown; putting him under the Tuition of the Empress, and of Chang-kyu-ching, a Ko-lau. This Prince was named Van-lye, but from his Accession to the Throne he was call'd Shin-tsong.

SHIN-TSONG, or VAN-LYE, Fourteenth Emperor, reign'd Forty eight Years.

TH<sup>O</sup> Shin-tsong was but ten Years old, there appeared in all his Actions a Prudence, much above his Years. He paid so much Respect to his Tutor and Master Chang-kyu-ching, that every time he came to give him a Lesson, if it was in the Summer, he order'd a Servant to fan him, and in the Winter he caus'd a double Carpet to be spread upon the Floor; he also visited him when he was sick, and gave him Broths and Medicines with his own Hands. This Ko-lau had a Son, who, in the Examination for the Doctor's Degree, had obtained the first Rank of the second Order, and the Emperor his Master rais'd him to the second Rank of the first Order. This excellent Disposition was supported by a great Stock of Uprightness and of Justice; he had withal a lively and penetrating Genius, and a strong Inclination to make himself Master of the Chinese Sciences. He ordain'd that for the future the Emperor should defray the Expences of the Licentiates, in their Journey from any of the fifteen Provinces to the Imperial City, when they came to pass their Examinations for the Degree of Doctor, at which he assisted himself. Every Day, at four in the Morning, he examined and answer'd the Petitions presented the Day before; and order'd a Book to be printed every three Months, for the Convenience of the Publick, containing the Names, Rank, Degree, and Country of every Mandarin in the Empire: which Custom still continues.

The eleventh Year of the Cycle, the Tartars, who had made an Irruption into Lyau-tong, were entirely routed. The Emperor, at his Mother's request, who had a great Affection for Images, intended to grant a general Amnesty, but was dissuaded from it by his Ko-lau; who represented, that the Hope of escaping Punishment would open the Door to all manner of Crimes, and that he ought to imitate the Lord of Heaven, who sooner or later never fails to punish wicked Villains.

The Emperor was marry'd the sixteenth Year of the Cycle, and immediately after created his Wife Empress. The nineteenth Year there was so great a Dearth in the Province of Shan-si, that numberless People dy'd of Hunger; so that sixty great Pits were dug in several Places, each of which held a thousand Bodies, and on this account were call'd Van jin keng. Woman seeing her Husband, who was famish'd to Death, thrown into one of these Pits, threw herself in also; and tho' she was taken out by Order of the Mandarin, it was to no Purpose, for not being able to survive her Loss, she dy'd three Days after.

This same Year was remarkable for two great Events; one was the Defeat of the Tartars, of whom ten thousand were slain by the Chinese General Li-chin; the other was the Loss which the Emperor had in the Death of Chang-kyu-ching, his Ko-lau and Master; whom he honour'd after his Death with the Title of Ven-chong, that is, A Man remarkable for Knowledge and Fidelity, and his Corps was carry'd in a pompous manner to his Sepulchre in the Province of Hanguang. But these Honours lasted not long, for two Years were scarce at an end, when his Enemies having laid heavy Accusations to his Charge, he and his Posterity were depriv'd of their Titles, and his Estate was confiscated; while his Son thro' Grief or Fear of Punishment kill'd himself.

The twentieth Year the Rivers were frozen, which facilitated the Irruptions of the Tartars into the Empire, who came in Swarms, but were cut to pieces by the Chinese Troops. || The twenty second Year was fatal to the Empire, on account of a terrible Famine, when the Emperor gave stronger Proofs than ever of his Affection for his Subjects; he often implored the Assistance of Heaven, remitted a great Part of the Taxes, and sent Mandarins into all the Provinces, to examine the Conduct of the Governors, and relieve the Miseries of the People. The twenty ninth Year of the Cycle a Comet appear'd towards the East; upon which Occasion a Ko-lau, named Pong-nzen, presented a Petition to the Emperor, setting forth that the Figure of this Meteor warn'd him to rid his Palace of certain Ministers, who took Bribes, and preserved their Employments by the basest Flattery. The Emperor being incensed at his Admonitions, order'd him to be imprison'd, and condemn'd him to Death; but his Son coming to offer his own Life to save his Father's, Shin-fong relented, and changed the Sentence to that of Banishment.

The thirtieth Year of the Cycle the Inhabitants of the Province of Ho-nan were reduced to such Extremity by Famine, that they fed on Human Flesh; upon which the Emperor immediately order'd Supplies to be sent them out of the Imperial Treasury. The same Year the Japanese enter'd the Kingdom of Korea, destroying all before them with Fire and Sword, wherever they came, and took several Cities. The King was forced to fly, till he had received the Succours from China, which he had demanded by his Ambassadors; but the Succours arriving very seasonably, there ensued an obstinate and bloody Battle, wherein the Japanese were intirely routed. After their Defeat they implor'd the Emperor's Clemency in a solemn Embassy; by which, having first begg'd Pardon for their Fault, they pray'd him to honour their Chief with a Title that might authorize his Claim: Accordingly the next Year Shin-fong granted him the Title of Je-pwen-vang (A), which signifies King of JAPAN, forbidding him to send any more Ambassadors to China.

The thirty third Year the Emperor, contrary to the Advice of his Ministers, ordered the Gold and Silver Mines in the Provinces of Ho-nan, Shan-si, and Shen-si to be open'd; but six Years after he caus'd them to be closed again. (*)

Mean time the Nyu-che, or Eastern Tartars, began to grow formidable; they were divided into seven Classes, or different Dynasties, which, after they had been long at War together, were united under one Prince, who erected a Kingdom. As to the Tan-yu, or the Western Tartars, they lived peaceably within their own Territories, having given over to disturb the Chinese, as they had formerly done by their frequent and unexpected Irruptions. (†)

The fifty third year the Tartars, whose Forces being united under one Chief were more capable of undertaking something considerable, no longer thought of making transient Irruptions into the Empire, but resolv'd to seize the Cities which were most for their Convenience; being incensed against the Chinese, because the Mandarins abused their Merchants trading into Lyau-tong, and had seized their King by Treachery and cut off his Head. Accordingly the Son of this Prince, named Tjen-ming, entering Lyau-tong with a strong Army, took the City of Kay-yuen; but at the same time wrote his Complaints to the Emperor, offering to restore the City and lay down his Arms, if his Majesty would give him a proper Satisfaction for such a cruel Injury. The Mandarins concern'd, to whom the Emperor communicated the Letter, slighted it, not deigning so much as to return an Answer; which Contempt so enraged the Tartar, that he vow'd to sacrifice 200,000 Chinese to his Father's Spirit. In Effect, at the Head of 50,000 Men he took the City of Lyau-yang, entered the Province of Pe-che-li in Triumph, and was even preparing to attack the Imperial City. But he was repuls'd by the Chinese Forces, and oblig'd to retire into Lyau-tong, where he haughtily assumed the Title of Emperor of China.

The fifty fifth Year of the Cycle, the Tartar King, under Pretence of a solemn Embassy, made his Troops file off towards the Empire. The Artifice being discovered, the Chinese Army march'd to oppose them; Upon which the Tartars fled, and by that Feint drawing the Chinese on, they furrounded and made a great Slaughter of them, the General himself being found among the Slain. Next Year the Emperor opposed the Tartars with very numerous Forces, supported by twelve thousand Auxiliaries, sent by the King of Korea. The Armies engaged, and Victory remain'd a long time doubtful, but declar'd at last for the Tartars, who advanc'd towards the Capital. Which caused such a Consternation that the Emperor would have abandon'd the City, and retired to the Southern Provinces, had not his Council represented to him that such a Retreat would dishonour him, and animate the Tartars, while it would sink the Spirit of his Subjects, and cause Troubles through the whole Empire.

Sbin-tsung dy'd during these Transactions, aged fifty eight Years, and was succeeded by his Son, nam'd Quang-tsung, who was before call'd Tay-chang.

QUANG-TSUNG, or TAY-CHANG, Fifteenth Emperor, reign'd but one Month.

THIS Prince dy'd a Month after his Accession to the Throne, aged thirty eight Years. His Death is attributed to the Neglect and Ignorance of his Physician; but before he dy'd he declared his eldest Son Hi-tsung, who was before nam'd Tyen-ki, Heir to his Crown.

HI-TSUNG, or TYEN-KI, Sixteenth Emperor, reign'd Seven Years.

THE natural Timidity of Hi-tsung, and his placing too great Confidence in the Eunuchs of the Palace, who were twelve thousand in Number, made every body fear at first that he would not oppose the Tartars vigorously enough; nevertheless he took Courage, and resolved to give them an effectual Check. He augmented his Army with a great number of new Troops, which he drew from all the Provinces; he sent magnificent Presents to the King of Korea, and demanded a greater Number of Auxiliaries, than had been sent to the Emperor his Grandfather; At the same time there arriv'd a Chinese Amazon; which Name we may give to a Woman who march'd at the Head of several thousand Men, drawn from a little State her Son possess'd in the Mountains of the Province of Se-chwen. The Emperor also fitted out a Fleet, and with all these Preparations put himself in a Condition to humble the Pride of the Tartars. Upon this Occasion two Christian Mandarins of his Court, advised him to send to Ma-kau for Portuguese Engineers, to serve the Artillery, to which the Chinese were but little used. But before they arriv'd, the Tartars were driven out of the Province of Lyau-tong; and the Capital was the more easily recover'd from them, as the Inhabitants of the City and the neighbouring Country detested the Cruelty of their King Tyen-ming, who was then engaged in another War in Tartary. But as soon as he had finish'd his Expedition he re-enter'd Lyau-tong, and renew'd the Siege of the Capital; during which the Chinese lost thirty thousand Men, and the Tartars twenty thousand; but at length they carry'd the City, by means of a Traitor. As soon as the King was Master of the Palace, he publish'd an Edict, by which all the Chinese were commanded under pain of Death to shave their Heads after the Tartar Fashion; but several thousands choose rather to lose their Heads than their Hair. Mau-ven-long, one of the most able Chinese Generals, being sent with fresh Troops against the Tartars, so strongly fortify'd the Citadel of Shang-bay, that he made it impregnable; and by this means shut up the Entrance into China from Tartary.

The first Year of the Cycle was unfortunate to the Empire, on account of the fresh Troubles rais'd by a great number of seditious People, and Robbers, call'd Lyew-tse, before-mention'd, who over-run and plunder'd four Provinces, their Number increasing daily. (*)

The fourth Year the Emperor dy'd at the Age of thirty two, and was succeeded by his Brother, Wbay-tsung, before call'd Tsong-ching, the fifth Son of Quang-tsung.

Tyen-ming, King of the Tartars, who had signalized himself by his Fierceness, dy'd the same Year. He was succeeded by his Son Tyen-tsung, who was quite the reverse of his Father, being a Prince of great Mildness, Clemency and Goodness.

(*) The second Year was remarkable for the Stone Monument which was dug out of the Earth, near the Capital of the Province of Shen-hi, containing an Abridgement of the Christian Law, and the Names of 70 Preachers of the Gospel, engraven in Syriac Characters. ## WHAYTSONG, or TSONG-CHING, Seventeenth Em- peror, reign'd Seventeen Years.

THE Chinese Power ended with the Reign of Wbay-tsong, to give place to that of the Tartars, who still govern this vast Empire with an absolute Authority. Wbay-tsong was a great Lover of the Sciences, and wrote the Chinese Characters very neatly; But tho' he had some favourable Sentiments of Christianity, which he protected on several Occasions, yet he continued extremely bigotted to the Bonzas. He repress'd the Luxury which began to be introduced, especially in Apparel; he was mild, chaste and temperate, slow in his Resolutions, and distrustful in his Temper, even towards his most faithful Ministers. He forbid the Mandarins to have any Correspondence with the Eunuchs: The latter having introduced Soldiers into the Palace, the Emperor gave them leave for a Month to visit their native Country and Friends, and furnished them with Money for their Journey, but afterwards forbid their Return. As he had often counselled his Brother to get rid of the Chief of the Eunuchs named Ghey-tsong, who domineered in the Palace with a very formidable Pride and Intolence, as soon as Wbay-tsong, ascended the Throne, this Villain by Poison prevented the Punishment due to his Crimes: his Body was torn to Pieces by the Populace, his Riches which were immense confiscated, and the Temples, which his Flatterers had erected to his Honour, burnt and demolished.

The Imperial Troops being employ'd on the Side of Tartary, the Seditious multiplied in the Provinces; the Suppression of whom requiring the greatest Expedition, the Emperor resolved to make Peace with the Tartars. To this end he sent a fresh Army into their Country, under the Command of an Eunuch, named Yuen, who had full Power to negotiate a Treaty: But the Villain suffering himself to be brib'd, made a Peace upon the most shameful Terms, which the Emperor refusing to ratify, the Traitor took the following Measures to force him thereto.

Mau-ven-long, who commanded the Chinese Army, being a Person of the strictest Fidelity, Yuen invited him to a Feast, where he poisoned him. After this he advised the Tartars to march directly to Pe-king, by a different Road from that which he took with his Army. This they did without Opposition, and besieged the Imperial City: Hereupon, Orders being instantly dispatch'd to Yuen, to come with his Forces to its Relief, he set out directly, not in the least suspecting that his Treason was discovered; but as soon as he was got into the Town he was put to the Torture, and after being convicted of Perfidy was strangled. The Tartar was no sooner inform'd of his Death, but he raised the Siege, and return'd to Lyau-tong loaded with rich Spoils †.

At the same time, by consent of the Empress, several of the principal Court-Ladies were instructed in the Christian Religion, and received Baptism.

The twelfth Year of the Cycle died Tyen-tsong, the Tartar King, who was succeeded by his Son Tjong-tê, Father to the Founder of the following Dynasty. This Tjong-tê was a very affable, good natur'd Prince; and as he had been secretly educated from his Infancy among the Chinese, he had acquir'd their Genius and Manners, as well as their Language and Sciences. This gain'd him the Friendship and Esteem of the Chinese Generals and Mandarins, who fell off insensibly from the Emperor; whose ill Success having quite altered his Temper, he grew thoughtful, uneasy, melancholy, and cruel. This, and all the following Years of his Reign, was a continued Series of Robberies, Murders, and intestine Wars. The Numbers of the Seditious and Malecontents were so vast, that they formed eight Armies, under eight different Commanders, who were afterwards reduced to two named Li and Chang. These, that they might not annoy each other, agreed to divide the Provinces between them: Chang took the Western Provinces of Se-chwen and Hs-quang for his Share; and Li marching Northwards seiz'd on great Part of the Province of Shen-si, and then entering Ho-nan, beleaguerr'd the Capital Kay-fong, but was forced to raise the Siege with Loss. Six Months after, he invested that City a second Time, where he met such obstinate Resistance, (the Besieged choosing rather to feed on human Flesh than surrender) that the Imperial Army having time to come to its Relief, the Chinese General thought he should infallibly have destroyed all the Rebels, by breaking down the Dikes of the Yellow River; but they escaped to the Mountains, while the City, which was much lower than the River, was quite laid under Water; an Inconvenience which the General had not foreseen, whereby 300,000 of the Inhabitants perished. Nevertheless Li made himself Master of the Provinces of Ho-nan and Shen-si, where he put to Death all the Mandarins, and exacted great Sums from those who had possessed Employments; treating none favourably but the Populace, whom he freed from all manner of Taxes. This Conduct even drew to his Party great Numbers out of the Imperial Army, whence he found himself so powerful that he no longer scrupled to assume the Title of Emperor. He afterwards advanced to the Imperial City, where there was a Garrison of seventy thousand Men, but where he was sure to meet with no Resistance. He knew the Divisions that were between the Mandarins and the Eunuchs; besides a great Number of his Soldiers had got into the City in Disguise, and gain'd a considerable Party, who were to open the Gates to him. In effect, three Days after his Arrival the Gates were open'd, and he entered in Triumph.

† [The eighth Year of the Cycle, or of Christ 1621, the Dominican Friars arrived in China to preach the Gospel, and were followed soon after by the Franciscans. Two Years after died the famous Doctor Paul Sy. See Vol. II. p. 8, 9, 10, 11.]

umph, at the Head of 300,000 Men. The Emperor was at this time shut up in the Palace, wholly taken up with the ridiculous Superstitions of the Bonzas, and quite ignorant of what was doing without: But as he could not be long so, when he found he was betray'd, he intended to have gone out of the Palace with six hundred of his Guards, who forsook him. Being thus deprived of all Hopes of escaping, and preferring Death to the Disgrace of falling alive, into the Hands of Rebels, he retired into his Garden; and after he had written these Words on the Border of his Vest, My Subjects have basely deserted me, do with me what you please, but spare my People, he kill'd his Daughter with the Stroke of a Sabre, and then hung himself upon a Tree, being thirty-six Years of Age. The chief Ko-lau, the Queens, and the most faithful Eunuchs, followed his Example and killed themselves.

The Body of the Emperor was search'd for a long time, and being at last found, was brought before the Tyrant, seated on a Throne, who treated it with Indignity; and afterwards caused two of the Emperor's Children, and all his Ministers to be beheaded, but his eldest Son escap'd by Flight.

Every body submitted to the Power of the Usurper, except Prince U-san-gbey, who commanded the Chinese Army in Lyau-tong. Against him the Tyrant set out with his Army, and having besieged the Place where he was Governor, to force him to surrender, shew'd him his Father, loaded with Chains; declaring he should be instantly slain if he refused to submit. This great Man beholding his Father from the Top of the Wall, fell on his Knees, and bursting into Tears, begg'd to be forgiven if he sacrificed his Filial Tendernefs to his Duty to his Prince and Country. The generous Father applauded the Resolution of his Son, and submitted to his Fate.

U-san-gbey, to revenge at once the Death of his Prince, and of his Father, struck up a Peace with the Eastern, or Manchew Tartars, and invited them to his Assistance against the Rebels. Tjong-té, their King, without Delay advanced with an Army of eighty thousand Men, which joining that of the Chinese General, the Usurper raised the Siege, and hasten'd to Pe-king. But not thinking himself safe there, he plunder'd the Palace, and set it on Fire; and then fled with his Troops into the Province of Shen-si, enrich'd with the Spoils of the Empire, and loaded with the Curses of the People.

Tjong-té dy'd almost as soon as he had set Foot in China; but before his Death he declar'd his Son Shun-chi Emperor, who was but six Years old, and committed the Care of him and the Empire to his Brother Ama van.

The young Prince was strait conducted to Pe-king, and receiv'd with the Acclamations of the People, who look'd upon him as their Deliverer; and nothing was heard on all sides but joyful Shouts of Long live the Emperor! May he live ten thousand Years! VAN-SW1! VAN-SW1! a Chinese Expression, which signifies, May he live many Years. This Revolution happen'd the twenty first Year of the Cycle, which answers to the Year of Christ 1644.

TSING.

SHUN-CHI, First Emperor, reign'd Seventeen Years.

IT is not certainly known what became of the Usurper, who was pursued for some time by the Tartars. Some think he was kill'd in an Engagement by U-san-gbey, who found too late his Error in having recourse to the Tartars (A), to get rid of the Tyrant, and would sometimes say, That he had sent for Lyons to drive away Dogs. Nevertheless, he received from Shun-chi the Dignity of King, and Title of Ping-si, which signifies Pacifier of the West; and the City Si-ngan-fu the Capital of Shen-si, which had been ravaged with Fire and Sword, was assign'd him for his Residence.

Shun-chi, 1st

Emperor.

U-san-gbey made a King.

Shun-chi thus seeing himself Master of the Northern Provinces turn'd his Arms to subdue the Southern. Hong-quang, a Grandson of Shin-tsong, or Van-lye, the thirteenth Emperor of the preceding Dynasty, had been proclaim'd at Nan-king; but being taken Prisoner, he was brought to Pe-king, where he was strangled. The Tartars afterwards enter'd the Province of Che-kyang, and besieged the Capital. Lo-vang, who was King of this Place, and had refused the Title of Emperor, ascended the Wall, and on his Knees beseech'd the Tartars to spare his Subjects, offering, if they must needs have some Victim, to sacrifice his own Life to save theirs; and at the same time went out of the City, submitting himself to the Mercy of the Conqueror.

The Man-

chew Tartars reduce all by Degrees to their Obedience.]

(A) The Nation here call'd Tartars and Eastern Tartars, are Manchews, the Descendants of the Kim, (a Name they still retain) who formerly possess'd the Northern Provinces, commonly call'd the Empire of Katay, (See p. 210, 211, & seq.) and now are Masters of all China.

Long-vü, another Grandson of Shin-tsung, or Van-lye, was proclaim'd in the Province of Fo-kyen, but all the Cities open'd their Gates at the Approach of the Conqueror; nor could this Prince escape Death, being forced to strengthen the Conquest with his Blood.

There was at this time a remarkable Person, named Chin-chi-long (*), who had a great Share in these Transactions. He was at first a Servant to the Portuguese at Ma-kau, among whom he was instructed in the Christian Religion, and received at his Baptism the Name of Nickolan: afterwards from a petty Trader he grew to be the richest Merchant in all China, by the Commerce he carry'd on with the Spaniards and Dutch; and became at length the Commander of a very numerous Fleet. He at first acknowledged Long-vü for Emperor, and after his Death the Tartar Prince. Shun-chi offer'd him the Dignity of King, and gave him an Invitation to a solemn Feast, which he accepted of, in hopes of obtaining the greatest Dignities at Court, whither he was conducted with Honour: leaving the Command of the Fleet to his Son Ching-ching-kong, whose Zeal and Fidelity to his Natural Princes could never be shaken, either by the Intreaties of his Father, or the Promises of the new Emperor.

The Chinese elect a new Emperor,

The Army of the Tartars advancing into the Province of Quang-teng met with no resistance; but the Course of their Victories was interrupted in that of Quang-si, where Thomas Kyu, Vice-Roy of this Province, and Luke Chin, Generalissimo of the Chinese Forces, both Christians, oppos'd the Progress of the Tartars, and after an obstinate Battle intirely routed, and put them to flight. The Conquerors immediately elected a Prince of the Imperial Family, named Tong-lye, who was King of the Capital of the Province of Quey-chow, and, after being proclaimed Emperor, removed his Court to Shau-king. A Christian Eunuch, nam'd Pan Aebilles (A), who was very zealous for the Faith, was his chief Counsellor; by whose means Father Andrew Koffler instructed the Emperor's Mother, his Wife, and eldest Son, in the Truths of Christianity, and baptized them. It was expected that this Emperor would one Day be the Constantine of China (B); which Name was given him when he received the Sacrament of Spiritual Regeneration. For these illustrious Converts, with the Consent of the Emperor, sent Father Michael Boym to Rome, to pay a Filial Obedience to the Holy See in their Names.

and attack the Tartars both by Sea and Land with great Success.

The Report which was spread thro' all the Provinces of a great Victory gain'd over the Tartars, and of the Election of the new Emperor, roused the Courage of the Chinese. A Commander who had got together an Army in the Province of Fo-kyen, and Ching-ching-kong, who scour'd the Seas with a numerous Fleet, retok several Cities; the one within the Country, and the other upon the Sea-Coasts; at the same time the Vice-Roy, of the Province of Kyang-si shook off the Yoke, and defeated the Tartars in several Engagements. In the Northern Parts two Chiefs, one nam'd Ho, the other Kyang, had rais'd each a considerable Army. The first took several Cities in Sben-si, and the second entering the same Province with an hundred and forty thousand Horse, and a still greater number of Foot, they defeated the Tartars in two Battles, and put them in such Dread, that they durst not appear any more in the Field.

The Tartars recover all again.

Nevertheless, in the Space of three or four Years, the Tartars, partly by Craft and Policy, and partly by Rewards and Promises, join'd to the Quarrels between the two Chinese Leaders, at length conquered them, and recover'd all the Cities they had lost. In the West another Chief of the Revolters, named Chang-byen-chong, who seem'd to be a Demon in Human Shape, made Havock wherever he came; and after having exercised all manner of Cruelties in the Provinces of Ho-nan, Kyang-nan, and Kyang-si, he turn'd his whole Fury against the Province of Se-chwen.

Chang-byen-chong, Head of the Revolters in the West.

His monstrous Cruelty

He was good natured and affable to none but his Soldiers, with whom he made merry, and eat familiarly; but to others he was exceeding barbarous. He put to Death the King of Ching-tu-fu, the Capital City, who was a Prince of the preceding Dynasty; and if any Man committed even the most trifling Fault, he caus'd all the People that lived in the same Street to be kill'd. Five thousand Eunuchs were slain by his Orders, because one of them had refused to give him the Title of Emperor. Having call'd ten thousand Literati to an Examination, as soon as they were assembled in the Hall appointed for their Compositions, he caus'd them all to be murder'd, on Pretence that by their Sophistry and Arguments they stir'd up the People to rebel. Being about to depart from Ching-tu-fu, to go into the Province of Sben-si, he caus'd all the Inhabitants to be brought out in Chains, and massacred in the Fields (+). He also order'd his Soldiers to kill their Wives, because they were only Incumbrances in time of War; and he set them an Example by cutting the Throats of three hundred of his own, reserving only twenty to wait on the three Queens. In short he did not leave the Province of Se-chwen, till he had burnt the Capital and several other Cities.

* See before p. 91.

(A) The Reader is not to imagine that Thomas Kyu, Luke Chin, Pan Aebilles, and such like curious Names, are to be met with in the Chinese Annals; but that they have been inserted by the Missionaries to do Honour to their Spiritual Conversions.

(B) How comes it the Emperor has not his Christian Name join'd to his Chinese Name as well as others?

(f) It was on this Occasion, that several Children were baptized by PP. Braglio and Magalhães. [P. Couplet relates what is more to the Purpose; That this Monster having sacrificed to the Devil, (a very Christian Expression) twenty thousand Humans, on account of one of that Order (who had formerly rais'd a great Persecution against the Christian Converts) he boasted of it before those Fathers, saying: "These Men would have taken away your Lives, but the Lord of Heaven sent me to punish them." He seems, by taking his Commission for his Villanies and Murders from God, to have been originally a Jew: for there are Jews in China, as well as in other Countries. P. Couplet adds, "That he often praised the Law of Christ, promising, when he came to the Empire, to build a magnificent Temple to God (1). This I fancy should have been the Constantine of China, as having so near a Resemblance for Piety and Humanity to the Constantine of Rome. See more of this Monster Vol. II. p. 13.]

(1) P. Couplet. Manarch. Sinic. Tabl. Chron. p. 96

Then entering Shen-fi, as he was preparing to engage the Tartars, who were not far off, he was told that five Warriors were seen upon the Hills; upon which he went, immediately to view them, without putting on either his Helmet or Cuirass, but was scarce got in sight of them, before he was shot thro' the Heart with an Arrow. His Army dispersing after his Death, the People received the Tartars as their Deliverers, and joyfully submitted to their Government.

By this Time eleven Provinces being reduced under the Dominion of the Tartar Monarch, there remained only five in the South in the Possession of the Chinese Emperor; to subdue which three different Armies were sent by the Court. Accordingly Siege was laid to the Capital of Yang-tong, which lasted a whole Year, with great Losses on both sides; but at length it was taken, and the Soldiers were allow'd to plunder it for ten Days. They march'd afterwards to Shau-king where Tong-lye kept his Court; but this Prince not having Forces sufficient to resist the Conqueror, retired first to the Province of Yang-shi, and afterwards into that of Yun-nan.

The next Year, which was the twenty eighth of the Cycle, dy'd A-ma-van, Uncle and Guardian to Shun-chi. His Death was the more regretted, as he had gain'd the Esteem of the Chinese by his great Qualities and sweet Disposition; in short, it is properly he who fix'd the Tartar Family now reigning on the Throne. His Brother, who had a small Sovereignty, claim'd a right of succeeding in the Guardianship of the young Emperor; but all the Grandees oppos'd it, because being now fourteen Years old, and marry'd to a Daughter of the Prince of the Western Tartars, they thought him capable of governing alone: they went so far as to hang up the Ensigns of their respective Dignities at the Gates of their Palaces, saying, That they would receive them from the Hands of Shun-chi only. It was then agreed that this Prince should assume the Government, which he did in a manner that soon gain'd him the Hearts of the People; instead of shutting himself up in his Palace, as the Chinese Emperors used to do, Shun-chi began his Reign by shewing himself in public, and giving free Access to his Person. He made no Alteration either in the Laws or Government of China, not even suffering the Chinese to learn the Tartarian Language, without a particular Licence. He preserv'd the six Supreme Tribunals, but would admit them no where, except at Pe-king, so that those of Nan-king were suppress'd; he also order'd that there should be a Tartar President besides the Chinese.

He continu'd to bestow the Government of Cities and Provinces only on the Literati; and, as the Safety or Ruin of the Empire depends on the Choice of proper Persons to fill such important Posts, having been inform'd that some Literati had bought the Suffrages of their Examiners, he condemn'd thirty six of the latter to be beheaded, and order'd the Literati to undergo a fresh Examination; pardoning those whose Qualifications intitled them to their Degrees, but banish'd the rest with their Families into Tartary, which is at present the common Place of Exile for Offenders; and the Design in peopling these vast Deserts is, that the Children who are born here might more easily contract the Disposition and Manners of the Tartars.

This Prince had a singular Affection for P. Adam Sebaal, and always call'd him Ma-fa, which is a Term of Respect that signifies, My Father; he made him President of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, that he might reform the Chinese Astronomy, and expell'd the Mohammedans, who had been in Possession of it for three Centuries. He also permitted him to present his Petitions into his own Hands, without their passing thro' the Tribunals, according to Custom; which remarkable Favour contributed much to the Advancement of Religion, and soon after two fine Churches were built at Pe-king by the Authority and Protection of the Emperor.

The thirty third Year of the Cycle the first Embassy from the Czar of Russia (A) arriv'd at Pe-king, but it was not favourably received, because the Ambassador refused to submit to the Chinese Ceremonies; nor was that which came from the Dutch more successful.

The thirty sixth Year of the Cycle Ching-ching-kong, who till then contented himself with making Incursions, and plundering the Coast of China, came and laid Siege to Nan-king with three thousand Ships. A Chinese, who was a young Man, being Vice-Roy of the City and Province, a Council of War was held, and the Tartar Chief declar'd, "That considering the multitude of Inhabitants, the City could not be defended, unless they were all destroy'd." This Proposal was received with Horror by the Vice-Roy, "You must begin this Butchery with me," (said he) if it be really so that the City cannot otherwise be preserv'd. This Answer stop'd the Tartar's Mouth, and saved the Lives of the Citizens.

On the twentieth Day of the Siege there was a great rejoicing in the Besiegers Camp, on Account of the Birth-Day of their General, and the Festival held three whole Days, which were spent in feasting and all manner of Diversions; when the Besieged took this Opportunity to sally out at Midnight with great Silence, and finding their Enemies overcome with Sleep and Wine, attack'd them and destroy'd near three thousand, forcing the rest to fly in haste to their Ships, and abandon their Camp, Baggage, and Provisions to the Conqueror.

Ching-ching-kong seeking to repair this Loss as soon as possible, fail'd to engage the Tartar Fleet, and coming up with it, after an obstinate Fight, sunk, and took several of their Ships; and having put the rest to Flight, cut off the Noses and Ears of his Prisoners, which amounted to four thousand, and then set them on Shore. As the Tartar Soldiers could not bear the Sight of this dismal Spectacle, and their hideous Countenances were a constant Mark of their Defeat, they were all put to Death by the Emperor's Order; as being culpable either for not conquering, or for not dying gloriously in Defence of their Country.

(A) He is call'd in the Text, The Great Duke of Moscow, according to the Custom in the last Century.

 fled for Refuge to the Kingdom of Pegu, which borders on the Province of Tun-nan, still kept

Shun-chi's Passion for the Wife of a Tartar Lord.

The same Year, being the thirty eighth of the Cycle, proved fatal to the Emperor, occasioned by his violent Love for the Wife of a young Tartar Lord, whom he had seen with the Empress. This Lady having informed her Husband of the Prince's Solicitations, he gave her Instructions how to behave, which she disclosed to her Lover, either thro' Simplicity or Design.
Shun-chi, who was entirely governed by his Passion, sent for this Lord, and under Pretence of some Neglect in the Business of his Post, gave him a Box on the Ear; which Affront the Tartar took so much to Heart, that he died of Grief the third Day after.

The Emperor immediately marrying the Widow, made her Queen, and had a Son by her, whose Birth was celebrated with great Magnificence; but this Child dyed in three Months, and his Mother followed him soon after to the Grave. The Emperor was inconsolable for this Loss,
 (w) and signified by his Will, that thirty Men should kill themselves [voluntarily] to appease her Manes; which Ceremony the Chinese look upon with Horror, and was abolished by the Care of his Successor.

He ordered the Grandees of the Court and Ministers of the Empire to go in Mourning for a Month, and the People for three Days, as if she had been Empress. After the Body was burnt on a Funeral Pile, he gathered up the Ashes himself, and with Tears in his Eyes inclosed them in a Silver Urn. He then devoted himself wholly to the Bonzas, and the Worship of their Images, which before he had treated with Contempt; in short, in a few Days this unhappy Prince was reduced to the last Extremity, and his Life despaired of. P. Adam (x) had often made him strong Remonstrances upon his Conduct, which the Prince look'd upon as the Effect of his Love, but were unavailing; however seeing him in this melancholy Condition, he resolved to make a last Effort. The Prince receiv'd him kindly, heard what he had to say, forbidding him to kneel, made him drink Tea, and dismissed him.

His Death.

After the Jesuit was gone, he ordered four Lords of the Court to draw near, and in their Presence reproached himself for his Neglects in the Government of his Dominions; for his Ingratitude to those who had served him faithfully; for despising the Counsel of his Mother; for his Avarice, and idle Expences in vain Curiosities; for his Affection to the Eunuchs; his inordinate Passion for the deceased Queen, and the Affliction he had occasion'd to his People. After this he declared them Guardians of his youngest Son Kang-bi, who was but eight Years old. Then calling for the Imperial Mantle, he put it on, and shrinking himself up in the Bed, said, Now I leave you: and expired the same Instant, about Midnight, aged twenty four Years.

KANG-HI, Second Emperor, reign'd Sixty Years.

KANG-HI,
 2d Emperor.

HAVING in the Course of this Work, spoken at large of the great Qualities and Merit of this Emperor, whose Name is respected throughout the East, and justly regarded by all Europe; nothing remains in this Place but to relate the principal Events of his Reign in Chronological Order. The Empire was pretty free from Disturbances under the Administration of the four Guardians; the first Use they made of their Authority was in beheading the Chief of the Eunuchs, who had been the Author of many Misfortunes, and driving from the Palace four thousand others, retaining only a thousand to be employed in the meanest Offices. Afterward an Edict was published, commanding all those who inhabited the Coast of the six Provinces, on pain of Death, to leave their Dwellings, and to settle themselves three Leagues from the Sea.
 In pursuance of which they demolished all their Cities, Forts, and Maritime Towns; and all Commerce by Sea was absolutely prohibited.

By this Means, indeed, the Power of a formidable Enemy (y) who had made himself Master of the Sea, was weakned, but then an infinite Number of Families, who lived by Fishing, were reduced to Want. A great many Idol Temples and Churches were also destroyed; and the City seq.

of Ma-kau would have shared the same Fate, had it not been for the earnest Solicitations of P. Adam [Schaal] who employed all his Credit to exempt it from the general Law.

In the Year forty Yang-quang-fyen, one of the Literati, presented a Petition to the Regents, full of the most horrid Calumnies against [our] Religion and the Missionaries; of whom P. Adam being look'd upon as the Chief, he and three of his Companions were loaded with nine Chains, and dragg'd before several Tribunals, where they underwent very long and mortifying Interrogatories. Their Books of Devotion, their Beads, their Medals, &c. were look'd upon as secret Marks, by which the Conspirators might know one another, and these Symbols of Christian Piety were ordered to be burnt: However it was forbidden to persecute the Christians, or to profane their Churches and their Images. The following Year P. Adam was condemned to be strangled; but this Sentence was afterwards revoked, and they condemned him to be cut while living into ten thousand Pieces, which is the Punishment for the most atrocious Crimes. This Sentence was carried to the Princes of the Blood, and to the Regents, to be confirm'd by them; but as often as they attempted to read it, a dreadful Earthquake dispersed the Assembly. The Consternation was so great, that they granted a general Pardon, and all the Prisoners were released except P. Adam; who was not set at Liberty till a Month afterwards, when the Royal Palace was consumed by the Flames. All the Missionaries except four remained at Court, were banished to Kan-ton, among whom were three Dominican Fryars, one Franciscan, and twenty one Jesuits.

The 15th of August, in the same Year, Adam Schaal died at the Age of seventy years, forty seven of which he spent in the Labours of an Apostolical Life. The Emperor afterwards declared him innocent, and honoured him with an Elogium, and several Titles [which he formerly enjoy'd.]

The forty third Year of the Cycle happened the Death of So-ni, the Chief of the four Regents; when the young Emperor, taking the Government into his own Hands, soon raised Hopes of that glorious Reputation which he acquired in the Sequel of a Reign, the most flourishing that ever was.

Su-ka-ma, who had the greatest Credit of the four Regents, and who was the more dangerous as he was a more secret Enemy of Christianity, had twenty Articles of Accusation brought against him. His Effects were confiscated, he was loaded with Irons, and condemned to the most torturing Death; but the Emperor mitigated the Rigour of his Sentence, and he was only strangled; seven of his Children or Grand-children were beheaded, and his third Son was cut into many Pieces. In the forty fifth Year of the Cycle, an Ambassador from the King of Portugal came to Court, who was received with Honour, and contributed not a little to establish his Nation in the Possession of the City of Ma-kau.

The Year following P. Ferdinand Verbiest was ordered by the Emperor to examine, and set down in Writing, all the Faults of the Chinese Kalendar made by Yang-quang-fyen; who had succeeded in P. Adam [Schaal's] Place, and had set the Grandeess, the Bonzas and Mohammedans, against the Christian Religion. The Faults being very many and enormous, Yang-quang-fyen was deprived of his Office, degraded of his Honours, and even condemned to Death: However, the Emperor was content to banish him into his own Country, but before he could reach it he died of a pestilential Ulcer (D).

Pere Verbiest was then made President of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, being in great Esteem with the Emperor, to whom he taught those Sciences for five Months. He took this Opportunity to present a Petition to that Monarch, wherein he detected the Calumnies that had been raised against the Christian Law, and the Injustice which had been done, under Colour of his Authority, to the Preachers thereof. Seven Days were spent in examining this Petition, in a general Assembly of the Mandarins, after which it was declared, That the Christian Law taught nothing that was evil, or tending to Sedition; and the banished Missionaries were recalled by an Imperial Decree, forbidding them however to build any more Churches, and the Chinese to embrace their Religion.

In the fiftieth Year of the Cycle, U-san-gbey, who had introduced the Tartars into the Empire to destroy the Rebels, began to think of delivering his Country from their Yoke. The Emperor invited him to Court; but his Answer to the Deputies was, "That he would not go thither, unless in the Company of eighty thousand Men", and presently after made known his Design.

He had already made himself Master of the Provinces of Yun-nan, Se-chuen, Quey-chew, and part of Hu-quang; and, which is a Mark of the Imperial Authority, had sent the Chinese Kalendar to the Princes his Neighbours, and among the rest to the King of Tong-king. But they all refused to receive it, and sent it back to the Emperor, who caused the eldest Son of U-san-gbey, then at Court, to be beheaded. Soon after the Kings of Fo-kyen and Quang-tong revolted, and were joined by the Prince of Formosa; so that the Tartars would have had no Chance for it, if all these Princes had acted in concert, in behalf of the common Liberty; but they were divided by Jealousies. The Prince of Formosa thinking himself not treated with due Honour by the King of Fo-kyen, declared War against him, defeated him in several Battles, and forced him to submit to the Tartars. The King of Quang-tong, for a like Reason of Discontent, broke the Treaty which he had made with with U-san-ghey, and put his Province into the Hands of the Emperor; who sent several Armies, commanded by Tartarian Princes, into the Provinces of Hu-quang, Che-kyang, Po-kyen, Qyang-tong, and Qyang-si, to reduce the rest that refused to acknowledge his Authority. However U-san-ghey dy'd in the fifty sixth Year of the Cycle, being very aged, and his youngest Son Hong-cha was proclaim'd Emperor.

The second of September, in the same Year, a dreadful Earthquake happen'd at Pe-king, whereby a great many Palaces and Temples, with the Towers and Walls of the City, were overthrown, which bury'd upwards of four hundred Persons under the Ruins. More than thirty thousand perish'd in the neighbouring City of Tong-chew, and as the Shocks were perceived from time to time for three Months, the Emperor, the Princes, and the Nobility quitted their Palaces, and dwelt in Tents; on this Occasion the Emperor was exceeding liberal in relieving his Subjects. In the last Month of the same Year the Imperial Palace was all in Flames, and in a few Hours was reduced to Ashes; it is said that the Loss amounted to 2,850,000 Taels.

Four Days after this Fire the Emperor set out to take the Diversion of Hunting at his Pleasure-House; and perceiving at a Distance the magnificent Monument which his Father had erected for the last Chinese Emperor, he went to it, and having prostrated himself to the Ground, and burnt Perfumes: "You know, O great Emperor, (said he, shedding Tears) that it was not we, but your rebellious Subjects, who were the Cause of your Death."

Altho' the King of the Province of Qyang-tong had submitted to the Tartars, yet his Conduct was not the less suspected at Court; because he had an enterprising Spirit, and was very powerful by the Trade, which, notwithstanding the Emperor's Prohibition, he continued to carry on by Sea with the Spaniards and Dutch. The fifty seventh Year of the Cycle he received Orders to march against the Rebels of the Province of Qyang-si with his Army; which being divided into several Bodies, as Occasion required, he was artfully prevailed on to return to his Palace: where a few Days after two Lords of the Court arrived, who, on the ninth of October, early in the Morning, presented him with a silken Halter, and the Emperor's Order to strangle himself. One hundred and twelve of his Accomplices, among whom were three of his Brothers, were beheaded; and his great Riches divided amongst his other Brothers, whereof one was the Emperor's Son-in-Law. (*) The Year following the King of Po-kyen, who in the Time of his Revolt had mal-treated the Mandarins, who were faithful to the Emperor, was put to Death, and his Body cast to the Dogs; his Brothers too, tho' innocent, were beheaded.

Mean time the Tartars having taken the Capital of Yun-nan, Hong-cha, who had been declared Emperor, prevented the Punishment design'd for him, by killing himself. The Bones of his Father U-san-ghey were dug up, and carry'd to Pe-king; where some of them were expos'd with Marks of Infamy on Stakes, in several Places, the rest reduced to Ashes, and scatter'd in the Wind. †

The fifty ninth Year, the Emperor, having happily subdued the fifteen Provinces of China, and establish'd Peace throughout the Empire, determined to visit his own Country, and the Tombs of his Ancestors; accordingly he set out for Eastern Tartary, the third of March, accompanied by the Prince his Heir, his three Queens, the great Lords and principal Mandarins, with an Army of about seventy thousand Men: He likewise ordered Pere Verbiest to attend him, and to be always near his Person during the Journey. In the sixtieth Year, which was the last of the Cycle, he made a second Progress into Western Tartary, with a greater Retinue, and a more numerous Army. He continued to make these Journeys every Year into that Country (‡), where he spent several Months in the Exercise of Hunting. The third Year of the new Cycle, Ching-ke-sai, the Grandson of the famous Pirate, who had taken the Island of Formosa from the Dutch, was obliged to surrender it to the Emperor, and repair to Pe-king, where the Title of Count was conferr'd on him. (§)

The fifth Year the PP. Gerbillon and Pereyra had Orders from the Emperor, to accompany the Chinese Plenipotentiaries into Tartary, who went to settle with those of Russia the Limits of the two Empires.

China enjoy'd a profound Peace, which was owing to the Wisdom and superior Abilities of the Emperor. The indefatigable Application of this Prince to all the Affairs of State; his Equity and Penetration in the Choice of proper Persons to fill the principal Places of Trust; his Frugality and Aversion to Luxury with respect to his own Person, joined to his Profuseness and Magnificence with reference to the Public; his Tenderness for his People, and Forwardness to relieve them; his Steadiness in maintaining the Laws in their full Vigour; his continual Watchfulness over the Conduct of his Vice-Roys and Governors; and the absolute Dominion which he had over himself; all these put together kept up a perfect Subordination among the Members of this vast Empire, without which there commonly is nothing but Trouble and Confusion.

Tho' this Prince was so much taken up with Affairs of Government, yet he found Leisure to apply himself to the Sciences, for which he had a particular Taste and Genius. He was not contented with the Chinese Literature, in which he was very well vers'd; but was desirous of being effeminate by the Delicacies of China; as well as, by displaying the Magnificence of his Court, and the Valour of his Power, to make his Authority on the one Hand formidable to the Tartar Princes his Subjects, and on the other, by his personal Affability and Beneficence, to make it amiable.

(‡) His View in these Visits was, to keep his Troops in Exercise, to harden them with Fatigue, and prevent their growing

being instructed in the European Sciences, viz. Geometry, Algebra, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, Physic and Anatomy. The Peres Gerbillon, Bouvet, and Thomas, for several Years composed their Lectures in the Tartarian Language, and explained them to him twice a Day, either at Pe-king, or his Pleasure-House. It was his Will also that Pere Gerbillon should attend on him in all his Journey into Tartary.

As the Christian Religion was only tolerated in China, it was not secure against Persecution in the Provinces. In that of Che-kyang there arose a very cruel one; whereupon the Jesuits presented a Petition to the Emperor, and after great Opposition from the Tribunals, they at length, by the Protection of the Prince So-fan, a Relation of the Emperor, obtained a Decree which spoke in Commendation of it, and permitted its free Exercise throughout the Empire. This Decree, was obtained in the ninth Year of the Cycle, of Christ 1692, and in the thirty-first of the Reign of Kang-hi, who confirmed it the twenty second of March, and caused it to be published soon after in all the Provinces.

The twenty-sixth Year of the Cycle was remarkable for a very uncommon Event; the Emperor's second Son, who was appointed his Heir, and almost his Equal in Dignity, was all of a sudden deposed, and loaded with Irons, his Children and principal Officers being involved in his Disgrace. Likewise an Astrologer, who had predicted, that if this Prince was not Emperor in such a Year he never would, was condemn'd to be cut in a thousand Pieces. The public Gazettes were filled with Invectives against the Prince, whose Actions were canvas'd from his very Infancy.

Soon after it appeared that he was innocent, and that his eldest Brother, to render his Loyalty suspected, had recourse to Magick, and divers Delusions, by the Assistance of certain Lama's, who were skill'd in Sorcery. These Lama's were put to Death, the eldest Son condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, and the Prince his Brother re-established in the Quality of Heir. Publick Rejoicings were made on this Occasion, and a Comedy was acted for some time, taken from a Passage in ancient History, that alluded to this Event. But this Restoration was not lasting, for afterwards he was deprived of the Title and Privileges of his Rank, for real Conspiracies against his Father.

The thirty-seventh (A) Year of the Cycle, 1717, a Tsong-ping, or Mandarin of War, whose Name was Cbin-mau, presented a Petition to the Emperor, full of Invectives and Calumnies against the Christian Religion, and the Preachers thereof; under the specious Pretence of Watchfulness over the publick Tranquillity, which, he said, was ready to be disturbed at Home by the Missionaries and their Disciples, and from Abroad by the Europeans, who trade to China. They were astonished when they found that this Petition was sent to the Tribunals to be examined, and that the Emperor confirmed their Sentence, which revived two Decrees: one of the eighth Year of Kang-hi, which prohibits the building of Churches and embracing the Christian Religion; the other of the forty fifth Year, obliging every European to receive an Imperial Patent, wherein shall be mentioned his Country, the Religious Order he is of, the Time he has been in China, and the Promise to be made by him never to return to Europe any more.

Father Parrenin, with two other Missionaries, went and threw themselves at the Emperor's Feet; but he could get no other Answer, than that none were prohibited to preach their Law, but those who had not received the Patents.

The Year following the Emperor's Mother dy'd, on the eleventh of January, and the whole Empire went into deep Mourning for upwards of forty Days. The Mandarins, and even the Sons of the Emperor, went to sleep in the Palace without putting off their Cloaths: All the Mandarins on Horseback, with white Garments and a small Train, went for three Days together to perform the usual Ceremonies before the Tablet of the deceased Empress. The Tribunals were shut up during the Mourning, and red Silk was prohibited, so that none wore either it or any other Ornament in their Caps. The same Year the Emperor was attacked with a Distemper, which gave a general Alarm; especially because his Design was to set aside his own Children, and choose for his Successor a Prince of the Dynasty of the Yuen, of whom there still remained more than a thousand. On this Occasion one of the chief Mandarins caused his Son to present a Memorial, wherein he respectfully shewed, of how great Importance it was to the Repose of the Empire to appoint his second Son the inheriting Prince. The Emperor, incensed at this Remonstrance, pardon'd him who presented it, because it was done in Obedience to his Father, but gave Orders that the Father should be put to death. This Example of Severity stoppt the Mouths of all the Grandeess, who durst not speak of a Successor any more.

The fortieth Year of the Cycle, 1720, the Court received the agreeable News of a compleat Victory gain'd by the Chinese Troops over Tse-vang Raptan, King of the Elutbs, who possessed the Country of the Lama's, and ravaged it for four Years together; by which Means Tiber fell into the Hands of the victorious Army. Though this Conquest was far enough from the Confines of China, yet it was of great Consequence, because the Emperor had the finishing of this War much at Heart, and all the Grandeess congratulated him upon it.

The seventh of June the same Year, an Earthquake happened at Pe-king at nine in the Morning, which lasted two Minutes. The Shock began again the next Day at half an Hour after seven in the Evening, and continued about six Minutes, nothing being heard in the City but confused Cries and Shrieks; at length it ceased for the present, tho' ten Shocks more were felt in the Night, but not so violent as the former. At break of Day the Calamity did not appear so great as was apprehended, there being but a thousand Persons crush'd to death in Pe-king. For as the Streets are generally broad, they could place themselves out of the Reach of the falling Houses; for twenty Days after some slight Shocks were perceived from time to time.

The twenty second of November, a Russian Ambassador made his public Entry into Pe-king, with much Pomp and Magnificence; having almost a hundred Persons in his Retinue, most of them richly dress'd after the European Fashion. The Gentlemen, who rode on each Side the Ambassador, had drawn Swords in their Hands, which was a Sight both new and extraordinary. My Lord Mezzabarba, the new Legate from his Holiness, who came from Lisbon in a Portuguese Ship, arrived at Pe-king, and was received by the Emperor with Distinction. After several Audiences he took his Leave, in order to return to Europe, to give the Pope an Account of what the Emperor had said to him, promising to return to China as soon as possible. He was conducted to Kan-ton, where he stayed but four or five Days, and from thence to Ma-kau, with all the Honour due to his Person and Dignity.

The Year following, the Island of Formosa in a few Months threw off the Emperor's Yoke, but was soon obliged to return to its Obedience. The Chinese Inhabitants, assisted by those of Fo-kyen and Kew-mi, had killed all the Mandarins, except one who escaped, and put all the Imperial Troops to the Sword. When the News was spread at Pe-king, the Revolt was imputed to the Dutch, (who had certainly no Hand in it) doubtless on Account of that Aversion which the Chinese have to all Strangers, and with design to render the Europeans odious. But there were great Rejoycings soon after, when they came to know, that the Imperial Troops, lately sent thither, having entered the Capital, had cut in Pieces one Party of the Rebels, excepting their Chief, who fled into the Mountains, and that the rest were intirely dispersed.

The forty second Year of the Cycle, 1722 (A), in December, the Emperor, diverting himself with hunting the Tyger in his Park of Hay-tse, was seized with a Chilnells, and immediately gave Orders to those that were with him to return to his Pleasure-House. This sudden Return surprised his whole Attendance, who soon were acquainted with the Cause, his Blood being coagulated, so that no Remedy could do him any Service. Perceiving himself near his End, he assembled all the Grandees, and declared his fourth Son his Successor. He expired the twentieth of December, about eight in the Evening, aged sixty nine Years, and the same Night his Body was conveyed to Pe-king.

YONG-CHING, Third Emperor, now reigning.

THE Day after the Death of Kang-hi, the new Emperor ascended the Throne, about five in the Morning, in the forty fifth Year of his Age, assuming the Name of Yong-Ching, which signifies lasting Peace (B); and was acknowledged by all the Princes, the Grandees, and the Mandarins belonging to the Tribunals. As soon as he came to the Crown he shew'd some Disatisfaction against some of his Brothers, especially the ninth, condemning him to refund large Sums, which he pretended were unlawfully acquir'd in his Father's Reign, and banished him into Tartary, where he died soon after his Arrival of the Flux, as the Gazettes gave out. He afterwards recalled to Pe-king, his fourteenth Brother, who commanded the Chinese Army; his eighth and tenth fell likewise under his Displeasure; nor had any of them his entire Confidence, except the thirteenth, to whom he communicated all the Affairs of State. At the same Time he imprisoned or banished several Princes and Lords; many of whom protected the Missionaries, and, by so doing, favoured Christianity. Whether this Prince hath not the same Taste for the Sciences as his Father, or that he seeks Occasion to dismiss the Missionaries, they have as yet received but few Marks of his Benevolence, contenting himself with letting them live in quiet. One Italian Jesuit only, an excellent Painter, is employed in the Palace. If he has given a new Title of Honour to Father Kegler, President of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, it was not from any favourable Inclinations to our Religion; but only with a View that he might appear with Decency in his Presence, especially on certain Days of Ceremony. In his Application to Affairs of State he is indefatigable and assiduous, steady and resolute; always ready to receive Memorials, and to answer them. He governs intirely by himself, insomuch that there never was a Monarch more absolute, or more to be dreaded.

He was prejudic'd against the Europeans from the first Year of his Reign, by means of several Petitions presented to him by the Literati, remonstrating; That these Foreigners had deceived the late Emperor, who had lost much Reputation, in condescending to let them settle in the Provinces; that they had built Churches where ever they came, and that their Law made a very swift Progress; that the Chinese Christians acknowledged no other Doctors, and that in troublesome Times they followed none but their Directions, &c.

These bad Impressions were strengthened by a public Petition address'd to the Emperor by the Tsong-tu of Fo-kyen; wherein, after specifying what important Reasons there were for prohibiting Christianity throughout his Dominions, he besought him, both for the Repose of the Empire, and

(A) The Year 1722, was the 39th of the Cycle.

(B) P. de Halde tells us elsewhere what more properly comes in here: that Kang hi, a few Hours before his Death, named this Prince his Successor, who took the Name of Yong-ching, which signifies firm Peace, or indissoluble Concord. That he is witty and speaks well, but sometimes too fast, and without giving Time for any Reply; which some think he affects, to prevent hearing any Reasons that might induce him to change his Resolutions when they are once fixt.

and the Good of the People, to order the Strangers to be sent out of the Provinces, either to Court or to Ma-kau, and that their Temples might be put to other Uses.

This Petition was referr'd to the Tribunal of Rites to determine what was to be done: whose Sentence was, to keep at Court the Europeans that are already there; to bring thither those from the Provinces that might be useful; to send the rest to Ma-kau; to convert their Temples to public uses; and strictly to prohibit their Religion. This Sentence of the Tribunal was confirm'd by the Emperor, to which he only added; That the Vice-Roys of the Provinces should allow them a Mandarin to conduct them to the Places appointed, and protect them from any Insults. The Missionaries bestir'd themselves heartily by means of their Friends, and especially the Emperor's thirteenth Brother, but to no Purpose; all the Favour they could obtain was, to be convey'd to Kan-ton instead of Ma-kau, nor were they allow'd to stay there, but on Condition they gave no Cause of Complaint.

By Virtue of this solemn Edi&t, which was publish'd throughout the Empire, the Missionaries were driven from their Churches, and tolerated no where but at Pe-king, and Kan-ton. Upwards of three hundred Churches were either demolish'd or converted to profane Uses; and more than three hundred thousand Christians, depriv'd of their Pastors, saw themselves deliver'd up to the Rage of Infidels. There was then, and still is, every Method employ'd that a prudent Zeal can inspire, to re-animate, as often as possible, the Faith of those several Communities, and keep them stedfast in it.

This Edi&t was scarcely publish'd, when the Emperor let fall the whole weight of his Anger and Indignation upon an illustrious and numerous Family which had embraced the Faith. The Head of this Family is a Prince of the Blood, descended from the eldest Brother of the Founder of the present Dynasty; whom, without any regard to his Dignity, his old Age, or his important Services to the State, he banish'd into Tartary, together with his Children; being no less than eleven Princes, besides sixteen Princesses, who were marry'd to Mongol Princes, or Mandarins of Pe-king. All these Princes and Princesses, who had each a numerous Family, were degraded from their Rank, and allow'd no other Abode than a desert Place in Tartary, where they were closely confin'd, and guarded by Soldiers. This venerable old Man was seen setting out for the Place of his Exile, with his Children and Grand-Children, to the Number of thirty seven, without reckoning the Wives and Daughters, who were near as many; and about three hundred Domesticks of both Sexes, the greater Part of whom were baptized. All these Disgraces not being able to shake their Constancy, the Princes were brought back to Pe-king in Waggon, loaded all the Way with nine Chains; there undergoing several Interrogatories, they were promised to be restored to their former Dignities if they would renounce their Faith, but were threatn'd with more dreadful Tortures if they refused. These Methods proving ineffectual, they were condemn'd to die by the Tribunals; But the Emperor changed this Punishment into perpetual Confinement. Accordingly some were shut up in close Prisons, where three dy'd merely thro' Hardships; the rest were dispersed in the Provinces, to end their Days in obscure Dungeons, under a Load of Irons. The Ambassadors of Portugal and Russia, who were then at the Court of Pe-king, were Admirers of the Constancy and Intrepidity of these Illustrious Confessors of Jesus Christ.

How little soever this Prince appear'd to favour our Religion, which yet he could not but esteem, we cannot avoid praising his unwearied Application to Business; For he employ'd his Thoughts Night and Day to establish a wise Form of Government, and procure the Happiness of his Subjects. The way to gain his Favour is to present him some Scheme tending to benefit the Public, and comfort the People, upon which he immediately resolves, and puts it in Execution, without sparing any Expence. He hath made several fine Regulations to honour Merit, and reward Virtue, to raise an Emulation among Husbandmen, and to relieve his Subjects in Years of Sterility. These excellent Qualities have in a very short time gain'd him the Respect and Love of all his Subjects.

The fiftieth Year of the Cycle, 1730 (c), the Emperor's thirteenth Brother, who shar'd with him the Burthen of Affairs, dy'd the nineteenth of June, of a languishing Distemper, being worn away merely by his excessive Application. The Emperor was so inconsolable for his Loss, that it even prejudiced his Health. He caus'd extraordinary Honours to be paid to this Prince, which he was pleas'd to account for to the Public by frequent Declarations; wherein he intimated, how desirous he was that all the World should share in his Grief, and assist at his Funeral, without Distinction of Rank; giving leave both to Great and Small to honour the Deceased in their own way, either by Presents or Encomiums. He added nevertheless, that he would constrain no body, and that those who did not think this Prince deserved such Honours were at Liberty not to pay them; yet at the same time he appointed Officers to take Notice of all those who perform'd this Duty, and to give him an account of them daily. His Body was expos'd in the great Ting, where none were admitted but the Princes of the Blood. Before the first Gate of the Palace there is a great Court, in the middle of which a Hall was erected, made of Mats, with a Throne in it, for the Deceased was not only a Regulo of the first Order, but had also the Title of Quê-vang or King; and before this Throne stood a small Table, upon which were only two Candlesticks and a Perfuming-Pan. The Entrance into the Hall was by a Folding-Door, which was opened as often as the Officers of the Tribunal came in their turns to pay their Reverence, a set Number entering at a time. At first they stood upright behind the Tables, placed on the side of the Hall; then kneeling down, they made six several Prostrations, giving a deep Groan all together, and so silently withdrew; being succeeded by others, who perform'd the same Ceremonies Ceremonies. Some time after the Body was carry'd to a Palace built on purpose, above half a League from the City, where those Rites were repeated; and here the Mandarins of the City, with the whole Body of Merchants, and the meaner sort of People went to pay him the last Honours.

One hundred Days after this he was carry'd to another Place, prepared in the same manner, where he lay the same space of Time. In short, there were five several Stations, of an hundred Days each, where the same Ceremonies were observ'd; and then he was convey'd to the Place of his Sepulchre, which the Emperor had caused to be prepar'd, being four Leagues in Circumference. The Mandarins of the Provinces either came to perform this Rite themselves, or deputed their Sons in their stead; afterwards they caused Monuments to be rais'd in their respective Districts, which contain the greatest Elogiums on the illustrious Deceased. The Emperor had his Name plac'd in the Hall of Emperors; a very extraordinary Distinction, and which is never conferr'd on private Persons, but when they have render'd the most important Services to the State.

Dreadful Earthquake.

On the thirteenth of November, the Year following, being 1731, the City of Pe-king was almost overturn'd by an Earthquake, the most extraordinary that ever afflicted China. The first Shocks, which happen'd a little before eleven in the Morning, were so very sudden and violent, that they were not perceived but by the dreadful Noise made by the falling of the Houses and Buildings. One would have imagin'd that they had been blown up in the Air by a general Mine, and that the Earth had open'd under Foot; for in less than a Minute upwards of a hundred thousand Inhabitants were bury'd in the Ruins, and a still greater number in the Country, where whole Towns were intirely destroy'd.

In singular Course.

What is singular in this Earthquake is, that it was not equal throughout the Line of its Course; for in some Places it made great Devastations, and seem'd to skip over others, where the Shocks were but slightly felt. Nothing could resist two Shocks so sudden and contrary to each other; and where the resisting Matter was most solid, there the Effects were most violent. This was follow'd by twenty three other smaller Shocks in less than twenty four Hours.

The Emperor was then at his fine Pleasure-House two Leagues from Pe-king, which was instantly reduc'd to such a miserable Condition, that to repair it will require an immense Sum of Money. He was taking the Air in a Bark upon a Canal, which runs thro' his Gardens, when immediately falling prostrate, he lifted his Hands and Eyes towards Heaven. Afterwards he publish'd an Edict, wherein he accus'd himself; attributing this Evil to the Wrath of Heaven for his Offences, and to his want of Care in governing the Empire.

Emperor's
Liberality.

This Prince appear'd very sensible of the Affliction of his People, and commanded several Officers to make a List of the demolish'd Houses, and to enquire what Damage each Family had sustain'd, advancing several considerable Sums towards their Relief. The Missionaries at Pe-king partook of his Liberality; for he admitted them to Audience, where he receiv'd them kindly, and gave them a thousand Taels towards repairing their Churches.

The Missionaries expelled to Ma-kau.

The fifty second Year of the Cycle, 1732 (A), the Missionaries, who were ten Years before driven from the Provinces, and banish'd to Kan-ton, were now forced from Kan-ton to Ma-kau, (a little City belonging to the Portuguese, but where notwithstanding the Chinese are Masters) being allow'd but three Days to prepare for their Journey, and to carry away their Goods. The only Reason given for such hard Usage was, that they had disobey'd the Emperor's Order, in preaching the Christian Law.

and their
punish'd.

The twentieth of August they embark'd to the number of thirty, under the Convoy of four Gallies and two Mandarins. When they came to Ma-kau, the Mandarins caus'd their Domestics, and the Christians, who had follow'd the Missionaries, to land also, and sent them back, loaded with Irons to Kan-ton; where, after being dragg'd in an ignominious Manner before several Tribunals, some were cast into Prison, others receiv'd the Bastinado, and others were condemn'd to carry the Kan-ghe for a Month or two. They all confess'd openly the Name of Christ, and gave public Testimony to the Truth and Holiness of their Religion. (B)

These are the most remarkable Transactions hitherto under this Emperor, who is now in the twelfth Year of his Reign, and governs his vast Dominions with an absolute Authority; so that here I must finish the Fashi [or Annals] of this great Monarchy.

(A) The Year 1732 was the 49th of the Cycle.

(B) Since this was written Yang-ching dy'd in 1736, and the Missionaries are in hopes of being restor'd; but methinks without any real Grounds. For since they acknowledge they found numbers of Jews and Mohammedans in China, on their first Arrival, but no Christians, notwithstanding their being so numerous, as they pretend, in former Ages, and that several Emperors themselves embraced the Faith, how can they hope for better Success now? And indeed it seems almost impossible that the Romish Religion should ever gain firm footing in that Country; considering how very averse the Mandarins in general (with the rest of the Followers of Confucius) are to it, as looking on it to be the counterpart of the Religion of the Bamars or Lamas, who, by their Arts to delude and fleece the Peoples by their pretended Revelations and Miracles; by their recommending a Monastic Life to both Sexes; and especially by their praying to Saints, and use of Images in Religion, have been odious to them in all Ages, as appears from the foregoing Annals.

CHINESE MONARCHY.

CHINA has this Advantage over all other Nations, that for more than four thousand Years, it has been almost constantly governed by its own Princes; and has continued the same, with regard to the Attire, Morals, Laws, Customs and Manners of the Inhabitants, without deviating in the least from the wise Institutions of its ancient Legislators.

Antiquity of the Chinese Nation.

As the Inhabitants find within themselves every thing that is necessary for the Conveniences and Pleasures of Life; so judging their native Soil sufficient to supply all their Wants, they have ever affected to carry on no Commerce with the rest of Mankind. This Ignorance of distant Countries led them into the ridiculous Persuasion that they were Masters of the whole World; that they inhabited the greater Part of it; and that all without the Bounds of China were Barbarians: Which Aversion to foreign Trade, joined to the Solidity of the People, has not a little contributed to the constant Uniformity found in their Manners.

Unchangeable in their Manners and Customs.

Concerning the Origin of this Empire, there are two Opinions among the learned Chinese; for they do not give into the Chimerical Notions of the Vulgar, who, on the Credit of some fabulous Authors, place it in imaginary Ages before the Creation. Their best Historians distinguish their Chronology into the Fabulous, the Doubtful, and the Certain; and being unwilling to admit any thing that is not grounded on Truth, reject the Ages preceding Wbang-ti, as uncertain, or not to be reduced to a true Chronological Order; and the Times before Fo-bi, as fabulous.

