

M0006674: Typescript from The Illustrated London News, 11th May 1850

Publication/Creation

27 March 1940

Persistent URL

<https://wellcomecollection.org/works/agzy28yr>

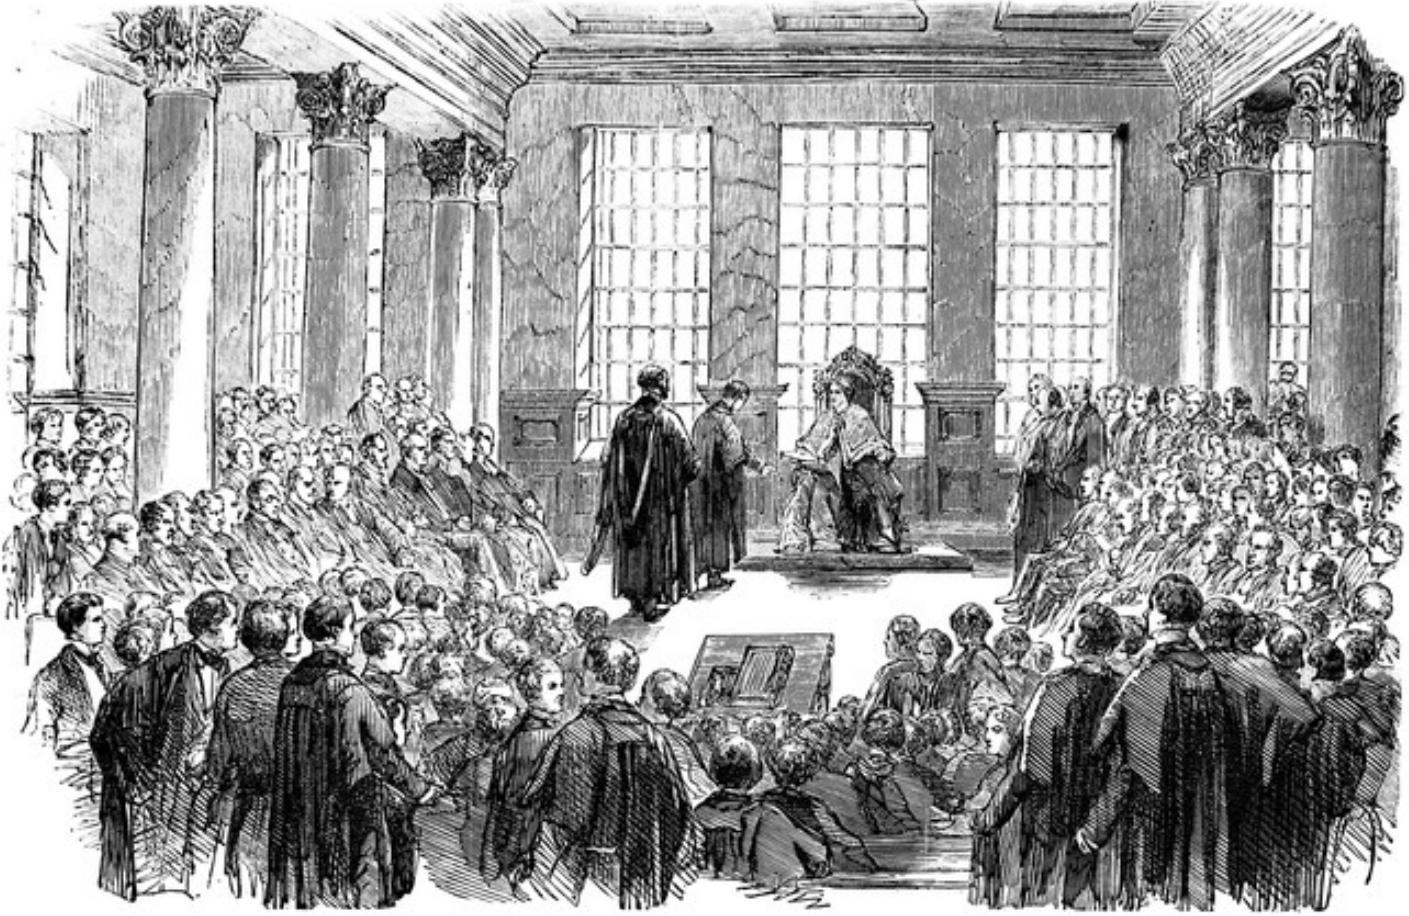

License and attribution

Wellcome Library; GB.

