THE FURNITURE AT QUENBY HALL.

THE beauty and architectural interest of Quenby Hall—built circa 1610—is greatly enhanced by its furniture so tastefully arranged by Lady Henry Grosvenor, and which is now all offered for sale. This collection contains specimens covering the long period from 1580 to 1800, and is remarkable for its genuine quality and most excellent state of preservation, and in the very few instances where breakage or damage has entailed necessary repairs, these have been carried out in a suitable and correct manner.

Among the most interesting early specimens, the Elizabethan oak trestle table, circa 1590, nearly 12 feet long, stands out pre-eminent, and is probably unique; and there are also many fine examples of "joined" or so-called refectory tables of both Jacobean and Carolean times, all in the finest condition. Another interesting piece of Elizabethan furniture is the bed from the Tapestry Room, which is of the highest quality, embracing all the best details of this carved and inlaid Tudor oak before carving became commercial, and is most complete with its contemporary curtains and quilt, all elaborately embroidered on linen. Many Court cupboards, buffets, small tables and chairs complete this picturesque oak furniture of the 17th Century.

The wave of taste from oak to walnut that took place at the Restoration is well represented, and the fashionable twist in conjunction with florid carving and caning has never been better executed in England than on the set of six tall-backed walnut Carolean chairs, circa 1675, that stand in the Great Parlour. The fine day-bed near these is of rather earlier date; it is of exceptional size and long enough to have accommodated our 6 ft. 2 in. Monarch of that time; it possesses the bolder carving that preceded the more delicate workmanship found on later types of Charles II. furniture.

The lacquer cabinets and chests of drawers have in some instances their original lacquer stands; these would probably have been used in the bedrooms, the elaborate carved and gilt stands, such as the beautiful Daniel Marot specimen in the Great Parlour, being reserved for the Galleries and Withdrawing Rooms. It is possible that the fine yellow marqueterie clock, inlaid with ebony and apple wood, may also have been designed by Marot, for it corresponds closely in motive to the semi-Chinoiserie he so frequently adopted. The set of green lacquer chairs of about 1716, in the Brown Parlour, are typical specimens of this Oriental taste, and they must have taken their place well against the Chinese wall-papers and porcelain that were the rage during Anne and George I.'s reigns. The bedrooms at Quenby are rich in the plain and tasteful walnut furniture of early 18th Century work, in some instances of very high quality, such as the small commode and chairs given in illustration, and in addition to these are numberless gilt mirrors, stools, eared armchairs—one covered with petit-point needlework—chests of drawers and small tables of the above date dispersed through the various rooms.

There are excellent examples of needlework pictures, and also Limoges enamels of the 16th and 17th Centuries, such as the Plaque attributed to Pénicaud II.

The tapestries are of much interest; those in the Great Chamber being of unusual and beautiful colour, whilst the piece in the Hall, of earlier date, gives a rare variety of costume, circa 1530.

It is seldom that so genuine and interesting a collection of furniture is offered to the public as that existing at Quenby Hall.