Opinions about the Origin of the Empire.

These Authors therefore consider (A) Fo-bi as the Founder of their Monarchy, who about two hundred Years after the Deluge, according to the Septuagint, reigned first towards the Confines of Sben-si. and in the Province of Ho-nan, situate almost in the Heart of the Empire; after which he cleared all that Tract of Land extending from thence to the Eastern Ocean.

Fo-bi the Founder of the Monarchy.

This is the Opinion of almost all the Literati: and indeed it is so well supported by a constant Tradition, and the Authority of their most ancient Histories, which could not have been altered by Strangers, that it's generally look'd upon as incontestable. According to these Yau was the fifth Emperor, tho' there are other Chinese Authors, who carry their Monarchy no higher than his Reign: But should any one presume to place its Commencement lower, he would not only be

(A) Among the Chimeras of the Learned, may be placed the Notion some of late have entertained, that Fo-bi is the same with Nuab; which Conjecture is grounded on some faint, or rather forced Resemblance between certain Circumstances in the History of each, set forth at large in a Modern Performance. See Univ. Hist. Vol. I. p. 116. in the Note.

be laughed at, but severely chastised, if not put to Death; and should the Missionaries betray the least Suspicion of that Kind, it would be sufficient Ground to banish them out of the Empire.

China Inhabited for certain 2155 Years before Christ.

It is certain however, that China was inhabited above 2155 Years before the Birth of Christ, which is demonstrable from an Eclipse of the Sun that Year; as may be seen in the Astronomical Observations, extracted from the Chinese History and other Books in that Language, and published in the Year 1729. (B)

The most ancient Empires of the Assyrians, Medes, Persians and Greeks, have been long since destroyed; whereas that of China, like its great Rivers, which always flow with the same Majesty, has lost nothing in so many Ages, either of its Beauty or Splendor: For as often as this Monarchy has been disturbed by Civil Wars, the weak or bad Conduct of its Emperors, or by a foreign Yoke, the Evil has been but of short Continuance; the Wisdom of the fundamental Laws, joined to the happy Dispositions of the People, always affording the Means to recover itself.

Thus for four thousand Years and more, this Imperial Throne has been possessed, without any Interruption, by twenty two Families; in which they reckon two hundred and thirty-four Emperors, who reigned successively till the Invasion of the Tartar King, who about eighty-five Years since seized the Crown, and has given China three Emperors of his Family, namely, Shun-chi, who reigned seventeen Years; Kang-bi, who reigned sixty Years; and Tong-ching, who ascended the Throne in 1722. [but is since dead.]

Easy Conquest by the Manchew's, to what owing.

This Conquest was made with the most surprizing Facility, thro' the Mis-understandings of the Chinese, and the various Factions which divided both the Court and the Empire. The greater Part of the Imperial Army was employ'd at that time near the Great Wall, in opposing one of the Kings of the Eastern Tartars, called Manchew's: who to revenge the Injustice done his Subjects in trading with the Chinese Merchants, and the little Regard shewn by the Court to his Complaints, had entred into Lyau-tong, at the Head of a formidable Army, and begun a War, which lasted many Years; in the Course of which several Battles were fought, Cities besieged, and Irruptions made into the Empire, with various Success on both Sides.

Great Success of Li-kong, a Rebel.

Mean time the Emperor Tsong-ching, lived very easy in his Capital, tho' he had but little Reason to be so. For the unjust Punishment, to which he had condemned one of his most considerable Ministers, his excessive Severity, and extreme Covetousness, which would not permit him to lessen the Taxes, even in a time of the greatest Scarcity, having provoked the People to revolt, in the Capital as well as in the Provinces; a Chinese of the Province of Se-chuen, called Li-kong-tse, who was a bold enterprizing Man, put himself at the Head of a great Number of Rebels; and his Army increasing daily with the Malecontents, in a short time he made himself Master of several considerable Towns, and even whole Provinces. He gained the Affections of the People, by easing them of the heavy Taxes, and by turning out the Magistrates, placing in their stead others, in whom he could confide, charging them to use his Subjects with Mildness; but on the other hand, he gave up every City which made the least Resistance, to be plunder'd by his Soldiers. In short, after he had enriched himself with the Spoils of the delightful Province of Ho-nan, he went into that of Shen-si, where he was declared Emperor, under the Name of Tyen-shun, which signifies, He that obeys Heaven; in order to persuade the People, that he was the Instrument appointed by Heaven to deliver them from the Tyranny and Oppression of the Ministers.

He is declared Emperor.

When the Rebel found himself near Pe-king, where the Divisions among the Grande'es favour'd the Attempts of his Spies to get Intelligence, he resolv'd without farther Delay to take that Capital. Most of its Troops were then on the Frontiers of Tartary, and several Chiefs of those which remain'd, being gain'd over, were ready to join with the Tyrant: who besides had sent a great Number of his best Soldiers into the City, disguised like Merchants, with Money to hire Shops and carry on a Trade; that being thus dispersed into every Part of it they might awe the Inhabitants and favour his Design, whenever he should appear before the Walls.

The Success answered his Expectations: for his Army was no sooner in sight of the City, before Sun-rise, than one of the Gates was opened to him; and the few faithful Soldiers that resisted him being quickly overpower'd, he march'd thro' the City, like a Conqueror, directly to the Palace, the first Wall of which was forced before the Emperor heard any thing of the Matter. This unhappy Prince, thus forsaken and betray'd by his Courtiers, finding it not in his Power to escape the Fury of his Enemy; and fearing to fall into the Hands of a Rebel more than Death itself, retired in Despair into one of his Gardens with his Daughter, and having first killed her at one Stroke with a Sabre, he hanged himself on a Tree.

All submit but the General U-san-gbey.

After this Catastrophe all submitted to the Tyrant, who, to establish himself on the Throne, put to Death several of the great Mandarins, and exacted large Sums of Money from others. None refused to acknowledge him for Emperor, except U-san-gbey, who commanded the Forces that were on the Frontiers of Tartary; to reduce whom he set out with his Army, taking along with him the Father of that General, called U, who then lived at Pe-king, and was venerable for his Age as well as Dignities.

U-san-gbey having retired into one of the Cities of Lyau-tong, the new Emperor besieged it, and ordering U to be brought out in Chains, threaten'd to cut his Throat before the General's Face, if he did not submit to him forthwith.

(B) We are obliged for the Extracts here meant to P. Gaubil, who transmitted them with many other very curious Matters relating to the Chinese Astronomy and History, which were published by P. Etienne Soucier, under the Title of Observations Mathematiques, Geographiques, Chronologiques & Physiques, &c.

U-fan-ghey, after being agitated for a while between the Love of his Country and Filial Tenderness, at length sacrificed his Father to his Virtue; the old Man himself, extolling the Loyalty of his Son, met his Fate with an heroic Courage. This cruel Action provoked the General so much the more to seek Revenge; but as it was difficult for him long to resist the Efforts of the Usurper, he thought that by piquing the Generosity of the Tartar King, he might not only obtain Peace from him, but likewise his Assistance, with all his Forces. Tsong-té, (which was the Name of this King) incited by a secret Ambition, more than the Riches offer'd by the Chinese General, liked the Proposition so well, that the very same Day he appear'd at the Head of eighty thousand Men. The Usurper being inform'd of the Union of the Chinese and Tartarian Armies, durst not encounter two such great Commanders, but retir'd in haste to Pe-king; and having loaded several Wagons with the choicest Goods of the Palace, he set it on Fire, and fled into the Province of Shen-si, where he took such Care to hide himself, that the Place of his Retreat could never be found; Altho' he made great Speed, yet part of the Plunder fell into the Hands of the Tartarian Cavalry, who pursued him; However, Tsong-té, who might easily have routed his Army, chose rather to repair to Pe-king, where he was joyfully received, both by the Gracians and the People. All looked on him as their Deliverer, and were manag'd so dexterously that they intreated him to take into his Hands the Government of the Empire, which was the thing he aim'd at. But he did not long enjoy his Conquest, for he dy'd quickly after, having only time to name Shun-chi, his Son, for his Successor, who was but six Years Old; leaving the Care of his Education and the Government to one of his Brothers call'd A-ma-vang.

U-fan-ghey calls in the Manchews.

Li-king flies; and is heard of no more.

King of the Manchews proclaimed Emperor and dies.

This Prince by his Courage and Policy reduced most of the Provinces, which were averse to the Tartar Yoke; and tho' he might have kept the Empire to himself, yet he surrender'd the Government to his Nephew, as soon as he had attain'd the proper Age. The young Emperor shew'd himself at once so able in the Art of Reigning, that he soon gain'd the Hearts of his Subjects; and as nothing escap'd his Vigilance and Penetration, he found Means to unite the Chinese and Tartars so firmly, that they seem'd to be but one Nation. During his Reign he maintain'd the Grandeur of the Empire with such a Superiority of Genius, as made him admired by his Subjects when living, and regretted when dead. Being at the Point of Death, which happen'd in the twenty fourth Year of his Age, he call'd his four chief Ministers; and having express'd his Concern for not having been able to reward those who had faithfully serv'd his Father, he declared, that Kang-hi, who was then but eight Years old, was of all his Children fittest to succeed him, and recommended his Education to their Care.

Most of China reduced under his Son Shun-chi.

The Day after the Death of the Emperor Shun-chi, his Body being put in a Coffin, Kang-hi was proclaim'd Emperor; when ascending the Throne, all the Princes, Lords, Prime Officers of the Army and the Crown, with the Mandarins of the several Tribunals, prostrated themselves at his Feet three times, striking the Ground with their Fore-Heads every Time they kneel'd, and made the nine Customary Reverences.

Kang-hi succeeds.

Nothing could equal the Magnificence of the Great Court, where this Ceremony was perform'd. All the Mandarins were ranged on both sides, dress'd in Silk, flower'd with Gold, in the form of Roses; there were fifty who carry'd great Umbrellas of Gold-Brocade and Silk, with their Staves gilt, and were divided in two Rows, twenty five on each side of the Throne. On the side of them were fifty other Officers with large Fans of Silk embroider'd with Gold; and near these were twenty eight large Standards, imbroider'd with golden Stars, great Dragons, and the Figure of the Moon in its Change, its Full and Wane, with all its various Phases and Appearances: In order to represent its twenty eight Mansions in the Heavens, and its different Conjunctions and Oppositions with the Sun, as they appear in the Intersections of the Circles, which the Astronomers call Nodes, or the Dragon's Head and Tail. A hundred Standards follow'd these; and the rest of the Mandarins carry'd Maces, Axes, Hammers, and other Instruments of War or Ceremony, with Heads of strange Monsters and other Animals.

Ascends the Throne with great Magnificence

The Sovereign Power was never so absolute as under this Monarch; who during his whole Reign, which was one of the longest to be met with, was not only held in Veneration throughout Asia, but his great Merit and Renown passing the Ocean, procur'd him the Admiration and Esteem of all Europe. It was he, who, uniting the two Tartaries with China into one Empire, brought under his Power a vast Extent of Country, which is no where interrupted by the Territories belonging to any foreign Prince. As none but the Western Tartars were able to give him Disturbance, he partly by Policy, and partly by Force, oblig'd them to remove three hundred Miles beyond the Great Wall, where he gave them Lands and Pastures, settling his own Subjects in their Room. In short, he divided this immense Country into several Provinces, which were tributary and subject to him; and kept them still more in Awe by means of the Lama's, who have an absolute Sway over the Minds of the Tartars, being ador'd by them like so many Divinities.

Unites the two Tartaries with China.

His Policy.

He made use of another Piece of Policy: for whereas his Predecessors shut themselves up in their Palaces, and were never seen by the People; he on the contrary went out of his three times a Year, either to travel or perform Hunting-Matches, which resembled so many military Expeditions.

Appears among his Subjects.

As soon as he had establish'd a solid Peace in his Dominions, he re-call'd the greater part of the Forces that were dispers'd thro' the Provinces; and to prevent their being soften'd by Ease and Luxury, march'd them from time to time into Tartary, arm'd with Bows, Arrows, and Cimeters: there to wage War with Stags, Boars, Bears, Tygers, and other wild Beasts, making his Soldiers perform long and fatiguing Journeys. This great Army was divided into Companies, and march'd in Order of Battle, at the Sound of Drums and Trumpets. It had its Van, Rear, main Body, right right and left Wings, commanded by so many Princes and great Lords; and was follow'd by Waggon, Horses, Camels, and Mules, loaded with Provisions, and Ammunition. It was oblig'd to encamp every Night, there being neither Cities, Towns, nor Villages in the Western Tartary, whose Inhabitants dwell in Tents, dispersed over the Country; where they feed their Oxen, Horses, and Camels, removing from Place to Place for the Convenience of Pasture. They know nothing of sowing Corn or cultivating Land, but live on Milk, Cheese, and what they can take in Hunting.

Tartars with the Chinese in the Tribunals

While the Emperor thus kept his Troops in Action, and the Tartars in Obedience, he did not lessen his Application to State-Affairs, but held his Councils regularly with his Ministers under a Tent, as if it had been a Palace, and gave them his Orders. He was inform'd of every thing, and govern'd the Empire wholly, by himself, as the Soul that gave Motion to all the Members of so great a Body, not intrusting the Administration either to his Ko-lau's, or to the great Lords of the Court; as for the Eunuchs of the Palace, who had so much Power in the preceding Reigns, they had not the least Authority. Another piece of his Policy was, to appoint one half of the Officers of the Tribunals Chinese, and the other half Tartars, who being so many Spies on each other, might prevent any Attempts to the Prejudice of either Nation; besides, it oblig'd the Tartars to apply themselves early to Literature, in order to qualify themselves for Employments, according to the ancient Custom of the Empire.

Extent of the Empire.

Ever since the Peace, which this Prince concluded with the Russians at Nip-chu, for settling the Limits, the true Extent of this great Empire has been known; being in length from the most Southern Point of [the Island of] Hay-nan, to the Extremity of that Part of Tartary, subject to the Emperor, upwards of nine hundred common Leagues of France. Besides there are many Kingdoms, as Korea, Tong-king, Kochin-china, Siam, &c. which are tributary to the Emperor, who sometimes appoints, and must always confirm their Kings. But these Countries differ from China, as well in their respective Forms of Government, as in the Fertility of their Soil; the Number, Beauty, and Largeness of their Cities; the Religion, Genius, Manners, and Politeness of their Inhabitants: so that the Chinese have very little Esteem for them, calling them Barbarians, and industriously avoiding all Alliance with them.

Multitude of its Inhabitants.

The fifteen Provinces, into which China is divided, are not equally peopled; for from Pe-king to Nan-chang, which is the Capital of Kyang-si, the People are not so numerous as in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, Quang-tong, Fe-kyen, and some others, where the great Roads as well as Cities are so crowded, that it is troublesome to travel; whence the Missionaries, who have seen only those fine and populous Provinces, have exaggerated the Number of Inhabitants, which however far exceeds that of all Europe put together. Altho' Pe-king stands on more Ground than Paris, I don't believe it contains above three Millions of Souls; which Computation is the more certain, as every Head of a Family is oblig'd to give the Magistrates an account of the Number of Persons that compose it, with the Age and Sex of each.

Great Number of Cities, Towns, Fortresses, &c.

Several things contribute to make this Country so prodigiously populous, as the Chinese being allow'd many Wives; their Sobriety and strong Constitution; their Contempt for other Nations, which prevents their settling or even travelling abroad; the Goodness of the Climate which has been hitherto free from the Plague; and especially the almost perpetual Peace which they enjoy.

There are in each Province, besides the Capital (which is very large and fit to be the Seat of the Empire) a great Number of Cities of the first, second, and third Order; most of which are built on the Banks of navigable Rivers, with large Suburbs on each side. Add to these a multitude of Forts, Castles, Villages, and Towns; some of which latter, especially those call'd Cbing, vye with Cities in Magnitude, Number of Inhabitants, and Trade: tho' they are only call'd Towns, because they have neither Walls, nor Magistrates of their own, being govern'd by those of the neighbouring Cities; thus King-te-ching, where the finest Porcelain is made, depends on a City in the District of Zbau-chew, and Fe-shan on Kan-ton, which is but four Leagues distant, &c.

Form of the Cities.

Most of the Cities of China, (but not all as some have affirmed) are alike, being Oblong Squares, whose Walls are built on a Line at right Angles, and facing the four Cardinal Points as near as may be. In like manner, whatever way the Streets are disposed, the Houses ought always to front the South, in order to avoid the sharpness of the Northwind, which does not agree with the Chinese; and for this Reason the Door is commonly made slanting in one of the sides of the Court.

Their Walls.

The Walls of the Cities, which are generally very broad and high, are either of Brick or square Stone, surrounded by a wide Ditch, and fence'd behind with a Rampart of Earth, as well as fortify'd with square Towers at certain Distances.

Their Gates.

Every Gate is double, and opens with two Leaves; and between the Gates is a Place of Arms for exercising the Soldiers. When one enters the first Gate, the second is not to be seen, because not opposite. Above the Gates are fine Towers, which serve for Arsenals and Guard-Houses for Soldiers; and without the Gates are frequently large Suburbs, almost as populous as the City.

Their Towers.

In the most frequented parts of each City, there is one or more Towers, which make a most beautiful Appearance, on account of their Architecture and Height; some consisting of nine, but none of less than seven Stories. The principal Streets are generally streight, but often narrow, except those of the Imperial City, which are very wide, as well as long; and perhaps the most convenient in the World, especially for Horses and Waggon. All the Houses, excepting the Towers and some particular Buildings overtopping the rest, are very low; and so hid by the Walls of the City

City, that were it not for a great number of square Towers that appear, one would take it at a distance for a vast Park. There are waste Places in some of the Cities, because not re-built since they were ruin'd by the Tartars, who lately conquer'd China. But what is very remarkable, near the great Cities, especially in the Southern Provinces, there are seen a kind of floating Cities; consisting of a prodigious multitude of Barks on both sides of the River, which are inhabited by numbers of Families, who have no other Dwellings: so that the Water is almost as populous as the Land.

There are properly but two Orders in the Empire, one of the Nobility, and the other of the People. The first comprehends the Princes of the Blood; the Dukes, Earls, Mandarins of Learning and Arms; those that have been Mandarins formerly, but are not so at present; and the Literati, who by their Studies having obtain'd the first Degrees of Literature, are aspiring to the Magistracy and Dignities of the Empire. The second comprehends the Husbandmen, Merchants, and Tradesmen. I shall treat of each of these in their Order, according to the Plan I have laid down.

China's divided into two Classes.

Of the Authority of the Emperor, and Seals of the Empire; his common Expences, his Palace, his Equipage, and the Order of his March when he goes abroad.

THERE is no Monarchy whose Government is more despotic than that of China. The Emperor is vested with absolute Authority, and to appearance is a kind of Divinity; The Respect which is paid him amounting to a sort of Adoration. His Words are like so many Oracles, and the least of his Commands as implicitly obey'd as if they came down from Heaven. None are suffer'd to speak to him but on their Knees, not even his eldest Brother; or to appear before him with Ceremony in any other Posture, unless he gives Orders to the contrary. Only the Lords who accompany him, are permitted to stand before him, and to bend one Knee when they speak to him.

Authority and Majesty of the Emperor.

The same Honours are paid the Emperor's Officers, when representing his Person, and giving his Orders, either as Envoys, or Mandarins of the Presence. Little short of this is the Respect due to Governors, when they administer Justice, who with regard to the People may be said to be Emperors, and Subjects with regard to their Superiors: which admirable Subordination contributes more than any thing else to the Repose of the Empire, where it is never consider'd who the Person is, but whom he represents.

Descend to his Officers.

The Mandarins, the Grandees of the Court, and the Princes of the Blood, prostrate themselves not only in the Presence of the Emperor, but often even before his Chair, his Throne, and every thing that is for his Use; kneeling down sometimes at the sight of his Habit or his Girdle. Not that they are either blind to his Faults, or approve of them; on the contrary, they blame them in their Hearts, and condemn him, when they see him abandon'd to Avarice, Anger, or any such shameful Passion. Yet they think they ought to give these public Marks of Veneration for their Emperor, in order to maintain Subordination so essential to every good Government; and to inspire the People, by their Examples, with the Submission, and Obedience due to his Authority. In consequence of this Maxim they give him the most lofty Titles, calling him Tyen-tse, the Son of Heaven; Wbang-ti, August and sovereign Emperor; Sbing-wbang, Holy Emperor; Sbau-ting, Palace Royal; Van-fwi, Ten thousand Years. These Names, and many more of the same Nature, shew not only their great Respect for his Person, but the Vows they make for his Preservation.

Profound Veneration paid him.

No Subject, be his Rank or Quality ever so great, dares ride on Horseback, or pass in a Chair before the Gate of his Palace; but as soon as he approaches it, he must alight, and not mount again till he comes to the Place appointed for that Purpose. On certain stated Days of the Week, or Month, all the Grandees are oblig'd to appear in Habits of Ceremony, in one of the Courts of the Palace, to pay their Homage; where, if he does not appear personally, they must prostrate themselves before his Throne. If he falls dangerously sick, it causes a general Alarm, the Mandarins of all Orders assemble in a vast Court of the Palace; and without regarding the Inclemencies of the Air, or the Rigor of the Season, pass both Nights and Days on their Knees, to testify their Grief, and intreat Heaven to restore his Health. For if the Emperor suffers, all the Empire suffers in his Person, his Loss being the only Misfortune which his Subjects ought to dread.

His Throne adored in his Absence.

In the middle of the Courts of the Palace, there is a Path paved with large Stones, for the Emperor to walk on when he goes out; and those that pass along it must run fast, which is a mark of Respect observ'd in passing before a Person of Quality: but they have a particular way of Running, which is esteem'd as graceful among the Chinese, as the making a handsome Bow in Europe. The first Missionaries were oblig'd to learn this Ceremony before they saluted the late Emperor

Marks of Respect.

Emperor upon their Arrival at Pe-king: After they had pass'd thro' eight great Courts, they arriv'd at his Apartment, which was a Kong; for so they call the great Halls or Parlours, standing by themselves, built upon Slabs of white Marble, where the Emperor lives.

This Kong consisted of a Hall, in which there was a Throne, and a Chamber, where he was sitting on a Kan or Estrade, raised three Foot, which took up the whole length of the Room. The Kan was cover'd with a plain white Felt, affecting perhaps this Simplicity as being in Mourning for his Grand-Mother. His Habit was only of Black Sattin, lin'd with Sable-Fur, such as most of the considerable Officers wear; he sat cross legg'd after the Tartarian Fashion, and they made the Imperial Salute, as perform'd by those who have Audience of this Prince.

The Imperial Salute.

As soon as the Person is enter'd the Door of the Hall, he must run in a graceful manner till he comes to the Bottom of the Chamber fronting the Emperor; where he must stand a little while with both Arms stretch'd downwards, and after bending his Knees, bow to the Ground three times, then rise up again: and repeat this last Ceremony the second and third time, till he is commanded to advance, and kneel at the Emperor's Feet.

The Imperial Colour and Arms.

Yellow is the Emperor's Colour, and is forbidden every body else. His Vest is cover'd with Dragons, which is his Coat of Arms; none else daring to wear them with five Claws, on pain of Punishment. He dates his Letters, Decrees, and all his publick Acts with the Years of his Reign, and the Day of the Moon; as for Instance, The sixteenth Year of my Reign, and the sixth of the fourth Moon.

The Sentiments of the profoundest Veneration for their Emperors, which the Chinese are brought up in from their Cradles, are corroborated by that absolute and boundless Power vested in him by the Laws. He only has the Disposall of the Lives and Fortunes of his Subjects; nor can the Vice-Roy, the Tribunals, nor any sovereign Court of Judicature, punish a Criminal with Death, till the Sentence be first confirm'd by the Emperor.

The Condition of the Princes of the Blood.

The Princes of the Blood-Royal, however dignify'd by their Birth, have neither Power nor Credit in the State. They have the Title of Regulo, and are allow'd a Palace, and a Court with Officers and a Revenue conformable to their Rank; but they have not the least Authority over the People, who yet pay them the greatest Respect. Formerly, when they were dispersed in the Provinces, the Officers of the Crown remitted them their Revenue every three Months; that by spending it as fast as it came to hand, they might be disabled from laying up any part of it for seditious or rebellious Purposes, and they were even forbidden on pain of Death to remove from the Place appointed for their Residence: but since the Tartars have been Master of China, the Emperor judg'd it more proper that all the Princes should live at Court under his Eye. They have also Houses, Lands, and Rents, besides what the Emperor allows them for their Expences; and improve their Money by the Industry of their Domesticks, so that some of them are very rich.

Emperor disposes of all Employments.

The Emperor alone disposes of all Offices in the State. He names the Vice-Roys and Governors, raising and degrading them according to their Capacities and Merits, (for, generally speaking, no Place in the Empire is venal;) even the Princes of the Blood have no Right to their Title, without his expresse Permission, which they could not obtain if they were irregular in their Conduct, or negligent in their Duty. He chuses for his Heir such of his Sons as he judges fittest to succeed him; and if he thinks there is none of his Family capable of governing well, he pitches on one of his Subjects whom he deems most worthy. In the earliest times there have been Instances of Princes, who are still revered by the Chinese for having prefer'd the Welfare of the State to the Glory and Splendor of their own Family; but for several Ages past, the Emperors have nominated their Successors out of the Princes of their own Blood. However, it is necessary that the Person elected should have real Merit, and proper Qualifications, for otherwise the Emperor would lose his Reputation, and infallibly occasion great Disorders. On the other hand if he prefers to the eldest one who has more Merit, then his Name becomes immortal; but if, after being declar'd his Successor with the usual Solemnities, he is wanting in his Duty, or commits any great Misdemeanor, it is in the Emperor's Power to disinherit him, and name another in his Place.

Can choose a Successor, and depose him at Pleasure.

The late Emperor Kang-hi, making use of this Right, deposed in a very singular Manner his only Son by his lawful Wife, on suspecting his Fidelity. It was surprizing to see him, who but a little before was almost equal to the Emperor, loaded with Irons. His Children and principal Officers were involv'd in the same Fate; and the publick Gazettes were immediately fill'd with Manifesto's, wherein the Emperor inform'd his Subjects of his Reasons. No Sentence of any Tribunal whatever is of force till ratify'd by the Emperor: but those that proceed immediately from himself are perpetual and irrevocable; the Vice-Roys and Tribunals of the Provinces being oblig'd to have them registred, and publish'd immediately in all Places of their Jurisdiction. His Power extends over the Dead as well as Living, bestowing Titles of Honour on the Deceased; for, to recompense the Personal Merit, either of the Deceased or their Descendants, he confers Titles of Honour on them, which extend to their whole Families.

Fundamental Principle of the Chinese Government

But absolute as his Power is, it is restrain'd by the same Law that enforces it. It is a Principle as old as the Monarchy itself, That the State is a large Family; and that a Prince ought to have the same Regard for his Subjects, that a Father has for his Children, whom he ought to govern with an equal Goodness and Affection. This Notion is engrafted in the Minds of the Chinese, who judge of the Merit and Talents of the Prince, solely by the Paternal Affection which he shews to his Subjects; and the Care he takes to make them sensible of it by procuring their Happiness. So that he ought to be, according to their way of expressing it, The Father and Mother of his People; nor ought he to make himself

A Check to the Emperor's Power.

fear'd by them, but in proportion as he gains their Love by his Goodness and Virtue. It is in this manner they draw the Character of their great Emperors, and their Books are full of this Maxim.

It is the general Notion of the Chinese, that an Emperor is oblig'd to attend to the minutest matters which concern his People; that he is not elevated to so high a Station to divert himself; but that he should place his Diversions in discharging the Duties of the Emperor, and prove by his Application, Vigilance, and Tenderness for his Subjects, that he is The Father and Mother of his People. When his Conduct is not agreeable to this Idea, he falls into the utmost Contempt; "Why (say the Chinese) has Tyen placed him on the Throne? Is it not that he may be as a Father and a Mother to us?"

He is considered as a Father of the People.

A Chinese Emperor is continually studying how to preserve this Reputation. Whenever any Province is afflicted with Calamities, he shuts himself up in his Palace, fasts, denies himself of all Pleasures, and publishes Decrees to exempt it from the usual Taxes, and procure it sufficient Relief. In those Decrees he affects also to set forth how deeply he is touch'd with the Miseries of his People, saying, "That he carries them in his Heart; that he bewails their Misfortune Night and Day; and that all his Thoughts are employ'd to render them happy:" making use of many such Expressions, to convince his Subjects how tenderly he loves them. The Emperor Tong-ehing went so far as to order, that whenever any part of the Empire was threatened with a Calamity, he should be inform'd of it instantly by a Courier; that as he believed himself accountable for every Misfortune that befel the State, he might by his Conduct appease the Anger of Tyen. The Laws are a farther Check on the Sovereign Authority, in that they allow the Mandarins, whenever the Emperor commits any Faults in his Administration tending to overthrow good Order in the Government, to represent them to him in the most humble and respectful manner by way of Petition: and should he either disregard such Remonstrances, or punish the Mandarin, who had the Courage and Zeal to make them, he would intirely lose the Hearts of the People; while the Mandarin would have the highest Applauses, and his Name become immortal. There have been several of these Martyrs for the Public in China, who, when the Prince deviated from a wise Administration, spoke their Minds, without fearing either Punishment or Death itself.

Endeavours to preserve that Character.

The Quán or Mandarins allow'd to tell him his Faults.

Besides, the Tranquillity of the Empire depends intirely upon the Prince's Care to see the Laws put in Execution. For such is the Genius of the Chinese, that were not the Emperor and his Council steady and attentive to the Conduct of the Vice-Roys and the Mandarins, who are at a distance from the Court, they would become so many petty Tyrants in the Provinces, and banish Justice from the Tribunals. This would raise such a Spirit in that numerous People, that finding themselves ill used and oppress'd in any Province, they would begin to assemble, and soon break out into a General Revolt. The Discontent would quickly spread from one Province to another, and thus the whole Empire would presently be in a Flame. For it is the Character of this Nation, that if the first Sparks of Rebellion be not immediately quench'd, they in a short time produce the most dangerous Revolutions, whereof China furnishes several Examples: which have taught the Emperors, that nothing but an indefatigable Application, and their treading in the Steps of their wise Ancestors, can secure their Authority.

One of the most considerable Marks of the Imperial Authority is, The Seals; which are employ'd to authorise the Public Acts, and all the Decisions of the Tribunals. The Emperor's Seal is about eight Inches square, and of a very fine Jasper, a Stone highly esteem'd in China; nor is any other Person whatever allow'd to use it in a Seal. It is call'd, Yu-she, and taken out of the In-yu-shan, that is, The Mountain of the Agate Seal, concerning which the Chinese relate several Fables. Among the rest they tell us, that formerly the Fong-wang having appear'd on this Mountain, rested on a rough Stone; which being broken by a skilful Lapidary he found therein this famous Stone, whereof the Seal of the Empire is made. The Fong-wang is the Phœnix of the Chinese, who account it a Bird of Prosperity, and the Fore-runner of the Golden Age; but indeed it exists only in their Books and Chimerical Paintings.

The Imperial Seals.

The Honorary Seals given to the Princes are of Gold; those of the Vice-Roys and great Mandarins, or Magistrates of the first Rank, are of Silver; and those of the inferior Mandarins, or Magistrates, are only of Brass or Lead, being larger or smaller according to the Dignity of the Magistrate. When it is worn out, they are to acquaint the Tribunal, which sends them another, obliging them to return the old one. Since the Tartars have settled in China, the Characters inscribed on these Seals are both Chinese and Tartarian, as the Tribunals are composed of both Nations. When the Emperor sends Visitors into the Provinces, to examine the Conduct of the Governors, Magistrates, and private Persons, he gives each of them the Seal of their Office.

Seals of Princes and the Quán.

One of these Visitors, having acted for some time in the Province appointed him, of a sudden disappear'd; and when any came to apply to him for Justice, his Domestics put them off, telling them their Master was so dangerously ill, that he could neither hear their Complaints, nor receive their Petitions. A Mandarin, who was one of his Friends, suspecting it to be only a feign'd Sickness, and fearing such a piece of Negligence would hurt him at Court, went to see him. After being put off several times by the Servants, he at length got Admittance into his Chamber, and ask'd his Reason for concealing himself in that manner.

Visitors or Censors of the Empire.

The Visitor still pretended to be indisposed: but the Mandarin press'd him so home, protesting to serve him, if Occasion were, at the hazard of his Life; that the Magistrate disclosing his Distress, "They have stolen, said he, the Seals given me by the Emperor, so that not being able to seal the Dispatches, I have thought fit to disappear". The Mandarin, who saw that the least least ill Consequence that could attend his Friend was the loss of his Employment, his own Fortune, and that of his Family, asked him if he had any Enemies. "Alas!" answered the Visitor "sighing, Hence arises my Confusion and Despair. The chief Magistrate of the City has declared himself against me on all Occasions which concern the Functions of my Office. He will certainly inform the Court, as soon as he comes to know I have lost the Seals, and then I am undone. Take my Advice, (reply'd the Mandarin, who was an ingenious Man,) remove every thing you have of Value into the most secret Part of your Palace, and at Night set the Apartment on Fire, and alarm the Neighbourhood. As soon as that Officer comes to give Orders according to his Duty, do you publickly deliver into his Hands the little Coffer where the Seals were kept; telling him, that as you have nothing so precious as that Depositum of the Emperor's, you give it into his Custody, till you have Occasion for it; and if he, my Lord, added the Mandarin, maliciously caused the Seals to be stolen, he will replace them in the Coffer; or you may accuse him with having lost them". The Matter succeeded as the Mandarin had foreseen, and the Seals were restored to the Visitor.

The Seals which the Magistrates receive from the Emperor, are on the Days of Ceremonies, (or when they go to visit those to whom they would show Respect) carry'd before their Chair in a golden Box, by two Men, upon a kind of a Litter; and being come to the Place appointed, they are laid on a Side-Table, cover'd with a Carpet.

Emperor's Revenue. The Emperor of China is render'd no less formidable on account of his great Revenue, than the Extent of his Empire. But it is not easy to say exactly what the first amounts to, because the Annual Tribute is paid partly in Money and partly in Commodities: and is collected from all kinds of Lands, even the Mountains; from Salts, Silks, Calico, Linen, and divers other Goods; from the Ports, Sea-Coasts, Custom-Houses and Barks; from the Forests, Royal Gardens, Consecrations, &c.

Number of People, The Tribute paid by every Person in this populous Empire between the Years of twenty and sixty, amounts to immense Sums; they say that formerly upward of 58,000,000 Inhabitants paid this Tax. In the Poll made at the Beginning of the Reign of Kang-hi, there were found 11,052,872 Families; and 59,788,364 Men able to bear Arms: and yet neither the Princes nor Officers of the Court; nor the Mandarins, nor the Soldiers who have served and been discharged; nor the Literati, the Licentiates, the Doctors, the Bonzas, nor young Persons under twenty years of Age; nor the great Multitudes living either on the Sea, or on Rivers, in Barks, are comprehended in this Number.

and Bonzas paying Tribute. The Number of Bonzas is a great deal above 1,000,000; of which there are 2,000 unmarried at Pe-king, besides 350,000 more in their Temples established in different Places by the Emperor's Patents. The [Literary] Batchelors alone are about 90,000. 'Tis true, the Civil Wars, and Settlement of the Tartars, destroy'd an innumerable Quantity of People; but they have increased extremely since, by means of the profound Peace.

Imperial Barks, and amount of the Tribute. There are, besides, 10,000 Barks maintained by the Emperor, for bringing to Court the Tribute in Commodities; he receiving annually 40,155,490 Sacks of Rice, Wheat and Millet, each Sack weighing a hundred and twenty Pounds; 1,315,937 Loaves of Salt, weighing fifty Pound each; 210,470 Sacks of Beans, and 22,598,597 Bundles of Straw for his Horses; in wrought Silks and Stuffs 191,530 Pound weight, each Pound of twenty Ounces; 409,896 Pound of unwrought Silk; 396,480 Pieces of Calico; 560,280 Pieces of Linen Cloth: besides vast Quantities of Velvet, Sattin, Damask, and other Silks; Varnish, Oxen, Sheep, Hogs, Geese, Ducks, Wild-Fowl, Fish, Pot-Herbs, Fruits, Spices; and many sorts of Wine, which are annually brought into the Imperial Palace. The whole Revenues of the Emperor amounting in French Money to near 200,000,000 of Tael; each being an Ounce of Silver, whose intrinick Value is a hundred French Sols.

The Emperor may lay new Taxes on the People, if the Occasions of the State should require it; but the settled Tributes being sufficient to defray all his Expences, he very seldom uses this Power. There is scarcely a Year but he excepts some Province or other from paying the Tribute, if it happens to be afflicted with Famine, or any other Calamity.

Order in levying, As the Lands are survey'd, and the Number of Families, as well as what is due to the Emperor, is known, 'tis easy to compute what each City ought to pay yearly. The Tax Gatherers of the respective Cities never seize the Goods of those who are slow in paying, or seek to avoid it by continual Delays, for that would ruin Families; and therefore from the middle of the Spring, when they begin to plow, to the time of Harvest, the Mandarins are not suffered to molest the Peasants. The Course they take to oblige them to pay, is by the Bastinado and Imprisonment; or else by billeting on them the old Men maintain'd in each Town on the Emperor's Charity, who remain in their Houses till they have consumed as much as their Arrears amount to.

and transmitting the Tribute. These Officers are accountable for what they receive to the Pu-ching-tse, or Treasurer General of the Province, who is next to the Viceroy; to whom at certain times they are obliged to remit the Money they collect. They send it on Mules, each carrying two thousand *Tael*s, in two wooden Vessels, like long Barrels, which are secured with Iron Cramps. The Pu-ching-tse accounts to the Hu-pu, which is the second supreme Tribunal of Pe-king, having the Super-intendency of the Finances; and the Hu-pu accounts to the Emperor. Nothing is better order'd than the manner of imposing and collecting the Tributes, allowing for some little Frauds in the Under-Officers.

How it is employ'd. China is remarkable in that its Emperor is as a great Head of a Family, who provides for all the Necessities of his Officers. This Custom, which has continued invariable among the Chingse, is is not unlike what was practised formerly in the Court of the Kings of France; where Bread, Wine, Meats, Candles, and the like were distributed. From which Distributions, called Livraisons, or Deliveries, came the Term Livery, applied to the Domestics, who were of the same Livery or Distribution, that is, belonged to the same Master.

Great Part of the Imperial Commodities are consumed in the Provinces, in Pensions, in maintaining the Poor, especially old People and Invalids, who are very numerous; in the Salary of the Mandarins, Payment of the Forces, publick Buildings, &c. and the Overplus is carried to Pe-king, to defray the Expences of the Palace and the Metropolis: where the Emperor maintains 160,000 regular Troops, exclusive of their Pay, which they receive in Money, besides near five thousand Mandarins; among whom there is distributed, every Day, a certain Quantity of Flesh, Fish, Salt Herbs, &c. and once a Month they have Rice, Beans, Wood, Coals and Straw, all which are delivered them very plentifully. The same Custom is observed with regard to those who are called to Court, or sent from thence into the Provinces; they are served, and all their Charges defrayed on the Road, being furnished with Barks, Horses, Carriages and Inns, which are kept at the Emperor's Expence.

In Pensions;

Payment of the Forces.

Defraying the Expences of the Quân.

When a Mandarin is dispatch'd by the Court, they give him a Kang-bo, that is, an Order of the Court, made out by the Ping-Pü, or Tribunal of the Militia, and sealed with its Seals; by which the Officers of the Posts and Cities are obliged to furnish without Delay, whatever the Kang-bo directs, and as a Proof of having executed it, apply their Seals to it. They provide Men to draw the Barks, and carry the Baggage, which is weighed by the Post-master General's Order, who allows as many Men as are necessary to carry it, at the Rate of fifty Chinese Pounds Weight each Man.

The Number of Soldiers maintain'd by the Emperor along the Great Wall, and in the Cities and fortify'd Places, amounted formerly to 770,000; which Number has been increased, but not diminished, for they never reduce their Forces. They are to serve for Guards to the Grand Mandarins, Governors, Officers and Magistrates: they even attend them on their Journeys, and in the Night keep Watch about their Barks or Inns, being relieved at every Place the Mandarin halts at. The Emperor likewise keeps near 565,000 Horses to remount the Cavalry, and for the Use of Posts and Couriers to carry his Orders, and those of the Tribunals into the Provinces. He also defrays the Expences of all Foreign Ambassadors, from the Day they enter till the Day they leave his Dominions; furnishing them with Horses, Barks, and all necessary Carriages, as well as Provisions for the Journey: and when they arrive at Court lodges them in a Palace, where as a Token of Friendship he sends them every other Day Dishes from his own Table; and when he has a Mind to shew particular Marks of his Affection, he adds some extraordinary Meßes. I do not mention this Monarch's Expences with regard either to public Buildings, in the Cities and Country, or the Repairs of his Palace.

Emperor's Forces.

Expences of Ambassadors defray'd.

Altho' the Description of the Palace in the Beginning of this Volume [p. 67.] may seem sufficient to give the Reader an Idea of it; yet I shall here add several other Particulars, in the Words of one of the Missionaries, who had the Honour to be admitted into the Emperor's Presence, and to salute him in his own Apartment. "It consists, says he, of an astonishing Collection of Buildings, and a long Row of Courts, Galleries and Gardens, which altogether make a magnificent Appearance. As the Southern Gate is never opened but for the Emperor, we came in by that facing the East, which leads into a vast Court to the South of the Palace. This Court is square, being two hundred Geometrical Paces from North to South; it is paved with large Bricks, and the Walks laid with broad flat Stones. At each Angle is a large oblong Building, with a double Roof, whose Ground-Story has three Entrances, like the Gates of Cities. Before we enter'd the next Court, we came to a Canal, most dry, running parallel to the Walls of it from East to West. We passed over this Canal by one of the six white Marble Bridges, built towards the Middle, facing so many Arches or open Gates, each supporting a large Building that has a Platform or Tower, with a double Roof, whose Thickness is upwards of twenty Geometrical Paces. At each End of the Bridge leading to the middle Gate are two great round Pillars of white Marble, upon a large Pedestal, surrounded with a Balustrade of the same. The Base is adorn'd with two great Lions, each between seven or eight Foot high, and seeming as if they had been cut out of one Block. Passing Northward thro' the Gate into this second Court (which is in Length about a hundred Geometrical Paces, and fifty in Breadth) we found at the Entrance two other white marble Columns, adorn'd with Dragons in Relief, with two small Wings below a Chapter, which is flat and very broad.

Supplemental Description of the Palace.

First Court.

Second Court

From thence we enter'd a third Court, twice the Length of the second, and a little wider, with five Gates, and Buildings over them like the former. These Gates are very thick, and covered with Plates of Iron, fasten'd on with rows of Brass Nails, whose Heads are bigger than a Man's Fist. all the Buildings of the Palace are placed on Bases as high as a Man, of a reddish grey Marble, very ill polished, and adorn'd with Mouldings.

Third Court.

All these Courts are surrounded with very low Buildings, covered with yellow Tiles. At the Bottom of this third Court, there is a long Building flank'd with two Pavilions, whose Wings are terminated by two other Pavilions, which are like the first: being double roofed and surrounded with Galleries as well as the Wings, and the lower Part of the Building; which stands on a Platform of Bricks with its Parapet, and little Embrasures, being near thirty five Foot high. The Base of the Platform, for six Foot above the Ground, is of Marble. The Passage is by three Gates like the former, with this Difference, that the Nails and Iron Work are gilded. There were several Guards at this Gate, among whom was a Ko-lau, or [one of the Prime] Ministers of State, who having been accused of taking a Bribe, was condemn'd as one of a Company of Soldiers to guard this Post: But notwithstanding his Disgrace, all who pass'd saluted him by bending the Knee; still regarding him on account of the high Station he once possess'd.

Fourth Court After we had pass'd thro' these three Courts, which have nothing remarkable excepting their Extent, we entered into a fourth. Near fourscore Geometrical Paces square, and exceedingly agreeable. It is surrounded with Galleries, interrupted at proper Distances with little open Halls, somewhat high, having Steps before them, with their Flights of white Marble; which go quite round. Thro' this Court runs a little Canal, lin'd with white Marble, whose Sides are adorn'd with Balusters of the same Fashion: It has over it four or five single arch'd Bridges of white Marble, adorn'd with Mouldings and Basso Relievo's. At the Bottom of this Court there is a large and magnificent Hall, with three fine Stair-Cases, whose Flights are adorn'd with Balusters of the same Kind.

Fifth Court. The fifth Court, which follows, is nearly of the same Form and Size; but makes a finer Appearance, as having a large square Perron, three Stories high, each adorn'd with Balusters of white Marble. This Perron takes up near half the Length of the Court, and two thirds of its Breadth: It is about eighteen Foot high, built upon a Base of Siam Marble, which is coarser, and upwards of six Foot high. It has three Stair-Cases, whereof the middle one is most considerable, having near the Foot of it two great Brass Lions; and on the Top of the Perron are eight Vases of the same Metal, about seven Foot high. This Perron is before a large and magnificent Hall, where the Emperor receives the Memorials and Petitions daily presented him by the Mandarins of the sovereign Tribunals, who first perform the accustom'd Prostrations at the great Stairs.

Sixth, seventh and eighth Court Afterward we pass'd thro' two other such Courts, with Perrons of the same Form as well as Size, and encompass'd with the like Buildings, furnished with Stair-Cases and Balusters round them. We were conducted through a Door on the Right-hand of the last Court into another, about two hundred Paces long; being a kind of Hippodrome, [or Place for Horse Racing] at the End of which on the Left-hand, we enter'd a great open Hall, where we found Guards, and waited some time for the Mandarin, appointed to conduct us into the Apartment of the Emperor.

Ninth Court Him we followed thro' a ninth Court, something less than the former, but equally sumptuous. At the End of it appear'd a large Building, of an oblong Figure, with a double Roof, cover'd with yellow varnish'd Tiles, like the preceding. This is the Palace where the Emperor's Apartment is; to which there led a Causey, rais'd about five or six Foot high, inclos'd with Balusters of white Marble, and pav'd with the same. None but the Emperor may pass this way, or thro' the middle of the other Courts.

The Palace. This Palace, which shines with Carvings, Varnish, Gilding and Painting, stands upon a kind of a Platform, pav'd with large square Pieces of a beautiful green Marble, polish'd like Glass, and laid so close together, that one can scarcely discern the Joinings. At the Entrance of the great Hall, there is a Door, which opens into a large square Room paved with Marble; where the Emperor was sitting on an Estrade, after the Tartar Fashion. The Beams of this Room were supported by wooden Columns varnish'd with red; and fixed in such a manner in the Wall that they were even with its Surface. We perform'd the usual Ceremonies, that is, we rang'd ourselves in a Line facing the Emperor, and fell on our Knees three times, bowing every time to the Ground. In receiving these Marks of our Respect himself, he did us a great Favour; for when the Mandarins of the six Sovereign Courts come every fifth Day, on the first Day of the Year, and on the Emperor's Birth Day, to perform these Ceremonies, he is scarce ever present; and is sometimes at a good Distance from the Palace when they pay him their Homages. After we had performed this Duty we approach'd his Person, kneeling on one Side, and in a Line: He ask'd us our Names, Ages and Country, and entertain'd us with a Sweetness and Affability which would be surprizing in any Prince, but was much more so in the Emperor of China. It must be confess'd, that this Series of Courts all on a Level and rang'd in a Line; this Collection of Buildings, tho' confus'd and ununiform; interspers'd with Pavilions, Galleries, Collonades, Balusters, Stair-Cases of Marble, and a multitude of varnish'd Roofs, cover'd with yellow Tiles, so bright and beautiful, that when the Sun shines on them, they look as if they were gilt with Gold: I say it must be confess'd that all this presents something so inexpressibly magnificent to the Eye, as to discover it to be the Palace of a great Emperor.

If to these we add, the Courts that have been made on the Wings for Offices, and Stables; the Palaces of the Princes of the Blood, with those of the Empress, and of the Women; the Gardens, Ponds, Lakes and Woods, in which are kept all sorts of Animals, the Whole will appear surprizing. What we have describ'd is only the inner Palace separated by a great Wall from the outer, which itself is inclos'd with a very high and thick Wall, about two Leagues in Compass, and resembles a little City; the different Officers of the Court, and a great Number of Tradesmen of all sorts who are in the Service of the Emperor, lodging in it.

Pleasure-House of the ancient Emperors. Near Pe-king lies the Pleasure-House of the ancient Emperors, no less than ten common French Leagues in Circumference; but it differs vastly from the Royal Palaces in Europe, having neither Marble nor Water-Works, nor Stone Walls about it. It is furnished with four Rivulets of excellent lent Water, whose Banks are planted with Trees; and is composed of three Buildings very large and neat, with several Fish-ponds, Pastures for Roebucks, wild Mules, and other fallow Beasts; Sheep-folds, Kitchen-gardens, green Walks, Orchards, and some Pieces of Ground under Corn; with all that renders a Country Life agreeable. Hither the Emperors formerly retired from Business, to relieve the Cares of Government, and taste the Sweets of a private Life. They seldom went out of their Palaces, imagining that the less they appeared in Publick the greater Respect would be paid them; but the Tartars, who now possess the Throne, affect greater Popularity, without departing too far from the Customs of the Chinese.

When the Emperor goes out of the Palace, he is always attended by a great Number of Lords of his Court; every thing glitters in his Train, the Arms, the Harness of the Horses, the Streamers, the Umbrella's, the Fans, and all the other Ensigns of the Imperial Dignity.

The Princes and the Lords go foremost on Horseback, follow'd by the Ko-lau's or Prime Ministers, and the Great Mandarins; they advance close to the Houses on both Sides, leaving the middle of the Streets clear. After them march twenty four Standards of yellow Silk, which is the Emperor's Livery, embroider'd with golden Dragons, which is his Coat of Arms. These are followed by twenty-four Umbrella's of the same Colour, and as many Fans, which are very curious and rich. The Life-Guards are cloathed in Yellow, each wearing a kind of Head-Piece, and in their Hands a sort of Javalin or half Pike gilt; on the Top of which is the Figure of the Sun or of a Crescent, or the Head of some Animal. Twelve Footmen dress'd in the same Colour, carry on their Shoulders the Emperor's Chair, which is very magnificent. At divers Places on the Road there are a great Number of these Footmen to relieve one another. A Band of Musick, of Trumpets, and other sorts of Instruments, accompanies the Emperor, playing all the while. Last of all, a great Number of Pages and Footmen close the Procession: But now that the Emperors appear oftner abroad, they are attended with a less Retinue. When Kang-bi visited the Southern Provinces, he went by Water, going on board a new Bark built on purpose; accompanied with his Children, the great Lords, and an infinite Number of trusty Officers: besides, there were such a Number of Troops on the Road that he seem'd to march in the midst of an Army. He made but short Stages, stopping from Time to Time to examine Things himself, and to be inform'd exactly of whatever occur'd; but in his Return to Pe-king, his Bark proceeded Day and Night.

When he went into Tartary, to take the Diversion of Hunting, he then actually march'd at the Head of an Army, as if he was going to conquer an Empire: But having described elsewhere the Magnificence of the Habits, Tents, and Equipages, belonging to the Train of this Prince, and of all the Grandees who attended him on these Occasions; I shall speak at present only of the Pomp in which he us'd to go, when he offer'd solemn Sacrifices in the Temple of Tyen. The Account whereof (taken from P. Magalbaens) is the more certain, because these sorts of Ceremonies are always regulated and invariably observ'd.

This Procession began with twenty four Drums, rang'd in two Files; and twenty-four Trumpets, (made of U-tong-shu, a Wood greatly esteem'd by the Chinese) more than three Foot long, and about eight Inches in Diameter at the Mouth: they are in the Shape of Bells, adorn'd with Circles of Gold, and suit very well with the Drums.

Next to these were twenty four Men in the same Livery; arm'd with Staves seven or eight Foot long, varnish'd with red, and adorn'd with gilded Foliages. Then a hundred Soldiers carrying Halberts, the Iron Part of which ends in a Crescent. A hundred Mace-Bearers, whose Arms were japan'd with red Varnish, mixed with Flowers, and gilded at the End. Four hundred great Lanthorns finely adorn'd. Four hundred Flambeaux made of a Wood, which burns for a long Time, and yields a great Light. Two hundred Spears, some set off with Locks of Silk of various Colours; others with the Tails of Panthers, Foxes, and other Animals. Twenty four Banners, on which were painted the Signs of the Zodiac, which the Chinese divide into twenty four Parts. fifty six other Banners, exhibiting the fifty six Constellations, to which the Chinese reduce all the Stars. Two hundred Fans (supported by long gilded Sticks) painted with diverse Figures of Dragons, Birds and other Animals. Twenty four Umbrellas richly adorn'd; and a Boufët carry'd by Officers of the Kitchen, and furnish'd with gold Utensils, such as Basons, Ewers, &c.

After these had march'd in good Order, the Emperor follow'd on Horseback pompously dress'd, with a grave majestic Air; on each Side of him was carry'd a rich Umbrella, large enough to shade both him and his Horse. He was surrounded with ten white led Horses (whose Saddles and Bridles were enrich'd with Gold and precious Stones. A hundred Spear Men, and the Pages of the Bed Chamber.

After which appear'd in the same Order, all the Princes of the Blood, the Regulo's, the Chief Mandarins, and the Lords of his Court in their Habits of Ceremony. Five hundred young Gentlemen belonging to the Palace richly clad. A thousand Footmen in red Gowns embroider'd with Flowers, and Stars of Gold and Silver. Then thirty six Men carry'd an open Chair, follow'd by another that was close and much larger, supported by a hundred and twenty Chair-Men; lastly, came four large Chariots, two drawn by Elephants, and the other two by Horses, cover'd with embroider'd Houfings; each Chair and Chariot had a Company of a hundred and fifty Men following it for its Guard.

This Procession was clos'd by two thousand Literary, and as many Military Mandarins, in magnificent Habits of Ceremony. Such is the Grandeur and Power of the Monarch, who governs

Emperor's
State when he goes out of his Palace.

Temple of

verns so vast an Empire. In him alone every thing centers, being the Soul that gives Motion to that vast Body, and keeps all its Members in the most perfect subordination, as will appear in the Sequel.

Of the Form of Government in China: the different Tribunals; the Mandarins, the Honours that are paid them, their Power and their Offices.

Principle of the Chinese Government

THE Political Government of China entirely turns on the reciprocal Duty of Parents and Children. The Emperor is called the Father of the Empire; the Vice-Roy is the Father of the Province under his Command; as the Mandarin is of the City which he governs. This single Principle is the Foundation of that great Respect and ready Obedience which the Chinese pay to the Officers who assist the Emperor to sustain the Weight of Government.

'Tis very surprizing, to see a Nation so vastly numerous, so naturally restless, so excessively selfish, and so eager in its Pursuit of Riches, govern'd and kept within the Bounds of its Duty by a small Number of Mandarins, at the Head of every Province. So true it is, that the bare Shadow of Imperial Authority, which appears in their Persons, can do every thing with this People.

Nine Orders of the Quán

From the very Commencement of the Monarchy, the Mandarins have been divided into nine different Orders, in so perfect a Subordination to each other, that nothing can be compar'd to the Respect, and Submission, which the Mandarins of an inferior Order bear to those who are of a Superior.

First Order.
the Ko-lau.

The first Order of Mandarins is that of the Ko-lau's or Ministers of State, the Chief Presidents of the Supreme Courts, and other principal Officers of the Army. This is the highest Degree that the Literati can arrive at; unless in Return for very important Services done the Nation, the Emperor should think proper to confer more honourable Titles on them; such as those equivalent to Earls, Dukes, &c. The Number of the Ko-lau's is not fix'd, but depends on the Will of the Prince, who chooses them at Pleasure, out of the other Tribunals; however they are seldom more than five or six, and one of them is commonly more distinguish'd than the rest, and stiled Sbew-Syang; he is President of the Council, and in greatest Confidence with the Emperor. The Tribunal of these Ko-lau's is kept in the Palace on the Left-hand (which is accounted most honourable) of the Imperial Hall; where the Emperor gives his public Audience, and receives the Veneration and Homage of the Mandarins. As there are in the Palace several magnificent Halls pompously adorn'd, each of the Ko-lau's is assign'd one; in which he examines what ever comes under his Cognizance, and has the Name of the Hall added, as a Title of Honour to his own: for Instance, such a Ko-lau, Supreme Hall of the Middle.

Second Order

The Tribunal which is call'd Nwi-ywen, that is the Inner Court, because it is within the Palace, is compos'd of three Orders of Mandarins. The first are properly the Ministers of State, whose Business is to inspect almost all the Petitions of the supreme Tribunals, whether relating to War or Peace, Civil or Criminal Matters: after which Examination, they remit them to be represented to the Emperor, unless they have any Objection thereto, wherewith they acquaint his Majesty; who receives or rejects their Advice, as he thinks proper, reserving sometimes solely to himself the Cognizance of Affairs and the Examination of the Memorials that are presented to him.

The Mandarins who compose the Second Order of this Tribunal are, as it were, Assistants to the former; and out of their Number are appointed the Vice-Roys of Provinces, and the Presidents of other Tribunals. They bear the Title Ta-hyo-se, that is Literati or Magistrates of approved Capacity; and are taken out of the Second or third Order of Mandarins.

Third Order

The Mandarins of the third Order, who are call'd Cbong-shu-ko, that is The School of Mandarins, are the Emperor's Secretaries, whose Office is to see all Matters, deliberated upon in the Tribunal, reduced to writing; these are taken out of the Fourth, Fifth, or Sixth Order of Mandarins.

Privy Council,
and Council of State.

These three Orders of Officers compose the Emperor's Privy-Council; and at this Tribunal the principal part of the great Affairs are examin'd and determin'd, unless the Emperor assembles the Great Council for that Purpose. This Great Council is compos'd of all the Ministers of State, the chief Presidents, and Assistants of the six supreme Courts, and three other considerable Tribunals. For, besides this Council within the Palace, there are in Pe-king six sovereign Courts, call'd Lew-pú, whose Power and Authority extend over all the Provinces of the Empire: each of them has always had a President, who is commonly a Mandarin of the first Order, and two Assistants of the second Order; without reckoning the forty four subordinate Tribunals, who have every one a President and at least twelve Counsellors.

After

After this Manner the Tribunals were compos'd under the Chinese Emperors; but since the Tartars became Masters of China, they have doubled the Officers, both of the Superior and Inferior Courts, placing therein as many Tartars as Chinese. This was a Master-Piece of Policy in the Conqueror, who thus brought the Tartars into the Administration, without discontenting the Chinese; who would have had Cause to complain, if they had been excluded from the public Employments.

The Business of the Chief of their Supreme Courts, call'd Li-pu, that is, the Tribunal of the Mandarin, is to furnish all the Provinces with Officers; to watch over their Conduct; to examine their good and bad Qualities; and to give an account thereof to the Emperor: that some may be rais'd to the highest Offices, as the Reward of their Virtue and Merit; and others degraded, for behaving unworthy of the Station they were rais'd to. These are, properly speaking, the Inquisitors of the State.

This Court has four Tribunals under it; the first is charged with choosing, those who, by their Learning and other Qualities, deserve to possess the great Offices of the Empire. The second examines the Conduct of the Mandarins. The third is to seal all Judicial Acts, to assign to the Mandarins of different Dignities and Offices their respective Seals, and to examine if the Seals of the Dispatches, that are sent to Court, be true or counterfeit. The fourth is to examine the Merit of the Grandees of the Empire, that is, the Princes of the Blood, the Regulos, those who are honour'd with Titles, like our Dukes, Marquisses, and Counts, and in general all Persons of Rank and Distinction.

The second Supreme Court, call'd Hu-pu, that is, High Treasurer of the King, hath the Superintendence of the Finances, with the Care of the private Estates, Treasures, Expences, and Revenues of the Emperor. It makes out Orders for Salaries and Pensions, appoints the Delivery of Rice, Silks, and Money, which are distributed to the great Lords, and all the Mandarins of the Empire. It keeps an exact Catalogue of all Families; of all the Duties that ought to be paid; of the Custom-Houses and public Magazines. To go thro' this prodigious Throng of Business, it has fourteen subordinate Tribunals for the Affairs of the fourteen Provinces, whereof the Empire is compos'd; for the Province of Pe-che-li, being the Province of the Court, and consequently superior to the rest, enjoys in many Cases the Prerogatives of the Court and Household of the Emperor. The Province of Kyang-nan, whereof Nan-king is the Capital, had heretofore the same Privileges, on account of its being the Emperor's Residence; but the Tartars have reduc'd it into a common Province, and changed the Name of Nan-king into that of Kyang-min.

The third Supreme Court is call'd Li-pu, or The Tribunal of Rights; Pu signifying Tribunal, and Li, Right; so that, tho' the Name seems to be the same with that of the first Court already spoken of, yet there is a great Difference between them, which is determin'd by the Pronunciation. It belongs to this Court, to see that Rites and Ceremonies be duly observ'd, and look after the Improvement of Arts and Sciences; it has also the Care of the Imperial Music, and examines those who are Candidates for Degrees, and permits them to come to be examined: it is consulted, concerning Titles of Honours, and other Marks of Distinction, wherewith the Emperor would gratify those that deserve them. Besides, it has the Charge of the Temples and Sacrifices offer'd by the Emperor; also of the Feasts given by the Prince to Subjects, or Strangers. It receives, entertains, and dismisses Ambassadors; it has the Direction of the Liberal Arts, and of the three Laws or Religions that are tolerated in the Empire, viz. of the Literati, the Tau-ssé, and the Disciples of Fo. In short, it is a kind of Ecclesiastical Tribunal, before whom the Missionaries have been oblig'd to appear in Times of Perfection.

This Court is assist'd by four subordinate Tribunals: the Business of the first is to deliberate on the most important Affairs, as when Patents are to be made out for the greatest Offices of the Empire; such are those of the Tsong-tu, or Vice-Roys. The second has the Charge of the Sacrifices which the Emperor offers; of the Temples; of the Mathematics; and of the Religions approved or tolerated. The third is to receive those who are sent to the Court. The fourth has the Direction of the Emperor's Table, and the Feasts which he gives either to the Grandees or Ambassadors.

The fourth Supreme Court is call'd Ping-pu, the Tribunal of Arms. The Soldiery of the whole Empire is under its Care, and the Officers of War, as well general as particular, have their Dependence on it. It examines them in their Exercise, keeps the Fortresses in Repair, supplies the Arsenals and the Magazines with Weapons offensive and defensive, Ammunition and Provisions; it causes all sorts of Arms to be made, and in short has the Management of every thing in general, which concerns the Defence and Safety of the Empire.

It has four Inferior Tribunals to assist it; the first disposes of all Military Employments, and sees that the Troops are well disciplin'd. The second distributes the Officers and Soldiers into their respective Stations, for maintaining the public Tranquility, and take Care to clear the Cities and Highways of Thieves and Robbers. The third has the Superintendence of the Horses of the Empire, the Posts, Stages, Imperial Inns, and Barks, appointed to carry Victuals and other Provisions for the Soldiers. The Fourth orders the making of all sorts of Arms, and stowing them in the Arsenals.

They have given the Name of Hing-pu to the fifth Supreme Court, which is like the Tournelle, or Criminal Chamber belonging to the Parliaments of France, where those, guilty of any Crime, are examined; under it are fourteen subordinate Tribunals, according to the Number of the Provinces.

Sixth Court, or Kong-pu.

The sixth and last Supreme Court, call'd Kong-pu, or The Tribunal of public Works, is employ'd in keeping in Repair the Palaces as well of the Emperor as of the Tribunals, the Princes of the Blood, and Vice-Roys; the Imperial Sepulchres, Temples, &c. It superintends the Towers, Triumphal Arches, Bridges, Causeways, Dykes, Rivers, [Canals] Lakes, and all the Works necessary to render them navigable; the Streets, Highways, Barks, and all Vessels requisite for Navigation.

Its Tribunals.

This Court has likewise four Subordinate Tribunals; the first prepares the Plans and Designs for the public Works. The second has the Direction of all the Work-Shops of the [Imperial] Joiners, Masons, Carpenters, &c. in the several Cities of the Empire. The third is employ'd in repairing the Canals, Bridges, Causeys, Roads, &c. and making the Rivers navigable. The fourth takes Care of the Royal Houses, Gardens, and Orchards; causes the latter to be improv'd, and receives the Profit arising from them.

Each of these Inferior Tribunals hath a Palace, with proper Halls, and is compos'd of two Presidents and twenty four Counsellors, one half Tartars, the other Chinese; besides a great number of Clerks, Registers, Tipstiffs, Messengers, Provosts, Sergeants, and other Under-Officers, which I pass over.

The Power of the Courts
how limited and restrain'd.

As there might be room to fear, that Bodies of Men, invest'd with so much Power, would by Degrees weaken the Imperial Authority, the Laws have provided against this Inconvenience two Ways; first, none of these Tribunals is vest'd with an absolute Power of judging in Matters that are brought before them, but requires the Assistance of another, and often of all the rest, to put its Decrees in Execution. For Instance, the Army is subject to the fourth Supreme Tribunal, but the Payment of it belongs to the second, while the Barks, Waggon, Tents, Arms, &c. are under the Management of the sixth: so that no military Operation can be carry'd on, without the Concurrence of these different Tribunals, and this is the Case with regard to all Affairs of Importance that concern the State.

Public Inspectors or Censors.