Conditions of use: it is possible this item is protected by copyright and/or related rights. You are free to use this item in any way that is permitted by the copyright and related rights legislation that applies to your use. For other uses you need to obtain permission from the rights-holder(s).

Wellcome Collection
183 Euston Road
London NW1 2BE UK
T +44 (0)20 7611 8722
E library@wellcomecollection.org
<https://wellcomecollection.org>

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—THE FIRST CONFERENCE OF DEGREES, IN THE HALL OF KING'S COLLEGE.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

In our Journal of last week we reported, as fully as our limits would allow, the Convocation of the University held on the 1st instant, in the Great Hall of King's College, for the purpose of conferring degrees and honours on such candidates as had passed their examination during the twelve months just expired. We now engrave the very interesting scene—a memorable one, in account of this being the first time the ceremony has been performed in public—The Right Hon. the Earl of Buxton, Chancellor of the University, presided.

The proceedings commenced with the reading of a short report by the Registrar, which stated that in the course of the last academic year her Majesty had been pleased to grant a supplemental charter, enlarging the powers previously conferred on the University. Her Majesty had also, by warrant under her sign-manual, been pleased to place in connexion with the University, in addition to the colleges and institutions previously authorised to issue certificates for degrees in arts and law, the West of England Dissenters' Proprietary School at Tauton, and Saint Patrick's College at Thurles. During the past year, 167 gentlemen had been admitted to matriculation, of whom 110 had distinguished themselves when under examination for honours in mathematics and natural philosophy; 100 had obtained a scholarship; and four had distinguished themselves in classics, one of whom had obtained an exhibition. 25 gentlemen had passed the first examination for the degree of Bachelor of Medicine, of whom one had obtained an exhibition in anatomy and physiology, another in chemistry, and a third in materia medica and pharmaceutical chemistry; several others had distinguished themselves, and obtained gold medals; 13 gentlemen had passed the examination for the degree of Bachelor of Medicine, of whom one had obtained a scholarship; two gentlemen had passed the examination for the degree of Bachelor of Laws, of whom one had distinguished himself in jurisprudence, and had obtained the University Law School 53 gold medals; and passed the examination for the degree of Doctor of Arts, two whom had obtained the University Scholarship; seven gentlemen had passed the examination for the degree of Master of Arts; eight had obtained the degree of Doctor of Medicine; and one that of Doctor of Laws.

The presentation for degrees then took place, each student being introduced to the Chancellor by the tutor of his own college.

The presentation for honours and prizes came next in the order of proceedings. The names of all candidates who had obtained honours in the course of the past year were read; but those gentlemen only who had gained scholarships, exhibitions, medals, and prizes were presented to the Chancellor.

A deputation of graduates of the University then presented an address to the Chancellor and Senate, to which the Chancellor replied. The deputation then withdrew, and the proceedings terminated.

INDUSTRIAL INVESTMENTS.

A COMMITTEE, TO DEVISE SOME EFFICIENT AND CONTINUOUS MODE OF INVESTING REPRODUCTIVELY THE SAVINGS OF THE MIDDLE AND WORKING CLASSES, HAS BEEN APPOINTED BY THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, ON THE MOTION OF MR. SLANEY.

According to the present Stamp Laws, a man may invest £5000 in land at 2½ per cent. expense; he cannot invest £50 in the same security at less than 20 per cent. Freehold security for his savings is legally denied to the comparatively poor. He may invest them, or rather lend them, to a savings-bank under the authority of Government, for a higher rate of interest than is given by ordinary bankers; but the premium is given at the cost of the nation, and the provident man is constantly tempted, on the other hand, to withdraw his savings from a slowly fluctuating treasury.

