- 489 LUTTRELL PSALTER (The), with Introduction by ERIC GEORGE MILLAR, 2 plates in colour and 183 in monochrome, roy. folio, buckram, British Museum, 1932, new £5/5/- net
 "The present vol is not a facsimile of the entire psalter; but it reproduces on the scale of the original, everything in it which is of interest for one reason or another, and in addition two pages are reproduced in full colour. But Dr. Millar suggests that the manuscript gains rather than loses by reproduction in monochrome, for the colour is often odd, distracting, and of no great beauty.
 The most familiar and perhaps the most valuable illustrations in the psalter are those which reproduce as accurately as the artist could contrive, various details of medieval life. The agricultural scenes, the well-known picture of a travelling coach for royal ladies, Jerusalem painted as an English town with shops and their signs, the many representations of games—these are obviously valuable and delightful documents. But the marginal grotesques are the most individual and startling part of the decoration. Such grotesques may be found in much earlier manuscripts of the school, as in the Ormesby Psalter of about 1295; but here they have developed a wild and hideous eccentricity which can only be paralleled in the last and most degenerate phase of medieval sentiment, in German woodcuts of the fifteenth century and, above all, in the nightmares of Hieronymus Bosch."—Times Literary Supplement.