Secondly, nothing can be better contriv'd to curb the Power of the Magistrates, belonging to the Supreme Tribunals, than the Precaution that is taken to appoint an Officer, whose Business is to assist at all their Assemblies, and to revise all their Acts which are communicated to him. He can decide nothing himself, but is only an Inspector to take notice of every thing that passes in each, and give an account thereof to the Court; being oblig'd by his Office to give private Information to the Emperor of the Faults of the Mandarins, not only in the Administration of public Affairs, but in their private Conduct. Nothing escapes their Vigilance, nor do they spare even the Emperor himself when he is blameable; and that they may neither be corrupted by Hopes, nor intimidated by Threats, they are kept constantly in their Employment, unless advanc'd to a more considerable Post.

Their Intrepidity.

This sort of Inspectors or public Censors, call'd Ko-tau, are extremely dreaded, and there are astonishing Instances of their Courage and Constancy; they have ventur'd to accuse Princes, great Lords, and Tartar Vice-Roys, tho' under the Protection of the Emperor; nay they commonly, either thro' Obstinacy or Vanity, choose to fall into Disgrace with the Prince, and even suffer Death, rather than desist from their Pursuits, when they believe them to be consistent with Equity and the Rules of a wise Government.

Regard paid to their Informations,

One of these Censors having, in the Reign of the late Kang-hi, accus'd and convicted four Kalau's, and as many great Officers, of receiving Bribes to put People into Posts; they were immediately displaced, and reduced to the Condition of Warders, who are petty Officers among the Commonalty. So that one may well say of the Officers of this Court, what a Persian Courtier said of his own Prince, "They are in the Hands of the King my Master, like Counters, which have no Value but what he puts upon them."

much dreaded.

When the Emperor, according to Custom, refers the Petitions of these Censors to the Tribunals, to deliberate upon them, the Mandarins seldom contradict them, for fear of being accus'd themselves; this, it is true, gives them great Power in the Empire, but then it is a means of keeping every one to his good Behaviour, and in the Subordination necessary to maintain the Imperial Authority. Whatever Deference the Mandarins pay to the least Intimations, as well as Orders of the Emperor, they do not fail on proper Occasions to discover a great deal of Resolution. When the Emperor interrogates the Tribunals, and they answer according to the Laws, they are not liable to either Blame or Reproach; whereas, if they answer contrary thereto, the Censors of the Empire have a right to accuse, and the Emperor to punish them.

Tribunal for the Affairs of the Princes.

There is at Pe-king another Tribunal establish'd, solely to inspect the Affairs relating to the Princes; which they are not willing should be confounded with those of the common People. The Presidents and Officers of this Tribunal are Princes; but the inferior Officers are choic'd from among the common Mandarins, who draw up the Acts of their Proceedings, and all other necessary Writings. Also in the Registers of this Tribunal, all the Children of the Imperial Family, as soon as they are born, are enroll'd; the Titles and Dignities they are honour'd with inscrib'd; and in this Court they are tried and punish'd when culpable. The Regulo's, besides their lawful Wives, have commonly three more, on whom the Emperor bestows Titles, and whose Names are registr'd in this Tribunal. Their Children take Place next to those that are legitimate; and are more respected than those born of meer Concubines, of whom the Princes may have as many as they please.

I shall give no farther account of the several Tribunals establish'd in the Imperial City, having been so particular in that of the six principal, to which the rest are subordinate; but I cannot omit one of a singular kind, which will serve to inform us in how great Esteem Men of Learning are in China.

Every three Years all the Kyu-jin, or Licentiates in the Empire, resort to Pe-king, to obtain their Doctor's Degree; where they are strictly examin'd for thirteen Days together, and not above three hundred can be admitted. Out of these new Doctors, those who have given Proofs of their Capacity and Skill, are chosen to compose the Tribunal, whereof I am speaking; which is call'd Han-lin-ywen, and is a kind of Academy, whose Members are Men of the greatest Genius and Learning in the Empire.

These Doctors direct the Education of the Heir to the Crown, and are to teach him Virtue, the Sciences and Rules of Civility, and the great Art of governing well. It is their Business to write the History of the Empire in general, and to record all the considerable Events, worthy to be transmitted to Posterity. Their Profession is to study continually, and to compose useful Books. They are properly the Literati of the Emperor, who discourses with them about Matters relating to the Sciences; and often chooses the Ko-lau's and Presidents of the Supreme Tribunals out of their Body, they being at once both esteem'd and dreaded.

The Emperor likewise nominates and vests with Authority the Mandarins in the Provinces, who are govern'd by two General Officers, on whom they depend; one is call'd Fu-ywen, the same with the Vice-Roy, or Governor of a Province in Europe; the other, whose Jurisdiction is much more extensive, since he has two, and sometimes three Provinces subject to him, is call'd Tsong-tu. Both these are at the Head of a Supreme Tribunal in the Province, wherein all Affairs of Moment, Civil or Criminal, are determin'd; to them the Emperor immediately issues his Orders, and they take Care to transmit them off hand to all the Cities in their District.

However great the Authority of the Tsong-tu may be, it does not in the least diminish that of the particular Vice-Roys; but every thing is regulated in such a manner, that they never have any Contest about Jurisdiction. The Supreme Tribunal of every Province hath several other subordinate Tribunals under it; and a certain number of inferior Mandarins, who assist the Vice-Roy in dispatching Affairs.

In all the Capital Cities of the Provinces two Tribunals are establish'd, one for Civil, and the other for Criminal Affairs. The first call'd Pu-ching-tse, has a President who is like the Treasurer General of a Province in Europe; and two Assistants, who are all Mandarins of the second Order. The Criminal Tribunal, nam'd Ngan-cha-tse, has a President of the third Order, and instead of Assistants, it has two Classes of Mandarins, call'd Tau-li.

These Mandarins are Visitors of the different Districts, into which every Province is divided, and have their respective Tribunals; their Business is to give an account of what passes to the Emperor, especially when there is no Visitor in the Province sent expressly from the Court. Some of them, call'd I-chwen-tau, have the Care of the Posts, as also of the Imperial Inns and Barks within their District; others named Ping-pi-tau, have the Inspection of the Army; the Tun-tyen-tau oversee the repairing of the High Roads; the Ho-tau take Care of the Rivers; and those call'd Hay-tau, visit the Sea Coasts. They have all a Power to punish Criminals, and are as the Substitutes of the six Supreme Tribunals of the Court.

The Cities being of three different Ranks, have also their own Governors, and several [other] Magistrates. The [chief] Mandarin of Cities of the first Rank, is call'd Cbi-fu, and is of the fourth Order, but his three Assistants are Mandarins of the sixth and seventh Order; he has besides a number of inferior Mandarins under him, in Proportion to the Extent of his Jurisdiction and number of Cities within it.

The Mandarin of Cities of the second Rank, is nam'd Cbi-chew, and is of the second Degree of the fifth Order; his two Assistants are of the second Degree of the sixth and seventh Order.

In short, all the rest of the Cities of the Empire have each a Tribunal, whose President is call'd Cbi-byen. He is a Mandarin of the seventh Order, and has two Assistants, one of the eighth, and the other of the ninth Order.

Besides the Tribunals, common to all the Provinces, there are others peculiar to certain Places, or which have particular Functions. Such are for Instance (1) the Mandarins of the Salt, whose Business is to distribute it thro' the Provinces by trusty Persons, and to hinder private Traders from selling it in Prejudice to the Revenue; the President of this Tribunal is call'd Yen-fa-tau. (2) The Mandarin-General of the Tribute of Rice, named Lyang-tau. (3) Another Mandarin-General, call'd Hyo-tau, who presides at the Examination of the Students of the Province, and those who appear to take the Degrees of Literature; besides several others too tedious to mention, who have particular Offices.

The number of Literary Mandarins, dispersed thro' the Empire, amount to more than thirteen thousand six hundred; four times a Year is printed an exact Catalogue of them, wherein their Name, Titles, Country, and the Times when they took their Degree, are mention'd. I shall speak elsewhere of the Military Mandarins, or Officers of War.

The Governors of Cities, who are inferior Mandarins, do not commonly determine matters of Importance themselves, but are oblig'd to make their Report to the Superior Mandarins; that is, to the Pu-ching-tse and Fu-ywen, who have none above them, except the Tribunals of Pe-king. As for the Tsong-tu, who is above a Vice-Roy, and has the Government of two or three Provinces, he is subject to the same Tribunals; but his Office is so considerable, that there is no advancing him without making him a Minister of State, or President of one of the Supreme Courts.

The

Badges of the Quân.

The Mandarins are extremely jealous of the Badges of their Dignity, which distinguish them not only from the common People, but also from other Literati, and all those of an inferior Rank among themselves. This Badge consists of a Piece of square Stuff, which they wear upon their Breasts, richly work'd, and carrying in the Middle the Devices peculiar to their respective Employments. The Literary Mandarins have, some a Dragon with four Claws, others an Eagle, or a Sun, and so of the rest: In like manner, those of the Military Class bear Leopards, Tygers, Lions, &c. They likewise affect a Distinction in their Girdles: In former Times before the Chinese took the Tartarian Habit, they were divided into small Squares, and fasten'd before with great Clasps, made of the Horns of Buffaloes and Rhinoceroses, of Ivory, Tortoise-shell, Eagle Wood, Silver, Gold, and Jewels; the Materials differing according to the different Employment of the Persons. None but a Ko-lau might wear one of Jewels, which was given him by the Emperor, when he put him in Possession of his Office; but at present a silk Girdle is all that is worn.

Power of the several Quân.

There is an absolute mutual Dependence among the several Powers that govern the Empire. The most inconsiderable Mandarin has full Authority within the Extent of his District; but he depends on other Mandarins, who tho' more powerful, yet are subject to the General Officers of every Province; as these latter are to the Tribunals of the Imperial City; and the Presidents of the Supreme Courts, who are dreaded by all other Mandarins, tremble themselves before the Emperor, in whom resides the Sovereign Power.

Manner of distributing Offices among them
by Lot.

The Employments are divided among the Mandarin Officers, in the following Manner. Any Person who has gain'd two of the three Degrees of Literature, is capable of enjoying Public Offices. The Names of these three sorts of the Learned, that is, Si-ew-tsi or Batchellors, Kyu-jin or Licentiates, and Tsing-tse or Doctors, are written on the Registers of the first supreme Tribunal, call'd Li-pu; which distributes the vacant Offices, according to the Rank and Merit of the Literati, who when duly qualify'd repair to Court for that Purpose; but they do not usually raise even Tsing-tse, or Doctors, to be more than Governors of Cities of the second or third Rank. As soon as any of these Employments fall, suppose four, they immediately acquaint the Emperor with it; and then calling the four Literati, who are first upon the List, write the Names of the four Governments on four Tickets, which are put into a Box, placed so high as just to be within Reach of the Candidates, who draw by turns according to their Rank, each possessing the City which falls to his Lot.

Besides the common Examinations, they pass thro' another; in order to discover what sort of Government they are fit for: and it is said, that when a Person has Friends or Money to bestow, the Chinese do not want Ways to cause the best Governments to fall to those they design to favour.

The Ease with which a single Quân governs Multitudes.

'Tis surprizing with how much Ease a single Mandarin, for Instance, a Chi-fu, governs Multitudes of People; he does no more than publish his Orders on a small Piece of Paper, sealed with his Seal, and fix'd up at the Corners of Streets, and he is instantly obey'd. This ready Obedience is grounded on that profound Veneration and unlimited Submission with respect to Parents, in which the Chinese are brought up from their Infancy. It proceeds also partly from the Reverence the Mandarin acquires by his Conduct towards a People, who are accusom'd to look upon him as the Emperor himself, whose Person he represents. They never speak to him but on their Knees when he is distributing Justice in his Tribunal; and he never appears in Public without a great Attendance, in a very majestick Manner; he is pompously dress'd, his Countenance grave and severe, being carried by four Men in a gilded Chair, open if in Summer, but cover'd with Silk in Winter; preceded by all the Officers of his Tribunal, whose Caps and Garb are of a very extraordinary Fashion.

The Pomp in which they appear abroad.

These Officers march in Order on each Side the Street, some carrying before him an Umbrella of Silk, some striking from time to time on a Copper Bason, and giving Notice to the People, with a loud Voice, to shew Respect as he passes along. Some carry great Whips, others long Staves or Iron-Chains, the Din of all which Instruments makes the People tremble; for they are naturally timorous, and know that in Cases of Disobedience they cannot escape Correction. So that as soon as he is in Sight, all who are in the Street, shew their Respect; not by saluting him in any manner whatsoever, for that would be a Familiarity deserving Punishment; but by withdrawing out of the Way, standing upright with the Feet close together, and their Arms hanging down; in which Posture as the most respectful, they continue till the Mandarin has pass'd by.

That of a
Tsing-tu, or Vice-Roy.

If the Chi-fu, who is a Mandarin of the fifth Order, marches with so much Pomp, what must be the Magnificence of the Tsing-tu, or a Vice-Roy, when he goes abroad? He is always accompany'd with a hundred Men at least, and this long Train, which has nothing embarrassing, because every one knows his Post, sometimes takes up a whole Street. In the middle of this Procession he appears, clad in his Habit of Ceremony, and sitting in a very large Chair, handsomely gilt, carry'd on the Shoulders of eight Men. First, two Kettle Drums beating upon Copper Basons, gives Notice of the March. Next follow eight Persons bearing Colours, (with japan'd Staves) whereon are written in large Characters, the Vice-Roy's Titles. Then fourteen other Ensigns, exhibiting the Symbols peculiar to his Office, such as the Dragon, Tyger, Phoenix, flying Tortoise, and other winged Animals. Six Officers carrying a Board in the Shape of a large Shovel, suspended at a pretty good Height; whereon are written, in large golden Characters, the particular Qualifications of the Mandarin. Two others bearing, the first, a large triple Umbrella of yellow Silk; the second a Case, wherein the Umbrella is kept. Two Archers on Horseback, at the Head of the chief Guards. The Guards arm'd with strait Scythes, adorn'd with Locks of Silk in four Rows; two other Files of arm'd Men, some of them carrying Maces, either with long Handles, or in the Form of a Hand or Serpent of Iron; others arm'd with large Hammers and long Hatchets like a Crescent. Another Company of Guards, some arm'd with sharp Battle-Axes, others with strait Scythes like the former. Soldiers carrying three pointed Halberts, Arrows or Axes. Two Porters, with a kind of handsome Coffer, containing the Seals of his Office. Two other Kettle Drummers, who give Notice of the Mandarin's Approach. Two Officers with Plumes of Geese Feathers in their Hats, and arm'd with Canes, to keep the Crowd in Awe. After them come two Mace-bearers, with gilt Maces in the Shape of Dragons, and a great number of Officers of Justice; some holding Whips or flat Staves, to give the Bastonado, others arm'd with Chains, Whips, and Cutlances, or carrying Silk Scarfs. Lastly, two Standard-bearers, and the Captain, who commands the Company. This is the Equipage that precedes the Vice-Roy, who is carry'd in his Chair, surrounded with Pages and Footmen, having near his Person an Officer, who carries a large Fan, shap'd like a Skreen. He is follow'd by several Guards, some armed with Maces, in form of Polyhedrons, and others with long handled Sabres. After which come several Ensigns and Cornets, with a great number of Domestics on Horseback, every one carrying something for the Use of the Mandarin; as the second Cap, inclosed in a Case, if the Weather should oblige him to change the one he wears, &c.

When he is abroad in the night time, they do not carry Flambeaux as in Europe, but several very handsome large Lanthorns, on which are written in Capital Letters the Titles and Quality of the Mandarin, with the Order of his Mandarinat; thereby to inspire every one with the Reverence due to him, as also that those who are walking may stop, and others who are sitting may rise in a respectful manner.

It is the Duty of the Governor of every Hyen or Cheu to administer Justice; to receive the Tribute due from each Family to the Emperor; to visit personally the Bodies of those who have either been kill'd in some Scuffle, or thro' Despair have laid violent Hands on themselves. Twice in a Month he is oblig'd to give Audience to all the Heads of the Wards in his District, and to inform himself exactly of every thing that passes. It is likewise his Business to give Passports to Barks and other Vessels, to hear Complaints and Accusations, which must be almost continual, in a Country so populous. All Law-Suits come before his Tribunal, and he punishes the Person he judges to be in the Wrong, with a severe Bastonado. In a Word, he condemns Criminals to Death, but his Sentence, or indeed that of any superior Mandarin, cannot be executed till it be ratify'd by the Emperor. Causes of small Importance are determined first by the three inferior Mandarins, who are like the private Deputies of our Judges of the Presidial Courts [in France].

However formidable the Authority of these Mandarins may be, they could not maintain themselves in their Offices, if they did not gain the Reputation of being the Fathers of the People, and of having nothing in view, but their Happiness; so that a good Mandarin ought to place all his Glory in rendering the People happy. A Magistrate of this Character has made it his Business to send for Persons skill'd in breeding Silk Worms and making Silk, that he might teach those Arts in his District; and thus by enriching his City, he has acquired the greatest Applause.

There have been others, who in the Time of a Storm were not contented to forbid Persons to cross the River, but have come themselves to the Bank, and staid there all Day; to prevent, by his Presence, any from being so rash thro' Desire of Gain as to expose himself to the Danger of perishing miserably. A Mandarin who did not shew the like Affection, or was too severe to the People under him, could not avoid being noted down in the Informations sent by the Vice-Roys every three Years to the Court, and this would be sufficient to deprive him of his Office. If a Prisoner dies in his Confinement, a great number of Attestations must be produced, to prove, that the Mandarin was not suborn'd to compass his Death; that he visited him, sent him a Physician, and furnish'd him with proper Remedies, &c. for an account must be transmitted to the Emperor of all those who die in Prison, and of the manner of their Death, and according to the Advice which he receives, he often orders an extraordinary Process.

There are certain Occasions whereon the Mandarins affect chiefly to shew their Tendernefs for their People; for instance, when they are apprehensive of a bad Harvest, occasion'd either by Drought, too much Rain, or any other Accident, such as the swarming of Grass-Hoppers, which sometimes over-run certain Provinces; for then the Mandarin, either thro' Affection, Interest, or Dissimulation, omits nothing that may render him popular. Tho' the greater Part of them are Men of Letters, and detest the Idols of Fo and the Tau, yet they fail not to make solemn Visits to their Temples, and that on Foot, contrary to their Custom, to implore Rain or fair Weather. When Calamities of this Nature happen, the Mandarin causes his Orders for a general Fast to be fix'd up in all public Places, forbidding Butchers and Cooks to sell Meat under heavy Penalties; which, tho' they cannot do it openly in their Shops, they do privately by means of a little Money, given under hand to the People of the Tribunal, appointed to see that the Orders are observed.

The Mandarin goes to the Idol Temples on Foot, negligently dress'd, sometimes even with Straw Shoes on, accompany'd with inferior Mandarins, and follow'd by the principal Persons of the City. Being arrived, he lights upon the Altar two or three small perfume-Sticks, after which they all sit; and to pass away the Time, drink Tea, smoke, and chat an Hour or two together, and then retire.

Duty of Governors of Cities of the first and second Rank.

The greatest Merit of the Qian is the Love of the People.

Great Value set on the Life of the Subject.

The Qian visit the Idol Temples to pray for Rain.

An Idol beaten to pieces for not sending Rain.

This is all the Formality they observe on such Occasions, wherein the Reader may perceive they treat the Idol with very little Ceremony; and if they are oblig'd to pray too long before the Favour is granted, they sometimes bring him to Reason with a good Cudgel, but this is rare. It is said that at Kyang-chew, in the Province of Shen-fi, an Image was beaten to pieces by Order of the Officers, for very obstinately refusing to send Rain in Time of a great Drought. It may be presum'd that during this Execution, there were delicate Hymns sung in his Praise; and when Rain fell, they made another Image, which was no difficult matter, (for they are generally of Earth, or a sort of Plaister,) and led it in Triumph into the City; where they offer'd Sacrifices to it, and in a Word restored it to its Saintship again.

Another Idol ill treated on a like account.

The Vice-Roy of a Province proceeded in the same Manner with another Idol, which not vouchsafing to answer his reiterated Prayers, he could not restrain his Choler; but sent an inferior Mandarin to tell him, that if there was not Rain by such a Day, he would drive him out of the City, and level his Temple with the Ground. It is likely the Image did not understand that Language, or was not afraid of his Menaces; for on the Day limit'd there fell no Rain. Upon which the Vice-Roy, to be as good as his Word, forbade the People to carry any Offering to the Image, and ordered the Temple to be shut up, and the Gates seal'd, which was immediately done; but the Rain falling a few Days after, the Vice-Roy's Anger was appeas'd, and the Image permitted to be worshipp'd as before.

In these kinds of public Calamities, the Mandarin addresses himself chiefly to the Guardian-Genius of the City, according to ancient Custom, imploring his Assistance usually in the following Form; viz.

Form of addressing the Guardian
Genius of a City.

"Guardian Genius! Notwithstanding I am the Pastor and Governor of this City, you, tho' invisible, are much more so. This Quality of Pastor obliges me to procure the People what ever is advantageous for them, and to remove from them every thing that is hurtful. But it is from you, properly, that they receive their Happiness; it is you who preserve them from the Misfortunes they are threaten'd with: and tho' you are invisible to our Eyes, yet whenever you please to accept our Offerings, and hear our Vows, you are in some Sense no longer so. But if you are pray'd to in vain, the Heart can have no Share in the Honours paid you; you indeed will continue to be what you are, but you will be little known: in the same manner as I, who am commission'd to protect and defend the People, would make them doubt of my Quality if I did not act answerable to it. In public Calamities we ought to lay before you the Ills which we cannot remedy, and implore your Aid. Behold then the great Affliction the People are in! from the sixth to the eighth Month no Rain hath fallen, nor any Grain been yet reap'd, if all be destroy'd, how can the Earth be sown hereafter? It is my Duty to represent this to you. I have appointed several Fast-Days: the Butchers are forbidden to open their Shops; the use of Meat, Fish, and even Wine, is prohibited; every one applies himself sincerely to purify his Heart, examine his Conscience, and repent: but our Virtue and Merits are not sufficient to move Tyen. As for you, O Spirit! the invisible Governor of this City, you have Access to him; you can request Favours of him for us Mortals, and beseech him to put an end to our Afflictions. Such a Favour obtain'd by your Intercession, will answer the utmost Desires of the People. I shall see then accomplish'd what my Office obliges me earnestly to wish for; and you will be more and more ador'd in the City, when it appears to the Inhabitants, that you do not preside over it in vain."

Duty of the Governors to administer Justice;

As the Mandarin is appointed solely to support and protect the People, he ought always to be ready to hear their Complaints, not only at the stated Hours of Audience, but at all other Hours of the Day. If the Affair be urgent, then they go to his Palace, and beat loud upon a kind of Kettle-Drum, which is sometimes on one side of the Hall of Justice, but commonly without Doors, that the People may come at it both Night and Day. At this Signal, the Mandarin, tho' ever so much employ'd, is oblig'd to leave every thing immediately, to grant the Audience demanded; but whoever gives the Alarm, unless he has suffer'd some extraordinary Wrong that requires speedy Redress, is sure to receive the Bastinado for his Pains.

to preach as Priests under the Emperor.

One of his principal Functions is to instruct his People as he is in the Emperor's stead; who according to the Chinese is not only a Monarch to govern, and a Priest to sacrifice, but is also a Master to teach. Hence it is that from time to time he assembles all the Grandees of the Court and chief Mandarins of the Tribunals, to give them Instructions, always taking his Text out of the Canonical Books.

Their Times of assembling the People.

In like manner, on the first and fifteenth Day of every Month the Mandarins assemble, and give their People a long Discourse, wherein every Governor acts the Part of a Father, who instructs his Family. There is a Law of the Empire for this Practice, and the Emperor himself has appointed the Subjects to be handled in their Sermons; which are comprehended in sixteen Imperial Ordinances as follows; viz.

Subjects for Texts.

The First.

That they very carefully practise the Duties prescribed by filial Piety, and the Deference that the younger Brother ought to pay the elder; whereby they will learn how to set a Value on the essential Obligations, which Nature lays on all Mankind.

The Second.

That they always preserve a respectful Remembrance for the Ancestors of their Family; which will be constantly attended with Unity, Peace, and Concord.

That

That there be Union in all the Villages; by this means they will be Strangers to Quarrels and Law-Suits. The Third.

Let them have a great Esteem for the Profession of Husbandmen, and those who cultivate Mulberry-Trees, wherewith the Silk-Worms are nourish'd; they will then never want Grain to feed on, nor Garments to cover them. The Fourth.

That they accustom themselves to a prudent Oeconomy by Frugality, Temperance and Modesty; and this will be the means of avoiding many idle Expenses. The Fifth.

That great Care be taken to encourage public Schools; to the end young Students may be taught good Morals. The Sixth.

That every one apply himself to his proper Business; which will be an infallible means to keep the Heart and Mind at Ease. The Seventh.

That they stifle Sects and Errors in their Birth; in order to preserve the true and solid Doctrine in its Purity. The Eighth.

That they inculcate to the People the Penal Laws establish'd by the supreme Authority; for Fear will keep rude and untractable Minds in their Duty. The Ninth.

That they instruct Persons thoroughly in the Laws of Civility and decent Behaviour; thus the good Customs, which Decorum has establish'd, will always be punctually practised. The Tenth.

That they apply all their Endeavours to give Children, and younger Brothers, a good Education; which will prevent their giving themselves up to Vice and disorderly Passions. The Eleventh.

That they abstain from all slanderous Accusations; thus Innocence and Integrity will have nothing to fear. The Twelfth.

That they take Care not to conceal the Guilty, whose Crimes oblige them to lead a wandering and vagabond Life; by this Means they will avoid being involved in their Misfortunes. The Thirteenth.

That they be punctual in paying the Contributions establish'd by the Prince; whereby they will prevent the Inquiries and Vexations of the Tax-Gatherers. The Fourteenth.

That they act in Concert with the Heads of the Wards in every City; which will prevent Thefts, and the Escape of those who are Guilty. The Fifteenth.

That they repress the Sallies of Anger, which will secure them against all Danger. The Sixteenth.

These are the Ordinances which serve the Mandarins for a Text to their Sermons. The following Discourse of one of them upon the third Head, will shew their Manner of instructing the People.

"The Emperor orders you to preserve Union in the Villages, that Quarrels and Law-Suits may be banish'd from thence; listen attentively to the Explanation that I shall make of this Ordinance. A Sermon preached by a Qian.

"When you dwell in the same Place (whether Relations or not, imports little) you pass for an Inhabitant of that Place or Town; you there live with Kinsfolks or Acquaintances, with Persons advanced in Age, and with your School-Fellows; you cannot go abroad without seeing one another Morning and Evening, and at all times you will meet. It is this Assemblage of Families united in the same Place, that I call a Village: in this Village there are rich and Poor; some are your Superiors, some your Inferiors, and other are your Equals.

"First of all therefore let this be a Maxim with you, that your Credit ought never to be employ'd to make yourself dreaded; and that you are never to be allow'd to make use of Craft or to lay Snares for your Neighbours. To speak of the latter with Contempt; to be ostentatious of your own good Qualities; and to seek to enrich yourself at the Expence of others, are things that you ought absolutely to avoid.

"One of the Ancients has wisely remark'd, that in a Place where there are old Men as well as young, the latter ought to respect the former, without examining whether they are rich or poor, learned or ignorant, they ought to regard nothing but their Age. If being in easy Circumstances you despise the Poor; if being in Indigence you look upon the Rich with an Eye of Envy; this will cause perpetual Divisions. What! says the proud rich Man, will you not give Place to me? and behold I am ready to crush you in pieces. In effect, if you have Lands or Houses he will endeavour to deprive you of them, and by Violence encroach upon your Property; neither your Wives nor Daughters will be secure from such a Creditor: as you are insolvent he will force them from you, under the specious Pretence of equitable Compensation. Sometimes when he is in an angry Mood, he will let loose his Horses and Oxen into your Fields, which will spoil your Lands newly sown; sometimes in the Heat of Wine he will give himself up to the greatest Excesses. Honest Men will not be able to avoid his Insults. The Patience of his Neighbours being quite tir'd out, they will exclaim against him, and apply to the Gentlemen of the Quirk, to sue him in form. These mischievous crafty Vermin will aggravate every thing in order to involve them over Head and Ears in Law. They will magnify a small Pond to a raging Sea, whose foaming Waves swell to the very Clouds; and the merest Trifle will become a most serious Matter: mean time the Accusation will be carry'd into all the Tribunals; and the Expence of the Prosecution will be attended with Consequences that will be felt ever after.

"Are you on a Journey? if you chance to meet a Man of your own Village, as soon as you know him by his Tongue, nothing can be comparable to the secret Pleasure which

"you

" which you feel ; you lodge together, you love one another as if you were own Brothers : how " then comes it to pass, that when you live in the same Place, instead of preserving Peace and " good Order, you excite Quarrels and sow Divisions ?

" Never speak Evil of others, and then they will let you be easy, never fall out with any " Body. Give way of your own Accord to others ; let your Patience be Proof against Contra" diction, and you need never to fear being abused or insulted.

" When a Difference arises between two Persons, if charitable People draw near to reconcile " them ; when the Fire of Discord is kindled in a Family, if the Neighbours run to quench
 " it ; if when a Man is in a violent Passion, another takes him aside, and mildly endeavours to " pacify his Anger : the great Fire that seemed to menace Heaven, will disappear in a Mo" ment ; and that important Affair, which was going to be carried before the Tribunals of the " Great, will be brought to an End with as much Ease as an Icicle is melted, or a Tile taken " from the Roof of an House. But if an Incendiary interposes, like a great Stone which, fal" ling with Violence, breaks to Pieces every thing in its Way, he will engage you by his pern-
 " cious Counsels and Practices, which will lead you to the Brink of Ruin. But since I am speak" ing of the fatal Consequences that attend Quarrels and Law-Suits, hearken attentively to what " I have farther to say on this Head.

" When once the Affair comes before a Mandarin, either you or the adverse Party must be " vanquish'd. If you have the worst on't, and are not willing to submit, you will seek every " where for Support and Protection ; you will endeavour to obtain the good Graces of the " Mandarin's Favourites, and they must be well paid for their Services. You will be desirous
 " also of gaining over to your Side the People belonging to the Court, and how many Feasts
 " will that oblige you to give them ? have you wherewithal to defray such Expences ?

" But if you fall into the Hands of an evil Judge, who, to ruin you, borrows the Colours and " Appearances of Uprightness and Equity ; in vain have you made Interest with those who " have Access to him, and are much in his Esteem ; in vain the Officers of the Court, those " venal Wretches, those Blood-Suckers of the People, will declare themselves in your Favour.
 " After all the Expences laid out, on one Side by you to oppose your Enemy, and by your " Enemy on the other to avoid your Fury, you will both be forced at length into an Accommo" dation. But if you refuse to agree ; if after being cast in a subordinate Tribunal, you will ap" peal to a superior Court ; you will see Petitions every Day running thro' all the Tribunals :
 " the Law-Suit will be spun out for several Years, by the Tricks of roguish Practitioners.
 " The Witnesses will suffer by it ; a great Number of Persons will be involved in your Affair :
 " some will be thrown into Prison, others punish'd by the Hand of Justice. In short, before " Sentence be pronounced, an infinite Number of Families will be reduced to shameful Beggary.
 " You may conclude from what I have said, that had you Mountains of Copper, and Mines of " Gold, they would hardly defray such Expences ; and tho' you had a Body of Iron you would " scarcely be able to hold out against the Fatigues you must undergo.

" The Emperor, whose Compassion to his People is unbounded, prohibits Law-Suits ; and " having your Peace and Unanimity at Heart, is so good as to give you Instructions himself,
 " to prevent the Broils which may arise among you.

" To that end reverence old Age, honour Virtue, respect the Rich, and pity the Poor.
 " Don't you concern yourself to rectify what you find out of Order. If you suspect any " Body has a Design to disparage you, never seek to revenge yourself ; if you have Libertines
 " among you, exhort them with Civility and Mildness to change their Life. On the Work Days due " to the Public, shew your Unanimity, by your mutual Readiness to assist one another. The " next Piece of Advice, which does not less concern you is, that if you are rich, you should " not pride yourself in keeping plentiful Tables, or in wearing costly Apparel ; if you have " Authority and Credit, never employ them to oppress the Weak and Defenceless. What I re" quire of you is, that you be humble in your Prosperity, as well as active and vigilant in your " Duty. 'Tis my Wish also, that being quite free from Ambition, you may be content with " a little ; and that you would distinguish yourselves by Mildness, by Moderation, and above all
 " by Frugality,

" Beware of those Years which happen from time to time, when Epidemic Distempers,
 " joined to a Scarcity of Corn, make all Places desolate : Your Duty then is to have Compas" sion on your Fellow-Citizens, and assist them with whatever you can spare.

" This Point, as it promotes your Interest, claims your Attention ; for by this Means your " Husbandmen will be faithful, your Fields will not be abandon'd, your Neighbours will be " careful of your Preservation, and your Interest will be that of the Publick : On the other " hand, Heaven, by Ways to you unknown, will protect and shower down Blessings upon
 " you.

" As for Tradesmen and all Mechanics, tho' by the immutable Laws of a superior Being,
 " they are born to Poverty and in a low Condition ; their Happiness consists in living according " to their Circumstances, in not being uneasy at their own Poverty, nor envying others in the " Possession of their Wealth. This Rule of Morality will be to them a Source of Peace and " Consolation. A good Man will assuredly prosper ; for true Virtue can never remain long in " Obscurity. You are now acquainted with the Intentions of the Emperor, whereto it behoves
 " you to conform ; which if you do (as I make no doubt but you will) the greatest Advantages " will accrue from your Obedience : for you will content the Paternal Heart of his Majesty :
 " "Discord"

"Discord will be no more seen among you; you will save the Mandarins the Trouble of multiplying Arrests and Punishments; and you will promote the Tranquillity and Peace of the Emperor. When you shall return Home apply your selves, each of you, seriously to the Practice of so useful a Doctrine".

In this manner every Mandarin gives the People twice a Month a Lecture of Morality; and it is so essential a Part of his Office, that there are some sorts of Crimes for which, if committed within his District, he must be accountable. The Qada accountable for the Crimes of the People.

When a Theft or a Murder happens in a City, he is obliged to discover the Thief or Murderer, or else he will lose his Employment. If a Crime be committed, as for Instance, if a Son should be so unnatural as to kill his Father, the Court is no sooner inform'd of it than all the Mandarins of that District are deprived of their Offices. "The Fault is theirs, say they, nor could this Misfortune have happened had they been careful to promote good Morals: For the same Reason, where the Children have been guilty of extraordinary Crimes, they put their Parents to Death along with them.

As nothing is comparable to the excellent Order established for the Government of the Empire, so no State would be more happy, did all the Mandarins, instead of gratifying their Passions, conform themselves strictly to the Laws of their Country: But among so great a Number there are always some, who, placing their Happiness in the Pleasures and Enjoyments of this Life, do not often scruple to sacrifice the most sacred Laws of Reason and Justice to their private Interests. Not free from Corruption.

There are no Tricks or Artifices which some of the inferior Officers do not make Use of to deceive the superior Mandarins; among the latter there are some who endeavour to impose upon the supreme Tribunals of the Court, and even to deceive the Emperor himself. They are so dexterous at cloaking their Design, under the most humble and flattering Expressions; and in the Memorials, which they present, affect such an Air of Disinterestedness, that it is often a very hard Matter for the Prince not to mistake Falsehood for Truth.

Besides, as their Salaries are not always sufficient to support their Pomp and Luxury, they make no Difficulty to commit Injustice, provided they can do it secretly; and even Ministers of State, and chief Presidents of the supreme Courts, have been known to extort Money underhand from the Vice-Roys of Provinces; and these again, are forced to recruit themselves by squeezing the subordinate Officers, who do not fail to exact from the People wherewithal to defray the Expence.

The Laws, however, have provided against this Disorder by several Precautions, which keep the Mandarins within Bounds, and shelter the People from Extortions. The Emperor [Yong-ching] now reigning, has apply'd a still more effectual Remedy; for he has augmented their Salaries, and declared he will receive no Presents himself: forbidding them to receive more than their Due, under the Penalty of the Law, which ordains, that a Mandarin, who shall receive or unjustly exact fourscore Ounces of Silver, shall be punished with Death. Means used to prevent it.

Besides this, First, it is difficult to prevent Commotions among the People when they groan under Oppression; and the least Interruption which happens in a Province is imputed to the Vice-Roy, who is almost sure to lose his Employment, if it be not immediately suppressed. He is considered in the Eye of the Law, as the Head of a great Family, whereof, if the Peace be disturbed, it must be his Fault. 'Tis his Business to govern the subordinate Officers, and hinder them from oppressing the People. When the Yoke is easy, they are so far from shaking it off, that they bear it cheerfully. (1.) The Qada accountable for all Insurrections.

Secondly, The Law prescribes, that no Person shall be made a Mandarin of the People, either in the City he belongs to, or even in the Provinces where his Family dwells. And commonly he does not possess the same Office many Years, in the same Place, before he is advanced; whence it happens, that he contracts no such particular Intimacies with the People of the Country, as may occasion his being partial: and as almost all the other Mandarins, who govern in the same Province, are unknown to him, he hath seldom any Reason to favour them. (2.) None to be preferred in his native Country.

If an Employment be given him in a Province joining to that where he came from, it must be in a City at least fifty Leagues from it; the Reason is, because a Mandarin ought to think of nothing but the publick Good. If he possessed a Place in his own Country, his Neighbours and Friends would not fail to solicit him, whereby he might either be biased in his Decrees to do Injustice to others in their Favour, or carry'd, by a Spirit of Revenge, to ruin or oppress those from whom he, or some of his Family, had formerly received Injury. Reasons for this wise Regulation.

They are so nice in this Respect, that they will not permit a Son, a Brother, or a Nephew, &c. to be a subordinate Mandarin, where his Brother, Uncle, &c. is the Superior. For Instance, Suppose such a one is Mandarin of a City of the third Rank, and the Emperor designs to send his eldest Brother to be Vice-Roy of the same Province; on this Occasion, the younger is obliged to give Notice of that Circumstance to the Court, which removes him to a Mandarinate of the same Degree in another Province.

The Reason of this Regulation is, because either the elder Brother being the Superior Officer, might favour the younger by conniving at his Faults; or the younger, presuming on the Dignity and Protection of his Brother, be more partial and remiss in the execution of his Office. On the other hand, it would be very hard for one Brother to be obliged to draw up an Accusation against another.

To avoid such Inconveniencies, Relations are not permitted to possess Employments which have the least Dependence upon each other. What has been said with regard to a Father, an elder Brother, or an Uncle being a superior Mandarin, ought likewise to be understood of a Son, a Brother, or a Nephew, in the same Station, with Respect to a Father, elder Brother, or Uncle, being their Inferiors; and in a word, of all Persons whatever who are nearly related.

(3) The triennial Examinations of the Quān.

Thirdly, Every three Years there is a general Review of all the Mandarins of the Empire, who are examined with Regard to their good or bad Qualifications for Government. Every superior Mandarin examines the Conduct of the inferior, from the time the last Informations were made, or ever since they have been in Office; and give Notes to each of them, containing Praises or Reprimands. For Instance, the chief Mandarin of a City of the third Rank, who has under him three or four petty Mandarins, gives them Notes, and sends them to the Mandarin of a City of the second Rank, on whom he depends; this latter, who has likewise under him several Mandarins governing Cities of the third Rank, examines these Notes, and either agrees thereto, or adds others, according to his Knowledge.

Notes or Certificates given them.

When the Mandarin of the City of the second Order, has received the Notes from all the Mandarins of the Cities of the third Order, he gives them his Note; and then sends the Catalogue of all the Mandarins in his District, to the Mandarins-General of the Province, who reside at the Capital. This Catalogue passes from them to the Vice-Roy; who after he has examined it in private, and then with the four Mandarins-General, sends it to Court with his own Notes; that the chief Tribunal may have an exact Knowledge of all the Mandarins of the Empire, in order to reward or punish them according to their Deserts.

They reward a Mandarin by raising him some Degrees higher, or giving him a better Place: and they punish him by removing him a few Degrees lower, or turning him out of his Post.

For two Months that this Examination lasts, the Vice-Roy sees no Body, admits no Visits, nor receives any Letters from those who are in his Government. He takes these Measures that he may appear to be a Man of Integrity, and to regard nothing but Merit.

Form of the Notes.

As to the Form of these Notes under the Name of Mandarins, and Title of their Mandarinate, they write: He is a Man greedy of Money; he is too severe in his Punishments; he treats the People harshly: Or else, He is too much advanced in Years. He is no longer able to perform the Duties of his Office. This Man is proud, fantastical, capricious, of an uneven Temper. That Person is rash, passionate, has no command of himself. Such a one is weak in his manner of Governing, does not know how to make himself obey'd; or else, He is slow, he is not expeditious in dispatching Business. He is not well acquainted with the Laws and Customs, &c.

Favourable Notes run in this manner: He is a Man of Integrity, who does not oppress the People, who is attentive to all the Duties of his Office. Or else, He is a Man of Experience. He is steady without Harshness, and gains the Love of the People; He has the Art of governing, &c.

The Quān rewarded or punished according thereto.

When the Catalogue of Notes arrive at Pe-king, the supreme Tribunal to which it is address'd, examine them; and having set down such Reward or Punishment as it appoints for each Mandarin of the Province, send them back to the Vice-Roy. They deprive those of their Employments whose Certificates are defective as to the smallest Point of Government: and raise those who are commended, to superior *Mandarinate*s. For Instance, one who has been Mandarin of a City of a third Rank, and has given Proof of his Capacity, is advanced to the Government of a City of the second Rank, for which he seems to have the necessary Talents.

They are contented with raising or turning down others a few Degrees; in which Case the Mandarins are obliged to put at the Head of their Orders, the Number of Degrees that they have been advanced or degraded. For Instance, The Mandarins of this City, raised three Degrees, Kya-san-kye: or else, Kyang-san-kye, turned down three Degrees, do give Notice and ordain, &c. By this Means the People are apprized of the Reward or Punishment that the Mandarin deserved. When he has been raised ten Degrees, he has room to hope that he will be advanced to a superior Mandarinate: On the contrary, if he has been depressed ten Degrees, he is in Danger of losing his Employment.

(4) The sending Inspectors into the Provinces.

Fourthly; As the General Officers might be corrupted with Bribes, by the Governors of Cities, and so connive at the Injustice of the Mandarins who oppress the People; the Emperor from time to time sends Inspectors secretly into the Provinces, who passing from City to City, slip into the Tribunals, while the Mandarin gives Audience; and also by their Enquiry among the Mechanics and common People, dexterously inform themselves in what Manner he behaves in the Administration of his Office. And if by these secret Informations, they discover any thing irregular in his Conduct, they presently unveil the Ensigns of their Dignity, and declare themselves the Emperor's Envoys.

As the Inspector's Authority is absolute, he that Moment prosecutes the faulty Mandarins, and punishes them with all the Rigor of the Laws; but if the Injustice be not very flagrant, he sends his Information to Court, that they may determine what is to be done.

Method of their Proceedings.

A few Years ago, the Emperor appointed Commissioners of this kind for the Province of Quang-tong, to enquire into an Affair which concern'd the Vice-Roy and the Comptroller General of Salt, who had sent Accusations to Pe-king against each other. The People of the Province, who suffered by the dearth of Salt, the Price of which was considerably augmented, took the Vice-Roy's Part, and most of the Mandarins General spoke in favour of the latter.

The

The Emperor being very desirous of knowing who was in the Fault, sent the Tjong-tu of the Provinces of Che-kyang and Fo-kyen; and the Tjong-tu of Kyang-nan and Kyang-shi, in Quality of his Commissioners to Kan-ton. At their Arrival they refused the usual Honours paid at their Reception; and to remove all Suspicion, that they might be gained to either Side by Presents, they had even no Communication with the Mandarins, but when they cited them one after another to take their Informations. For which Reason, without receiving or making any Visit, they went directly to the Palace prepared for them, and shut themselves up, till such time as having cited the Vice-Roy and Comptroller General they had begun the Process, by repeated Interrogatories put to those two great Mandarins, who appeared several Times like common Criminals before their Judges.

The Vice-Roy, during the whole Time of the Trial, was obliged to leave his Palace every Morning, and repair to a Place near the Hall of Audience, and there to wait till Night; in which he was treated yet more favourably than the Comptroller-General, who was obliged all the Time to absent himself from his Tribunal, and to be continually at the Door of the Audience-Chamber.

All the Shops in the City were shut up, and the People by their Deputies, sent in their Accusations against the Comptroller, which were received by the Commissioners, as well as those of the Mandarins. The Informations being ended, the Commissioners sent them to Pe-king, by a particular Express; after which they received Visits from all the Mandarins, except the Comptroller-General.

Fifthly, Tho' the Inspectors of Provinces are always chosen from among the Officers of considerable Posts, and known Integrity; yet, as they may sometimes abuse their Power, and be tempted to enrich themselves by taking Bribes from the Guilty, to wink at their Unjustice, to keep them upon their Guard, the Emperor, when they least think of it, makes a Progress into certain Provinces, that he may hear in Person the just Complaints of the People against their Governors. These Visits, wherein the Prince affects to render himself popular, make the Mandarins tremble, let their Conduct be ever so little liable to blame. The late Emperor Kang-bi in one of his Journeys into the Southern Provinces, made in 1689, passed thro' the Cities of Su-chew, Yang-chew, and Nan-king. He was on Horseback, follow'd by his Guards, and about three thousand Gentlemen, in which manner he made his Entry into the last. The Citizens came to receive him with Standards, silk Ensigns, Canopies, Umbrellas, and other Ornaments without Number. At the Distance of every twenty Paces they had erected in the Streets Triumphant Arches cover'd with the finest Stuffs, and adorn'd with Festoons, Ribbands, and Tufts of Silk, under which he pass'd. The Streets were lin'd with an infinite Number of People, who shew'd the greatest Marks of Veneration, and observ'd so profound a Silence, that there was not heard the least Noise. He lay in his Bark the Night he arrived at Yang-chew, and the next Day made his Entry on Horseback into the City; where finding the Streets cover'd with Carpets, he ask'd the Inhabitants, if that had been done by the Mandarin's Order: and finding they did it of their own accord, to give a public Testimony of their Veneration for his Majesty, he express'd his Satisfaction. The Streets were so full of Men and Children, who throng'd among the Horsemen, that the Emperor stop't every Moment, seeming to be highly delighted with it. The Inhabitants of Su-chew, having laid Carpets upon the Pavement of the Streets, the Emperor alighted, at the Entrance of the City, and commanded the Horses to stop, that they might not spoil so many fine pieces of Silk, which belonged to the People: he went therefore on Foot to the Palace prepar'd for him, and honour'd the City with his Presence for two Days.

In these kinds of Journeys the Emperor declares himself the Protector and Father of the People, by executing speedy and severe Justice upon the Mandarins, when the Complaints against them are just. P. le Comte relates an Example of this, by which the late Emperor Kang-bi render'd himself equally formidable to the Mandarins, and amiable to the People.

"This great Prince being separated at some Distance from his Attendants, (says that Jesuit) and perceiving an old Man who wept bitterly, ask'd the Cause of his Tears. My Lord, reply'd the Man, who did not know him, I had but one Child, in whom I placed all my Joy as well as the Care of my Family; and a Tartarian Mandarin has taken him from me, so that I am at present deprived of all Succour: for how can I, who am a poor weak Man, oblige the Governor to do me Justice? This is not so difficult as you think it, (reply'd the Emperor) get up behind me, and guide me to the House of this Ravisher. The good Man obey'd without Ceremony, and in two Hours time they arriv'd at the Mandarin's Palace, who did not expect such an extraordinary Visit.

"Mean time the Guards and a great Company of Lords, after long rambling about, arriv'd at the Mandarin's; and without knowing what was the matter, some surrounded the House, while others enter'd with the Emperor: who having convicted the Mandarin of the Violence he was accused of, condemn'd him to lose his Head on the Spot. After this turning towards the afflicted Father, "To make you full Amends, said he to him with a serious Air, I give you the Employment of the guilty Person, who is put to Death. Take Care to behave yourself in it with more Moderation than he did; and let his Crime and Punishment be a Warning to you, that in your turn you be not made an Example of."

Lastly, Nothing can be more instructive, as well as proper, to keep the Mandarins in Order, and prevent their committing Faults, than the Gazette, which is printed every Day at Pe-king, and dispers'd from thence into all the Provinces. There is nothing inserted in it, but what what relates to the Government; and as that of China is absolutely Monarchical, and all Affairs however inconsiderable are referr'd to the Emperor; it contains nothing but what may be of great Use to direct the Mandarins in the Execution of their Offices, and instruct the Literati as well as the Commonalty. For Instance; you find there the Names of the Mandarins who have been deprived of their Employments, and for what Reasons; one, because he was negligent in gathering the Emperor's Tribute, or had imbezzel'd it; another for being either too indulgent or severe in his Punishments; this for his Oppressions, and that for want of Talents to govern well. If any Mandarin has been advanc'd to a considerable Place, or remov'd to a worse, or if he has been depriv'd, for some Fault, of the Annual Pension he receiv'd of the Emperor, it is immediately put into the Gazette.

Nature of the Articles contain'd in it.

It contains an Account of all Criminal Matters, which are punish'd with Death; likewise the Names of the Officers who fill the Places of the Mandarins that are remov'd; all the Calamities that happen in a Province, and the Relief given by the Mandarins of the respective Cities by the Emperor's Order; an Extract of the Expences disbursed for the Subsistence of the Soldiers, the Necessities of the People, the Public Works, and the Benefaction of the Prince; the Remonstrances made by the Supreme Tribunal to the Emperor, concerning his own Conduct or his Decisions; therein is mention'd also the Day when the Emperor plough'd the Earth, in order by his Example to excite Emulation in the People, and inspire their Governours with a Love of Labour and Application to Agriculture; the Time he has fix'd for assembling the Grandees of the Court, and all the Chief Mandarins of the Tribunals at Pe-king, to be instructed by him in their Duty. There you meet with the Laws, and new Customs that have been establish'd; as also the Praises or Reprimands given by the Emperor to a Mandarin; for Instance, Such a Mandarin has no good Reputation; if he does not mend, I will punish him.

In short, the Chinese Gazette is so contriv'd, that it is of great Use to instruct the Mandarins how to govern the People; for which Reason they read it carefully, and as it gives an account of all the public Transactions in this vast Empire, most of them write down Remarks upon the Passages in it, that may help to direct their Conduct.

To add any thing to it criminal.

Nothing is printed in the Gazette but what has been presented the Emperor, or comes from him; those who have the Care of it not daring to add a tittle, not even their own Reflections, upon pain of Corporal Punishments.

In 1726, a Writer belonging to a Tribunal, and another employ'd in the Post-Office, were condemn'd to die, for having inserted certain Falshoods in the Gazette; the Reason, upon which the Tribunal of Criminal Affairs founded their Judgment, was, that what they had done shew'd a Failure of Respect towards his Majesty, which is by the Laws declar'd Capital.

The Quân
restrain'd from Pleasure.

To conclude, the Laws prohibit the Mandarins most of the common Pleasures of Life. They are but seldom permitted to treat their Friends, and give them a Play; they would risk their Fortune if they took the Liberty to game or walk abroad, to make private Visits, or frequent public Assemblies; being debarr'd all Diversions but what they can take in the most private Apartments of their own Palace.

Of the Military Government and Forces of the Empire; the Forts and Soldiers, their Arms and Artillery.

AS there were formerly in France Knights belonging to the Army, and Knights belonging to the Laws, there are likewise in China Literary Doctors, and Military Doctors. Having already spoken of the first, upon whom the Government depends, we proceed now to the latter, who are appointed to preserve Tranquillity in the Empire, to keep their Neighbours in Awe, and to stifle or prevent Rebellions.

Degrees among the Military
Quân.

The Military Mandarins, or Officers of the Army, must pass several Examinations, as well as the Literary Mandarins, and give Proof of their Strength, Dexterity, and Experience in the Art of War. Accordingly there are three Degrees among them, which they are to take, viz. those of Batchelor, Licentiate, and Doctor of Arms. The Batchelors are examined in the Capital of every Province, in order to be Licentiates, in the Manner explain'd elsewhere.

5 Tribunals or Classes.

There are at Pe-king five Tribunals of Military Mandarins, call'd U-fu, that is, The five Classes, or Troops of Mandarins of War.

The first Class is that of the Mandarins of the Rear-Guard, call'd Hew-fu. The second consists of the Mandarins of the left Wing, which is nam'd Tso-fu. The third is of the Mandarins of the right Wing, call'd Yew-fu. The fourth of the Mandarins of the Van-Guard of the main Body, nam'd Chong-fu. The fifth of the Mandarins of the Van-Guard, call'd Tjen-fu.

These five Classes have at their Head a Chief [or President] and two Assistants, which are of the first Order of Mandarins. They commonly choose for these Posts great Lords of the Empire, and their these are they who command the Officers and all the Soldiers. These five depend on a Supreme Tribunal of War, call'd Yong-ching-fu, whose President is one of the greatest Lords of the Empire, and has Authority over the five Tribunals, and all the Officers and Soldiers of the Court; but to prevent the Abuse of so extensive a Power, which renders him Master of so many Troops, they give him a Literary Mandarin for an Assistant, with the Title of Superintendent of the Army, and two Inspectors nam'd by the Emperor, who have their Share in all Affairs. Moreover, when the Execution of any Military Project is in Agitation, they depend absolutely on the fourth of the six Supreme Courts, call'd Ping-pu, already spoken of, which has the whole Militia of the Empire under its Jurisdiction.

Supreme Tribunal of Yong-ching-fu or Zhong-ching-fu

Tho' there are great Lords, who, holding in the Empire the Rank of Princes, Dukes, and Earls, are above all the Orders of Mandarins, by their Dignity, Merit, and Services; yet there is not one of them but thinks himself honour'd by the Title he derives from his Mandarinate, and the Quality of Chief of the five Tribunals of Military Mandarins. None can be more ambitious to command than the Chinese, placing all their Glory and Happiness in having Authority in the State.

The Rank and Business of the principal Military Mandarin is much the same with that of a General in Europe. He has under him in some Places four Mandarins, and in others only two, whose Employment is not unlike that of our Lieutenant-Generals, who have likewise four subordinate Mandarins, answering to Colonels; these again have under them others, who may be considered as Captains, and have likewise their subaltern Officers resembling our Lieutenants and Ensigns.

Degrees of Military Rank.

Each of these Mandarins has a Train suitable to his Dignity; and when he appears in Public, he is always attended by a Company of Officers belonging to his Tribunal. All of them together command a great number of Troops, partly Horse, and partly Foot.

These Officers exercise their Soldiers regularly: the Exercise consisting in a kind of tumultuous and disorderly Marches, which they perform when they attend the Mandarins; or else in forming Squadrons, in filing off in Order, in encountering each other, or in rallying at the Sound of Horns and Trumpets; in a Word, they draw the Bow, and handle the Sabre with a great deal of Skill. They also from time to time review their Troops, examining carefully their Horses, Muskets, Sabres, Arrows, Cuirasses, and Helmets. If there be the least Rust on their Arms, they are punish'd on the Spot for their Negligence; with thirty or forty Blows of a Battoon, if they are Chinese; or so many Lashes of a Whip, if they are Tartars. At other times they are at Liberty to follow what Trade they please, unless they are on some Duty which gives them full Employ; as when, for Instance, they are placed to guard a City-Gate, or to take Care of the high Roads.

Discipline of the Troops.

As the Military Business does not take up much of their Time in a Country which has been so many Years at Peace; far from being oblig'd to enlist Men by Force, or Money, as is practis'd in Europe, the Profession of a Soldier is commonly look'd upon as a Fortune, which they endeavour to procure by means of their Friends, or by Presents to the Mandarins; the Service being generally in the Country where they dwell, and have their Family.

Profession of a Soldier coveted in China.

The three Northern Provinces furnish abundance of Soldiers, who every three Months receive their Pay; being five Sous of fine Silver, and a Measure of Rice a day, which is sufficient to maintain one Man. Some have double Pay, and Horsemen have five Sous more, with two Measures of small Beans to feed their Horses, which also are provided by the Emperor.

The Pay.

They reckon more than eighteen thousand Mandarins of War, and above seven hundred thousand Soldiers distributed among the Forts, Cities, and Fortifications, belonging to the several Provinces, and along the Great Wall. These Troops being well clothed, and well arm'd, make a very fine Appearance in their March, or on a Review; but they are not comparable to the Soldiers of Europe, either for Courage or Discipline, being easily put into Disorder and routed.

Number of Military Qua and Forces.

Besides, that the Chinese are naturally effeminate, and the Tartars are almost degenerated to Chinese, the profound Peace they have enjoy'd, gives them no Opportunity to become Warlike. Add to this the Esteem that they have for Learning preferable to every thing else; the Dependence which the Soldiers have on the Literati; and the Education that is given to Youth, (who see nothing but Books and Characters, who are instructed with a grave and serious Air, and hear nothing spoken of but Law and Politics,) are so many Obstructions to their being Warriors. These Troops are scarce ever employ'd, especially since Tartary has submitted, for any thing else, but to prevent Revolts, or to quash Commotions on their first Appearance in a City or Province. Twenty four Tartar Officers have at Court the Dignity of Captain-Generals, and there are likewise many Colonels. Besides these Officers, who were establish'd by the Tartars, there are also Officers of the Ping-pu, or Tribunal of War; who superintend the Chinese Troops throughout the Empire, and have always Couriers ready to carry necessary Orders into the Provinces, which is perform'd with great Secrecy. Their chief Employment is to purge the high Ways of Robbers, whom they follow and observe so carefully, that they seldom escape. On these Occasions, Orders are sent to the City, and, if there be a Necessity for it, the Forces of several Cities, nearest to the Place infested by the Robbers, are employ'd. In War-time several Battallions are detach'd from every Province to form an Army.

Chinese no good Soldiers, and why.

Number of Generals.

Before the Union of the Tartars and Chinese, a prodigious Number of Troops were rang'd along the Great Wall, in order to guard it, and cover the Empire against the Attempts of such formidable Enemies; but at present only the most important Places are garrison'd.

China fortified by Nature.

Nature has taken care to fortify China in all other Places, where it might be liable to be attacked. The Sea, which washes six Provinces, is so shallow near the Shore that no large Vessel can approach it, without being broken to Pieces; and Storms are so frequent that no Fleet can ride there in safety: On the West there are inaccessible Mountains, which are no less a Defence on that side, than the Sea and the Great Wall on the other two.

Great Wall, when and how built.

Two Hundred and Fifteen Years before Christ, this prodigious Work was built, by order of the First Emperor of the Family of Tsin, for securing three great Provinces against the Inruptions of the Tartars. To execute this grand Design he drew every third Man, capable of working, out of each Province; and in laying the Foundation of it on the Sea-Coast, he ordered several Ships laden with Iron and huge Stones to be sunk: whereon the Wall was raised with so much Art, that the Workmen were not to leave the least Chink between the Stones on Forfeiture of their Lives; hence the Work is almost as intire at present, as when it was first built. It is about 500 Leagues in Length, and broad enough for six Horsemen to ride abreast upon it. [See p. 20.]

This Wall is admirable on two accounts; First, That in its Course from East to West it runs in several Places with a gradual Ascent, over very high Mountains; and is fortified with large Towers, no more than two Bow-shots a sunder, that no part of it may be left undefended. It is hard to conceive how this enormous Bulwark could be raised, of the Height it is, in dry and barren Places; considering the Bricks, Mortar, and all the necessary Materials for the Work must have been brought with incredible Labour from a great Distance.

The second is, That this Wall does not run in a strait Line, but, as may be seen in the Map, turns and winds in several Places, according to the Disposition of the Mountains, in such a manner, that the North Part of China may be said to be encompassed with three Walls instead of one.

Chinese Fortifications.

The Cities of War have no Advantage of other fortified Cities but in their Situation, which renders them difficult of Access. The whole Art of Fortification among the Chinese consists in an excellent Rampart, Brick-Walls, Towers, and a large Ditch full of Water; and, to say the Truth, this is sufficient Security against all Efforts of Enemies, who are as ignorant of the offensive as the defensive part of War.

Fortresses several kinds.

The Forts, fortified Places, and Cittadels, are very numerous, and distinguish'd in seven different Orders, named by the Chinese, Quang, Gbey, So, Chin, Pau, Pu and Chay. There are about six hundred of the first Order, five hundred and upward of the second, three hundred and eleven of the third, three hundred of the fourth, one hundred and fifty of the fifth, and three hundred of the last: which make above two thousand fortified Places, without reckoning the Towers, Castles, and Redoubts of the famous Wall, which have every one its particular Name and Garrison.

Places of Refuge.

Among the latter, there are Places of Refuge in the middle of the Fields, whither the Husbandmen and Peasants retire with their Flocks and Moveables, in case of Commotions, which rarely happen, or of the sudden Incurfion of Robbers, where they are secure from all Insults. There are others built on the Tops of Rocks and craggy Mountains, inaccessible but by Ladders or Steps cut into the Rock. These Places are not encompass'd with Walls, their Strength consisting solely in their impregnable Situation, or in deep and broad Ditches capable of stopping the Rebels in their March. They reckon, besides these, more than three thousand Towers, or Castles called Tay; wherein are constantly kept Centinels and other Soldiers on Duty, who, when they discover any Disturbance, make a Signal: in the Day, by a Flag on the Top of the Tower, and in the Night, by a lighted Torch, to alarm the Neighbouring Garrisons; for there is not a Province, City, nor walled Town in the Empire, but what has Soldiers for its Defence.

Artillery and Gunpowder.

Artillery is but a modern Invention among the Chinese, and tho' that of Gunpowder is very ancient, they have seldom made use of it but for Fireworks, wherein they excel. There are however three or four Bombards short and thick at the Gates of Nan-king, ancient enough to prove that they have had some Knowledge of Cannon, tho' they seem'd to be ignorant of their Use; for they serve for nothing but to be shewn as Curiosities. They had also a few Patarreroes on Board their Vessels, but had not skill enough to make use of them.

European Cannon admired.

In the Year 1621, the City of Ma-kau having presented the Emperor with three Cannon, and Men to manage them, the first Trial of them was made before the Mandarins; who were greatly surprized at the Novelty, but more when they saw that one of the Pieces in recoiling kill'd a Portuguese, and three Chinese, who did not get out of the way time enough. These Guns being employ'd against the Tartars, who came in swarms towards the Great Wall, they were to terrify'd at the Havock made by them, that they fled, and durst never approach it any more.

In the Year 1636, when the Persecution was raised against the Missionaries, who had not dar'd to appear for ten Years, the Tartars having made a new Irruption into the Empire, the military Mandarins consulted about Measures for putting a stop to their Inroads, and talked of fortifying the Towns, and furnishing them with Artillery. On this occasion, remembering they had often heard Dr. Paul Syu say, that the Missionaries understood the Art of founding Cannon, they immediately besought the Emperor to command P. Adam Sebaal, President of the Tribunal of the Mathematicks, to cast some. His Majesty was desirous to know before hand if this Father had ever actually founded any, or knew how to do it. But the Mandarins taking upon themselves to make the Enquiry, without letting him perceive their Design, intreated the Emperor to hasten what they desired, they made the Father a Visit, under pretence of proposing some Difficulty in Astronomy, and putting him Questions concerning several parts of the Mathematics: among the rest asked him, as it were by chance, if he understood the method of casting Cannon; and the the Father replying that he understood its Principles, they immediately presented him the Emperor's Orders. The Missionary excused himself, by alledging that the Practice was quite different from the Theory; but obey he must, and instruct the Workmen. Accordingly they assigned him a proper Place near the Palace, that he might be assisted by the Eunuchs of the Court. Afterwards the several Pieces of Work relating to Optics, Statics, Architecture and Fortification, and several Instruments of Wood and Copper, made by P. Ferdinand Verbiest, for the Observatory at Pe-king, persuaded the Mandarins that he must be equally skilled in founding Cannon; which they wanted in order to defend the Empire against its Enemies, and especially certain Robbers who infested the Coasts and Frontiers of China, from whence it was difficult to chase them.

For this reason they presented a Memorial to the Emperor, beseeching him to order P. Verbiest to instruct Workmen in the manner of founding and making of Cannon, for the Preservation of the State. The Jesuit having read in the Register of the Church of Pe-king, that a great number of Missionaries have been brought into the Empire by the same means, under the last Family of the Chinese Emperors; and believing that such a piece of Service done for the Emperor would induce him to favour the Romish Religion, he cast 130 Pieces of Cannon with wonderful Success.

casts 130
Cannon.

Some time after, the Council of the Chief Mandarins of War, having presented a Memorial to the Emperor, whereby they required 320 Pieces of Cannon, of different Bores, after the European Fashion, for the defence of the fortified Places; his Majesty granted their Request, and ordered that Nan-wbay-jin (for so the Chinese called P. Verbiest) should oversee the Work, which was to be perform'd accordingly to the Patterns, to be painted and presented him in a Memorial. Accordingly the 11th of February 1681, P. Verbiest having presented the Patterns, they were approved of; and an Order was sent to the Tribunal, which has the Inspection of the Publick Buildings and Works, to furnish all things necessary for the Purpose without Delay.

more.

It took up above a Year to make these Cannon, in which time the Father met with many Obstructions from the Eunuchs of the Palace, who, impatient to see a Stranger so much in favour with the Emperor, us'd their utmost endeavours to defeat the Undertaking; they complained every Moment of the Slowness of the Workmen, while they caused the Metal to be stolen away by the Under-Officers of the Court. As soon as one of the largest Guns was cast, before it could be polished on the inside, they forced an Iron Bullet into the Mouth of it, thinking thereby to render it useless; but Verbiest having charged it thro' the Touchhole, it was fired out with such a terrible Noise, that the Emperor hearing it in the Palace wou'd needs see it repeated. When all the Cannon were finished, they were taken to the foot of the Mountains, half a Day's Journey West from Peking, whither several Mandarins went to see them tried; whereof report being made to the Emperor, he went himself, with several Governors of Western Tartary, who were then at Peking, and the principal Officers of his Army, besides his whole Court, to see the Experiment. Accordingly they were loaded in his Presence, and discharged several times against such Places as he directed.