The only present alternative is the Benefit Building Society—a useful class institution, certainly; but, until very lately, based upon most inaccurate data and most erroneous principles, and fruitful of consequent disaster and disappointment. Even under the improved system of parsimony, the security, as respects the class of small investors—the security, namely, of house property—is subject to constant fluctuation and depreciation in value. The value of house property, we hear, the market value—is contingent upon a variety of circumstances, including taste, opinion, fashion. Today, the regions of Bloomsbury yield, in estimation by experts, to-morrow, even the aristocratic Belgravian may succumb to the more robust and more palatial districts of Hyde Park; and who knows but in the next generation the West End will be identical with the erstwhile Shade of Bayswater.

While house property is thus inevitably doomed to the fate of depreciation, improvable land must constantly tend, to use a Yankee term of analogy, to "appreciate." Colonisation—the development of neglected waste lands, whether in these islands or in the remote regions of the British world—is, therefore, not merely a herculean work and a solemn mission delegated to the Anglo-Saxon; but it is the surest, most promising, and most profitable of investments. It has been estimated by Mr. GRIMSHAW, that millions of acres in Ireland, now not returning six shillings of rent per acre per annum, might, by prudent and comprehensive investment, be made to render as much as twenty shillings per acre, increasing the aggregate produce thus a few hundred thousand pounds to three million sterling. What has not wise investment done for Coal-Mess and the Edinburgh Foss?

There are many moral as well as political-considerations to induce the capitalist, large or small, from committing his savings, in the shape of idle capital, into the hands of land speculators. But it is obviously open to the industrial portion of the community to combine their savings for this great and profitable purpose. It appears to us that the mode in which this might be accomplished is clearly enough indicated in a letter to Earl Grey, when it seems, has referred to the effect that, under the present regime, it is not in the power of the Government to enforce the adoption of the principle in the manner suggested. This, then, leaves the question open. It is one of invaluable importance. The Committee referred to—the Association of the Middle and Working Classes Committee—was nominated on Wednesday week, and consists of the following members:—Mr. Slaney, Mr. John Bell Scott, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Greene, Mr. Ewart, Lord James Stuart, Mr. Jas. G. Marshall, Mr. Wm. Pittet, Lord Supper, Mr. Staafford, Sir Robert Ferguson, Mr. Littleton, Mr. John Ellis, and Mr. Frederick Pocock.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

THE RIGHT HON. ANDREW RUTHERFORD, M.P. (FOR THE LEITH DISTRICT), LORD ADVOCATE OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. Rutherford was born in 1790, entered the High School at Edinburgh, of which Dr. Adams, the well-known author of the "Roman Antiquities," was at that time Principal, in 1799, soon took lead amongst his fellow pupils, and was awarded the classical gold medal, the highest honour of the school, when he was but fourteen. In 1808 he entered the University of Edinburgh, and became a distinguished member of the Speculative Society, famous as a school of oratory and legal discussion. His contemporaries, amongst others, who afterwards attained distinction in the pulpit, at the bar, or in Parliament, were Lord John Russell and Lord Murray; and amongst his predecessors in the society, were Lord Jeffrey, Mr. Leonard Horner, and Lords Brougham and Lansdowne.