They are a
ing.

Observing that the Balls hit the Places they were levell'd at by the Jesuit with his Instruments, he was so greatly pleased that he made a solemn Feast for the Tartarian Governor, and principal Officers of the Army, in the middle of the Fields under Tents; drinking out of his Golden Cup, to the Health of his Father-in-Law, of his Officers, and even of those who had so exactly directed the Cannon. At length sending for P. Verbiest, who by his Orders was lodged near his own Tent, he said to him, The Cannon you caused to be made for me the last Year were very serviceable against the Rebels, in the Provinces of Shen-si, Hô-quang and Kyang-si, and I am well satisfied with your Services; then taking off his Vest furred with Martin-skins of great value, and also his Gown that was under it, he gave them to him as a Testimony of his Friendship.

Who honours Ver-biest.

They continued several Days to make Proof of the Guns, in which time they discharged twenty three thousand Bullets, to the great Satisfaction of the Mandarins, whose Officers assisted at the same time. P. Verbiest compos'd a Treatise on the founding of Cannon, and their Use, which he presented the Emperor; with forty four Tables of Figures necessary for understanding the Art, and of the Instruments proper to level the Cannon for shooting at any Mark.

A few Months afterwards, the Tribunal for enquiring into the Deserts of Persons who have done service to the State, presented a Memorial to the Emperor, wherein they besought him to have regard to the Service P. Verbiest had done, by casting so many Pieces of Artillery. His Majesty granted their Petition, and bestow'd on him a Title of Honour, like that conferr'd on the Vice-Roys, when they have deserved well in their Government by their prudent Conduct. To prevent the Superstition of the Chinese, who sacrifice to the Spirit of the Air, Mountains and Rivers, according to the various natural Events, and the different Works they begin or finish, P. Verbiest fixed a Day to bless the Cannon in a solemn Manner. For this purpose he erected an Altar in the Foundry, on which he placed a Crucifix, and then in his Surplice and Stole, adored the true God, making nine Prostrations, and beating his Forehead against the Ground; and as it is the Custom in China to give Names to such kinds of Works, the Father gave to every Piece of Cannon the Names of a he or she Saint of the Romish Church, tracing the Characters that were to be engraven on the Breech of the Gun.

The Jesuit blesses the Cannon.

Some Persons, with a design to render the Jesuits odious, published Libels in Spain and Italy against P. Verbiest; affirming, that it was unworthy of a Priest and a Regular to furnish the Infidels with Arms, and that he had incurred the Excommunications of the Popes who have forbidden it.

The

The Father prudently reply'd, That the Intention of the Church in this Prohibition, was to hinder the Infidels from making use of those Arms against the Christians; that nothing like this could happen in China, since neither the Chinese nor Tartars could make war against the Christians: That, on the contrary, by this means the Romish Religion was established in China; since the Emperor, in recompence of such a Service, gave the Missionaries leave to preach throughout his Dominions.

But P. Verbiest is cleared from these Invectives by the honourable Brief sent him by Pope Innocent XIth; who therein praises him for having so wisely employed the profane Sciences for the Conversion of the Chinese, and exhorts him to continue, by his Zeal and Knowledge, to promote his Religion, promising him all the Assistance of the Holy See, and his Pontifical Authority.

Of the Polity of the Chinese, as well in the Cities for maintaining good Order, as in the great Roads for the Safety and Conveniency of Travellers; of the Custom-Houses, Ports, &c.

IN such a vast Dominion as China, so prodigiously populous, and so full of Cities, there would be nothing but Confusion and Disorder, if the Regulations were not so exactly observed as to prevent the least Disturbances; the Repose which it enjoys being the Effect of the Wisdom of its Laws.

Cities divided into Wards.

Every City is divided into Wards, each of which has a Head, who keeps an Eye over a certain Number of Houses, being responsible for whatever passes within his Precinct; so that should any Tumult happen, and he neglect immediately to inform the Mandarin about it, he would be very severely punish'd.

Masters of Families are equally responsible for the Conduct of their Children and Servants; he who has all the Authority being deem'd culpable, when his Inferiors, who owe him Obedience and Respect, have committed any Crime. The very Neighbours themselves are obliged to lend mutual Assistance when any Misfortune happens, for Instance, a Robbery in the Night; and in such Cases one House answers for the next.

Guards at the Gates.

There is always a good Guard at the Gates of every City, who examine all Passengers; and if they see any thing suspicious about a Man, if his Physiognomy, Air, or Accent, discover him to be a Stranger, he is immediately stopp'd, and Notice given to the Mandarin.

One of their principal Maxims, and which they believe contributes most to good Government, is, not to suffer Foreigners to settle in the Empire; for besides their hereditary Pride, and Contempt of other Nations, whom they look upon as barbarous, they are persuaded, that a Mixture of People would introduce a Diversity of Manners and Customs, which would gradually produce personal Quarrels, Parties and Rebellions, fatal to the Tranquility of the Empire.

None abroad after Night-fall.

As soon as Night falls, the Gates of the City, as also the Barricades at the End of every Street are carefully shut; and at proper Distances there are Centries, to stop those who are abroad. In some Places there are Horsemen continually patrolling upon the Ramparts; The Night, say they, is for Repose, and the Day for Work. This Law is so well observed, that no People of Credit will be seen at Night in the Streets; and if any one happens to be found, he is look'd upon as a Scoundrel or Robber, on the Lurch to do Mischief by favour of the Darkness, and therefore he is stopp'd: So that it is very dangerous to be abroad at unreasonable Hours; it being difficult, however innocent, to escape the Severity of the Magistrates.

Watches of the Night.

There are in every City large Bells, or a Drum of a very extraordinary Size, with which they distinguish the Watches of the Night. Every Watch lasts two Hours. The first begins about Eight in the Evening, during which they strike from time to time one Stroke, either on the Bell or on the Drum; in like manner, they strike two Strokes throughout the second Watch, three in the third, and so on; insomuch that at any Time of the Night, one may know within a Trifle what it is o' Clock. The Sound of their Bells is not very harmonious, because the Hammer which they strike with is not of Metal, but of Wood.

The Gate of Arms is only for the Use of Soldiers, who seldom are in their military Accoutrements but when on Duty, as in time of War, when they keep Guards; when they pass in Review, or when they attend the Mandarins; at other times they apply themselves to Trade, or follow their own private Professions.

If there happens to be a Quarrel among the Populace, and from abusive Language they come to Blows, they are extremely careful not to shed Blood; for which Reason if they chance to have any Stick or Iron Weapons in their Hands, they lay it aside, and fall a Boxing.

They commonly end their Quarrels by complaining to a Mandarin, who sitting in his Chair of State, and surrounded with his Officers, very calmly hears both Parties plead their own Cause; after which he causes the culpable, and sometimes both Parties, to be bastonaded in his Presence.

There

There are common Prostitutes in Cbina as well as elsewhere; but as they generally cause Disturbances, they are not permitted to live within the Walls of the City, or have private Houses to themselves; but several of them lodge together, and often under the Government of a Man, who is responsible for any Disorder. After all, these loose Women are but barely tolerated, being look'd upon as infamous; and some Governors of Cities will not permit them to live within their Districts.

Common Women how regulated.

In short, the Education they give to Youth, contributes much to the Repose which the Cities enjoy; for as Offices and Dignities are obtained according to the Progress made in the Sciences, young Persons are kept continually to their Studies, being wholly debar'd from Play, and all Diversions likely to promote Idleness: by which close Application to cultivate their Minds, and exercise their Memories, they are accustomed to moderate their unruly Passions, and free from a great Part of those Vices that necessarily attend Idleness and Sloth.

Nor is the Government less careful to render the great Roads safe, handsome and commodious, than to preserve Peace in the Cities. The numerous Canals, so useful for the transporting of Merchandizes into several Provinces, are border'd with Quays of hewn Stone; and in low, marshy, and watery Places, very long Causeways have been raised for the Convenience of Travellers.

The great Roads,

Great Care is taken to keep the Roads even, and often to have them well pav'd, especially in the Southern Provinces, where they use neither Horses nor Waggon. The Roads are commonly very broad, and as in many Places the Soil is light, it dries almost as soon as the Rain ceases. They have made Ways over the highest Mountains, by cutting thro' Rocks, levelling the Tops of Hills, and filling up the Valleys.

kept in Order.

In some Provinces the high Roads are like so many great Walks, having very tall Trees, and sometimes Walls on each Side, eight Foot high, to prevent Travellers from riding over the Fields; with Openings into the Cross-ways leading to different Villages.

like Garden-Walks.

In the great Roads there are at proper Distances resting Places, very neat and conveniently fenced, as well against the Winter Cold as the Summer Heats. Most of the Mandarins on their Return to their own Country, after being dismiss'd from their Employments, endeavour to recommend themselves by Works of this Kind.

with resting Places.

There are also Temples and Pagods, which afford a Retreat in the Day time, but it is with great Difficulty that any Person is permitted to stay there all Night, except the Mandarins, who have that Privilege. The Bonzas wait on them with great Affection, receiving them with the Sound of Musical Instruments, and lodging them in their own Apartments: They also take Care of their Baggage, their Servants and Porters.

This sort of Gentlemen make very free with their Gods; for they put their Temples to all manner of Uses, not thinking such Familiarity inconsistent with the Reverence due to them.

There are some charitable Persons, who hire Men to distribute Tea to poor Travellers in the Summer, and in the Winter a kind of Water with Ginger infused in it; requiring no other Return, but that they would not forget the Name of their Benefactors.

Inns are numerous enough on the Roads; but nothing can be more wretched or ill contrived, excepting those on the great Roads, which are very large and handsome; but Travellers must carry their Beds along with them, or else be forced to lie on a plain Mat. The Chinese, especially the meaner sort, never use Blankets, being content to wrap themselves, sometimes quite naked, in a Cover-lid lined with Linnen; so that their Beds are easily carry'd. The Entertainment is suitable to the Lodging, for you will have very good Luck if you meet with any Fish or the least Bit of Meat. In several Places, however, Pheasants are cheaper than other wild Fowls; for sometimes four may be bought for ten Sols. 'Tis true some of these Inns afford better Accommodations than others, but the best of them are very mean; consisting for the general of four Mud Walls without any Plastering. All the Rafter in the Roof appear, and 'tis well if you do not see thro' it in many Places; besides the Rooms which are seldom paved are full of Holes. In some Provinces these Inns are built only of Earth and Reeds, but in the Cities they are of Bricks, and pretty convenient. In the Northern Parts one meets with what they call Kan's; being great Brick Estrades, the whole Breadth of the Room, with a Stove underneath, and a Mat made of Reeds on the Top, whereon you may lay your Bed if you have one.

Wretched Inns on the Roads.

They have taken Care to publish an Itinerary, which contains all the Roads, with the Distances of Places both by Land and Water, from Pe-king to the Borders of the Empire (F). The Mandarins make use of this Book when they set out from the Court, to take Possession of their Employments in the Provinces. At the End of every Stage there is a House called Kong-quan, appointed to receive the Mandarins, and all those who travel by the Emperor's Order, who defrays their Expences.

Book of the the Roads.

The Day before a Mandarin sets out on his Journey, a Courier is sent forwards, who carries a Tablet, wherein is written the Name and Employment of that Officer; on Sight of which the Lodgings are immediately prepared for him according to his Dignity; and he is furnish'd with all Necessaries, such as Provisions, Porters, Horses, and Chairs, or Barks if he goes by Water. The Couriers, who publish the Approach of the Mandarin, always find Horses ready; and

that

(F) Had the Missionaries sent a Translation of these Itineraries, it would have been very acceptable to the Curious; thereby we might have improved the Maps with the Roads, and in some Measure have supplied the Want of the Journals of their own Travels over the Provinces, when they made the Maps.

that they may not be disappointed, one or two Li, before their Arrival, they strike very hard several times upon a Bafon, to give Notice that the Horse may be immediately saddled if it be not already done.

The Kong-quan.

These Houses appointed for Lodging of the Mandarins, are not so handsome as might be expected; for which Reason, when one reads of such things in the Relations of foreign Countries, he ought to make some Allowance: not that the Authors are given to magnify, but they often borrow the Descriptions from the Natives, to whom very mean Things seem magnificent. Besides, they are obliged to make Use of Terms, which convey very lofty Ideas to Europeans: When it is said, for Instance, that the Kong-quan are prepared for the Reception of the Mandarins, and those who are entertained at the Emperor's Expence, one would imagine them from hence to be noble Structures. When farther we read that an Officer is sent before hand with Orders to get every thing ready against the Mandarin arrives. It is natural to believe that they were in a Hurry to spread Carpets, and adorn the Apartments with handsome Moveables; but the Chinese Frugality, and the great Number of Messengers, who are dispatch'd from Court, free them from this Trouble: the Furniture to be prepared consisting of a few Felts and Mats, two or three Chairs, a Table, and a wooden Bedstead cover'd with a Mat, when there is never a Kan. If he be a Mandarin of considerable Rank, and the Kong-quan not suitable to his Dignity, he is lodged in one of the best Houses of the City, where an Apartment is borrowed for him.

Their Furniture.

Kong-quan of Kan-ton described.

The Kong-quan are sometimes large and sometimes small, and there are some handsome and commodious enough. By that of Kan-ton which is one of the common sort, one may judge of the rest: It is of a moderate Size, consisting of two Courts, and two principal Buildings; one of which, at the Bottom of the first Court, is a Ting, or large open Hall, for receiving Visits. The other, standing at the end of the second Court, is divided into three Parts; that in the middle serving for a Salon, or Anti-Chamber, to the two great Rooms that are on the Sides, with each a Closet behind. This Disposition is observed in most of the Houses belonging to Persons of any Distinction. The Hall and Anti-Chamber are each adorn'd with two great Lanterns of transparent Silk painted, hung up in the manner of a Branch; also the Gate towards the Street, and those of the Courts are each enlightened with two large Paper-Lanterns, adorn'd with large Characters.

Watch Towers and Centries on the Roads.

On the great Roads, at proper Distances, there are a sort of Towers, with Centry Boxes upon them for Centinels, and Flag-staffs to make Signals in Case of Alarms. These Towers are made of Turf, or temper'd Earth; they are square, about twelve Foot high, with Battlements, and are built slanting. In some Provinces there are large Bells of cast Iron on the Top of them; but most of those which are not upon the Road to Pe-king, have neither Centry Boxes nor Battlements. According to the Laws, these Towers ought to be found on all frequented Roads, at the Distance of every five Li [or half League] one small and another large alternately; with Soldiers continually upon Duty to observe what passes, and prevent any Disturbance. These Soldiers have their Guard-Houses, and place themselves in a Rank, when any considerable Officer passes by. They are very regular, especially in Pe-che-li, which is the Province of the Court, and there is always a Centry in the Box.

In some other Provinces these Towers falling to Ruin, Orders are given from time to time to repair and keep Guard in them; especially when they are apprehensive of Robbers, or any Disturbance. In which Case the Number of Soldiers not being sufficient, they oblige the Villages to lend Assistance in their Turns. The Mandarins make a List, and the Inhabitants agree among themselves in dividing the Duty.

Robbers rare in Cbina.

If this Law was observed strictly, there would be no Robbers in Cbina; for at every half League there would be a Guard to stop suspicious Persons; not only in the Roads leading to the Capitals, but also in those from one City to another; so that as the Cities are very numerous, and all the Country is crossed with great Roads, these Towers occur almost every Moment. For this Reason Highway-Men are very rare in Cbina; indeed they are sometimes found in the Provinces neighbouring to Pe-king; but they seldom murder those they rob, and when they have done their Business, they make off very dexterously. In other Provinces there are very few Robbers. These Towers are also of Use to determine the Distance from one Place to another, much in the same manner as the Roman Stones.

Chairs or Sedans for travelling.

When the Roads are too rough to travel on Horseback, they make Use of Chairs, which the Chinese call Quan-kyau, that is to say, Mandarin-Chairs; because the Chairs used by the Mandarins are of much the same Fashion. The Body of the Chair is not unlike that of the Hackney-Chairs of Paris, but it is larger, higher and lighter. It is made of Bambù's, a kind of Cane, very strong and light, laid a-cross each other in the Form of a Lattice, and tied together very strongly with Rattan; which is another sort of Cane very small but strong, creeping along the Earth, to the Length of eight hundred or a thousand Foot. This Lattice is covered from Top to Bottom with a Piece of coloured Linnen, Silk, or Woolen Cloth, according to the Season; over which, in rainy Weather, they put an Oil-Cloath [if we may call that so which is made of Taffaty].

How carry'd.

This Chair which is of a convenient Size for sitting at Ease, is carried by Men like our portable Chairs or Sedans. If there be but two Chairmen, the Ends of the Poles rest upon their Shoulders; but if it be a Sedan with four Chairmen, then the Ends of the Poles as well before as behind, pass thro' two running Knots of a strong pliable Cord, hung by the middle to a thick Stick, Stick, whose Ends rest on the Shoulders of the Chairmen, (c) and then there are commonly eight in order to relieve each other.

When to avoid the Heats, they travel in the Night, especially along Mountains infested with Tygers, they hire Guards on the Spot with Torches; which serve both to light them and to scare those wild Beasts, who are naturally afraid of Fire. They are made of Branches of the Pine Tree, dried by the Fire, and prepared in such a manner that the Wind and Rain do but make them burn the faster, each Torch, which is six or seven Foot long, lasting near an Hour: and with the Help of four or five of these Guides, they travel all Night over the Hills, with as much Safety and Ease as at Noon Day in a plain Country; Wherefore in mountainous Countries these sorts of Conveniencies are to be found at proper Distances. However, scarce any Body but those sent from Court, the Mandarins, and other great Lords, travel in this Manner during the Night; for having a great Train they have nothing to fear either from Tygers or Robbers.

The Nobility travel by Night in Summer-time.

The great Number of Villages upon the Roads, full of Pagods, is no small Conveniency to Travellers. Over against these Pagods, and in the great Roads, one meets with a great many Monuments, called She-pei, with Inscriptions on them; being great Stones generally of Marble, standing upright upon Bases of the same; wherein a Mortis being made, the Stones are fixt in by means of Tenons cut at the Ends, and joined together without farther Trouble. Some of these Stones are eight Foot high, two broad, and almost one thick; tho' commonly the Height is not above four or five Feet, and the other Dimensions in Proportion.

Monuments on the Roads called She-pei.

The largest of all are erected on a Stone Tortoise, in which the Chinese Architects (if they deserve that Name) have more Regard to Probability than the Grecian, who introduced Caryatides (n) and Supporters. Nay, what was still more extravagant, some put Cushions on their Heads for fear such heavy Burdens should incommode them.

Some few of these She-pei are surrounded with large Halls; others to avoid Expence, are inclosed with a small Brick Building, and covered with a neat Roof: they are exactly square except towards the Top, which is somewhat rounded or covered with some Grottesque Figure, often cut out of another Piece of Stone.

When they are erected on Account of some Favour or Honours received from the Emperor, they carve two Dragons variously twisted: The Inhabitants of the Cities erect them in Memory of their Mandarins, when they are satisfied with their Government. The Officers erect them to perpetuate the extraordinary Honours bestowed on them by the Emperor, and for several other Reasons.

One great Conveniency to those that travel by Land in China is, the Ease and Safety where-with their Goods are carried by Porters, who are very numerous in every City, and have their Head, to whom Persons apply; and having agreed for the Price, he gives them as many Tickets as they have hired Porters, by means whereof they are furnished in an Instant, and he becomes answerable for the Contents of their Bales. When the Porters have brought their Loads to the Place appointed, you give every one of them a Ticket, which they carry back to their Chief, who pays them with the Money you have advanced.

Goods carry'd from City to City by Porters.

In much frequented Roads, as for Instance, that over the Mountain of Mey-lin, (which separates the Province of Kyang-si and Quang-tong), there are in the Cities between which they pass, a great Number of Officers, where all the Porters, both in the City and Country, give in their Names with good Security: so that if you have Occasion for three or four hundred, they will provide them. Having applied to the Head of the Office, he makes out an exact List in a Trice, of all you have to carry, whether they be Boxes or other things; and agrees with you for so much a Pound, the Price being commonly about ten Sols a hundred Weight for a Day's Carriage, which you pay before-hand, and then you have no farther Trouble: for the Principal gives every Porter his Load, with a Note of what it contains; and when you arrive at the City on the other Side, all that belongs to you is faithfully delivered by the Correspondent Office. The Burden is fastened by Cords to the Middle of a Pole of Bambú, the Ends of which are carried by two Men on their Shoulders; and if the Weight be too great, then they make use of four Men with two Poles. They are changed every Day, and obliged to make the same Stages with those who employ them. When one Man carries a Bundle alone, he lightens his Load, by dividing it into two equal Parts, and fastening them with Cords or Hooks, to the Ends of a flat Bambú Pole; afterwards he poises the Pole upon his Shoulders like a Balance, which bends and rises alternately as he goes along. When he is weary of carrying his Load on one Shoulder, he dexterously gives the Pole a twist round his Neck upon the other Shoulder, and by this Means some will carry a hundred and sixty French Pounds ten Leagues in a Day; for as they are paid by the Pound, they carry as much as they can at a time.

Manner of hiring the Porters.

How they carry the Goods.

In some Provinces they make use of Mules for carrying the Bales and Merchandizes, but oftener Carts with one Wheel; which indeed are Wheel-barrows, excepting that the Wheel is very large and placed in the middle. On each end of the Axel-Tree, which comes out on both sides, they place a Lattice, whereon they lay Loads of equal Weight. This Custom is very common in several Parts of China; one Man only thrusts it forwards, or if the Load be heavy, another Man, Carts with one Wheel.

(c) The Chairmen must be supposed to follow one another, two before and two behind the Sedan, which is carried as it were in Slings; for such the Stick and Rope seem to be by the Description.

(n) Caryatides, is a sort of Pilastr representing the Figure of a Woman without Arms, and cover'd with a Robe down to the Heels, and the Supporters Statues of Men.

Man, or else an Ass, is put before to draw it, and sometimes both. They have Axle-Trees resembling with the Wheel plac'd forward, but they scarce ever make use of them in Journeys. When the Loads are carry'd by Mules, the common Price for twenty five Days is four Tails and an half, or at most five, according to the different Seasons and Price of Provisions; return'd Mules may be hired a great deal cheaper. The Muleteers are oblig'd to maintain and bear their own Charges back, if no body hires them. Their Mules are very little if compared with those of Europe, but they are very strong; their usual Load being from one hundred and eighty to two hundred Chinese Pounds. The Chinese Pound is four Ounces heavier than ours.

Custom-Houses in China not severe.

There are Custom-Houses in China, but they are not so rigorous as those in the Indies, (where Passengers are search'd without regard to Decency or Shame) or indeed any where else; for they search no Man's Person, and very rarely open the Bales. Nay, if a Man makes a tolerable Appearance, they not only forbear to open his Chest, but take nothing of him, We see plainly, say they, that the Gentleman is no Merchant.

There are Custom-Houses where they pay by the Lump; and then Credit is given to the Merchant's own Bill of Parcels. There are others that require so much a Load, which is easily settled. Even the Emperor's Kang-ko [or Travelling Order] does not exempt one from paying Custom; nevertheless the Mandarin out of Respect lets him pass, without requiring any thing; But at Pe-king they are generally more strict.

The Bales of Goods, which come from, or are sent to, the great Officers of the Court, have each a Fong-tyau pasted on it, which is a large slip of Paper, whereon is written the Time it was pack'd up, with the Name and Dignity of the Owner; and if these Officers are considerable, they dare not venture to open them.

Formerly the Custom-Houses were shut up, and the Mandarin belonging to them changed every Year. This Mandarin by his Employ was a considerable Officer, who had the right of Memorial, that is, to address the Emperor immediately; but for twelve Years past the Emperor has committed the Care of the Custom-House to the Vice-Roy of each Province, who appoints a trusty Mandarin to receive the Customs; however, they have been oblig'd of late to appoint particular Mandarins for those of Quang-tong and Fo-kyen, on account of the Trouble occasion'd by the Sea Trade.

Post-Houses.

In every Place, where there is a Post-House, there is a Mandarin to take Care of it. All the Post-Horses belong to the Emperor, and no body is to make use of them but the Couriers of the Empire, the Officers, and others who are sent from Court. Those who carry the Emperor's Orders are commonly Persons of some Note, and attended by several Horsemen; the Orders are inclosed in a great Roll, cover'd with a piece of yellow Silk, and wrap'd in a Scarf, which hangs at their Backs. Their Horses are but ordinary to look at, but they are very good, and capable of performing long Journeys, for they commonly ride sixty or seventy Li's without changing them. One Post-Stage is call'd Chan; two Post-Stages two Chan.

These Stages where they change their Horses are not always of the same Length; the shortest contains fifty Li's, and rarely so few as forty. The ordinary Couriers carry their Wallet fasten'd upon their Back, and when they ride, it rests upon a Cushion lying on the Horses Buttocks. Their Wallets are not heavy, for they carry nothing but the Emperor's Dispatches, or those of the Sovereign Courts, or Advice from the Officers of the Provinces. They also carry privately the Letters of other Persons; and in this consists their Perquisites.

The Roads greatly incommoded with Dust.

The greatest and almost the only Inconvenience in travelling, especially in Winter time, and in the North Part of China, is the Dust, for it scarce ever rains in that Season; but there falls a great Quantity of Snow, in some of these Provinces, but not much at Pe-king. When the Wind blows very hard, it raises such Clouds of Dust, and that so frequently, that the Sky is darken'd with them, and one can hardly breathe. They are often obliged to cover their Faces with a Veil, or their Eyes with Glasses, fix'd in Leather or Silk, and ty'd behind the Head, whereby one may see and not be incommoded with the Dust. As the Soil is very loose, it easily flies off in Dust, when there has been a want of Rain for any considerable time.

The same thing happens in other much frequented Roads of the Empire, where the continual Motion of such infinite numbers of People as travel on Foot, on Horseback, or in Waggon, raises a thick Cloud of very fine Dust, which would blind them, if they did not take care to prevent it. The Southern Provinces are indeed free from this Inconvenience; but they have another to fear, which is the overflowing of the Waters, if they had not provided against it by building a vast Quantity of Wooden and Stone Bridges.

Of the NOBILITY.

Nobility not hereditary in China.

NOBILITY is not Hereditary in China, tho' there are Dignities belonging to some Families, which are bestow'd by the Emperor on such of them as he judges to have the greatest Abilities. However illustrious any Man has been, nay, tho' he had arriv'd to the highest Dignity of the Empire, his Children have their Fortune to make; and if they want Parts, or love their Ease, they become like the common People, and are often obliged to follow the meanest Occupations. It is true that a Son may succeed to his Father's Estate, but not to to his Dignities or Reputation, to which he must raise by the same Degrees as his Father did. For this Reason they place their chief Dependence on a constant Study, and they are sure to be advanced, let their Condition be what it will, if they have a Disposition for Literature. Thus one sees every Day several very surprizingly jump into Honours, not much unlike the Ecclesiastics in Italy, who, tho' of the meanest Extraction, are allow'd to aspire to the Prime Dignity in the Romish Church.

All the Inhabitants of China are divided into three Classes, the People, the Literati, and the Mandarins. None but those belonging to the Family now reigning, have any Title of Distinction: these possess the Rank of Princes, in whose Favour five honorary Degrees of Nobility are established, much like those of Dukes, Marquisses, Earls, Viscounts, and Barons in Europe. These Titles are granted to the Descendants of the Imperial Family, such as the Children of the Emperor, and those to whom he gives his Daughters in Marriage, who have Revenues assign'd them equal to their Dignity, but not the least Power. However, there are Princes who are not at all ally'd to the Imperial Family; being either Descendants of the preceding Dynasties, or such, whose Ancestors have acquired the Title by the Services done to the Public. The Provinces are govern'd solely by Mandarins, sent thither by the Emperor, as has been already observ'd, after he has examin'd them himself.

Superior Degrees of the Princes or Regulo's.

The Prince now reigning is the third of the Family, which for ninety nine Years has govern'd all China and Tartary; but the fifth if you go back to his Great Grand-Father's Father. This latter having subdued his own Country, conquer'd also Eastern Tartary, the Kingdom of Korea, and the Province of Lyau-tong, beyond the great Wall; fixing his Court in the Capital, call'd Shin-yang by the Chinese, and Mukden (A) by the Manchew Tartars. They then gave him the Name Tay-tsu, which is conferr'd on all Conquerors, who are Founders of a Dynasty; and as his Brothers, who were very numerous, had contributed very much by their Valour to the Conquest of so many Countries, he gave them Titles of Honour, creating some Tsin-vang, others Kyun-vang, and Pey-lé. The Europeans have thought fit to give these sorts of Dignities the Appellation of Regulo's, or Princes of the first, second, and third Rank. It was then determined, that from among the Children of every Regulo, one should always be chosen to succeed his Father in the same Dignity.

Besides these three the same Emperor created others of an inferior sort, which are bestow'd on the other Children who are most worthy. Those of the fourth Rank, are call'd Pey-tse; those of the fifth Kong-beu, and so of the rest.

This fifth Rank is above that of the greatest Mandarins in the Empire; but the Princes of the inferior Ranks have nothing to distinguish them, like the former, from the Mandarins, either in their Equipage or Habits, except a yellow Girdle, which is common to all the Princes of the Blood, as well those who possess Dignities, as those who have none; but these latter hide it, being asham'd to let it be seen, when their Circumstances are too low to afford an Equipage suitable to their Rank and Birth. For this Reason we should have a false Notion of the Princes of the Blood in China, if we compare them to those in Europe, and especially France; where their Descent from so many Royal Ancestors, raises them far above Persons of the highest Distinction in the State: Besides the small number of them attracts greater Regard and Veneration, which increases in Proportion as they are nearer to the Throne. On the contrary, in China the Origin of the Princes of the Blood is at no great Distance, as being but five Generations backward; and yet their Number has increased to such a Degree, in so short a Time, as to amount at present to no less than two thousand. Hence, as their Multitude puts them at a vast Distance from the Throne, they are little esteem'd, especially those who, having neither Titles nor Employments, cannot make a Figure suitable to their Birth; which makes a great Difference between Princes of the same Blood. Polygamy causing the Princes to increase exceedingly, they hurt one another in Proportion as they multiply, for they have no Estates in Lands; and as the Emperor cannot afford Pensions to them all, some of them live in extreme Poverty, tho' they wear the yellow Girdle.

Those of inferior Degrees often very poor.

Towards the End of the Dynasty of the Ming, there were more than three thousand Families of that Race in the City of Kyang-chew, several of whom were reduced to submit upon Charity. The Banditti, who made themselves Master of Pe-king, slew almost all those Princes, which is the Cause that some Part of the City lies waste; the few that escaped quitting the yellow Girdle, and changing their Names, mix'd themselves with the People. But they are still known to be of the Imperial Blood of the Ming; and one of them was a Servant of the Missionaries, in a House belonging to our Society in that City, which was built by one of those Princes; who, knowing that the Tartars sought after him, betook himself to Flight and disappear'd.

Princes of the Family of the Ming still remaining.

The Princes, besides their lawful Wife, have commonly three others, on whom the Emperor bestows Titles, and whose Names are enter'd in the Tribunal of the Princes; their Children take Place next to those of the lawful Wife, and are more respected than those of common Concubines, of whom they may have as many as they please. They have likewise two sorts of Servants, the one are properly Slaves, the others are Tartars, or Chinese Tartarized; whom the Emperor bestows upon them in a greater or lesser number, according to the Dignity where-with he honours the Princes of his Blood.

Wives and Children of Princes of the Blood.

These latter make the Equipage of the Regulo, and are commonly call'd The Men of his Gate. There are among them considerable Mandarins, Vice-Roys, and even Tsong-tsi's; who, tho' not Slaves like the first, yet they are almost equally subject to the Will of the Regulo, so long as he possesses his Dignity, and descend after his Death to his Children, in case they are honour'd with the same Dignity. But if one of these Princes is degraded from his Rank in his Life-time, or if his Dignity does not descend to his Children, this kind of Domestic is kept in reserve; and they are bestow'd on another Prince of the Blood, when his Household is establish'd, and he is raised to the same Dignity.

They are under great Restraints.

The Employment of these Princes of the five first Orders is most commonly to assist at public Ceremonies, and to appear every Morning at the Emperor's Palace; after which they retire to their own Houses, and have nothing to do but to govern their Families, the Mandarins, and the other Officers of their Household: but they are not allowed to visit one another, nor to lodge out of the City without an express Permission.

It is easy to see for what Reason they are put under such Restraints: it may suffice to say they have a great deal of time upon their Hands, and that most of them do not apply it to the best Advantage. However, some are employ'd in public Affairs, and do great Services to the Empire; such was the thirteenth Brother of the present Emperor.

The Nobility of whom composed.

They reckon in the Rank of Nobility, First, Those who formerly have been Mandarins in the Provinces, whether they have been dismissed from their Posts, of which sort almost all of them are, or have retir'd, either of their own Accord with the Emperor's Consent, or else constrain'd thereto by the Death of a Parent; in which case a Mandarin ought to give public Proof of his Grief, by laying down his Office.

Secondly, Those who not having Capacity enough to obtain the Literary Degrees, have yet by Favour or Presents procur'd certain Titles of Honour, which give them a Privilege of visiting the Mandarins; and hence they are fear'd and revered by the People.

Thirdly, An infinite number of Students, who from the Age of fifteen or sixteen to forty, come every third Year to be examin'd before the Tribunal of the Governour, who gives them a Subject to write upon. It is Ambition rather than the Desire of Improvement, that keeps them so long at their Studies. Besides the Degree of Batchelor, when they have attain'd it, exempts them from the Chastisement of the Mandarin: They are also admitted to his Audience, to sit in his Presence, and to eat at the same Table; an Honour which is exceedingly priz'd in China, and seldom ever granted to any of the People's Class.

China.

The Family, at this Day accounted the most noble in China, and which, with respect to its Antiquity, is the most noble in the World, is descended from Confucius, their celebrated Philosopher. And indeed, properly, there are no hereditary Nobility besides this Family, which has been continued in a direct Line for above two thousand Years, from one of his Nephews; who is call'd on this Occasion Shing-jin-ti-shi-ell, that is to say, The Nephew of the Great Man, or by way of Eminence, The Sage; for so the Chinese call the Restorer of their Moral Philosophy. And in Consideration of this Original, the Emperors have constantly honour'd one of the Descendants of this Philosopher with the Dignity of Kong, which answers to that of our Dukes or ancient Earls. He who is now living, passes thro' the Streets of Pe-king, with all the Honours due to his Rank, when he comes every Year from Kyo-few, in the Province of Sban-tong; which is the Birth Place of his illustrious Ancestor, and always govern'd by a Mandarin of the same Family.

Titles of Honour conferr'd by the Emperor
enobles.

One of the Principal Marks of Nobility is, the Titles of Honour bestow'd upon Persons of distinguish'd Merits by the Emperor, who sometimes entails them for five, or six, or eight, or ten Generations, in Proportion to the Service done to the Public; and with these the Mandarins stile themselves in their Letters, and on the Front of their Houses. In Europe Nobility descends from Father to Son, but in China it sometimes ascends from the Son to the Father and Grand-Father; for when any one has signaliz'd himself by his extraordinary Merit, the Emperor is not contented to raise him to the Honours I have been speaking of, but by distinct Patents extends them to his Father, Mother, Grand-Father and Grand-Mother: or to speak more properly, he confers on each a particular Title of Honour, in acknowledgment of their Care in the Education of so great and useful a Man.

Instance in the Case of
P. Verbiest.

I cannot give a more remarkable Instance than that of P. Ferdinand Verbiest, a Flemish Jesuit, President of the Tribunal of the Mathematics at the Court of Pe-king; who being call'd to assist P. Adam Schaal, in the Reformation of the Kalendar, had Orders to make Tables of the Celestial Motions and Eclipses, for two thousand Years: wherein he apply'd himself with great Diligence, employing all the Mandarins of the first Class of the Astronomical Tribunal, to calculate the Revolutions of the Planets, according to the Rules he laid down. After he had finish'd this great Work, he reduced it to thirty two Volumes of Maps with their Explanations, and presented them to the Emperor, in the Year 1678, with this Title, The perpetual Astronomy of the Emperor KANG-HI.

Hereupon that Monarch convened a General Assembly of the Mandarins of all Orders of the Princes, the Vice-Roys, and the Governors of Provinces; who were come to salute and rejoice with him, on occasion of having declared his Son for his Successor. He received the Present from Pere Verbiest with a great deal of Pleasure; and not only caused it to be placed among the Archives of the Palace, but to reward his indefatigable Labour, made him President of the Tribunal of the first Order, and gave him the Title of that Dignity. And tho' the Father by Petition remonstrated, that the religious Profession he had embraced would not permit him to accept of this Honour, the Emperor gave no heed to it; so that the Fear both of offending that Monarch, and of hurting the Progress of our Religion in the Empire, oblig'd him to receive the following Patent, which confers this Dignity upon him.

" We

" We the Emperor, by the Appointment of Heaven, ordain: The Constitution of a well govern'd State requires, that wor thy Actions should be made known, and that the Services done to a State with a ready Will should be rewarded, and receive the Encomiums they deserve. It is also the Duty of a Prince who governs wisely according to the Laws, to praise Virtue and exalt Merit: this is what we now do by these Letters patent, which, it is our will, shall be published throughout the Empire; that all our Subjects may know what Regard we have to Services performed with due Application and Diligence.

Patent to enoble P. Verbiest.

" For this Cause, Ferdinand Verbiest, to whom I have committed the care of my Imperial Kalendar, the Excellent Dispositions, the Sincerity and Vigilance, which you have discovered in my Service, as well as the profound Learning you have acquired by continually applying your Mind to all sort of Sciences; have obliged me to place you at the Head of my Astronomical Academy. Your Care has answered our Expectation, and by labouring Night and Day, you have fully perform'd the Duties of that Office. In a word, you have happily brought your Designs to an End, with indefatigable Pains, of which we our selves have been Witnesses.

" It is proper, that during this great Festival, when my whole Empire is assembled to testify their Joy, I should make you sensible of my Imperial Favour, and of the Esteem I have for your Person: For this Reason, by a Special Grace, and of our own Accord, we grant you the Title of GREAT MAN, (大) which ought to be famous every where; and we ordain, that this Title be sent into all Parts of our Empire, there to be published.

" Assume new Vigour for our Service: This Title of Honour, which begins in your Person, extends to all your Kindred and those of your Blood. You have deserved, by your Care and your extraordinary Application, this Encomium, as well as Dignity; and your Merit is so great, that it fully amounts to the Honour we confer on you. Receive then this Favour with due Respect: you are the only Person on which I have conferred it; let it therefore be a new Motive to employ all your Talents and all the Faculties of your Mind, in our Service."

The like Titles of Honour, as already observed, ascend to the Ancestors of him who receives them: all his Relations are proud of them; they cause them to be written in several Places of their Houses, and even upon the Lanthorns that are carried before them when they walk in the Night-time, which gains them great Respect. As Pere Verbiest was a European, he had no Relations in China to partake of this Honour; but very luckily for our Religion, all the Missionaries, as well Jesuits as others, pass'd for his Brothers, and were considered under the said Title by the Mandarins. This Quality of Great Man gain'd the Bishop of Heliopolis an easy Admission into China; and most of the Religious caus'd it to be inscribed on the Door of their House.

All the Missionaries partake of it as his Brothers.

After having thus honour'd Pere Verbiest, the Emperor conferr'd the same Titles on his Ancestors, by so many Patents, which he caused to be drawn up: viz. one for his Grandfather Peter Verbiest; another for Paschasia de Wolff his Grandmother; a third for Louis Verbiest his Father; and the fourth for Ann Vanberke his Mother; whereof I shall on'y produce those for the two first, which will be a sufficient Specimen of the Chinese Genius.

His Ancestors made noble also.

The Patent granted to P. Verbiest's Grandfather was express'd in these Terms:

" We the Emperor, &c. The Honours which we grant to those, who by their Merit have been raised to the Dignities of Mandarins, and the chief Magistrates, ought to be ascribed to the Care of their Ancestors, as their original; since it was owing to the Instruction, Education and good Examples received from them, that they practis'd Virtue, and became worthy of those Honours.

His Grandfather's Patent.

" For this Reason, being willing to ascend to the Fountain of Merit, I extend my Favours to you, Peter Verbiest, who were the Grandfather of P. Verbiest, whom I have honoured with the Title of, &c. Your Virtue, like a well planted Tree, has taken deep Root, and will never fall: It still upholds your Posterity, and continues in your Grandson, who by his extraordinary Merit, has made known to us what yours was. For this Reason, considering you as the Origin of his Greatness, by a particular Grace, I confer on you the same Titles of Honour.

His Grandmother's Patent was to this Sense: " We the Emperor, &c. When according to the laudable Customs of our Empire, we would reward the Deserts of those who have faithfully served us, and, by those Rewards, excite them to continue their Services to us; it is just that part of the Glory, which thereby redounds to them, should pass to their Ancestors.

His Grandmother's Patent.

" Wherefore, in Consideration of the Care you took in the Education of P. Ferdinand, who so worthily acquits himself in the Charges and Employments which I have entrusted to his Care, I confer on you by these Presents, the Title given to the Wife of him, who is a Mandarin of the first Rank, under the Stile of, &c. Enjoy this Title of Honour, which exalts the Care you have taken in the Education of your Children, and will excite the Care of others; when they shall see, that our Imperial Favours extend even to those who have any way contributed to Virtue, and to the Merit of Persons whom we honour. Your Posterity will thereby become more illustrious, and have for you the greater Veneration; for this Reason it is that we are willing by these Patents to raise the glory of your Name."

(x) I suppose the Word in the original Chinese is Ta-jin, which signifies Great Man, a Title of Honour, as appears from several Places of this Work.

From what had been said it appears, that, excepting the Descendants of Confucius, and the Princes belonging to the reigning Family, no Person is noble in China, but in consequence of the Emperor declaring his Merit, or advancing him to a Rank which he thinks him worthy of; all who have not taken Degrees being reckon'd Plebeians. And hence, as there is no such thing as an Ancient and Hereditary Nobility in Families, there can be no Fear of their establishing an Authority in the Provinces dangerous to that of the Sovereign.

Of the Fertility of the Lands ; of Agriculture, and the Value set on those who apply themselves thereto.

The Soil of China productive every where.

IN an Empire of such vast Extent, as we have observed this to be, the Nature of the Soil cannot be every where the same; accordingly it differs in China, in proportion as the Lands are more or less Southward. But so indefatigably industrious and inured to Labour, are the Husbandmen, that every Province is very fruitful; and there is scarce one but what will yield Subsistence for an inconceivable Number of Inhabitants.

Besides the Goodness of the Land, the prodigious Number of Canals, wherewith it is interspersed, contribute not a little to it's Fertility; and tho they reap so many different Sorts of Grains, that great Quantities are used for making Wine and strong Waters, yet when Scarcity is apprehended in any Place the more experienced Mandarins forbid the making such Liquors for a Time. Agriculture is in great Esteem; and the Husbandmen, whose Profession is look'd upon as the most necessary one in a State, are of a considerable Rank; for they are prefer'd to Merchants and Mechanics, besides having large Privileges.

Manured with Ordure,

The Attention of Husbandmen is chiefly employ'd in the Cultivation of Rice. They manure their Land extremely well, gathering, for that purpose with extraordinary Care, all Sorts of Ordure, both of Men and Animals, which they truck for Wood, Herbs, or Linseed-Oil. When they are not employ'd in the Fields, they go into the Mountains to cut Wood for this Sort of Traffic, or else cultivate their Kitchen Gardens; for the Chinese are very far from preferring the Agreeable to the Useful. They very seldom employ their Land for unprofitable Uses, such as Flower-Gardens, or fine Walks; believing it more for the Public Good, and what is still dearer to them their private Interest, that every Place should be sown in order to produce useful Things.

This kind of Manure, which elsewhere would burn up the Plants, is very proper for the Lands of China, where they have an Art of tempering it with Water before they use it. They gather the Dung in Pails, which they commonly carry cover'd on their Shoulders, and this contributes very much to the Cleanness of their Cities, whose Filth is thus taken away every Day.

and the Hair of Animals.

In certain Places, as in the Province of Che-kyang, when they sow Rice, they buy Balls of Hogs, or even human Hair, which according to them give Strength to the Land, and makes the Rice grow better. For this reason Barbers are very careful to save the Hair which they shave off Heads, to sell to the Inhabitants of those Parts, who come to purchase it, for about a Half penny a Pound, carrying it away in Bags; and you may often see Barks loaded with it.

Lime mixt with Water.

When the Plant begins to ear, if the Land be watered with Spring Water, they mix quick Lime with it; saying, that it kills Worms and Insects, destroys Weeds, and gives a Warmth to the Ground, which contributes much to it's Fertility.

The Mountains cultivated.

This Country, like all others, has its Mountains and Plains, which latter are all cultivated; but one sees neither Hedges nor Ditches, nor scarce any Tree; so fearful they are of losing an Inch of Ground. In several Provinces the Land bears twice a Year, and even between the two Crops, they sow small Grains and Pulse. The Provinces which lie to the North and West, as Pe-che-li, Sban-fi, Sben-fi and Se-chuen, produce Wheat, Barley, several kinds of Millet, Tobacco, Peas that are always green, also black and yellow Peas, which serve instead of Oats to feed their Horses; they likewise produce Rice, and that in several Places where the Earth is dry, but then not so plentifully; besides it is harder, and requires more boiling than the Rice of the Southern Provinces, especially Hu-quang, Kyang-nan and Che-kyang, which produce great Quantities, because the Lands lie low, and have Plenty of Water.

All Grain transplanted.

The Husbandmen sow their Grain at first without any Order; but when it has shot forth about a Foot, or a Foot and a half high, they pluck it up by the Roots, and making it into a sort of small Sheaves, plant it by a Line, and chequer-wise; to the end that the Ears, resting upon each other, may stand more firmly, and resist the Violence of the Wind.

Manner of Levelling the Land.

But before the Rice is transplanted, they are careful to level the Land, and make it very smooth, after the following Manner. Having plow'd the Ground three or four Times successively always up to the Ankles in Water; they break the Clods with the Head of their their Mattocks; then by the help of a wooden Machine (on which a Man stands upright and guides the Buffaloe that draws it) they smooth the Earth, to the end that the Water, so necessary to the Rice, may be every where of an equal Height, inasmuch that the Plains seem more like vast Gardens than open Fields; the Plains in those Provinces, where they are mingled with Hills and Mountains, are sometimes barren, but the greater part have good Soil, and are cultivated to the very Edges of the Precipices.

It is very agreeable to behold in some Places Plains three or four Leagues in Length, surrounded with Hills and Mountains, cut, from the Bottom to the Top, into Terraces three or four Foot high, and rising one above another, sometimes to the number of twenty or thirty. Mountains cut into Terraces.

These Mountains are not generally rocky as they are in Europe, the Soil being light, porous, and easy to be cut; and so deep in several Provinces, that one may dig three or four hundred Foot without meeting with the Rock.

When the Mountains are rocky, the Chinese loosen the Stones, and make little Walls of them to support the Terraces; then they level the good Soil, and sow it with Grain. So painful a Task shews how laborious the Chinese are, which will appear still more plainly from what I am going to say.

Tho' in some Provinces there are barren and uncultivated Mountains, yet the Valleys and Fields, which separate them in a vast number of Places, are very fruitful, and well cultivated; there being not an Inch of arable Land, but what is cover'd with fine Rice, the Chinese having been industrious enough to level all the unequal Places that are capable of Culture. Method for watering the Terraces and higher Grounds.

The Husbandman divides that Part of the Land, which is of the same Level, into Plots, and that along the Edges of the Valleys, which is unequal, into Stories, in form of an Amphitheatre; and as the Rice will not thrive without Water, they make Reservoirs at proper Distances, and different Heights to catch the Rain Water, and that which descends from the Mountains, in order to distribute it equally among all their Rice-Plots: never grudging their Pains or Fatigue, either, in letting the Water run down from the Reservoir above to the Plots below, or in causing it to ascend from the lower Reservoirs, Story by Story, even to the highest Plots. For this Purpose they make use of certain Hydraulic Engines, to convey the Water from Place to Place, continually, for moistening the Ground; inasmuch that on the one hand the Husbandman is almost sure every Year to find a Harvest proportionable to his Industry and Labour; and on the other, the Traveller receives every Moment new Pleasures in beholding those charming Fields and Valleys, which, tho' uniformly green, present so many Scenes wonderfully diversify'd by the various Appearances of the Mountains that surround him; and will be every Instant agreeably surpriz'd by a new Landkip, offering to his View a constant Succession of verdant Amphitheatres, as he proceeds on his Journey.

This kind of Engine, which they make use of, is very simple, both with respect to its Make and the manner of playing it. It is compos'd of a Chain, made of Wood, resembling a Chaplet or Pair of Beads, strung as it were with a great number of flat Boards, six or seven Inches square, and placed at equal Distances, parallel to each other. One half of this Chain is laid in a Trough or Gutter, made of three Planks, which is clos'd up with a fourth; on the Outside whereof the other half of the Chain lies. At the lower End of the Gutter, or Tube, is a smooth Cylinder or Barrel, whose Axis is fix'd in the two sides thereof; and to the upper end is fasten'd a sort of Drum, set round with little Boards, to answer those of the Chain, which passes round both it, and the Cylinder: so that when the Drum is turn'd, the Chain turns also, and consequently the lower end of the Gutter or Tube being put into Water, and the upper or Drum-end set to the height where the Water is to be convey'd, the Boards filling exactly the Cavity of the Tube, must carry up a continual Stream of Water, so long as the Machine is in Motion; which is perform'd three Ways: First, with the Hand, by means of one or two Handles apply'd to the ends of the Axis of the Drum. Secondly, with the Feet, by means of certain large wooden Pegs, about half a Foot long, set round the Axel-tree of the Drum, for the Purpose. These Pegs have great longish Heads, rounded on the outside, that is, of a proper Shape for applying the Soles of the naked Feet; inasmuch that one or more Men, according to the number of the Rows of Pegs, either standing or sitting, may with the greatest Ease put the Engine in Motion, and raise a continual Stream of Water; their Hands being employ'd all the while, the one in holding an Umbrella, and the other a Fan. Thirdly, By the Assistance of a Buffaloe, or some other Animal, made fast to a great Wheel, about four Yards in Diameter, placed horizontally; round its Circumference are fix'd a great number of Pegs or Teeth, which, tallying exactly with those in the Axel-tree of the Drum, turn the Machine, tho' much larger, with a great deal of Ease. Engine, for raising the Water, described.

When a Canal is to be cleans'd, which often happens, it is divided at convenient Distances by Dikes; and every neighbouring Village, being allotted its Share, the Peasants immediately appear in Companies, with their Chain-Engines, just now describ'd, to raise the Water out of the Canals into the Fields. As the Banks are very high, they place three Engines one above another, whereby the Water is convey'd from one to the other; this Labour, tho' long and painful, is soon ended by means of the multitude of Hands employ'd therein. Useful in cleansing the Canals.

Tho' in some Parts, as the Province of Fo-kyen, the Mountains, which are not very high, are contiguous to each other, and almost without any Valleys between; yet they are all cultivated by the Art the Husbandmen have to convey the Water, in what Quantity they please, from Mountain to Mountain, through Pipes made of Bambù. Water convey'd over the Mountains.

The Harvest often destroy'd by Locusts.

The continual Labour and Pains of these poor People are oft times render'd ineffectual, especially in some Provinces, by the great number of Locusts, which destroy the Fruit of the Earth. It is a dreadful Plague, if we may judge of it from a Chinese Author: "There appears," (says he) a prodigious multitude which covers all the Sky, being so thick together, that their Wings seem to touch, and their Number so great, that in lifting up your Eyes, you would think you saw over your Head very high green Mountains, [that is his Expression] and the Noise they make in flying, is like the Sound of a Drum."

The same Author observes that this incredible Quantity of Locusts does not appear but when the Inundations are follow'd by a very dry Year; and, philosophizing in his own way, he pretends, that the Spawn of the Fish being left upon the Ground, and afterwards hatch'd by the Heat of the Sun, produce this prodigious multitude of Insects, that destroys, in a short time, the Hopes of the most plentiful Harvest.

It is then that one beholds the wretched Husbandmen sweat all the Day, underneath the burning Sky, to drive away these Insects, with Clouts which they spread over their Crop. This deadly Plague is very common in Sban-tong, in the time of a great Drought; but sometimes it does not extend above one League, the Harvest being very good in the rest of the Province.

Agriculture held in great Esteem.

That which makes these People undergo such incredible Fatigues in cultivating the Earth, is not barely their private Interest; but rather the Veneration paid to Agriculture, and the Esteem which the Emperors themselves have always had for it, from the Commencement of the Monarchy. The common Opinion is that it was first taught by Shin-nong, one of their first Emperors, who is revered to this Day as the Inventor of an Art so useful to the Public; which has still gain'd farther Credit from one of their Emperors, who was taken from the Plow to sit upon the Throne, as the Story is related in the Books of their ancient Philosophers. According to them the Emperor Yau, who began to reign 2357 Years before Christ, and sat on the Throne so long, having appointed the several Tribunals of Magistrates still subsisting, had thoughts of freeing himself from the Weight of the Government. On this account he conferr'd with his principal Ministers, who reply'd, he could not do better than to commit the Care of the Empire, to the eldest of his Children, who was a wise Prince of a good Disposition, and of great Hopes. But Yau more thoroughly acquainted, than his Ministers, with the Genius of his Son, who was crafty and full of Dissimulation, look'd upon their Counsel to be the Effect of a foolish Complaisance; wherefore, without coming to any Conclusion he broke up the Assembly, and put off the Business to another time.

A Husband-man chosen by Yau for his Successor.

Some time after (having then reign'd seventy Years) he caus'd one of his most faithful Ministers to be call'd; and said to him, "You are endow'd with Probity, Wisdom and Experience, I believe you a fit Person to fill my Place, and accordingly appoint you to it. Great Emperor, (reply'd the Minister) I am altogether unworthy of the Honour you bestow on me; and I want the Qualifications requisite for an Office, whose Dignity is of so exalted a Nature, and Duties difficult to discharge. But since you are desirous of finding out a Person worthy to succeed you, and able to preserve the Peace, Justice and good Order, which you have already introduc'd into your Dominions; I assure you, with the greatest Sincerity, that I know of none more capable than a young Husbandman, who is yet unmarried. He is no less below'd than admir'd by all who know him, for his Probity, Wisdom and Evenness of Temper; considering the Lowness of his Circumstances; and that he lives in a Family where he suffers intolerably from the ill Humours of a fretful Father, and the Fury of a Mother, who sets no Bounds to her Severity. His Brothers are so haughty, insolent, and quarrelsome, that no body has been able to live with them hitherto; he alone has had the Art to find Peace, or rather to bring it into an House compos'd of such fantastic and unreasonable Creatures. I judge, Lord, that a Man, who can conduct himself with so much Wisdom in a private Condition, and joins to the Sweetness of his Temper, such Address, such Labour, and such an indefatigable Application, is the most capable of governing your Empire, and preserving the wise Laws establish'd therein."

Yau, equally charm'd with the Modesty of the Minister, who refused the Crown, and with his account of the young Husbandman, order'd him to send for the latter, and oblig'd him to reside at Court; where the Emperor observ'd all his Conduct for several Years, and in what manner he acquitted himself in the Employments which he bestow'd upon him. At length, finding himself declining with Age, he sent for him, and spoke thus, "Sbun (for that was his Name) I have for a long time made a Trial of your Fidelity, in order to satisfy myself that you will not baulk my Expectation, but govern my People with Wisdom. I therefore give up to you my whole Authority; be rather their Father than their Master: and remember that I make you Emperor, not for the People to be your Servants, but to protect them, to love them, and to relieve them in their Necessity. Reign with Equity, and render them the Justice they expect from you."

Books of Agriculture written by the Emperor Yu.

This Choice of an Emperor out of the Country, has inspir'd the Chinese with a great Esteem for Agriculture. Yu, who succeeded Sbun, came to the Throne after the same Manner. At the beginning of the Empire several low Countries were still cover'd with Water, and it was he who found out the Art, by means of Canals, to drain off the Water into the Sea, and afterwards made use of them to render the Soil fruitful. He wrote several Books con-concerning the manner of cultivating Land, by dunging, tilling, and watering it; which induc'd Shun to appoint him for his Successor.

So many Books written upon so useful a Subject, by an Emperor, have contributed much to raise the Credit of Agriculture, as they see it has been thought worthy the Care and Application of a great Prince.

Several other Emperors have expressed their Zeal for this Art: Kang-wang, who was the third Emperor of the Chew, caused the Land to be measured and surveyed by Chau-kong, one of his Ministers; he himself visited all the Provinces in his Dominions, and caused Landmarks to be fixed, to prevent Disputes and Differences among the Husbandmen. Chau-kong heard their Complaints, and administered Justice under a Willow Tree; which was had in Veneration for a long time among the People.

Agriculture promoted by Emperors;

King-wang, who was the twenty fourth Emperor of the same Family, and reigned at the same Time that Confucius was born, being 531 Years before the Christian Era, made a new Division of the Lands, and renewed the Laws that had been made for promoting Agriculture. In a Word, no Emperor has raised its Esteem to so great a Pitch as Ven-ti, who reigned 179 Years before Christ; for this Prince, perceiving that his Country was ruined by the Wars, assembled his Council to consult on the Means to restore it to its former Condition, and engage his Subjects to cultivate the Land; he himself set them an Example, by ploughing, with his own Hands, the Land belonging to his Palace, which obliged all the Ministers and great Men of the Court to do the same.

especially by King-wang and Ven-ti,

It is thought that this was the Original of a great Festival that is solemnized every Year in all the Cities of China, on the Day that the Sun enters the fifteenth Degree of Aquarius; which the Chinese look upon as the beginning of their Spring.

Festival in its Honour.

On this Day the Governor, or the Chief Mandarin, comes out of his Palace, carried in his Chair, preceded by Banners, lighted Torches, and divers Instruments. He is crowned with Flowers, and marches in this Equipage towards the Eastern Gate of the City, as it were to meet the Spring: being attended with several Litters painted and adorned with Variety of Silk-Tapestry, exhibiting various Figures, and the Portraits of Illustrious Persons, who had practised Husbandry, with Histories relating to the same subject. The Streets are covered with Tapestry, and at proper Distances, Triumphal Arches are erected; They also hang out Lanthorns, and make Illuminations.

The Ceremonies described

Among the Figures, there is a Cow of Earthen-Ware, so monstrously large, that forty Men can hardly carry it. Behind the Cow, whose Horns are gilt, is a young Child with one Foot naked, and the other shod: him they call the Genius of Labour and Diligence, who strikes the earthen Cow incessantly with a Rod, as tho' it were to make it advance. All the Husbandmen follow with their Instruments; after whom proceed Companies of Masquers and Comedians, acting Plays.

In this manner they march to the Governor's Palace, where they strip the Cow of her Ornaments, and drawing out of her Belly a prodigious Number of small Cows made of Clay, distribute them among the Multitude, as well as the Fragments of the Cow which they break in Pieces. Afterwards the Governor makes a short Discourse, recommending the Care of Husbandry as one of the things most conducive to the Good of a State.

The Attention of the Emperors and Mandarins to the Cultivation of the Land is so great, that when Deputies arrive at Court from the Vice-Roys, the Chinese Monarch never forgets to demand in what Condition the Fields appeared to them: And the falling of a seasonable Shower furnishes a proper Occasion for visiting a Mandarin, to compliment him thereupon.

Every Year in Spring, the Emperor (according to the Custom of the antient Founders of this excellent Monarchy) goes himself in a solemn manner to plough a few Ridges of Land; in order to animate the Husbandmen by his own Example, and the Mandarins of every City perform the Ceremony. Yong-ching, who is now upon the Throne, declared, that as soon as the Time of Mourning was expired, he would duly observe this ancient and laudable Custom; having a few Months before published an Instruction signed with the red Pencil, that is, with his own Hand, to exhort the People to apply themselves to Husbandry without Interruption.

Ceremony of the Emperor ploughing in Spring,

The Order observed in this Ceremony, is as follows, at the Beginning of the Chinese Spring, which falls in the Month of February, the Tribunal of the Mathematics having received Orders to find out the proper Day for the Ceremony of Tillage, fixt on the twenty-fourth of the second Moon; whereof the Tribunal of Rites gave Notice by a Memorial to the Emperor, in which were set forth the following Particulars to be observed by him, preparatory to this Festival: First, that he should appoint twelve illustrious Persons to attend, and plow after him, viz. three Princes, and nine Presidents of the sovereign Courts; or the Assistants of the latter, in Case they were too old or infirm.

described;

Directions to be followed by the Emperor.

Secondly, This Ceremony does not solely consist in the Emperor's ploughing the Earth, in order to stir up Emulation by his own Example; but it also includes a Sacrifice, which He, as chief Pontif, offers to Shang-ti, to procure Plenty from him in favour of his People. Accordingly in preparing for the Sacrifice, he ought to fast and observe Continence the three preceding Days; both the Princes and Mandarins, who accompany his Majesty, ought to prepare themselves in the same manner.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, On the Eve of the Ceremony, his Majesty is to send several Lords of the first Quality to the Hall of his Ancestors, to prostrate themselves before their Tablet; and give them Notice, as tho' they were yet living, that the next Day he will offer the Great Sacrifice.

Preparations. These are in Brief, the Directions of the Tribunal of Rites to the Emperor. It likewise prescribes the Preparations to be made by the different Tribunals; one is obliged to prepare the Sacrifice; another to compose the Formula, which the Emperor repeats when he makes the Sacrifice; a third to carry and set up the Tents, under which the Emperor is to dine, in Case he so orders it; a fourth is to assemble forty or fifty Husbandmen venerable for their Age, who are to be present when the Emperor ploughs the Ground, with forty of the younger Sort to make ready the Plough, yoke the Oxen, and prepare the Grain that is to be sown. The Emperor sows five Sorts of Grain, supposed to be the most necessary; under which all the rest are comprized, as Wheat, Rice, Beans, Millet, &c. and a kind of Millet called Kau-lyang.

Emperor offers Sacrifice. These are the Preparations. On the twenty-fourth Day of the Moon the Emperor went with his whole Court, in his Habit of Ceremony, to the Place appointed, to offer to Sbang-ti the Spring Sacrifice; by which he is implored to increase and preserve the Fruits of the Earth: for this Reason the Offering is made before they put their Hand to the Plough. The Place is a little Hillock made of Earth, a few Furlongs distant from the City to the South. On the Side of this Elevation (which ought to be fifty Foot four Inches high) is the Spot which is to be ploughed by the Imperial Hands.

Ploughs a Field. After the Emperor had offered Sacrifices, he descended with the three Princes and nine Presidents, who were to plough with him. Several great Lords carried the valuable Chests, which contain'd the Grains that were to be sown. All the Court attended with profound Silence; then the Emperor took the Plough and tilled the Ground several times backwards and forwards. When he quitted it a Prince of the Blood held it, and ploughed, as did all the rest in their Turns. After having ploughed in several Places, the Emperor sowed the different Grain; and the Day following the Husbandmen by Profession, (forty-four of whom were old and forty-two young Men) finished the Remainder of the Field which was left untilled. The Ceremony concluded with the appointed Reward which the Emperor bestowed upon each of them; consisting of four Pieces of dy'd Cotton to make Cloaths.

which is often visited by the Governor of Pe-king. The Governor of Pe-king goes often to visit this Field, which is cultivated with great Care, and examines all the Ridges thoroughly, to see if he can meet with any uncommon Ears, such as they reckon good Omens: On which Occasion he gives Notice that he found a Stalk, for Instance, that bore thirteen Ears. In the Autumn, the same Governor gets in the Grain in yellow Sacks, which are stowed in a Granary built for that Purpose, call'd the Imperial Magazine. This Grain is kept for the most solemn Ceremonies: for when the Emperor sacrifices to Tyen or Sbang-ti, he offers it as the Fruit of his own Hands; and on certain Days in the Year he presents it to his Ancestors, as if they were still living.

Fine Regulation of Yang-ching, to encourage Agriculture. Among several good Regulations made by the same Emperor, he has shewn an uncommon Regard for the Husbandmen. To encourage them in their Labour, he has ordered the Governors of all the Cities to send him Notice every Year, of the Person of this Profession, in their respective Districts, who is most remarkable for his Application to Agriculture; for unblemished Reputation; for preserving Union in his own Family, and Peace with his Neighbours; for his Frugality and Aversion to all Extravagance.

Upon the Report of the Governor, the Emperor will advance this wise and diligent Husbandman to the Degree of a Mandarin of the eighth Order, and send him Patents of an honorary Mandarin: Which Distinction will entitle him to wear the Habit of a Mandarin, to visit the Governor of the City, to sit in his Presence, and take Tea with him. He will be respected all the rest of his Days, and after his Death will have funeral Obsequies suitable to his Degree; and his Title of Honour will be written in the Hall of his Ancestors. What Joy must this afford the venerable old Man and his whole Family! besides the Emulation such a Reward excites among the Husbandmen, the Emperor still adds fresh Lustre to a Profession which is of so great Importance to the State, and has always been had in Esteem thro' the Empire.

Of the Ingenuity of Mechanics, and the Industry of the common People.

The People divided into three Classes.

THE People, as before observed, are distinguished into three sorts of Professions: that of the Husbandmen, which is in great Esteem; that of Merchants, of whom I shall speak, when I come to treat of the Chinese Trade; and that of Mechanics, who being constantly employed in the manual Arts, help these to supply Necessities and Conveniences of Life.

The common People cannot provide for their own Maintenance without a continual Toil; and there is scarce any Nation more laborious and temperate than this. A Chinese will spend whole whole Days in digging the Earth, often up to the Knees in Water; and in the Evening will think himself happy with a little boiled Rice, Pot-Herbs, and some Tea.

It must be observed, that the Chinese always boil their Rice in Water, it being the same to them as Bread is to us, without ever cloying. They are inur'd to Hardships from their Infancy, which greatly contributes to preserve the Innocence of their Manners.