In 1817 Mr. Rutherford was called to the Scottish bar, at which, through his thorough knowledge of law, his skill as a conveyancer, and his aptness as an advocate, he soon became known, and was early and continuously successful. So far as his professional avocations admitted, he aided the agitation for the Reformation of 1820; when the Whig cause, into power, in 1832, he was known as a thorough Liberal, and one of the chief lawyers at the Scottish bar, and was in that year, in conjunction with Messrs. Jardine, Skinner, Dundas, and Anderson (afterwards Scotch Tory Solicitor-General), appointed a member of the Commission to enquire into the state of Conveyancing, and the borough magistrates; they were bound to secure all prisoners, and to meet all the charges of the gaols. Not only criminal offenders, but debtors were committed to their keeping, and, in case of escape, the magistrates became liable to the creditors. The then condition of the gaols would now scarce gain belief. There was no classification; no attention to cleanliness, morality, or health; the prisons were damp, dark, filthy, crowded; certain moral destruction to all who were sent, even for a brief period, within their walls; and, in short, an abomination and disgrace to any civilised country. Mr. Rutherford, in concert with Mr. Fox Maule, brought in a bill, an Act effecting an entire reform in the supervision, management, and discipline of the prisons; a great Improvement Fund was established, consisting, among others, of £100,000, Lord Justice General, Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Advocate, the Solicitor-General, and certain noblemen and gentlemen members of the commission, and amongst whom Lord Melville continued to take an especially active part. The corporations of the several burghs were also empowered to appoint local Prison Boards, subject only to the supervision of the central board. The result has been a complete change in the prisons of Scotland. They are not now behind any others in the kingdom; and the great Penitentiary at Perth has become almost a normal school of prison discipline and management, especially for the reformation and education of juvenile offenders.

Another measure of public importance, to which Mr. Rutherford, on taking office, early directed his attention, was the Scotch Bible monopoly. The rights of printing the Bible in Scotland was reserved exclusively to the Queen's printers. Lord Murray gave no small assistance in the abolition of the monopoly in 1833, and obtained a committee to inquire into its operation. In a view to introducing a bill for the abolition of the exclusive privilege of the Queen's printers, the way, however, was beset with difficulties; the Government were respectively wavering between minorities and the smallest possible majorities, and it was quite certain that no measure could be framed which would have satisfied the House that the monopoly could be abolished, and the authentic version of the Scriptures preserved from innovation. The question, therefore, was waiting for Mr. Rutherford, when he took his seat in 1833. He at once gave up the idea of an act of Parliament, and pointed out that by Royal prerogative the office of Queen's printer could be put into commission, and that thus, by the appointment of an unpaid board, the monopoly might be abolished, and the authentic version of the Scriptures preserved. The suggestion was at once adopted and, in 1841, the Bill was accordingly passed, and the commissioners for executing the acts of Queen's Printer were enabled to grant licenses to print the whole or any portion of the Scriptures to any persons whatever who might give bond for compliance with certain conditions. The practical working of the measure is, that the Secretary of the Board, who, with his readers, are its only paid officers, have the supervision of all publications of the Bible as the sheets pass through the press; they mark every error or alteration from the authorised version; without these are made, and nowhere is more perfect adherence to the established version of the Scriptures to be found than in those printed in Scotland since the abolition of the monopoly. The effect upon the price has been no small boon to the publishing houses which, under the Queen's printers' monopoly, would have cost twice as much, and to the public in the selling and expences.

Mr. Rutherford went out of office in 1841; in 1842 took part with Mr. Fox Maule in his efforts to secure the right of independent spiritual government to the Church of Scotland, and twice brought forward measures for the abolition of the religious tests in the Scotch universities. In 1846 he was elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, and was again appointed Lord Advocate; and in the following year brought in four bills founded upon the recommendation of the Law Commission, doing away with obscure and costly circumlocution, and saving no small amount of expense in the items of drafting, engrossing, stamping, and recording, and effecting an entire change in the practice of conveying in Scotland. But his chief measure of law reform was the abolition, in 1848, of the old Scotch Law of Entail, enacted in 1685, and under which entails were settlements in perpetuity that locked up the whole estate, made mortgages impossible, and stood in the way of any family settlement, or any arrangement for young men, except by the costly course of life insurance. Mr. Rutherford's bill of 1848 was, with some improvements, the law of entail in Scotland to that of England. Until these reforms were taken in hand by the Lord Advocate, they were admitted to be important, but were held to be impossible; and they would have been so to anyone with a less complete knowledge of every point and detail of the matter to be dealt with, or who had less entirely the confidence of the profession and the public. The results of all the measures have amply justified this general confidence. The Entail Act has been taken advantage of to an extent that no one had ventured to predict, and the beneficial effects of the new practice of conveyancing are daily developing themselves. Nor has Mr. Rutherford yet given up his cause of Law Reforms; he has at present a bill before the House for the Reformation of Proceedings before the Courts of Law in Scotland. In 1815, the system of juries in criminal cases was first introduced into Scotland. It has worked well; the practice of requiring unanimity in the jury contrary to the practice in civil cases, has given rise to endless appeals and revivals of litigation; to trial which, the present Bill proposes to give the parties a certain discretion as to how their cause shall be tried—they may select their own jury or arbitrators from one to seven in number; the trial is to be taken as now before the judge, that the arbitrators may have his direction in matters of law; and the decisions are not to be subject to review unless in case of misdirection from the judge on points of law.