The japann'd Works, the beautiful China-Wares, and the Variety of well-wrought Silks, imported from China, are a sufficient Proof of the Ingenuity of the Natives. They are not less skilful in making Commodities in Ebony, Shells, Ivory, Amber, and Coral. Their Works in Sculpture, as well as their publick Buildings, such as the Gates of great Cities, the Triumphal Arches, their Bridges, and their Towers, expresse something great and noble. In a Word, they succeed equally in all Kinds of Arts that are necessary for the common Uses of Life; doing things with a certain kind of Elegance agreeable to their Taste: and if they have not arrived at so great a Perfection as appears in several Works in Europe, 'tis because they are restrained by the Chinese Frugality; which sets Bounds to the Expences of private Persons.

It is true their Invention is not so good as that of our Mechanics, but the Tools they make Use of are more simple; and they imitate, well enough, any Pattern that is brought them, tho' they never saw it before. Thus at present they make Watches, Clocks, Glafs, Muskets, Pistols, and several other things which they had no Notion of formerly, or made but very imperfectly. There are Mechanics of all sorts in every City; some of whom work in their Shops at their Work-Houses, and others go about the Streets, offering their Service to such as want it; but the greater Part are employed in private Houses. For instance, if you want a Suit of Cloaths, the Taylor comes betimes in the Morning to your House, and returns home in the Evening: It is the same with respect to other Mechanics, who all bring their Tools along with them, even to the Smith with his Anvil and Stove, to make things of common Use.

A great Number of Barbers are seen in the Streets, with a kind of little Bell to give Notice of their Approach: They carry on their Shoulders a Stool, their Bason, their Pot and Fire, with a Towel and Clouts; and immediately in the Street, in the middle of a Square, at the Door of a House, or wherever else it is desired, they shave the Head very dexterously, leaving only a long Lock of Hair behind, according to the Custom introduced by the Tartars: They set the Eyebrows in order, clean the Ears with proper Instruments, stretch out the Arms, rub the Shoulders, and do all this for eighteen Deniers [or less than a Half-penny] which they receive with a great many Thanks, and then ring the Bell again in quest of another Job.

Many get their Living by hiring Vehicles for carrying one thro' the City, particularly at Pe-king; where you find in all Squares and at the Corners of Streets, Horses ready saddled, Mules and Chairs, fifty or a hundred of which may be had any time at a moderate Price.

They have Recourse to all manner of Contrivances, for means of Subsistence; and as there is not a Spot in all the Empire that lies untill'd, neither is there one Person, Man or Woman, tho' ever so old, deaf or blind, but what may easily gain a Livelihood. They scarce ever make use of any thing to grind their Corn in China but Hand-mills; which requiring nothing more than the motion of the Arms, employs an infinite number of People. This is not for want of Water-mills, which are common on most of their Rivers, being used for grinding the Bark of Trees to make Pastiles withal. The Wheel of these Mills is placed Horizontally, and has double Fellows, about a Foot, or a Foot and a half, from each other; which are united by little Boards, and disposed obliquely in such a Manner, that at the Top they leave a pretty wide Opening, and at the bottom a very narrow Cleft, while the Water, that falls like a Sheet, the height of two Foot on these little Boards, makes the Wheel turn swiftly round.

The Chinese will make a Profit of Things, which appear to others to be, quite useless: Their Shifts for a Livelihood. A great many Families in Pe-king subsist by selling Matches; others by picking up in the Streets little Rags of Silk, Wollen, Cotten, or Linnen; the Feathers of Fowls, Bones of Dogs, and Bits of Paper, which they wash and sell again. They even make sale of Ordure, for which purpose a great Number of People in every Province carry Pails; [See p. 272] In some Places they go with their Barks into the Canals, which run on the Backside of the Houses, and fill them at almost every Hour of the Day.

This Sight, in Cities so well governed as those of China, is very surprizing to an European; but in this Country it may be properly said, Lucri bonus Odor ex re qualibet. Gain has a good Smell let it come out of what it will. The Chinese are not less astonish'd to see the Water-bearers in Europe. The Peasants come and buy it in their Houses, endeavouring to forestal each other, and give in Exchange Wood, Oil, and Pulse. There are in every Street Conveniences for Passengers; whereof the Owners make a good Advantage by this sort of Traffic.

Yet it must be own'd, that notwithstanding the great Sobriety and Industry of the Inhabitants of China, the prodigious Number of them occasions a great deal of Misery. There are some so poor, that being unable to supply their Children with common Necessaries, they expose them in the Streets, especially when the Mothers fall sick, or want Milk to nourish them; so that these little Innocents are in some sense condemn'd to Death, as soon as they begin to live. In the great Cities, such as Pe-king and Kan-ton, this shocking Sight is very common, but in other places it is very rare.

The Missionaries in populous Cities have Catechists, who, dividing the Place among themselves, walk out every Morning to baptize a Multitude of dying Children. With the same View they have sometimes prevailed on the unbelieving Midwives to permit Christian Women to follow them to the Houses where they are called; for it often happens that the Chinese, not being in a Condition to maintain a numerous Family, engage the Midwives to stifle the Females in a Basin of Water, as soon as they are born, on which Occasion these Christians take care to baptize them.

Mortgaging
and Families.

The same Misery produces a prodigious Multitude of Slaves, or rather Persons who mortgage themselves with a Condition of Redemption, a thing very common with the Chinese; for among the Tartars they are truly Slaves. A great number of Men and Maid-Servants are thus bound in a Family, tho' there are some to whom they give Wages, as in Europe.

Slavery in China very easy.

A Man sometimes sells his Son, and even himself and Wife, at a very moderate Price; but if he can he chooses to pawn his Family only. It often happens that a great Tartarian Mandarin, or Chinese Tartarised, (that is, listed under the Tartar Banner) who has a Parcel of Slaves for his Servants, is himself a Slave to some Court-Lord; to whom, from time to time, he makes a Present of considerable Sums. A poor Chinese, when he gives himself to a Tartarian Prince, if he has Merit, may hope to be a great Mandarin very soon; but this is not so common under the present Dynasty as formerly: if he be deprived of his Office he returns to his Master to serve in certain honourable Functions.

When rich Folks marry their Daughters, they give them several Families of Slaves, in Proportion to their Wealth. It often happens that they give them their Liberty; and some have half their Freedom, on condition that they pay Yearly a certain Sum. If any of them grow rich by their Industry, or Business, their Master does not strip them of their Goods, but is contented with large Presents; and lets them live in Credit, without consenting however to their Redemption. These Slaves are of an approved Fidelity, and inviolably attached to their Master; who on his side uses them as his own Children, and often trusts them with the most important Affairs. As to his Authority over his Slaves, it is confined to Matters relating to his Service; for should it be legally proved, that a Master had abused his Power, by taking criminal Liberties with the Wife of his Slave, he would be ruin'd beyond Remedy.

Of the Genius and Character of the Chinese.

The Chinese
affable, mild, and humane.

THE Chinese in general are of a mild, tractable, and humane Disposition. There is a great deal of Affability in their Air and Manner, wherein we see nothing that is either harsh, rough, or passionate: This Moderation is remarkable among the Vulgar themselves: I was one Day (says "Pere de Pontaney") in a very narrow and deep Road, "where, in a short time, there happen'd a great Stop of Carts. I expected they would have fallen into a Passion, given one another abusive Language, and perhaps come to Blow, as is common in Europe; but was much surpriz'd to see that they saluted each other, spoke mildly, as if they had been old Acquaintance, and lent their mutual Assistance to make way". (A)

Have great Respect for old Men.

Instance in the late Emperor.

Above all things, they shew a great Deference and Respect for their old Men, of which the Emperor himself sets the Example. An inferior Mandarin of the Tribunal of the Mathematics, about a hundred Years old, came to Court the first Day of the Chinese Year, to salute the late Emperor Kang-hi; who, tho he had designed to see Nobody that Day, gave Orders to admit him. As the good old Man was but indifferently clad, every one was forward to lend him Garments. Being conducted into the Emperor's Apartment, his Majesty, who was sitting on an Estrade after the Tartarian Manner, rose up and went to meet him; receiving him with great Tokens of Affection. The Mandarin was going to fall on his Knees, but the Emperor immediately raised him, and graciously taking him by both his Hands, "Venerable Old Man, said he, I will admit you henceforth into my Presence as often as you come to salute me; but I acquaint you, once for all, that I exempt you from all Sorts of Ceremony. As for me, I will rise upon your Arrival, and go to meet you; but it is not to your Person that I do this Honour, it is to your Age: and to give you real Marks of my Affection, I from this time appoint you Chief President of the Tribunal of the Mathematics": This completed the Happiness of the old Man, who never tasted such perfect Joy before.

How Strangers should behave in conversing with them.

When we have to do with the Chinese we should take care of being too hasty or warm; the Genius of the Country requires that we should command our Passions, and act with a great deal of Calmness. The Chinese would not hear in a Month what a French Man could speak in an Hour. We must suffer with Patience this Phlegm, which seems more natural to them than any other Nation. Not that they want Fire and Vivacity; but they learn betimes to become Masters of themselves, and are vain of being more polite, and more civiliz'd than other People.

Their Ceremonies irksome to us.

It is a difficult Matter for a Stranger to conform himself to their Notion of Politeness and Civility. Their Ceremonies are on many occasions tiresome, and full of Constraint; it being one Fatigue to learn, and another to practise them. But this Trouble regards only the

(A) See something of this kind in that Father's Travels. p. 51.

Behaviour towards some, to whom uncommon Veneration is due, on certain particular Occasions; as the first Visits, a Mandarin's Birth-Day, &c. for after two Persons have seen each other several Times, they lay aside all Reserve, and grow as familiar as the People of Europe; so that if you should begin to use Ceremonies, they are the first as will say, Pu-yau-tso-be, Make no Stranger of me: No Compliments, No Compliments.

Tho' the Chinese are mild and peaceable in Conversation, and when they are not provoked, they are exceeding violent and revengeful when they are offended. The following is an Instance: In a certain Maritime Province it was discover'd that the Mandarin had applied to his own Use, great Part of the Rice sent thither by the Emperor in a Time of Scarcity, to be distributed to every Family in the Country; the People accused him before a Superior Tribunal, and proved, that out of the four hundred Loads of Rice received, he had only delivered out ninety; upon which he was immediately depriv'd of his Office.

*Chinese full of Resentment
when thoroughly provoked.*

Pleasant instance.

When he had left the City to go on Board a Ship, he was greatly surpriz'd, instead of finding in his Passage Tables loaded with Perfumes, and new Boots for Change, (as is customary for those who gain the Love and Esteem of the People) to see himself incompass'd with a prodigious Multitude, not to do him Honour, but to insult and reproach him for his Avarice. Some invited him, by way of Derision, to stay in the Country till he had eaten all the Rice, the Emperor had intrusted him with, for the relief of his Subjects; some dragg'd him out of his Chair, and broke it; others fell upon him, tore his Garments, and filken Umbrella in Pieces; in short, all followed him to the Ship, loading him with Injuries and Curses.

Tho' the Chinese, are naturally vindictive when urged by Interest, yet they revenge themselves in a methodical Manner. They dissemble their Resentment; and as they rarely take violent Measures, especially People of any Figure, they preserve, even with their Enemies, so fair an Outside, that one would imagine they were insensible: but when an Opportunity of destroying their Enemy offers, they immediately seize on it; and their having seem'd so patient, was only with a Design to strike the surer Blow.

venge.*

In some Districts the People are so very litigious, that they mortgage their Lands, Houses, Goods, and all that they have, for the Pleasure of going to Law, and procuring the Bastonado to be given to their Enemy: and it sometimes happens that the Defendant, by giving a larger Sum privately to the Mandarin, finds Means to escape the Punishment himself, and cause the Blows to fall on the Back of the Plaintiff. Hence arise mortal Enmities amongst them, which stick in their Hearts till they find an Opportunity of satisfying their Revenge.

Very Litigious.

One of their Methods, tho' rarely practis'd, is to fire their Enemy's House in the Night-time; by their Laws, those who are convicted of this Crime are punished with Death, and the Mandarins are very expert in discovering the Authors. However, many abhor such Villanies, and become sincerely reconciled with their Enemies.

Their Modesty is surprizing; the Literati always appear with a composed Air, without using the least Gesture, but what is strictly agreeable to the Rules of Decency. It seems to be natural to those of the Female Sex, who live in a constant Retirement, and are decently covered even to their very Hands, which never appear, being constantly hid within their long and wide Sleeves; so that in presenting any thing, even to their Brothers or Parents, they lay it on the Table with the Hand always cover'd for their Relations to take it.

modest.*

Interest is the Grand Foible of the Chinese, with whom you must act all sorts of Parts, even that of being disinterested. When they have any Gain in View, they employ all their Cunning, artfully to insinuate themselves into the Favour of Persons, who may forward their Business, and endeavour to gain their Friendship by frequent Services; assuming all sorts of Characters with surprizing Address, and turning to their advantage the most trifling Occasions to obtain their Ends. Interest is the Spring of all their Actions; for when the least Profit offers, they despise all Difficulties, and undertake the most painful Journeys to procure it. In a word, this puts them in a continual Motion, fills the Streets, the Rivers, and the high Roads with infinite Numbers of People, who pass and repass, and are always in Action.

Interest their darling Vice.

Tho', generally speaking, they are not so deceitful and knavish as P. Le Comte represents them, it is however true that Honesty is not their favourite Virtue; especially when they have to do with Strangers, whom they seldom fail to cheat if they can, and then brag of it. Some of them are so impudent as, when detected, to plead in Excuse, their want of Dexterity; "You see I am but a Bungler, say they; You are more dextrous than I; Another time I will not venture to meddle with an European": And in reality it is said, that some Europeans have taught them their Trade.

Have learn'd Deceit from the Europeans

Nothing can be merrier than what happen'd to a Captain of an English Ship. He had bargained with a Chinese Merchant of Kan ton for several Bales of Silk; and when they were ready, he went with his Interpreter to the Merchants House, to see if the Silk was in a good Condition. On opening the first Bale it proved to his liking, but the rest contained nothing but rotten Silks Upon which growing very angry, he reproach'd the Chinese in the severest Terms for his Disingenuity and Knavery; while the other heard him very unconcerned, and only made this reply; Blame, Sir, said he, your Rogue of an Interpreter, for he protested to me that you would not examine the Bales.

Merry Story of an English Captain.

This

Some of their little knavish Tricks.

This knavish Wit is found chiefly among the Vulgar, who have Recourse to a thousand Tricks to adulterate every thing they sell. Some have the Art to open the Breast of a Capon, take out all the Flesh, fill up the Hole, and then close it so nicely that the Cheat is not perceived till the Fowl comes to be eaten. Others counterfeit the true Hams so exactly, by covering a Peice of Wood with a sort of Earth, and then wrapping it in Hogs Skin, that the Deceit is not discovered till it is serv'd up at the Table, and going to be carv'd. However, it must be confess'd they seldom practise these Tricks on any but Strangers; and in other Places [distant from the Sea-coast] the Chinese themselves will hardly believe them.

Robbers use Craft instead of Violence.

Robbers scarce ever make Use of Violence, endeavouring to gain their Ends by Subtily and Craft; for some follow the Barks and hire among those who draw them along the Imperial Canal, in the Province of Sban-tong; where, being changed every Day, the Thieves are not easily known: In the Night they slip into the Barks, and by the Smoke, as is reported, of a certain Drug which they burn, cause those on Board to sleep so soundly, that they have Time enough to search all Places, and carry off what they will, unperceived. Some of these Thieves will dog a Merchant two or three Days together till they find a proper Opportunity to do their Business.

Most of the Chinese are so sway'd by Interest, that they can scarcely conceive a thing is ever undertaken with any other View: Hence it seems almost incredible to them, that the Missionaries should have no other Motive in leaving their Country, Friends, and all that is dear to them in this World, than to glorify God and save Souls. They know that it is not Necessity that makes them run the Danger of the Sea to get to China, since they subsist without asking any Favour, or expecting the least Assistance; nor the Desire of Riches, since they are Witnesses to the Missionaries Contempt of them: Some therefore are simple enough to imagine, that they come to bring about a Revolution, and by their Intrigues to make themselves Masters of the Empire, as happen'd in the Affair of Yang-quang-syen (n). However their Disinterestedness is one of the most prevailing Motives, with many, to embrace their Religion.

Chinese very anxious about their Coffins.

The extreme love of Life is another Foible, wherein the Chinese exceed almost all other Nations; tho' there are some, chiefly Females, who make away with themselves, either thro' Anger or Despair: and indeed the Generality, especially among the Poor, seem less afraid of Death, than of wanting a Coffin after it. It is astonishing to see how careful they are in this Respect: Those who have but nine or ten Pistoles in the World will lay it out on a Coffin, above twenty Years before they want it; looking upon it as the most valuable Moveable in their House. However, it must be confessed, that the Chinese, for the most part, when dangerously ill, are willing enough to die, and even to be told they are near their End.

Proud and
themselves,

To omit nothing of the Character of the Chinese, I must add, that there is no Nation more proud of their pretended Grandeur, and their assumed Preheminence over all others. This Haughtiness, which is born with them, inspires even the Rabble with the greatest Contempt for all other Nations. They are so full of their own Country, Customs, Manners, and Maxims, that they cannot be persuaded there is any Thing good out of China, or any Truth but what their learned Men are acquainted with. However, they have seen their Mistake a little, since the Europeans came among them; tho' when they first saw them, they asked if they had any Cities, Towns, or Houses in Europe.

tho' ignorant of the World.

Our Missionaries have often been Witnesses of their Surprize and Confusion on Sight of a Map of the World. One Day some of the Literati desiring P. Chavagnac, to shew them such a Map, they sought a long while for China; and at length took one of the two Hemispheres for it, which contains Europe, Africa, and Asia; supposing America appeared too large for the rest of the World. The Father let them alone for a while in their Error, till one of them desiring an Explanation of the Letters and Names in the Map: You see EUROPE, said the other, AFRICA and ASIA; In ASIA here is PERSIA, the INDIES and TARTARY. Where then is CHINA, cry'd they? It is this little Corner of the Earth, reply'd he, and these are the Bounds of it: Upon this they look'd astonish'd at one another, saying in Chinese, Syau-te-kin, It is very small.

their own Fashions.

How far soever they fall short of the Perfection, to which Arts and Sciences are brought in Europe, there is no getting them to do any thing in the European Manner; the Chinese Architects could hardly be prevailed on to build the Church, which is in the Palace, according to the Model brought from Europe.

Their Ships are very ill built, and they admire those that come from Europe; but when you talk of their imitating them, they are surprized at the Proposition: It is according to the Fashion of China, say they. But it is worth nothing, say you. It matters not, reply they; since it is used in the Empire it is sufficient, and it would be a Crime to vary from it.

But this Answer, made by their Carpenters, proceeds not merely from their Fondness for their own Custom, but partly thro' Fear they should not please the European, who employs them, so effectually when they follow his Method as their own; for those who are Artists readily undertake and perform the Work let the Model be what it will, provided there is Money to be gotten, and you have Patience to give them Directions.

(n) Pray must not every Protestant think these Suspicions of the Chinese very wise and just, since they have the same Notions themselves, not without the most convincing Reasons, dear Experience; say, they have been charged already, as well as the Bruce's, with fleeing their Proselytes.

EMPEROR OF CHINA

P. 242

In a Word, to finish the Character of the Chinese, it is sufficient to say, that tho' they are vicious they naturally love Virtue, and those who practise it: tho' they are not chaste themselves they admire those that are, especially Widows; and when they find any that have liv'd a continent Life, they preserve their Memory by Triumphal Arches, and honour their Virtue by lasting Inscriptions. It is not decent for a Woman of Credit to marry again after her Husband is dead.

Great Admirers of Virtue.

As they are subtil and crafty, they know how to carry a fair Outside, and cover their Vices with so much Cunning, that they conceal them from the Public. They have the greatest Respect for their Parents, and those who have been their Masters. They detest every Action, Word, and Gesture that seems to betray Anger, or the least Emotion; but they also know perfectly how to dissemble their Hatred. They are not permitted to carry Arms even when they travel, that being a Privilege peculiar only to the Soldiery. All their Esteem and Ardour are engrossed by the Sciences, which are the Foundation of their Nobility; because, as I said before, all their Honours and Preferments are derived from thence.

They do not glory in their Vices.

Of the Air and Physiognomy of the Chinese: their Fashions; their Houses, and elegant Furniture.

WE must not judge of the Air and Physiognomy of the Chinese by the Pictures on their japan'd Works and China-Ware. Tho' they are skilful in painting Flowers, Animals and Landscips, they are very ignorant in drawing Human Figures, maiming and disfiguring themselves in such a Manner that they look more like Scaramouches than Chinese.

It is true however, that as Beauty depends upon Taste, and consists more in Imagination than Reality, their Notion of it differs somewhat from that of the Europeans; for, generally speaking, that which seems beautiful to us is agreeable to their Taste, and that which appears beautiful to them appears equally so to us. That which they chiefly admire, as making a perfect Beauty, is a large Forehead, a short Nose, small well cut Eyes, a large and square Face, great broad Ears, a middle-sized Mouth, and black Hair; for they cannot bear the Sight of yellow or red-hair'd People. However, there must be a certain Proportion among the several Features to render the whole agreeable.

A Chinese Beauty.

A fine easy Shape is no Charm among them, because their Garments are wide, and not fitted to the Body, as those of the Europeans; they think a Man well made, when he is large and fat, and fills his Chair with a good Grace.

Their Shape.

Their Complexion has been misrepresented by those who have seen only the Southern Parts of China; for tho' the excessive Heats which prevail there, especially in Quang-tong, Po-kyen, and Yun-nan, give the Mechanics and Peasants an Olive or brown Complexion, yet in the other Provinces they are naturally as white as the Europeans; and generally speaking, their Physiognomy has nothing disagreeable in it.

Their Complexion.

The young People, commonly to the Age of thirty, have a very fine Skin, and beautiful Complexion, as well as the Literati and the Doctors; these latter, especially if they are of base Extraction, never pare the Nails of their little Fingers, affecting to let them grow an Inch long, or more, with a Design to let People see that they are not driven by Necessity to work for their Living. As for the Women they are commonly middle siz'd, their Noses short, their Eyes little, their Hair black, their Ears long, and their Complexion ruddy; there is a certain Gayety in their Countenance, and their Features are regular.

The Doctors affect long Nails.

Features of the Women.

It is affirm'd that they rub their Faces every Morning with a kind of Paint, to make them look fair, and give them a Complexion; but that it soon spoils their Skin, and makes it full of Wrinkles.

They paint.

Among the Beauties of the Sex, small Feet is not the least; when a Girl comes into the World, the Nurses are careful to bind their Feet very close, to prevent their growing. The Chinese Ladies all their Lives after feel this Constraint imposed on them in their Infancy, their Gate being slow, unsure, and disagreeable to Foreigners: yet such is the Force of Custom, that they not only willingly undergo this Inconvenience, but they increase it, by endeavouring to make their Feet as little as possible; thinking it an extraordinary Charm, and always affecting to shew them as they walk.

Small Feet a great Beauty.

The Chinese themselves are not certain what gave Rise to this odd Custom. The Story current among us, which attributes the Invention to the ancient Chinese, who, to oblige their Wives to keep at home, are said to have brought little Feet into Fashion, is look'd upon as fabulous by some. The far greater number think it to be a politic Design, to keep the Women in continual Subjection. It is certain, that they are extremely confin'd, and seldom stir out of their Apartment, which is in the most retired Place in the House; having no Communication with any but the Women-Servants. However they have generally speaking the common Vanity of the Sex, and tho' they are not to be seen by any but their Domestic, they spend several Hours every Morning in Dressing and setting themselves out.

Chinese Ladies under great Restrictions.

Their Head Attire.

Their Head-dress usually consists in several Curls, interspers'd with little Tufts of gold and silver Flowers. Some adorn their Heads with the Figure of the Pong-wang, a fabulous Bird, of which the Ancients speak many mysterious things. It is made of Copper or Silver, gilt, according to the Quality of the Person; its Wings are stretch'd gently over the fore part of their Head-dress, and embrace the upper part of their Temples. Its long spreading Tail makes a sort of Plume on the Top of the Head; the Body is placed over the Forehead; the Neck and Beak hang down upon the Nose: but the Neck is join'd to the Body by a secret Hinge, that it may easily play and vibrate at the least Motion of the Head, whereon the Bird is supported by the Feet, which are fix'd in the Hair. Women of the first Quality sometimes wear an Ornament of several of these Birds, interwoven together, which forms a sort of Crown, the Workmanship whereof alone is very costly.

The young Ladies commonly wear a kind of Crown, made with Paste-Board, and cover'd with a beautiful Silk; the Fore-part whereof rises in a Point above the Fore-head, and is cover'd with Pearls, Diamonds and other Ornaments. The Top of the Head is adorn'd with natural or artificial Flowers, mix'd with little Bodkins, with Jewels on their Points. Women who are advancing in Years, especially those of the common sort, are contented with a piece of very fine Silk, wound several times about the Head, which they call Pau-tew, that is to say, A Wrapper for the Head.

Uncommon
Modesty of their Looks and Drefs.

But what adds much to the natural Charms of the Chinese Ladies, is the uncommon Modesty which appears in their Looks and Drefs. Their Gowns are very long, and cover them from Head to Foot, so that nothing is seen but their Faces. Their Hands are always conceal'd within their wide long Sleeves, which would almost drag on the Ground, if they did not take care to hold them up. The Colour of their Garments is either red, blue or green, according to their Fancy; only, scarce any but Ladies advanc'd in Years wear violet or black.

The Fashions
in China
never alter.

What I here call the Fashion, is very different from the Idea which that Word carries in Europe, where the manner of Dress is subject to many Changes: but it is not so in China; nor is there any thing that more shews the good Order and Uniformity of the Government, even in the most trifling Matters, than the Fashion as to Dress having been always the same, from the Commencement of the Empire, to its Conquest by the Tartars; who have changed nothing of the ancient Usages among the Chinese, except in obliging them to dress after their Manner.

Habit of the Men.

The Garb of the Men is suited to the Gravity they affect; it consists in a long Vest, extending to the Ground, one of whose Lappets folds over the other, the upper one reaching to the right side, where it is fasten'd with four or five gold or silver Buttons, not far asunder. The Sleeves, which are wide towards the Shoulder, grow narrower gradually towards the Wrist-bands, and end in the Shape of a Horse-shoe, covering all their Hands, except the ends of their Fingers. They gird themselves with a broad silken Sash, whose ends hang down to the Knee; and fasten to it a Case, containing a Purse, a Knife, and two small Sticks, which serve for a Fork, &c. Formerly the Chinese did not carry a Knife, and to this Day the Literati very rarely do.

Their Summer and Winter
Cloaths.

In the Summer they wear under the Vest a pair of Linnen Drawers, which they sometimes cover with another pair of white Taffety; and during the Winter they put on Breeches of Sattin, quilted with Cotton or raw Silk, but if it be in the Northern parts they are made of Skins, which are very warm. Their Shirts, (being of different kinds of Cloth, according to the Season) are very wide and short; and to keep their Garments from Sweat in Summer, several wear next their Skin a silken Net, which hinders their Shirt from sticking to it. During this last Season they go with their Neck quite bare, but in Winter wear a Collar, made either of Sattin, or Sable, or the Skin of a Fox, and fasten'd to their Vests; which in Winter are lin'd with Sheep-Skin, tho' some are only quilted with Silk and Cotton. People of Quality line them quite thro' with the rich Sables brought from Tartary, or fine Fox-Skin with a Border of Sable; in Spring they have them lin'd with Ermin. Over the Vest they wear a Surtout with short Sleeves, that are lin'd or border'd after the same manner.

Confined to certain Colours.

All Colours are not suffer'd to be worn indifferently by the People; none but the Emperors and Princes of the Blood may wear yellow Garments. Sattin, with a red Ground, is affected by certain Mandarins on days of Ceremony; but they are commonly dress'd in black, blue, or violet: and the People are generally clad in blue or black Callico.

They shave
the Head.

Heretofore they oyled their Hair very much, and were so exceeding fond of this Ornament, that many chose to die rather than shave their Heads after the Tartarian Fashion; though their new Masters did not meddle with the other Customs of the Nation. However, at present they let Hair enough grow on the hind part or Top of the Head, to braid into Tresses.

Their Hats or Caps.

In Summer they wear a kind of small Hat or Cap, shap'd like a Funnel; it is cover'd on the outside with Rattan, very curiously work'd, and lin'd with Sattin. At the Top is a large Lock of Hair, which spreads over it to the very Edge. This Hair, which is mighty fine and light, grows on the Legs of a certain kind of Cows, and is dy'd of a very bright red; it is very much used, and allow'd to be worn by all sorts of People.

There is another sort of Cap proper to the Mandarins and Literati, which the People dare not wear; it is of the same Fashion with the former, but made of Paste-Board, between two pieces of Sattin; that on the inside is commonly red or blue, and the outside Sattin is white, cover'd with a large Lock of the finest red Silk. People of Distinction often make use of the first sort, especially when they ride, or in foul Weather; because it keeps out Rain, and defends the Head both before and behind from the Sun.

In Winter they wear a very warm sort of Cap, edged with Sable, Ermin, or Fox-Skin, the Top of which is cover'd with a Lock of red Silk. This edging of Fur is two or three Inches broad, and looks very handsome, especially when made of the fine black shining Sable, which is sold at forty or fifty Taels.

The Chinese, especially those of any Quality, dare not appear in Public without Boots; these Boots are generally of Silk, particularly Sattin, or of Callico, and fit exactly, but have no Tops nor Heels. When they go long Journeys on Horseback, their Boots are of Neats or Horse-Leather, so well dress'd that nothing can be more pliable. Their Boot-Stockings are of Stuff, stitch'd, and lin'd with Cotton, whereof part comes above the Boot, and has a broad Border of Plush or Velvet. But these, tho' very commodious for keeping the Legs warm in Winter, are almost intolerable in hot Weather: for which Reason they have another cooler Sort; but it is not much used among the People, who often, to save Expence, have something of this kind made of black Cloth. Persons of Quality wear such in their Houses, made of Silk, which are very neat and handsome.

They wear Boots in all Seasons.

When they go abroad, or make a Visit of any Consequence, over their under Garments, which are usually of Linnen or Sattin, they wear a long silk Gown, commonly blue, with a Girdle about them; and over all they have a short Coat of a black or violet Colour, reaching only to their Knees, but very wide, with large and short Sleeves: also a little Cap, shap'd like a short Cone, and cover'd with loose waving Silk or red Hair; lastly, Stuff Boots on their Legs, and a Fan in their Hand.

Visiting-Habit.

The Chinese love to be neat in their Houses, but they have nothing very magnificent. Their Architecture is not the most elegant, nor have they any regular Buildings, except the Emperor's Palace, some public Edifices, the Towers, Triumphal Arches, the Gates and Walls of the great Cities, the Dikes, Causeways, Bridges, and Temples of the Bonzas. The Houses of private Persons are very plain, for they have no regard to any thing but Convenience. The Rich adorn theirs with Japan Work, Sculpture and Gildings, which render them very pleasant and agreeable.

Their Houses and other Buildings.

They commonly begin with erecting Pillars, and placing the Roof thereon; for the greater part of their Buildings being of Wood, they seldom lay the Foundation deeper than two Feet. They make their Walls of Brick or Clay, tho' in some Places they are all of Wood. These Houses are generally nothing but a Ground-floor, excepting those of the Merchants, which have often one Story above it, call'd Lew, where they place their Goods.

The Walls.

In the Cities almost all the Houses are cover'd with very thick Ridge-Tiles; they lay the convex Side downwards, and cover the Chinks where the Sides meet, by laying on others in a contrary Position. The Spars and Joists are either round or square: upon the Spars they lay either very thin Bricks, in the Shape of our large square Tiles, or else small pieces of Boards, or Matts made of Reeds, which are plaister'd over with Mortar; when it is a little dry, they lay on the Tiles, which those who are able to be at the Expence, join together with Roche-Lime.

The Roof.

In most of their Houses after passing through the Porch, you enter into a Hall, facing the South, about thirty or thirty five Feet long; behind the Hall there are three or five Rooms in a Range from East to West, whereof the middlemost serves for an Inner-Hall. The Roof of the House is supported by Pillars, in such sort, that if the Hall be thirty Feet long, it will be at least fifteen broad, and then there will be twenty four Pillars forward, and as many backward, with one at each end. These Pillars, which are commonly ten Feet high, are erected on Stone Bases, and support great Beams, laid lengthwise; and between every two Pillars they place a cross Beam, and on the two Pillars at the Ends, they lay other Pieces of Wood, which support the Timber-Work of the Roof, this done they begin to build the Walls.

The Timber-Work within.

The Magnificence of the Houses, according to the Chinese Taste, usually consists in the Thickness of the Beams and Pillars, in the Excellency of the Wood, and in the fine Carvings on the Gates or Doors. They have no Stairs but the Steps at the Entrance of the House, which is rais'd a little above the Level of the Ground; but along the Front there is a close Gallery, about six or seven Feet wide, and lin'd with fine hewn Stone.

The Front;

There are several Houses whose middle Doors answering one another, discover on entering a long series of Apartments. The Houses of the Vulgar are made of unburnt Bricks, only in Front they are cas'd with burnt Bricks; in some Places they are made with tempered Clay, and in others of nothing but Hurdles cover'd with Lime and Earth; but in Houses of Persons of Distinction, the Walls are all of Ground-Bricks, very artificially carv'd. In the Villages, especially of some Provinces, besides being very low, the Houses are generally made of Earth, and the Roofs so obtuse, or else round, so much by Degrees, that they seem to be flat. They are compos'd of Reeds cover'd with Earth, and supported by Matts of small Reeds that lie upon the Rafters and Joists. In some Provinces instead of Wood they burn Pit-Coal, or else Reeds or Straw. As they make use of Stoves with very small Chimneys, and sometimes none at all, when Fires are made in any place, besides the Kitchen, one is almost stifled with Houses of the common People.

the

the Smoke; especially if the Fewel be Reeds, which is unsupportable to those who are not used to it.

Houses of the Nobility and Tribunals.

The Houses of the Nobility and rich People do not deserve to be mention'd, in comparison of ours; it would be an Abuse of the Term to call them Palaces, they being nothing but a Ground-Floor, raised something higher than common Houses; the Roof is next, and has several Ornaments on the Top. The great number of Courts, and Apartments for lodging their Domestic, makes amends for their want of Beauty and Magnificence; not that the Chinese hate Pomp and Expence, but the Custom of the Country, and Danger of appearing extravagant, restrain them contrary to their Inclination. The Tribunals of Justice are not more pompous: the Courts are large, the Gates lofty, and sometimes adorn'd with elegant Carvings; but the Inner Halls and Chambers of Audience are neither magnificent nor very neat.

Palaces of the Quæ.

It must be confessed, however, that the Palaces of the chief Mandarins, and the Princes, as well as of those who are rich and in Power, are surprizing for their vast Extent. They have four or five Courts, with as many Ranges of Buildings in each. Every Front has three Gates, that in the middle is the largest, and both sides of it are adorn'd with Lions of Marble. Near the great Gate is a Place, inclos'd with Rails, finely japan'd with either red or black; on the sides are two small Towers, wherein are Drums and other Instruments of Music, on which they play at different Hours of the Day, especially when the Mandarin goes in or out, or ascends the Tribunal.

The Form of them.

On the inside there appears first a large open Place, where those wait who have any Case or Petition to present; on each Side are small Houses, serving as Offices for the Officers of the Tribunal: Then there appear three other Gates, which are never opened but when the Mandarin ascends the Tribunal; the middlemost is very large, and none but Persons of Distinction pass through it. Beyond this is another large Court, at the End whereof is a great Hall, wherein the Mandarin administers Justice; lastly, follow successively two very neat Halls, for receiving Visits in, furnished with Chairs and Variety of other Moveables. Such are generally the Tribunals of the great Mandarins.

The Officers just now spoken of are a kind of Notaries, Clerks, &c. there are six Sorts of them, each employed in Business of the same kind with one of the six Supreme Courts at Pe-king; so that a private Mandarin does all that in little, in his Tribunal, which some time or other he will be called to do in one of the Supreme Courts, with respect to the whole Empire. They are maintained at the public Expence, and their Places are for Life; so that Business goes on without Interruption, tho' the Mandarins are often changed, either by being cashier'd, or removed into other Provinces.

Out-Houses, Gardens, &c.

You afterwards pass into another Court, with a Hall much handsomer than the former, where none but particular Friends are admitted, surrounded by Out-Houses for the Mandarin's Domestic. Beyond this Hall is another Court, where is the Apartment of the Women and Children, with a great Gate to it, thro' which no Man dares to enter. This Part is very neat and commodious, being furnished with Gardens, Woods, and Lakes, and every thing that is delightful to the Eye. Some delight in artificial Rocks and Mountains, pierced thro', and full of Windings like a Labyrinth, to take the fresh Air in. When they have Room enough, they make little Parks to keep Deer, and Ponds for Fish and Water-Fowls.

Fine Palace at Kan-ton.

The Palace of the Tsyang-kun, or General of the Tartarian Troops at Kan-ton, is thought to be one of the finest in all China; it was built by that rich and powerful Prince called Ping-nan-vang, that is, The Peace-maker of the South. The Emperor Kang-bi had made him in some Sort King of Kan-ton, for his Services in reducing some of the Southern Provinces under the Dominion of the Tartars: but forgetting his Duty a few Years after, he and all his Family fell into Disgrace; being forced to strangle himself with a Scarf of red Silk, presented him by a Gentleman of the Emperor's Bed-Chamber, sent Express from Pe-king.

Chinese Notion of Building.

The Chinese Notion of Beauty and Magnificence, with regard to their Palaces, is very different from the European: for tho' the Largeness of the Courts and Buildings bespeaks them to be the Habitation of Persons of Distinction, yet an European is not at all affected with this Sort of Magnificence; which only consists in the Number and Extent of the Courts, the Largeness of the principal Halls, the Thickness of the Pillars, and a few Pieces of Marble rudely cut.

Marble seldom used by them.

Marble is very common in the Provinces of Sban-tong and Kyang-nan, but the Chinese don't know the Value of it; for they seldom make use of it but for lining Canals, or building Bridges and Triumphal Arches, in Tables for Inscriptions, in their Pavements, the Thresholds of their Gates, and the Foundations of some of their Temples.

Not curious in adorning their Houses within.

The Chinese are not curious like the Europeans, in adorning and beautifying the Inside of their Houses, where neither Tapestry, Looking-Glasses, nor Gildings are to be seen: for as the Emperor owns the Palaces of the Mandarins, whose Offices are no more than Commissions, that are taken away when they commit any Fault; and as they are not fixed in any Place, be their Conduct ever so unblameable, but when they least think of it are removed into another Province; they do not care to be at any great Expence in furnishing a House, which they are in danger of leaving every Minute. Besides, as Visits are never received in the Inner Apartments, but only in the great Hall before the House, it is not surprizing that they are sparing of Ornaments; which wou'd be, in some measure, useless, as not being seen by Strangers.

The principal Things, that set off their Halls and Apartments, being kept with a great deal of Care, appear exceeding neat and agreeable to the Eye: Such as, large silk-Lan-thorns, painted, and hanging from the Cieling; Tables, Cabinets, Screens, Chairs, Japan'd with their beautiful red and black Varnish, which is very transparent, so that the Veins of the Wood appear through it, and as bright as a Looking-Glass; Variety of Figures, in Gold and Silver, or other Colours painted upon this Japan, give it a new Lustre; moreover, the Tables, the Bouffets, and the Cabinets, are adorned with that fine Cbina-Ware, which is so much admired, but could never yet be imitated in Europe.

Their principal Furniture and Moveables.

Besides, this they hang up, in several Places, Pieces of white Sattin, on some of which are painted Flowers, Birds, Mountains, and Landships: On others are written, in large Characters, Moral Sentences taken from their Histories, and generally couched in obscure Terms, bearing a different Sense from the natural; these Sentences are commonly two and two together, and conceived in the same Number of Words. Some are contented with whitening or papering the Walls of their Rooms, wherein the Chinese are very skilful.

Pictures.

Tho' they never are seen in their Bedchambers, where it wou'd be unpolite to con-duct a Stranger, the Beds, especially of the Nobility, are curious and handsome: the wooden part is painted, gilt, and carved: the Curtains vary according to the Season; during Winter, in the Northern Provinces, they are of double Sattin, and in Summer, either of plain white Taffety adorned with Flowers, Birds, and Trees, or of very fine Gauze; which is both open enough to let the Air through, and close enough to keep off the Gnats, that are extremely troublesome in the Southern parts. The common People use, for the same purpose, a very thin Cloth made of a sort of Hemp; their Mattresses are very thick, and stuffed with Cotton.

Their Beds and Curtains.

In the Northern Provinces they make Places of hollow Bricks, in the form of Beds, which are larger or smaller according to the Number of the Family: Beside it is a small Stove, of Charcoal, whose Flames and Heat are dispersed to all parts by Pipes, terminating in a Funnel, which carries the Smoak thro' the Roof. In the Houses of Persons of Distinction the Stove comes through the Wall, and the Fire is lighted on the Outside; by which means the Bed, and even the whole House, is warmed; so that they have no occasion for the Feather-Beds of Europe. Those who are afraid of lying on the hot Bricks, hang a sort of a Hammock over them, made of Cords or Ratan, and not unlike the Sacking of our Beds.

Stove Beds.

In the Morning every thing of this kind is taken away, and Carpets or Matts put in their Room, on which they sit. As they have no Chimneys, nothing can be more convenient; for the whole Family work upon them, without feeling the least Cold, or being obliged to wear furred Garments. The meaner Sort dress their Victuals, warm their Wine, and prepare their Tea (for the Chinese drink every thing hot) over the Mouth of the Stove. The Beds belonging to the Inns are much larger, that there may be Room for several Travellers at a time.

Their Conveniences.

Of the Magnificence of the Chinese, in their Journeys; in their Public Works, such as, Bridges, Triumphal Arches, Towers, Walls of Cities; in their Feasts, &c.

THE Magnificence of the Emperor and his Court, and the Riches of the Mandarins surpass all that can be said of them; one is surpris'd at first to see nothing but Silks, Porcellaine, Cabinets and other Furniture, which make a more glittering Appearance, than the common Manufactures of Europe. But the principal Magnificence of the Chinese Lords is not seen in their Houses; for they commonly neglect themselves at home, from whence the Laws banish Luxury and Pomp, permitting them the Use thereof only when they are seen in publick, when they make or receive Visits, or when they go to Court, and are admitted into the Emperor's Presence.

Chinese Magnificence public not private.

I have already spoken of the pomp of the Mandarins, and the numerous Train of Officers attending them. Military Men, who travel commonly on Horseback, no less affect an Air of Grandeur. Indeed their Horses are not very beautiful, but their Harness is exceeding sumptuous, the Bits and the Stirrups being either Silver or gilt. The Saddle is very rich; the Reins of the Bridle are made of coarse, pinked Sattin two fingers broad. From the upper part of the Chest hang two great Locks of fine red Hair (such as their Caps are cover'd with) suspended by Iron-rings either gilt or silvered. Their Retinue consists of a great number of Horsemen, part going before, and part behind them; without reckoning their Domestic, who are clad either in black Sattin or dyed Callico, according to their Master's Quality.

State of the Military Quar when they travel.

But the Chinese Magnificence never appears with so much Splendor, as when the Emperor gives Audience to Ambassadors; or when sitting upon his Throne he beholds at his Feet the principal Lord of his Court, and all the great Mandarins in their Habits of Ceremony, paying him Homage. It is a Spectacle truly August, to see a prodigious Number

Magnificence of the Court on State days of Soldiers under Arms; an inconceivable Multitude of Mandarins, with all the Marks of their Dignity, each placed according to his Rank, in exact Order; the Ministers of State, the Presidents of the Supreme Courts, the Regulo's and Princes of the Blood; the whole appearing with extraordinary Grandeur, and conveying a most lofty Idea of the Sovereign, to whom such profound Reverence is paid. There is no Dispute about Precedence, but every one knows his distinct Place; the Name of each Office being engraven on Copper-Plates fastned into the Marble Pavement.

In Europe People are not fond of making a great Figure upon the Road, instead of which they are commonly unprovided, and have nothing in Order; but the Custom is otherwise in China, where a great Mandarin always travels in State. If by Water, his own Bark is very splendid, sailing at the Head of a great Number of others, which carry his Attendants. If he goes by Land, besides the Domestics and Soldiers who precede and follow him with Spears and Ensigns, he has for his own Person a Litter, a Chair carried by Mules, or eight Men, and several led Horses; making Use of these Vehicles by turns, according to his Fancy and the different Changes of Weather.

Canals numerous in China.

I have already observed that China is full of broad Canals, which often run in a strait Line; there is commonly in every Province a great River, or broad Canal, serving for a Highway, with Causeways on each Side, cased with flat Stones or Marble.

Great Canal.

That which is called the Great Canal crosses the whole Empire from Kan-ton to Pe-king; and nothing can be more commodious than to travel the six hundred Leagues from the Capital to Ma-kau, as if he were all the while in his own House, without going above one Day's Journey by Land over the Mountain Mey-lin, that separates the Provinces of Kyang-fi and Quang-tong; tho' the whole may be performed in a Bark, especially when the Waters are high.

Imperial Barks described.

For this reason, the Mandarins who go to take possession of their Governments, and the Messengers sent from Court, most commonly travel by Water: Being furnished with Barks maintained by the Emperor, which are equal in Bigness to one of our third-rate Men of War. These Imperial Barks are of three different Sorts, nor can any thing be more neat; for they are painted, gilt, embellish'd with Dragons, and japan'd both within and without. Those of the middle Size, which are most in Use, are above sixteen Feet broad, fourscore long, and nine in Depth from the Deck. As to the Form, they are square and flat, excepting that the Forepart is somewhat rounded.

Rates and Sizes of them.

Appartments

Furniture and Embellishments.

Besides what the Master has for himself and his Family, (viz. his own Cabbin, a Kitchen, and two large Places, one before, the other behind,) there is a Hall about six or seven feet high, and eleven broad; next an Anti-Chamber, and two or three other Rooms; likewise a Bye Place without Ornaments, all upon the same Deck, which make up the Mandarin's Apartment. It is all japan'd with the beautiful red and white Varnish, and the Sides as well as Cieling adorn'd with plenty of carv'd Work, Painting and Gildings; the Tables and Chairs are japan'd red or black. The Hall has Windows on each Side, which may be taken away upon occasion; and instead of Glass they make use of very thin Oyster-shells or fine Stuffs, done over with shining Wax, and embellish'd with Flowers, Trees, and variety of Figures. The Deck is surrounded with Galleries, for the Sailors to go backward and forward without incommoding the Passengers.

The Hold.

Sails.

Over this Apartment is a sort of Platform, or Terrass, open on all Sides, set apart for the Music, which consists of four or five Hands, whose Harmony can ravish nothing but the Ear of a Chinese. Underneath is the Hold, divided into several little Chambers for stowing the Baggage. The Sails are made of Mats, and consist of several oblong Squares, which folding like a Fan, take up little or no Room. They are very convenient, because they are better than any other for sailing near the Wind; besides, if the Braces happen to break, no Inconvenience arises from thence to the Bark.

To push forward these great Barks, they make use of long thick Poles, shap'd like a Gibbet, or the Letter T, thrusting one End to the Bottom of the Water, and applying their Shoulder to the other; or else they employ Oars of several Shapes, but the common sort is a long Pole made like a Shovel at one end, with a Hole in the middle, to receive the Pegs fixed on the Side of the Bark. There are others whose Extremities, being continually moved to the right and left in the Water, like a Fish's Tail, cut it obliquely, in the same manner as your Birds of Prey do the Air, when they fly with their Wings extended, making use of their Tails for Oars. This Method is the more convenient, as the Rowers take up little or no Room in the Bark, for they are ranged on the Sides upon Planks. Their Oars, which do the Office of a Rudder, seldom break; and, tho' never taken out of the Water, constantly force the Bark forward.

Some of these Barks are hauled along with Ropes, when the Wind is contrary, or they are obliged to go against the Stream. These Ropes in some places are made of Hemp, and in other of very long and fine Splinters of Cane twisted, which are exceeding strong, and never rot with the Water.

Barks attending the Quán in their Travels by Water.

Among the Barks that follow the great Mandarins, there is always one, at least, called the Hsue-chwen, or Bark of the Provisions; on board which is the Kitchen, the Eatables, and the Cooks. Another is full of Soldiers for the Convoy; a third, much more small and light, may be called the Harbinger, because its Business is to hasten before to give Notice, and cause every thing to be prepared that there be no Occasion to wait. These Barks have their Rowers, and in case of Necessity, are are also drawn with a Rope along the Bank by Men, who are furnished by the Mandarin of each City, and changed every Day. The Number of these Supplies is determin'd by that of the Horses appointed by the Kang-ho, or Patent of the Emperor, viz. three Men for every Horse: Hence if eight Horses are appointed for an Envoy, they supply him with twenty four Men to draw the Bark.

All along the Roads by Water, there is, at the End of every League, a Tang, or Guard, who, if there be Occasion, are to give Notice to each other by Signals. In the Day time, the Signal is a thick Smoak, made by burning Leaves and Branches of Pine, in three small Stoves, shaped like Pyramids, and open at the Top; in the Night the Signal is given by shooting off a small Cannon. The Soldiers of every Tang, who are sometimes ten, sometimes five, or less, according to the Place, usually stand in a Rank along the River side, out of Respect to the Mandarin, one of them bearing an Ensign display'd, and the rest with their Arms in their Hands.

If the Bark carries an Envoy, they put at the Head and Stern four Lanthorns; with these Words in great Characters of Gold, King-chay-ta-jin, that is, The Great Envoy from the Court: These are accompanied with Flags and Streamers of Silk, of several Colours, waving in the Wind.

Every Morning and Evening, when they heave and cast Anchor, the Guard salute the Mandarin with a discharge of their Fire-Arms, followed by the Sound of Trumpets. Towards Night-fall they light the Lanthorns at the Head and Stern, as well as thirteen others of a smaller Size, hung in the Form of a Chaplet, by the Side of a Mast, viz. ten in a perpendicular Line, and three above them cross-wise.

When the Lanthorns are lighted, the Captain of the Place appears with his Company opposite to the Barks, and with a loud Voice calls over the Names of the Men whom he hath brought to watch and stand Centry all Night; then the Master of the Bark pronounces a long Harangue to the Soldiers, reminding them of all the Accidents that are to be feared, as Fire, Thieves, &c. and that if any of them should happen, they must be accountable for it.

The Soldiers at the end of every Article give a great Shout; after which they withdraw to form a Guard, leaving one of their Company to stand Centry, who walks to and fro on the Quay, continually striking two Pieces of Bambú against each other, to signify his Vigilance, and that he is not asleep. These Centries are relieved every Hour, performing by turns the same Duty, and making the same Noise the whole Night: If he be a principal Mandarin, or a great Court-Lord, they pay him the same Honours.

The great Number of Canals to be seen in China is something very extraordinary: They are often lined on each Side to the height of ten or twelve feet, with fine square Stone, which in many Places seem to be a kind of grey Marble, of the Colour of Slate. The Banks of some of the Canals being twenty or twenty five foot high on each Side, there is need of a great number of Chaplet-Engines to raise the Water into the Fields.

Some run above ten Leagues in a strait Line; as that from Sá-chew to Vú-si-hyen. In like manner the Canal to the Northwest of the City Hang-chew extends very far in a Right-line, and is every where more than fifteen Toises in Breadth; it is lin'd on each Side with hewn Stone, and border'd with Houses close together, and as full of People as those in the City. Both Sides of the Canal are cover'd with Barks, and in Parts where the Bank is low and flooded, there are flat Bridges of great Stones seven or eight foot long, placed three and three in form of a Causeway.

The great Canals in every Province discharge their Waters into several small ones on each side; which afterwards forming a great number of Rivulets, are dispersed in the Plains, and reach to the Villages, and often to the great Cities. From Space to Space they are cover'd with Bridges of three, five, or seven Arches; that in the middle is sometimes thirty six, nay forty five Foot wide, and so high, that Barks may pass through, without taking down their Masts; those on each side are seldom less than thirty, and diminish in proportion to the Slopings of the Bridge.

Some of these Bridges have but one Arch, which is semicircular, and built of arched Stones, five or six Foot long, and only five or six Inches thick; some of them are Polygonal. As these Arches are not very thick at Top, they cannot be strong, but then Carts never pass over them, for the Chinese make use only of Porters to carry their Bales. Several Bridges instead of Arches have three or four great Stones placed on Piers, like Planks; many of them being ten, twelve, fifteen and eighteen Feet long. There are a considerable number of this sort neatly built over the Great Canal, whose Piers are so narrow that the Arches seem to hang in the Air.

It is no hard matter to learn how the Chinese build their Bridges, for, having finish'd the sides of the Arch next to the Land, when the Bridge is to have only one Arch, or raised the Piers when it is to have several, they then take Stones four or five Foot long, and half a Foot broad, and place them alternately upright and crosswise, in such a manner that the Key-Stones may be laid horizontally. The Top of the Arch is commonly no thicker than one of these Stones; and because the Bridges, especially when they have but one Arch, are sometimes forty or fifty Foot wide between the Piers, and consequently much higher than the Causeway, the Ascent on each end is by very flat easy Stairs, with Steps about three Inches thick; tho' it would be difficult for Horses to pass over some of them. The whole Work is generally well contrived.

Many Beautiful Bridge near

Pe-king.

Many of these Bridges are very handsome. That call'd Lü-ko-kyau, two Leagues and a half Westward of Pe-king, was one of the finest that ever was seen, before part of it was broken down by a Land-flood. The whole was of white Marble well work'd, and very curiously built. There were on each side seventy Pillars, separated by Cartridges of fine Marble, whereon were delicately carved Flowers, Foliages, Birds, and several sorts of Animals. On each side of the Entrance of the Bridge on the East-end, there were two Lions of an extraordinary Size, on Marble Pedestals, with several little Lions in Stone, some climbing on the Backs of the great ones, some getting off them, and others creeping between their Legs; at the West-end, on Marble Pedestals also, stood the Figures of two Children, carv'd with the same Skill.

Public Monuments

Among the public Works ought to be rank'd the Monuments which the Chinese have erected almost in every City to eternize the Memory of their Heroes; that is to say, the Captains, Generals, Princes, Philosophers, and Mandarins, who have done Service to the Public, and signalized themselves by great Actions.

erected in Honour of Women as well as Men.

There is for Instance, near the City of Nan-byong, in the Province of Quang-tong, an high Mountain (A), (from whence proceed two Rivers) which was formerly inaccessible, till a Ko-lau, born in that Country, undertook to cut a Passage through it, for the Sake of Travellers. To perpetuate the Memory of so signal a Benefit received from that great Man, they erected a Monument on the Top of the Mountain, and placed his Statue there, before which they burn Perfumes. They reckon more than eleven hundred Monuments erected in Honour of their Princes, and illustrious Men, renown'd for Knowledge or Virtue. The Women participate of this kind of Glory; History taking Notice of several, who have merited and obtain'd the like Titles of Honour, and whose Heroic Virtues are daily celebrated in the Works of their most famous Poets.

Triumphal Arches.

These Monuments consist principally in Triumphal Arches, call'd Pay-fang, and Pay-leu, which are very numerous in every City. Many of them are very clumsily made, and deserve little Notice; but others are worth Attention. Some are wholly of Wood, except the Pedestals, which are of Marble. Those at Ning-po have generally three Gates, that is, a large one in the middle, and two small ones on the sides; the Peers or Jambs are square Pillars or Posts consisting of one Stone; the Entablature is composed of three or four Faces, generally without any Projection, or Moulding, except the last or the last but one, which is in place of a Frieze, and has some Inscription engraven on it.

Their Architecture.

Instead of a Cornice, the Piers support a Roof, that makes the Top of the Gate, and is only to be described by the Pencil, our Gothic Architecture itself not having any thing so odd in it. Every Gate consists of the same Parts, which differ only in Size, and tho' of Stone, are join'd together by Tenons and Mortises, as if they were made of Wood. The Rails or Breast-Walls of the Bridges on the Canals, are in the same Taste, being large square Pannels of Stone, fix'd in Grooves cut in the Posts for that purpose.

Their Ornaments.

These Triumphal Arches, which are seldom above twenty or twenty five Feet high, are set off with Figures of Men, Antics, Flowers, and Birds, jutting out beyond the Arch in various Attitudes, with other Ornaments indifferently well carv'd; The Relievo is so great, that many of them seem to be almost separated from the Work: among the rest are several small Cordons or Pieces of Net-work, pierc'd very artificially. In a word, these Pageants, tho' slight enough, have their Beauties; and several of them placed at certain Distances in a Street, especially if it be narrow, discover something grand, and make an agreeable Show.

City Walls,

I have already given some Account of the Chinese Magnificence, with respect to public Works, in speaking of the Walls and Gates of Pe-king; and as many Cities have the like, I shall only add, that their Walls are so high, that they hide the Buildings, and so broad that one may ride on Horseback upon them. Those of Pe-king are made of Brick, and forty Feet high; they are flank'd at the distance of every twenty Toises, with small square Towers set upon them.

and Gates.

As for the Gates, tho' they are not adorn'd with Figures in Basso Relievo, like other public Works, the Sight is extremely affected by the prodigious Height of the two Pavilions that form them; by their Arches, that in some places are of Marble; by their Thickness, and by the Strength of the Work.

Towers.

The Towers, call'd Pau-ta, erected in almost every City, are some of their greatest Ornaments; they consist of several Stories, one less than another the higher they go, with Windows on every Side. The most famous Structure of this kind, is that in the City of Nan-king, in the Province of Kyang-nan, commonly call'd, The Great or Porcelain Tower, which I have already spoken of in the Beginning of this Work; but as P. le Comte has given a more exact Description of it, it deserves to be repeated here:

Porcelain
Tower at Nan-king.

"There is (says he) without the City, and not within it, as some have written, a Temple, call'd by the Chinese, The Temple of Gratitude, built by the Emperor Yong-lo. It is erected on a Pile of Bricks, which form a great Perron, surrounded with Rails of unpolish'd Marble, and a Stair-Case of ten or twelve Steps. The Hall, which serves for the Temple, is a hundred Feet high, and standing on a small Marble Basis, no more than a Foot in height, but jutting out two Feet beyond the rest of the Wall all round. The Front is adorn'd with a Gallery and several Pillars. The Roofs (for according to the Custom of

"China

(A) The Mountain meant here, is doubtless the famous My-shu, mention'd p. 286 and often before, particularly p. 115.

" China, there often are two, one bearing on the Wall, the other covering that again) are of japan'd Tiles, green and shining. The Joiners Work on the Inside is painted, and adorn'd with an infinite number of Pieces, engaged, in different manners one within another; which is no small Ornament among the Chinese. It is true that this Forest of Beams, Joists, Rafters, and Spars, that appear on all sides, has something very singular and surprising; because one is apt to imagine that there is a great deal of Labour and Expence in Works of this kind: tho' in reality the Confusion proceeds from the Ignorance of the Workmen, who have not yet discover'd that lovely Simplicity, wherein the Strength and Beauty of the European Buildings consist.

" The Hall has no Light but what it receives through the Doors, of which there are on the East-side three very large ones, leading into the famous Tower I am going to speak of, which makes part of the Temple. It is an Octagon, about forty Feet in Diameter, so that every Side of it is fifteen Feet in length. It is encompass'd on the Outside by a Wall of the same Figure, which is two Toises and an half distant from the Edifice, and at a moderate Height supports a Roof, cover'd with japan'd Tiles, that seems to proceed from the Body of the Tower, and makes underneath a very handsome Gallery. The Tower has nine Stories, each adorn'd with a Cornice, three Feet above the Windows; and a Roof like that of the Gallery, except that it does not jut out so far, as not being supported by a second Wall: These Stories grow smaller, as the Tower rises higher, and lessens in Circumference. The Wall on the Ground-Floor is at least twelve Feet thick, and eight and an half high, cas'd with Porcelain. It is true, the Rain and Dust have impair'd its Beauty, but yet it is still entire enough to shew that it is made of China Ware, tho' of a coarse sort, for it is not probable Bricks would have continued three hundred Years in so good Condition.

" The Stair-Case, which is made on the Inside, is small and inconvenient, because the Steps are extremely high. Every Story is separated by thick Beams, plac'd cross-ways, which support a Floor, and form a Room, the Ceiling of which is adorn'd with variety of Paintings, if the Chinese Painters be capable of embellishing an Apartment. The Walls of all the upper Stories are full of small Niches, containing Images in Basso-relievo, which make a very pretty sort of Inlaid Work. The whole is gilded, and seems to be of Marble, or polish'd Stone, tho' I believe it to be nothing but Brick made in a Mould; for the Chinese are surprizingly skilful in stamping all sorts of Figures on their Bricks: the Earth of which, being extremely fine and well temper'd, is much fitter than ours for taking the Impression of the Mould.

" The first Story is the highest of all; the rest are of an equal Height. As I reckon'd one hundred and ninety Steps, almost every one ten Inches thick, which I measur'd exactly, they must make one hundred and fifty eight Feet; if to this we add the Height of the Perron, the ninth Story which has no Steps, and the Roof, the Tower will be from the Ground about two hundred Feet high.

" The Top of all the Work is one of its greatest Beauties; for it is a thick Mast, reaching from the Floor of the eighth Story, whereon it stands, more than thirty Foot above the Roof. It seems to be inclos'd in a large Iron Hoop of the same Height, which winds round it [like a spiral Line or Screw] at the Distance of several Feet; so that it looks like a sort of hollow Cone, pierced through, rising in the Air, with a golden Ball on the Top of an extraordinary Magnitude. This is what the Chinese call the Porcelain Tower, though some Europeans perhaps will name it a Brick Tower; but let that be as it will, it is certainly the best contriv'd, most solid, and magnificent Work in all the East."

Among the most sumptuous Buildings of the Chinese we ought not to omit their Temples or Pagods, erected to fabulous Divinities by the Superstition of the Princes as well as of the People. Of these there is a prodigious number in China, and the most celebrated are built in barren Mountains, to which however the Industry of the Natives has given the Beauties and Conveniencies deny'd them by Nature: the Canals cut at a great Expence to conduct the Water from the Heights into Basins and Reservoirs appointed for that Purpose; The Gardens, Groves, and Grottos, made in the Rocks for Shelter, against the excessive Heat of a burning Climate, render these Solitudes charming.

The Structure consists partly of Porticos, pav'd with large square polish'd Stones, and partly of Halls, and Pavilions, which stand in the Corners of Courts, and communicate by long Galleries, adorn'd with Statues of Stone, and sometimes of Brass. The Roofs of these Buildings shine with beautiful Tiles japan'd green and yellow; and are adorn'd at the Corners with Dragons of the same Colour, projecting forward.

There are few of these Pagods but what have a great Tower, standing by itself, and terminating in a Dome, to which they ascend by a handsome Stair-Case that winds round about it. A square Temple commonly occupies the middle of the Dome, which is often adorn'd with Mosaic Work, and the Walls cover'd with stone Figures of Animals and Monsters in Relievo.

This is the Form of most of the Pagods, which are larger or smaller, according to the Devotion and Abilities of those who have contributed towards building them. These are the Habitations of the Bonzas and Idol-Priests, by whom all sorts of Frauds are practis'd, to impose on the Credulity of the People; who come from far in Pilgrimage to these Temples consecrated to the Devil (A): but as the Chinese are not very consistent in the Worship they pay to their Images, it often happens that they shew but little Veneration either for their Gods or his Ministers.

Generally the Bonzas are in great Contempt, nor will any Chinese of Fashion embrace their Condition; so that being almost all taken from the Dregs of the People, they are often, to encrease their number, oblig'd to buy young Children, whom they bring up in their way of Life, in order to succeed them in the Ministry.

Festivals of the Chinese.

That of Lanterns.

In speaking of the Magnificence of the Chinese, I should omit what is very essential, if I said nothing of their Festivals, whereof principally two, are celebrated with vast Expence. The one is the Beginning of their Year, and the other, which falls on the fifteenth of the first Month, is call'd The Feast of Lanterns. By the Beginning of the Year I mean the End of the twelfth Moon, and about twenty Days of the first Moon of the following Year, which is properly their Vacation-Time. Then all Business ceases, they make Presents, the Posts are stopp'd, and the Tribunals are shut up throughout the Empire. This is what they call the Shutting up the Seals; because at this Time they, with a great deal of Ceremony, shut up the little Coffer, wherein the Seals of each Tribunal are kept. This Vacation lasts a whole Month, and is a Time of great Rejoicing; especially during the last Days of the old Year, which are celebrated with great Solemnity. Their inferior Mandarins go to salute the Superiors, the Children their Fathers, the Servants their Masters, &c. This is what they call taking Leave of the Year. In the Evening all the Family meet together, and a great Feast is made.

In some Places a very odd piece of Superstition prevails, for they will not suffer a Stranger among them, nay not one of their nearest Relations; for fear that the Moment the new Year begins, he should catch the good Luck which was to light on the House, and carry it away with him, to the Prejudice of his Host. On this Day therefore every one keeps close at home, and rejoices with none but his own Family; but on the Morrow, and the following Days, they express Signs of extraordinary Joy, for all the Shops are shut, and every body is wholly taken up with Sports, Feasts and Plays. The poorer sort on this Day put on the best they have; while such as can afford it dress themselves richly, and visit their Friends, Relations, eldest Brothers, Patrons, and all those they have any Interest in. They act Plays, treat each other, and mutually wish all kinds of Prosperity; in a word, all the Empire is in Motion, and nothing is heard of but Mirth and Pleasure.

Another Festival of Lanterns.

The fifteenth of the first Month is likewise a solemn Festival, when all China is illuminated, and to look from some high Place seems to be on Fire. It begins on the thirteenth in the Evening, and continues to the sixteenth or seventeenth. Every Person, both in City and Country, on the Sea-Coast, or on the Rivers, lights up painted Lanterns of several Fashions; even the poorest Houses that are, have them hanging in their Courts, and at their Windows, every one being desirous to distinguish himself. Those used by the Poor do not cost much, but the Rich lay out sometimes two hundred Franks in Lanterns; and the chief Mandarins, the Vice-Roys, and the Emperor, three or four thousand Livres.

This being a Spectacle free for every body, the People flock thither from all Parts of the City, and the more to satisfy their Curiosity, the Gates are left open every Evening: They are even permitted to enter into the Tribunals of the Mandarins, who adorn them in a splendid manner, to shew their Magnificence.

The Lan-
scribed.

These Lanterns are very large, the Frames of some, containing six Panes, being of japan'd Wood, adorn'd with Gildings. These Panes consist of fine transparent Silk, whereon are painted Flowers, Trees, Animals, and human Figures; which being disposed with Art, receive as it were Life from the great number of Lamps and Candles, wherewith the Lanterns are lighted up. Others are round, and made of blue transparent Horn, very beautiful to the Sight. The Top of this Machine is adorn'd with Variety of carved Works, from the Corners whereof hang several Streamers of Sattin and Silk of divers Colours.

Moving Figures.

Several of them represent Sight's purposely to amuse and divert the People; there you see Horses galloping, Ships sailing, Armies marching, People dancing, and several other things of the same Nature; the respective Figures being put in Motion by means of imperceptible Threads, manag'd by Persons unseen. Some by Shadows represent Princes and Princesses, Soldiers, Buffoons, and other Characters; whose Gestures are so conformable to the Words of the Operator, who moves them with extraordinary Art, that one would think they really spoke. Others carry a Dragon sixty or eighty foot long, full of Lights from the Head to the Tail, which they cause to wind and turn like a Serpent.

Sp'endid
Fire-works.

But what gives a new Splendor to this Feast is the Fire-Works, which are plaid off in all Parts of the City; and wherein the Chinese are thought to excel. P. Magalbaens relates, that he was extremely surpris'd with one he saw, representing a Vine-Arbor, which burn'd without consuming; and the Foot of the Vine, the Branches, Leaves, and Grapes consumed exceeding slowly: The Grapes appeared red, the Leaves green, and the Colour of the Stem was imitated so artificially, that any Person might have been deceived. But the Reader will be better able to judge of these Fire-Works from the Description of one which the Emperor Kang-hi caused to be play'd off for the Diversion of his Court; whereat the Missionaries, who were of his Train, were present.

(A) The hard Names bestow'd by the Author will not take of the Resemblance between the two Religions. Their Practice is the very same, they only differ as the Objects of their Worship.

It began by setting Fire to half a dozen Cylinders planted in the Earth: these spouted Flames in the Air, which at the Height of twelve Foot fell down again in golden Rain or Fire. This was follow'd by a sort of Bomb-Cart supported by two Stakes or Pillars, from whence proceeded a Shower of Fire with several Lanthorns; many Sentences wrote in large Characters; the Colour of burning Sulphur; and half a dozen branched Candlesticks in the Form of Pillars, consisting of several Rings of Lights, one above another, which cast a white or silver Flame, and in a Moment turn'd Night into Day. At length the Emperor, with his own Hands, set Fire to the Body of the Machine, which presently became all in a Blaze, being eighty Feet long, and forty or fifty broad: The Flame having caught hold of several Poles, and Paper Figures placed on all Sides, a prodigious Quantity of Squibs flew up into the Air, and a great number of Lanthorns and Branches were lighted all over the Place. This Show lasted for half an Hour; and from time to time there appeared in some Places violet and bluish Flames, in the Form of Bunches of Grapes, hanging on a Vine-Arbor, which, joined to the Splendor of the Lights, that were like so many Stars, yielded a very agreeable Spectacle.

There is one very remarkable Ceremony observed at this Festival: In most Houses the Head of the Family writes in large Characters on a Sheet of red Paper, or japan'd Board, the following Words, Tyen-ti, San-kyay, She-fan, Van-lin, Chin tsay: the Sense of which is, To the true Governour of the Heaven, the Earth, the three Limits, (that is, the whole World) and of the ten thousand Intelligences, (that is, an innumerable Multitude.) This Paper is either put in a Frame, or pasted on a Board; at Court they place it on a Table, on which is set Corn, Bread, Meat, or some other Thing of that Nature, and then prostrating themselves on the Earth, offer Sticks of Pastil.

Of the Ceremonies observed by the Chinese in their Compliments, Visits, Presents, Letters, Feasts, Marriages, and Funerals.

1. Their SALUTATIONS and COMPLIMENTS.

THERE is nothing in which the Chinese seem more scrupulous than in their Ceremonies and Compliments. They are persuaded that a due Attention in performing the Duties of Civility goes farther than any thing else to purge the Mind of a certain Roughness that is born with us; to infuse a Sweetness of Temper, and to maintain Peace, good Order, and Subordination in a State: It is, say they, by Modesty and Politeness in civil Society, that Men are distinguished from Brutes.

Among their Books, containing the Rules of Civility, there is one which has upwards of three thousand, every thing being set down at large. The common Salutations, the Visits, the Presents, the Feasts, and whatsoever is done in public or private, are rather so many standing Laws, than Fashions gradually introduced by Custom. Almost the whole of these public Ceremonies may be reduced to the Manner of bowing, kneeling down, and prostrating one or more times, according to the Occasion, Place, Age or Quality of the Persons; especially in visiting, making Presents, or treating Friends.

Foreigners, who are obliged to conform to these fatiguing Ceremonies, are frighten'd with them at first; whereas the Chinese, who are brought up to them from their Infancy, instead of being discouraged, are greatly pleased with them, and believe that for want of the like Education other Nations are become barbarous. And, that the Observation of these Customs may not wear out in time, there is a Tribunal at Pe-king, whose principal Business is to preserve the Ceremonies of the Empire; wherein it is so strict that it will not exempt even Strangers from the Obligation: for which Reason, before the Ambassadors are introduced to Court, the Custom is to instruct them privately for forty Days together, and exercise them in the Ceremonies of the Country; much after the same manner as our Comedians practise before they come to act their Parts on the Stage.

It is reported that one of the former Czars of Russia, having in a Letter to the Emperor of China besought his Majesty to pardon his Ambassador, if, for want of being well acquainted with the Customs of the Empire, he committed any Blunder; the above mentioned Tribunal, called Li-pu, reply'd gently in these Terms, (which the Missionaries at Pe-king translated faithfully by the Emperor's Order) Legatus tuus multa fecit russice; Your Ambassador has done many things in a very unpolite Manner.

This Affectation of Gravity and Politeness appears ridiculous at first to an European; but he must comply with it, unless he has a mind to pass for a Clown. After all, every Nation has its Genius and Manners; nor ought we to judge of them according to the Prejudice of Education. If on comparing the Customs of China with ours, we are tempted to look upon so wise a Nation as fantastic; the Chinese in their Turns, agreeable to their own Notions of things, look upon us as Barbarians: But both are mistaken, most Actions of Mankind being indifferent in themselves, and standing just for nothing but what People please to make of them: hence that which is look'd upon as a mark of Honour in one Country, is a sign of Contempt in another. In many Places it is an Affront to a Gentleman to take Their Ceremonies have the Force of Laws.

All even Strangers and Ambassadors oblig'd to comply with them.

An Apology for the Chinese Ceremonies.

take him by the Beard; in others it is a Mark of Veneration, and signifies that the Person who does it has some Favour to ask. The Europeans rise up and take off their Hats to receive Visitors: the Japanese on the contrary neither move nor uncover, but only pull off their Shoes and Stockings; and in China it is a great Rudeness to talk bare-headed to any Person whatever. Plays, and Instruments of Music, are almost every where Signs of Joy, yet in China they are used at Funerals.

Therefore, without either praising or blaming the Customs which disgust us, it is sufficient to say, that these Ceremonies, however forbidding they may seem to us, are look'd upon by the Chinese as very essential to the good Order and Peace of the State. It is a Task to learn them, and a Science to be Master of them; but they are brought up to them from their Infancy, so that, however irksome they may prove at first, they at length become natural to them.

The Behaviour even to the Vulgar regulated.

All things being thus regulated as to Ceremonies, every body is sure not to fail in the smallest Duty of Civil Life. The Grandeess know the Respect due from them to the Emperor and the Princes, and in what manner they ought to behave to each other; even the Mechanics, the Peasants, and the very Dregs of the People perform all the Formalities prescribed them, and in their Meetings observe Politeness and Complaisance; as will appear from the Account I am going to give of these Ceremonies.

Ceremony of saluting the Emperor.

On certain Days the Mandarins go to salute the Emperor in their Robes of Ceremony; and if he does not appear himself, they do reverence to his Throne, instead of his Person. While they wait for the Signal to enter the Court of the Chau, facing the Hall of the Throne, they sit on their Cushions in the Court, before the South-Gate of the Palace, which is pav'd with Bricks, and as clean as a Room. The Cushions vary according to the Degree of the Mandarin: those who are intitled to one, for all are not, have it in Summer of Silk, the Colour making the Distinction, though the Difference of the Rank appears chiefly from the middle of the Cushion; and in the Winter they use Skins, which are distinguish'd by the Price. In this great multitude, where one would expect to meet with nothing but Confusion, every thing is admirably well regulated, and perform'd in the greatest Order; for as each knows his Place, there are no Disputes about Precedence.

Every one accountable for a Breach of the Ceremonial.

When the Body of the late Empress was carrying to be interr'd, one of the Princes of the Blood calling a Ko-lau to speak with him, the Ko-lau approach'd, and having answer'd him on his Knees, the Prince left him in that Posture without bidding him rise. Next Day a Ko-li accus'd the Prince and all the Ko-lau's before the Emperor; the Prince for suffering such a considerable Officer to appear before him in so humble a Posture; and the Ko-lau's, chiefly him who kneel'd down, for dishonouring the highest Post in the Empire, and the rest for not opposing, or at least giving the Emperor Notice of it. The Prince excus'd himself, in that he was ignorant of what Custom or the Law directed in the Case, and did not require that Submission; but the Ko-li in Answer alledged a Law of an ancient Dynasty: Whereupon the Emperor order'd the Li-pu [or Tribunal of Ceremonies] to search for such Law in the Archives, and in Case it could not be found, to make a Rule on that Head, which might take place for the future.

Formality of complimenting the Emperor on the Choice of an Empress.

The Ceremonial is likewise regulated, on all other Occasions, which the Grandeess may have to compliment the Emperor: Such for Instance (and it is the only one I shall mention) was that when the present Emperor [Yong-ching] declar'd the Choice he had made of one of his Wives for Empress. Immediately two of the most considerable Doctors, who are Members of the great Council, were deputed to make the Compliment, (for to them only it belongs to compose these pieces of Eloquence) and remit it to the Tribunal of Rites; who, as soon as they receiv'd it, prepar'd themselves for the Ceremony.

On the Day appointed, in the Morning, there was carry'd, to the first or Eastern Gate (*) of Palace, a kind of square Table, on the Corners whereof were erected four Pillars, which supported a sort of Dome: This little portable Cabinet was set off with yellow Silk and other Ornaments. At the prefixed Hour a neat little Book (wherein was written the Compliment that was compos'd for the Emperor, with the Names of the Princes, Grandeess, and those of the supreme Courts, who came in a Body to perform this Ceremony) being plac'd on the Table, some Mandarins, clad suitably to their Office, took up the Machine, and went forward. All the Princes of the Blood with the other Princes and Noblemen had gone before, each according to his Rank, and waited near one of the inner Gates of the Palace. The rest of the great Officers, such as the Prime Ministers, the Doctors of the first Rank, the Presidents of the supreme Courts, and the other Tartarian and Chinese Mandarins, as well Literary as Military, all magnificently dress'd in their Habits of Ceremony, follow'd the Table on Foot, every one in his proper Place. Several musical Instruments made a very agreeable Concert, the Drums and Trumpets resounding from different Parts of the Palace. They began the Procession; and when they were near the Gate call'd U-mwen, the Princes join'd them, placing themselves at their Head. In this manner they walk'd together as far as the great Hall of Audience (+), which having entred, they took the Compliment off the portable

(*) For the great Gate, facing the South, is never open'd but for the Emperor, or for the Ceremonies which relate to his Ancestors.

Table, and plac'd it on another Table, prepar'd for that Purpose, in the middle of the Hall. Then all being rang'd in handsome Order, and standing in their proper Places, they made their usual Reverences before the Imperial Throne, as if his Majesty had been there himself; that is, they fell upon their Knees, struck their Foreheads three times against the Ground with great Respect, and then rose up again, performing the same Ceremony three times. After this, every one keeping in his own Place with great Silence, the Music began to play again; and the Presidents of the Tribunal of Rites acquainted the chief Eunuchs of the Presence, that all the Grandees of the Empire besought his Majesty to come and sit down on his precious Throne. These Words being carry'd to the Emperor, he appear'd and ascended the Throne; when immediately two Doctors of the first Rank, appointed for that Purpose, having advanced near the Table, made several Reverences on their Knees; and then rising up, one of them took the little Book, and read distinctly with a loud Voice the Compliment made by this August Company to his Majesty, which was not very long. As soon as the Doctors had finish'd it, and retired to their Places, the Emperor, descending from his Throne, return'd to his Apartment.

After Noon the Princesses of the Blood, the other Princesses, and Ladies of the first Quality, with the Wives of all the great Mandarins, above-mention'd, went every one, according to their Rank and Dignity, towards the Palace of the Empress, no Lord or Mandarin daring to appear; they were conducted by a Lady of Distinction, who on this Occasion perform'd the part of a Mistress of the Ceremonies, as the Presidents of the Tribunals had done that of Masters.

As soon as all the Ladies were arriv'd near the Empress's Palace, her first Eunuch presenting himself, the Mistress of the Ceremonies address'd him in this Manner: "I humbly beseech the Empress, (said she) in behalf of this Assembly, to condescend to come out of the Palace, and place herself on the Throne." The Women's Compliment is not carry'd in a small Book like the Emperor's, but they present a Leaf of a particular sort of Paper, whereon it is written, with Variety of Ornaments about it. The Empress accordingly came out; and being seated on her Throne, erected in one of the Halls of her Palace, after the Paper was presented, the Ladies standing up made two Curtesies, like those made by the Women of Europe, which is the Fashion in China. This Reverence is call'd Van-so; Van signifying ten thousand, and So Happiness, or Good Luck; Van-so, All Happiness attend ye.

In the Beginning of the Monarchy, when Simplicity reign'd, Women were permitted, in making a Curtesy to a Man, to use these two Words, Van-so; but afterwards, when the Purity of Manners began to corrupt, this sort of Address to Men was not thought decent in Women, whose Salute to them was confined to the mute Curtesy; and to destroy the Custom entirely, they were not permitted to say the Words even in saluting one another. The Ladies having made the two Curtesies, fell on their Knees, and knock'd their Fore-head once against the Ground, as the Tribunal of Rites had prescrib'd; they then rose and stood up in the same Order with profound Silence, while the Empress descending from the Throne withdrew.

The Women salute by a Curtesy.

It is not at all strange that there should be a Ceremonial regulated for the Court; but the Surprise is, that they should go so far as to establish particular Rules for the Behaviour of private Persons towards one another, when they have any Business, either with their Equals or Superiors. No Person whatever can dispense with these Rules, but, from the highest Mandarin to the meanest Mechanick, every one observes punctually the Subordination that Rank, Merit, or Age require.

The common way of Saluting, is to clap the Hands together before the Breast, moving them in an affected Manner, and to bow the Head a very little, saying Tsin-tsin; which is a Word of Compliment, of an unlimited Signification. When they meet a Person to whom they ought to pay greater Deference, after joining their Hands, they first lift them up, and then let them fall almost to the Earth, bowing their Body very low at the same time. When two Persons who are acquainted meet, after a long Separation, they both fall on their Knees and bow to the Earth, then rise up again, and perform the same Ceremony two or three times. They commonly make use of the Word Fo in their Civilities: if any Person is newly arriv'd, the first Question they ask him, is Na-so, that is, If all things have happen'd well in his Journey; when they are ask'd, How they do, they reply, Kau lau-ye bung-so, Very well, Thanks to your abundant Felicity; when they see a Man who is in Health, they accost him with Yung-so, which is as much as to say, Prosperity is painted on your Face, or You have a happy Countenance.

Form of Salutation used by the Men.

Complimental Expressions.

Regard is had to the Rules of Civility no less in the Villages than the Cities; and whether they are walking together, or saluting each other, they always make use of Terms full of Respect and Complaisance. When, for Example, one takes any Pains to please them, Fey-sin, they say, You are lavish of your Heart; If you have done them any Service, the Expression is, Sye-pu-tsin, My Thanks can never have an end; If they hinder a Person ever so little who is busy, Fan-lau, say they, I am very troublesome; Te-tfwi, I have committed a great Fault in taking this Liberty; When one is beforehand in doing them a Kindness, they cry, Pu-kan, Pu-kan, Pu-kan, I dare not, I dare not, I dare not, that is to say, suffer you to take so much Trouble on my Account; If you speak the least in their Praise, they reply, Ki-kan, How dare I! meaning, How dare I believe the Things you say of me! When they even among the Peasants and common People.

take Leave of a Friend who has been at Dinner with them, they say, Tew-man, or Tay-man, We have receiv'd you after a very ordinary manner; we have treated you after a very ordinary manner. The Chinese have always in their Mouths such Words as these, which they utter with an affected Tone; but it does not follow from hence, that they generally proceed from the Heart.

Precedence given to Age. Among the common People, the chief Place is constantly given to the most aged; but if there are Strangers, it is bestow'd on him who lives farthest off, unless his Rank or Quality requires it to be otherwise. In those Provinces where the Right Hand is most honourable, (for in some the Left is so) they never fail to give it.

Salutation among the Quae. When two Mandarins meet in the Street, if their Rank be equal, they salute, without either leaving their Chair or rising, by letting fall their join'd Hands, and afterwards lifting them up to the Head, which they repeat several times till they are out of each other's Sight; but if one of them be of an inferior Rank, he must stop his Chair, or alight, if he is on Horseback, and make a profound Reverence; for which Reason the Inferiors avoid such Rencontres as much as possible.

Of Children to Parents. Nothing is comparable to the Respect which Children have for their Fathers, and Scholars for their Masters, speaking little, and always standing in their Presence; their Custom is, especially at the beginning of the Year, their Birth-Days, and on several other Occasions, to salute them on their Knees, knocking their Foreheads several times against the Ground.

Most humble Terms used in Conversation. When the Chinese converse together, they express themselves in the most humble and respectful manner; and unless they are talking familiarly to intimate Friends, or Persons of an inferior Rank, they never speak in the first or second Person: for to say I and You, would be a gross Incivility; wherefore instead of I am very sensible of the Service that you have done me, they will say, The Service which the Lord, or the Doctor, has done for his meanest Servant, or his Scholar, has sensibly affected me. In the same manner a Son speaking to his Father, will call himself his Grand-Son, tho' he is the eldest of the Family, and has Children himself.

Chinese have several Names, given on various Occasions. They often make use of their proper Names to testify their great Respect; for it must be observ'd that the Chinese have several Names, suitable to their Age and Rank. The Parents give their Child at his Birth the Name of the Family, which is common to all who are descended from the same Grandfire. About a Month after they give him a Diminutive or Milk-Name, as they term it, being commonly that of a Flower, Animal, or such like thing. When he begins his Studies, he receives from his Master a new Name, which is join'd to the Family-Name, and this he is call'd by at School. Being arriv'd to Man's Estate, he takes among his Friends another Name; and this is it which he retains, and commonly signs at the end of his Letters or other Writings. In a Word, when he attains some considerable Office, he then assumes a Name agreeable to his Rank and Merit, which is the Name that Politeness requires to be used in speaking to him. It would be an Incivility to call him by his Family-Name, unless the Person who did so were of a much superior Rank.

Compliment paid a good Governor at parting. These polite and modest Manners, infused so early into the Chinese, give them the most profound Veneration for their Governors, whom they look upon as their Fathers; but their way of expressing this Veneration seems to us very extraordinary. When the Governor of a City withdraws into another Province, after having acquitted himself in his Office to the public Satisfaction, the People strive to pay him the greatest Honours. For two or three Leagues together at certain Distances they fix Tables, on some of which (set round with long Pieces of Silk, that hang down to the Ground) they burn Perfumes and place Candlesticks, Wax-lights, Meats, Pulse and Fruits; furnishing others with Wine and Tea. As soon as the Mandarin appears, they fall on their Knees, and bow their Heads to the Ground: some weep, or at least pretend to do so; others beseech him to alight to receive the last Testimony of their Gratitude. They then present him with the Wine and other Provisions prepar'd for him, and thus he is continually stopp'd as he advances. But the most pleasant part of all is to see People drawing off his Boots, every now and then, to give him new ones. All the Boots that have touch'd the Mandarin, are held in Veneration by his Friends, who preserve them as precious Relics in their Houses. The first that are drawn off are by way of Gratitude put, in a sort of Cage, over the Gate of the City through which he pass'd.

Way of saluting a Governor on his Birth Day. In the same manner when the Inhabitants of any City would honour their Governor on his Birth-Day, the principal Persons meet and go in a Body to salute him at his Palace. Besides the common Presents, they often take with them a long japan'd Box, adorn'd with Flowers of Gold, and divided into eight or twelve small Cells, which are filled with several sorts of Sweetmeats. When they are come to the Hall, where the Ceremony is to be perform'd, they all stand in a Rank, and make a profound Reverence; then they fall on their Knees, and bow their Heads to the Ground, unless the Governor prevents them, as he commonly does. Oftentimes the most considerable among them takes a Cup of Wine, and lifting it up on high, with both Hands offers it to the Mandarin, and says aloud, by way of wish; Fo-tyü, This is the Wine that brings good Luck; Shew-tyü, This is the Wine that brings long Life. Immediately after another advances, and holding up the Sweet-Meats, presents them very respectfully, saying, This is the Sugar of long Life. Then others repeat the same Ceremonies three times, still uttering the same Wishes.

But when the Mandarin has distinguish'd himself in an extraordinary manner by his Equity, Zeal, and Goodness to the People, and they are desirous of giving a remarkable Testimony of their Gratitude, they have a particular way of letting him know how highly they esteem his happy Government. The Literati cause a Garment to be made, consisting of small Squares of Sattin, of various Colours, as red, blue, green, black, yellow, &c. and on his Birth-Day carry it with great Ceremony, accompanied with Musick. Being arrived in the outward Hall, which serves for a Tribunal, they beseech him to come out of the inner Hall into the public one; and then present this Garment, requesting him to put it on. The Mandarin pretends to make a Difficulty of it, saying, that he is unworthy of such an Honour; but at length giving way to the Intreaties of the Literati, and People who crowd the Court, he suffers them to strip off his upper Garment and cloath him with that which they brought with them. They intend by the various Colours to represent all Nations, who wear different Habits, and to signify that all People consider him as their Father, and that he is worthy to be their Governor; for which Reason these Garments are called Wan-jin-i, that is, The Habits of all Nations. 'Tis true, the Mandarin never wears them except at this Time; but they are carefully kept in the Family, as a Mark of Honour and Distinction. They never fail to acquaint the Viceroy with it, and the News is often carried to the Supreme Courts. P. Contancin happen'd once to be present at this Ceremony, on going to pay his Compliments to a Governor on his Birth-Day.

of that Present.

All Visits to a Governor, or other Person of Distinction, must be made before Dinner; or if the Person has eaten any thing, he ought at least to abstain from Wine: for it would shew want of Respect to a Man of Quality to appear before him with a Countenance which discover'd they had been drinking; and the Mandarin would be offended, if the Visitor smell'd ever so little of Wine. However, when you pay a Visit the same Day you receive one, it may be done after Dinner; for then it is a Sign of your Haste to honour the Person who visit'd you.

'Tis also an indispensable Duty of the Literati, who alone are capable of having a Share of the Government, to pay extraordinary Honours to the ancient Legislators, and most famous Philosophers of the Empire, especially Confucius; who in his Life-time contributed greatly to establish a perfect Form of Government, and left behind him the principal Maxims thereof. All that is to be done on such an Occasion is regulated by the Ceremonial of the Empire.

Honours paid ancient Legislators and Philosophers.

In every City a Palace is erected, which serves for the Assemblies of the Literati, who have given it several Names, as Pwan-king, or the Royal Hall; Ta-shing-tyen, The Hall of Wisdom, or Perfection; Ta-lyo, The Great College, [or School] Qya-lyo, The College of the Empire. On the Walls are hung divers small Boards, gilt and japan'd, inscribed with the Names of those who have distinguish'd themselves in the Sciences, Confucius being at their Head; and all the Learned are oblig'd to honour this Prince of their Philosophers, according to the following Ceremonies:

Hall of Kong.

Those who, after rigorous Examinations, are judg'd fit for the Degree of Syew-tsay, or Bachelors, go to the Threshold of the Ti-lyo-tau, or Mandarin, with black linen Garments, and a common Cap on. As soon as they are admitted into his Presence they bow themselves, fall on their Knees, and then prostrate themselves several times, on the Right and on the Left, in two Lines; till the Mandarin gives Orders for presenting them with the Habits proper for Bachelors, which consist of a Vest, a Surtout, and a silk Cap. Having put them on, they return in order to prostrate themselves again before the Tribunal of the Mandarin. From hence they march very gravely to the Palace of Confucius, where they bow their Heads four times to the Ground before his Name, and before those of the most eminent Philosophers, as they had done before in the Mandarin's House. This first Devoir of the Bachelors is performed in a City of the first Rank, nor can any Person whatsoever be excus'd from doing it, unless he is in Mourning, or dangerously ill. When the Syew-tsay are return'd to their own Country, those of the same District go in a Body to prostrate themselves before the Governor, who expects them; and having received these new Marks of Honour in his Tribunal, he rises, and offers them Wine in Cups, which he first lifts up in the Air. In several Places pieces of red Silk are distributed among them, of which they make a kind of Belt; they also receive two Wands adorned with Flowers of Silver, which they set on each of their Caps like a Caduceus; then they walk with the Governor at their Head to the Palace of Confucius, to finish the Ceremony with the usual Salutation before mention'd. This is as it were, the Seal [or Test] which establishes them, and puts them in Possession of their new Dignity; because then they acknowledge Confucius for their Master, and by that Action profess to follow his Maxims in the Government of the State.

Ceremony of the Bac-chelors saluting him.

Besides this, the Emperors have order'd that the Doctors and Literati should celebrate, as it were in the Name of the Empire, a Festival to that Great Man. Every thing is prepared the Evening before: a Butcher comes and kills a Hog, and the Servants of the Tribunal bring Wine, Fruits, Flowers and Herbs, which they place on a Table, set with Wax-Candles and Perfuming-Pans. On the Morrow, the Governors, Doctors and Bachelors, repair with Drums beating, and Hautboys sounding to the Feast-Hall: where the Master of the Ceremonies, appointed to regulate the whole Affair, commands them sometimes to bend forwards, sometimes to kneel down, sometimes to bow to the very Earth, and sometimes to stand up.

Festival or Sacrifice in honour of
Kong-fu-tse.

When

When the Hour for beginning the Ceremony is come, the chief Mandarin takes successively Meat, Wine, Pulse, and presents them before the Tables of Confucius; the Music playing all the while to Verses sung in Honour of this great Philosopher. They afterwards repeat his Encomium, which is seldom more than eight or ten Lines, in praise of his Knowledge, Wisdom, and good Morals. The Formula is the same throughout all the Cities of the Empire; and these Honours, which are in Effect paid to all the Learned in the Person of Confucius, inspire the Doctors with great Emulation.

Honours paid to illustrious Persons and Citizens.

The Ceremony is concluded with repeated Bows and Reverences at the Sound of Flutes and Hautboys, and with reciprocal Compliments among the Mandarins. Last of all, they bury the Blood and Hair of the Animal that has been offer'd; and burn in Token of Joy a large Piece of Silk, which is fasten'd to the end of a Pike, and hangs to the Earth in manner of a Streamer. They afterwards go into the second Hall, to pay certain Honours to the ancient Governors of Cities and Provinces, who are famous for behaving well in their Employments. Then they pass into a third Hall, where are the Names of Citizens illustrious for their Virtues and Talents, and there perform some farther Ceremonies.

Emperor
Kya-tung's
Address to
Kong-fu-tse.

It is reported, that the Chinese Emperor Kya-tung, before he began his Studies, went to the Palace of Confucius to offer him Presents, and before his Tablet spoke to him in this manner:

"I, the Emperor, come this Day to offer Praises and Presents, as Marks of my Respect for all the ancient Doctors of our Nation, especially for the Prince Cheu-kong and Confucius: I then, who do not surpass in Genius the least of their Disciples, am oblig'd to apply my self to the Works, that is, the Books left us by these great Men, and sage Masters of Antiquity; and to the Collection of their Maxims, according to which Posterity ought to regulate their Manners. For this Reason, being resolv'd to set my self to study them on the Morrow, I will seriously employ the whole Force of my Understanding to read them over and over without ceasing, as the least of the Disciples of these incomparable Doctors; in order to instruct my self thoroughly therein, and to finish happily the Course of my Studies."

2. Their VISITS.

Certain Visits indispen-sible.

ONE Article of the Chinese Politeness is to pay Visits to each other, which on certain Days of the Year, and particular Occasions that happen from time to time, are Obligations; especially on Scholars with respect to their Masters, and Mandarins with regard to those that they depend upon. These Days are the Birth-days, the beginning of the new Year, the Festivals at the Birth of a Son; when one of the Family marries, is raised to some Office, takes a long Journey, or dies, &c. These Visits, which there is no dispensing with on all such Occasions without sufficient Cause, are commonly accompany'd with Presents; consisting often of things of no great Value, which yet may be of Use to the Person they are presented to, and contribute not a little to keep up the Ties of Friendship or Dependance. As for common Visits there is no Time fix'd for them, and tho' they are made between intimate and familiar Friends, without Formality, yet Custom and the Law oblige others to perform a great many Ceremonies, which at first are very irksome to all but the Chinese. When they make a Visit they must begin by delivering to the Porter a Visiting-Billet, called Tye-tse, which consists of a Sheet of red Paper, slightly embellish'd with Flowers of Gold, and folded up like a Screen. On one of the Folds is written their Name, with the Addition of some respectful Terms, according to the Rank of the Person who is visited: They say, for Instance, The tender and sincere Friend of your Lordship, and the perpetual Disciple of your Doctrine, presents himself in this Quality, to pay his Duty, and make his Reverence even to the Earth; which they express by these Words, Tun-shew-pay. When the Person visited is a familiar Friend, or an ordinary Body, common Paper will serve, only if he be in Mourning it ought to be white.

visiting Bil-
lets.

They serve instead of a Visit.

Visits re-ceiv'd or paid by the Qian.

A Mandarin sometimes contents himself with receiving the Tye-tse from the Porter, (which, according to the Chinese manner, is the same as if he received the Visit in Person) and desiring the Visitor, by a Servant, not to be at the Trouble to alight from his Chair: Then on the same Day, or one of the three following, he goes to return the Visit, and present a Tye-tse like that which he receiv'd. If he receives the Visit, and the Visitor is a Person of Distinction, his Chair is permitted to pass thro' the two first Courts of the Tribunal, which are very large, as far as the Entrance of the Hall, where the Mandarin comes to receive him. When you enter into the second Court, you find before the Hall two Domestic, who sometimes hold the Umbrella, and great Fan, belonging to the Mandarin, inclining toward each other, in such a Manner, that you can neither see the Mandarin, who advances to receive you, nor be seen by him: When you have alighted from the Chair, your Domestic withdraws, the great Fan that likewise conceal'd your Person, and then you are at a proper Distance from the Mandarin, to pay your Reverence.

The Ceremonies on those occasions.

At this Instant begin the Formalities, which are set down at length in the Chinese Memorial: where you may find the Number of Bows that you are to make; the Expressions you are to use; the Titles that you are to give; the mutual Genuflections; the several Turns you are to make, sometimes to the right, sometimes to the left; (for the Place of Honour is different in different Places;) the silent Gestures by which the Master of the House invites

vites you to enter, saying nothing but Tsin-tsin; the decent Refusal to enter first, by saying Pü-kan, I dare not; the Salutation that the Master of the House is to make to the Chair you are to sit in, for he must bow respectfully before it, and dust it lightly with the Skirt of his Garment. As soon as you are seated, you are to declare, in a grave and serious manner, the Occasion of your Visit; and you are answered with the same Gravity, and a great many Bows. you are likewise to sit upright in your Chair without leaning 'gainst the Back; to look down a little without turning your Eyes either to one Side or the other, having your Hands stretched out upon your Knees, and your Feet placed exactly even. After a Moment's Conversation, a Servant finely dressed comes in, bringing as many Dishes of Tea as there are Persons; and here again you must be very careful to observe the Forms in taking the Dish, in putting it to your Mouth, and in returning it to the Servant. At length, the Visit being ended, you withdraw, making use of other Ceremonies. The Master of the House conducts you to your Chair, and when you are entred, advances a little, waiting till the Chairmen have taken it up; then being ready to depart, you bid him adieu, and he returns an Answer to your Civility†.

These Ceremonies are observed with the greatest Strictness. When a King-chay, or Envoy from the Court, pays a Visit to the chief Mandarins of the Cities thro' which he passes, at setting out, about thirty Persons go before his Chair, marching two in a Rank; some with Copper-Basons in their Hands, which they beat at times like a Drum. Some carry Colours, and others small japan'd Boards, whereon are written in large Characters of Gold, King-chay-ta-jin, that is, The Lord, the Envoy from the Court. Some bear Whips in their Hands, others Chains. Many carry on their Shoulders certain Instruments, painted with variety of Figures, and gilt; some in the Form of huge Crosses, with Dragons Heads at the Top, and others like Vergers Staves. Among the rest there are some with high Caps of red Felt, in Form of a Cylinder, from which hang down two large golden Feathers, who are hired only to cry in the Streets, and bid the People clear the Way. At the Head of this Cavalcade is a Porter, or inferior Officer of the Tribunal, who carries in a large Letter-Case the Tye-tse, or Visiting-Billets, prepared for all the Mandarins and other Persons of Distinction whom he designs to visit. On each Side of the Chair walk two or four of the King-chay's Domestics finely dress'd, and several others close the March; for all the rest are occasionally hired to attend on him, while he stays in the City: besides, there are fifteen who never stir from House; six wait at the Door with Hautboys, Fifes and Drums, as if they were hired to deafen the Neighbourhood with the Noise of their Instruments, striking up every time any Person of Distinction enters or comes out of the House; the rest are employ'd within Doors.

The Manner wherein the Mandarins are to receive an Envoy from the Court, is likewise accompany'd with Ceremonies, which they dare not omit. The Reader may form a just Notion of them, from the Reception given to P. Bouvet, at Nan-chang-fü. [See p. 59.] when he was sent, in this Quality by the Emperor, into Europe. He was accompanied by a chief Mandarin, named Tong-Lau-ya; and had made his Journey, partly on Horseback and partly in a Chair, as far as that City, where he was to embark. On their Arrival they found one of those large Barks representing a middle-rate Man of War, all painted and gilded, which was prepared for their Voyage. Before they went on Board, the Under-Secretaries of the Viceroy and great Mandarins, who had been sent to meet them, according to Custom, presented the Tye-tse, or Billets of Compliment, on Behalf of their Masters: who on their crossing the River, appeared on the Bank ready to receive them; and having invited them to Land, conducted them into a Kong-quan, or great Palace, on the River-Side. When they were come into the middle of the second Court, the Viceroy and all the Mandarins that accompany'd him fell on their Knees, over-against the Great Hall, at the bottom of the Stair-Case, and enquir'd after the Emperor's Health; of which being inform'd by Tong-lau-ya, he and the Mandarins rose up. Then the Envoy entering the Hall (where two ranks of Chairs were prepared for the Company, who sat in the same Order as they enter'd) they were presented Tea after the Tartarian and Chinese Manner, which was drank in Form; that is to say, every one holding in his right Hand a Dish of Tartarian Tea, made a low Bow to the Viceroy who gave the Treat, both before and after they had drank. As for the Chinese Tea, the Custom is to take the Dish in both Hands, and making a low Bow to touch the Ground therewith: Then they drink it at several Sips, holding the Dish in their Left-hand. After this first Regale, the Viceroy and the General, rising up with the rest of the Company, presented the Envoy with Tye-tse, or Billets of the Presents (A), they were obliged to make them of Provisions to put into their Barks, and then invited them to sit at Table. The Dinner was prepared at the Bottom of the Hall, where there were two Rows of Tables, over-against each other; the Feast was partly after the Tartar and partly after the Chinese Fashion, so that a great Part of the troublesome Ceremonies observed at the Chinese Entertainments were dispensed with. The Feast being over, the Envoys re-imbarked, and in a little time the chief Mandarins sent them Visiting-Billets, and came presently in Person one after another. The Chü-fü, or Governor of the City, accompany'd by the two Chy-byen, or Presidents of the two Inferior Tribunals, followed the Example of the chief Mandarins; and their Visits were attended with as many Tye-tse, or Billets of Presents, which they were to make of Provisions and Refreshments.

(†) This sort of Ceremonious Visits, relates to Persons of equal Distinction, as that of one Mandarin to another, nearly of the same Order.

(A) Tye-tse seems to be a general Term for Billets, or Letters of any kind.

Presents of a Vice-Roy.

In their Passage by Water, instead of Tables covered with Viſtuals, which the Mandarins of the Places keep in Readineſs to regale the King-chay, the Cuſtom is to ſend the ſame ſort of Proviſions on board the Bark that accompanies him. One may judge of the Nature of theſe Presents by that of the Viceroy, the Liſt of which follows: viz. two Meaſures or Buſhels of fine white Rice, two Meaſures of Meal; one Hog, two Geefe, four Fowls, four Ducks, two Bundles of Sea-Herbs, two Bundles of Stags Pizzles, which when pick'd and dry'd are deem'd in China exquiſite Eating; two Bundles of the Entrails of a certain Sea-Fiſh, two Bundles of dry'd Me-yu, or Ink-Fiſh, and two Jars of Wine. The Presents of the other Mandarins were much of the ſame ſort. As it is cuſtomary in all the Cities that you paſs thro', to receive this kind of Presents from the Mandarins, there is no occaſion to make any other Proviſion on board the Barks, becauſe there is enough and to ſpare for the Envoy and all his Attendants. When a Preſent is made, beſides the Tye-tſé, or Viſiting-Billet, they add a Li-tán; which is a piece of red Paper like the Tye-tſé, whereon is written the Name of him who offers it, and a Liſt of Particulars.

Li-tán or Bill of Parcels.

Cuſtomary to ſend back Presents or receive only Part.

When he who makes the Preſent comes in Perſon, after the common Civilities, he offers you the Billet, which you take from him, and give to one of your Servants to keep, making a low Bow by way of Acknowledgement. The Viſit being over, you read the Billet, and take what you think proper: if you accept of every thing ſet down in the Liſt, you keep the Billet, and ſending another immediately to return Thanks, acquaint him that you accept of the Whole: If you detain but Part, you mention the Particulars in the Billet of Thanks; and in caſe you keep nothing at all, you ſend back the Billet and the Preſent, with a Billet of Thanks; upon which you write Pi-ſyé, that is, Theſe are precious Pearls, I dare not touch them.

doing it.

If the Perſon thinks fit to ſend the Preſent by his Servants only, or if he ſends the things with the Billet, then you obſerve the ſame Ceremonies as when he offers it in Perſon: but if he ſends you the Billet before the things are bought, intending to buy thoſe you pitch on, you take a Pencil, and make Circles on the things you accept of, which are immediately bought and ſent to you. Then you write a Billet of Thanks, and mention what you have received, adding Tu-pi, that is, The reſt are precious Pearls. But when there is any Wine, the Servants never fail to caſe themſelves of ſome part of the Weight, without its being perceiv'd till the Pots or Jars come to be open'd. On ſeveral Occaſions, when you accept of a Preſent, Complaiſance requires you ſhould ſend another in return; this is principally put in Practice, in the Beginning of the Year, in the fifth Moon, &c. When the Preſent comes from a Perſon conſiderable, either by Birth or Office, the Receiver makes a low Bow before it.

Formality in writing and ſending of Letters.

Even the Letters that are written by private Perſons are ſubject to a great number of Formalities, which often puzzle the Literati themſelves. If you write to a Perſon of Diſtinction you are obliged to uſe white Paper, with ten or twelve folds like a Screen; they are to be brought, with little Bags and ſlips of red Paper, which go along with the Letter. You begin to write on the ſecond Folding, and put your Name at the End. A great deal of pains muſt be taken about the Stile, which ought to be different from that uſed in common Converſation; Regard muſt alſo be had to the Character, for the ſmaller the Size the more reſpectful; there are proper Diſtances to be kept between the Lines, and Titles to be made Uſe of according to the Rank and Quality of the Perſons. The Seal, if any be uſed, is put in two Places, that is, over the Name of the Perſon who writes, and over the firſt Words of the Letter, but they are uſually contented with putting it on the little Bag which encloſes it. If the Writer is in Mourning, he puts a ſlip of blue Paper over his own Name. The Letter when written, is put in a little Paper-Bag, on the middle of which they paſte a ſlip of red Paper, the length of the Letter, and two Fingers broad, and write thereon Nwi-ban, that is, The Letter is within. They then put it in a ſecond Bag, of thicker Paper than the former, with a Band of red Paper, as before, on which they put, in large Characters, the Name and Quality of the Perſon to whom it is addreſſed; and on the ſide, in ſmaller Characters, the Province, City, and Place of his Abode. The Openings at top and bottom of this ſecond Letter are paſted together very neatly, and the Seal impreſſed on both with theſe Words, Hu-fong, that is, Guarded and Sealed; alſo between both from top to bottom, they write the Year and Day, on which the Letter is delivered. When the Mandarins ſend any Diſpatches to Court that require more than ordinary Expedition, they faſten a Feather to the Packet, and then the Courier is obliged to travel Night and Day without ſtopping.

3. Their Feaſts and Entertainments.

Chinese Feaſts

THE Chinese, as well as other Nations, often invite one another to Feaſts, wherein they make mutual profeſſions of Eſteem and Friendſhip; but it is chiefly in theſe Feaſts that Politeneſs, natural to the Chinese, is troubleſome to Europeans, for the whole is made up of Ceremonies and Compliments. Their Feaſts are of two Sorts: the ordinary, conſiſting of about twelve or ſixteen Diſhes; and the more ſolemn, which require twenty four upon each Table, as well as more Formalities. When all Ceremonies are punctually obſerved, the Feaſt is preceded by three Tye-tſé, or Billets, ſent to thoſe who are invited: the firſt Invitation is made the Day or two Days before, but this laſt is rare; the ſecond in the Morning Morning of the Feast-Day, to put the Guests in mind, and intreat them not to fail coming; and the third, when every thing is ready, and the Master of the House is disposed, by a third Billet, carried by one of his Servants, to let them know he is extremely impatient to see them.

The Hall, wherein the Feast is serv'd up, is commonly adorned with Flower-Pots, Pictures, China-Ware, and such like Ornaments. There are as many Tables as there are Persons invited; unless the Number of Guests obliges them to sit two at a Table, for they rarely put three, at these great Feasts. These Tables are ranged in a Row on each Side the Hall, in such a manner that the Guests face each other as they sit in their Arm-Chairs. The fore-part of the Tables are set off with silk Ornaments of Needle-Work, resembling those belonging to our Altars; and tho' there are neither Table-Cloaths nor Napkins, the curious jappanning makes them look very neat. The Ends of each Table are often covered with several great Dishes, loaded with Meats ready carved, and piled up like a Pyramid, with Flowers and large Citrons on the Top; But these Pyramids are never touched, being only for Ornament, like the Figures made of Sugar at Feasts in Italy.

The Feast Hall how set out.

When he who gives the Entertainment introduces his Guests into the Room, he salutes them all, one after another; and then calling for Wine in a little Cup, either of Silver, precious Wood, or Porcelaine, placed on a little japan'd Salver, he takes it with both Hands, and bowing to all the Guests, turns towards the great Court of the House, and advances to the Forepart of the Hall; when lifting up his Eyes and Hands, together with the Cup, towards Heaven, he straitway pours the Wine on the Ground, by way of acknowledging that whatever he is possessed of is the Gift of Heaven. He then causes Wine to be poured into a China or Silver Cup, and after making a Bow to his principal Guest, places it on the Table, where he is to sit. The Guest returns this Civility by endeavouring to hinder him from taking the Trouble, and at the same time causing Wine to be brought in a Cup, advances a few Steps; as tho' he would carry it to the Place of the Master of the Feast, which is always the lowest, and who in his Turn prevents him with certain common Terms of Civility. Immediately after the Steward brings two small Ivory Sticks, adorned with Gold or Silver, which serve instead of Forks, and places them on the Table, in a parallel Position, before the Chair, if there were not any placed before, as there usually are. This done, he leads the chief Guest to his Chair, which is covered with a rich Carpet of flower'd Silk, and then making another low Bow (c), invites him to sit: But the Guest does not comply, till after a great many Compliments, excusing himself from taking so honourable a Place. The Steward next prepares to do the same to all the rest, but they will by no means suffer him to take so much Trouble. It is observable that, according to the ancient Custom of China, the first Place is given to Strangers, preferable to others; and amongst Strangers, either to those who come farthest off, or are most advanced in Years, unless some other Person of a considerable Distinction be in Company.

Compliments before sitting down to Table.

All these Ceremonies being over, they sit down to the Table; at which instant four or five Principal Comedians in rich Dresses enter the Hall, and making low Bows all together, knock their Foreheads four times against the Ground. This they perform in the midst of the two Rows of Tables, with their Faces towards a long Table, set out like a Buffet, full of Lights and Perfuming-Pans. Then rising up, one of them presents the principal Guest with a Book, like a long Pocket-Book, containing, in Letters of Gold, the Names of fifty or sixty Plays, which they have by heart, and are ready to act on the Spot. The chief Guest refuses to choose one, and sends it to the second with a Sign of Invitation; the second to the third, &c. but they all make Excuses, and return him the Book; at last, he consents, opens the Book, runs it over with his Eyes in an Instant, and pitches on the Play which he thinks will be most agreeable to the Company. If there be any thing in it not fit to be acted, the Player ought to apprise him of it; for instance, if one of the principal Persons in the Play had the same Name with one of the Auditors: after which the Comedian shews the Title of the Play that is chosen to all the Guests, who testify their Approbation by a Nod.

Comedians acted during the Feast.

The Representation begins with the Music peculiar to that Nation: which are, Basons of Brass or Steel, whose Sound is harsh and shrill; Drums of Buffalo-skins, Flutes, Fifes, and Trumpets, whose Harmony can charm none but Chinese. There are no Decorations for these Plays, which are acted during the Feast; they only spread a Carpet on the Floor, and the Comedians make use of some Rooms near the Balcony, from whence they enter to act their Parts. Besides the Guests, there are commonly a great number of other Spectators, who, led by Curiosity, and known to the Servants, are let into the Court, from whence they can see the Play. The Ladies, who are willing to be present, are placed out of the Hall over against the Comedians, where, through a Lattice made of Bambú, and a sort of Silken-Net, they see and hear all that passes without being seen themselves. The counterfeit Murders, Tears, Sighs, and sometimes Shrieks of these Players will inform an European, tho' ignorant of the Language, that their Plays are full of Tragical Events.

Nature of their Plays.

(c) There is no Mention here of a Steward bowing before, and indeed all thro' this Account of the Feast, the Maitre d'Hotel, or Steward, seems to be confounded with the Maitre de Festin, Maitre de Maison, or Maitre de Logis, the Master of the Feast, or Master of the House, that is, the Person of Quality who gives the Entertainment; this appears also from P. Etour's Account of a Feast, which comes afterwards.

Order of the Feast.

As the Feast always begins with drinking unmixed Wine, the Steward, on one Knee, says to all the Guests with a loud Voice, Tjing Lau-ya, men kyu poy, that is, You are invited, Gentlemen, to take the Cup. On this every one takes his Cup in both Hands, and having first moved it up to his Head, and then down below the Table, they all put it to their Mouths at once, and drink slowly three or four times, the Steward all the while pressing them to drink it up, after his example; turning the Cup upside down to shew that it is quite empty, and that each of them ought to do the same. Wine is served two or three times, and while they are drinking, on the middle of each Table is set a China-Dish full of Meat ragou'd, so that they have no Occasion for Knives; then the Steward invites them to eat, in the same Manner as he did to drink, and immediately every one takes some of the Ragou very dexterously. Twenty, or twenty four of these Dishes, are served up [on each Table] with the same Ceremony every time one is brought in, which obliges them to drink as often; but then they may do it as sparingly as they please, besides the Cups are very small. The Dishes are never taken away as they are done with, but continue on the Table till the Repast is over. Between every six or eight Dishes they bring in Soup, made either of Flesh or Fish, with a sort of small Loaves or Pies, which they take with their Chopsticks, to dip into the Soup, and eat without any Ceremony: Hitherto nothing is eaten but Flesh. At the same time they serve up Tea, which is one of their most common Drinks, and taken hot as well as the Wine, the Chinese never using to drink any thing cold; for this Reason there are always Servants ready to pour hot Wine into their Cups out of Vessels for the purpose, and to put back that which is cold into others of China. When the Guests have quitted their Sticks, and done eating, they bring in Wine, and another Dish; and then the Master of the House invites them again to eat or drink, which is repeated every time a fresh Dish is served up. In serving up Victuals the Waiters order it so, that the twentieth or twenty fourth Dish is placed on [each] Table, just in the time, when the Comedy is to break off. Afterwards Wine, Rice, and Tea, is presented. Then rising from the Table, the Guests walk to the lower end of the Hall, to pay their Compliments to the Master of the Feast; who conducts them into the Garden, or another Hall, to chat and rest a little before the Fruit is brought in.

Ceremony of serving the Desert.

In the mean time the Comedians take their Repast; and the Domestic are employed, some in carrying warm Water for the Guests to wash their Hands and Faces, if they think fit; others to take the Things off the Tables, and prepare the Desert; which likewise consists of twenty or twenty four Dishes of Sweetmeats, Fruits, Jellies, Hams, salted Ducks dried in the Sun which are delicious eating, and small Dainties made of Things which come from the Sea. When every Thing is ready, a Servant approaches his Master, and with one Knee on the Ground in a low Voice acquaints him with it, who as soon as every one is silent, rises up, and very complaisantly invites his Guests to return to the Feast-Hall; where being come, they gather at the lower end, and after some Ceremonies about the Places, take those they had before. Now bigger Cups are brought, and they press you mightily to drink large Draughts; the Play also is continued, or else sometimes to divert themselves more agreeably, they call for the Book of Farces, and each chuses one, which he acts very neatly. There is at this Service, as well as the former, five great Dishes for State on the Sides of the Table; and while it lasts the Servants belonging to the Guests go to Dinner in one of the neighbouring Rooms, where they are very well entertain'd, but without any Ceremony.

Money gathered at the Desert for Servants.

At the Beginning of this second Service, every Guest causes one of his Servants to bring, on a Sort of Salver, several little Bags of red Paper, containing Money for the Cook, the Stewards (D), the Comedians, and those who served at the Table. They give more or less according to the Quality of the Person who made the Treat, but never any thing unless there is a Play. Every Domestic carries his Salver to their Master, who after some Difficulty consents, and makes a Sign to one of them, to take, in order to distribute, it. These Feasts, which last about four or five Hours, always begin in the Night, or when it grows duskish, and do not end till Midnight; the Guests separating with the Ceremonies used in Visits, already described. The Servants, who wait on their Masters, walk before the Chairs, carrying great Lanthorns of Oil'd Paper, whereon their Quality, and sometimes their Names, are written in large Characters. The next Morning each of them sends a Tye-tse, or Billet, to thank him who had entertained them so handsomely.

Account of a Feast by P.
Bouvet.

Palace described.

P. Bouvet was at one of these Feasts at Kan-ton, when he was sent by the Emperor into Europe. He was invited, along with Tong-Lau-ya, [already mentioned, p. 297.] and two other Missionaries, by the Tsong-tu of the Province; and as the usual Residence of that Mandarin was at Chau-king, he borrowed the Palace of the Tsyang-kyun for the Entertainment. Now, tho' the Ceremonies are nearly the same with those already related, yet the Description Bouvet gives of that Feast, in a Letter sent just after into Europe, deserves the Reader's Notice, on account of the Singularities which it contains. The Place where the Feast was made is a vast Edifice at the Bottom of two great square Courts, composed of three large Halls, one behind the other, in such a manner, that the middle communicates with

(n) Orig. Maitre d'Hotel. This Circumstance proves what is observed in the former Note, for it is not to be supposed Money is gathered for the Master of the Feast, or House, as well as his Servants; neither can we suppose two Masters of the House, as there may be Stewards, tho' we hear but of one before.

with the other two, by means of two long and wide Galleries, which have each their Courts on both sides. The Hall in the Middle, where the Feast was made, which is the largest and finest of the three, was remarkable for the Length, and extraordinary Thickness of the Pillars, Beams, and all the Wood-work in general. The Guests were received at their Arrival, in the first Hall, the Tsong-tu being at the trouble to go and meet the Principal as far as the Stair-Cafe to do them Honour: They also advanced a few Steps to meet the rest as they arrived; who, to return the Civility, having first saluted the Master of the Feast in particular, and the Company in general, afterwards went and saluted each in particular, according both to the Tartarian and Chinese Manner, and received from them a like number of Bows, with a surprizing Politeness. These Ceremonies being over, they took their Places in the Elbow-Chairs ranged in two parallel Lines, over against each other, waiting for the rest of the Guests; during which time Tea was served up, in the Tartarian and Chinese Fashions.

Manner of receiving the Guests.

Among those who were at this Feast, besides Tong Lau-ya, who conducted me, says P. Bouvet, and two other Missionaries who accompany'd me, all the General Officers of the Province were invited, viz. First, the Vice-Roy, the Tsyang-kyun, the two Tu-tong and the Yen-yuen (A), who were the most considerable Persons. Secondly, the Chief Mandarins of the Customs, who, as they are changed every Year, bear the title of King-chay, or, Envoys of the Court; for which reason the following Mandarins give Place to him. Thirdly, the Pu-ching-tse, or Treasurer-general, the Ngan-cha-tse, and the Tau: who tho' General-Officers and very considerable, yet being inferior in Rank to the former, sat in a different Line from them, that is, their Chairs were placed a little more behind; which Distinction was observed also at Table.

Chief Personages at the Feast.

When all the Guests were come, they went out of the first Hall into the second, where were two Rows of Tables over against each other, according to the Number of the Guests. On this Occasion, as well as on that of sitting down at the Table, many Bows were made after the Chinese manner; which done, the Tsong-tu, and the chief Mandarins following his Example, did the King-chay the Honour to invite them to sit at the uppermost Tables. Afterwards, agreeably to what is practised in the Feasts made after the Chinese Fashion, he took a full Cup of Wine, on a Salver, with both Hands, and addressing himself to me, stepp'd forward to place it on my Table, with a pair of Quay-tse, or little Sticks used instead of Forks (B); but I went to meet, and hinder him from taking that Trouble. Then offering to do the same Honour to the rest of the Guests, they excused themselves in the same Manner, after which every one sat down at the Table designed for him. These Tables were all of the same Make, being square and japanned, to the Number of sixteen or eighteen, there having been so many Guests. There were two Rows of them opposite to each other, disposed in such a manner that the upper Tables, where the Persons of chief Distinction sat, were placed a little more forward than the lower Tables. They were all adorned before with Violet-coloured Sattin, imbroider'd with Golden Dragons with four Claws; and the Chairs, whose Arms and Back formed a kind of Semicircle in an oblique Position, were covered with the same sort of Furniture. As this Feast was interrupted, and divided, as it were, into two, that in the Morning was conducted without much Formality, but that in the Evening was accompany'd with all the Chinese Ceremonies; for which Reason, to give the Reader a just notion of them, I shall describe the latter.

Ceremonies on sitting down to Table.

Manner of ranging the Tables.

When the Guests went to the Entertainment in the Evening they found all their Tables double, that is to say, there was a second Table placed before each, set with a Banquet for State-sake, consisting of sixteen Pyramids of Flesh, other sorts of Meat and Fruit, &c. each Pyramid being a Foot and a half high, all adorned with Painting and Flowers. I call it a Banquet for State, because such Tables are set merely for Show, and to entertain the Eyes of the Company; who were no sooner sat down, but they were all taken away, and at the end of the Feast distributed to the Servants belonging to the Guests, or rather to the Chairmen and Under-Servants of the Tribunal. The other Table had upon the Forepart a small Pedestal [or Stand] on which were a little Brass Perfuming-Pan, a Box of Perfumes, a Vial of odoriferous Water, a Tube or Horn made of Agate, containing small Instruments, fit to put the Incense into the Perfuming-Pan, and to stir the Ashes. At each of the two Fore-corners of the Table was placed a small japan'd Board, named Wey, adorned on one Side with an Emblem, and on the other with some little Pieces of Poetry: The other Corners of the Table were furnished with three small China Plates, full of Herbs, Pulse, and Pickles, to procure an Appetite, between which there was a little Silver Cup on a Salver.

The Evening Entertainment.

As these Feasts are usually accompany'd with a Play, the Moment it began the Comedians, ready dressed, came in to act their Parts; when the Head of the Company, advancing to the upper Part of the Hall, presented me the Book, which contained a Catalogue of all his Plays, and desired me to mark that which I had a Mind should be acted: for they have commonly fifty or sixty by heart, any of which they are able to perform off hand. As I was an entire Stranger to this kind of Ceremony, and knew but little of their Language, I was afraid there might be something in the Chinese Plays, not fit for a Christian to hear; for which reason I acquainted Tong Lau-ya our Conductor, that Plays were not a Diversion agreeable to Persons of our Profession. Whereupon the Tsong-tu and the other Mandarins had the Complaisance to deny themselves of this this Amusement, (tho' innocent enough, as I understood afterwards) and contented themselves, with a Concert of variety of Musical Instruments, which, playing methodically and all together by Intervals, regulated the Time of each Course. During the Feast, all the Motions and Words, as well of the Servants as the rest of the Company, were so very formal and affected, that were it not for the Gravity of the Company, an European at first Sight wou'd be apter to take it for a Play than a Feast, and have much ado to refrain from laughing.

The Play proposed but laid aside.

Order of the Feast.

The Feast was, as it were, divided into several Scenes or Courses, each being open'd by a Piece of Music. The Preludes to the Feasts, were two small Cups of Wine, one after the other, containing about a Spoonful each, which two Masters of the Ceremony invited us to drink, in behalf of the Tsong-tu: They kneeled down in the Middle of the Hall, saying very gravely with a loud Voice, Ta Lau-ya Tsing-tsyu, that is, My Lord invites you to drink; and after every one had drank part of his Cup, he cry'd a second time Tsing-chau-kan, Drink it all, nay, even to the last Drop. This Ceremony is repeated during the time of the Feast, not only when there is an Occasion to drink, but as often as a fresh Dish is plac'd on the Table, or touch'd by the Guests. As soon as a fresh Dish is plac'd, the two Masters of the Ceremony kneeling down invite every one to take their Quay-tse, or Chop-sticks, and taste the Victuals newly serv'd up; the Tsong-tu at the same time inviting them, they obey. The principal Dishes of the Feast consist of Ragous, Meats hash'd, or boil'd, (with divers sort of Herbs or Pulse,) and serv'd up with the Broth, in fine China Vessels almost as deep as wide.

The principal Meats.

Number and Order of the Dishes,

They place on each Table twenty such Dishes, all of the same Size and Shape: those who serve them up, receive them at the lower end of the Hall, where as many Servants belonging to the Kitchen as there are Tables bring them, one by one upon japan'd Salvers, and present them on their Knees. The Domesticks who received them, before they brought them to the Table, rang'd them four and four in a Row; so that at the end of the Entertainment all the Dishes which remain'd on the Table form'd a kind of Square.

and Courses.

At the end of every Act of this Comic Feast, that is, at every fourth Dish which appear'd on the Table, in order to distinguish the Courses, they serv'd up a particular kind of Broth, and a Plate of Mazarine Tarts, but of a different Taste: At length, the whole was concluded with a Dish of Tea.

Money givther'd for the Servants.

It was necessary to taste every thing, and observe the same Ceremony, which seem'd to me very troublesome, for it was the first time I had been at a Feast of this kind, though I had been often invited; but I always made such Excuses as satisfy'd those who had done me that Honour. When there is a Play it is customary at the end of the Repast, as I already observ'd, for the Guests to make a small Present to the Domesticks in waiting. A Servant belonging to each of them brings in his Hand four or five small Bags of Red Paper with a little Money in every one; and by his Master's Order lays them on a Table that is sometimes plac'd at the lower end of the Hall, in the sight of all the Company; while the Master, [of the Feast] by divers Signs, seems to accept of this Gratification for his People with a great deal of Reluctance. At length the Ceremony of the Feast concludes with a great many mutual Professions of Thanks; and after a quarter of an Hour's Conversation, every one withdraws. The next Morning, according to Custom, I sent the Tsong-tu a Billet of Thanks for the Honours he had done me the Day before. Such are the Ceremonies which the Chinese Politeness requires, and are almost constantly observ'd at their solemn Feasts. However, the Tartars, who do not like Restraint, have retrench'd a great Part thereof; and tho' their Meat and Fish are cut in small Pieces, their Cooks have such an Art of seasoning them, that they are very palatable.

Chinese
mended.

Their Cooks prefer'd to the French.

Their Broths are exceeding good, and to make them they use the Fat of Hogs, which in China are very excellent, or else the Gravy of different Animals, such as Pork, Fowls, Ducks, &c. and even in dressing their Hashes or minced Meat, they boil it up in this Gravy.

In every Season of the Year they have several sorts of Herbs (as well as Pulse) not known in Europe, of whose Seed they make an Oil, which is much us'd in Sauces. The French Cooks, who have refin'd so much in every thing which concerns the Palate, would be surpris'd to find that the Chinese can outdo them far in this Branch of their Business, and at a great deal less Expence. They will hardly be persuaded to believe that, with nothing but the Beans that grow in their Country, particularly those of the Province of Szun-tong, and with Meal made of Rice and Corn, they can prepare a great many Dishes quite different from each other, both to the Sight and Taste. They vary their Ragous by putting in several sorts of Spices and strong Herbs.

Their most delicious Dishes, Stag-Pizzles, and Birds-Nests.

The most delicious Food of all, and most used at the Feasts of Great Men, are Staggs-Pizzles, and Birds-Nests, which they carefully prepare. To preserve the Pizzles, they dry them in the Sun in the Summer, and roll them in Pepper and Nutmeg. Before they are dress'd, they are soak'd in Rice-Water, to make them soft; and after being boil'd in the Gravy of a Kid, are season'd with several sorts of Spices.

As for the Nests they are found on the sides of the Rocks, all along the Coasts of Tong-king, Java, Kochin-China, &c. where they are built by Birds, which, as to their Plumage, resemble Swallows, and are supposed to make them with the little Fishes they catch in the Sea. However that be, this is certain, that the Birds themselves distill a viscous Juice from their Beaks, which serves them instead of Gum to fasten their Nests to the Rock. They have also been observ'd to take the Froth that floats on the Sea, wherewith they cement the Parts of

of their Nests together, in the same manner as Swallows make use of Mud. This Matter being dry'd becomes solid, transparent, and of a Colour sometimes inclining a little to green, but while fresh it is always white. As soon as the young ones have quitted their Nests, the People of the Place are very eager to get them down, and sometimes load whole Barks with them. They resemble the Rind of a large candy'd Citron, in Shape as well as Size, and mix'd with other Meats give them a good Relish.

Tho' there is Corn every where in China, and great Plenty in some Provinces, yet they generally live upon Rice, especially in the Southern Parts. They even make small Loaves of it, which in less than fifteen Minutes are prepar'd in Balneo Mariae, and eat very soft; the Europeans bake them a little at the Fire, and they are very light and delicious. Also in the Province of Sban-tong, they make a kind of a thin Wheaten Cake, which does not taste amiss, especially when mix'd with certain Herbs for creating an Appetite. To grind their Corn, they make use of a very simple kind of a Mill, consisting of a round Stone Table, plac'd horizontally like a Mill-Stone, whereon they roul circularly a Stone Cylinder, which by its Weight bruises the Corn. Rice Bread.
Corn-Mills.

Tho' Tea, as I have said, is their most usual Drink, yet they often drink Wine, made of a particular kind of Rice, different from that which is eaten: There is a great Vent for it among the People. There are different Sorts, and various ways of making it; the following is one: They let the Rice soak in Water with some other Ingredients which they throw in, for twenty or thirty Days; afterwards boiling it till it is dissolv'd, it immediately ferments, and is cover'd with a light Froth like that of our new Wines. Under this Froth is very pure Wine; and having drawn off the Clear into earthen Vessels well glaz'd, of the Lees which remain they make a kind of Brandy, as strong as the European, nay, it is sometimes stronger, and will sooner take Fire. The Mandarins make use of Wine at their Tables that comes from certain Cities, where it is reckon'd very delicious: that of Vu-fi-byen [in Kyang-nan] is in great Esteem, owing its Excellence to the Goodness of the Water found there; but that brought from Sbau-bing is in greater Request, as being more wholesome. Both these Wines are sent all over China, and even to Pe-king itself. Rice-Wine.

Places most famous for it.

They have a kind of Spirit or distill'd Water, said to be drawn from the Flesh of Mutton, which the Emperor Kang-bi drank sometimes; but few make use of it besides the Tartars, as it has a disagreeable Taste, and gets soon into the Head, being affirm'd to be very strong. They have another very extraordinary sort of Wine, which is made in the Province of Sben-fi, and call'd Kau-yang-tsyew, or Lambs Wine. It is very strong, and has a disagreeable Smell; but among the Chinese, or rather the Tartars, it passes for exquisite Wine. None of it is carry'd into other Countries, but it is all consumed at home. Mutton Brandy and Lambs-Wine.