Mr. Rutherford has also devoted no small attention to the condition of pauper inmates in Scotland, who are now left wholly unpreserved and uncared for, and last year brought in a bill for the establishment of proper asylums for their protection and treatment. He has also a bill in hand for the general reform of the medical profession, and has been a diligent and active member of the Committee of Inquiry as to the Management and Improvement of the British Asylums.

Mr. Rutherford has been the maker of his own fortune—he had no inherited but his own ability; and has worked his way to distinguished eminence in his profession and office in the state, by diligent attention to business, and laborious mastership of the law. Our portrait is from a coloured photograph by Beard.

THE RIGHT HON. ANDREW RUTHERFORD, M.P. (FOR THE LEITH DISTRICT), LORD ADVOCATE OF SCOTLAND.

entire practice of the Law Courts in Scotland. Between 1832 and 1836, when his labours were completed, the Commission published several parliamentary volumes of reports, in the preparation of which, and especially in regard to conveyancing, Mr. Rutherford took an active and laborious part. Their value is proved by the fact that they have since formed the foundation of most extensive treatises in the practice of nearly every branch of the law in Scotland.

In 1847, Mr. Rutherford, whose ability and complete acquaintance with the law had been well known, was appointed a member of the Commission, and his further success at the bar, was rewarded, in 1850, by the Leith district of burgesses, in the person of Lord Murray, his predecessor in office, and has since, at every election, been returned for the same place, without opposition. At his first election he declared himself an opponent of the immediate repeal of the Corn-laws; but, in 1843, voted with Mr. Villiers' motion for a Committee of the whole House to inquire into their operation, with a view to their repeal; and, in 1846, supported Free-trade.

At the period of Mr. Rutherford's first appointment to the office of Lord Advocate, the entire management of the prisons of Scotland was in the hands of theborough magistrates; they were bound to secure all prisoners, and to meet all the charges of the gaols. Not only criminal offenders, but debtors were committed to their keeping, and, in case of escape, the magistrates became liable to the creditors. There was no classification; no separation of the convicted from those waiting trial; no attention to cleanliness, morality, or health; the prisons were damp, dark, filthy, crowded; certain moral destruction to all who were sent, even for a brief period, within their walls; and, in short, an abomination and disgrace to any civilised country. Mr. Rutherford, in concert with Mr. Fox Maule, brought in a bill, an Act effecting an entire reform in the supervision, management, and discipline of the prisons; a great Improvement Fund was established, consisting, among others, of £100,000, Lord Justice General, Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Advocate, the Solicitor-General, and certain noblemen and gentlemen members of the commission, and amongst whom Lord Melville continued to take an especially active part. The corporations of the several burghs were also empowered to appoint local Prison Boards, subject only to the supervision of the central board. The result has been a complete change in the prisons of Scotland. They are not now behind any others in the kingdom; and the great Penitentiary at Perth has become almost a normal school of prison discipline and management, especially for the reformation and education of juvenile offenders.

Another measure of public importance, to which Mr. Rutherford, on taking office, early directed his attention, was the Scotch Bible monopoly. The rights of printing the Bible in Scotland was reserved exclusively to the Queen's printers. Lord Murray gave no small assistance in the abolition of the monopoly in 1833, and obtained a committee to inquire into its operation. In a view to introducing a bill for the abolition of the exclusive privilege of the Queen's printers, the way, however, was beset with difficulties; the Government were respectively wavering between minorities and the smallest possible majorities, and it was quite certain that no measure could be framed which would have satisfied the House that the monopoly could be abolished, and the authentic version of the Scriptures preserved from innovation. The question, therefore, was waiting for Mr. Rutherford, when he took his seat in 1833. He at once gave up the idea of an act of Parliament, and pointed out that by Royal prerogative the office of Queen's printer could be put into commission, and that thus, by the appointment of an unpaid board, the monopoly might be abolished, and the authentic version of the Scriptures preserved. The suggestion was at once adopted and, in 1841, the Bill was accordingly passed, and the commissioners for executing the acts of Queen's Printer were enabled to grant licenses to print the whole or any portion of the Scriptures to any persons whatever who might give bond for compliance with certain conditions. The practical working of the measure is, that the Secretary of the Board, who, with his readers, are its only paid officers, have the supervision of all publications of the Bible as the sheets pass through the press; they mark every error or alteration from the authorised version; without these are made, and nowhere is more perfect adherence to the established version of the Scriptures to be found than in those printed in Scotland since the abolition of the monopoly. The effect upon the price has been no small boon to the publishing houses which, under the Queen's printers' monopoly, would have cost twice as much, and to the public in the selling and expences.

Mr. Rutherford went out of office in 1841; in 1842 took part with Mr. Fox Maule in his efforts to secure the right of independent spiritual government to the Church of Scotland, and twice brought forward measures for the abolition of the religious tests in the Scotch universities. In 1846 he was elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, and was again appointed Lord Advocate; and in the following year brought in four bills founded upon the recommendation of the Law Commission, doing away with obscure and costly circumlocution, and saving no small amount of expense in the items of drafting, engrossing, stamping, and recording, and effecting an entire change in the practice of conveying in Scotland. But his chief measure of law reform was the abolition, in 1848, of the old Scotch Law of Entail, enacted in 1685, and under which entails were settlements in perpetuity that locked up the whole estate, made mortgages impossible, and stood in the way of any family settlement, or any arrangement for young men, except by the costly course of life insurance. Mr. Rutherford's bill of 1848 was, with some improvements, the law of entail in Scotland to that of England. Until these reforms were taken in hand by the Lord Advocate, they were admitted to be important, but were held to be impossible; and they would have been so to anyone with a less complete knowledge of every point and detail of the matter to be dealt with, or who had less entirely the confidence of the profession and the public. The results of all the measures have amply justified this general confidence. The Entail Act has been taken advantage of to an extent that no one had ventured to predict, and the beneficial effects of the new practice of conveyancing are daily developing themselves. Nor has Mr. Rutherford yet given up his cause of Law Reforms; he has at present a bill before the House for the Reformation of Proceedings before the Courts of Law in Scotland. In 1815, the system of juries in criminal cases was first introduced into Scotland. It has worked well; the practice of requiring unanimity in the jury contrary to the practice in civil cases, has given rise to endless appeals and revivals of litigation; to trial which, the present Bill proposes to give the parties a certain discretion as to how their cause shall be tried—they may select their own jury or arbitrators from one to seven in number; the trial is to be taken as now before the judge, that the arbitrators may have his direction in matters of law; and the decisions are not to be subject to review unless in case of misdirection from the judge on points of law.

Mr. Rutherford has also devoted no small attention to the condition of pauper inmates in Scotland, who are now left wholly unpreserved and uncared for, and last year brought in a bill for the establishment of proper asylums for their protection and treatment. He has also a bill in hand for the general reform of the medical profession, and has been a diligent and active member of the Committee of Inquiry as to the Management and Improvement of the British Asylums.

Mr. Rutherford has been the maker of his own fortune—he had no inherited but his own ability; and has worked his way to distinguished eminence in his profession and office in the state, by diligent attention to business, and laborious mastership of the law. Our portrait is from a coloured photograph by Beard.