4. Their MARRIAGES.

WE now come to their Marriages: The Laws regarding which, establish'd by the Chinese Policy, and particularly set down in the Ceremonial of the Empire, are regulated, First, By the Grand Principle, which is as it were the Basis of their Political Government; I mean the Veneration and Submission of Children which continues even after the Death of their Parents, to whom they pay the same Duties as if they were living. Secondly, By the absolute Authority that Fathers have over their Children; for it is a Maxim of their Philosophy, that Kings ought to have in the Empire all the Tendernefs of Fathers, and Fathers in their Families ought to have all the Authority of Kings. It is in Consequence of these Maxims, that a Father lives in some sort of Dishonour, and is not easy in his Mind, if he does not marry off all his Children; that a Son is wanting in the principal Duty of a Son, if he does not leave Posterity to perpetuate his Family; that an elder Brother, tho' he inherit nothing from his Father, must bring up the younger and marry them: because if the Family become extinct thro' their Fault, their Ancestors will be deprived of the Honours and Duties they are intitled to from their Descendants; and because in the Absence of the Father the eldest Son ought to be a Father to the rest. Marriage an indispensible Duty among the Chinese.

In like manner the Inclinations of the Children are never consulted in Matrimony, the Choice of a Wife belonging to the Father or the nearest Relation of him that is to be marry'd; who makes the Match either with the Father, or Relations of the Maiden, paying a certain Sum to them (for in China the Daughters have no Fortunes) which is laid out in new Cloaths and other things for the Bride, who carries them with her on the Day of her Nuptials. This is the common Practice, especially among Persons of mean Rank; for the Grandeefs, the Mandarins, the Literati, and all rich People in general, expend much more than the Presents they receive amount to. For the same Reason a Chinese, who is in mean Circumstances, often goes to the Hospital of Foundlings, and demands a Girl, in order to bring her up, that she may be a Wife for his Son: Wherein he has three Advantages; he saves the Money that he must otherwise have given to purchase one; the Maid is educated as one of the Family; and is accusom'd by that means to have greater respect for the Mother-in-Law: there is Reason also to believe, that a Wife thus taken from the Hospital will prove more submissive to her Husband. It is very rare that any thing passes contrary to Decency, before the Nuptials, for the Mother, who never is from home, has always her Daughter-in-Law under her Eye; besides, the Modesty which prevails among the Sex in this Country, would alone be sufficient Security against any such Disorder. All Marriages made by the Parents.
The Daughters have no Portions.

It

Strong Desire of the Chinese to leave Posterity.

They adopt Children.

It is said that sometimes the Rich, who have no Children, pretend that their Wife is with Child, and go privately in the Night-time and fetch one from the Hospital, who passes for their own Son. These Children, being supposed legitimate, pursue their Studies, and obtain their Degrees of Batchelor and Doctor, a Privilege which is deny'd the Children taken publicly from the Hospital. It is observable that, with the same View of leaving Posterity, the Chinese, who have no Male-Issue, adopt a Son of their Brother, or some of their Relation. They may also adopt a Son of a Stranger, and sometimes give Money to the Relations; but, generally speaking, these Adoptions require much Solicitation, and often the Credit of their Friends is employ'd to bring them about.

Marry many Wives.

The adopted Child is intitled to all the Privileges of a real Son; he assumes the Name of the Person who adopts him, goes in Mourning for him after his Death, and becomes his Heir. And if it happen afterwards that the Father has Children of his own, the Son by Adoption shares the Inheritance equally with the rest, unless the Father does something more for his own Son. It is also with the same View of preventing the want of Posterity, that the Chinese are permitted by the Laws to take Concubines besides their Lawful Wives. The Name of Concubine, or rather of Second Spouse, is not at all reproachful in China, these sort of Wives being inferior and subordinate to the first; but that which gave Occasion to this Law, is not always the Motive that induces the Chinese at present to take many Wives, for the being rich, and able to maintain them, is Pretence enough. However, there is a Law, that prohibits the People from marrying a second Wife, unless the first has arriv'd to the Age of forty without having any Children.

Marriage transacted by Match-makers or Go-betweens.

As those of the Female Sex are always shut up in their Apartments, and Men not permitted to see and converse with them, Matches are brought to a Conclusion solely on the Credit of the Relations of the Maid, or the Old Women, whose Business is to transact such Affairs. These the Parents are very careful to ingage by Presents, to make advantageous Reports of the Beauty, Wit, and Talents of their Daughter; but they are not much rely'd on, and if they carry the Imposition too far, will be severely punish'd. When by means of these Go-betweens every thing is settled, the Contract sign'd, and the Sums agreed upon, deliver'd, Preparations are made for the Nuptials; during which certain Ceremonies intervene, whereof the principal consist in both Parties sending respectively to demand the Name of the intended Bridegroom and Bride, and in making Presents to their Relations of Silk, Callicoes, Meats, Wine, and Fruits. Many consult the Fortunate Days, set down in the Kalendar, as proper for marrying on; and this is the Business of the Relations of the future Bride, to whom are sent Rings, Pendants, and other Jewels of the same Nature. All this is done by Mediators, and by a sort of Letters, written on both sides; but it is what is practis'd only among the Vulgar, for the Marriages of Persons of Quality are manag'd and conducted in a more noble manner, and with a true Magnificence.

Ceremony on the Marriage-Day.

The Day of the Nuptials being come, the Bride is put into a Chair, pompously adorn'd, and follow'd by those who carry the Fortune she brings; which among the Vulgar consists of Wedding-Cloaths, laid up in Boxes, some Goods and Moveables, given by her Father. A Train of hired Men accompany her with Torches and Flambeaux, even at Noon-Day; her Chair is preceded with Fifes, Hautbois, and Drums, and follow'd by her Relations and the particular Friends of the Family. A trusty Servant keeps the Key of the Door belonging to the Chair, which he is not to deliver to any body but the Husband, who waits at his own Door, richly dress'd, to receive his Bride; as soon as she is arriv'd, he takes the Key from the Servant, and eagerly opening the Chair, is then a Judge, if he never saw her before, of his good or bad Fortune. There are some who, not content with their Lot, immediately shut the Chair again, and send back the Maid along with her Relations, choosing rather to loose the Money they gave, than be ty'd to so bad a Bargain; but this very rarely happens, by the Precautions that are taken. When the Bride is got out of the Chair, the Bridegroom placing himself at her side, they go both together into the Hall, to make four Reverences to Tyen; and having done the like to the Husband's Relations, she is put into the Hands of the Ladies invited to the Ceremony, with whom she passes the whole Day in Feasting and Diversions, while the new-marry'd Man treats his Friends in another Apartment.

Privileges of second Wives and their Children.

Tho, according to the Laws, the Chinese can have but one lawful Wife, and in the Choice they make, have regard to Equality of Age and Rank, they are nevertheless permitted, as I before said, to have several Concubines, whom they receive into the House without any Formality: all they do on these Occasions, being to sign a Writing with their Parents, whereby, on delivering the Sum agreed upon, they promise to use their Daughter well. These second Wives are intirely dependant on the legitimate Wife, whom they respect as the only Mistress of the House. The Children born of a Concubine are also deem'd to belong to the true Wife, and have equally a Right to inherit; none but she has the Name of Mother: and if the real Mother happen to die, they are not absolutely oblig'd to go in Mourning for three Years, nor to be absent from their Examinations, nor to quit their Offices and Governments, as it is customary to do at the Death of their Father, and the lawful Wife; however very few fail to express that Token of Tenderness and Respect for their own Mother.

There are some, who piquing themselves upon their Probity, and desiring to gain the Reputation of good Husbands, take no Concubines without the Permission and Consent of their Wives; persuading them that their Intention in so doing is only to provide a greater number of Women for their Service. Others take a Concubine only with a View of getting a Son, and the Moment he is born, if she displeases their Wives, they send her away, and give her Liberty to marry whom she thinks proper; or which is most usual procure her a Husband themselves. The Cities of Yang-chew and Su-chew, are famous for furnishing great numbers of these Concubines: for which Purpose they bring up good handsome young Girls, whom they buy up elsewhere; teaching them to sing, to play on Music, and in short all sorts of Accomplishments belonging to young Gentlewomen, with a View to dispose of them at a good Price to some rich Mandarin.

Girls educated and sold for second Wives.

The Men as well as Women, may contract Matrimony again, when Death has broken the first Bonds; but, tho' in the first Match they are oblig'd to regard Quality in their Wives, they cease to be under the same Obligation, when they marry a second time: being at Liberty to espouse whom they think fit, and even to raise one of their Concubines to the Rank and Honours of a lawful Wife; but in these second Nuptials there are but few Ceremonies observ'd.

Second Marriages.

As for Widows when they have had Children, they become intirely their own Mistresses; so that their Parents cannot constrain them, either to continue in the State of Widowhood, or to marry anew. However, it is disreputable for a Widow, who has Children, to marry a second time, without great Necessity, especially if she is a Woman of Distinction: for tho' she was marry'd but a few Hours, or but only contracted, she thinks herself oblig'd to pass the rest of her Days in Widowhood, thereby to testify the Respect she preserves for the Memory of her deceas'd Husband, or the Person to whom she was engag'd. But it is otherwise with those of a middling Condition, whose Relations being desirous to get back part of the Sum that she cost her first Spouse, may marry her again, if she has no Male-Issue, and often force her to it; nay, sometimes the new Husband is actually procur'd, and the Money paid without her Knowledge. If there happen to be a Daughter yet unwear'd, by the Bargain, she goes along with the Mother: who has no way of avoiding this Oppression, unless her own Relations are able to maintain her, or she either reimburses those of her deceas'd Husband, or becomes a Bonzess; but the Condition of those Nuns is so contemptible that she cannot embrace it without dishonouring herself. This violence is not so common among the Tartars. As soon as a poor Widow has been sold in this Manner, they bring a Sedan, with a number of trusty Persons, and carry her to her Husband's House. The Law, which forbids the selling of a Woman before the Time of their Mourning expires, is sometimes neglected, so eager they are to get rid of them; however, when this Trepass is complain'd of, the Mandarin must look to himself, if he has in the least conniv'd at it.

disreputable in Women who have Children.

Some forced to it by their Husband's Relations.

The Marriages duly solemniz'd, according to the prescrib'd Ceremonies, cannot be dissolv'd. The Law inflicts severe Penalties on those, who prostitute their Wives, or sell them secretly to others. If a Woman elopes from her Husband, he may sell her, after she has undergone the Correction appointed by the Law: on the other hand, if the Husband abandons his House and Wife, after three Years Absence she may present a Petition, laying her Case before the Mandarins, who, after they have naturally examin'd the whole Affair, may licence her to take another Husband; but she would be severely punish'd if she marry'd without observing this Formality. However, there are particular Cases wherein a Man may divorce his Wife, such as Adultery, which is very rare, by Reason of the Precaution taken with regard to Women; Antipathy or different Tempers; Excess of Jealousy, Indiscretion, or Disobedience; Barrenness, and contagious Distempers: on these Occasions the Law permits a Divorce, yet it seldom happens among Persons of Quality; Examples of this kind being only to be found among the common People. If a Man, without lawful Authority, sell his Wife, both he and the Buyer, with all those who are any way concern'd in the Affair, are very severely punish'd. (A)

A Man may sell his eloping Wife.

A Wife may marry if the Husband absents three Years.

Cases of Divorce.

Bars against a Man's marrying.

There are other Cases, wherein a Man cannot contract a Marriage, and which, if he should, would make it null and void; viz.

A former Contract.

I. If a young Woman has been promised to a young Man, so far as that Presents have been sent and accepted by the Relations of both Families, she cannot marry any other Person.

II. If any Deceit has been made use of, for Instance, if instead of a beautiful Person, who has been shewn to the Match-makers or Go-between, they substitute a disagreeable one; or if the Daughter of a Freeman be marry'd to his Slave; or if a Man gives his Slave to a Free-Woman, and persuades her Relations that he is his Son, or his Relation; in such Cases the Marriage is declared null, and all those concern'd in the Fraud are rigorously punished.

Imposition in the Match

III. A Literary Mandarin is not allow'd to marry into any Family of the Province or City where he is Governour; and should he be found to transgress this Law, the Marriage would not only be null, but he would be condemn'd to be severely bastinado'd.

IV. During the time of Mourning for a Father or Mother, Marriage is prohibited their Children; nay if Promises were given before the Death, the Obligation ceases; and the young Man, who has lost his Parent, ought by a Billet to acquaint the Relations of the betrothed Damsel: However, these latter do not on this Account think themselves disingag'd, but wait till the time of Mourning is expir'd, and write in their turns to the young Man, to put him in mind of his Promise ; then indeed if he will not listen to their Proposal the Maid is at Liberty, and may be married to another. The case is the same if any extraordinary Affliction befalls a Family ; for instance, if the Father or near Relation is imprison'd, the Marriage cannot take Effect till the Prisoner gives his Consent ; and then there is no Feasting, nor any of the usual Signs of Rejoicing at the Wedding.

Relation-ship V. Lastly, those of the same Family, or even Name, cannot marry, tho' ever so distant in point of Affinity. In like manner the Laws do not permit two Brothers to espouse two Sisters, or a Widower to marry his Son to a Daughter of the Widow whom he takes to Wife.

Their Mournings and Funerals.

Ceremonies of Mourning, and at Funerals, SINCE the Chinese Policy has taken such great Care in regulating the Ceremonies that are to accompany publick and private Actions, as well as all the Duties of Civil Life ; and since the Ceremonial is so very particular in these Respects, it would be strange if filial Piety should be forgotten : on which, as I have observ'd more than once, the whole Frame of the Chinese Government is built. Young Persons being Witnesses of the Veneration paid to deceas'd Relations, by the continual Honours that are done them, as if they were still alive, become acquainted betimes with the Submission and Obedience which they owe to their living Parents. The ancient Sages were convinc'd, that the profound Respect which is infused into Children for their Parents, renders them perfectly submissive ; that this Submission preserves Peace in Families ; that Peace in private Families produces Tranquility in Cities ; that this Tranquility prevents Insurrections in the Provinces, and establishes Order throughout the Empire : for this Reason they have prescribed the several Forms to be observed in the time of Mourning, and at Funerals, as well as the Honours to be paid to deceas'd Parents.

Term of Mourning for a Parent three Years. The usual time of Mourning ought to be three Years ; but they commonly reduce them to twenty seven Months ; and during this time they cannot exercise any public Office. So that a Mandarin is obliged to quit his Government, and a Minister of State the Administration of Affairs, to live retired, and give himself up to Grief for his Loss ; (unless the Emperor, for some extraordinary Reasons, dispenses therewith, which very rarely happens ; ) nor can he re-assume his Office till the three Years are expired. Their continuing so long in this melancholy Situation, is to express their Gratitude for their Parents Care of them, during the three first Years of their Infancy ; wherein they stood in continual Need of their Assistance. The Mourning for other Relations are longer or shorter, according to the Degree of Kindred.

Piety of Ven-kong on that Occasion. This Practice is so inviolably observed, that their Annals perpetuate the Piety of Ven-kong, King of Tsin : who being driven out of the Dominions of his Father Hyen-kong, by the Cunning and Violence of Li-ki, his Step-Mother, travell'd into several Countries to divert his Uneasiness, and avoid the Snares that this ambitious Woman was continually laying for him. When he was informed of his Father's Death, and invited by Mo-kong, who offer'd him Soldiers, Arms and Money, to put him in Possession of his Dominions, his Answer was : " That being as it were a dead Man, since his Retreat and Exile, he no longer esteem'd any thing but Virtue and Piety towards his Parents ; that this was his Treasure, and that he chose rather to lose his Kingdom, of which he was already dispossest, than to be wanting in those last Duties, which did not permit him to take Arms at a Time destin'd to Grief, " and the Funeral Honours which he owed to the Memory of his Father".

White the Mourning Colour. White is the Mourning Colour both among Princes and the meanest Mechanics. Those who wear it compleat, have their Cap, Vest, Gown, Stockings, and Boots all white. In the first Month after the Death of a Father or Mother, the Habit is a kind of hempen Sack of a bright red Colour, much like our packing Cloth ; their Girdle is a sort of loose Cord, and their Cap, which is of a very odd Figure, is also of hempen Cloth. By this melancholy Attire and negligent Outside, they affect to express their inward Grief for the Loss of what is most dear to them.

Their Coffins and manner of putting in the Corps. They seldom wash the dead Bodies, but dressing the Deceas'd in his best Cloaths, and laying over him the Ensigns of his Dignity, put him in the Coffin they have bought, or that he had order'd to be made in his Life time ; about which they are extremely anxious. [See p. 280.] Sometimes the Son will sell or mortgage himself, to procure Money to buy a Coffin for his Father. The Coffins for those in easy Circumstances are made of Planks above half a Foot thick, and last a long time. They are so well daubed with Pitch and Bitumen on the inside, and japan'd without, that no bad Smell can break thro' them. Some are finely carv'd and gilded all over ; in a word, many rich Persons lay out from three hundred to a thousand Crowns, to purchase a Coffin of precious Wood, adorn'd with Variety of Figures. Before the Body is placed in the Coffin, they throw a little Lime at the Bottom ; and after it is layed in, they put either a Pillow or a good deal of Cotton, in order to keep the Head steady. The Cotton and the Lime serve to soak up the Moisture that may proceed from the Corps ; they also put in Cotton, or such like things, to fill up the Vacancies, and preserve it in the same Situation. It would be, in their Opinions, an unheard-of Cruelty, to open a dead Body, and taking out the Heart and Entrails, bury them seperately ; in like manner it would be a monstrous thing to behold, as in Europe, the Bones of dead Persons heaped one upon another.

The

The Procession at a Chinese Funeral

To the Rev. Nicholas Carter D.D. of Dulwich to James Carr Esq. of the said Town. Collector of the Customs, this Plate is Inscribed.

The Pavilion at a Chinese Fair Reproduction of the original in the Chinese Museum, Peking, China

The Chinese are prohibited from burying their Dead within the Walls of the Cities, or any inhabited Places, but they are permitted to keep them in their Houses, inclosed in such Coffins as I have described; which they often do for several Months, and even Years, like so much Treasure, nor can the Magistrate ever oblige them to inter them. They may even transport them from one Part of the Empire to another; as is commonly practised, with regard not only to Persons of Distinction who die in Employments out of their Country; but even among the richer sort of People who die in a distant Province, which often happens to Merchants and Dealers. If a Son did not cause the Corps of his Father to be laid in the Tomb of his Ancestors, he would live without Reputation; especially in his own Family, who would refuse to place his Name in the Hall where they pay them Honours. In carrying them from one Province to another, they are not permitted to bring them into, or pass with them through, the Cities without an Order from the Emperor, but must keep on their way without the Walls.

May keep the Corps in their Houses but cannot bury in Cities.

They do not bury several Persons, tho' Relations, in the same Grave, so long as the Sepulchres keep their Form. They come sometimes a great way to visit them, and examine the Colour of the Bones, in order to discover whether a Stranger has died a natural or violent Death; but it is necessary that the Mandarin should be present at the opening of the Coffin, and there are under Officers in the Tribunals, whose Employment it is to make this Enquiry, in which they are very skilful. Some indeed open the Tombs to steal Jewels or rich Dresses, but it is a Crime that is punish'd very severely.

Do not bury many in the same Grave.

The Sepulchres there are built without the Cities, and as often as may be, upon Eminences; it is also usual to plant Pine and Cypress Trees round them. About a League from every City one meets with Villages, Hamlets, and Houses scatter'd up and down, diversify'd with little Groves; also a great many Hillocks cover'd with Trees, and enclos'd with Walls, which are so many different Sepulchres, affording no disagreeable Prospect.

Places of Sepulture.

The Form of their Sepulchres is different in different Provinces; they are for the most part very prettily built in Shape of a Horse-shoe, and well white wash'd, with the Names of the Family, written on the principal Stone. The Poor are content to cover the Coffin with Stubble or Earth, raised five or six foot high like a Pyramid: Many inclose the Coffin in a Place built with Brick, like a Tomb.

Form of their Tombs.

As for the Grandees and Mandarins, their Sepulchres are of a magnificent Structure: they build a Vault, in which they put the Coffin, and raise a Heap of temper'd Earth over it, not unlike a Hat in Shape, about twelve foot high and eight or ten in Diameter; covering it with Lime and Sand made into a Cement, that the Water may not penetrate, and planting it round with Trees of different kinds ranged in very nice Order. Near to it stands a large long Table of white polish'd Marble, whereon is a perfuming Pan, two Vessels and two Candlesticks, which are also of Marble, and curiously made. On each side are placed in several Rows a great many Figures of Officers, Eunuchs, Soldiers, Lions, Saddle-Horses, Camels, Tortoises, and other Animals in different Attitudes, discovering Signs of Grief and Veneration; for the Chinese are skilful in imitating and expressing all the Passions in their Sculptures.

Sepulchres of the Great.

Many Chinese, to give the greater Proof of their Respect and Tenderness for their deceased Fathers, keep their dead Bodies by them for three or four Years; and during the whole time of Mourning, their Seat in the Day is a Stool covered with white Serge; and in the Night they lie near the Coffin, on nothing but a Matt made of Reeds: they deny themselves the Use of Meat and Wine, frequenting no Feasts, nor any public Assemblies; and if they are oblig'd to go out of the City, which is not usual till a certain time be over, the Chair they are carried in is sometimes cover'd with white Cloth. The Tyau, or solemn Rites, which they render to the Deceas'd, commonly continue seven Days, unless some good Reason obliges them to reduce the number to three. During that time all the Relations and Friends, whom they take great care to invite, come to pay their last Duty to the Deceas'd; the nearest Relations remaining together in the House. The Coffin is expos'd in the principal Hall, which is hung with white Stuffs, sometimes intermix'd with Pieces of black, and violet Silk, and other Ornaments of Mourning. Before the Coffin they set a Table, and place on it the Image of the Deceas'd; or else, a carv'd Piece of Work, whereon his Name is written, with Flowers, Perfumes, and lighted Wax-Candles on each Side.

Time of solemn Rites.

Those who come to make their Compliments of Condolence, salute the Deceas'd after the manner of their Country, prostrating themselves, and knocking their Foreheads several Times against the Ground, before the Table; on which they afterwards place Wax-Candles and Perfumes, brought with them according to Custom. Particular Friends accompany these Ceremonies with Tears and Groans, which may be often heard at a great Distance. While they are performing these Duties, the eldest Son, attended by his Brothers, comes from behind a Curtain, which is on one Side of the Coffin, crawling on the Ground, his Face the very Picture of Grief it self, and shedding Tears, with a mournful and profound Silence. The Compliment is paid with the same Ceremony that is used before the Coffin; behind the Curtain are plac'd the Women, who send forth every now and then, very doleful Cries. The Ceremony being ended, they rise up, and a distant Relation of the Deceas'd, or some Friend in Mourning, who receiv'd them at the Door, when they came in, performs the honours of the House, and conducts them into another Apartment; where they are presented with Tea, and sometimes dry'd Fruits, or the like Refreshments, after which he conducts them to their Chairs. Those who live but a little Way from the City, come purposely to pay those Rites in Person; and if they are hindred by the

the Distance of the Place, or some Indisposition, they send a Servant with a visiting Billet, and their Presents, in order to make their Excuse. The Children of the Deceas'd, or at least the eldest Son, are afterwards obliged to return all those Visits: but then they are not under an absolute necessity, of seeing so many Persons; it being sufficient to go to the Door of every House, and send in a visiting Billet by a Domestic.

The Funeral Procession.

When the Day for the Funeral is fix'd, Notice is given to all the Relations and Friends of the Deceas'd, who are sure to be there at the Time. The Procession is begun by Men carrying various Pastboard-Figures representing Slaves, Tygers, Lions, Horses, &c. Several Companies follow, marching two and two; some carry Standards, Flags, and Perfuming-pans full of Perfumes; others play doleful Tunes on divers musical Instruments. In some Places the Picture of the Defunct is elevated above all the rest, with his Name and Dignity written in large Characters of Gold; then follows the Coffin under a Canopy, in form of a Dome, made intirely of violet-colour'd Silk, with Tufts of white Silk at the four Corners, which are embroider'd, and very curiously intermix'd with Twist. The Machine whereon the Coffin is plac'd, is carry'd by sixty four Men; But those who are not able to bear the Expence, make use of one that does not require so great a Number of Bearers. The eldest Son, at the Head of the other Sons and Grandchildren, follows on Foot, cover'd with a Hempen Sack, and leaning on a Staff, with his Body bent as if ready to sink under the Weight of his Grief. Afterwards appear the Relations and Friends all in Mourning; and a great Number of Chairs cover'd with white Stuff, wherein are the Daughters, Wives, and Slaves of the Deceas'd, who make the Air echo with their Cries. Nothing can be more surprizing than the Tears which the Chinese shed, and the Cries they make at these Funerals (b); but the Manner, in which they express their Sorrow, seems too regular and affected to excite in a European the same Sentiments of Grief that he is the Spectator of.

Entertainment at the Place of Burial.

When you are arrived at the Burying-Place, you see, a few Paces from the Tomb, Tables set in Halls built on purpose; and while the usual Ceremonies are performing, the Servants prepare an Entertainment to regale the Company. Sometimes after the Repast, the Relations and Friends prostrate themselves again, knocking their Foreheads against the Ground; but most commonly they content themselves with expressing their Thanks: which Civilities, the eldest Son, and the other Children return by exterior Gestures, but with profound Silence. At the Burying-Places of great Lords, there are several Apartments; and after the Coffin is brought to be interred, many of the Relations stay there for a Month or two together, to renew their Grief every Day with the Sons of the Deceas'd.

At the Funerals of Christians the Cross is carry'd on a great Machine handsomely adorn'd, and supported by several Men, with the Images of the Virgin, and St. Michael the Archangel. The Reader will find an Account of the other Ceremonies in the Description I shall hereafter give of P. Verbieff's Burial (c). Those that were observ'd at the Interment of P. Broglie appear'd so magnificent to the Chinese, that they printed the Description of them. The Emperor honour'd his Tomb with an Epitaph; and, to defray the Expence, sent ten Pieces of white Cloth for Mourning, and two hundred Ounces of Silver, with a Mandarin and other Officers to assist on his Behalf at the Funeral.

Ceremonies observed on the Death of the Emperors.

If at any Time Death attacks the Throne, the whole Empire goes in Mourning. When the Emperess, Mother of the late Kang-hi, died, all went in deep Mourning for fifty Days; during which time, the Tribunals were shut up, and they never spoke of any Business to the Emperor. The Mandarins spent the whole Day at the Palace, intirely taken up with weeping, or at least the Appearance thereof; several of them pass'd the Night there, sitting in the open Air, tho' it was very cold Weather: even the Emperor's Sons slept in the Palace without putting off their Cloaths, all the Mandarins on Horseback, clad in white, and with few attendants, went for three Days together to perform the usual Ceremonies before her Picture; and as the red Colour was prohibited, their Caps were stripp'd of their red Silk, and all other Ornaments. When her Corps was carry'd to the Place where she was to lye in Public-State, the Emperor order'd that she should pass through the common Gates of the Palace: affecting to shew by this how much he despis'd the superstitious Notions of the Chinese, with whom, it is customary to make new Doors to their Houses on purpose for carrying out the Bodies of their Relations to be buried; after which they close them up again to prevent the Grief becoming excessive by too frequent a Remembrance of the Deceas'd, which would be renewed every time they pass through that Door (d). Out of the City they built a vast and stately Palace (all of new Mats, with Courts, Halls, and Apartments) for the Body to remain in, till it was carry'd to the Imperial Burying-Place.

Extravagant Customs of the Tartars
at the Funerals of their Princes.

Four young Ladies, who had served her affectionately while she liv'd, (being desirous of bearing her Company in Death, that they might attend her likewise in the other World) had taken their Attire, according to an ancient Usage of the Tartars, in order to go and sacrifice themselves before their Mistress's Corps; but the Emperor, who disapprov'd of so barbarous a Practice, prevented their putting it in Execution. He likewise prohibited, for the future, another extravagant Custom among that People of burning the Riches, and even sometimes Domestics of Great Men, along with their Bodies, on the Funeral Pile.

(b) The Irish still put forth as many doleful Cries over the Dead as the Chinese, and perhaps shed as many Tears; whether as unfeignedly I will not say, because the Irish Mourners are for the most part hired.

(c) See Vol. 2. p. 20.

(d) According to this Account, the Custom is grounded on Filial Affection, and not Superstition.

The Ceremonies observ'd at the obsequies of the *Grande*s are very magnificent, as the Reader may judge, by those perform'd at the Death of Ta-vang-ye, the eldest Brother of the late Emperor Kang-hi, at which some of the Missionaries were oblig'd to assist. The Procession began with a Band of Trumpeters and Musicians, after which marched two and two in the following Order: Ten Mace bearers, whose Maces were of gilt Copper; four Umbrellas, and four Canopies of Cloth of Gold; six unloaded Camels, with Sable-skins hanging at their Necks; six Camels carrying Tents and Hunting-Equipages, cover'd with great red Houfings, which trail'd upon the Ground; six Hounds led in a Leash; fourteen led Horses unsaddled, with yellow Bridles, and Sable-skins hanging down; six other Horses carrying magnificent Portmanteau's full of Habits that were to be burnt; six other Horses with embroider'd Saddles, gilt Stirrups, &c. fifteen Gentlemen carrying Bows, Arrows, Quivers, &c. eight Men bearing a couple Tartarian Girdles, from whence hung Purfes fill'd with Pearls; ten Men carrying in their Hands, Caps proper for every Season; an open Chair, like to that in which the Emperor is carry'd in the Palace; another Chair, with yellow Cushions; the two Sons of the deceas'd Prince supported by Eunuchs; and weeping; the Coffin, with it's great yellow Canopy, carry'd by sixty or eighty Men, cloath'd in Green with red Plumes in their Caps; the Ago in Companies surrounded with their Servants; the Regulos and other Princes; two other Coffins containing the Bodies of two Concubines, who were hang'd, that they might serve the Prince in the other World, as they had done in this; the *Grande*s of the Empire; the Chairs of the deceas'd Prince's Wife, and the Princesses, his Relations; a Multitude of People, Lama's, and Bonza's clos'd the Procession.

Funeral Procession of Ta-vang-ye.

The eight Banners with all the Mandarins great and small, were gone before, and rang'd themselves in order of Battle, to receive the Body at the Entrance of the Garden, where it was to be deposited till the Tomb was built; in a word, they reckon'd above sixteen thousand Persons at this Ceremony.

The Duties and Honours that are paid by every Family to their deceas'd Ancestors, are not solely confin'd to those which regard the Mourning and Funeral; there being two other Sorts of Ceremonies that are annually observ'd with reference to them. The first are perform'd in the Tse-tang or Hall of Ancestors, in certain Months of the Year: for every Family whatever has such a Place, built on purpose for this Ceremony, which is frequented by all the Branches thereof, amounting sometimes to seven or eight thousand Persons; since some of these Assemblies have consisted of eighty seven Branches of the same Family. At this time there is no Distinction of Rank; the Mechanic, the Husbandman, the Mandarin, are all confusely mixt together, and own one another; it is Age here that gives Precedence; the oldest, tho the poorest, having the first Place.

Honours paid to the Dead in the Hall of Ancestors.

There is in the Hall a long Table standing against the Wall, with Steps to go up to it, whereon commonly is plac'd the Image of the most eminent Ancestor, or at least his Name; and on small Tablets, or little Boards about a Foot high, rang'd on both sides, are written the Names of the Men, Women, and Children of the Family, together with the Age, Quality, Employment, and Day of the Decease of each.

All the Relations assemble in this Hall in Spring, and sometimes in Autumn. The Richest among them prepare a Feast: several Tables are loaded with Variety of Dishes of Meat, Rice, Fruit, Perfumes, Wine, and Wax-Candles, and much the same Ceremonies perform'd, as their Children observ'd with Reference to them while they were living, and are practis'd, in respect of Mandarins, on their Birth-Days, or when they take Possession of their Governments. As for the Common People, who are not able to build proper Places for this Use, they content themselves with hanging the Names of their nearest Ancestors in those Parts of their Houses, where they may be most in view.

The other Ceremonies are practis'd at least once a Year, at the Burial-Place of their Ancestors; which being without the City, and often in the Mountains, the Descendants, both Men and Children, resort thither every Year. Some time in April they begin with plucking up the Weeds and Bushes from about the Sepulchre; after which they express Signs of Veneration, Gratitude, and Grief, according to the same Forms that were observ'd at their Death: they then place upon the Tomb, Wine and Victuals, with which they afterwards regale themselves.

and at their Burying-Places.

It cannot be deny'd but that the Chinese carry their Ceremonies to Extremes, especially with respect to honouring the Deceas'd; but it is a Maxim establish'd by their Laws and Customs, that they ought to render the Dead the same Honours that were paid them when living.

Confucius says, in the Book Lu nyu, that the same Duties must be paid to the dead as if they were present and alive. In explaining which Words one of his Disciples tells us, that when his Master made the accustomed Offering to the Dead, he did it with great Affection; and to raise his warmth the more, he imagin'd that he saw them and heard them speak; and because they had been long dead, he often call'd them to mind.

The Authority for this Custom.

In the Book of the Li-ki, the famous Pe-bu-tung, who liv'd under the Dynasty of the Han, (A) says, The Reason for making that little Representation is, because the Soul or Spirit of the Dead being invisible, a Child stands in need of a sensible Object to put him in mind of his Parents, to attract his Eyes and Heart, and give him Consolation. As after a Father is interr'd, nothing remains with the Children capable of fixing their Hearts, that Consideration first induc'd them to make a Picture, in order to do him Honour.

and Grounds for this Custom.

(A) In the French the Empire of the Han-chou. See my Reason for not using this last Term, P. 136. Note (c).

The ancient Chinese made use of a little Child, as a living Image, to represent the Deceas'd, in place of whom their Successors have substituted an Image or Tablet; because it is easier to procure a Tablet than a Child, as often as they have occasion to make their Acknowledgments to their dead Relations, for the Life, Fortune, and good Education receiv'd from them.

Superstitions added by the Bonzas.

It is true that Idolatry having been introduc'd in the Empire, the Bonzas, or Tau ts, engag'd by views of Interest to deceive the People, have mingl'd with these Ceremonies several superstitious Practices: such as, burning gilt Paper in the Form of Money, and even Pieces of white Silk, as if those things could be of Service to them in the other World; and teaching that the Souls of the Deceas'd hover about the Tablets inscrib'd with their Names, and feed on the Smell of the Meats, and Perfumes that are burnt. But these ridiculous Customs are very opposite to the true Chinese Doctrine, and prevail only among an ignorant Multitude, who follow such Sects; even the Bonzas themselves, notwithstanding the Corruptions they have introduc'd, always consider the ancient Ceremonies as so many Signs of Filial Respect, which Children owe to their Parents.

Of the Prisons in China, and Punishments inflicted on Criminals.

Justice slow but sure in
China.

THOUGH Justice in China seems slow, by Reason the Proceedings are lengthen'd out, that Men may not be unjustly depriv'd of such considerable Benefits as Life and Honour; yet Criminals are severely punish'd, and the Penalty proportion'd to the Enormity of the Crimes.

Before the Criminal Matters come to a definitive Sentence, they commonly pass thro' five or six Tribunals, subordinate to one another; which have all a Right to review the whole Proceedings, and to receive exact Information concerning the Life and Manners of the Accusers and Witnesses, as well as of the Crimes of the Persons accused. This Dilatoriness proves favourable to the Innocent, who by that means are seldom oppress'd, altho' they lie a long while in Prison.

The Prisons
more convenient and spacious than those of Europe.

These Prisons are neither so dreadful nor loathsome as the Prisons of Europe, and besides are much more convenient and spacious. They are built almost in the same Manner, throughout the Empire, and situated at a small Distance from the Tribunals. Having pass'd thro' the first Door towards the Street, you meet with a long Passage, which brings you to a second Door, leading into a Base-Court, which you cross over to a third Door, belonging to the Jailor's Apartment. After that, you enter a large square Court, on the sides whereof are Prisoners Rooms, erected on large Pillars of Wood, which form a kind of a Gallery.

Criminals very closely confined.

At the four Corners are secret Prisons, wherein the more notorious Rogues are secur'd, who are never let out in the Day-time to converse in the Court, as sometimes the other Prisoners are; and yet Money will purchase this Liberty for a few Hours: but at Night they take care to load them with heavy Chains, which are fasten'd to their Hands, Feet, and Middle, squeezing the Sides so hard that they can scarcely stir. However, a little Money rightly apply'd may even soften this Severity of the Jailors, and make their Irons sit easier. As for those whose Faults are not very heinous, they have the Liberty of the Courts of the Prison in the Day-time to walk about to take the Air; but in the Evening they are all call'd one after another, and shut up in a large dark Hall, or else in the little Rooms which they may hire for lodging more conveniently. A Centinel watches all the Night, to keep the Prisoners in profound Silence, and if the least Noise is heard, or the Lamp which is to be kept lighted happens to be put out, immediate Notice is give to the Jailors, that they may remedy the Disorder.

The Prisons
well guarded.

Others are oblig'd to walk the Rounds continually, so that it would be in vain for any Prisoner to attempt an Escape; because he would immediately be discover'd and severely punish'd by the Mandarin, who visits the Prisons very often, and ought always to be able to give an account of them: for if any fall sick, he must answer for them, being oblig'd not only to provide them with Physicians and Remedies, at the Emperor's Expence, but also to take all possible Care for their Recovery. When any die, they are to inform the Emperor, who often orders the superior Mandarin to examine, if the inferior have done their Duty. At these Times of visiting, those who are guilty of any capital Crime, appear with a melancholy Air, the Face pale and ghastly, the Head hung down, and the Feet trembling, whereby they endeavour to excite Compassion; but it is to no purpose, for the Design of their Imprisonment is not only to secure but also to afflict them, and become part of their Punishment.

Great Care taken of the Health of the Prisoners.

In large Prisons, such as that of the supreme Court at Pe-king, Tradesmen and Mechanics, as Tailors, Butchers, Sellers of Rice and Herbs, &c. are allow'd to enter, for the Service and Convenience of those who are detain'd in them: there are even Cooks to dress their Viſuals, and every thing is done in order, thro' the Care of the Officers.

The Women's Prison.

The Womens Prison is separate from that of the Men, and there is no speaking to them but through a Grate, or at the Turning-Box, by which their necessities are convey'd; but very rarely any Man goes near them.

In some Places when a Prisoner dies, his Body is not carry'd out thro' the common Door of the Prison, but through a Passage made in the Wall of the first Court, which serves only for the Dead. When Prisoners above the common Rank find themselves in Danger of Death, they desire, as a Favour, that they may go out before they expire, because they look upon it as an infamous thing for their Corps to be carry'd thro' that Passage, in so much that the greatest Curse a Chinese can bestow on the Person to whom he wishes ill, is to say, May you be dragg'd thro' the Prison-Hole.

Door for carrying out the Dead.

In China no Offences whatever escape Punishment, that of each being fix'd. The Bastonado is commonly apply'd for slight Faults, and the number of Blows proportion'd to the Quality thereof. It is the usual Chastisement inflicted by the Officers of War on the Soldiers, plac'd as Centinels in the Night-time in Streets and public Places of great Cities, who, when found asleep, are often punish'd on the Spot. If the number of Blows does not exceed twenty, it is accounted a Fatherly Correction, and is not disgraceful; for the Emperor himself causes it to be given to Persons of great Distinction, and afterwards fees and carries it to them as usual. A very small matter will incur this Fatherly Chastisement, as having filch'd any Trifle, us'd abusive Language, given a few Blows with the Fist; for if these Things reach the Mandarin's Ears, he immediately sets the Pan-tse at work, for so that Instrument is call'd. After the Correction is over, they are to kneel at the Feet of the Judge, bow their Bodies three times to the Earth, and thank him for the Care he takes of their Education. The Pan-tse is a thick Piece of split Bambú, (which is a hard, massy, and heavy sort of Cane) several Foot long; the lower end is as broad as one's Hand, the upper smooth and small, that it may be more easily manag'd.

The Bastonado,

for what Faults inflicted.

The Pan-tse or Instrument describ'd.

When the Mandarin sits in Judgment he has before him on a Table, a Case full of small Sticks, about half a Foot long, and two Fingers broad, and is surrounded by Officers, holding Pan-tse, or Battoons in their Hands; who, upon a Sign given by the Magistrate taking out and throwing down these Sticks, seize the Offender, and lay him along with his Face towards the Ground, pull his Breeches over his Heels, and as many small Sticks as the Mandarin throws on the Ground, so many Officers give him five Blows each, with the Pan-tse on the bare Skin. They are chang'd every five Strokes, or rather two strike alternately five Blows, that so they may fall the heavier, and the Correction prove more severe. However, it is observable that four Blows are always reckon'd as five, which they call the Grace of the Emperor, who as a Father, out of Compassion for his People, constantly lessens the Punishment something. There is a way of mitigating it also by bribing the Officers, who have the Art of making the Blows fall so lightly as to be scarcely felt. A young Chinese, beholding his Father condemn'd to this Punishment, and ready to suffer, threw himself upon him to receive the Blows; which Act of Filial Piety so affected the Judge, that he pardon'd the Father for sake of the Son.

Form of applying it.

A Mandarin has Power to give the Bastonado not only in his Tribunal, but also wherever he is, even out of his own District; for which Reason when he goes abroad, he has always Officers of Justice in his Train, who carry the Pan-tse. If one of the People happening to be on Horseback, when the Mandarin passes by, does not alight, or crosses the Street in his Presence, it is sufficient Offence to incur five or six Blows by his Order; which is executed so nimbly, that often the honest Man has got his due, before those about him know any thing of the matter. Masters give the same Correction to their Scholars, Fathers to their Children, and Noblemen to their Domestics, with this Difference, that the Pan-tse is neither so long nor so large.

The Pan-tse always carry'd before the Judge.

Another Punishment, less painful but more infamous, is the Wooden Collar, which the Portuguese call Kangbe. This Kangbe is composed of two pieces of Wood, hollow'd in the Middle, to fit the Neck of the Offender; and when he is condemn'd by the Mandarin, they take the two pieces of Wood, lay them on his Shoulder, and join them together. By this means the Person can neither see his Feet, nor put his Hand to his Mouth, so that he cannot come to his Victuals without some other Person feeds him. Night and Day, he carries this disagreeable Load, which is heavier or lighter, according to the Nature of the Fault. The Weight of the common sort of Kangbe's is fifty or sixty Pounds, but some weigh two hundred; and are so grievous to Criminals, that sometimes through Shame, Confusion, Pain, Want of Nourishment, and Sleep, they die under them. Some are three Foot square, and five or six Inches thick.

The Kangbe or Wooden Collar.

The Criminals, however, find different ways to imitigate this Punishment, some walk in Company with their Relations and Friends, who support the four Corners of the Kangbe, that it may not press their Shoulders; some rest it on a Table or on a Bench; others have a Chair made with four Pillars of an equal Height, to bear up the Machine; some lie on their Bellies and make use of the Hole, their Head is in, as a Window, through which they impudently gaze at all that passes in the Street. When they have fix'd the two pieces of Wood about the Neck of the Criminal, in the Mandarin's presence, they paste on each side over the Place where it joins, two long Slips of Paper, about four Inches broad, on which they clap a Seal, that the Kangbe may not be open'd without its being perceiv'd. Then they write in large Characters the Crime for which this Punishment is inflicted, and the Time that it ought to last; for Instance: This is a Thief; this is a disorderly and seditious Person; this is a Disturber of the Peace of Families; this is a Gamester, &c. he shall wear the Kangbe for three Months in such a Place.

Contrivances to make it fit easy.

The Offence written on it.

The

The Place, where they are exposed, is generally at the Gate of a Temple which is much frequented, or at the Corners of crowded Streets, or at the Gate of the City, or in a public Square, or even at the principal Gate of the Mandarin's Tribunal. When the Time of Punishment is expir'd, the Officers of the Tribunal bring back the Offender to the Mandarin, who, after exhorting him to amend his Courses, frees him from the Kan gbe, and to take his Leave of him for that Time, orders him twenty Strokes of the Pan-tse: for commonly in China all Punishments, except Pecuniary ones, begin and end with the Bastinado, in to much that it may be said, the Chinese Government subsists by the Exercise of the Battoon.

This Punishment is more common for Men than Women, nevertheless, an ancient Missionary, P. Contancin, visiting a Mandarin of a City of the first Rank, found a Woman near his Tribunal carrying the Kan gbe. She was a Bonzessi, that is, one of those Females who live in a kind of Nunnery, where Entrance is forbid to all Persons whatever; who employ themselves in worshipping of Images and in Labour; and who do not keep their Vows, yet are oblig'd to live a Life of Chastity while they continue there. This Bonzessi being accus'd of having had a Child, the Mandarin cited her before his Tribunal, and after giving her a severe Reprimand, told her; that since she could not live continently, it was fit she should quit the Convent, and marry. However, to punish her, he condemn'd her to carry the Kan gbe; and to the Note containing her Crime, it was added, That in Case any Person would marry her, the Mandarin would set her at Liberty, and give her an Ounce and an half of Silver, to defray the Expences. Of this Sum, which is equal to seven Livres and ten Sous French Money, fifty Sous were to hire a Chair, and to pay the Musicians; and the five remaining Livres were for bearing the Expence of the Wedding-Feast, to which the Neighbours were to be invited. It was not long before she met with a Husband, who demanding her of the Mandarin, she was accordingly deliver'd to him.

Besides the Punishment of the Kan gbe, there are still others, which are inflicted for slight Faults. The same Missionary entering into a second Court of the Tribunal, found young People upon their Knees; some bore on their Heads a Stone weighing seven or eight Pound, and others held a Book in their Hands, and read very diligently. Among these was a young marry'd Man, about thirty Years old, who lov'd Gaming to excess, and had lost part of the Money given him by his Father, to carry on some little Business. Exhortations, Reprimands, and Menaces, proving ineffectual, his Parents desirous, if possible, to cure him of so pernicious a Vice, carry'd him before the Tribunal. The Mandarin, who was a Man of Honour and Probity, having heard the Father's Complaint, caus'd the young Man to draw near; and, after giving him a severe Reprimand, as well as very good Advice, with regard to Submission, was going to order him the Bastinado; when his Mother entred of a sudden, and throwing herself at the Mandarin's Feet, with Tears in her Eyes, besought him to pardon her Son. The Mandarin being mov'd to Pity, order'd a Book to be brought, compos'd by the Emperor for the Instruction of the Empire, and opening it, chose the Article which related to Filial Obedience. You promise me, said he to the young Man, to renounce Play, and to listen to your Father's Directions; I therefore pardon you this Time, but go kneel down in the Gallery on the side of the Hall of Audience, and learn by Heart this Article of Filial Obedience: you shall not leave the Tribunal till you repeat it, and promise to observe it the Remainder of your Life. This Order was punctually executed, the young Man remain'd three Days in the Gallery, learn'd the Article, and was dismiss'd.

There are certain Enormities for which Offenders are mark'd on both Cheeks with a Chinese Character, signifying those Crimes; for others they are condemn'd to Banishment, or to draw the Royal Barks, which Servitude scarce ever lasts longer than three Years. As for Banishment it is often perpetual, especially if Tartary is the Place of Exile; but before their Departure they are sure to be drubb'd with a number of Blows proportionable to their Crimes.

There are three different ways of punishing with Death, the first and mildest is Strangling, which is inflicted for the smaller sort of Capital Offences; as, when a Man kills his Adversary in a Duel. The second is beheading, and this Punishment is inflicted for Crimes of a more enormous Nature, such as Assassination. This Death is look'd upon as the more shameful, because the Head, which is the principal part of a Man, is separated from the Body; and that in dying they do not preserve the Body as intire as they receiv'd it from their Parents. In some places they strangle with a kind of Bow, the String of which being put about the Criminal's Neck, they draw the Bow, and by that Means choak him. In other Places they make use of a Cord, seven or eight Foot long, with a running Knot, in which the Neck being put, two Servants belonging to the Tribunal draw it hard at each End, and loose it of a sudden a Moment after; then they draw it as before, and the second time they are sure of doing the Criminal's Business. Persons above the common Rank are always carry'd to the Place of Execution in Chairs, or cover'd Carts.

When the Criminal is to be condemn'd, the Mandarin orders him to be brought into the Tribunal, where commonly there is prepar'd a short Repast; at least before Sentence is given, they never fail to offer him Wine, which is call'd Tsi-feng (†). After the Sentence is read, the Criminal sometimes breaks out into abusive Language and Invectives against those who condemn'd

(†) This Word Tsi [written in the French Tsi] is the same, with that made use of when they offer any thing to their Ancestors. [Such naked Remarks, which are too frequent in this Author, can be of no great use to the Reader, without farther Explanation. All I can conjecture from it is, that Tsi-feng signifies offer'd or Offering Wine.]

condemn'd him; when this happens the Mandarin hears all with Patience and Compassion, but afterwards they put a Gag in his Mouth, and lead him to Execution. Some of those who go on Foot, sing all the Way, and drink cheerfully of the Wine presented them by their Acquaintance; who wait their coming, in order to give them this last Proof of their Friendship.

There is another kind of Punishment which favours of Cruelty, and wherewith Rebels and Traytors are usually punish'd: this they call Cutting in ten thousand Pieces. The Executioner fastens the Criminal to a Post, and tearing the Skin off his Head pulls it over his Eyes: he mangles him afterwards in all Parts of his Body, which he cuts in many Pieces; and when he is tired with this barbarous Exercise, he abandons him to the Cruelty of the Populace and Spectators. This has been often practised under the Reigns of some Emperors, who are looked upon as barbarous; for according to the Laws, this third Punishment consists in cutting the Body of the Criminal into several Pieces, opening his Belly, and throwing the Carcase into the River, or a Ditch, as is done by great Malefactors.

Unless in some extraordinary Cases, which are mentioned in the Body of the Chinese Laws, or wherein the Emperor permits Execution upon the Spot, no Mandarin of superior Tribunal can pronounce definitive Sentence of Death. The Judgments passed on all Persons for Crimes worthy of Death, are to be examin'd, agreed to, and subscrib'd by the Emperor. The Mandarins send to Court an Account of the Trials with their own Decision, mentioning the particular Law on which their Sentences is grounded; for instance, Such a one is guilty of a Crime, and the Law declares, that those who are convicted of it, shall be strangled, for which Reason I have condemned him to be strangled. These Informations being arrived at Court, the Superior Tribunal of Criminal Affairs, examines the Facts, the Circumstances, and the Sentence. If the Fact is not clearly stated, or the Tribunal has need of fresh Informations, it presents a Memorial to the Emperor, containing the Case and the Judgment of the inferior Mandarin, with this Addition: To form a right Judgment, it is necessary that we should be informed of such a Circumstance; therefore we are of Opinion that the Matter should be sent back to such a Mandarin, that he may give us such Light therein as we could wish to have. The Emperor makes what Order he pleases, but his Clemency always inclines him to do what is desired; that the Sentence, which concerns a Man's Life, may not be pronounc'd rashly, and without the most convincing Proof. When the superior Tribunal has receiv'd the Informations requir'd, it presents a second time its Deliberation to the Emperor, who either confirms the same, or else diminishes the Rigor of the Punishment; nay, sometimes he remits the Memorial, writing these Words with his own Hand: Let the Tribunal deliberate farther upon this Affair, and make their Report to me.

In China every thing is canvass'd with the strictest Care, when they are about condemning a Man to death. The Emperor [Yong-ching] gave Orders in 1725, that thenceforward none should be put to Death till after his Trial was presented to him three times. Agreeable to this Order the Criminal-Tribunal observe the following Method: Some time before the appointed Day, they cause to be transcribed in a Book, all the Informations that, during the Course of the Year, have been sent them from the inferior Judges, to which they join the Sentence given by each, and that of the Tribunal of the Court. This Tribunal afterwards assemble to read, review, correct, add, or retrench whatever they think fit. When every thing is settled two fair Copies are made out, one of which is presented to the Emperor for his private Reading and Examination; the other is kept to be read in the Presence of all the principal Officers of the Supreme Courts, that it may be amended as they shall advise. Thus in China the most vile and despicable Wretch enjoys a Privilege, which in Europe is granted to none but Persons of the greatest Distinction; namely, the Right of being judg'd and condemn'd by all the Houses of Parliament assembled in a Body (A.) The second Copy having been examin'd and corrected they present it to the Emperor; then it is written over again ninety eight times in the Tartarian Language, and ninety-seven in the Chinese: All which Transcripts being put into his Majesty's Hands, he gives them to be examin'd by his most skilful Officers of both Nations who are at Pe-king.

When the Crime is very enormous, the Emperor, in signing the dead Warrant, adds: As soon as this Order shall be receiv'd, let him be executed without any Delay.

As for capital Crimes, which have nothing uncommon in them, the Emperor writes this Sentence underneath, Let the Criminal be kept in Prison till Autumn, and then be executed. For there is a fix'd Day in Autumn, whereon all Capital Offenders are put to Death.

The ordinary Torture in China to extort Confession, is extremely acute and painful. 'Tis inflict'd both on the Feet and Hands: for the former they make Use of an Instrument composed of three cross Pieces of Wood, of which that in the middle being fix'd, the two other move and turn about; in this Machine they put the Feet of the Criminal, and squeeze them so violently, that they make the Ankle Bone quite flat. They inflict it on the Hands by placing

(A) Nay, it is a much greater Privilege, and such as alone must convey a most noble Idea, both of the exceeding Happiness of the People and Mildness of the Government. For absolute and limited Monarchies are but Names, that is most limited and eligible, where the Constitution is best calculated for securing the Rights of the Subject, and preventing the Oppression of Ministers and Magistrates. Such is the Monarchy of China: where, the People are more free, from being in the most profound Subjection; and where, the most despotic Power in the Prince is reconciled, with the most perfect Liberty and Property of the Subject. little Pieces of Wood between the Fingers of the Criminal, and tying them very hard with Cords, leave him for some time in this Torment. The Chinese have Remedies to diminish and even stupify the Sense of Pain during the Torture; others to heal the Prisoner who indeed recovers by their Assistance, sometimes in a few Days, the former use of his Limbs (B). From the ordinary Torture I pass to the extraordinary, which is inflicted for great Crimes, especially High Treason, in order to discover the Accomplices, when the Fact has been proved; it consists in making slight Gashes on the Offender's Body, and stripping off the Skin in narrow Slips like Fillets.

These are all the kinds of corporal Punishment appointed by the Chinese Laws for Malefactors; tho' as I said before, some Monarchs have inflicted others of a more inhuman Nature, but they have been detested by the Nation, and look'd upon as Tyrants for it: Such was the Emperor Cbew, whose horrible Cruelties are mention'd in the Annals of the Empire. [p. 157.] This Prince, at the Instigation of Ta-kye, one of his Concubines, with whom he was desperately enamour'd, invented a new kind of Punishment call'd Pau-lo: It was a column of Brass twenty Cubits high, and eight in Diameter, hollow in the middle like Pbalari's Bull, with openings in three Places for putting in fewel. To this they fastned the Criminals, and making them embrace it with their Arms and Legs, lighted a great Fire in the Inside; and thus roasted them till they were reduc'd to Ashes, in the Presence of that Monster of a Woman who seem'd to take Delight in so dreadful a Spectacle.

Game.

IT may be said, without Exaggeration, that China is one of the most fruitful, as well as large and beautiful Countries in the World: A single Province of it might make a considerable Dominion, and flatter the Ambition of no mean Prince. Almost all that other Kingdoms afford may be found in China, but China produces an infinite Number of Things, which are to be found no where else.

This Plenty may be attributed as well to the Depth of the Soil, as to the painful Industry of the Inhabitants, and the great Number of Lakes, Rivers, Brooks, and Canals, wherewith the Country is water'd. There are few Cities or even Burroughs in the Southern Provinces, but what one may go to by Water, because no Part is destitute of Rivers or Canals. Rice is sown twice a Year in some Provinces, and is much better than that which grows in Europe. The Land produces various other Sorts of Grain, such as Wheat, Barley, Millet of several kinds, Beans, Pease that are always green, besides black and yellow Pease, which they make use of instead of Oats to feed their Horses; but in the Southern Parts all these Grains are of no esteem, in companion of Rice, which is their common Food, as Wheat is in the Northern.

Of all the Flesh of Animals, eaten in Europe, that of Hogs is reckon'd most delicious by the Chinese, especially the Rich who love their appetites; they prefer it to all the rest, and make it, as it were, the Foundation of their Feasts. Almost all People keep Hogs in their Houses, to fatten, for they eat them the year round; it must be own'd that they are far better tasted than those in Europe, nor is there finer Eating in the World than a Chinese Ham. Wild-Mare's Flesh is also in great Esteem; and besides Fowls, Hares, Rabbits, and other Animals, that we have in Plenty, Stags-pizzles, (c) Birds-nests already spoken of [p. 302.] Bears-Paws, and the feet of diverse Wild Creatures, which are brought ready salted from Siam, Kamboya, and Tartary, are Dainties fit for the Tables of Great Lords. The People are very well pleas'd with the Flesh of Horses and Dogs, even tho they dye of Age or Sickness; nay, they do not scruple eating Cats, Rats, and such like Animals, which are openly sold in the Streets. It is very good Diversion to see the Butchers, when they are carrying the Flesh of Dogs to any place, or dragging five or six to the Slaughter: for all the Dogs, drawn together by the cries of those going to be kill'd, or the smell of those already slain, fall in a Body upon the Butchers, who are oblig'd to go always arm'd with a long Staff or Whip to defend themselves from their Attacks; and to keep the Places close shut where they kill them, if they wou'd do it undisturb'd.

Besides the domestic Birds, they have on the Rivers and Lakes great Plenty of Water-fowl, especially Wild-ducks; the manner of taking which deserves mention. They put their heads into the Shells of large Gourds, with holes made in them to see and breathe through; then going naked into the Water, they walk or swim so low that nothing appears but the Gourds. The Ducks being accusom'd to see Gourds floating on the surface, and to play about them, approach them without Fear; when the Duck-hunter, taking them by the Feet, pulls them under Water to prevent their making a noise, wrings their Necks, and fastens them to his Girdle, pursuing his Exercise till he has gotten a great number.

Game is exceeding plenty. In several parts of Pe-king, during the Winter, are to be seen great Heaps of Animals, and Fowl of various kinds, harden'd by the Frost and free from Corruption. There

(B) If this be so, methinks the Chinese Surgeons must far excel the European; and their Method of curing Wounds and Contusions be well worth enquiring after.

(c) These Dainties are in great Request in several Parts of England, and are call'd Inch-pies in many Places.

There are a prodigious number of Bucks, Does, Wild-bores, Goats, Elks, Hares, Rabbits, Squirrels, Cats, Field-Rats, Geese, Ducks, Wood-cocks, Partridges, Pheasants, Quails, and several other Creatures not to be met with in Europe, which are sold exceeding cheap.

The Rivers, Lakes, Pools, and even Canals are full of all sorts of Fish: nay, they abound in the very Ditches, which are made in the middle of the Fields to preserve the Water, whereof the Rice stands in continual Need. These Ditches are stock'd with the Water mixt with the Spawn of Fish, which, as we have already mention'd, [p. 19.] are carry'd in Boats into all Parts of China. The young Fry being small, and almost imperceptible, are fed with Lentils that grow in the Marshes, or yelks of Eggs, much in the same manner as domestic Animals are nourish'd in Europe; they preserve the large Fish by means of Ice, and filling great Boats with them, carry them as far as Pe-king. There is scarce any sort of Fish in Europe but what is to be met with in China, as; Lampreys, Carps, Soals, Salmon, Trouts, Shads, Sturgeons, &c. besides a great many others of an excellent Taste, quite unknown to us; whereof I shall mention a few by way of specimen, it being impossible to give an account of all the different kinds.

One of those in greatest Esteem, and which weighs about forty Pound, is call'd Che-kyang-yu, that is, the Armour-Fish; it is so nam'd because its Back, Belly, and Sides, are cover'd with sharp Scales, plac'd in strait Rows, one over another, much like Tiles on the Roof of an House. It is an admirable Fish, exceeding white, and tastes not unlike Veal. In calm Weather they catch another sort of delicate Fish, which the People of the Country call the Meal-Fish, on account of its extraordinary Whiteness, and because the black Pupils of its Eyes are inclos'd with two Circles resembling very bright Silver. There are such prodigious Shoals of them in the Sea near the Province of Kyang-nan, that they commonly take four hundred Weight of them at one draught of the Net.

One of the best sorts of Fish China affords, resembles a Sea-Bream: it is caught in the fourth and fifth Moon, and commonly sold for a little more than a Farthing a Pound, whereof it weighs five or six, and for about twice as much, twenty Leagues up the Country, where it is carried. When this Fishing time is over, there comes from the Coasts of Che-kyang large Barks, loaded with another kind of fresh Fish resembling New-foundland Cod; it is incredible what a Consumption there is of them, in the proper Season, along the Coasts from Fo-kyen to Sban-tong, besides the prodigious Quantity that is salted in the Country where they are caught. The plenty of this fishery appears in that they are sold at a very low Price, notwithstanding the Merchants are at great expence to procure them: for they must first buy a Licence of the Mandarin to trade, then they must hire a Bark, buy the Fish as soon as it is caught, and lay them in the Hold, on Beds of Salt, in the same manner as they pack up Herrings in Tuns at Diepe; by which means the Fish is transported into the most distant Provinces, even in the time of the greatest Heats. There is likewise brought a surprizing Quantity of other Salt-fish from the Sea-coast, from the sixth to the ninth Moon. In the Province of Kyang-nan, one meets with very large Fish, which, coming out of the Sea or yellow River, throw themselves into vast Plains cover'd with Water; but matters are so ingeniously contriv'd (n), that the Water runs off as soon as the Fish are entred: so that being left on dry Land they are taken without Difficulty, salted, and sold to the Merchants, who load their Barks with them at a very cheap Rate.

In the great River Yang tse kyang, over against the City Kyew-kyang fu, where it is above half a League broad, they catch all sorts of excellent Fish; and among others, one call'd Whang-yu, that is, the yellow Fish. It is of an extraordinary Size, (some of them weighing upwards of eight hundred Pound) as well as an exquisite Taste, nor is there any Fish in the World that eats more firm; they are caught only at certain Seasons, when they come out of the Lake Tong-ting hu into this River. This Lake, which is also call'd the Lake of Zbau [or Jau chaw] is form'd by the Confluence of four Great Rivers, each as large as the Loire, which come from the Province of Kyang-si. It is thirty Leagues in Circumference, and is subject to Storms like the Seas of China, it being the greatest Lake belonging thereto: for almost every Province has Lakes of prodigious Extent, such are the Hong-tse Hu, the Ta Hu, the Poyang Hu &c.

We have already spoken, in the general View of this Empire, of a very extraordinary Fish call'd the Golden or Silver Fish, which the Grandees keep in their Courts or Gardens as an Ornament to their Palaces; and P. Le Comte, from whom we gave the Account, adds some farther Particulars which ought not to be omitted. "These Fish (says he) are commonly the length of one's Finger, and proportionably thick. The Male is of a beautiful Red from the Head to more than half way down the Body, and the remaining Part, together with the Tail, is gilded; but accompany'd with such a bright and dazling Lustre, that our best Gildings fall vastly short of it. The Female is white, the Tail, and some part of the Body, having a perfect Resemblance of Silver. The Tail of neither kind is smooth and flat, like that of other Fish, but forms a sort of Tuft, thick and long, which adds a particular Beauty to this little Creature, whose Body beside is finely shap'd. Those who feed them ought to take great Care, because they are exceeding delicate, and sensible of the least Injury from the Weather. They are kept in a very large and deep Basin; at the Bottom of which there is commonly put an earthen Pan, turn'd upside down, and made with Holes in it, that in hot Weather they may retire and have a Shelter from the Sun. The Water is chang'd three or four times a Week, but

(n) This must be a very curious Contrivance; I wish the Author had given some Account of it.

- “but in such a manner, that the fresh runs in while the other runs out, that the Bason may never be dry; they likewise strew on the Surface certain Herbs, which keep the Water always green and cool. If they are oblig'd to transport the Fish from one Vessel to another, great Care must be taken not to handle them, for those which are touch'd die soon after or decay; therefore they make Use of a small Net, the Mouth of which is fasten'd round a Hoop, wherewith they take them up by degrees, the Threads being woven so close together that they have time to put them into fresh Water before the old runs out. A great Noise, like that of Guns or Thunder, a strong Smell, or a violent Motion, hurts and sometimes kills them; as I observ'd upon the Sea, where we carry'd some of them, every time the Guns were fired, or Pitch and Tar were melted. Besides, they live upon almost nothing; the imperceptible Worms that are bred in the Water, or the little earthy Particles mixt with it, are sufficient to keep them alive. Nevertheless from time to time they throw in small Bits of Paste: but there is nothing better for them than Wafers, which soak'd make a kind of Broth they are extremely fond of, being in reality, very proper Food for such delicate Creatures.
- “In hot Countries they multiply exceedingly, provided the Spawn, that swims upon the Surface of the Water, be carefully taken away; for otherwise they would devour it. Being plac'd in a particular Vessel expos'd to the Sun, it is kept there till the heat animates the young Fry. They are at first quite black, which colour some always retain; but the rest change by degrees to red or white, to Gold or Silver, according to their different kinds. The Gold and Silver begin to appear at the end of the Tail, and extend more or less towards the middle of their Bodies, according to their respective Natures.
- Some new Informations gain'd from the Chinese, who deal in these small Fish, and get their Livelihood by breeding and selling them, give me occasion to make some farther Remarks:
- I. Tho' they are commonly no longer than one's Finger, some grow to the length and thickness of the largest Herrings.
- II. It is not the red or white Colour that distinguishes the Male from the Female: but the latter are known by several small white Spots about their Gills, and little Fins that are near them, and the Males, by having these places bright and shining.
- III. Tho' the Tail is commonly in the shape of a Tuft, yet often it is like that of other Fish.
- IV. Besides the small Balls of Paste above mention'd, they give them the yolks of Eggs boil'd hard, or lean Pork, dry'd in the Sun, and reduc'd to very fine Powder. They sometimes put Snails into the Bason where they are kept, because their Slime, which sticks to the sides of the Vessel is excellent Food for these little Creatures, who struggle about getting to it. They are also very fond of little reddish Worms, found in the Water of some Reservoirs.
- V. They seldom multiply after they are shut up in these Vessels, because they are too much confin'd: for if you would have them breed, you must put them in Reservoirs, where the Water runs, and is deep in some Places.
- VI. After the Water is drawn out of the Well, to fill the Vessel where the Fish are put, it ought to be left to settle, five or six Hours, otherwise it would be too crude and unwholesome.
- VII. If you perceive that the Fish are spawning, which happens about the Beginning of May, you should scatter Grass upon the Surface of the Water that the Spawn may cling to it; and when you perceive the spawning is over, or that the Males cease to follow the Females, the Fish must be remov'd into another Vessel, that the Spawn may be expos'd in the Sun for three or four Days: and at the End of forty or fifty Days, the Water must be chang'd, because the small Fry begin then to appear distinctly.
- These Remarks will not be useless, in case the Golden Fish should ever be brought into Europe, as they have already been carry'd to Batavia by the Dutch.
- Besides the Nets and Lines that are us'd by the Chinese, the first in their great Fisheries, the latter in their small, they have another way of fishing, which is singular enough, and very diverting: for in several Provinces they rear a certain Bird resembling a Raven, but the Neck is a great deal longer; the Beak also is long, sharp, and crooked: It being a kind of Cormorant, which they teach to fish, much in the same manner as we bring up Dogs to catch Hares.
- In the Morning when the Sun rises, one may see on the Rivers a considerable Number of Boats, and several of these Birds sitting at the Head of them. Then the Fisher-men turning their Boats about, at the Signal given by striking the Water with an Oar, the Cormorants fly into the River, one here, another there, and diving to the Bottom, seize the Fish they light on by the middle; then rising up again, they carry it to the Bark: where the Fisherman receiving it, takes the Bird and holding its Head downwards, passes his Hand along the Neck to make it disgorge the small Fish that it had swallow'd, but is hindered from going into the Gullet by a Ring put on the lower Part of the Neck; which, after the fishing is quite over, they take off and give them something to eat. When the Fish happens to be too large for one Bird, they mutually assist each other; one takes the Tail, another the Head, and bring it to the Boat to their Master.
- There is another way of taking Fish, which is very simple, and gives but little Trouble; for this Purpose they make use of long narrow Boats, nailing on each side, from one end to the other, a Plank two Foot broad. This Plank is japan'd with very white shining Varnish, and slants gently till it almost touches the Top of the Water; in the Night-time, when it is us'd, they turn it towards the Moon, that the Reflection may increase its Splendor: so that the Fish, which are sporting, easily mistaking the Colour of the japan'd Plank for that of the Water, leap often on that Side, and fall either on the Plank or into the Boat.

In some Places the Soldiers shoot the Fish very dexterously with Arrows, which are fasten'd to the Bow with a Pack-thread, as well to prevent their being lost, as to draw out the Fish when it is shot. In other Places there is such a great Quantity in the Mud, that Men standing up to the Girdle in the Water, pierce them with a three-fork'd Spear.

The Land is not less productive in the multitude and variety of Fruits, than the Rivers and Lakes are of Fish. Here are Pears, Apples, Peaches, Apricots, Quinces, Figs and Grapes, especially a kind of excellent Muscadine; likewise Nuts, Plumbs, Cherries, Chestnuts, Pomegranates, and almost all other Fruits to be met with in Europe, besides many other Sorts not to be found there at all.

Variety of Fruit in
China.

However it must be confess'd that none of these Fruits, except the Muscadine-Grapes and Pomegranates, is to be compar'd to ours; because the Chinese are not so skilful as the Europeans in cultivating the Trees, and improving the Flavour of the Fruit: They have too much Occasion for their Land to propagate Rice and Wheat; yet their Peaches are as good as ours, nay one kind of them is better. In some Places they are unwholesome, and must be eaten sparingly, because they bring on a Dysentery, which is very dangerous in China. Their Apricots would not be bad, did they but give them Time to ripen.

but not so good as in Europe.

It is from China that our Oranges came, but we have only one Kind, whereas they have several excellent Sorts, especially one, which is in great Esteem: they are small, and the Rind is thin, smooth and very soft. There is another Sort that comes from the Province of Fo-kyen; that has an admirable Taste; they are larger, and the Rind is of a beautiful Red: The Europeans commonly say that a Dish of these Oranges would become the toppingest Tables in Europe. They have larger at Kan-ton, which are yellow, agreeable to the Taste, and very wholesome; they give them even to sick Persons, roasting them first in hot Embers, then cutting them in two, and filling them with Sugar; the Juice being reckon'd a great Pectoral. Others have a sharp Taste, and are us'd by the Europeans in Sauces.

Oranges of several sorts.

Lemons and Citrons are very common in some Southern Provinces, and extraordinary large; but these are scarce ever eaten, being only made use of for Ornaments in Houses, where they put seven or eight in a China Dish, to please the Sight and Smell; however, they are exceeding good when candy'd. Another sort of Limon, not much larger than a Walnut, is likewise in great Esteem; it is round, green, and sharp, being reckon'd excellent for Ragous. The Tree that bears them is sometimes put in Boxes, and serves to adorn the outward Courts or Halls of Houses.

Lemons and Citrons.

Besides Melons of the European kind, there are two other Sorts in China; one of which is very small, and yellow within, has a sweet Taste, and may be eaten Rind and all in the same manner as we sometimes eat Apples. The other kind, which is call'd a Water-Melon, is very large and long; the Inside is white, and sometimes red, containing a sweet cooling Juice, that quenches Thirst, and never does any Harm, even in the hottest Weather. To these may be added another Sort still better, which comes from a place in Tartary call'd Hami, at a great Distance from Pe-king. These Melons have this peculiar Quality, that they keep fresh for five or six Months together; great Provision is made of them every Year for the Emperor: but we have already spoken of them elsewhere.

Melons.

To the above-mention'd Fruits, which we are acquainted with, we ought to add those that are known to us only by the Relations of Travellers, and seem to have been imported into China from the neighbouring Islands, where they are found in very great Plenty: I mean the Ananas, the Guavaes, the Bananas, the Cocoas, &c. But besides all these sorts of Fruit, which it has in common with other Countries, there are several others of a peculiar kind, and very good Taste, not to be met with any where else; such are the Tsé-tsé, the Li-chi, and the Long-yen (A), which I have already describ'd. [See p. 8.]

Uncommon
Fruits.

The Plains are so much taken up with Rice, that there is scarce a Tree to be seen in them; but the Mountains, especially those of Shen-si, Ho-nan, Quang-tong, and Fo-kyen, are cover'd with Forests, containing large strait Trees of all kinds, very proper to be used in public Edifices, and especially for building Ships; there are Pines, Ashes, Elms, Oaks, Palm-Trees, Cedars, and several others little known in Europe.

Trees.

Other Mountains are famous for their Mines, containing all sorts of Metals; for their Medicinal Fountains, Simples, and Minerals. There you meet with Mines of Gold, Silver, Iron, Copper, Tin, white Copper, Quicksilver, Lapis Armenus, Cinnabar, Vitriol, Allum, Jasper, Rubies, Rock-Crystal, Load-Stones, Porphyry, and Quarries of different kinds of Marble.

Mines.

The Mountains also, especially those in the Northern Provinces, afford vast Quantities of Pit-Coal, of which there is a very great Consumption; it is black, and is found between the Rocks in very deep Veins: then being broken into Pieces, it is burnt in the Stove belonging to the Kitchen. Some pound it, and wetting the Dust with Water, make it into Lumps, which sort of Fuel is us'd especially by the common People. This Coal is very difficult to light, but when once it has kindled, it casts a great Heat, and lasts a long time. It sometimes yields a very bad Smell, and will suffocate those who sleep near it, if they have not the Precaution to keep close by them a Vessel full of Water; which draws the Smoke in such a manner that at length it smells as disagreeably itself.

Pit-Coal.

(A) In the Original Long yen, but this seems to be a Mistake, it being written Long yen, p. 8, as well as in the Explanatory Table of Terms.

Much us'd for Fewel.

The Cooks belonging to the Mandarins and other great Men commonly make use of it, as well as Mechanics: such as Victuallers, Dyers, Black-Smiths, Lock-Smiths, &c. however these latter find that it makes the Iron hard: It is also much us'd in Wind-furnaces, for smelting Copper. These Coal-Pits are likewise found in the high Mountains near Pe-king, and seem to be inexhaustible, considering this great City and the whole Province have been constantly supply'd from thence; and yet there is not a Family, how poor soever, but what has a Stove heated with this sort of Fewel, which lasts a great deal longer than Charcoal.

Herbs and Roots.

Their Kitchen-Gardens are well furnish'd with Herbs, Roots, and Pulse of all sorts; besides the Kinds that we have, they have many others we know nothing of, which are more valuable than ours. They cultivate them very carefully, as being in conjunction with Rice, the chief Food of the People: Every Morning an infinite Number of Waggons and Beasts laden with them enter Pe-king.

Salt.

how got out of the Earth.

As it would be difficult to transport Salt from the Sea-Coasts into the Western Parts bordering on Tartary, Providence has wonderfully supply'd their Wants in that particular: for beside the Salt-Pits found in certain Provinces, there is in other parts a sort of grey Earth scatter'd up and down several Districts in Spots, containing between three and four Acres each, which yield a prodigious Quantity of Salt. The manner of getting this Salt out of the Earth is remarkable: they make the Surface of the Land as smooth as Glass, with a little sloping, that the Water may not lie on it; and when the Sun has dry'd it very well, so that it appears white from the Particles of Salt which are mix'd with it, they take it up, and raise it in little Heaps, beating it very well all over, that the Rain may soak into it. Afterwards spreading it upon large Tables, that are a little inclining, and have Ledges about four or five Fingers high, they pour a certain Quantity of fresh Water thereon; which soaking through dissolves all the Particles of Salt, and carries them along with it into a large Earthen Vessel, whereinto it runs, Drop by Drop, by means of a little Tube made on Purpose. The Earth, thus drain'd, does not become useless, but is laid aside, and in a few Days time becoming quite dry, they reduce it to Powder, and lay it in the same Spot from whence it was taken; where having lain seven or eight Days, it becomes impregnated as before with abundance of Saline Particles, which are again separated from it in the manner as above.

While the Men are working in this manner in the Fields, their Wives and Children are employ'd, in Huts built on the Place, in boiling the Salt Water, in very large, deep Iron Basons, over an Earthen Stove; with Holes made in it, in such manner that the Fire is communicated to all the Basons alike, the Smoak being carry'd off by a long Funnel, made in form of a Chimney, at the end of the Stove. When the Water has boiled for some time, it grows thick, and changes by degrees into a very white Salt, which they stir incessantly with a large Iron Spatula, till it is quite dry. Whole Forests would scarce suffice to maintain the Fire necessary for the Salt which is making all the Year round; but as often there are no Trees in these Places, Providence supplies that Defect with large Quantities of Reeds, which grow in their Neighbourhood.

No Spices in
China.

To say the Truth, the Soil of China produces no sort of Spice, except a kind of Pepper, very different from that of the East-Indies; but the Chinese meeting with it in Countries very near their own, procure it with so much Ease by their Commerce, that they have as great Plenty of it as if it grew at home.

Tho' most of the Necessaries of Life are found in all parts of the Empire, yet each Province yields something different from, and in greater abundance than, another; as appears from the Geographical Description already given of them.

Tartary, tho' full of Forests and Sand, is not intirely barren: for it furnishes the fine Skins of Sables, Foxes, and Tygers, whereof the rich Furrs are made; plenty of Roots and Simples very useful in Physic; an infinite Quantity of Horses for the Service of the Army; and numerous Herds of Cattle, which supply the Northern parts of China with Food.

Great Misery in China not withstanding so great Plenty.

Notwithstanding this great Plenty it is however true, though a kind of a Paradox, that the most rich and flourishing Empire in the World is in effect poor enough; for the Land, though so very extensive and fruitful, hardly suffices to support its Inhabitants. One may venture to say, that to live comfortably they have need of a Country as large again: the City of Kan-ton only, where such numbers of Europeans resort every Year, contains more than a Million of Souls; and in a large Town, not above three or four Leagues distant, there are more People than at Kan-ton itself. Extreme Misery forces them sometimes to terrible Extremes; so that if one examines things at Kan-ton a little closer, he will not be so much surpriz'd at Parents exposing several of their Children in the Streets, and giving their Daughters away for Slaves, or that such an immense People should be so much sway'd by Interest. It is rather to be wonder'd at, that nothing more tragical happens; and that in a Time of Scarcity, when such multitudes are ready to perish with Hunger, they should not have recourse to violent Methods, as well as the People of Europe: the Histories whereof furnish us with many Examples.

Chinese and Europeans
compared.

Extraordinary Trees.

Tho' I have spoken a good deal already of the Animals and Trees to be found in China, yet I shall here give some farther Account of the more extraordinary Kinds: If I omit the rest, it must be consider'd that it is not my Design to write a Natural History of the Empire, as has been already observ'd.

One of the most singular Trees, and which is not to be met with elsewhere, is the Tallow-Tree, call'd by the Chinese U-kyew-mü, being very common in the Provinces of Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, and Kyang-si. P. Martini has given a pretty exact Account of it in his Description of the City of Kin-wu, in the Province of Che-kyang. This Tree, which he compares to our Pear-trees, and is sometimes as tall as the larger sort of them; has also a great resemblance of the Aspin, and Birch-Tree, at least with respect to the Leaves, and long Stalks; but the Trunk and Branches are for the most part of the Shape of our Cherry-Trees. The Bark is of a whitish Grey, somewhat soft to the Touch. The little Branches are long, slender, flexible, and furnish'd with Leaves only from the Middle to the End; where they grow in a sort of Tuft, but more small than elsewhere, and often turning at the Edges so as to appear hollow like a Gondola. These Leaves are of a dark Green, sleek on the upper part, and whitish underneath; very thin, dry, moderately large, and in form of a Lozenge, only the Angles on the side are rounded off, and the End lengthen'd into a Point. They are join'd to the Branches by long Stalks, dry, and small; the Ribs of the Leaf, as well as its Fibres, are round, dry, and slender. In the latter Season, that is, towards November and December, they become red before they fall off, as happens to the Leaves of the Vine and Pear-Tree.

U kyew mü, or Tallow-
Tree,

The Fruit grows in Bunches, at the Extremity of the Branches; to which they are join'd by a very short woody Stalk, that seems to be a Continuation of the Branch itself. This Fruit is inclos'd in a hard, woody, brown Capsula, or Husk, a little rough, and of a triangular Figure; the Angles being rounded off, much in the same manner as those of the small Fruit, or red Berries of the Privet or Prime-Print, vulgarly call'd Priest-Cap. These Husks or Cases commonly inclose three small Kernels, each about the size of a Pea, and round, excepting on the Sides where they touch, which is a little flat. Every Kernel is inclos'd with a thin Covering of white Tallow, pretty hard. The Stalk divides itself, as it were, into three other smaller, or rather Strings; which pass through the middle of the Fruit, between the three Kernels, in such manner, that the ends of the Strings enter the upper ends of the Kernels, whereat they seem to hang. When the Husk, which is composed of six small hollow oval Leaves, begins to open and fall off, as it does by degrees, the Fruit discovering itself makes a very agreeable Sight, especially in Winter-time; for then these Trees appear cover'd over with small white Bunches, which one would take at a Distance for so many Nofegays. The Tallow that envelopes the Fruit, being broken off into one's Hand, easily melts, and yields a greasy Smell, not much unlike that of common Tallow.

its Fruit.

The Tallow
where generated, its Qualities.

Before the Fruit is quite ripe, it appears round, which is probably the Reason why P. Martini says it is round; unless having examin'd only a few, that were not perfect in their Kind, he thought this to be their natural Figure: for in reality some are defective as to Shape, and besides contain but one or two Nuts or Berries. The Nut has a pretty hard Shell including a kind of small Kernel, about the Bigness of a large Hempseed, which is cover'd with a brown Skin, and affords a great deal of Oyl; so that the same Fruit supplies the Chinese both with Tallow for their Candles, and Oyl for their Lamps.

The Kernel of the Fruit yields Lamp Oyl.

These Candles are like the Segment of a Cone, which they light at the broad End; and the Wick is a little Stick, or hollow Reed, round which they wrap Cotton Thread, or else the Pith of a Rush of the same Bigness: this Rush serves also for the Wick of Lamps. One end of the Reed or small Stick serves for lighting, and the other for fixing on the Candlestick, which is made with a Point to enter into the Hollow of the Reed. This sort of Candle, besides being thick and heavy, readily melts when touch'd with the Hand. The Light it gives is pretty clear, but a little yellowish; and as the Wick is solid, and changes while burning into a hard Coal, it is not easily snufft, they using Cizars made for the Purpose.

The Candles made of the Tallow.

In order to separate the Tallow from the Fruit, they pound the Shell and Nut both together, and boil it in Water; skimming off the Fat or Oyl as it rises to the Top, which condenses like Tallow when it is cold. To ten Pound of this Grease they sometimes put three of Linseed-Oyl, and a little Wax to give it a Body; whereof they make exceeding white Candles, tho' they also make red ones, by mixing Vermillion with the Composition.

One of the most useful Shrubs in all China is that producing the Cotton; which the Husbandmen, the same Day that they get in their Harvest, sow in the same Field, only breaking the Surface of the Ground with a Rake. After the Earth has been moisten'd with Rain or Dew, there grows up by degrees a small Shrub about two Foot high; the Flowers of which appear towards the beginning or middle of August, being generally yellow, but sometimes red. This Flower is succeeded by a small Button, growing in the Shape of a Pod of the Bigness of a Nut.

The Cotton Shrub.

The fortieth Day after the Appearance of the Flower, the Pod opens of itself; and cleaving in three Places, discovers three or four little Bags of Cotton, extremely white, and of the same Figure as the Cod of a Silk-Worm. They are fasten'd to the Bottom of the open Pod, and contain Seed for the following Year. It is then time to get in the Crop; but in fair Weather the Fruit is left expos'd to the Sun two or three Days more, that so being swell'd by the Heat the Profit may be greater.

The Cotton
grows in a Pod.

As all the Fibres of the Cotton are strongly fasten'd to the Seeds which they inclose, they make use of a sort of Wheel to separate them. This Engine consists of two very smooth Rowlers, one of Wood and the other of Iron, about a Foot long, and an Inch thick. They are plac'd so close together that there is no Vacancy between; and while one Hand gives Motion to the first Rowler, and the Foot to the second, the other Hand applies the Cotton, which, loosening by the Motion, passes on one side of the Engine, the Seed remaining on the other. Afterwards they card and spin the Cotton, whereof they make Callico.

The Tree
Kü-shu,

There is another Tree call'd Kü-shu, resembling our Fig-Tree, both with respect to the Wood of its Branches, and its Leaves; the Root commonly sends forth several Stalks or little Trunks like a Bush, and sometimes only one. The Trunk of some is strait, round, and nine or ten Inches thick. The Branches consist of a light pithy Wood, and are cover'd with a Bark like that of the Fig-Tree. The Leaf is deeply indented, especially in two Places, whereby it becomes as it were divided into three Leaves, curiously hollow'd on each side. In Colour on both sides, as well as the Contexture of the Fibres, it resembles the Leaf of the Fig-Tree; only it is larger, thicker, and rougher on the upper side, but the under side is very soft, being cover'd with a fine Down. Some of them are not hollow'd at all, and have the Figure of a longish Heart.

yields a sort of Size for Gilding.

This Tree yields a Milk, made use of by the Chinese in gilding with Leaf-Gold, which is drawn off in the following manner: They make in the Trunk one or more Horizontal and Perpendicular Incisions, and in the Slit put the Edge of a Sea-shell, or some such Receiver; into which the Milk distilling they afterwards put it all together, and in using it draw with a Pencil what Figures they please upon Wood or any other Matter whatever: this done they apply Leaf-Gold, which sticks so firmly thereon that it never comes off.

The Tree
Lung-ju-tsu.

The Tree, which the Chinese call Lung-ju-tsu, has a Trunk as large as our biggest Plum-Tree. It divides betimes into two or three thick Branches, and these again into smaller. The Bark is of a reddish grey Colour, and spotted like the Filbert-Tree; but the Extremity of the Branches is knotty, crooked, rough, and full of Pith, like the Walnut-Tree. The Fruit is somewhat oval, and when green, nearly resembles Cherries, both in Colour and Shape, as well as the Stalk; which last is green and stringy; extremely long, and divided into several Branches, each whereof has one of these Berries hanging at the end. The Skin of the Fruit in some Places is full of little red Spots, is pretty tough, and incloses a greenish Substance, which when ripe becomes like Pap: they use it in Winter to rub the Hands with, and prevent Chilblains.

This Fruit has a very hard Stone, like a Cherry-Stone, but a little oblong, and indented with five, six, and sometimes seven Furrows. This Stone receives its Nourishment through a pretty large round Hole, that grows straighter, as it approaches the inclosed Kernel, which is small, and cover'd with a blackish Skin, not so hard as that of the Pippin of an Apple. Of the Trunk of this Tree they make Boards for common uses.

If the Chinese delighted, as we do in Europe, to adorn their Gardens, and make fine Alleys, they might, by cultivating their Flowers, and employing certain Trees peculiar to their own Country, have very agreeable Walks; but as nothing seems to them more ridiculous than to walk backward and forward, merely for the sake of Walking, they take no care to make use of the Advantages which Nature has bestow'd upon them.

The Tree
Mo-lyen.

Among the Trees that I am speaking of, there is one call'd Mo-lyen, as thick as the small of one's Leg; its Branches are slender, full of Pith, and cover'd with a red Rind, speckled with whitish Spots, like a Filbert-Tree. They have not many Leaves, but to make amends for that Defect, they are very large, being broader towards the Top than in the Middle or lower part. They are thin and pretty dry; their Ribs and principal Fibres are cover'd with a fine whitish Down. They are join'd to the Tree by Stalks, which spread so much towards the Bottom, that it may be said they embrace the Branch, and that the Branch proceeds from it, as out of a little Tube, making an Elbow in this Place.

From amidst the Stalks proceed little Buds of an oval Figure, cover'd with Down; which, opening in December, or the Depth of Winter, become large Flowers, like the Mountain-Lilly, compos'd of seven or eight Leaves full of long Fibres, of an oval Figure, and pointed at the Extremities. Some of these Trees bear yellow Flowers, some red, and others white; the Leaves fall at the same time, and often even before the Flowers are open'd.

The Tree
La-mwe.

Another Tree call'd La-mwe has some Resemblance of our Bay-Tree as to the size and figure, as well as the shape of its Branches; which yet are wider, and furnish'd with Leaves opposite each other, growing by Pairs on short Stalks. The greatest Leaves are almost as large as those of the common Laurel, but neither so thick, nor so dry; growing less and less in proportion to their Distance from the end of the Branch. In the Depth of Winter there proceed from between the Leaves small yellow Flowers, of an agreeable Smell, not much unlike that of the Rose.

The Tree
U-tong-shu.

Nothing can be fitter to adorn a Garden than the Tree call'd U-tong-shu; which is very large, and resembles the Sycamore; its Leaves are long, broad, and join'd to a stalk of a Foot in Length. This Tree is so bushy, and croud'd with Tufts, that the Rays of the Sun cannot penetrate. The manner of bearing its Fruit is very extraordinary: towards the end of August there grow at the extremities of the Branches, instead of Flowers, small Tufts of Leaves, which are different from the rest, being more white, soft, and not so broad. On the Edge of every Leaf are generated three or four small Grains of the bigness of a Pea, containing a white Substance, of a Taste not unlike the Kernel of a Hazle-nut before it is ripe.

The Tree call'd Cba-wba would also be a great Ornament for Gardens. There are four kinds of it, which bear Flowers, and resemble our Spanish-Laurel in the Wood and Leaves: these latter do not fall off during the Winter. The Trunk is commonly as thick as one's Thigh. The Top is shap'd like the Spanish-Laurel. Its Wood is of a whitish Grey, and very sleek. The Leaves, which are rang'd alternately on each side of the Branches, are as large as those of the Spanish-Laurel, but of an oval Figure, pointed at the ends, and indented on the edges like a Saw; they are also more thick and firm, being of a dark Green on the upper side, like the Leaf of an Orange-tree, and yellow underneath, with pretty thick Stalks.

At the Place where the Stalks join to the Tree proceed Buds of the Bigness, Figure, and Colour of a Hazle-nut; they are cover'd with fine white Hair, and have a Ground like that of Sattin. In the Month of December these Buds become Flowers, which are double and of a reddish Colour like small Roses; they are supported by a Calix or Cup, and join'd immediately to the Branch without any Stalks.

The Trees of the second kind are very high: the Leaf is rounded at the end, and the Flowers, which are large and red, being intermix'd with the green Leaves, make a very agreeable show. The two other kinds bear Flowers also, but they are smaller and whitish: the middle of this Flower is full of small Filaments, which have each a yellow flat Top, much like those in common Roses, with a small round Pistil in the middle; at the bottom whereof is a small green Ball, which as it grows, forms the Film, inclosing the Seed.

There is another remarkable kind of Tree, partaking somewhat both of the Juniper and Cypress; for which reason the Chinese call it Tse-fong, that is, Juniper, and Ywen-pe, or Cypress. The Trunk, which is about a Foot and a half in Circumference, sends forth Branches almost from the very Ground, subdivided into a great number of others, which stretching out at some Distance from the Trunk, form a thick green Bush. The Tree is cover'd with a Multitude of Leaves, some like Cypress, and the rest like those of Juniper; that is to say, the latter are long, narrow, and sharp, having this peculiarity, that they are dispos'd along the Boughs in Rows four, five, or six in Number: so that looking on the Boughs from the end, they appear like Stars of four, five, or six Rays; the Leaves of the first Row covering those of the under Rows so exactly, that thro' the Spaces between, one may see distinctly to the bottom of the Bough. The Boughs or Twigs, which are cover'd with these long Leaves, are found principally at the lower part of the Branches, for towards the Top you behold nothing but Cypress.

Nature seems to have taken Pleasure, in mingling these two sorts of Leaves in such a manner, that some Branches are entirely Cypress, and these are the more large and numerous; others entirely Juniper; some are half one and half the other: in short, sometimes one beholds a few Cypress Leaves grafted at the end of a Juniper Bough; at other times some small Juniper Bough shooting from the bottom of a Cypress Branch. The Bark of this Tree is somewhat rugged and of a greyish brown Colour, inclining a little to the red in some Places. The Wood is of a reddish white, like that of the Juniper, with a spice of Turpentine in it. The Leaves, besides the Smell of Cypress, have an aromatic Scent, but their Taste is tartish and very bitter. The Tree bears small round green Berries little larger than those of Juniper; the Pulp is of an Olive green, and has a strong Smell. The Fruit is join'd to the Branches by long Stalks of the same Nature as the Leaves: It contains two reddish seeds in the shape of Hearts, and as hard as Grape-Stones. The Trunk of some of these Trees is tall and slender, having Branches no where but at the top, which ends in a Point almost like the Cypress: there are others of the Dwarf-kind, growing no higher than seven or eight Foot; but as their Trunk and Branches are crooked and wrinkled, there is reason to believe the Chinese stunt their Growth by cutting them. When the Tree is young, all the Leaves are long, like those of Juniper; but when it is old, they resemble the Cypress.

I should never have done were I to describe the rest of the uncommon Trees or Shrubs, to be met with in China; and yet I cannot possibly neglect to speak of the famous Plant call'd Yin feng, which is so much esteem'd in the Empire, where it bears a very great Price, and is consider'd as the most excellent Cordial. It grows no where but in Tartary, for that which comes from the Province of Se-chwen is not worth mentioning. As P. Tartoux had full Opportunity and Leisure to examine this Plant attentively on the Spot, when he assisted in making the Map of the Country by the Emperors Order, he has drawn it according to its proper Dimensions, and explain'd its Properties and Use as follows:

"The most skilful Physicians of China, says he, mix it in all the Medicines they prepare for the great Lords; the Price being too high for the common People; they pretend that it is a Sovereign Remedy for Decays caus'd by excessive Labour, either of Body or Mind; that it dissolves Phlegm, heals the Weakness of the Lungs, cures Pleurifies, stops Vomiting, strengthens the Stomach and creates an Appetite; cures the Vapours, and shortness of Breath by strengthening the Breast; fortifies the Vital Spirits, generates Lympha in the Blood; in short, is good for Vertigo's and Dimness of Sight, and prolongs the Life of old Persons.

"It is hardly to be imagin'd that the Chinese and Tartars would set so great a value on this Root, if it did not constantly produce good Effects; even those who are in Health frequently use it to strengthen their Constitution. As for me I am perswaded that if it was in the Hands of Europeans, who understand Pharmacy, it would prove an excellent Remedy, after they had examined the nature of it, and found the proper quantity to be given in different Disorders. It is very certain that it rarifies the Blood, as well as warms and puts it in motion; that it assists Digestion, and strengthens in a sensible manner. After having design'd what I shall describe

- “ in the Sequel, I felt my Pulse to know what Condition it was in: I then took one half of the root quite raw and unprepar’d, and an hour after found my Pulse more full and quick, my Appetite also return’d, I felt my self much stronger, and was more fit for travelling than before.
- Restores Loss of Strength and Spirits by Fatigue. “ However, I did not depend much upon this Proof, attributing the Change I found, to the Rest we had taken that Day: but four Days after, finding my self so fatigu’d and exhausted with Labour, that I could hardly sit upon my Horse, a Mandarin of our Company perceiving it, gave me one of these Roots, whereof I immediately took the half, and about an Hour after my strength return’d. I have often used it since, and always with equal Benefit; I likewise observ’d that the Leaf, and especially the Fibres, chew’d while it was fresh, produc’d very near the same Effect.
- Leaves prefer’d to Tea. “ We often made use of the Leaves of Jin seng instead of Tea, as the Tartars do; after which I found myself so well, that I prefer’d them to the very best Tea. The Colour is also agreeable, and when one has taken it two or three times, both the Smell and Taste prove very grateful.
- Decoction of the Root. “ As for the Root it requires a little more boiling than Tea, in order to draw it sufficiently: this Practice is observ’d by the Chinese when they give it to sick Persons, in which case they seldom use above the fifth Part of an Ounce of the dry Root. As for those who are in Health, and take it by the way of Prevention, or for some slight Disorder, I would not advise them to take more than a tenth Part of an Ounce at a time, nor ought they to use it every Day.
- how prepar’d. “ The manner of preparing it is this: they cut the Root in small Slices, and put them in an earthen Pan well glaz’d, on which they pour a Gallon of Water; then taking care that the Pan be cover’d very close, they put it on a slow Fire, and when the Water is boil’d all away, to about a cup-full, it must be drank immediately. They then pour in the same quantity of Water as before, and boil it after the same manner to extract all the Juice, and the spirituous Parts of the Root that remain. These two Doses are taken one in the Morning, and the other in the Evening.
- Country where the Plant grows. “ With respect to the Places where this Root grows, it may suffice to say in general: that it is found between the thirty ninth and forty seventh Degree of North Latitude, and between the tenth and twentieth Degree of Longitude, East from Pe-king. Within these Limits there is a long Chain of Mountains cover’d and surrounded with thick Forests, which render them almost inaccessible. On the Declivity of these Mountains, and in these thick Forests, on the Brinks of the Channels, made by the Torrents, or about the Rocks at the Foot of Trees, and amongst all sorts of Herbs is the Jin seng found; but it is never to be met with in Plains Valleys and Marshes, at the Bottom of these Channels, or in Places too much exposed.
- “ If the Forest be consum’d by Fire, this Plant does not appear again till three or four Years after, which shews that Heat is an Enemy to it; accordingly it hides itself from the Sun as much as possible: whence it may be presum’d, that if it is to be found in any other Country in the World, Canada is the most likely Place; whose Forests and Mountains, according to the Report of those who have lived there, very much resemble these I am speaking of.
- Strictly guarded. “ The Parts where the Jin-seng grows, are separated from Qyang-tong, call’d Lyau tong in our ancient Maps, by a Barrier of wooden Stakes, which encloses that whole Province; in the Neighbourhood of which the Guards are continually patrolling to hinder the Chinese from going out to seek this Root. But in spite of all their Vigilance, the Chinese are tempted, by the Thirst of Gain, to slip into those Deserts, sometimes to the Number of two or three thousand; at the Hazard of loosing their Liberty and the Fruits of their Labour, if they are surpriz’d, either going out of the Province, or returning into it.
- Army sent to gather it. “ The Emperor chusing that the Tartars, rather than the Chinese, should reap the Advantage made by this Root, gave Orders, in 1709, to ten thousand Tartars to go and gather all the Jin-seng they could find; on Condition that each of them should give his Majesty two Ounces of the best, and for the Remainder they were to be pay’d its Weight in fine Silver: by this means it was reckon’d that the Emperor got that Year about twenty thousand Chinese Pound Weight of it, which did not cost him above the fourth part of the Value. We met by chance some of these Tartars in the middle of those frightful Deserts; whose Mandarins were not far out of our Road, and came one after another to offer us Oxen for our Subsistence, according to the Command they had receiv’d from the Emperor.
- Order observ’d by the Military Botanists. “ The following, is the order observ’d by this Army of Herbalists: after they have divided the Country according to their standards, the Soldiers of each Company, being a hundred in Number, extend themselves in a Line, till they come to the Limits appointed them, leaving a certain Distance between every ten: then they carefully seek after the Plant, advancing insensibly on the same Point of the Compass; and in this manner they pass over the space of Country allotted them, in a certain number of Days. When the time is expir’d, the Mandarins fixing their Tents in Places, where there is good Pasture for their Horses, send their orders to every Company, and to know if their number be compleat; for in case any Person is wanting, as it often happens, either by their stragling too far, or being devour’d by Wild-beasts, they search for him a Day or two, and then fall to work again, in the same manner as before.
- Gathering Jin seng hard Service. “ These poor People suffer greatly in this Expedition, for they carry neither Tents nor Beds with them, every one being sufficiently loaded with his Provision of Millet bak’d in an Oven, which is to serve him the whole Time of his Journey: so that they are oblig’d to sleep under " a Tree, covering themselves with such Branches or Pieces of Bark, as they can find. The " Mandarins send them, from time to time, Pieces of Beef or other Meat, which they devour

 " after they have warm'd it at the Fire. In this manner ten thousand Men spent six Months " of the Year, and yet, notwithstanding their Fatigues, they seem'd robust and good Soldiers.
 " The Tartars that attended us met with no better Treatment, having nothing else but the " Remainder of an Ox, that was kill'd every Day, after fifty Persons had fed upon it.

" To give you some Idea of this Plant, so much esteem'd by the Tartars and Chinese, I shall " explain the Figure, which I send herewith, and drew with all the Exactness possible. Description of the Plant.

" A. represents the Root of its natural size: when I wash'd it I found it white, and some- See the Figure.
 " what rugged as the Roots of other Plants commonly are.

" B. C. C. D. represent the Stalk in its full Length and Thickness, which is smooth and almost " round; its colour is a pretty deep red, except towards the beginning, B. where it is whiter as being " near the Ground. The Point D. is a kind of Knot, form'd by the rise of four Branches, which The Branches " proceed from it as from a Center, shooting strait forward at equal Distances from each other.

" The lower Part of the Branch is green mix'd with white; the upper part is much like the " Stalk, that is, of a deep red, a little inclining to the Colour of a Mulberry, but towards the " Edges the two Colours gradually unite. Each Branch has five Leaves of the size and figure as The Leaves.
 " represented in the Plate. It is observable that these Branches are equally distant from each other
 " as well as from the Horizon, for they fill with their Leaves a round Space very nearly parallel " to the surface of the Ground.

" Tho' I have drawn but half of one of these Leaves F with any Accuracy, all the rest may " easily be conceiv'd and finish'd from thence. I do not remember ever to have seen Leaves " of this Largeness so very thin, and of so fine a Contexture. The Fibres of it are very well " distinguish'd, and have on the upper part a few whitish Hairs. The fine Skin that is between " the Fibres rises towards the Middle a little above them. The upper side of the Leaf is a " dark, and the under a whitish Green, a little shining: all the Leaves are curiously indented
 " at the Edges.

" From D the Center of the Branches of this Plant rises a second Stalk DE, very strait The Fruit or Berry.
 " and smooth, of a whitish Cast, from the Beginning to the End, where there is a Cluster of " twenty four very round Berries, whose Skin is of a bright Colour, very fine and smooth,
 " inclosing a white softish Pulp, which is not good to eat. I have only design'd two of them, " which are of their natural size, and are mark'd with the Figures 9, 9. As these Berries
 " were double, (for some of them are single) each contain'd two rough Stones of the Bigness
 " and Shape of common Lentils, but separated, tho' they lay on the same Level. This " Stone is not sharp on the sides like Lentils, but is nearly all over of an equal Thickness.
 " Every Berry adheres to a smooth Filament or Stalk, equal on all sides, pretty fine, and of " the Colour of that of our small red Cherries; which Filaments, proceeding like Rays from " the same Center, gave the Bunch of Berries its round Form. The Stone, which like the " Stone of other Fruit is hard, and incloses a Kernel, always lies in the same Position with
 " the Filament that bears the Berry, whence it comes that the Berry, instead of being round, " is a little flat on each side. When it is double there is a little Dent between the two Parts, " of which it is compos'd; it has also a little Beard on the Top. When the Berry is dry,
 " there remains nothing but a wrinkled Skin, that adheres to the Stone, and becomes of " a dark red, almost black.

" As this Plant dies and grows again every Year, its Age is discover'd by the number Age of the Plant how discover'd.
 " of Stalks already put forth, whereof there always remains some Sign, as may be seen in the " Figure at the small Letters b, b, b; by which it appears that the Root A was in the seventh " Year, and the Root H in the fifteenth. As for the Flower, having never seen, I cannot Its Flower.
 " describe it: some have told me that it is white and very small; others that the Plant " bears none, no body ever having seen any. I should rather believe, that being very small " and no way remarkable, it has not been minded: what confirms me the more in this " Opinion is, that those who search after the Jin feng, wanting nothing but the Root, despise " and reject all the rest as useless.

" There are Plants which, besides the Clusters of Berries already describ'd, have a Berry Other Species of the Plant.
 " or two altogether like the former, standing an Inch, or an Inch and half, below the Cluster;
 " and then they say one ought to observe the Rumb to which these Berries point, because " they seldom fail to find another Root a few Paces from thence on the same Point of " the Compass or thereabouts. The Colour of the Berries, when there are any, distinguishes this " Plant from all others, and discovers it at once; but then it often happens that there are " none, tho' the Root be very old: such was that mark'd in the Figure by the Letter H, " which bore none, tho' it was in its fifteenth Year.

" There is no propagating this Plant by Art, since none have ever seen its Seed; which Circum- Has no Seed.
 " stance probably gave rise to a Fable current among the Tartars, who say: that a Bird picks it up,
 " as soon as it is in the Ground, and not being able to digest it, it purifies in his Stomach, and " grows in the Place where the Bird dungs. I rather believe that the Stone remains a long " time in the Earth before it takes Root; and this Opinion seems confirm'd from the Roots
 " that are found no longer, but smaller, than the little Finger, tho' they have produc'd more " than ten Stalks in as many different Years.

" Tho' the Plant I have describ'd, had four Branches, yet there are some that have but Variable in the Branches.
 " two

- But not in Leaves. "two or three, others again have five, and even seven, which last are the finest of all. However, every Branch has always five Leaves as well as that which I have design'd, unless the number has been diminish'd by some Accident. The height of the Plant is proportionable to its Thickness and number of Branches; those who have no Berries, are commonly small and very low.
- Marks of the best Roots. "The Root that is largest, most uniform, and has the fewest Strings, is always the best, for which Reason that mark'd H is preferable to the other. I cannot tell why the Chinese have call'd it Yin feng, which signifies the Representation of a Man. For my part I never saw any in the least inclining to human Shape; and those whose Trade is to gather it, have assur'd me, that they as seldom find any Resemblance of a Man in the Yin feng, as in other Roots, which are sometimes by Chance of an odd Figure. The Tartars call it with great Reason Orbota, that is, the Chief of Plants. For the rest it is not true, that this Plant grows in the Province of Pe-che-li, on the Mountains of Tung-pin-fu, as P. Martini tells us on the Authority of some Chinese Authors. But they might easily have been deceiv'd, because that is the Place where it is brought to when it comes from Tartary.
- Reason of its Name. "Those who search for this Plant preserve nothing but the Root, burying in one Place all they can procure of it in the Space of ten or fifteen Days. They take great Care to wash the Root, and clean it well with a Brush; then dipping it for a Moment in scalding hot Water, they dry it in the Smoak of a kind of yellow Millet, which communicates a little of its Colour to it. The Millet is boil'd with a little Water over a slow Fire, and the Roots being plac'd upon small Sticks of Wood layed cross-wise over the Vessel, and cover'd with a Linnen-Cloth, or another Vessel, by Degrees become dry. They may be also dry'd in the Sun, or even at the Fire; but tho' they preserve their Virtue this way, they are not of the Colour that the Chinese admire. When they are dry'd they must be kept close in a dry place, otherwise they will corrupt or grow worm-eaten."
- The Root only in Esteem. "With Respect to Animals, besides those already spoken of, China produces a great number of Fallow-Beasts of all sorts, except Lions, such as wild Boars, Tigers, Buffaloes, Bears, Camels, Stags, Rhinoceroses, &c. But as these kinds of Beasts are well known, I shall only speak of two others, which are peculiar to China, and are seldom met with in other Countries.
- How preserv'd. "The first of these is a kind of Camel or Dromedary, no taller than an ordinary Horse; having two Bunches on his Back, cover'd with long Hair, which make a sort of Saddle. The Bunch before seems to be form'd by the Back-bone and the upper part of the Shoulder-bones, being bent backwards, not unlike the Bunch which the Indian Cows have on their Shoulders; the other Bunch joins to the Buttocks. Its Neck is shorter than the common Camels, and much thicker, cover'd with thick Hair, as long as that of Goats; some of them are of a yellowish Dun-Colour, others are a little upon the Red, and blackish in some Places. The Legs are not so long and slender in Proportion as those of other Camels, so that it seems more fit to carry Burdens."
- Uncommon Animals. "The other Animal is a kind of Roe-Buck, call'd by the Chinese Hyang-chang-tse, that is, The Odoriferous Roe-Buck, or The Musk Roe-Buck. Chang-tse signifies a Roe-Buck, and Hyang properly a Sweet Smell: but it also implies Odoriferous, when join'd to a Substantive, because then it becomes an Adjective. One of the Jesuit Missionaries, who describes it, relates nothing but what he was an Eye-witness of: "I bought one, (says he) when it was just kill'd, in order to sell it me; and preserv'd the Part which they usually cut to take out the Musk, which is dearer than the Animal itself. The thing happen'd as follows:
- Kind of Dromedary. "As the Musk-Deer is found in a Chain of Mountains on the West-side of Pe-king, while I was discharging the Duty of my Mission, in the middle of those Hills, (where there is a small Church, and Congregation of Christians) the poor Inhabitants of the Village went a hunting, in hopes that I would purchase the Game, to carry with me to that City; and when they had kill'd two, a Male and a Female, they brought them to me, while they were yet warm and bleeding. Before we agreed on the Price, they ask'd if I was for having the Musk as well as the Flesh (because some buy only the latter, leaving the former to the Hunters, who sell it to those that deal in this Commodity) and as it was chiefly the Musk which I wanted, I reply'd, I would buy the whole Animal, and got it for a Crown; then they immediately took the Male and cut off the Bag, lest the Musk should evaporate, and tied the Top of it close with a Pack-thread. Those who would keep it out of Curiosity dry it."
- The Musk Roe-Buck. "The Musk is generated in the inward part of the Bag, and sticks all round it like a kind of a Salt. There are two sorts: but that which is in Grains, and call'd Tew-pan-byang is the most precious; the other nam'd Mi-byang is the least esteem'd, because it is too small and fine. The Female produces no Musk; or at least the Matter which she yields having the Appearance of Musk, has no Scent."
- Description of it. "The usual Food of this Animal, as I was told, is the Flesh of Serpents, which tho' of an enormous Size, are easily kill'd by it; because when they are at a certain Distance from the Roe-Buck, they are suddenly overcome with the Scent of the Musk, and grow so feeble that they are not able to stir. This is so certain, that when the Peasants go to cut Wood, or make Char-coal in the Mountains, they have no surer way to preserve themselves from these Serpents, whose Bite is exceeding dangerous, than to carry about them a few Grain of Musk: being thus arm'd they sleep quietly after their Dinner; and if any Serpent advances towards them, it is stupify'd all of a sudden, by the Smell of the Musk, and can approach no nearer."

"That which happen'd on my Return to Pe-king, was in some Measure a Confirmation that the Flesh of Serpents is the principal Food of the Musk-Animal. Part of the Roe-buck being dress'd for Supper, one of those who was at Table happen'd to have an exceeding Aversion for Serpents, and this to so great a Degree, that the bare mentioning of them in his Presence would make him extremely sick. As he knew nothing of what was reported of this Animal and the Serpent, I was very careful to say nothing at all about it, but I observ'd his Countenance very attentively. He took some of the Roe-Buck, as others did, with a Design to eat it, but he had no sooner put a bit in his Mouth, than he found an extraordinary loathing at his Stomach, and would not touch any more. The rest eat of it very heartily, he having been the only Person that had an Aversion for this sort of Meat."

Of the Lakes, Canals, and Rivers of China ; as also of the Barks, and Vessels of Burden.

THE great Plenty which China so happily enjoys, is owing much to the Goodness and Depth of its Soil ; but chiefly to the great number of Rivers, Lakes and Canals, Lakes, Canals, and Rivers of China. wherewith it is water'd : there not being a City, nor even a large Country Town, especially in the Southern Provinces, but what is situated upon the Banks of some River, Lake, or Canal ; whereof as I have had Occasion to speak at large in several Places of this Work, I shall, to avoid Repetition, only just mention some few over again to refresh the Reader's Memory.

Among the Lakes, to be met with in most of the Provinces, the Chief are : (1) The Tong-ting Hû, in the Province of Hû-quang, which is eighty Leagues or more in Circumference ; Chief Lakes, (2) The Hong-fé Hû, one part of which is in the Province of Kyang-nan, and the other in that of Che-kyang ; and (3) the Ho-yang Hû, in the Province of Kyang-si, otherwise call'd the Lake of Zbau-chew, [or Jau-chew.] This last being thirty Leagues in Compass, is form'd by the Confluence of four Rivers, each as large as the Loire, which come out of the Province of Kyang-si. It is also subject to Hurricans like the Seas of China ; for in less than a quarter of an Hour the Wind will veer round all the Points of the Compass, and sometimes sink the largest Barks.

In approaching the most dangerous part of the Lake, a Temple appears built on a steep Dangerous sailing on the Lake Ho-yang. Rock ; on sight of which the Chinese Mariners beat a kind of Brass Drum, to inform the Idol of their Arrival, and lighting Wax Candles in Honour of it, upon the Fore-part of the Bark, burn Incense, and sacrifice a Cock. To prevent these Inconveniences Barks are station'd here on Purpose to succour those who are in Danger of being cast away ; altho' it often happens that those who are appointed to give the Assistance, are the most forward to work the Merchants Destruction, in order to enrich themselves with the Spoil, especially if they think they can do it without being discover'd. Nevertheless, the Vigilance of the Magistrates of China is very great : A Mandarin places his chief Glory in assisting the People, and shewing that he has a Paternal Affection for them. In tempestuous Weather you see the Mandarin of Jau-chew, after giving Order not to cross the Lake, go in Person to the Side of it, and there continue all Day long ; with Design to hinder, by his Presence, any one from rashly exposing himself to the Dangers of perishing, thro' Greediness of Gain.

Besides these principal Lakes there are many others in the several Provinces, which, together Canals. with a multitude of Springs, Rivulets, and Torrents, that descend from the Mountains, have given Occasion to the industrious Chinese of cutting numberless Canals, wherewith all their Lands are water'd. There is scarce a Province but what has a large Canal of clear and deep Water, inclos'd between two Causeways, cas'd with flat Stones, or Marble Slabs, laid on the Ground, and fasten'd in Posts of the same Materials, by means of Grooves. The Canals are cover'd with Bridges at convenient Distances, consisting of three, five, or seven Arches, in order to open a Communication between the several parts of the Country. The middle Arch is always exceeding high, that Barks may pass with their Masts up : The Tops of the Arches are well built, and the Piers so narrow, that at a Distance the Arches seem to hang in the Air.

The principal Canal discharges itself on the Right and Left into several other small ones ; which are divided again into a great number of Brooks, that run to so many different large Towns, and even considerable Cities. They also often form Ponds and small Lakes, whereby the neighbouring Plains are water'd. The Chinese, not contented with these Canals, which are of infinite Conveniency for Travellers and trading People, have dug many others with admirable Industry and Art, for the Reception of Rain, to water the Plains cover'd with Rice ; for Rice requires to be almost continually in Water.

But nothing of this Kind is to be compar'd to the great Canal, call'd Yun-lyang, or Royal Canal, which is three hundred Leagues in Length. The Emperor Sbi-tsü, who was Chief of the Western Tartars, and Founder of the twentieth Dynasty of the Yuen, undertook and executed this grand Work, which is one of the Wonders of the Empire. This Prince having its being

conquer'd all China, and being already Master of Western Tartary, (which extends from the Province of Pe-che-li, as far as the Great Mogol's Empire, Persia, and the Caspian Sea,) resolv'd to fix his Residence at Pe-king, to be, as it were, in the Center of his vast Dominions, that he might govern them with the greater Ease. But as the Northern Provinces were unable to furnish Provisions sufficient for such a large City, he caus'd a vast number of Vessels and long Barks to be built, in order to fetch from the Maritime Provinces Rice, Callicoes, Silks, Merchandizes, and other Commodities necessary for the Maintenance of his numerous Court and Troops.

Its Course.

But finding this Method dangerous, and that Calms detain'd the Provisions too long, and Storms occasion'd many Ship-wrecks, he employ'd, at an infinite Expence, innumerable Workmen, who with incredible Industry carry'd on through many Provinces this prodigious Canal, upon which all the Riches of the South and North are convey'd. After it has cross'd the Provinces of Pe-che-li and Sban-tong, it enters that of Kyang-nan, and discharges itself into the great and rapid Whang-bo, or Yellow River; whereon having sail'd for two Days you come to another River, and presently after find the Canal again, which leads to the City of Whay-ngan. From thence passing by many Cities and Towns, it arrives at Yang-chew, one of the most famous Ports of the Empire; and a little beyond it enters the great River Yang-tse-kyang, one Day's Journey from Nan-king. Continuing your Course on this River to the Lake Po-yang in Kyang-si, you cross it, and enter the River Kan-kyang, which divides that Province nearly into two equal Parts, and ascend the Stream as far as Nan-ngan. From thence you go by Land to Nan-byong, the chief City of Quang-tong, where you embark upon a River, that carries you to Kan-ton: so that you may travel very commodiously, by means of the Rivers and Canals, from Pe-king to the farthest part of China, being about six hundred Leagues by Water. To facilitate the Navigation of this Canal, they commonly allow a Fathom and an half Water; but when the Stream is swell'd and threatens to overflow the neighbouring Fields, they take care to make Trenches in divers Places, in order to keep it within Bounds. There are Inspectors appointed, who visit the Canal continually, accompany'd with Workmen to repair the damag'd Places.

Depth of Water.

Rivers.

China abounds also with navigable Rivers, as appears from the Description already given of the Provinces; wherefore it will be sufficient to speak here of the two great Rivers which run across this vast Empire.

The Yang-tse-kyang.

The first (call'd Yang-tse-kyang, commonly translated, The Son of the Sea, or Ta-kyang, that is, The Great River, or simply Kyang, The River, by way of Eminence) runs from West to East, rising in the Mountains belonging to the Country of the Tu-fan, about thirty three Degrees of Latitude. It receives different Names, according to the different Places it passes through; and, dividing into several Branches, forms a great many Islands full of Rushes, which serve as Fuel for the Cities round about. First crossing a Skirt of the Province of Yun-nan, it afterwards runs through those of Se-chwen, Hu-quang, and Kyang-nan. Its Stream is very rapid, but after making many Windings and Turnings in those Provinces, (where it loses and resumes its Name of Ta-kyang) as far as the City of Kin-chew, it begins to be slacken'd by the Sea Tide, (which meets it at the City of Kyew-kyang), and glides along more slowly; thenceforward it is so gentle at all times, but especially at the new and full Moon, as to admit being sail'd upon. It passes next by Nan-king, and falls into the Eastern Sea, over-against the Isle of Tsong-ming.

its Course.

Depth.

This River is broad, deep, and exceeding full of Fish. The Chinese have a common Saying, That the Sea is without a Shore, and the Kyang without a Bottom; Hay vu-pin, Kyang vu-ti. They pretend that in several places they find no Bottom with a Sounding-Lead, and that in others there are two or three hundred Fathom Water; but it is probable in this they exaggerate, and that their Pilots have judg'd so, only because they found no Bottom with their Lines, which do not exceed fifty or sixty Fathom.

Signification of its Name.

It seems they are mistaken likewise in translating Yang-tse by the Son of the Sea; for the Character us'd in writing Yang, is different from that which signifies the Sea, tho' the Sound and Accent are the same. Among its various Significations that given to it formerly strengthens this Conjecture: for in the time of the Emperor Yu it denoted a Province of China, bounded on the South, by this River, which it is thought took the name thereof, because the Emperor diverted the Waters which overflowed the Province into its Channel.

The Whang-bo, or Yellow River.

The second River is call'd Whang-bo, or, the Yellow River: A Name given to it on account of the Colour of its Waters, which are mix'd with yellowish Clay, wash'd off its Banks by the Force of its Stream. It rises about the thirty fifth Degree of Latitude, in the mountainous Country of the Tartars of Koko nor, which having pass'd thro', it runs for a while along the side of the great Wall, and then taking a sweep round the Lands of the Ortos Tartars, re-enters China between the Provinces of Sban-si and Sben-si. Next it crosses the Province of Ho-nan, with part of Kyang-nan; and after a Course of about six hundred Leagues, discharges itself into the Eastern Sea, not far from the Mouth of the River Yang-tse-kyang.

Its Course

very rapid.

Altho' this River is exceeding large, and traverses a great Extent of Land, yet it is not very navigable, because it is almost impossible to sail up it, without a strong, as well as fair Wind. Sometimes it makes great Havock in the Places thro' which it passes, where breaking its Banks, it suddenly overflows the Country, and lays whole Villages and Cities under Water; for which Reason they are oblig'd to make long and thick Dikes in certain Places to restrain the Waters. The Lands of the Province of Ho-nan being low, and the Banks liable to be broken down, as

I have elsewhere observ'd they us'd to be formerly, they raise, by way of Precaution, round most of the Cities, at the Distance of more than a Quarter of a Mile from the Wall, a strong Inclosure or sort of Bank made of Earth, cover'd with Sods.

The Canals, as well as Rivers, are all cover'd with Barks, of various Sizes; which sometimes lye so close together for more than three Quarters of a Mile, that it is impossible to squeeze in one more amongst them. They reckon about ten thousand which belong to the Emperor, and are wholly employ'd in carrying Tribute and all sorts of Provision from the Provinces to the Court. These imperial Barks, call'd Lyang-chwen, or Barks of the Provisions, have all flat Bottoms, and are of equal Breadth from Head to Stern. There are others which are appointed to carry Stuffs, Brocades, Pieces of Silk, &c. which are call'd Long-i-chwen, that is, Barks with Dragon-habits; because the Emperor's Arms are Dragons with five Claws, and his Garments and Moveables are always adorn'd with the Figures of Dragons in Embroidery or Painting.

Barks on the Rivers and Canals.

The Imperial Barks.

Each Bark makes but one Voyage in a Year, and carries no more than one fourth Part of its full Burden. They pay the Master of the Bark a certain Sum out of the Royal Treasury, according as the Place from which he set out is distant from the Court: for instance, if he comes from the Province of Kyang si, which is above three hundred Leagues from Pe-king, they give him a hundred Taëls. This Sum, tis true, seems too little for defraying his Expence; but then he gets what does that and a good deal more, by the Liberty of taking in Passengers as well as Goods, which pass the Custom Houses Toll-free.

There is a third sort of Barks, higher and smaller than others call'd Tso chwen, which are appointed to carry the Mandarins to their respective Governments in the Provinces, and Persons of Distinction, who are sent from, or call'd to Court. They have two Decks, upon the first of which, there is a compleat Apartment reaching from one End to the other, about seven or eight Foot high; its Rooms are painted within and without, varnish'd, gilt, and extremely neat: but I have given a particular Description of them in another Place, [p. 286.] There a Mandarin may sleep, eat, study, write, receive Visits, &c. In short, has every thing as convenient and neat about him as in his own Palace: Indeed it is impossible to travel more agreeably than in these Barks.

Those for carrying the Qans, &c.

There are besides an infinite number of Barks belonging to private Persons, some very commodious, which are hir'd to the Literati or rich Folks, who have Occasion to travel; others much larger, made use of by the Merchants, for carrying on Trade: and lastly, there are a prodigious Multitude of Barks where whole Families dwell, having no other Habitation, and live more conveniently than in Houses on Land. In the smallest sort, which have no Cabins, they make a kind of Tilt or Arch of thin Mats about five Foot square, to defend them from the Rain and Heat of the Sun.

Several Sorts of private Barks.

You see likewise some that may be call'd a kind of Gallies; which are convenient for sailing upon the Rivers, along the Sea-coast, and among the Islands. These Barks are as long as Merchant-men of three hundred and fifty Tuns. But as they are shallow, and draw no more than two foot of Water; as also their Oars are long, and do not extend a cross the Sides of the Bark like those in Europe, but are plac'd on the Outside, in a position almost parallel to the Body of the Bark, every Oar is easily mov'd by a few Hands, and the Vessel made to go very swiftly. I shall say nothing here of certain small Barks, built in Form of a Dragon, and dress'd out every Year on a Festival-day, whereof an account has been given already [p. 101]

Kind of Gallies.

The Merchants trading in Timber and Salt, who by the way are the richest in all China, instead of Barks to carry their Goods, use a sort of Rafts, or Floats, made in the following manner: After the Timber, which they cut down in the Mountains, and neighbouring Forests, of the Province of Se-chwen, is brought to the side of the River Kyang, they take what is necessary to make a Raft, four or five Foot high, and ten long. Then boring Holes in both ends of the Pieces of Wood, they run thro' them twisted Oziers, with which they fasten the rest of the Timber together, and so form a Raft, floating on the River, of any length; which is proportion'd to the Wealth of the Merchants, there being some half a League long. The several Parts of the Raft thus put together, move easily any way, like the Links of a Chain. Four or five Men on the Fore-part guide it with Poles and Oars; while others, plac'd all along the side at equal Distance, help to conduct it. They build thereon, from Space to Space, Booths cover'd with Boards, or Mats, where they put their Moveables, dress their Victuals, and take their rest. In the different Cities which they touch at, they sell their Houses along with their Timber; and thus they float above six hundred Leagues, when they carry their Wood to Pe-king.

Rafts or Floats on the Rivers.

As the Chinese sail upon the Sea, as well as Rivers, they have always had pretty good Ships; and pretend to have cross'd over the Indian Seas long before the Birth of Christ. But whatever Knowledge they may have had of Navigation, they have not brought it to a greater Perfection than their other Sciences.

Their Ships, which they call Chwen in common, with Boats and Barks, are nam'd by the Portuguese Soma, or Sommes; but for what Reason is not known. These Vessels are not to be compar'd to ours, the largest of them carrying no more than from two hundred and fifty to three hundred Tuns. They are properly no other than flat Barks, with two Masts, and not above eighty or ninety Foot in length. The Fore-part is not made with a Beak, but rises up somewhat like two Wings or Horns, which make an odd Figure; the Stern is open in the middle to receive the Rudder, and shelter it from the beating of the Waves. This Rudder, which is about five or six Foot broad, may be easily rais'd or lower'd by means of a Cable, fasten'd to it from the Stern.

Their Bulk and Structure

These

- Their Mast- ing. These Vessels have neither a Mizzen-mast, Bow-sprit, nor Scuttles; all the Mast- ing consists of a Main-mast, and Fore-mast, to which they add sometimes a very small Top-mast of no great use. The Main-mast is plac'd near the Fore-mast, which stands very forward upon the Prow; the Proportion of one to the other is commonly at two or three, and the Length of the Main-mast is usually two thirds of the Length of the Vessel.
- Sails. Their Sails are made of Mats of Bambú, (a kind of Canes common in China) divided into Leaves like a Pocket-Book, and join'd together by Poles, which are also of Bambú. At the Top there is a piece of Wood, serving for a Sail-Yard; and at the Bottom, a sort of Plank, above a Foot broad, and five or six Inches thick, which keeps the Sail steady, when they have a mind to lower it, or hoist it up. These sorts of Ships are no good Sailors; tho' they hold much more Wind than ours, because of the Stiffness of their Sails, which do not yield to the Gale: yet as they are not built in so commodious a manner, they lose the Advantage they have over ours in this Point.
- Caulking. Their Vessels are not caulk'd with Pitch and Tar, as those of Europe, but with a particular sort of Gum; which is so good, that a Well or two, made in the Bottom of the Hold of the Ship, is sufficient to keep it dry: for hitherto they have had no Knowledge of a Pump.
- Anchors of Wood. Their Anchors are not made of Iron, like ours, but of a hard and heavy Wood, which for that Reason they call Tye-mú, that is, Iron Wood. They pretend that these Anchors are much better than the Iron ones; because, say they, these are apt to bend, which those of the Wood they use never do: however, they commonly tip both the Flukes with Iron.
- Chinese Sail- ing. The Chinese have on Board neither Pilot nor Master, the Vessel being wholly under the Management of those who steer her. It must be confess'd, however, that they are tolerable Seamen, and very good Coasting-Pilots, but indifferent Pilots in the main Sea. They lay the Head of the Ship upon the Rumb, on which they propose to sail; and without giving themselves any Pain about the Deviation of the Vessel, thus hold on their Course as they think convenient. This Negligence proceeds, no doubt, from their making no long Voyages, yet when they have a mind they sail tolerably well.
- As the five Jesuit Missionaries, who went from Siam to China, in 1687, (embarking the seventeenth of June, on Board a Chinese Soma, the Captain of which belong'd to Kan-ton), had Leisure enough, during their Voyage, to examine the Structure of these sorts of Vessels; the particular Description which they made of them, will give the Reader a most exact Knowledge of the Chinese Navigation.
- Description of a Chinese Ship. The Ship they embark'd in, according to the way of reckoning among the Indian Portuguese, carry'd nineteen hundred Pics; which at the Rate of one hundred Catis, or one hundred and twenty five Pound a Pic, comes to near one hundred and twenty Tuns: a Tun Weight is computed two thousand Pounds. The Model of it was tolerably handsome, except the Fore-part, which was flat, and without a Beak. Its Mast- ing was different from that of our Vessels, with respect to the Disposition, Number, and Strength of the Masts. Its main-Mast was plac'd within a small matter where our Fore-Mast stands, so that the two Masts were near to one another. For Stays and Shrouds it had a simple Rigging, which reach'd from Star-board to Lar-board, that it might be always fasten'd out of the Wind. It had also a Bolt-sprit and Mizzen-mast, which was plac'd to the Lar-board. As for these latter they were very small, and scarce deserv'd the Name; but to make Amends, the Main-mast was extremely large in Proportion to the Vessel; and to strengthen it still more, it was supported by two Fishes, or Side-beams, lash'd to it, reaching from the Keelson up to the second Deck. Two flat pieces of Wood strongly fasten'd by Pegs on the Top of the Main-mast, and join'd together at the upper ends, extending seven or eight Foot above the same, supply'd the Place of a Top-mast.
- Masts and Rigging. It had two Sails, the Main and Fore-Sail both made of Mats: the first was forty-five Foot in Height, and twenty-eight or thirty Foot in Breadth; the second was proportionable to the Mast that carry'd it. They were furnish'd on both sides with several Rows of Bambú, laid along the Breadth of the Sail, near a Foot asunder on the Outside, and somewhat farther asunder on the Side next to the Mast; on which they were strung by means of several Chaplets, or Rings, that took up about a fourth part of the Breadth of the Sail, reckoning from the Side where there were no Braces. So that the Masts divided the Sails into two very unequal Parts, leaving more than three Quarters of them on the Side of the Braces; whereby each Sail was dispos'd to turn upon its Mast as upon a Hinge, and run without Difficulty towards the Stern, at least twenty six Points, when it was necessary to tack about, sometimes bearing upon the Mast, and sometimes only upon the Chaplets. The Yard serv'd for Rat-lines above; and a great round Pole as thick as the Yards, perform'd the same Office below: It likewise serv'd to keep the Sail straight, which, to prevent its tearing, was supported in two Places with Planks, suspended by two Ropes, hanging down from the Top of the Mast for this Purpose. Each of the Sails had but one Brace, one Bow-line, and what the Portuguese call a Spider; which is a long Parcel of small Tacklings on the Edge of the Sail from Top to Bottom, about two Foot asunder, whose ends are fasten'd to the Brace, where they make a strong Knot.
- Sails. This sort of Sail folds and unfolds like a Skreen. When they would hoist the main Sail, they made use of two Wind-lasses, and three Halliards or Ropes, which pass thro' as many Pulleys fix'd at the Head of the Main-mast. When they were about furling the Sail, they laid laid hold of it with two Iron Hooks, and after loosing the Ropes, they folded the Plates one after another, hauling them down forcibly with the Hooks.
